CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES

HEARING

BEFORE THE

SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

OF THE

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

UNITED STATES SENATE

NINETY-SIXTH CONGRESS

FIRST SESSION

ON

S. 3, S. 520, and S. 1710

BILLS TO PROVIDE PROCEDURES FOR CALLING CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS FOR PROPOSING AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, ON APPLICATION OF THE LEGISLATURES OF TWO-THIRDS OF THE STATES, PURSUANT TO ARTICLE V OF THE CONSTITUTION

NOVEMBER 29, 1979

Serial No. 96–77

Printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary

U.S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

59-609 O WASHINGTON : 1980

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

[96th Congress]

EDWARD M. KENNEDY, Massachusetts, Chairman

BIRCH BAYH, Indiana
ROBERT C. BYRD, West Virginia
JOSEPH R. BIDEN, Jr., Delaware
JOHN C. CULVER, Iowa
HOWARD M. METZENBAUM, Ohio
DENNIS DeCONCINI, Arizona
PATRICK J. LEAHY, Vermont
MAX BAUCUS, Montana
HOWELL HEFLIN, Alabama

STROM THURMOND, South Carolina
CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, Jr., Maryland
PAUL LAXALT, Nevada
ORRIN G. HATCH, Utah
ROBERT DOLE, Kansas
THAD COCHRAN, Mississippi
ALAN K. SIMPSON, Wyoming

STEPHEN BREYER, Chief Counsel

SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

BIRCH BAYH, Indiana, Chairman

HOWARD M. METZENBAUM, Ohio
DENNIS DeCONCINI, Arizona
HOWELL HEFLIN, Alabama

ORRIN G. HATCH, Utah
STROM THURMOND, South Carolina
ALAN K. SIMPSON, Wyoming

KEVIN O. FALEY, Chief Counsel and Executive Director
MARY K. JOLLY, Staff Director and Counsel
LINDA ROGERS-KINGSBURY, Chief Clerk and Deputy Staff Director
STEVE MARKMAN, Minority Counsel

CONTENTS

OPENING STATEMENTS

PROPOSED LEGISLATION

CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF WITNESSES

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1979

ALPHABETICAL LISTING AND MATERIALS SUBMITTED

APPENDIX

PART 1—ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS, NEWS ARTICLES, AND CORRESPONDENCE

PART 2—BAR ASSOCIATION AND LAW REVIEW ARTICLES

PART 3—PAST LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1979

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met at 9:55 a.m., room 318, Russell Senate Office Building, Hon. Birch Bayh (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Bayh, Thurmond, and Hatch.

Staff present: Kevin O. Faley, chief counsel and executive director; Mary K. Jolly, staff director and counsel; Linda Rogers-Kingsbury, deputy staff director and chief clerk; Christie F. Johnson, clerk; John Minor, counsel to Senator Kennedy; Mike Klipper, counsel to Senator Mathias; Tom Perry, minority chief counsel; Steve Markman, minority counsel; Dennis Shedd, counsel to Senator Thurmond; Chip Wood, counsel to Senator Simpson.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. BIRCH BAYH, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF INDIANA, AND CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Senator BAYH. Today we will begin to consider an important issue and legislation which could lead to profound alteration in the method by which we amend our Constitution—the hitherto unused provisions of article V of the Constitution providing that the States may petition Congress for a Constitutional Convention. The legislation which is the subject of these hearings would establish procedures both for calling such a Convention and for conducting its business.

Throughout these hearings I believe we should keep one thought in mind—calling a Constitutional Convention is the single most significant step our Government could take. We should not underestimate the consequences of this act or the possible unforeseen result of an event such as a Convention, to rewrite the basic law of our land.

As we know, the original and only Constitutional Convention, which was held in Philadelphia in 1787, met "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation". Our country had just concluded a war for our independence and the Government at that time, had no power under the Articles of Confederation to defend the country, collect taxes, or encourage and engage in trade and commerce. The Government for which many fought and suffered was in the midst of another crisis, different from previous experiences, but no less critical. Our country was fighting for its very survival, and as we know, the Articles of Confederation were not amended, but rather replaced with the Constitution of the United States embodying our Bill of Rights.

My purpose as a Senator, is to guard and protect this Constitution, to uphold its integrity and to weigh the impact of suggested revisions or amendments in terms of not only our lifetime, but that of our children and grandchildren. The Constitution has endured and survived for almost 200 years and it has succeeded in keeping secure our basic liberties throughout our history. Our responsibility to this document is one of much gravity and one which cannot be dealt with frivolously or without much thought and consideration.

As chairman of this subcommittee, I am of course, aware of the petitions which have been received by the Congress calling for a Constitutional Convention on a variety of subjects. I am somewhat concerned that some of these petitions have apparently been adopted by State legislatures with no hearings, and no debate. While I believe there can be little question that the receipt of 34 valid petitions for a convention places an obligation on the Congress to call one, I would hope that our legislatures would carefully consider the consequences of these petitions.

I personally do not believe that this is the time to have the wrenching experience of a convention. I recognize however, that we should begin an examination of the questions raised by proposed procedures legislation, before a convention is threatened, to deal with a specific topic, lest views on the substantive issue color what should be neutral decisions about fair procedures.

I am on record that we ought to take the middle ground in framing such a bill—avoiding both those procedures which make constitutional change too easy and those which stifle needed reform altogether.

Let us recognize that if we establish a procedure whereby a Constitutional Convention can propose a constitutional amendment, that convention will be writing the chapter and verse of a proposed constitutional amendment, just as Congress does and has historically done.

The purpose of these hearings is to investigate the many questions that have remained uresolved. In the opinion of some constitutional scholars, some of these questions are unanswerable, even if that is true, we must still make an attempt, we must also make the citizens of the United States aware of the startling realities of the situation. Hopefully these hearings will serve not only that purpose, but also the Constitution.

Without objection I will submit copies of S. 3, S. 520, S. 1710, and a prepared statement by Senator Pryor for the record.

[Text of S. 3, S. 520, S. 1710, and the prepared statement of Senator David Pryor follows:]

96TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. 3

To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

JANUARY 15, 1979

Mr. HELMS introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

---

A BILL

To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act".

APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 2. The legislature of a State, in making application to the Congress for a constitutional convention under article

V of the Constitution of the United States, shall adopt a resolution pursuant to this Act stating, in substance, that the legislature requests the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more amendments to the Constitution of the United States and stating the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

APPLICATION PROCEDURE

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting or rescinding a resolution pursuant to section 2 or section 5 of this Act, the State legislature shall follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute by that legislature, but without the need for approval of the legislature's action by the Governor of the State.

(b) Questions concerning the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act shall be determinable by the Congress of the United States and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

TRANSMITTAL OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) Within thirty days after the adoption by the legislature of a State of a resolution to apply for the calling of a constitutional convention, the secretary of state of the State, or, if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Each copy of the application so made by any State shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution;

(2) the exact text of the resolution signed by the presiding officer of each house of the State legislature; and

(3) the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution; and shall be accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution.

(c) Within ten days after receipt of a copy of any such application, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall report to the House of which he is presiding officer, identifying the State making application, the subject of the application, and the number of States then having made application on such subject. The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall jointly cause copies of such application to be sent to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of every other State and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

EFFECTIVE PERIOD OF APPLICATION

SEC. 5. (a) An application submitted to the Congress by a State, unless sooner rescinded by the State legislature, shall remain effective for seven calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, except that whenever within a period of seven calendar years two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same subject all such applications shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 6 of this Act, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State may rescind its application calling for a constitutional convention by adopting and transmitting to the Congress a resolution of rescission in conformity with the procedure specified in sections 3 and 4 of this Act, except that no such rescission shall be effective as to any valid application made for a constitutional convention upon any subject after the date on which two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have valid applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same subject.

(c) Questions concerning the rescission of a State's application shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

CALLING OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 6. (a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to maintain a record of all applications received by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives from States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon each subject. Whenever applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same subject have been received, the Secretary and the Clerk shall so report in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer thereupon shall announce on the floor of the House of which he is an officer the substance of such report. It shall be the duty of such House to determine that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds of the States with respect to the same subject. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and time of meeting of the convention, and (2) set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called. A copy of each such concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress shall be transmitted forthwith to the Governor and to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of each State.

(b) The convention shall be convened not later than one year after adoption of the resolution.

DELEGATES

SEC. 7. (a) A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. In each State two delegates shall be elected at large and one delegate shall be elected from each congressional district in the manner provided by law. Any vacancy occurring in a State delegation shall be filled by appointment of the Governor of that State.

(b) The secretary of state of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function shall certify to the Vice President of the United States the name of each delegate elected or appointed by the Governor pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(d) Each delegate shall receive compensation for each day of service and shall be compensated for traveling and related expenses. Provision shall be made therefor in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. The convention shall fix the compensation of employees of the convention.

CONVENING THE CONVENTION

SEC. 8. (a) The Vice President of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office of the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe to an oath by which he shall be committed during the conduct of the convention to refrain from proposing or casting his vote in favor of any proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to any subject which is not named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called. Upon the election of permanent officers of the convention, the names of such officers shall be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the elected presiding officer of the convention. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as the convention may adopt.

(b) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses of the convention.

(c) The Administrator of the General Services shall provide such facilities, and the Congress and each executive department, agency, or authority of the United States, including the legislative branch and the judicial branch, except that no declaratory judgment may be required, shall provide such information and assistance as the convention may require, upon written request made by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

PROCEDURES OF THE CONVENTION

SEC. 9. (a) In voting on any question before the convention, including the proposal of amendments, each delegate shall have one vote.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily verbatim record of its proceedings and publish the same. The vote of the delegates on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

(d) Within thirty days after the termination of the proceedings of the convention, the presiding officer shall transmit to the Archivist of the United States all records of official proceedings of the convention.

PROPOSAL OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 10. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a vote of a majority of the total number of delegates to the convention.

(b) No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. Questions arising under this subsection shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

APPROVAL BY THE CONGRESS AND TRANSMITTAL TO THE STATES FOR RATIFICATION

SEC. 11. (a) The presiding officer of the convention shall, within thirty days after the termination of its proceedings, submit to the Congress the exact text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention.

(b)(1) Whenever a constitutional convention called under this Act has transmitted to the Congress a proposed amendment to the Constitution, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such amendment to the Administrator of General

59-609 O - 80 - 2

Services upon the expiration of the first period of ninety days of continuous session of the Congress following the date of receipt of such amendment unless within that period both Houses of the Congress have agreed to (A) a concurrent resolution directing the earlier transmission of such amendment to the Administrator of General Services and specifying in accordance with article V of the Constitution the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified, or (B) a concurrent resolution stating that the Congress disapproves the submission of such proposed amendment to the States because such proposed amendment relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called, or because the procedures followed by the convention in proposing the amendment were not in substantial conformity with the provisions of this Act. No measure agreed to by the Congress which expresses disapproval of any such proposed amendment for any other reason, or without a statement of any reason, shall relieve the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the obligation imposed upon them by the first sentence of this paragraph.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1) of this subsection, (A) the continuity of a session of the Congress shall be broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and

(B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of the period of ninety days.

(c) Upon receipt of any such proposed amendment to the Constitution, the Administrator shall transmit forthwith to each of the several States a duly certified copy thereof, a copy of any concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress which prescribes the time within which and the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified, and a copy of this Act.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. (a) Any amendment proposed by the convention and submitted to the States in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when duly ratified by three-fourths of the States in the manner and within the time specified.

(b) Acts of ratification shall be by convention or by State legislative action as the Congress may direct or as specified in subsection (c) of this section. For the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments transmitted to the States pursuant to this Act the State legislatures shall adopt their own rules of procedure. Any State action ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

(c) Except as otherwise prescribed by concurrent resolution of the Congress, any proposed amendment to the Constitution shall become valid when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of the submission thereof to the States, or within such other period of time as may be prescribed by such proposed amendment.

(d) The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State action ratifying any proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services.

RESCISSION OF RATIFICATIONS

SEC. 13. (a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment by the same processes by which it ratified the proposed amendment, except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendment by three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.

(c) Questions concerning State ratification or rejection of amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States, shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States, and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

PROCLAMATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 14. The Administrator of General Services, when three-fourths of the several States have ratified a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 15. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date specified therein or, if no date is specified, then on the date on which the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the States of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

Calendar No. 64

96TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. 520

To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

MARCH 1 (legislative day, FEBRUARY 22), 1979

Mr. HELMS introduced the following bill; which was read the first time

APRIL 9, 1979

Read the second time and ordered placed on the calendar, by unanimous consent

---

A BILL

To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Constitutional Convention Procedures Act".

APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 2. The legislature of a State, in making application to the Congress for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States, shall adopt a resolution pursuant to this Act stating, in substance, that the legislature requests the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more amendments to the Constitution of the United States and stating the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

APPLICATION PROCEDURE

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting or rescinding a resolution pursuant to section 2 or section 5 of this Act, the State legislature shall follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute by that legislature, but without the need for approval of the legislature's action by the Governor of the State.

(b) Questions concerning the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act shall be determinable by the Congress of the United States and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

TRANSMITTAL OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) Within thirty days after the adoption by the legislature of a State of a resolution to apply for the calling of a constitutional convention, the secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Each copy of the application so made by any State shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution;

(2) the exact text of the resolution, signed by the presiding officer of each house of the State legislature, and

(3) the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution; and shall be accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution.

(c) Within ten days after receipt of a copy of any such application, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall report to the House of which he is presiding officer, identifying the State making application, the subject of the application, and the number of States then having made application on such subject. The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall jointly cause copies of such application to be sent to the presiding officer of each House of the legislature of every other State and to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

EFFECTIVE PERIOD OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) An application submitted to the Congress by a State, unless sooner rescinded by the State legislature, shall remain effective for seven calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, except that whenever within a period of seven calendar years two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same subject all such applications shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 6, of this Act calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State may rescind its application calling for a constitutional convention by adopting and transmitting to the Congress a resolution of rescission in conformity with the procedure specified in sections 3 and 4, except that no such rescission shall be effective as to any valid application made for a constitutional convention upon any subject after the date on which two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have valid applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same subject.

(c) Questions concerning the rescission of a State's application shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

CALLING OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 6. (a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to maintain a record of all applications received by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives from States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon each subject. Whenever applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same subject have been received, the Secretary and the Clerk shall so report in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer thereupon shall announce on the floor of the House of which he is an officer the substance of such report. It shall be the duty of such House to determine that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds of the States with respect to the same subject. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and time of meeting of the convention, and (2) set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called. A copy of each such concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress shall be transmitted forthwith to the Governor and to the presiding officer of each House of the legislature of each State.

(b) The convention shall be convened not later than one year after the adoption of the resolution.

DELEGATES

SEC. 7. (a) A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. In each State two delegates shall be elected at large and one delegate shall be elected from each Congressional district in the manner provided by law. Any vacancy occurring in a State delegation shall be filled by appointment of the Governor of that State.

(b) The secretary of state of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function shall certify to the Vice President of the United States the name of each delegate elected or appointed by the Governor pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(d) Each delegate shall receive compensation for each day of service and shall be compensated for traveling and related expenses. Provision shall be made therefore in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. The convention shall fix the compensation of employees of the convention.

CONVENING THE CONVENTION

SEC. 8. (a) The Vice President of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office of the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe to an oath by which he shall be committed during the conduct of the convention to refrain from proposing or casting his vote in favor of any proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to any subject which is not named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called. Upon the election of permanent officers of the convention, the names of such officers shall be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as the convention may adopt.

(b) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses of the convention.

(c) The Administrator of the General Services shall provide such facilities, and the Congress and each executive department, agency, or authority of the United States, including the legislative branch and the judicial branch except that no declaratory judgment may be required shall provide such information and assistance as the convention may require, upon written request made by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

PROCEDURES OF THE CONVENTION

SEC. 9. (a) In voting on any question before the convention, including the proposal of amendments, each delegate shall have one vote.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily verbatim record of its proceedings and publish the same. The vote of the delegates on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

(d) Within thirty days after the termination of the proceedings of the convention, the presiding officer shall transmit to the Archivist of the United States all records of official proceedings of the convention.

PROPOSAL OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 10. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a vote of a majority of the total number of delegates to the convention.

(b) No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. Questions arising under this subsection shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

APPROVAL BY THE CONGRESS AND TRANSMITTAL TO THE STATES FOR RATIFICATION

SEC. 11. (a) The presiding officer of the convention shall, within thirty days after the termination of its proceedings, submit to the Congress the exact text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention.

(b)(1) Whenever a constitutional convention called under this Act has transmitted to the Congress a proposed amendment to the Constitution, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such amendment to the Administrator of General Services upon the expiration of the first period of ninety days of continuous session of the Congress following the date of receipt of such amendment unless within that period both Houses of the Congress have agreed to (A) a concurrent resolution directing the earlier transmission of such amendment to the Administrator of General Services and specifying in accordance with article V of the Constitution the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified, or (B) a concurrent resolution stating that the Congress disapproves the submission of such proposed amendment to the States because such proposed amendment relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called, or because the procedures followed by the convention in proposing the amendment were not in substantial conformity with the provisions of this Act. No measure agreed to by the Congress which expresses disapproval of any such proposed amendment for any other reason, or without a statement of any reason, shall relieve the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the obligation imposed upon them by the first sentence of this paragraph.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1) of this subsection, (A) the continuity of a session of the Congress shall be broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and (B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of the period of ninety days.

(c) Upon receipt of any such proposed amendment to the Constitution, the Administrator shall transmit forthwith to each of the several States a duly certified copy thereof, a copy of any concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress which prescribes the time within which and the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified, and a copy of this Act.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. (a) Any amendment proposed by the convention and submitted to the States in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when duly ratified by three-fourths of the States in the manner and within the time specified.

(b) Acts of ratification shall be by convention or by State legislative action as the Congress may direct or as specified in subsection (c) of this section. For the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments transmitted to the States pursuant to this Act the State legislatures shall adopt their own rules of procedure. Any State action ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

(c) Except as otherwise prescribed by concurrent resolution of the Congress, any proposed amendment to the Constitution shall become valid when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years of the date of the submission thereof to the States, or within such other period of time as may be prescribed by such proposed amendment.

(d) The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State action ratifying any proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services.

RESCISSION OF RATIFICATIONS

SEC. 13. (a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment by the same processes by which it ratified the proposed amendment, except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendment by three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.

59-609 O - 80 - 3

(c) Questions concerning State ratification or rejection of amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

PROCLAMATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 14. The Administrator of General Services, when three-fourths of the several States have ratified a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 15. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date specified therein or, if no date is specified, then on the date on which the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the States of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

96TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. 1710

To provide procedures for calling Federal constitutional conventions under article V for the purpose of proposing amendments to the United States Constitution.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

SEPTEMBER 5 (legislative day, JUNE 21), 1979

Mr. HATCH introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

---

A BILL

To provide procedures for calling Federal constitutional conventions under article V for the purpose of proposing amendments to the United States Constitution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Constitutional Convention Implemention Act of 1979".

APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 2. (a) The legislature of a State, in making application to the Congress for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States, shall adopt a resolution pursuant to this Act stating, in substance, that the legislature requests the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more specific amendments to the Constitution of the United States and stating the general subject of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

(b) The procedures provided by this Act are required to be used whenever application is made to the Congress, under article V of the Constitution of the United States, for the calling of any convention for the purposes of proposing one or more specific amendments to the Constitution of the United States, each applying State stating in the terms of its application the general subject of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

APPLICATION PROCEDURE

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting or withdrawing a resolution pursuant to section 2 and section 5 of this Act, the State legislature shall follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute by that legislature, except that the action shall be valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

(b) Questions concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption or withdrawal of a State resolution cognizable under this Act are determinable by the State legislature.

TRANSMITTAL OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) Within thirty days after the adoption by the legislature of a State of a resolution to apply for the calling of a constitutional convention, the secretary of state of the State, or, if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Each copy of the application so made by any State shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution, the exact text of the resolution signed by the presiding officer of each house of the State legislature, the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution, and a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution; and

(2) to the extent practicable, a list of all State applications in effect on the date of adoption whose subject or subjects are substantially the same as the subject or subjects set forth in the application.

(c) Within ten days after receipt of a copy of any such application, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall report to the House of which he is presiding officer, identifying the State making application, the general subject of the application, and the number of States then having made application on such subject. The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall jointly cause copies of such application to be sent to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of every other State and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

EFFECTIVE PERIOD OF APPLICATION

SEC. 5. (a) An application submitted to the Congress by a State, unless sooner withdrawn by the State legislature, shall remain effective for the lesser of the period specified in such application by the State legislature or for a period of seven calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, except that whenever within a period of seven calendar years two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same general subject all such applications shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 6 of this Act, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State may withdraw its application calling for a constitutional convention by adopting and transmitting to the Congress a resolution of withdrawal in conformity with the procedures specified in sections 3 and 4 of this Act, except that no such withdrawal shall be effective as to any valid application made for a constitutional convention upon any subject after the date on which two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have valid applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same general subjects.

CALLING OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 6. (a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to maintain a record of all applications received by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives from States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon each general subject. Whenever applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same general subject have been received, the Secretary and the Clerk shall so report within five days, in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer within five days thereupon shall announce on the floor of the House of which he is an officer the substance of such report. It shall then be the duty of such House to determine that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds of the States with respect to the same general subject. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same general subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that general subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and time of meeting of the convention, and (2) set forth the general subject of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called. A copy of each such concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress shall be transmitted forthwith to the Governor and to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of each State.

(b) The convention shall be convened not later than six months after adoption of the resolution.

DELEGATES

SEC. 7. (a) Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of delegates, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress. No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed as delegate. Any vacancy occurring in a State delegation shall be filled by appointment of the legislature of that State.

(b) The secretary of state of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function shall certify to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives the name of each delegate elected or appointed by the legislature of the State pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

CONVENING THE CONVENTION

SEC. 8. (a) Of those persons serving as chief justices of the State supreme courts, the person who is senior in years of service as such a chief justice shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office of the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe to an oath by which he shall be committed during the conduct of the convention to comply with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this Act. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act as the convention may adopt.

(b) No Federal funds may be appropriated specifically for the purposes of payment of the expenses of the convention.

(c) The Administrator of the General Services shall provide such facilities, and the Congress and each executive department, agency, or authority of the United States, including the legislative branch and the judicial branch, except that no declaratory judgment may be required, shall provide such information and assistance as the convention may require, upon written request made by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

PROCEDURES OF THE CONVENTION

SEC. 9. (a) In voting on any question before the convention, including the proposal of amendments, each delegate shall have one vote.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily verbatim record of its proceedings and publish the same. The vote of the delegates on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) Within thirty days after the termination of the proceedings of the convention, the presiding officer shall transmit to the Archivist of the United States all records of official proceedings of the convention.

PROPOSAL OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 10. No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a general subject different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention.

APPROVAL BY THE CONGRESS AND TRANSMITTAL TO THE STATES FOR RATIFICATION

SEC. 11. (a) The presiding officer of the convention shall, within thirty days after the termination of its proceedings, submit to the Congress the exact text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention.

(b)(1) Whenever a constitutional convention called under this Act has transmitted to the Congress a proposed amendment to the Constitution, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such amendment to the Administrator of General Services upon the expiration of the first period of thirty days of continuous session of the Congress following the date of receipt of such amendment unless within that period both Houses of the Congress have agreed to (A) a concurrent resolution directing the earlier transmission of such amendment to the Administrator of General Services and specifying in accordance with article V of the Constitution the mode of ratification in which such amendment shall be ratified, or (B) a concurrent resolution stating that the Congress disapproves the submission of such proposed amendment to the States because such proposed amendment relates to or includes a general subject which differs from or was not included as one of the general subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called. No measure agreed to by the Congress which expresses disapproval of any such proposed amendment for any other reason, or without a statement of any reason, shall relieve the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the obligation imposed upon them by the first sentence of this paragraph.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1) of this subsection, (A) the continuity of a session of the Congress shall be broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and (B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of the period of thirty days.

(c) Upon receipt of any such proposed amendment to the Constitution, the Administrator shall transmit forthwith to each of the several States a duly certified copy thereof, a copy of any concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress which prescribes the mode in which such amendment shall be ratified, and a copy of this Act. Such concurrent resolution may also prescribe the time within which such amendment shall be ratified in the event that the amendment itself contains no such provision. In no case shall such a resolution prescribe a period for ratification of less than four years.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. (a) Any amendment proposed by the convention and submitted to the States in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when duly ratified by three-fourths of the States in the manner and within the time specified consistent with the provisions of article V of the Constitution of the United States.

(b) The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State action ratifying any proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services.

RESCISSION OF RATIFICATIONS

SEC. 13. (a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment by the same processes by which it ratified the proposed amendment, except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendment by three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.

PROCLAMATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 14. The Administrator of General Services, when three-fourths of the several States have ratified a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

SEC. 15. (a) Any State aggrieved by any determination or finding, or by any failure of Congress to make a determination or finding within the periods provided, under section 6 or section 11 of this Act may bring an action in the Supreme Court of the United States against the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives or, where appropriate, the Administrator of General Services, and such other parties as may be necessary to afford the relief sought. Such an action shall be given priority on the Court's docket.

(b) Every claim arising under this Act shall be barred unless suit is filed thereon within sixty days after such claim first arises.

(c) The right to review by the Supreme Court provided under subsection (a) does not limit or restrict the right to judicial review of any other determination or decision made under this Act of such review as is otherwise provided by the Constitution or any other law of the United States.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 16. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date specified therein or, if no date is specified, then on the date on which the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the States of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HON. DAVID PRYOR, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF ARKANSAS

Thank you, Senator Bayh, for this opportunity to testify before your Subcommittee on the Constitution. I must state at the outset that I strongly oppose the use of a constitutional convention to amend our Constitution. Some of my concerns are expressed in these remarks. The bottom line of my concern is that attempting to amend our Constitution by the conventional method would be opening a Pandora's Box.

That does not mean, however, that this discussion is not important. At the present time a number of states have submitted resolutions calling for a convention. To ignore these is to court danger. It is important that we discuss the possibility of a constitutional convention in an environment free from the pressures surrounding the current issues which may be topics of future constitutional conventions. I was pleased to hear of efforts to limit narrowly the testimony on these bills, and not deal with particular issues which might be before a constitutional convention. Earlier attempts have been bogged down in these pressing but side issues.

Prior to the preparation of my testimony, the staff of the Subcommittee submitted numerous questions for my consideration. Though I may not address each and every one, I will attempt in my testimony to comment on those I feel are of major importance or I have personal experiences which may be beneficial to the Subcommittee.

Article V of the Constitution provides two procedures for amending that document. Two-thirds of both Houses of Congress may propose amendments or two-thirds of the states may request the Congress to call a constitutional convention. Under the second method, Congress has two obligations: (1) to call the convention and (2) to select the mode of ratification. But its responsibility is more complex than that. The duty to call a constitutional convention contains the responsibility of Congress to determine the validity of the state resolutions. I do not believe this determination can be delegated to the states as is proposed in S. 1710. What is needed is a uniform review by Congress of the state resolutions. Congress should explore the intent of the resolutions submitted by each state legislature. I see no problem in each state applying procedures consistent with the normal passage of resolutions. States may differ in these procedures, but this should not be grounds to reject resolutions regardless of the use or exclusion of certain officials, votes or referendums.

I do not believe, however, that efforts, either by the states or by the Congress, to limit the scope of the convention are constitutional. While I was Governor of Arkansas, I proposed and the legislature adopted legislation calling for a limited state constitutional convention. The convention never convened, however, because the Supreme Court of Arkansas struck down this attempt to hold a limited convention. The Court held in Pryor v. Lowe, "delegates to a constitutional convention are exercising that * * * power inherent in the people * * *" 523 S.W.2d 202. The attempt of the Arkansas Legislature to limit the scope of the convention was viewed by the Court to be a usurpation of the power of the citizens of the state. The Court left open the situation when the electorate passed on the limitations placed on a convention.

This country's only experience with a constitutional convention supports, I believe, my position. The constitutional convention of 1787 exceeded its purported call. The call was for the "sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of the Confederation." The result of the convention was the Constitution by which we rule ourselves today. Their drafting of a new constitution was justified by those who now seek a limited convention as valid due to the impending dissolution of the republic. The unity of the republic is a subjective opinion, and should not be confused with the right of the people to propose a new constitution or amendments to the present constitution.

Proponents of a limited convention cite the language of the Constitutional Convention of 1787. The American Bar Association quoted proposed language which contained specific wording inferring the calling of a limited convention. This language was omitted from the resulting Constitution; however, the ABA contends that the intent is still embodied in the Constitution. I would suspect this to be just the reverse, removing the wording removes the option to hold a limited convention. Assuming a limited convention cannot be called, then no limiting oath or other means to accomplish this end can be permitted. Even though it would not be required, I would hope that the delegates to the convention would do their best to heed the advisory comments and instructions contained in their state resolution.

Many of the state resolutions before Congress are worded to be effective only if a limited convention is called. If a limited convention may not be called, as I think it cannot, then it is only appropriate that these state resolutions are invalid. If the state legislature's resolution will permit a general convention, although recommending only a single subject of consideration, there appears to be no problem in these continuing in force.

Both S. 3 and S. 1710 address the selection of delegates to a constitutional convention. The act which authorized the 1976 Arkansas Constitutional Convention provided for the appointment of delegates by the governor. Since the Arkansas Supreme Court in Pryor v. Lowe held the call for a convention void on other grounds, it did not review the selection of delegates. The dissent, however, did address the issue of selection of delegates. The dissenters indicated a preference for a direct election of delegates, but found no provisions in the state constitution or statutes prohibiting the appointment of delegates. As to whether public officials should be allowed to serve as delegates, the 1970 Arkansas case of Harvey v. Ridgeway would seem to be instructive. The court in that case held participation in the convention was not similar to employment in any other office in the state. A constitutional convention is equal to and independent from existing branches of government. The Court found no conflict in any dual employment as a delegate and employee of a particular branch of government. I see no reason why any individual needs to be excluded from the pool of minds available to assist in the drafting of a new amendment.

Some provisions will be necessary to address the convening of a constitutional convention. Article V provides for the calling of the convention and the selection of the mode for ratification of amendments by the states. Congress may provide under the power granted by Article I's "Necessary and proper clause" for procedures necessary for the convention. I believe Congress possesses the power to provide for such matters as the time and place of the convention, financing of the convention, and to provide for the initial opening procedures.

While I believe that Congress should appropriate funds to finance a constitutional convention, there seems to be no obligation to do so under Article V. If Congress did not appropriate funds in the call for the constitutional convention, it would be necessary for the states to pay the expenses on some proportioned basis. I do not support the requirement of annual authorization by Congress. Congress should not be in a position to use the authorization process to influence the work of the convention.

S. 1710 provides for the nation's senior State Supreme Court Justice to convene the convention. I have no objection to such a procedure but fail to see the reason for doing so. Senator Helms' bill provides for the Vice President to preside on the opening day. This method appears to be simpler and more practical than the use of a state justice.

The vote on final passage of any amendment submitted by the Convention should parallel the two-thirds requirement imposed on Congress in submitting amendments to the States. Some who seek lower voting requirements feel the three-fourths vote by the States needed for ratification is a sufficient check. I can see no reason, however, to exempt the convention from the two-thirds requirement. On procedural matters and amendments to the proposed amendments, I would allow the convention itself to determine the required percentage.

I do not support the provisions in these bills which remove the constitution convention from judicial review. Congress has discretion in interpreting Article V, but neither Congress, the convention nor the states should be the final arbitration in every situation involving the convention.

The final responsibility of Congress under Article V is to propose the method of ratification. Automatic submission by the Administrator of the General Services Administration to the states is inappropriate and will not likely prove binding on future Congresses.

Mr. Chairman, these are a few of my thoughts on the bills before your Subcommittee. I appreciate your inviting me to testify. Let me end my statement as I began it—that is by restating my strong opposition to using the convention method to amend our Constitution.

59-609 O - 80 - 4

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. STROM THURMOND, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Chairman, today we begin hearings on an uncharted area of our Constitution. We are here to discuss that portion of article V which authorizes a Constitutional Convention. While we have come close to such a convention in the past, we have never used this approach to amend the Constitution. However, we are now faced with the very real possibility of convening such a body, because 30 of the required 34 States have requested one.

The possibility of a convention invokes mixed feelings. While some people fear that a convention would be uncontrollable, others see it as limited to one or two very specific, well-defined amendments. While some believe that the risks involved in a convention outweigh any possible benefit, others think that it represents a needed check on an unresponsive Federal Government.

Whatever one's feelings are on the usefulness of the convention method for amending the Constitution, there appears to be a consensus on what the fundamental questions are. First, we must consider the validity of State applications for a convention. This discussion includes the issue of a State's ability to rescind its application. Second, we must consider the scope of the deliberations at the convention. This discussion must focus on whether these deliberations can be limited, and if they are to be limited, then how those limits are to be enforced.

Since there is very little precedent to guide us, we have no hard and fast answers to these tough questions. We must look to the reasoning and interpretation by the Framers of the Constitution for assistance. We must fully consider all the possible ramifications of a convention and attempt to find the best solutions to any problems which we can foresee. Hopefully, these hearings will help us find those solutions.

We are fortunate to have such distinguished witnesses with us today. By their presence, they indicate their desire to help fashion reasonable solutions. I look forward to participating in these very important discussions.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. ORRIN G. HATCH, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH

Senator HATCH. Let's call this session of the Subcommittee on the Constitution to order. We have an impressive list of witnesses here today, and I apologize for being a little bit late, but we had a conflict that I had to resolve before I could get down here.

I wish to congratulate our chairman, Senator Bayh, for convening hearings on the subject of procedures for article V Constitutional Conventions. I am well aware of the chairman's long interest in this matter, and the leadership role he played in this issue several sessions ago.

In considering this isue, this committee is embarking upon a complex issue of the first constitutional magnitude. The question that this committee will be deciding are threshold questions, for the most part. There is no precedent that will guide our decisions. There is no tradition and no experience to which we can look for example. And there is surprisingly little in the way of documentary material to provide insight into the expectations of those who drafted our Constitution.

Each of us, in my opinion, must look carefully to the plain language of the Constitution, to provide whatever guidance of which it is capable. We must look to the actions of the Philadelphia convention to discern what we can from it. And we must look to the policies that the founders hoped to achieve through article V and conform our procedures legislation appropriately. I am extremely enthusiastic about the quality of witnesses that our subcommittee will have before it today, and I am confident that each of them will enable us to make wiser and more informed decisions on this legislation.

At the outset, I would like to state my strong hope that each of us, committee members, witnesses, the media, and the public, will be able to view this issue apart from the issues that seem immediately to be compelling some States to seek a Constitutional Convention. Several years ago, the issue was reapportionment; today it is a balanced budget; tomorrow it will be something else. To the best of our abilities, we must place aside the merits of these individual amendment efforts.

What this committee is considering, rather, is legislation to establish neutral procedures to guide the conduct of Constitutional Conventions generally. While the imminence of a convention on the matter of a balanced budget has obviously created the urgency for this legislation, this committee's burden is to produce procedures legislation designed neither to facilitate nor to obstruct the achievement of a balanced budget amendment, or any other amendment. This legislation will remain applicable to convention initiatives long after a balanced budget amendment has been disposed of one way or the other.

Before we begin, I would very quickly like to summarize the premises that underlie S. 1710, my Constitutional Convention Implementation Act. First, it supposes that an article V convention can be limited. That is, if the States have a narrow or precise grievance of a constitutional sort, it is not necessary that they place the entire Constitution in jeopardy in order to remedy their concerns. A convention may, in fact, be limited in the scope of its considerations.

Second, I sense that the founders in establishing the convention alternative were concerned that the strong desires of the States should not be obstructed permanently by the will of an intransigent Congress. Congress, as with any other institution, is sometimes less than enthusiastic about limiting its own power and authority. Thus, I have sought in my bill to limit opportunities for congressional obstruction in the Constitutional Convention process. It would be dubious policy in my opinion, and inconsistent with the objectives of article V, to permit Congress to loom over this process in such a way that the legitimate concerns of the States could not, at some point, be pursued through the alternative amendment process.

We will begin today by hearing from the Secretary of the Senate, Mr. Stanley Kimmitt.

Stan, I apologize for being late. I know you are very busy, and we appreciate hearing from you.

TESTIMONY OF J. S. KIMMITT, SECRETARY OF THE SENATE

Mr. KIMMITT. Thank you, Senator Hatch. Thank you for providing me an opportunity to appear before your subcommittee today to discuss the method employed by the Office of the Secretary of the Senate in processing petitions and memorials received by the Senate.

It is my understanding that before I became Secretary of the Senate original petitions or memorials from State legislatures, rather than copies, were referred to committees. Apparently, this procedure was adopted because of difficulties in duplicating these documents at that time.

The original petitions or memorials were delivered to the committees, and receipt cards were signed and returned to the Office of the Secretary where they were retained on file. Thus, a record was kept on the referral and receipt of all documents.

Upon becoming Secretary of the Senate, I undertook a review of the procedures within the Office. It was during this review that I noted original petitions and memorials were being forwarded to committees. In some cases, they were lost or unaccounted for. Since rule VII, paragraph 6 of the Standing Rules of the Senate states that original petitions and memorials are to be retained within the files of the Office of the Secretary, the procedure was promptly changed.

However, the Senate rules were revised on November 14 of this year, by the adoption of Senate Resolution 274 and now contain no provision to this effect. It is still my intention, unless otherwise directed, to continue the same procedure now in effect.

The current procedure for processing petitions and memorials is as follows:

The documents are received by the Senate Parliamentarian from the Office of the Vice President. The Parliamentarian reads and endorses them with the date and committees to which they are to be referred.

They are then hand delivered to the assistant reported within my office where they are numbered, recorded in the Journal, printed in full in the Congressional Record, and entered in the computer records system. The documents are numbered consecutively, beginning anew with each Congress, a process which was instituted recently so that they could be included in the computer system.

After proper entries have been completed, the communications are then Xeroxed and copies sent to the appropriate committees, together with receipt cards which are signed and returned. The original documents and receipt cards are then retained in the files of this Office.

The Secretary's Office never kept records of States making application for a Constitutional Convention. However, I directed my staff to conduct a search of those original communications in our possession, beginning with 1978, to determine from which States we have received petitions or memorials relating to a balanced Federal budget. The attached table details those States which have forwarded communications to the Senate.

As to petitions and memorials prior to 1978, it is my understanding that originals are in the possession of the Committee on the Judiciary.

That completes my statement.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your testimony, Stan, and for bringing us up to date on your procedures.

There are 30 States that have called for a Constitutional Convention on the subject of the balanced budget amendment, or something approximating that. Yet, your list contains the names of only 24 States. Among those that your list does not include are Delaware, 1975; Georgia, 1976; Maryland, 1975; Nevada, 1977; and Virginia, 1976. If I could ask, why is there this discrepancy, and in view of the fact that the constitutional convention effort was so close to success several years ago in the area of reapportionment, why have we not adopted housekeeping procedures that would have resolved these problems in the past?

Mr. KIMMITT. I can only assume, Senator Hatch, that those petitions that are not on our list are in the possession of the committee. The previous procedure that I outlined, was not a tight one and our Office apparently dropped the ball in not keeping track of those petitions.

Senator HATCH. I would think you ought to get your files up to date so the reports can be made more accurately. Can we do that?

The subcommittee has the copies, so why don't we get them to you so that you have them all.

Mr. KIMMITT. That would bring us up to date.

Senator HATCH. Apparently, Nevada has not yet formally sent us their convention application so that only 29 should presently be on file.

I think that is the way to do it. I think it is better for you to keep them and send copies to the committee, because we have lost them in the past. I commend your efforts in this regard, and appreciate your testimony.

Thank you so much, Senator, any questions?

Senator THURMOND. We are glad to have you with us, and thank you for your statement. I wanted to ask you this question: Are these petitions generally sent to the Archives, or the Secretary of the Senate, or to the committees? Where is the official place it should be sent?

Mr. KIMMITT. They come first to the Vice President, as the President of the Senate, and he transmits them to my Office, specifically to the Office of the Parliamentarian. The Parliamentarian reviews them and determines to which committee they should be referred. Entries are then prepared for the Senate Journal, the Congressional Record, and the Senate computer system. After being properly recorded, the documents are then duplicated, and copies forwarded to the committees.

The original, under the rules, should have been kept and it is now being kept in the Office of the Secretary. As long as the item is active, the original remains in the Office of the Secretary and a copy in your committee. When the matter has been disposed of, it will then be transferred to the Archives which is the permanent repository.

Senator THURMOND. Then the petitions should be sent to the Secretary of the Senate, and he would keep them and send copies to the committees, and it would remain on Capitol Hill as long as it is active, and after it becomes inactive, it would be sent to the Archives.

Mr. KIMMITT. Yes.

Senator THURMOND. Thank you very much.

[Mr. Kimmitt's prepared statement with an attachment follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF J. S. KIMMITT

Mr. Chairman, thank you for providing me an opportunity to appear before your Subcommittee today to discuss the method employed by the Office of the Secretary of the Senate in processing Petitions and Memorials received by the Senate.

It is my understanding that before I became Secretary of the Senate original Petitions or Memorials from state legislatures, rather than copies, were referred to committees. Apparently, this procedure was adopted because of difficulties in duplicating these documents at that time.

The original Petitions or Memorials were delivered to the committees, and receipt cards were signed and returned to the Office of the Secretary where they were retained on file. Thus, a record was kept on the referral and receipt of all documents.

Upon becoming Secretary of the Senate, I undertook a review of procedures within the Office. It was during this review that I noted original Petitions and Memorials were being forwarded to committees. In some cases, they were lost or unaccounted for. Since Rule VII, paragraph 6 of the Standing Rules of the Senate states that original Petitions and Memorials are to be retained within the files of the Office of the Secretary, the procedure was promptly changed. However, the Senate Rules were revised on November 14 of this year (see S. Res. 274) and now contain no provision to this effect. It is still my intention, though, unless otherwise directed, to continue the same procedure now in effect.

The current procedure for processing Petitions and Memorials is as follows:

The documents are received by the Senate Parliamentarian from the Office of the Vice President. The Parliamentarian reads and endorses them with the date and committees to which they are to be referred.

They are then hand delivered to the Assistant Reporter within my office where they are numbered, recorded in the Journal, printed in full in the Congressional Record, and entered in the Computer Records System. The documents are numbered consecutively, beginning anew with each Congress, a process which was instituted recently so that they could be included in the computer system.

After proper entries have been completed, the communications are then xeroxed and copies sent to the proper committees, together with receipt cards which are signed and returned. The original documents and receipt cards are then retained in the files of the Office.

The Secretary's Office never kept records of states making application for a Constitutional Convention. However, I directed my staff to conduct a search of those original communications in our possession, beginning with 1978, to determine from which states we have received Petitions or Memorials relating to a balanced Federal budget. The attached table details those states which have forwarded communications to the Senate.

As to Petitions and Memorials prior to 1978, it is my understanding that originals are in the possession of the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS

State	Date received, Secretary of Senate	Assigned POM No.	Legislative Doc. No.
Alabama	Mar. 13, 1979	91	H.J. Res. 227.
Arizona	Apr. 10, 1979	149	S.J. Res. 1002.
Arkansas	Mar. 8, 1979	78	H.J. Res. 1.
Colorado	Apr. 5, 1978	579	S.J. Mem. No. 1.
Florida	Mar. 1, 1979	59	S. Mem. 234.
	do	60	H. Mem. 2801.
Idaho	do	64	H. Con. Res. 7.
Indiana	May 1, 1979	192	S.J. Res. 8.
Iowa	June 18, 1979	301	S.J. Res. 1.
	June 25, 1979	316	S.J. Res. 1.
Kansas	May 18, 1979	657	S. Con. Res. 1661.
Louisiana	July 13, 1978	739	S. Con. Res. 73.
	July 19, 1979	394	S. Con. Res. 4.
Nebraska	Mar. 7, 1979	67	L. R. 106.
New Hampshire	May 15, 1979	223	H. Con. Res. 8.
New Mexico	Mar. 1, 1979	62	S.J. Res. 1.
North Carolina	Feb. 6, 1979	37	S.J. Res. 1.
North Dakota	May 3, 1979	205	S. Con. Res. 4018.
Oklahoma	May 2, 1978	629	H.J. Res. 1049.
Oregon	Mar. 21, 1979	104	S.J. Mem. 2.
Pennsylvania	Mar. 12, 1979	85	H. Res. 236.
South Carolina	May 26, 1978	673	S. 1024.
South Dakota	Mar. 1, 1979	61	S.J. Res. 1.
Tennessee	Apr. 25, 1978	613	H.J. Res. 22.
Texas	Aug. 15, 1978	776	H. Con. Res. 13.
	Mar. 1, 1979	51	Do.
	Mar. 15, 1979	95	H. Con. Res. 31.
Utah	Mar. 8, 1979	80	H.J. Res. 12.
Wyoming	May 15, 1978	641	H.J. Res. 1.

Senator HATCH. Our second witness today will be Mr. John Feerick of the American Bar Association.

John, we are happy to welcome you here, and we appreciate the effort you have put forth in preparing to come here and assist us on these issues.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN D. FEERICK, ESQ., REPRESENTING THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, NEW YORK, N.Y.

Mr. FEERICK. Thank you. I would like to say that the American Bar Association is deeply privileged to be invited to appear before this committee once again to speak on an issue which we believe is of considerable importance.

I would like, with the subcommittee's permission, to file with the committee my written statement and, in my testimony, to present brief highlights of the written statement.

Senaor HATCH. Your statement will be admitted to the record.

Mr. FEERICK. Thank you very much, Senator.

In 1971, members of the committee, the American Bar Association set up a special committee to examine the many questions of law associated with the subject of a National Constitutional Convention.

This particular study committee was established as a result of experiences we had had in the late 1960's with respect to the subject of legislative reapportionment that focused considerable attention on the National Constitutional Convention provision of the Constitution.

The American Bar Association, as it has done from time to time, called together a committee of people to give objective and careful study to the subject with a view to developing a position to the bar.

This particular study committee consisted of two Federal judges. Our chairman was Federal Judge Clyde Atkins from Florida. We also had Federal Judge Sarah Hughes from Texas, and the committee included two law school deans, Dean Albert Sacks of Harvard and David Dow, former dean of the Nebraska Law School. We had the benefit of two former presidents of State constitutional conventions, Adrian Foley of New Jersey, and Sam Witwer of Illinois.

We also had as a member of the committee, a former Deputy Attorney General of the United States, who now serves as Deputy Secretary of State, Warren Christopher. In addition, we had the assistance of a judge here in the District of Columbia, Judge William Thompson. I rounded out the committee.

The committee met for 2 years, met often, to study the questions associated with this particular article of the Constitution. We were aided in our study by a dozen law students from six or seven law schools. Those law school students put together several volumes of work papers on these issues before the committee, and I would like to say to the committee that we would be more than welcome to make available those unpublished work papers to the committee and its staff as it proceeds with its study of this issue.

Senator HATCH. We would be very grateful if you would. We would appreciate that.

Mr. FEERICK. Our study concluded in the summer of 1973. It eventuated in a printed report. It was presented to the house of delegates of the American Bar Association and it was approved as a position of the American Bar Association in the summer of 1973 and remains the position of the Bar Association at this point in time.

I realize it is a rather lengthy document, but it may be of use to the committee, and I would like, with the committee's permission, to offer as part of the committee record, a copy of our final printed report on this subject.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it will be admitted.

Mr. FEERICK. Thank you, Senator.

Getting to the conclusions reached by the American Bar Association on this subject, we concluded, Senators, that it would be highly desirable for the Congress to enact legislation with respect to this alternative method of amending the Constitution. I might add, parenthetically, that in terms of our study, we took as a given article V. It was not part of our study to deal with the issue of whether or not there should be an alternative method of amending the Constitution. We took it as a given, and we tried to understand it and tried to cope with legal issues that were put before us concerning this particular provision, and it was our conclusion that it would be highly desirable for the Congress to adopt legislation to regulate this particular process, as Congress had done in a number of other areas, such as handling contested elections to the Congress, with respect to the treatment of the electoral vote returns from the States, and with respect to certain ministerial functions of the amending article in terms of the Office of General Services Administration.

It is our view that it is better governmental technique, and more faithful to the integrity of the amending process, to avoid the type of crisis we could have in the absence of procedures to deal with the issues of the alternative method of amending the Constitution.

It was our view that if we don't have legislation, we could be faced with a very serious crisis where applications were put before the Congress on a particular issue and a debate ensued as to how those applications should be dealt with in terms of the obligations that this body has under article V of the Constitution.

In addition to concluding that there should be legislation on the subject, we then approached one of the basic issues, and that is whether or not a convention called pursuant to article V, could be limited.

It was the view of our committee that if two-thirds of the States called for a National Constitutional Convention, limited to a particular subject matter, that that Constitutional Convention had to be called by the Congress and that Constitutional Convention had no more authority than to deal with the subject matter giving rise to the call for a convention.

In other words, it was our conclusion that legislation could limit a Constitutional Convention to a particular subject matter. We felt that the State legislatures that have the power under article V to call for a Constitutional Convention, could exercise a limited amount of its authority and call for a limited-purpose convention, and we felt that if two-thirds of the States concurred in a particular limited way, that Congress duty under article V was clear, and that was to call such a limited convention.

We felt that article V, when the conditions giving rise to such a call were present, imposed on the Congress a mandatory duty to call a convention, and we set forth in our report the evidence that we found to support that conclusion.

We also felt that if a limited purpose convention was called by the Congress, Congress had the power to limit that convention to such a call, and we suggested in our report that if a convention exceeded the limitations placed on it, Congress had the power to refuse to submit that excess to the States for ratification as a proposed constitutional amendment.

We also dealt with a number of important subsidiary issues that we believe have to be confronted in the context of legislation, such as the content of applications.

We felt that under article V, Congress had the power not only to call a convention, but to make a judgment as to whether or not the conditions for such a call were present, and we felt that there was power in the Congress to make a judgment with reference to the validity of applications, at least initially.

That is not to say—it is not our conclusion—that Congress could get involved in the substantive aspects of applications, but could make a judgment as to whether or not a proper application was present under article V.

It seemed to us that an application which simply expressed the States' position on a given problem or requested Congress to propose an amendment would not be sufficient for purposes of article V, nor would, in our view, an application be proper if it called for a convention with no more authority than to vote a specific amendment set forth therein up or down, since as we saw it, the convention under such circumstances would be effectively stripped of its deliberative function with respect to that particular subject.

As we saw it, a convention should have latitude to amend, as the Congress does, by evaluating the problem, as Congress does.

Our committee felt that an application expressing the results sought by amendment should be proper. We also felt that another issue that should be confronted is the timeliness of an application. We have no view as to what time limit should be placed in such legislation concerning the timeliness of an application, although our report reflects the view that if there was a rule of 4 or 7 years for States to file applications on a particular subject, that that time certainly would be consistent with our view of what is reasonable.

We also felt that legislation should deal with the subject of whether or not a State can withdraw an application once submitted, and it was our conclusion that a State could withdraw an application that was submitted if it subsequently felt that for any reason it should not have been submitted.

We also expressed the view that with reference to the delegates to a National Constitutional Convention, such delegates should be elected by the people rather than appointed.

With reference to the subject of apportionment, with respect to delegates, it was our conclusion that the Constitutional Convention would perform a governmental function, and that the one-person-one-vote standard would be applicable to the selection of delegates to a Constitutional Convention.

With respect to what vote would be required at a Constitutional Convention for purposes of proposing an amendment, we felt that that issue should be decided by the convention itself, because it would involve very much an essential deliberative type of aspect of the function of the convention.

We have set forth in our report more detail as to our conclusions on that subject. With reference to the involvement of the President and the Governors in the process, we felt that under article V, the President and the State Governors did not have a constitutional role to play with respect to the substantive functioning of the amendment process, and our report contains considerable detail on our conclusions on those subjects.

Finally, and very importantly, we felt that if legislation were adopted, as we hope this Congress will adopt on this subject, that that legislation should provide for limited judicial review of determinations made in the process.

Finally, and reflecting, Senator, the comments that you made earlier, we feel that if legislation is adopted, the legislation should strike a balance between not making it too easy to amend the Constitution, but not making it impossible to amend the Constitution, if the States feel that they must resort to the alternative method on a paricular subject.

I would be very happy to answer, perhaps in a little more detail, any of the subjects that I have commented on and any of the other subjects that our association has taken a position on. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. We thank you for your testimony. I would like to congratulate you and your committee for the landmark work that you have done in this particular area. Although there are differences, as you know, between your committee's proposal and my own, I have to acknowledge that I am deeply indebted to your committee for many of the ideas that are in this bill.

Mr. FEERICK. Thank you, Senator.

Senator HATCH. Could you please comment upon the relationship between the alternative amending processes in the Constitution? Is it your view that the provisions in article V were designed to be symmetrical in their application?

Mr. FEERICK. We pointed out that the framers intended that the two methods be equal methods. How far you carry that equality, when we get into the area of procedure, I think can be debated. I can see certain types of legislation, or obstacles, that would render the convention method unequal with respect to the congressional method, and would seem to do violence to at least the spirit of what was intended by the Constitution.

What I am really saying is that we certainly had a view that there was to be equality with respect to the methods, which is not to say that every aspect of the congressional method has to be mirrored in every aspect of how you deal with the alternative method.

For example, the Constitution specifically provides for a two-thirds vote on a congressional proposal, and it has no provision as to what the vote should be at the Constitutional Convention in terms of proposing an amendment. So we have internal evidence in the Constitution itself of inequality, so to speak. The Constitution doesn't specify in that particular procedural, substantive area, the same vote it does specify with respect to the congressional method.

So I would not want to leave the committee with our view as that whatever the rule is under the congressional method, that that should be the rule under the alternative method.

Senator HATCH. You suggest that "consensus" is the critical consideration in calling a convention, as it has traditionally been in ratifying congressionally proposed amendments.

Would you say that Congress, in making its aggregation decisions, should, in effect, be asking itself, "Is this State application part of the same consensus that is being expressed in other State applications?"

How do we translate this into statutory language? How do we develop criteria by which we can give meaning to all this?

Mr. FEERICK. I think we are suggesting that Congress initially make a judgment whether or not the applications before it concur on a particular purpose. In terms of the type of standard that should be placed in legislation, our report indicates that we gave a lot of thought to that and we felt that the standard of the same subject matter, was perhaps as best as we could achieve in terms of language. We also felt that, at least initially, Congress, under a same-subject type of standard, would have the responsibility—as it does in many other areas—to make a judgment whether or not there is concurrence on a subject. Under our suggested scheme for legislation, that particular judgment would be subject to judicial review. We thought judicial review in this particular area would be particularly appropriate because here we have State legislatures and Congress in a relationship with each other, State legislatures presumably seeking a convention to make some change maybe opposed by Congress, and that type of potential confrontation can best, we think, be resolved by our judiciary. It can function in a very impartial, arbitrator type role with such questions.

Senator HATCH. I believe that it is important we limit opportunities for potential congressional interference in the convention process based on nothing other than Congress' own policy preferences. Would you agree that this is something that merits significant attention? What suggestions would you have in this area as well?

Mr. FEERICK. We certainly expressed in our study the view that there are a number of areas where it would be inappropriate for the Congress to seek to dominate the States in the functioning of article V. And we did express in our report the sense that this particular method of amending the Constitution was intended as an alternative to the congressional method, and that it was important in terms of legislation that our approach not be congressionally dominated, because that would seem to us to run inconsistent with some of the thinking behind the alternative method with respect to having a means of dealing with abuse, perhaps, at the Federal level.

That is not to say that Congress doesn't have a very important role in the process. It certainly was our view that the Constitution gave Congress a very important managerial, supervisory role with respect to the integrity of the amendment process, and so under our approach, we would have a role for the Congress, an important role.

We would suggest to the Congress that there are areas, such as the convention vote, for example, where the Congress should leave it to the convention to decide. There are areas, with respect to the matter of the content of applications, where we would suggest that the standard be such that even though Congress disagreed with the subject of what the State legislatures were seeking to have a convention on, that if the necessary concurrence were present, Congress should call such a convention. The standard should be a tight standard with respect to the calling of the convention.

So, under our approach, it would be a balance in terms of the roles. We have a role for the courts, a role for Congress, of course, an important role, and an important role for the State legislatures.

Senator HATCH. Do I understand you to be saying in your statement, and also in the questioning, that——

Mr. FEERICK. I missed the thrust of your remarks. I couldn't hear you.

Senator HATCH. —issues concerning the propriety of State application and convention procedures are not really political questions?

Mr. FEERICK. The whole political question issue is one that our committee spent a good deal of time with, and it is certainly a troublesome issue, and we certainly felt that the role of the courts should be a limited role.

On the other hand, we thought that there were areas where the courts did have a role, and properly should have a role, and I think the suggestions we have advanced specifically in our report reflect a recognition of a primary role to be played by Congress and, in certain respects, by the State legislatures, and, at the same time, a role for the courts.

Senator HATCH. In the event this committee rejects the interpretation of those who believe in the concept of a limited convention, has the convention method of amendment become an effective dead letter in your opinion?

Mr. FEERICK. A dead letter, the view being that it only sanctions general conventions?

Senator HATCH. That is right.

Mr. FEERICK. I don't think I could say a dead letter. There is always the possibility, I suppose, of the States calling for a general convention—how much you credit that possibility answers, in my view, how dead it would be.

Senator HATCH. Senator Bayh?

Senator BAYH [presiding]. Thank you, Mr. Feerick.

I enjoyed hearing your testimony, and I apologize for not being here at the outset. I was trying to find how efficiently the deregulated airline service is functioning. I was sort of a captive of Eastern Airlines, so I apologize for not being here.

I think the record should show, and I would like to ask unanimous consent, that my brief opening statement be submitted at the beginning of todays proceedings.

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that my opening statement follow yours.

Senator BAYH. Fine. That is perfectly in order.

I think the record should show that our witness, John Feerick, has been a long and faithful witness before the committee for perhaps more years than either of us would like to remember. There have been a number of opportunities over a good number of years to bring his personal expertise, as well as collecting the expertise of the American Bar Association to bear on the decisions of this committee.

Particularly, the country owes him a debt of gratitude. He was one who was very instrumental for the process by which the 25th amendment was created. We are grateful for that effort, and I think the country was well served, and because of that work and the work by legislatures and others, we were prepared for the resignation of a President, and we moved to the congressional selection process for the first time in history.

I wanted to thank you.

Mr. FEERICK. I thank you for those remarks. I think the country has been extraordinarily well served by your 16 years as chairman of this subcommittee.

Senator BAYH. You are very thoughtful.

Let me ask, if I might, this question: You point out that within the Constitution itself there are specifically enunciated technicalities relative to the ways in which the two constitutional vehicles are to function, which shows they aren't placed on equal footing, at least as far as the words are concerned.

You mentioned the two-thirds requirement in one instance and the omission of it in the other. I assume that is the bar's position—I haven't had a chance to read it fully, but I shall.

Mr. FEERICK. It is a long one.

Senator BAYH. Yes. I assume that the bar reached the conclusion that the seriousness of whatever issues might be addressed and proposed, and perhaps culminated in amendment to the Constitution of the United States, would be of an equally serious nature whether the traditional route or the general or specific National Convention route would be followed.

I am not talking about a second-rate constitutional amendment or a constitutional amendment of less importance being covered by the convention system, whereas the more significant and greater impact amendments would be covered by Congress and the State legislatures.

Mr. FEERICK. We didn't express a view on that subject, Senator. It was not part of our study, how we felt about the type of amendments or a particular amendment that should be subject to that process. In this area of equality, so to speak, we were just talking about the method and procedure.

We were not dealing with, in our own study, the area of whether or not a particular proposal should be a constitutional amendment.

I must say we were fortunate at the time not to have what could have been a particular subject before us, just like when we dealt with the 25th amendment area. When we started that effort, it was after the death of President Kennedy, and we just sort of spoke about the subject in terms of what was in the best interest of our country, without having to get caught up in the politics and the particular events. Our committee did not address that issue, Senator, and I am not able to say that members of the committee as a committee, and we as an association, have a view on a particular amendment or a particular subject that should be subject to the process.

Senator BAYH. I did not in any way intend the question to suggest that you should have, or that you did, but you say the committee did not address itself to that question. As a learned member of the bar and a constitutional scholar of some note, is it reasonable to assume that amendments of equal seriousness could and would perhaps be addressed by both routes?

Mr. FEERICK. Don't know that I can answer that question. I certainly would not want to answer that question as a spokesman for the American Bar Association, because I don't think we addressed it.

Answering for myself, quite apart from the bar association, certainly my view is that amending the Constitution is a very serious business, and that we are talking about something of great permanency and a document of great delicacy, and I think the highest responsibility needs to be paid to that document.

I personally would not like to see the document as an unwieldy, lengthy document that deals with thousands of subjects in detail. My own personal view is a very limited view with reference to amending the Constitution. I haven't studied the subject of the balanced budget amendment, and I can't address myself to that amendment, but I would say that I would hope we would only put an amendment in after we have seen a defect, and it is not something to be done hastily, or out of particular emotion. It is a matter of great seriousness.

So, I suppose, personally, I do reflect that view of the amending process, but I cannot really speak for the American Bar on that subject.

Senator BAYH. It would have the same degree of permanence, would it not?

Mr. FEERICK. The constitutional amendment?

Senator BAYH. Yes.

Mr. FEERICK. Yes, but I suppose that would be subject to how the people felt about a particular amendment. The 18th amendment didn't enjoy the permanence of most of our other amendments.

Senator BAYH. What I am driving at is whether an amendment is passed by the Congress or a convention, it has the same permanence and the same legal requirement on our citizens, regardless of which vehicle is used.

Mr. FEERICK. So long as any amendment that comes out of either process remains part of the Constitution, yes.

Senator BAYH. Because of the impact of a constitutional amendment, wouldn't it be fair to assume that the same need for a general, broad consensus of support for such an amendment should be present whether it was passed through the convention or through the Congress?

Mr. FEERICK. I certainly would say so, and that view of a national consensus for a constitutional amendment is a view that is expressed throughout our report, and we think the amending article is asking for a national consensus before a matter does become part of the Constitution, yes.

Senator BAYH. I certainly salute you for that, and the bar.

I must confess that I am a little surprised at the bar's expressing that we need a strong national consensus before we amend the Constitution. The bar does not recommend that the subject amendment be adopted by a two-thirds vote, but would require only a simple majority.

Mr. FEERICK. No. We say that is a question for the convention to decide.

Senator BAYH. Why should that be a subject for the convention to decide? If we need a broad national consensus and the Congress is setting up guidelines, why should not the Congress require a broad consensus in support of an amendment? Why should it not meet the same test as one that is adopted by the Congress itself?

Mr. FEERICK. Well, it was our view that the subject of the vote requirement could very well be tied into the deliberative area of a convention, that it was something one might say was of a procedural nature, but a lot of our history, in terms of history, has been a history of procedure. We felt that it intruded into the deliberative nature of the convention and that the arguments, such as the arguments you have just eloquently put forth, should be arguments decided by the convention.

With reference to the consensus, the consensus is reflected in a number of ways, specifically, in the process. Two-thirds of the States must ask for a convention, as I have testified earlier, before Congress has, as we see it, a mandatory duty to call a convention. There has to be a concurrence of purpose on the subject of the convention, and the article then calls for ratification by three-fourths of the State legislatures or State ratifying conventions.

So, we have specifically built into the Constitution a number of consensus requirements. We don't have any specificity in this area. We were concerned that the vote requirement did perhaps get very close to the inner core of the convention, and in reaching our own conclusion that legislation should not deal with that subject, we were influenced by the fact that many Constitutional Conventions, the Convention of 1787, many of the territorial conventions that have taken place under acts of Congress with reference to drafting of State constitutions, decided for themselves what the vote should be. So that we felt that our recommendation of leaving that to the convention was consistent with a very strong history of conventions deciding that type of issue for themselves.

I don't know that a simple majority does violence to the consensus requirement against the backdrop of the type of concurrence you need before you get to the convention, or the type of approval you need after you leave the convention.

Senator BAYH. I come down on the other side of that issue.

Mr. FEERICK. We take no position on what the vote should be.

Senator BAYH. Yes; but let me think out loud with you a bit, and I don't want to go into this at too great a length, but this was an issue that was debated on the floor of the Senate. Senator Ervin and I had a little disagreement about the plurality being required, and the Senate adopting a two-thirds requirement. Senator Ervin thought it should be a majority.

So, in judging what standards should be applied, if there is precedent we look to, it should be the precedent of the past experience with the U.S. Constitution, rather than other ratification and convention-call processes.

What concerns me here, Mr. Feerick, is that I have found, and I don't say this critically, that it is a lot easier to find people to say they want something done than it is to get them to agree to specifics, and the specifics are the ones that have the cutting edge, affecting our lives, our country and perhaps the whole world.

So, to suggest that two-thirds of the States might feel we should have a balanced budget as being a sufficient consensus to support whatever that convention might decide upon, I really don't rest easily on that, because it is awfully difficult to conclude that any significant portion of that two-thirds really had in mind what hopefully a convention might come up with.

I find this whole business of how you balance the budget, and this is only one of many amendments, the most complicated kind of subject we have dealt with here. A lot of our good folks are very busy with their normal lives and understandably don't understand the nuances of the budget processes and the impact it would have on our lives. We have been trying to study that in some detail.

The concern I have, goes to the idea which I find—and did find at the time Senator Ervin and I were supporting the Procedcres Act on the floor, and you mentioned the bar takes into consideration—that it is better to consider something of this nature when the normal human tendency is to make a substantive judgment on the basis of whose ox is being gored—when that is not as prevalent as it would be with an amendment before the Congress or before a Constitutional Convention.

So, I think deliberation is required. I can conceive of a Constitutional Convention being called and the proponent delegates of issue X, whatever it may be, getting together and counting noses, and if the majority of the delegates support issue X, but they don't have two-thirds, it is totally unreasonable to expect the convention to adopt a two-thirds rule. That is why I feel that this is something that Congress should accept as its responsibility.

But, I would like to get your judgment, not mine.

Mr. FEERICK. Again, it is a balance. Maybe we struck the balance wrong on this issue. I don't know. But the committee did feel that this was not a matter that we felt we would recommend should be dealt with by the Congress. We had on the one side of the ledger the facts that I gave you about other precedents, even though they weren't article V precedents.

We did have the reason for the convention method, which was to deal with—perhaps in some situations—power abuse at the national level, and we felt that maybe this was an area that, philosophically, given the reason for the alternative method, Congress should exercise restraint over.

The arguments that you have expressed, as all your arguments are, are filled with merit. On the other hand, I appear here as a representative of our study group, and we did not come out the same way on the issue, and our report does set forth the detail.

I just might mention another bit of history on that point. There was a point in the constitutional convention before the ratification provisions were put in that the delegates were suggesting that the Constitution be amended through the convention route. I don't remember whether it was James Madison or some other delegate saying, "Gee, a majority of the States will bind us to innovations that aren't desirable."

In response to that, the framers came up with the ratification provisions. There. at least, was some evidence that they recognized that perhaps a majority vote might take place at a convention, and they intended the ratification mechanism to deal with maybe some of those concerns you have expressed.

But once again, we struck the balance as I indicated. The arguments that you advance certainly are very merited, and we didn't perhaps have the benefit of those arguments with the same degree of insight and eloquence that you have just put them out with.

Senator BAYH. This was completed in 1974. Is it possible to get an update of the thoughts of the committee?

Mr. FEERICK. Yes; I believe so, even though the committee doesn't any longer have any legal existence within the American Bar Association.

I think, as we have done in the past when a committee has completed its work on a subject, and a member of the committee has been designated to be a continuing representative of that work, it has been my practice to represent the members of the committee on any suggestion that we might be advancing on details.

I can recall vividly on the subject of Electoral College reform that after taking a number of very detailed positions other issues developed, and we subsequently dealt with those issues on an informal basis by tapping back to the people who originally were involved.

So our position is out there. I don't want to be presumptuous. I doubt that we are going to change our position on matters that are specifically contained in our report.

We did not take a position on what the vote should be at the convention. All we took a position on was that the legislation should not specify that vote.

So there is an open issue as to how the members of this committee, as a group of individuals, would feel about what the vote should be at the convention in terms of what the convention should do. I don't know if that is one that our committee would want to speak to, but I certainly will put the question to them.

Senator BAYH. I am not suggesting that you deal with this concern just because I raised it, but if there are other things that you feel might be indicated, the committee would always be glad to have your judgment. Let me move to——

Senator HATCH. Would the Senator yield just on that point for a second?

You know, we elect Members of Congress by a simple majority vote and then they propose amendments by two-thirds votes. How does that differ from calling conventions by applications of two-thirds of the States, and then proposing amendments at the convention by majority vote? Three-fourths of the States ratifying would still be necessary.

As I noted in my opening remarks, I strongly believe that consideration of this bill should be divorced from contemporary constitutional controversies. I am in complete agreement with Senator Bayh.

Senator BAYH. I apprciate the comment of my friend from Utah, but we also elect city clerks by majority vote. We are not talking about a general election. We are talking about amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and we have not amended once by a process of a vote other than two-thirds.

We will work that out in the committee.

Mr. FEERICK. I will circulate the members of our old special committee, and if there are any additional comments in the light of that, I will convey them to you.

Senator BAYH. You are a busy man. I don't want to ask you to do something that will take a lot of time and effort.

Let me ask you: The three-judge panel as arbitrators, how do you recommend that they be appointed, and where do we find the authority for that kind of arbitration?

Mr. FEERICK. There are statutory provisions on the three-judge courts. The American Bar has recommended that there be very limited use of three-judge courts in the past, quite apart from this particular study.

We did not get into the type of issues you just mentioned about appointment of the members of the three-judge court, and frankly, I hadn't personally thought through that in that type of detail, and I would not feel that I would be able to speak with the confidence that this committee is entitled to without a little more thought on that. I would be happy, if I could, to respond to your question in writing.

Senator BAYH. Thank you.

[The information subsequently submitted follows:]

NEW YORK, N.Y., March 18, 1980.

Hon. BIRCH BAYH,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAYH: This is in response to your inquiry when I testified if I could survey the members of the Association's Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee concerning the vote for proposal of a constitutional amendment by a national constitutional convention. As you know, the Committee recommended that the required vote be left to the convention to decide.

The Committee, as a functioning group within the Association, no longer is in existence. It ceased operating after it had completed its study in 1973 with the publication of its report, entitled "Amendment of the Constitution by the Convention Method Under Article V." However, as you requested, I wrote to the members of the Special Committee subsequent to my testimony inviting them to express any additional views they might have on the question of the vote. No additional views were communicated to me. Since the 1973 recommendations of the Committee were approved by the Association's House of Delegaes, I believe a process of committee study followed by Association action would be required before any new positions could be taken, if such were to be the case.

Although I am not in a position to communicate any additional views of the Association other than those contained in the above-mentioned report, I am, of course, available to assist the Committee on an individual basis with its study of the subject of constitutional convention procedures legislation.

Once again, I would like to thank you and the Committee for affording us the opportunity to testify on this subject.

Sincerely,

JOHN D. FEERICK.

Senator BAYH. One last question.

One of the real issues concerning us, of course, is the question of the ability to limit the jurisdiction. Your committee concludes that this can be done.

Mr. FEERICK. Yes.

Senator BAYH. Do you have any doubts at all that this might be something that could be challenged by a sitting convention, by the first convention called to revise the articles? They might say that the paraphernalia that the Congress has provided is not listed in the Constitution, and that that body is free and independent to do what it likes. Do you have any doubt in your mind?

Mr. FEERICK. Speaking as a spokesman for our study committee, I do not think there is any type of a committee view on it.

Senator BAYH. Excuse me. The reason I asked that is, and I think we can get almost 100 percent approval, this is what it ought to be, but whether it can be based upon the mandate of authority is the question I raise.

Mr. FEERICK. I guess the way I would answer it for myself in terms of doubt is to say that it is a possibility—maybe more than a possibility under certain circumstances where there is strong emotion about a particular subject.

But if that possibility were to occur, we think there are controls for dealing with it.

On the other hand, I personally do reflect a view that when we are talking about matters of serious business such as amending the Constitution of the United States, my experience as a practicing lawyer and working with this committee and the Congress is that people exercise those responsibilities mindful of the importance of the subject of amending the Constitution. This is similar to so many issues we grappled with in the 25th amendment. In that area, as you recall, we were concerned about what would happen if the President became insane and how the Members of Congress would handle their responsibility. I remember Herbert Brownell saying, "Well, there are those areas where you have to trust to the good faith of the people you put in office," whether it be Members of this body or a Constitutional Convention. Up to now that faith has been honored by the responsibility of people in moments of seriousness and crisis.

Senator BAYH. You know, I think that is something that is true, that we just trust that the Good Lord is watching over us.

I don't for a moment doubt the motivation of delegates, that they would do what they thought was in the best interests of the country, but it is a matter, I think, of general recognition that some of these constitutional amendment issues are very emotional, very deeply felt, and I do not believe it is beyond the realm of reason to suggest that a Constitutional Convention called for balancing the budget would find the very well-organized right to life opponents utilizing this.

They are well-motivated, but they could see that a majority of delegates elected in the States, in addition to wanting to balance the budget just coincidentally want to have a constitutional amendment on the question of abortion. Then when the question of ignoring the specificity is drawn to the convention, say, "We will bring in something else," particularly when you talk about emotional issues.

Mr. FEERICK. I hope I haven't left you with the impression that either I or the American Bar are advocates of a National Constitutional Convention. That is not an issue we addressed.

Senator BAYH. I understand.

Mr. FEERICK. People of experience and the exercise of restraint and reluctance, I think, needs to be part of amending the Constitution. But as I said before, we took article V as given, we put aside what personal views we had about how the Constitution should be amended.

Members of the committee certainly weren't polled as to whether they would prefer the congressional method, but frankly, based on my discussions with them, I doubt that anybody would say anything other than what I said about one's personal preference. But we put aside all that, and groped with these issues, mindful of the trust that the American Bar Association placed in us, and mindful of the fact that we are dealing with the United States Constitution. We went about it as thoroughly and objectively, with the limitations we had as a group, as possible.

Senator BAYH. I would add another adjective—as democratically as the bar association usually proceeds in these matters. There is no question about that at all.

Look, if I might ask your permission to submit some questions to you in writing, because there are some others with respect to congressional delegates to conventions, delegates to the conventions, where a State legislator gets elected to the convention and then goes back and ratifies.

Questions like that may seem extreme, but it seems to me those problems are best anticipated in advance rather than to wait and suffer the consequences.

I apologize for talking so long. I yield to my friend from Utah.

Senator HATCH. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could have 10 minutes each after this round, like they do in the Judiciary Committee. Would that be reasonable, instead of one member taking 30 minutes or 40 minutes? We could each be alloted 10 minutes.

Senator BAYH. That is fine.

Senator THURMOND. That is a rule that has worked pretty well.

Senator BAYH. If I had known the Senator had time constraints, I would have yielded to him all my time at the beginning. He may have that next time.

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Feerick, we are glad to have you here.

Mr. FEERICK. Thank you, Senator.

Senator THURMOND. We appreciate your statement, and as I understand, you have come down on the side of a limited convention; is that correct?

Mr. FEERICK. We have come down with the conclusion that if the States, the State legislatures, asked for a limited convention, that such a convention can be convened under article V, yes.

Senator THURMOND. Article V, as I just read the pertinent portion here, and I would like for it to be in the record at this point, reads this way:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution all on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, all by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

Now, I can see that a construction might be put on that section to mean that if we were to call a convention, it would have to be open, or I can see where, if you called a convention, that it would not have to be open. However, it seems to me that if the legislatures of two-thirds of the States so word their petitions that a convention be called and those petitions limit the scope of the convention to one or two items, or whatever it is, then the convention could legally and constitutionally be called in that manner.

I see nothing here in the Constitution, especially in this pertinent portion I just read, that would prohibit it.

Do you know of anything in the Constitution that would prohibit the States from submitting petitions along the line I have indicated so that a convention would be limited?

Mr. FEERICK. No. Assuming in your question that two-thirds of the States concur on a particular item or items so that there is a concurrence of the necessary two-thirds of the States.

Senator THURMOND. Two-thirds of the States?

Mr. FEERICK. Concur on a particular item.

Senator THURMOND. Concur and agree that they want a convention to be limited to one item, say, a balanced budget, for instance, or abortion, or any other subject.

Then, is there any reason why their wishes as expressed in their petitions could not be conveyed to the Congress, and is there any reason why the Congress should not abide by their wishes? I see nothing in the Constitution that would demand that a convention be open to any and all subjects.

Mr. FEERICK. There is no disagreement between us, Senator. I agree with you.

Senator THURMOND. You agree with the same proposition, in other words.

I am of the opinion that there is no logical reason to construe the Constitution otherwise and say that although the legislatures of two-thirds of the States submitted petitions for a limited convention, we are forced to have an open convention.

If the States wanted an open convention, the petitions would have just signified to that effect, or if they wanted to consider two subjects at the convention, the States would so signify. That, to me, makes good sense.

If you didn't follow that construction, then would not the States be discouraged from calling for a convention, for fear that if you do have one, then it could upset the entire system of government and change the entire form of government?

Mr. FEERICK. Our committee expressed similar views in our report, Senator.

Senator THURMOND. I am strongly of the opinion that this committee should take the position that whatever is contained in the petitions, then Congress would be bound by that request, to take up one subject, or two subjects, or have an open convention, or whatever, that the States ask and request, and that we should be limited to that.

If we don't do that, and make any other construction, then we might as well write off this provision of the Constitution of the States calling conventions unless the States wish to take the risk of changing the entire form of government.

Do you agree with that?

Mr. FEERICK. There was a lot in what you said. I think the thrust of what you said is certainly consistent with the views of our association and the committee as expressed in our report.

Senator THURMOND. What I have expressed here is in accordance with the views of your committee of the American Bar Association?

Mr. FEERICK. Essentially, yes.

Senator THURMOND. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you.

Senator BAYH. Thank you very much.

Mr. FEERICK. Thank you very much.

Senator BAYH. It is a pleasure to have you again before us, and I wish you would pass our compliments on to your colleagues.

Mr. FEERICK. Thank you very much.

[Mr. Feerick's prepared statement, the study submitted by the American Bar Association, and additional material follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JOHN D. FEERICK ON BEHALF OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, I am John D. Feerick, a practicing attorney from New York City. I appear before you today at the request of Leonard S. Janofsky, President of the American Bar Association, to share with you our views on the issue of legislation to establish procedures for amending the Constitution by means of a national constitutional convention.

I commend the Subcommittee for undertaking these hearings. What once may have seemed an issue of academic interest only has become a matter deserving serious national attention. The recent calls for a constitutional convention on a balanced budget and related issues are but the latest manifestation of a growing trend. While a national constitutional convention has never been held, every state has submitted at least one application for a convention, and there have been several hundred applications submitted in toto. From 1940 to 1942, more than thirty states petitioned for a convention to deal with the federal taxing power, and between 1963 and 1969 thirty-three states submitted petitions on the issue of legislative reapportionment.

The reapportionment petitions in particular brought into sharp focus unsettled questions concerning the convention method or initiating amendments. Does Article V leave it to the discretion of Congress to call a convention? Can a convention be limited to a particular subject or would it be free to roam over the entire Constitution and propose an entirely new document? Do the executive and judiciary have, or should they have, a role in the process? What is a valid application? How long does it remain valid? Can it be withdrawn once it has been submitted?

Prompted by the controversy over the convention method generated by the reapportionment applications, the American Bar Association in 1971 established a special committee to look into the questions of law entailed in the calling of a national constitutional convention. The chairman of the committee was C. Clyde Atkins, a federal district judge, and the committee included two other judges, Sarah T. Hughes and William S. Thompson; a former deputy attorney general of the United States, Warren Christopher, who, of course, is now the Deputy Secretary of State; two law school professors, David Dow of the University of Nebraska Law School and Dean Albert M. Sachs of Harvard Law School; two former presidents of state constitutional conventions, Adrian M. Foley, Jr., of New Jersey, and Samuel W. Witwer of Illinois; and me.

The committee conducted a two-year study on the subject and rendered a series of recommedations that were adopted by the Association at its August, 1973, meeting. Before addressing many of the specific recommendations, I would like to read a passage from the committee's report which I think well summarizes the underlying view of the Association on this issue:

"If we fail to deal now with the uncertainties of the convention method, we could be courting a constitutional crisis of grave proportions. We would be running the enormous risk that procedures for a national constitutional convention would have to be forged in time of divisive controversy and confusion when there would be a high premium on obstructive and result-oriented tactics.

"It is far more prudent, we believe, to confront the problem openly and to supply safeguards and general rules in advance. In addition to being better governmental technique, a forthright approach to the dangers of the convention method seems far more likely to yield beneficial results than would burying our heads in the sands of uncertainty. Essentially, the reasons are the same ones which caused the American Bar Association to urge, and our nation ultimately to adopt, the rules for dealing with the problems of presidential disability and a vice-presidential vacancy which are contained in the Twenty-Fifth Amendment. So long as the Constitution envisions the convention method, we think the procedures should be ready if there is a contemporaneously felt need by the required two-thirds of the state legislatures. Fidelity to democratic principles requires no less."

Having concluded that legislation governing the convention method is highly desirable, the Association next addressed the issue of whether an Article V convention can be limited to a specific subject. We concluded in the affirmative.

Article V authorizes the state legislatures to initiate the convention process and imposes no express conditions on the scope of the convention which the states may seek. It was the view of our committee, however, that the state legislatures could exercise only a portion of their authority by calling for a convention limited to a specific subject. In this regard, the committee noted that at the state level, at which there have been more than 200 constitutional conventions, it seemed settled that the electorate may choose to delegate only a portion of its authority to a state convention and so limit it substantively.

With respect to the view that Article V sanctions only general conventions, the committee stated: "Such an interpretation would relegate the alternative method to an 'unequal' method of initiating amendments. Even if the state legislatures overwhelmingly felt that there was a necessity for limited change in the Constitution, they would be discouraged from calling for a convention if that convention would automatically have the power to propose a complete revision of the Constitution."

The committee found support in both the text and history of Article V for its conclusion that a convention could be limited. The text of Article V evidences an intent that there be a national consensus in order to amend the Constitution. A two-thirds vote is necessary in each house of Congress to propose an amendment; there must be applications from two-thirds of the states to call a convention; ratification by three-forths of the states is necessary to ratify an amendment proposed under either method of initiation. This suggested to us that there must be a consensus of purpose among the states to hold a convention. When the states are at odds on the purpose of a convention, it seems wholly inconsistent with Article V to call one. Conversely when two-thirds of the states are in agreement on a particular, limited purpose, the conclusion is strong that a convention should be called, limited to that purpose.

As for the history of Article V, the amendment articles of a number of state constitutions adopted before the U.S. Constitution also suggested to the committee that a constitutional convention can be limited substantially. The language of the earliest draft of Article V submitted to the Constitutional Convention by the committee on detail indicates that a convention limited substantively was within its contemplation. That provision read: "On the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of the Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a convention for that purpose" (emphasis supplied).

Sometimes the Constitutional Convention of 1787 itself is cited for the proposition that an Article V convention may not be limited, but that premise seems wholly inapposite. As the ABA report noted: "While the Constitutional Convention of 1787 may have exceeded the purpose of its call in framing the Constitution, it does not follow that a convention convened under Article V and subject to the Constitution can lawfully assume such authority."

The 1787 convention took place before the adoption of the Constitution when the states were independent and there was no effective national government. In addition, its work was submitted to the Continental Congress, consented to by that congress, and transmitted by it to the states for ratification. Moreover, as Thomas Cooley has observed, the 1787 convention was "a revolutionary proceeding, and could be justified only by the circumstances which had brought the Union to the brink of dissolution."

As for whether Congress is obliged to call a convention when the requisite number of applications have been submitted, the committee had little doubt. The language of Article V is mandatory, and the intent of the framers was made clear in the debate at the Constitutional Convention. Before the convention was a proposed Article V which provided in relevant part:

"The Legislature of the U.S. whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution * * *."

George Mason objected to the proposal, stating that both methods depended on Congress so that "no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive * * *." His notes on the draft article read:

"By this article Congress only have the power of proposing amendments at any future time to this constitution and should it prove ever so oppressive, the whole people of America can't make, or even propose alterations to it; a doctrine utterly subversive to the fundamental principles of the rights and liberties of the people."

Gouverneur Morris and Elbridge Gerry then proposed the convention language and it was adopted. Alexander Hamilton, in Federalist paper 85, referred to Article V as contemplating "a single proposition." Congress would be obliged to call a convention, he stated, whenever two-thirds of the states concurred. He added: "The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention,' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."

In the first Congress, surrounding receipt of the first state application, Mr. Madison stated that when two-thirds of the states had concurred in an application, it would be "out of the power of Congress to decline complying, the words of the Constitution being express and positive relative to the agency Congress may have in case of applications of this nature."

Once a convention is called for a particular purpose, the committee concluded that the convention would have no authority to act with respect to other subjects. Were it to deviate from the subject that brought it into being and propose amendments on other subjects, the committee suggested that Congress could deal with the deviation by exercising its power over choosing the method of ratification and refusing to submit the amendments to the states. We also felt that judicial relief might be appropriate under such circumstances.

These issues are basic to the legislation you are considering today. But a variety of other issues are raised as one attempts to draft appropriate language.

1. CONTENT OF APPLICATION

Article V explicitly gives Congress the power to call a convention upon receipt of applications from two-thirds of the state legislatures. As a necessary incident of the power to call, the committee reasoned, Congress has the power to determine initially whether the conditions requiring a call have been satisfied. Not every state application, of course, is necessarily valid.

As the committee stated: "A reading of Article V makes clear that an application should contain a request to Congress to call a national convention that would have the authority to propose an amendment to the Constitution. An application which simply expressed a state's opinion on a given problem or requested Congress itself to propose an amendment would not be sufficient for purposes of Article V. Nor would an application seem proper if it called for a convention with no more authority than to vote a specific amendment set forth therein up or down, since the convention would be effectively stripped of its deliberative function. A convention should have latitude to amend, as Congress does, by evaluating and dealing with a problem."

The committee added that an application which expressed the result sought by an amendment (i.e., direct popular election of the President) should be proper since the convention would have the freedom to decide on the terms of the specific amendment. The committee also felt that it should not be necessary that each application be identical or propose similar changes in the same subject matter.

2. TIMELINESS

In Dillon v. Gloss,[1] the Supreme Court stated that "the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal, which Congress is free to fix." It stated that "as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people n iall sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do."

[1] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

The committee expressed its view that this reasoning also was applicable to state applications for a constitutional convention. As the committee observed, the convening of a convention to deal with a certain matter certainly should reflect the "will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period * * *."

In the absence of a uniform rule, the timeliness or untimeliness of state applications would vary, it seemed to the committee, from case to case. It would involve, as the Supreme Court suggested with respect to the ratification area in Coleman v. Miller,[2] a consideration of "political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the [applications]."

3. WITHDRAWAL

Although there is uncertainty over whether a state may withdraw an application, the committee reasoned that there should be a rule allowing withdrawal. "In view of the importance and comparatively permanent nature of an amendment, it seems desirable that state legislatures be able to set aside applications that may have been hastily submitted or that no longer reflect the social, economic and political factors in effect when the applications were originally adopted. We believe Congress has the power to so provide."

4. ELECTION OF DELEGATES

From its study of Article V and conventions generally, the committee was led to the conclusion that in order for a convention to be representative of the people, its delegates should be elected by the people. It felt this was especially appropriate for the extraordinary happening of a national constitutional convention since the method was intended to supply the "people" with an alternative way of obtaining amendments "if the Government should become oppressive * * *," to quote George Mason's remark at the Convention of 1787.

5. APPORTIONMENT OF DELEGATES

On the question of the apportionment of delegates to an Article V convention, the ABA was of the view that in light of the governmental function to be performed, the one-person, one-vote standards should govern. The committee stated its view that an apportionment scheme based on representation in the House of Representatives also would be acceptable compliance, since it would respect existing state and district boundaries and assure each state at least one delegate. It doubted that a formula which afforded each state a number of delegates equal to its total representation in Congress would be held constitutional, since under that formula fifteen states would be over-represented at a convention by 50 percent or more.

6. CONVENTION VOTE

As for the necessary vote at a convention, the committee felt it was unwise and of questionable validity for Congress to prescribe a minimum vote by which the convention might propose an amendment, since such action would intrude into an area touching on the essential characteristic of a convention as a deliberative body and would be inconsistent with the farmers' design that the convention process be as free as possible from congressional control. It is noteworthy that the territorial conventions held under acts of Congress, most state constitutional conventions and the Convention of 1787 have determined their own vote.

7. PRESIDENTIAL INVOLVEMENT

On the question of whether a convention call is required to be presented to the President, the committee concluded that it was not. It believed that the submission of that question to the President would be inconsistent with the mandatory nature of Congress' duty to call a convention when proper applications had been submitted from the requisite number of states. As the President historically has not had a role in the process by which Congress proposes amendments, it also would alter the parallelism and intended equality between the two methods of initiating amendments. Also supporting the conclusion is the Supreme Court's decision in Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[3] which held that Article I, Section 7 (the veto provision), applies to "ordinary cases of legislation" and "has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution." The Court ruled the 11th Amendment to be valid although it had not been presented to the President.

[2] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

8. GUBERNATORIAL INVOLVEMENT

For somewhat similar reasons as above, the committee concluded that the state governor is not assigned a role in the process by which a state legislature applies for a convention or ratifies a proposed amendment. It believed this followed from the Supreme Court's decisions in Hawke v. Smith,[4] and Leser v. Garnett.[5]

In Hawke the Court held that it was improper for a state to subject the ratification of a proposed amendment to a popular referendum, declaring that ratification was not ordinary legislation but rather an expression of assent in which "no legislative action is authorized or required." The Court emphasized that the agency for ratification was the "state legislature," that is, the representative lawmaking body of the state. The lawmaking procedures of the state, the Court held, were not applicable to the act of ratification. If the act of ratification does not invoke these procedures, which customarily include the governor's veto, it is hard to see why the application, a task specifically assigned to the legislatures by the Constitution, would do so.

9. JUDICIAL INVOLVEMENT

The committee, in its report, stated that it was desirable and feasible to have in any implementing legislation a limited judicial review of congressional determinations made in the convention process. It was influenced in this regard by the view that the convention process likely would be used to effect a constitutional change opposed by vested interests and against the backdrop of some congressional inaction. Under these circumstances, the committee believed, it was desirable to have our independent judiciary serve as the arbiter and thereby assure the legitimacy of the process.

The committee questioned both the wisdom and validity of legislation excluding the courts from any involvement, stating: "It is questionable whether the power [of Congress to withdraw matters from the jurisdiction of the federal courts] reaches so far as to permit Congress to change results required by other provisions of the Constitution or to deny a remedy to enforce constitutional rights. Moreover, we are unaware of any authority upholding this power in cases of original jurisdiction."

The committee suggested limits on judicial review in any legislation adopted on the subject. First, it suggested that a congressional determination should be overturned only if "clearly erroneous," which would acknowledge Congress' political role and at the same time guard against arbitrary action. Second, it recommended that judicial remedies be limited to declaratory relief so as to diminish actual conflict between the branches of government. Finally, it stated that judicial review should not be allowed to delay the amending process unduly; accordingly, it recommended a short limitation period combined with expedited judicial procedures.

In our view, the confusion about the convention method strongly argues, as long as the convention method remains part of the Constitution, for the establishment of procedures governing the process—procedures which neither facilitate the adoption of any particular constitutional change nor make practically impossible any resort to the convention method. As our committee noted: "The integrity of our system requires that when the convention method is properly resorted to, it be allowed to function as intended."

---

[3] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).
[4] 253 U.S. 221 (1920).
[5] 285 U.S. 355 (1932).

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

BY THE CONVENTION METHOD UNDER ARTICLE V

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION STUDY COMMITTEE

ABA

Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee

The Honorable C. Clyde Atkins,
Chairman
P.O. Box 3009
Miami, Florida 33101

Warren Christopher, Esq.
611 West 6th Street
Los Angeles, California 90017

Professor David Dow
University of Nebraska
College of Law
Lincoln, Nebraska 68508

John D. Feerick, Esq.
919 Third Avenue
New York, New York 10022

Adrian M. Foley, Jr., Esq.
Gateway I
Newark, New Jersey 07102

The Honorable Sarah T. Hughes
Federal Courthouse
1100 Commerce Street
Dallas, Texas 75221

Dean Albert M. Sacks
Harvard University Law School
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138

The Honorable William S. Thompson
Suite 205, Building B
Superior Court of DC
Washington, D.C. 20001

Samuel W. Witwer, Esq.
141 West Jackson Boulevard
Chicago, Illinois 60604

Contents

The following resolutions were approved by the American Bar Association House of Delegates in August, 1973, upon the recommendation of the ABA Constitutional Convention Study Committee.

WHEREAS, the House of Delegates, at its July 1971 meeting, created the Constitutional Convention Study Committee "to analyze and study all questions of law concerned with the calling of a national Constitutional Convention, including, but not limited to, the question of whether such a Convention's jurisdiction can be limited to the subject matter giving rise to its call, or whether the convening of such a Convention, as a matter of constitutional law, opens such a Convention to multiple amendments and the consideration of a new Constitution"; and

WHEREAS, the Constitutional Convention Study Committee so created has intensively and exhaustively analyzed and studied the principal questions of law concerned with the calling of a national constitutional convention and has delineated its conclusions with respect to these questions of law in its Report attached hereto,

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED, THAT, with respect to the provision of Article V of the United States Constitution providing that "Congress . . . on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments" to the Constitution,

1. It is desirable for Congress to establish procedures for amending the Constitution by means of a national constitutional convention.
2. Congress has the power to establish procedures limiting a convention to the subject matter which is stated in the applications received from the state legislatures.
3. Any Congressional legislation dealing with such a process for amending the Constitution should provide for limited judicial review of Congressional determinations concerning a constitutional convention.

4. Delegates to a convention should be elected and representation at the convention should be in conformity with the principles of representative democracy as enunciated by the "one person, one vote" decisions of the Supreme Court.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, THAT, the House of Delegates authorizes the distribution of the Report of the Constitutional Convention Study Committee for the careful consideration of Federal and state legislators and others concerned with constitutional law and commends the Report to them; and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, THAT, representatives of the American Bar Association designated by the President be authorized to present testimony on behalf of the Association before the appropriate committees of the Congress consistent with this resolution.

Our Committee originated from a suggestion by the Council of the Section of Individual Rights and Responsibilities that a special committee representing the entire Association be created to evaluate the ramifications of the constitutional convention method of initiating amendments to the United States Constitution. The suggestion was adopted by the Board of Governors at its meeting in Williamsburg, Virginia, on April 29, 1971, and was accepted by the House of Delegates at its meeting in July 1971.

In forming the Committee, the Association authorized it to analyze and study all questions of law concerned with the calling of a national constitutional convention, including, but not limited to, the question of whether a convention's jurisdiction can be limited to the subject matter giving rise to its call, or whether the convening of a convention, as a matter of constitutional law, opens a convention to multiple amendments and the consideration of a new constitution.

The Committee thus constituted consists of two United States District Judges, a Judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, a present and a former law school dean, two former presidents of state constitutional conventions, a former Deputy Attorney General of the United States, and a private practitioner with substantial experience in the amending process.

Comprising the Committee are: Warren Christopher, a California attorney, former Deputy Attorney General of the United States, and Vice President of the Los Angeles County Bar Association; David Dow, former Dean and currently Professor of Law, Nebraska College of Law, a member of Nebraska's Constitutional Revision Commission, and a former member of the Board of Directors of the American Judicature Society; John D. Feerick, a New York attorney who served as advisor to the Association's Commission on Electoral College Reform and a member of the Association's Conference on Presidential Inability and Succession; Adrian M. Foley, Jr., a New Jersey attorney, a member of the House of Delegates, and President of the Fourth New Jersey Constitutional Convention (1966); Sarah T. Hughes, United States District Judge for the Northern District of Texas; Albert M. Sacks, Dean, The Harvard Law School, and former chairman of the Massachusetts Attorney General's Advisory Committee on Civil Rights and Civil Liberties; William S. Thompson, Judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, chairman of the Association's Committee on World Order Under Law, and a member of the Association's Committee on Federal Legislation; and Samuel W. Witwer, an Illinois attorney, a member of the Board of Directors of the American Judicature Society, and President of the Sixth Illinois Constitutional Convention (1969-1970). Robert D. Evans, assistant director of the Association's Public Service Activities Division, has served ably as our liaison.

Throughout our two-year study the members of the Committee have been ever mindful of the nature and importance of the task entrusted to them and they have endeavored to uncover and understand every fact and point of view regarding the amending article. Beginning with our organizational meeting in Chicago on November 20, 1971, the Committee has met frequently and has spent an enormous amount of time studying, discussing and analyzing the questions concerned with the calling of a national constitutional convention. We all have been guided by the hope of rendering to the Association a thorough, objective and realistically constructive final report on a fundamental article of the United States Constitution, as other special committees have done in such fields as presidential succession and electoral college reform.

In August 1972 we filed with the House of Delegates a detailed interim report setting forth certain tentative conclusions reached as a result of our research and deliberations since our organizational meeting. Since that report, we have re-examined all of the matters commented upon in it and have studied other questions concerning the amending article which were not specifically discussed in our earlier report.

59-609 O - 80 - 6

In our work the Committee has been the beneficiary of substantial quantities of valuable research and background material provided by twelve law students, to whom we express our deep gratitude. These students are: Richard Altabef, Edward Miller, Mark Wattenberg, and Richard Weisberg of Columbia Law School; Joan Madden and Barbara Manners of Fordham Law School; Shelley Z. Green and Henry D. Levine of Harvard Law School; Andrew N. Karlen and Barbara Prager of New York Law School; Michael Harris of St. John's Law School; and Marjorie Elkin of Yale Law School. The memoranda and papers prepared by these students have been filed at the Cromwell Library in the American Bar Center in Chicago.

I take pride in the fact that the conclusions and recommendations set forth in this report are unanimous (in every instance but one*).

C. Clyde Atkins,+
Chairman

*That single instance appears at page 10, infra.

+The Committee's Chairman is a United States District Judge for the Southern District of Florida, a former member of the House of Delegates (1960-66), and a past president of the Florida Bar (1960-61).

REPORT OF THE ABA SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION STUDY COMMITTEE

Introduction

There are few articles of the Constitution as important to the continued viability of our government and nation as Article V. As Justice Joseph Story wrote: "A government which . . . provides no means of change . . . will either degenerate into a despotism or, by the pressure of its inequities, bring on a revolution."[1] James Madison gave these reasons for Article V:

> "That useful alterations [in the Constitution] will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other."[2]

Article V sets forth two methods of proposing and two methods of ratifying amendments to the United States Constitution:

> "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . . ."

Up to the present time all amendments have been proposed by the Congress and all but one have been ratified by the state legislature mode. The Twenty-First Amendment was ratified by conventions called in the various states. Although there has not been a national constitutional convention since 1787, there have been more than 300 applications from state legislatures over the past 184 years seeking such a convention.* Every state, at one time or another, has petitioned Congress for a convention. These state applications have ranged from applications calling for a general convention to a convention dealing with a specific subject, as, for example, slavery, anti-polygamy, presidential tenure, and repeal of prohibition. The pressure generated by numerous petitions for a constitutional convention is believed to have been a factor in motivating Congress to propose the Seventeenth Amendment to change the method of selecting Senators.

Despite the absence at the national level since 1787, conventions have been the preferred instrument for major revision of state constitutions. As one commentator on the state constitution-making process has stated: "The convention is purely American—widely tested and used."[3] There have been more than 200 conventions in the states, ranging from 15 in New Hampshire to one in eleven states. In a substantial majority of the states the convention is provided for by the state constitution. In the remainder it has been sanctioned by judicial interpretation and practice.[4]

Renewed and greater efforts to call a national constitutional convention have come in the aftermath of the Supreme Court's decisions in Baker v. Carr[5] and Reynolds v. Sims.[6] Shortly after the decision in Baker v. Carr, the Council of State Governments recommended that the states petition Congress for a national constitutional convention to propose three amendments to the Constitution. One would have denied to federal courts original and appellate jurisdiction over state legislative apportionment cases; another would have established a "Court of the Union" in place of the Supreme Court; and the third would have amended Article V to allow amendments to be adopted on the basis of identically-worded state petitions.[7] Twelve state petitions were sent to Congress in 1963 and 1964 requesting a convention to propose an amendment which would remove state legislative apportionment cases from the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary. In December 1964 the Council of State Governments recommended at its annual convention that the state legislatures petition Congress for a national constitutional convention to propose an amendment permitting one house of a state legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population.

*These applications are classified by subject and state in Appendix B, Part One. They are also discussed generally in Barbara Prager's paper, which is also included in Appendix B, Part Two.

By 1967 thirty-two state legislatures had adopted applications calling for a constitutional convention on the question of apportionment. The wording of these petitions varied. Several sought consideration of an amendment to abolish federal judicial review of state legislative apportionment. Others sought a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment which would "secure to the people the right of some choice in the method of apportionment of one house of a state legislature on a basis other than population alone." A substantial majority of states requested a convention to propose a specific amendment set forth haec verba in their petitions. Even here, there was variation of wording among a few of these state petitions.[8]

On March 18, 1967 a front page story in The New York Times reported that "a campaign for a constitutional convention to modify the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote rule is nearing success." It said that the opponents of the rule "lack only two states in their drive" and that "most of official Washington has been caught by surprise because the state legislative actions have been taken with little fanfare." That article prompted immediate and considerable discussion of the subject both in and out of Congress. It was urged that Congress would be under no duty to call a convention even if applications were received from the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. Others argued that the words of Article V were imperative and that there would be such a duty. There was disagreement as to whether applications from malapportioned legislatures could be counted; and there were different views on the authority of any convention. Some maintained that, once constituted, a convention could not be restricted to the subject on which the state legislatures had requested action but could go so far as to propose an entirely new Constitution. Adding to the confusion and uncertainty was the fact that there were no ground rules or precedents for amending the Constitution through the route of a constitutional convention.

As the debate on the convention method of initiating amendments continued into 1969, one additional state* submitted an application for a convention on the reapportionment issue while another state adopted a resolution rescinding its previous application.[9] Thereafter, the effort to call a convention on that issue diminished. Recently, however, the filing of state applications for a convention on the school busing issue has led to a new flurry of discussion on the question of a national constitutional convention.

The circumstances surrounding the apportionment applications prompted Senator Sam J. Ervin to introduce in the Senate on August 17, 1967 a bill to establish procedures for calling a constitutional convention. In explaining his reasons for the proposed legislation, Senator Ervin has stated:

> "My conviction was that the constitutional questions involved were far more important than the reapportionment issue that had brought them to light, and that they should receive more orderly and objective consideration than they had so far been accorded. Certainly it would be grossly unfortunate if the partisanship over state legislative apportionment—and I am admittedly a partisan on the issue—should be allowed to distort an attempt at clarification of the amendment process, which in the long run must command a higher obligation and duty than any single issue that might be the subject of that process."[10]

After hearings and amendments to the original legislation, Senator Ervin's bill (S.215) passed the Senate by an 84 to 0 vote on October 19, 1971.[11] Although there was no action in the House of Representatives in the Ninety-Second Session of Congress, comparable legislation is expected to receive attention in both Houses in the future.+

*Making thirty-three in all, including applications from two state legislatures made in 1963.

+S. 215 was re-introduced in the Senate on March 19, 1973, as S.1272 and was favorably reported out of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers on June 6, 1973, and passed the Senate July 9, 1973. That legislation is set forth and discussed in Appendix A.

The submission by state legislatures during the past thirty-five years of numerous applications for a national constitutional convention has brought into sharp focus the manifold issues arising under Article V. Included among these issues are the following:

1) If the legislatures of two-thirds of the states apply for a convention limited to a specific matter, must Congress call such a convention?

2) If a convention is called, is the limitation binding on the convention?

3) What constitutes a valid application which Congress must count and who is to judge its validity?

4) What is the length of time in which applications for a convention will be counted?

5) How much power does Congress have as to the scope of a convention? As to procedures such as the selection of delegates? As to the voting requirements at a convention? As to refusing to submit to the states for ratification the product of a convention?

6) What are the roles of the President and state governors in the amending process?

7) Can a state legislature withdraw an application for a convention once it has been submitted to Congress or rescind a previous ratification of a proposed amendment or a previous rejection?

8) Are issues arising in the convention process justiciable?

9) Who is to decide questions of ratification?

Since there has never been a national constitutional convention subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution, there is no direct precedent to look to in attempting to answer these questions. In searching out the answers, therefore, resort must be made, among other things, to the text of Article V, the origins of the provision, the intent of the Framers, and the history and workings of the amending article since 1789. Our answers appear on the following pages.*

*While we also have studied a great many related and peripheral issues, our conclusions and recommendations are limited to the principal questions.

General

Responding to our charge, our Committee has attempted to canvass all the principal questions of law involved in the calling of a national constitutional convention pursuant to Article V. At the outset, we note that some, apprehensive about the scope of constitutional change possible in a national constitutional convention, have proposed that Article V be amended so as to delete or modify the convention method of proposing amendments.[12] On the other hand, others have noted that a dual method of constitutional change was intended by the Framers, and they contend that relative ease of amendment is salutary, at least within limits. Whatever the merits of a fundamental modification of Article V, we regard consideration of such a proposal as beyond the scope of our study. In short, we take the present text of Article V as the foundation for our study.

It is the view of our Committee that it is desirable for Congress to establish procedures for amending the Constitution by the national constitutional convention method. We recognize that some believe that it is unfortunate to focus attention on this method of amendment and unwise to establish procedures which might facilitate the calling of a convention. The argument is that the establishment of procedures might make it easier for state legislatures to seek a national convention, and might even encourage them to do so.[13] Underlying this argument is the belief that, at least in modern political terms, a national convention would venture into uncharted and dangerous waters. It is relevant to note in this respect that a similar concern has been expressed about state constitutional conventions but that 184 years' experience at that level furnishes little support to the concern.[14]

We are not persuaded by these suggestions that we should fail to deal with the convention method, hoping that the difficult questions never arise. More than 300 applications during our constitutional history, with every state legislature represented, stand as testimony that a consideration of procedure is not purely academic. Indeed, we would ignore at great peril the lessons of the recent proposals for a convention on legislative apportionment (the one-person, one-vote issue) where, if one more state had requested a convention, a major struggle would have ensued on the adequacy of the requests and on the nature of the convention and the rules therefor.

If we fail to deal now with the uncertainties of the convention method, we could be courting a constitutional crisis of grave proportions. We would be running the enormous risk that procedures for a national constitutional convention would have to be forged in time of divisive controversy and confusion when there would be a high premium on obstructive and result-oriented tactics.

It is far more prudent, we believe, to confront the problem openly and to supply safeguards and general rules in advance. In addition to being better governmental technique, a forthright approach to the dangers of the convention method seems far more likely to yield beneficial results than would burying our heads in the sands of uncertainty. Essentially, the reasons are the same ones which caused the American Bar Association to urge, and our nation ultimately to adopt, the rules for dealing with the problems of presidential disability and a vice-presidential vacancy which are contained in the Twenty-Fifth Amendment. So long as the Constitution envisions the convention method, we think the procedures should be ready if there is a "contemporaneously felt need" by the required two-thirds of the state legislatures. Fidelity to democratic principles requires no less.

The observation that one Congress may not bind a subsequent Congress does not persuade us that comprehensive legislation is useless or impractical. The interests of the public and nation are better served when safeguards and rules are prescribed in advance. Congress itself has recognized this in many areas, including its adoption of and subsequent reliance on legislative procedures for handling such matters as presidential electoral vote disputes and contested elections for the House of Representatives.[15] Congressional legislation fashioned after intensive study, and in an atmosphere free from the emotion and politics that undoubtedly would surround a specific attempt to energize the convention process, would be entitled to great weight as a constitutional interpretation and be of considerable precedential value. Additionally, whenever two-thirds of the state legislatures had applied for a convention, it would help to focus and channel the ensuing discussion and identify the expectations of the community.

In our view any legislation implementing Article V should reflect its underlying policy, as articulated by Madison, of guarding "equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults."[16] Legislation should protect the integrity of the amending process and assure public confidence in its workings.

Specific

It is our conclusion that Congress has the power to establish procedures governing the calling of a national constitutional convention limited to the subject matter on which the legislatures of two-thirds of the states request a convention. In establishing procedures for making available to the states a limited convention when they petition for such a convention, Congress must not prohibit the state legislatures from requesting a general convention since, as we view it, Article V permits both types of conventions (pp. 11-19 infra).

We consider Congress' duty to call a convention whenever two-thirds of the state legislatures have concurred on the subject matter of the convention to be mandatory (p. 17).

We believe that the Constitution does not assign the President a role in either the call of a convention or the ratification of a proposed amendment (pp. 25-28).

We consider it essential that legislation passed by Congress to implement the convention method should provide for limited judicial review of congressional action or inaction concerning a constitutional convention. Provision for such review not only would enhance the legitimacy of the process but would seem particularly appropriate since, when and if the process were resorted to, it likely would be against the backdrop of some dissatisfaction with prior congressional performance (pp. 20-25).

We deem it of fundamental importance that delegates to a convention be elected and that representation at the convention be in conformity with the principles of representative democracy as enunciated by the "one-person, one-vote" decisions of the Supreme Court (pp. 33-37). One member of the Committee, however, does not believe that the one-person, one-vote rule is applicable to a constitutional convention.

We believe also that a convention should adopt its own rules of procedure, including the vote margin necessary at the convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution (pp. 19-20).

Our research and deliberations have led us to conclude that a state governor should have no part in the process by which a state legislature applies for a convention or ratifies a proposed amendment (pp. 28-30).*

Finally, we believe it highly desirable for any legislation implementing the convention method of Article V to include the rule that a state legislature can withdraw an application at any time before the legislatures of two-thirds of the states have submitted applications on the same subject, or withdraw a vote rejecting a proposed amendment, or rescind a vote ratifying a proposed amendment so long as three-fourths of the states have not ratified (pp. 32-33, 37-38).

*We, of course, are referring to a substantive role and not a role such as the agency for the transmittal of applications to Congress, or for receipt of proposed amendments for submission to the state legislature, or for the certification of the act of ratification in the state.

Authority of an Article V Convention

Central to any discussion of the convention method of initiating amendments is whether a convention convened under Article V can be limited in its authority. There is the view, with which we disagree, that an Article V convention would be a sovereign assemblage and could not be restricted by either the state legislatures or the Congress in its authority or proposals. And there is the view, with which we agree, that Congress has the power to establish procedures which would limit a convention's authority to a specific subject matter where the legislatures of two-thirds of the states seek a convention limited to that subject.

The text of Article V demonstrates that a substantial national consensus must be present in order to adopt a constitutional amendment. The necessity for a consensus is underscored by the requirement of a two-thirds vote in each House of Congress or applications for a convention from two-thirds of the state legislatures to initiate an amendment, and by the requirement of ratification by three-fourths of the states. From the language of Article V we are led to the conclusion that there must be a consensus among the state legislatures as to the subject matter of a convention before Congress is required to call one. To read Article V as requiring such agreement helps assure "that an alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and felt needs of today . . . ."[17]

The origins and history of Article V indicate that both general and limited conventions were within the contemplation of the Framers. The debates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 make clear that the convention method of proposing amendments was intended to stand on an equal footing with the congressional method. As Madison observed: Article V "equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other."[18] The "state" method, as it was labeled, was prompted largely by the belief that the national government might abuse its powers. It was felt that such abuses might go unremedied unless there was a vehicle of initiating amendments other than Congress.

The earliest proposal on amendments was contained in the Virginia Plan of government introduced in the Convention on May 29, 1787 by Edmund Randolph. It provided in resolution 13 "that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto."[19] A number of suggestions were advanced as to a specific article which eventuated in the following clause in the Convention's Committee of Detail report of August 6, 1787:

> "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose."[20]

This proposal was adopted by the Convention on August 30. Gouverneur Morris's suggestion on that day that Congress be left at liberty to call a convention "whenever it pleased" was not accepted. There is reason to believe that the convention contemplated under this proposal "was the last step in the amending process, and its decisions did not require any ratification by anybody."[21]

On September 10, 1787 Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts moved to reconsider the amending provision, stating that under it "two thirds of the States may obtain a Convention, a majority of which can bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the State-Constitutions altogether." His motion was supported by Alexander Hamilton and other delegates. Hamilton pointed to the difficulty of introducing amendments under the Articles of Confederation and stated that "an easy mode should be established for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new System."[22] He felt that Congress would be "the first to perceive" and be "most sensible to the necessity of Amendments," and ought also to be authorized to call a convention whenever two-thirds of each branch concurred on the need for a convention. Madison also criticized the August 30 proposal, stating that the vagueness of the expression "call a convention for the purpose" was sufficient reason for reconsideration. He then asked: "How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?" As a result of the debate, the clause adopted on August 30 was dropped in favor of the following provision proposed by Madison:

> "The Legislature of the U-S- whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U.S."[23]

On September 15, after the Committee of Style had returned its report, George Mason strongly objected to the amending article on the ground that both modes of initiating amendments depended on Congress so that "no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive . . . ."* Gerry and Gouverneur Morris then moved to amend the article "so as to require a convention on application of" two-thirds of the states.[24] In response Madison said that he "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application." He added that he had no objection against providing for a convention for the purpose of amendments "except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided."[25]

---

*Mason's draft of the Constitution, as it stood at that point in the Convention, contained the following notations: "Article 5th — By this article Congress only have the power of proposing amendments at any future time to this constitution and should it prove ever so oppressive, the whole people of America can't make, or even propose alterations to it; a doctrine utterly subversive of the fundamental principles of the rights and liberties of the people." 2 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 629 n. 8 (Farrand ed. 1937)

Thereupon, the motion by Morris and Gerry was agreed to and the amending article was thereby modified so as to include the convention method as it now reads. Morris then successfully moved to include in Article V the proviso that "no state, without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

There was little discussion of Article V in the state ratifying conventions. In The Federalist Alexander Hamilton spoke of Article V as contemplating "a single proposition." Whenever two-thirds of the states concur, he declared, Congress would be obliged to call a convention. "The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention'. Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."[26]* Madison, as noted earlier, stated in The Federalist that both the general and state governments are equally enabled to "originate the amendment of errors."

While the Constitutional Convention of 1787 may have exceeded the purpose of its call in framing the Constitution,* it does not follow that a convention convened under Article V and subject to the Constitution can lawfully assume such authority. In the first place, the Convention of 1787 took place during an extraordinary period and at a time when the states were independent and there was no effective national government. Thomas Cooley described it as "a revolutionary proceeding, and could be justified only by the circumstances which had brought the Union to the brink of dissolution."[27] Moreover, the Convention of 1787 did not ignore Congress. The draft Constitution was submitted to Congress, consented to by Congress, and transmitted by Congress to the states for ratification by popularly-elected conventions.

Both pre-1787 convention practices and the general tenor of the amending provisions of the first state constitutions lend support to the conclusions that a convention could be convened for a specific purpose and that, once convened, it would have no authority to exceed that purpose.

*This is because it was called "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation and reporting . . . such alterations and provisions therein as shall . . . render the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union."

Of the first state constitutions, four provided for amendment by conventions and three by other methods.[28] Georgia's Constitution provided that

> "no alteration shall be made in this constitution without petitions from a majority of the counties, . . . at which time the assembly shall order a *convention to be called for that purpose, specifying the alterations to be made, according to the petitions referred to the assembly by a majority of the counties as aforesaid."[29]

Pennsylvania's Constitution of 1776 provided for the election of a Council of Censors with power to call a convention

> "if there appear to them an absolute necessity of amending any article of the constitution which may be defective . . . . But the articles to be amended, and the amendment proposed, and such articles as are proposed to be added or abolished, shall be promulgated at least six months before the day appointed for the election of such convention, for the previous consideration of the people, that they may have an opportunity of instructing their delegates on the subject."[30]

The Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 directed the General Court to have the qualified voters of the respective towns and plantations convened in 1795 to collect their sentiments on the necessity or expediency of amendments. If two-thirds of the qualified voters throughout the state favored "revision or amendment," it was provided that a convention of delegates would meet "for the purpose aforesaid."

The report of the Annapolis Convention of 1786 also reflected an awareness of the binding effect of limitations on a convention. That Convention assembled to consider general trade matters and, because of the limited number of state representatives present, decided not to proceed, stating:

> "That the express terms of the powers to your Commissioners supposing a deputation from all the States, and having for object the Trade and Commerce of the United States, Your Commissioners did not conceive it advisable to proceed on the business of their mission, under the Circumstances of so partial and defective a representation."[31]

In their report, the Commissioners expressed the opinion that there should be another convention, to consider not only trade matters but the amendment of the Articles of Confederation. The limited authority of the Annapolis Commissioners, however, was made clear:

*Note the similarity between this language (emphasis ours) and the language contained in the earliest drafts of Article V (p. 12, supra).

59-609 O - 80 - 7

> "If in expressing this wish, or in intimating any other sentiment, your Commissioners should seem to exceed the strict bounds of their appointment, they entertain a full confidence, that a conduct, dictated by an anxiety for the welfare, of the United States, will not fail to receive an indulgent construction.
>
> • • •
>
> "Though your Commissioners could not with propriety address these observations and sentiments to any but the States they have the honor to Represent, they have nevertheless concluded from motives of respect, to transmit Copies of this Report to the United States in Congress assembled, and to the executives of the other States."

From this history of the origins of the amending provision, we are led to conclude that there is no justification for the view that Article V sanctions only general conventions. Such an interpretation would relegate the alternative method to an "unequal" method of initiating amendments. Even if the state legislatures overwhelmingly felt that there was a necessity for limited change in the Constitution, they would be discouraged from calling for a convention if that convention would automatically have the power to propose a complete revision of the Constitution.

Since Article V specifically and exclusively vests the state legislatures with the authority to apply for a convention, we can perceive no sound reason as to why they cannot invoke limitations in exercising that authority. At the state level, for example, it seems settled that the electorate may choose to delegate only a portion of its authority to a state constitutional convention and so limit it substantively.[32] The rationale is that the state convention derives its authority from the people when they vote to hold a convention and that when they so vote they adopt the limitations on the convention contained in the enabling legislation drafted by the legislature and presented on a "take it or leave it" basis.[33] As one state court decision stated:

> "When the people, acting under a proper resolution of the legislature, vote in favor of calling a constitutional convention, they are presumed to ratify the terms of the legislative call, which thereby becomes the basis of the authority delegated to the convention."[34]

And another:

> "Certainly, the people, may, if they will, elect delegates for a particular purpose without conferring on them all their authority . . . ."[35]

In summary, we believe that a substantively-limited Article V convention is consistent with the purpose of the alternative method since the states and people would have a complete vehicle other than the Congress for remedying specific abuses of power by the national government; consistent with the actual history of the amending article throughout which only amendments on single subjects have been proposed by Congress; consistent with state practice under which limited conventions have been held under constitutional provisions not expressly sanctioning a substantively-limted convention;[36] and consistent with democratic principles because convention delegates would be chosen by the people in an election in which the subject matter to be dealt with would be known and the issues identified, thereby enabling the electorate to exercise an informed judgment in the choice of delegates.

Power of Congress with Respect to an Article V Convention

Article V explicitly gives Congress the power to call a convention upon receipt of applications from two-thirds of the state legislatures and to choose the mode of ratification of a proposed amendment. We believe that, as a necessary incident of the power to call, Congress has the power initially to determine whether the conditions which give rise to its duty have been satisfied. Once a determination is made that the conditions are present, Congress' duty is clear—it "shall" call a convention. The language of Article V, the debates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and statements made in The Federalist, in the debates in the state ratifying conventions, and in congressional debates during the early Congresses make clear the mandatory nature of this duty.*

*Upon receipt of the first state application for a convention, a debate took place in the House of Representatives on May 5, 1789, as to whether it would be proper to refer that application to committee. A number of Representatives, including Madison, felt it would be improper to do so, since it would imply that Congress had a right to deliberate upon the subject. Madison said that this "was not the case until two-thirds of the State Legislatures concurred in such application, and then it is out of the power of Congress to decline complying, the words of the Constitution being express and positive relative to the agency Congress may have in case of

While we believe that Congress has the power to establish standards for making available to the states a limited convention when they petition for that type of convention, we consider it essential that implementing legislation not preclude the states from applying for a general convention. Legislation which did so would be of questionable validity since neither the language nor history of Article V reveals an intention to prohibit another general convention.

In formulating standards for determining whether a convention call should issue, there is a need for great delicacy. The standards not only will determine the call but they also will have the effect of defining the convention's authority and determining whether Congress must submit a proposed amendment to the states for ratification. The standards chosen should be precise enough to permit a judgment that two-thirds of the state legislatures seek a convention on an agreed-upon matter. Our research of possible standards has not produced any alternatives which we feel are preferable to the "same subject" test embodied in S.1272. We do feel, however, that the language of Sections 4, 5, 6, 10 and 11 of S.1272 is in need of improvement and harmonization so as to avoid the use of different expressions and concepts.

We believe that standards which in effect required applications to be identical in wording would be improper since they would tend to make resort to the convention process exceedingly difficult in view of the problems that would be encountered in obtaining identically worded applications from thirty-four states. Equally improper, we believe, would be standards which permitted Congress to applications of this nature." The House thus decided not to refer the application to committee but rather to enter it upon the Journals of Congress and place the original in its files. 1 Annals of Congress, cols. 248-51 (1789). Further support for the proposition that Congress has no discretion on whether or not to call a constitutional convention, once two-thirds of the states have applied for one, may be found in IV Elliot, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 178 (2d ed 1836) (remarks of delegate James Iredell of North Carolina); 1 Annals of Congress, col. 498 (1796) (remarks of Rep. William Smith of South Carolina during debate on a proposed treaty with Great Britain); Cong. Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess. 630-31 (1865) (remarks of Senator Johnson).

---

exercise a policy-making role in determining whether or not to call a convention.*

In addition to the power to adopt standards for determining when a convention call should issue, we also believe it a fair inference from the text of Article V that Congress has the power to provide for such matters as the time and place of the convention, the composition and financing of the convention, and the manner of selecting delegates. Some of these items can only be fixed by Congress. Uniform federal legislation covering all is desirable in order to produce an effective convention.

Less clear is Congress' power over the internal rules and procedures of a convention.+ The Supreme Court's decisions in Dillon v. Gloss[37] and Leser v. Garnett[38] can be viewed as supporting a broad view of Congress' power in the amending process. As the Court stated in Dillon v. Gloss: "As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal with subsidiary matters of detail as the public interests and changing conditions may require; and Article V is no exception to the rule." On the other hand, the legislative history of Article V reflects a purpose that the convention method be as free as possible from congressional domination, and the text of Article V grants Congress only two express powers pertaining to a convention, that is, the power (or duty) to call a convention and the power to choose the mode of ratification of any proposed amendment. In the absence of direct precedents, it perhaps can be said fairly that Congress may not by legislation interfere with matters of procedure because they are an intrinsic part of the deliberative characteristic of a convention.[39] We view as unwise and of questionable validity any attempt by Congress to regulate the internal proceedings of a convention. In particular, we believe that Congress should not impose a vote requirement on an Article V convention. We are influenced in this regard by these factors:

*See our discussion at pages 30-31, infra.

+For a related discussion, see the debates which took place at the time the Twenty-First Amendment was being formulated concerning the extent of congressional power over state ratifying conventions. See, e.g., 76 Cong. Rec. 124-34, 2419-21, 4152-55 (1933); 77 Cong. Rec. 481-82 (1933); 81 Cong. Rec. 3175-76 (1937). Former Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer argued that Congress could legislate all the necessary provisions for the assembly and conduct of such conventions, a view that was controverted at the time by former Solicitor General James M. Beck.

First, it appears from our research that throughout our history conventions generally have decided for themselves the vote that should govern their proceedings. This includes the Constitutional Convention of 1787, the constitutional conventions that took place between 1776 and 1787, many of the approximately two hundred state constitutional conventions that have been held since 1789, and the various territorial conventions that have taken place under acts passed by Congress.[40] Second, the specific intent of the Framers with regard to the convention method of initiating amendments was to make available an alternative method of amending the Constitution—one that would be free from congressional domination. Third, a reading of the 1787 debates suggests that the Framers contemplated that an Article V convention would have the power to determine its own voting and other internal procedures and that the requirement of ratification by three-fourths of the states was intended to protect minority interests.[41]

We have considered the suggestion that Congress should be able to require a two-thirds vote in order to maintain the symmetry between the convention and congressional methods of initiating amendments. We recognize that the convention can be viewed as paralleling Congress as the proposing body. Yet we think it is significant that the Constitution, while it specifies a two-thirds vote by Congress to propose an amendment, is completely silent as to the convention vote.

Judicial Review

The Committee believes that judicial review of decisions made under Article V is desirable and feasible. We believe Congress should declare itself in favor of such review in any legislation implementing the convention process. We regard as very unwise the approach of S.1272 which attempts to exclude the courts from any role. While the Supreme Court's decision in Ex parte McCardle[42] indicated that Congress has power under Article III to withdraw matters from the jurisdiction of the federal courts, this power is not unlimited. It is questionable whether the power reaches so far as to permit Congress to change results required by other provisions of the Constitution or to deny a remedy to enforce constitutional rights. Moreover, we are unaware of any authority upholding this power in cases of original jurisdiction.[43]

To be sure, Congress has discretion in interpreting Article V and in adopting implementing legislation. It cannot be gainsaid that Congress has the primary power of administering Article V. We do not believe, however, that Congress is, or ought to be, the final dispositive power in every situation. In this regard, it is to be noted that the courts have adjudicated on the merits a variety of questions arising under the amending article. These have included such questions as: whether Congress may choose the state legislative method of ratification for proposed amendments which expand federal power; whether a proposed amendment requires the approval of the President; whether Congress may fix a reasonable time for ratification of a proposed amendment by state legislatures; whether the states may restrict the power of their legislatures to ratify amendments or submit the decision to a popular referendum; and the meaning of the requirement of a two-thirds vote of both Houses.[44]

Baker v. Carr and Powell v. McCormack suggest considerable change in the Supreme Court's view since Coleman v. Miller[45] on questions involving the political process.

In Coleman, the Court held that a group of state legislators who had voted not to ratify the child labor amendment had standing to question the validity of their state's ratification. Four Justices dissented on this point. The Court held two questions non-justiciable: the issue of undue time lapse for ratification and the power of a state legislature to ratify after having first rejected ratification. In reaching these conclusions, the Court pointed to the absence of criteria either in the Constitution or a statute relating to the ratification process. The four Justices who dissented on standing concurred on non-justiciability. They felt, however, that the Court should have disapproved Dillon v. Gloss insofar as it decided judicially that seven years is a reasonable period of time for ratification, stating that Article V gave control of the amending process to Congress and that the process was "political in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point." Even though the calling of a convention is not precisely within these time limits and the holding in Coleman is not broad, it is not at all surprising that commentators read that case as bringing Article V issues generally within the rubric of "political questions."

In Baker v. Carr,[46] the Court held that a claim of legislative malapportionment raised a justiciable question. More generally, the Court laid down a number of criteria, at least one of which was likely to be involved in a true "political question," as follows:

> "a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for non-judicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment for multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question."[47]

Along with these formulas, there was additional stress in Baker v. Carr on the fact that the Court there was not dealing with Congress, a coordinate branch, but with the states. In reviewing the precedents, the Court noted that it had held issues to be nonjusticiable when the matter demanded a single-voiced statement, or required prompt, unquestioning obedience, as in a national emergency, or contained the potential embarrassment of sitting in judgment on the internal operations of a coordinate branch.

Perhaps the most striking feature of Baker and its progeny has been the Court's willingness to project itself into redistricting and reapportionment in giving relief. In addition, some of the criteria stressed by the Court as determinative of "political question" issues were as applicable to Congress as to the states.

In Powell,[48] the Court clearly marked out new ground. The question presented was the constitutionality of the House of Representatives' decision to deny a seat to Congressman-elect Powell, despite his having fulfilled the prerequisites specified in Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution. Even though it was dealing with Congress, and indeed with a matter of internal legislative operation, still it held that the question was a justiciable one, involving as it did the traditional judicial function of interpreting the Constitution, and that a newly elected Representative could be judged as to qualifications only as to age, citizenship, and residence. The Court limited itself to declaratory relief, saying that the question of whether coercive relief was available against employees of Congress was not being decided. But the more important aspect of the decision is the Court's willingness to decide. It stressed the interest of voters in having the person they elect take a seat in Congress. Thus, it looked into the clause on qualifications and found in the text and history that Congress was the judge of qualifications, but only of the three specified.

It is not easy to say just how these precedents apply to judicial review of questions involving a constitutional convention under Article V. It can be argued that they give three different doctrinal models, each leading to a different set of conclusions. We are inclined to a view which seeks to reconcile the three cases. Powell may be explained on the theory that specially protected constitutional interests are at stake, that the criteria for decisions were rather simple, and that an appropriate basis for relief could be found. Baker is more complex, but it did not involve Congress directly. The state legislatures had forfeited a right to finality by persistent and flagrant malapportionments, and one person, one vote supplied a judicially workable standard (though the latter point emerged after Baker). Thus, Coleman may be understood as good law so far as it goes, on the theory that Congress is directly involved, that no specially protected interests are threatened, and that the issues are not easily dealt with by the Court.

Following this approach to the three cases, some tentative conclusions can be drawn for Article V and constitutional conventions. If two-thirds of the state legislatures apply, for example, for a convention to consider the apportionment of state legislatures, and Congress refuses to call the convention, it is arguable that a Powell situation exists, since the purpose of the convention method was to enable the states to bring about a change in the Constitution even against congressional opposition. The question whether Congress is required to act, rather than having discretion to decide, is one very similar in quality to the question in Powell. The difficulty not confronted in Powell is that the relief given must probably be far-reaching, possibly involving the Court in approving a plan for a convention. There are at least two answers. The Court might find a way to limit itself to a declaratory judgment, as it did in Powell, but if it must face far-reaching relief, the reapportionment cases afford a precedent. In some ways, a plan for a convention would present great difficulties for a court, but it could make clear that Congress could change its plan, simply by acting.[49]

If one concludes that the courts can require Congress to act, one is likely to see the courts as able to answer certain ancillary questions of "law," such as whether the state legislatures can bind a convention by the limitations in their applications, and whether the state legislatures can force the call of an unlimited convention. Here we believe Congress has a legislative power, within limits, to declare the effects of the states' applications on the scope of the convention. Courts should recognize that power and vary their review according to whether Congress has acted.

Consequently, this Committee strongly favors the introduction in any implementing legislation of a limited judicial review.* It would not only add substantial legitimacy to any use of the convention process but it would ease the question of justiciability. Moreover, since the process likely would be resorted to in order to effect a change opposed by vested interests, it seems highly appropriate that our independent judiciary be involved so that it can act, if necessary, as the arbiter.

In view of the nature of the controversies that might arise under Article V, the Committee believes that there should be several limits on judicial consideration. First, a Congressional determination should be overturned only if "clearly erroneous." This standard recognizes Congress' political role and at the same time insures that Congress cannot arbitrarily void the convention process.

*_Appendix A_ sets forth suggestions as to how such review might be provided for in S.1272.

Second, by limiting judicial remedies to declaratory relief, the possibility of actual conflict between the branches of government would be diminished. As Powell illustrated, courts are more willing to adjudicate questions with "political" overtones when not faced with the institutionally destructive need to enforce the result.

Third, the introduction of judicial review should not be allowed to delay the amending process unduly. Accordingly, any claim should be raised promptly so as to result in an early presentation and resolution of any dispute. We favor a short limitation period combined with expedited judicial procedures such as the selection of a three-judge district court. The possibility of providing original jurisdiction in the Supreme Court was rejected for several reasons. Initiation of suit in the Supreme Court necessarily escalates the level of the controversy without regard to the significance of the basic dispute. In addition, three-judge district court procedures are better suited to an expedited handling of factual issues.

We do not believe that our recommendation of a three-judge court is inconsistent with the American Bar Association's position that the jurisdiction of such courts should be sharply curtailed. It seems likely that the judicial review provided for will occur relatively rarely. In those instances when it does, the advantages of three-judge court jurisdiction outweigh the disadvantages which the Association has perceived in the existing three-judge court jurisdiction. In cases involving national constitutional convention issues, the presence of three judges (including a circuit judge) and the direct appeal to the Supreme Court are significant advantages over conventional district court procedure.

Role of Executive
(i) President

There is no indication from the text of Article V that the President is assigned a role in the amending process. Article V provides that "Congress" shall propose amendments, call a convention for proposing amendments and, in either case, choose the mode for ratification of amendments.

Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution, however, provides that "every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President" for his approval and, if disapproved, may be repassed by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

It has, we believe, been regarded as settled that amendments proposed by Congress need not be presented to the President for his approval. The practice originated with the first ten amendments, which were not submitted to President Washington for his approval, and has continued through the recently proposed amendment on equality of rights. The question of whether the President's approval is required was passed on by the Supreme Court in Hollingsworth v. Virginia.[50] There, the validity of the Eleventh Amendment was attacked on the ground that it had "not been proposed in the form prescribed by the Constitution" in that it had never been presented to the President. Article I, Section 7 was relied upon in support of that position. The Attorney General argued that the proposing of amendments was "a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of investing the President with a qualified negative on the Acts and Resolutions of Congress." It was also urged that since a two-thirds vote was necessary for both proposing an amendment and overriding a presidential veto, no useful purpose would be served by a submission to the President in such case. It was argued in reply that this was no answer, since the reasons assigned by the President for his disapproval "might be so satisfactory as to reduce the majority below the constitutional proportion." The Court held that the amendment had been properly adopted, Justice Chase stating that "the negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation: he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution."[51] What was not pointed out, but could have been, is that had the President's approval been found necessary, it would have created the anomaly that only amendments proposed by Congress would be subject to the requirements inasmuch as Article I, Section 7 by its terms could not apply to action taken by a national constitutional convention.

Subsequent to Hollingsworth, the question of the President's role in the amending process has been the subject of discussion in Congress. In 1803 a motion in the Senate to submit the Twelfth Amendment to the President was defeated.[52] In 1865 the proposed Thirteenth Amendment was submitted to President Lincoln and, apparently through an inadvertence, was signed by him. An extensive discussion of his action took place in the Senate and a resolution was passed declaring that the President's signature was unnecessary, inconsistent with former practice, and should not constitute a precedent for the future.[53] The following year President Andrew Johnson, in a report to the Congress with respect to the Fourteenth Amendment, made clear that the steps taken by the Executive Branch in submitting the amendment to the state legislatures was "purely ministerial" and did not commit the Executive to "an approval or a recommendation of the amendment."[54] Since that time, no proposed amendment has been submitted to the President for his approval and no serious question has arisen over the validity of amendments for that reason. Thus, the Supreme Court could state in 1920 in Hawke v. Smith that it was settled "that the submission of a constitutional amendment did not require the action of the President."

While the "call" of a convention is obviously a different step from that of proposing an amendment, we do not believe that the President's approval is required. Under Article V applications from two-thirds of the state legislatures must precede a call and, as previously noted, Congress' duty to issue a call once the conditions have been met clearly seems to be a mandatory one. To require the President's approval of a convention call, therefore, would add a requirement not intended. Not only would it be inconsistent with the mandatory nature of Congress' duty and the practice of non-presidential involvement in the congressional process of initiating amendments but it would make more difficult any resort to the convention method. The approval of another branch of government would be necessary and, if not obtained, a two-thirds vote of each House would be required before a call could issue. Certainly, the parallelism between the two initiating methods would be altered, in a manner that could only thwart the intended purpose of the convention process as an "equal" method of initiating amendments.

While the language of Article I, Section 7 expressly provides for only one exception (i.e., an adjournment vote), it has been interpreted as not requiring presidential approval of preliminary votes in Congress, or, as noted, the proposal of constitutional amendments by Congress, or concurrent resolutions passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives for a variety of purposes.* As the Supreme Court held in Hollingsworth, Section 7 applies to "ordinary cases of legislation" and "has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution." Thus, the use of a concurrent resolution by Congress for the issuance of a convention call is in our opinion in harmony with the generally recognized exceptions to Article I, Section 7.

(ii) State Governor

We believe that a state governor should have no part in the process by which a state legislature applies for a convention or ratifies a proposed amendment. In reaching this conclusion, we are influenced by the fact that Article V speaks of "state legislatures" applying for a convention and ratifying an amendment proposed by either Congress or a national convention. The Supreme Court had occasion to focus on this expression in Hawke

*The concurrent resolution is used to express "the sense of Congress upon a given subject," Watkins, C.L., & Riddick, F.M., Senate Procedure: Precedents and Practices 208 (1964); to express "facts, principles, opinions, and purposes of the two Houses," Deschler, L., Jefferson's Manual and Rules of the House of Representatives 185-186 (1969); and to take a joint action embodying a matter within the limited scope of Congress, as, for instance, to count the electoral votes, terminate the effective date of some laws, and recall bills from the President, Evins, Joe L., Understanding Congress 114 (1963); Watkins and Riddick, supra at 208-9. A concurrent resolution was also used by Congress in declaring that the Fourteenth Amendment should be promulgated as part of the Constitution. 15 Stat. 709-10. Other uses include terminating powers delegated to the President, directing the expenditure of money appropriated to the use of Congress, and preventing reorganization plans taking effect under general powers granted the President to reorganize executive agencies. For an excellent discussion of such resolutions, see S. Rep. No. 1335, 54th Cong., 2d Sess. (1897).

v. Smith[55] (No. 1) in the context of a provision in the Ohio Constitution subjecting to a popular referendum any ratification of a federal amendment by its legislature. The Court held that this requirement was invalid, reasoning that the term "legislatures" had a certain meaning. Said the Court: "What it meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation. A Legislature was then the representative body which made the laws of the people."[56] The ratification of a proposed amendment, held the Court, was not "an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word" but simply an expression of assent in which "no legislative action is authorized or required." The Court also noted that the power to ratify proposed amendments has its source in the Constitution and, as such, the state law-making procedures are inapplicable.

That the term "Legislature" does not always mean the representative body itself was made clear by Smiley v. Holm.[57] That case involved a bill passed by the Minnesota legislature dividing the state into congressional districts under Article I, Section 4. The bill was vetoed by the governor and not repassed over his veto. As for the argument that the bill was valid because Article I, Section 4 refers to the state "Legislatures," the Court stated:

> "The use in the Federal Constitution of the same term in different relations does not always imply the same function .... Wherever the term 'legislature' is used in the Constitution it is necessary to consider the nature of the particular action in view ...."[58]

The Court found that the governor's participation was required because the function in question involved the making of state laws and the veto of the governor was an integral part of the state's legislative process. In finding that Article I, Section 4 contemplated the making of laws, the Court stated that it provided for "a complete code for congressional elections" whose requirements "would be nugatory if they did not have appropriate sanctions." The Court contrasted this function with the "Legislature's" role as an electoral body, as when it chose Senators, and a ratifying body, as in the case of federal amendments.

It is hard to see how the act of applying for a convention invokes the law-making processes of the state any more than its act of ratifying a proposed amendment. If anything, the act of ratification is closer to legislation since it is the last step before an amendment becomes a fundamental part of our law. A convention application, on the other hand, is several steps removed. Other states must concur, a convention them must be called by Congress, and an amendment must be proposed by that convention. Moreover, a convention application, unlike legislation dividing congressional districts, does not have the force of law or operate directly and immediately upon the people of the state. From a legal point of view, it would seem to be contrary to Hawke v. Smith and Leser v. Garnett to require the governor's participation in the application and ratification processes.[59]

The exclusion of the governor from the application and ratification processes also finds support in the overwhelming practice of the states,[60] in the views of text-writers,[61] and in the Supreme Court's decision in Hollingsworth v. Virginia holding that the President was excluded from any role in the process by which amendments are proposed by Congress.[62]

Article V Applications (i) Content

A reading of Article V makes clear that an application should contain a request to Congress to call a national convention that would have the authority to propose an amendment to the Constitution. An application which simply expressed a state's opinion on a given problem or requested Congress itself to propose an amendment would not be sufficient for purposes of Article V. Nor would an application seem proper if it called for a convention with no more authority than to vote a specific amendment set forth therein up or down, since the convention would be effectively stripped of its deliberative function.* A convention should have latitude to amend, as Congress does, by evaluating and dealing with a problem.

On the other hand, an application which expressed the result sought by an amendment, such as providing for the direct election of the President, should be proper since the convention itself would be left free to decide on the terms of the specific amendment necessary to accomplish that objective. We agree with the suggestion that it should not be necessary that each application be identical or propose similar changes in the same subject matter.[63]

*In commenting on the ratification process, the Supreme Court stated in Hawke v. Smith (No. 1). "Both methods of ratification, by legislatures or conventions, call for action by deliberative assemblages representative of the people, which it was assumed would voice the will of the people." 253 U.S. at 226-27 (emphasis added).

In order to determine whether the requisite agreement among the states is present, it would seem useful for congressional legislation to require a state legislature to list in its application all state applications in effect on the date of its adoption whose subject or subjects it considers to be substantially the same. By requiring a state legislature to express the purpose of its application in relation to those already received, Congress would have additional guidance in rendering its determination. Any such requirement, we believe, should be written in a way that would permit an application to be counted even though the state involved might have inadvertently but in good faith failed to identify similar applications in effect.

(ii) Timeliness

In Dillon v. Gloss, the Court upheld the fixing by Congress of a period during which ratification of a proposed amendment must be accomplished. In reaching that conclusion the Court stated that "the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal, which Congress is free to fix." The Court observed that

> "as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do."[64]

We believe the reasoning of Dillon v. Gloss to be equally applicable to state applications for a national constitutional convention. The convening of a convention to deal with a certain matter certainly should reflect the "will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period . . . ." In the absence of a uniform rule, the timeliness or untimeliness of state applications would vary, it seems, from case to case. It would involve, as the Supreme Court suggested with respect to the ratification area in Coleman v. Miller, a consideration of "political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the [applications] . . . ."[65]

59-609 O - 80 - 8

A uniform rule, as in the case of ratification of proposed amendments since 1918,[66] would add certainty and avoid the type of confusion which surrounded the apportionment applications. Any rule adopted, however, must take into account the fact that some state legislatures do not meet every year and that in many states the legislative sessions end early in the year.

Although the suggestion of a seven year period is consistent with that prescribed for the ratification of recent proposed constitutional amendments, it can be argued that such a period is too long for the calling of a constitutional convention, since a long series of years would likely be involved before an amendment could be adopted. A shorter period of time might more accurately reflect the will of the people at a given point in time. Moreover, at this time in our history when social, economic and political changes frequently occur, a long period of time might be undesirable. On the other hand, a period such as four years would give states which adopted an application in the third and fourth year little opportunity to withdraw it on the basis of further reflection. This is emphasized when consideration is given to the fact that a number of state legislatures do not meet every year. Hence, a longer period does afford more opportunity for reflection on both the submission and withdrawal of an application. It also enables the people at the time of state legislative elections to express their views. Of course, whatever the period it may be extended by the filing of a new proposal.

The Committee feels that some limitation is necessary and desirable but takes no position on the exact time except it believes that either four or seven years would be reasonable and that a congressional determination as to either period should be accepted.

(iii) Withdrawal of Applications

There is no law dealing squarely with the question of whether a state may withdraw an application seeking a constitutional convention, although some commentators have suggested that a withdrawal is of no effect.[67] The desirability of having a rule on the subject is underscored by the fact that state legislatures have attempted to withdraw applications, particularly during the two most recent cases where a large number of state legislatures sought a convention on a specific issue.* As a result, uncertainty and confusion have arisen as to the proper treatment of such applications.

During the Senate debates of October 1971 on S.215, no one suggested any limitation on the power to withdraw up to the time that the legislatures of two-thirds of the states had submitted proposals. Since a convention should reflect a "contemporaneously-felt need" that it take place, we think there should be no such limitation. In view of the importance and comparatively permanent nature of an amendment, it seems desirable that state legislatures be able to set aside applications that may have been hastily submitted or that no longer reflect the social, economic and political factors in effect when the applications were originally adopted. We believe Congress has the power to so provide.

From a slightly different point of view, the power to withdraw implies the power to change and this relates directly to the question of determining whether two-thirds of the state legislatures have applied for a convention to consider the same subject. A state may wish to say specifically through its legislature that it does or does not agree that its proposal covers the same subject as that of other state proposals. The Committee feels that this power is desirable.

Finally, we can see no problem with respect to a state changing a refusal to request a convention to a proposal for such a convention. All states, of course, have rules of one sort or another which restrict the time at which a once-defeated proposition can be again presented. If these rules were to apply to the call of a federal convention and operate in a burdensome manner, their validity would be questionable under Hawke v. Smith.

The Article V Convention

(i) Election of Delegates

We believe it of fundamental importance that a constitutional convention be representative of the people of the country. This is especially so when it is borne in mind that the method was intended to make available to the "people" a means of remedying abuses by the national government. If the convention is to be "responsive" to the people, then the structure most appropriate to the convention is one representative of the people. This, we believe, can only mean an election of convention delegates by the people. An election would help assure public confidence in the convention process by generating a discussion of the constitutional change sought and affording the people the opportunity to express themselves to the future delegates.

*That is, the reapportionment and tax limitation applications.

(ii) Apportionment of Delegates

Although there are no direct precedents in point, there is authority and substantial reason for concluding, as we do, that the one-person, one-vote rule is applicable to a national constitutional convention. In Hadley v. Junior College District, the Supreme Court held that the rule applied in the selection of people who carry on governmental functions.[68] While a recent decision, affirmed without opinion by the Supreme Court, held that elections for the judiciary are exempt from the rule, the lower court stated that "judges do not represent people."[69] Convention delegates, however, would represent people as well as perform a fundamental governmental function. As a West Virginia Supreme Court observed with respect to a state constitutional convention: "[E]ven though a constitutional convention may not precisely fit into one of the three branches of government, it is such an essential incident of government that every citizen should be entitled to equal representation therein."[70] Other decisions involving conventions differ as to whether the apportionment of a state constitutional convention must meet constitutional standards.[71]

Of course, the state reapportionment decisions are grounded in the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the congressional decision in Wesberry v. Sanders[72] was founded on Article I, Section 2. Federal legislation providing for a national constitutional convention would be subject to neither of these clauses but rather to the Fifth Amendment. Yet the concept of equal protection is obviously related to due process and has been so reflected in decisions under the Fifth Amendment.[73]

Assuming compliance with the one-person, one-vote rule is necessary, as we believe it is, what standards would apply? While the early cases spoke in terms of strict population equality, recent cases have accepted deviations from this standard. In Mahan v. Howell, the Supreme Court accepted deviations of up to 16.4% because the state apportionment plan was deliberately drawn to conform to existing political subdivisions which, the Court felt, formed a more natural basis for districting so as to represent the interests of the people involved.[74] In Abate v. Mundt, the Court upheld a plan for a county board of supervisors which produced a total deviation of 11.9%.[75] It did so on the basis of the long history of dual personnel in county and town government and the lack of built-in bias tending to favor a particular political interest or geográphic area.

Elaborating its views on one person, one vote, the Committee believes that a system of voting by states at a convention, while patterned after the original Constitutional Convention, would be unconstitutional as well as undemocratic and archaic. While it was appropriate before the adoption of the Constitution, at a time when the states were essentially independent, there can be no justification for such a system today. Aside from the contingent election feature of our electoral college system, which has received nearly universal condemnation as being anachronistic, we are not aware of any precedent which would support such a system today. A system of voting by states would make it possible for states representing one-sixth of the population to propose a constitutional amendment. Plainly, there should be a broad representation and popular participation at any convention.

While the representation provisions of S. 1272 allowing each state as many delegates as it has Senators and Representatives in Congress are preferable to a system of voting by states, it is seriously questionable whether that structure would be found constitutional because of the great voting weight it would give to people of one state over the people of another.* It can be argued that a representation system in a convention which parallels the structure in Congress does not violate due process, since Congress is the only other body authorized by the Constitution to propose constitutional amendments. On the other hand, representation in the Congress and the electoral college are explicit parts of the Constitution, arrived at as a result of compromises at the Constitutional Convention of 1787. It does not necessarily follow that apportionment plans based on such models are therefore constitutional. On the contrary, the reapportionment decisions make clear that state plans which deviate from the principle of equal representation for equal numbers are unconstitutional. As the Supreme Court stated in Kirkpatrick v. Preisler:

*Use of an electoral-college-type formula would mean that 15 states would be overrepresented by 50 percent or more, with the representation rising to close to 375 percent for Alaska. California, on the other hand, would be underrepresented by nearly 20 percent.

> "Equal representation for equal numbers of people is a principle designed to prevent debasement of voting power and diminution of access to elected representatives. Toleration of even small deviations detracts from these purposes."[76]

In our view, a system allotting to each state a number of delegates equal to its representation in the House of Representatives should be an acceptable compliance with one-person, one-vote standards.* We reach this conclusion recognizing that there would be population deviations of up to 50% arising from the fact that each state would be entitled to a delegate regardless of population. It would be possible to make the populations substantially equal by redistricting the entire country regardless of state boundaries or by giving Alaska one vote and having every other state elect at large a multiple of 300,000 representing its population or redistrict each state on the new population unit.[77] None of these methods, however, seems feasible or realistic. The time and expense involved in the creation and utilization of entirely new district lines for one election, especially since state election machinery is readily available, is one factor to be weighed. Another is the difficulty of creating districts crossing state lines which would adequately represent constituents from both states. There is also the natural interest of the voter in remaining within his state. Furthermore, the dual nature of our political system strongly supports the position that state boundaries be respected. Abate

*We have not studied the District of Columbia question, although we note that the District does not have a role in the congressional method of initiating amendments or in the ratification process.

v. Mundt, although distinguishable regarding apportionment of a local legislative body, suggests an analogy on a federal level. The rationale of the Court in upholding the legislative districts within counties drawn to preserve the integrity of the towns, with the minimum deviation possible, could be applicable to apportionment of a convention. The functional interdependence and the coordination of the federal and state governments and the fundamental nature of the dual system in our government parallel the relationship between the county and towns in Abate. Appropriate respect for the integrity of the states would seem to justify an exception to strict equality which would assure each state at least one delegate. Thus, a system based on the allocation of Representatives in Congress would afford maximum representation within that structure.

(iii) Members of Congress as Delegates

We cannot discern any federal constitutional bar against a member of Congress serving as a delegate to a national constitutional convention. We do not believe that the provision of Article I, Section 6 prohibiting congressmen from holding offices under the United States would be held applicable to service as a convention delegate. The available precedents suggest that an "office of the United States" must be created under the appointive provisions of Article II[78] or involve duties and functions in one of the three branches of government which, if accepted by a member of Congress, would constitute an encroachment on the principle of separation of powers underlying our governmental system.[79] It is hard to see how a state-elected delegate to a national constitutional convention is within the contemplation of this provision. It is noteworthy in this regard that several delegates to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 were members of the Continental Congress and that the Articles of Confederation contained a clause similar to Article I, Section 6.

We express no position on the policy question presented, or on the applicability and validity of any state constitutional bars against members of Congress simultaneously serving in other positions.

Ratification

As part of our study, the Committee has considered the advisability of including in any statute implementing the convention method a rule as to whether a state should be able to rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment or withdraw a rejection vote. In view of the confusion and uncertainty which exists with respect to these matters, we believe that a uniform rule would be highly desirable.

The difficult legal and policy question is whether a state can withdraw a ratification of a proposed amendment. There is a view that Article V envisions only affirmative acts and that once the act of ratification has taken place in a state, that state has exhausted its power with respect to the amendment in question.[80] In support, it is pointed out that where the convention method of ratification is chosen, the state constitutional convention would not have the ability to withdraw its ratification after it had disbanded. Consequently, it is suggested that a state legislature does not have the power to withdraw a ratification vote. This suggestion has found support in a few state court decisions[81] and in the action of Congress declaring the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment valid despite ratification rejections in two of the states making up the three-fourths.

On the other hand, Article V gives Congress the power to select the method of ratification and the Supreme Court has made clear that this power carries with it the power to adopt reasonable regulations with respect to the ratification process. We do not regard past precedent as controlling but rather feel that the principle of seeking an agreement of public support espoused in Dillon v. Gloss and the importance and comparatively permanent nature of an amendment more cogently argue in support of a rule permitting a state to change its position either way until three-fourths of the states have finally ratified.*[82]

*These views of the Committee are in accord with the rule which is expressed in S.1272 and its predecessor, S.215, which was unanimously passed by the Senate in October 1971. See page 4, supra.

Much of the past discussion on the convention method of initiating amendments has taken place concurrently with a lively discussion of the particular issue sought to be brought before a convention. As a result, the method itself has become clouded by uncertainty and controversy and attempted utilization of it has been viewed by some as not only an assault on the congressional method of initiating amendments but as unleashing a dangerous and radical force in our system. Our two-year study of the subject has led us to conclude that a national constitutional convention can be channeled so as not to be a force of that kind but rather an orderly mechanism of effecting constitutional change when circumstances require its use. The charge of radicalism does a disservice to the ability of the states and people to act responsibly when dealing with the Constitution.

We do not mean to suggest in any way that the congressional method of initiating amendments has not been satisfactory or, for that matter, that it is not to be preferred. We do mean to suggest that so long as the convention method of proposing amendments is a part of our Constitution, it is proper to establish procedures for its implementation and improper to place unncessary and unintended obstacles in the way of its use. As was stated by the Senate Judiciary Committee, with which we agree:

> "The committee believes that the responsibility of Congress under the Constitution is to enact legislation which makes article V meaningful. This responsibility dictates that legislation implementing the article should not be formulated with the objective of making the Convention route a dead letter by placing insurmountable procedural obstacles in its way. Nor on the other hand should Congress, in the guise of implementing legislation, create procedures designed to facilitate the adoption of any particular constitutional change."[83]

The integrity of our system requires that when the convention method is properly resorted to, it be allowed to function as intended.

Respectfully submitted,

SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION
STUDY COMMITTEE

C. Clyde Atkins, Chairman
Warren Christopher
David Dow
John D. Feerick
Adrian M. Foley, Jr.
Sarah T. Hughes
Albert M. Sacks
William S. Thompson
Samuel W. Witwer

July, 1973

[1] 2 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 1826 (5th ed. 1905).

[2] The Federalist No. 43, at 204 (Hallowell; Masters, Smith & Co. ed. 1852) (J. Madison).

[3] J. Wheeler, The Constitutional Convention: A Manual on its Planning, Organization and Operation xiii (National Municipal League Series 1, No. 4 1961); see R. Hoar, Constitutional Conventions 1-3 (1917).

[4] See A. Sturm, Thirty Years of State Constitution Making: 1938-1968, at 51-80, 132-37 (National Municipal League 1970).

[5] 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[6] 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

[7] See Black, "The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster," 72 Yale L.J. 957 (1963); Fensterwald, "Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process – A Reply," 46 A.B.A.J. 717 1960); Oberst, "The Genesis of the Three States-Rights Amendments of 1963," 39 Notre Dame Lawyer 644 (1964); Shanahan, "Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Will Strengthen Federal-State Relations," 49 A.B.A.J. 631 (1963).

[8] See American Enterprise Institute, A Convention to Amend the Constitution: Questions Involved in Calling a Convention Upon Applications by State Legislatures (Special Analysis No. 5, 1967).

[9] See Martin, "The Application Clause of Article Five," 85 Pol. Sci. Q. 616, 626 (1970).

[10] Ervin, "Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution," 66 Mich. L. Rev. 875, 878 (1968).

[11] See Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967); S. Rep. No. 336, 92nd Cong., 1st Sess. (1971); 117 Cong. Rec. 36803-06 (1971).

[12] The literature in this field deals with various proposals to "reform" Article V by easing, restricting, or otherwise altering the means of proposing amendments to the Constitution through the convention method. See, e.g., L. Orfield, The Amending of the Federal Constitution, Chap. VI (1942); McCleskey, "Along the Midway: Some Thoughts on Democratic Constitution-Amending," 66 Mich. L. Rev. 1001, 1012-16 (1968).

[13] On the other hand, some have suggested that state legislatures will be less likely to seek a national constitutional convention if they are more aware of the risks and uncertainties of the convention method. See, e.g., Buckwalter, "Constitutional Conventions and State Legislators," 20 J. Pub. Law 543 (1971).

[14] J. Wheeler, supra note 3, at xv. There have been occasions on which state constitutional conventions have successfully exceeded limitations placed upon them. Conventions in Georgia (1789), Illinois (1862 and 1869), Pennsylvania (1872), Alabama (1901) and Michigan (1907) all violated legislative directives – either procedural, substantive, or both. See R. Hoar, supra note 3, at 111-115.

The Virginia Convention of 1901 and the Kentucky Convention of 1890 both wrote major changes in suffrage into their creations, and then proclaimed the new constitutions as law without holding the legislatively mandated popular referenda. (Referenda conducted under the suffrage provisions of the old constitutions would have resulted in disapproval of the new instruments.)

[15] Article 1, § 5, of the Constitution gives the House of Representatives the authority to judge challenges to the election of its members. Since 1798, the House has seen fit to exercise this power through procedures enacted into law. Act of Jan. 23, 1798, Ch. 8, 1 Stat. 537. Subsequent modifications of that law appear in 2 U.S.C. §§ 201-226 (1970). Precedents for the use of this class of legislation, despite recognition that the rules enacted by one Congress in this area cannot bind a successor Congress, may be found in 1 Hinds, Precedents of the House of Representatives §§ 680, 719, 833 (1907).

In 1969 Congress passed the Federal Contested Elections Act, 2 U.S.C. §§ 381-96 (1970). In the House Report Accompanying that legislation appeared the following:

> Election contests affect both the integrity of the elected process and of the legislative process. Election challenges may interfere with the discharge of public duties by elected representatives and disrupt the normal operations of the Congress. It is essential, therefore, that such contests be determined by the House under modern procedures which provide efficient, expeditious processing of the cases and a full opportunity for both parties to be heard. H.R. Rep. No. 569, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1969).

Similarly, Congress decided in 1877 to establish procedures for handling electoral vote disputes for President rather than adopt ad hoc procedures, as it did in 1876 to resolve the Presidential election dispute of that year. That ad hoc resolution led to a great deal of criticism of Congress, as many felt the issue had been decided on the basis of political bias rather than facts. See generally 3 U.S.C. § 15 (1970); Rosenbloom, A History of Presidential Elections 243 (1965).

[16] The Federalist No. 43, supra note 2.

[17] J. Jameson, A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions; Their History, Powers, and Modes of Proceeding § 585, at 634 (4th ed. 1887); cited with approval in Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 375 (1921).

[18] The Federalist No. 43, supra note 2, at 204.

[19] 1 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 22 (Farrand ed. 1937) (hereinafter cited as Farrand).

[20] 2 Id. 188 (emphasis added).

[21] Weinfeld, "Power of Congress over State Ratifying Conventions," 51 Harv. L. Rev. 473, 481 (1938).

[22] 2 Farrand 558.

[23] Id. 559.

[24] Id. 629.

[25] Id. 629, 630.

[26] The Federalist No. 85, at 403 (Hallowell; Masters, Smith & Co. ed. 1852) (A. Hamilton).

[27] T. Cooley, The General Principles of Constitutional Law in the United States of America 15 (2d ed. 1891).

[28] Georgia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania provided for amendments by convention; Delaware, Maryland and South Carolina provided methods of amendment, but not through conventions; New Jersey, New York, North Carolina and Virginia lacked any provisions for amendment; and Connecticut and Rhode Island did not adopt constitutions at that time. The constitution of Vermont (then considered a territory) provided for amendments through convention. Weinfeld, supra note 21, at 479.

[29] Ga. Const. art. LXIII (1777), at 1 B. Poore, The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws of the United States 383 (1878) [hereinafter cited as Poore].

[30] Pa. Const. § 47 (1776), at 2 Poore 1548. Vermont's Constitution of 1786 contained a similar amending article.

[31] "Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States," H. Doc. No. 398, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. 41-43 (1927).

[32] A. Sturm, Methods of State Constitutional Reform 102 (1954); R. Hoar, supra note 3, at 71, 120-1; Dodd, "State Constitutional Conventions and State Legislative Power," 2 Vand. L. Rev. 27 (1948). The following state cases support the proposition: Opinion of the Justices, 264 A.2d 342 (Del. 1970); Chenault v. Carter, 332 S.W.2d 623 (Ky. 1960); State v. American Sugar Refining Co., 137 La. 407, 68 So. 742 (1915); Opinion of the Justices, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 573 (1833); Erwin v. Nolan, 280 Mo. 401, 217 S.W. 837 (1920); State ex rel. Kvaalen v. Graybill, 496 P.2d 1127 (Mont. 1972); Wood's Appeal, 75 Pa. 59 (1874); Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39 (1873); In re Opinion of the Governor, 55 R.I. 56, 178 A. 433 (1935); Cummings v. Beeler, 189 Tenn. 151, 223 S.W.2d 913 (1949); Quinlan v. Houston and Texas Central Ry. Co., 89 Tex. 356, 34 S.W. 738 (1896); Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 33 S.E.2d 158, 158 A.L.R. 495 (1945). See Annot. "Power of state legislature to limit the power of a state constitutional convention," 158 A.L.R. 512 (1945).

[33] Roger Hoar has expressed it this way:

> [T]here would be no convention unless the people voted affirmatively, that an affirmative vote would result in holding exactly the sort of convention in every detail provided in the act, and that the people are presumed to know the terms of the act under which they vote. The conclusion drawn from this is that the convention act in its every detail is enacted by the people voting under it. R. Hoar, supra note 3, at 71.

[34] State v. American Sugar Refining Company, 137 La. 407, 415, 68 So. 742, 745 (1915).

[35] State ex rel. McCready v. Hunt, 20 S.C. (2 Hill's Law) 1,271 (1834).

[36] Nearly 15% of the total number of state constitutional conventions called have been substantively limited in one or more respects. The limited or restricted state constitutional convention has been used frequently since World War II. See A. Sturm, supra note 4, at 56-60, 113; A. Sturm, "State Constitutions and Constitutional Revision, 1970-1971," in Council of State Gov'ts, The Book of the States, 1972-1973, at 20 (1972).

[37] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[38] 258 U.S. 130 (1922), where the Court stated: "But the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing the amendment, is a federal function derived from the Federal Constitution; and it transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a State."

[39] As Justice Felix Frankfurter has observed: "The history of American freedom is, in no small measure, the history of procedure." Malinski v. New York, 324 U.S. 401, 414 (1945). It is not surprising, therefore, that procedural limitations on conventions have been invalidated. See Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 115 N.W. 429 (1908); Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 61 (1858). See also Jameson, supra note 17, at 364; Dodd, supra note 32, at 31, 33.

[40] A number of the Congressional Acts providing for territorial conventions did prescribe that the convention must determine by a majority of the whole number of delegates whether it was expedient for the territory to form a constitution and state government. No such requirement, however, was imposed on the conventions in their work of framing such constitutions and governments. See, e.g., Act of April 30, 1802, ch. 40, 1 Stat. 173 (Ohio); Act of Feb. 20, 1811, ch. 21, 3 Stat. 641 (Louisiana); Act of July 16, 1894, ch. 138, 28 Stat. 107 (Utah); Act of June 16, 1906, ch. 3335, 34 Stat. 267 Oklahoma).

Among those few state constitutional conventions, for which the vote needed to govern convention proceedings was established in enabling legislation were the 1967 Pennsylvania convention, and the New Jersey conventions of 1947 and 1966. See Law of March 16, 1967, ch. 2 [1967] Pa. Laws 2; Act of Feb. 17, 1947, ch. 8, [1947] N.J. Laws 24; Act of May 10, 1965, ch. 43, [1965] N.J. Laws 101.

When Congress required that the Twenty-First Amendment (ending Prohibition) be ratified by state conventions, rather than legislatures, forty-three states enacted legislation providing for such conventions. Thirty-two of those enabling acts established the vote required of convention delegates for ratification; either a majority of those delegates present and voting (e.g., New Mexico and North Carolina – such acts also established a minimum quorum) or a majority of the total number of delegates (e.g. California and Illinois). In no case was the requirement greater than a majority of the total number of delegates. See E. Brown, Ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States: State Convention Records and Laws 515-701 (1938).

[41] To be noted is Gerry's criticism of the August 30, 1787 proposal, specifically, his observation that a "majority" of the states might bind the country in the convention contemplated by that proposal See pp. 12-13, supra. Gerry's criticism eventually led to the inclusion of ratification requirements. See Weinfeld, supra note 21, at 482-483.

[42] 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1869); criticized in Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 605 n.11 (1962) (Douglas, J., dissenting).

[43] See Strong, "Three Little Words and What They Didn't Seem to Mean," 59 A.B.A.J. 29 (1973). See generally Fairman, "Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864-88," in VI History of the Supreme Court of the United States 433-514 (Freund ed. 1971).

[44] The cases are: United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931); Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922); Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920); Hawke v. Smith (No. 1), 253 U.S. 221 (1920); Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

[45] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[46] 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[47] Id. 217.

[48] 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

[49] See Butterworth v. Dempsey, 237 F. Supp. 302 (D. Conn. 1965), involving a court-ordered state constitutional convention on the subject of reapportionment. Cf. Sixty-Seventh Minnesota State Senate v. Beens, 406 U.S. 187 (1972).

[50] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

[51] Id. 380 n.(a).

[52] III Journal of the Senate 323 (1803) (motion defeated by a vote of 23 to 7).

[53] Cong. Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess. 629-33 (1865). Four years earlier a proposed amendment on slavery was presented to and signed by President Buchanan. No discussion took place in Congress concerning this action and the proposed amendment was never ratified.

[54] VI J. Richardson, A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, 1789-1897, at 391-392 (1897).

[55] 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

[56] Id. 227.

[57] 285 U.S. 355 (1932).

[58] Id. 365, 366.

[59] See Coleman v. Miller, 146 Kan. 390, 71 P.2d 518 (1937), aff'd, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), upholding the right of a lieutenant governor to cast the tie-breaking vote in the state senate on the ratification of the proposed child labor amendment. In affirming, the United States Supreme Court expressed no opinion as to the propriety of the lieutenant governor's participation.

[60] The results of a questionnaire-type inquiry which we sent to the fifty states indicate that a substantial majority exclude the governor from participation and that in a number that include him it is not clear whether his inclusion is simply a matter of form. Historically, it appears that the governor generally has not played a role in these processes, although there are exceptions to this rule. See Myers, "The Process of Constitutional Amendment," S. Doc. No. 314, 76th Cong., 3rd Sess. 18 n.47 (1940), wherein it is stated that governors gave 44 approvals in the ratifications of 15 amendments. Whether the approvals were simply a matter of form or were required as a matter of state law is not clear. In several cases there were gubernatorial vetoes of ratifications, including the governor of New Hampshire's attempted veto of his state's ratification of the twelfth amendment.

[61] H. Ames, "The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of Its History," H. Doc. No. 353, pt. 2, 54th Cong., 2d Sess. 298 (1897); Bonfield, "Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention; Some Problems," 39 Notre Dame Lawyer 659, 664-65 (1964); Buckwalter, supra note 13, at 551; Brickfield, Staff of House Committee on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess., "Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention" 7-9 (Comm. Print 1957); Note, "Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention," 70 Harv. L. Rev. 1067, 1075 (1957). But compare 69 Op. Att'y Gen. of Okla. 200 (1969), in 115 Cong. Rec. 23780 (1969), with In re Opinion of the Justices, 118 Maine 544, 107 A. 673 (1919). See generally Dodd, The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions 148-55 (1910); Hoar, supra note 3, at 90-93; Orfield, supra note 12, at 50 & n.30, 66 & n.89.

[62] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798). See also Omaha Tribe of Nebraska v. Village of Walthill, 334 F. Supp. 823 (D. Neb. 1971), aff'd, 460 F.2d 1327 (8th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 93 S.Ct. 898 (1973) (governor's approval not required in order for a state to cede jurisdiction over Indian residents); Ex parte Dillon, 262 F. 563 (1920) (when the Legislature is designated as a mere agency to discharge some duty of a non-legislative character, such as ratifying a proposed amendment, the legislative body alone may act).

[63] Brickfield, supra note 61, at 11-12.

[64] 256 U.S. 368, 375 (1921).

[65] 307 U.S. 433, 453-54 (1939).

[66] Beginning with the proposal of the eighteenth amendment, Congress has, either in the amendment or proposing resolution, included a provision requiring ratification within seven years from the time of the submission to the states.

[67] See, e.g., Note' "Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions," 30 Chi.–Kent L. Rev. 339 (1952).

[68] 397 U.S. 50 (1970).

[69] Wells v. Edwards, 347 F. Supp. 453, 455 (M.D. La. 1972), aff'd, 93 S. Ct. 904 (1973).

[70] Smith v. Gore, 150 W. Va. 71, 143 S.E.2d 791, 794 (1965).

[71] See Forty-Second Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 481 P.2d 330 (Mont. 1971); Jackman v. Bodine, 43 N.J. 453, 470, 476-77, 205 A.2d 713, 722, 726 (1964). In Butterworth v. Dempsey, 237 F. Supp. 302 (D. Conn. 1965), a federal court ordered, without indicating the basis for it, apportionment of convention delegates on a one-person, one-vote basis. See also State v. State Canvassing Board, 78 N.M. 682, 437 P.2d 143 (1968), where a section of the state constitution, requiring that any amendments to that constitution affecting suffrage or apportionment be approved by both 3/4 of the voters of the state as a whole and 2/3 of those voting in each county, was found to violate the 'one-person, one-vote' and equal protection principles, and was accordingly declared invalid. Contra, West v. Carr, 212 Tenn. 367, 370 S.W.2d 469 (1963), cert. denied, 378 U.S. 557 (1962), holding equal protection guarantees inapplicable to a state constitutional convention since it had no power to take any final action; accord, Livingston v. Ogilvie, 43 Ill.2d 9, 250 N.E.2d 138 (1969); Stander v. Kelley, 433 Pa. Super. 406, 250 A.2d 474 (1969), appeal dismissed sub nom. mem., Lindsay v. Kelley, 395 U.S. 827 (1969). West, Stander and Livingston, in reaching this result, emphasized the fact that the entire electorate would be afforded a direct and equal voice, in keeping with the 'one-person, one-vote' principle, when the convention's product was submitted for ratification.

[72] 376 U.S. 1 (1964).

[73] See Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969); Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163 (1964); Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954). See also United States v. Pipefitters, 434 F.2d 1116, 1124 (8th Cir. 1971); United States v. Synnes, 438 F.2d 764, 771 (8th Cir. 1971); Henderson v. ASCS, Macon County, Alabama, 317 F. Supp. 430, 434-35 (M.D. Ala. 1970). See generally Griffin v. Richardson, 346 F. Supp. 1226, 1232-33 (D. Md. 1972).

[74] 93 S.Ct. 979 (1973).

[75] 403 U.S. 182 (1971).

[76] 394 U.S. 526, 531 (1968).

[77] The present 1970 census establishes the mean population of congressional districts as approximately 467,000. As Alaska has a population of approximately 302,000, the absolute differential is over 50%. There are similar disparities in some states with two representatives (e.g., South Dakota's two Congressmen each represent 333,000 people), but they are not as great.

[78] See United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508 (1878); United States v. Mouat, 124 U.S. 303 (1888); United States v. Smith, 124 U.S. 525 (1888). See generally 1 Hinds, Precedents of the House of Representatives § 493 (1907). In Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 439, 229 A.2d 388, 395 (1967), the court held that a delegate to a state constitutional convention was not an "officer" so that a member of the legislature was not guilty of dual office-holding when he simultaneously served as a delegate; accord, Livingston v. Ogilvie, 43 Ill.2d 9, 250 N.E.2d 138 (1969). But see Forty-Second Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 481 P.2d 330 (Mont. 1971); State v. Gessner, 129 Ohio St. 290, 195 N.E. 63 (1935).

[79] See 1 Farrand 376; Reservists Comm. to Stop the War v. Laird, 323 F. Supp. 833 (D.D.C. 1971).

[80] Jameson, supra note 17, at § § 582-584; Dodd, "Amending the Federal Constitution," 30 Yale L.J. 321, 346 (1921).

[81] Wise v. Chandler, 270 Ky. 1, 108 S.W.2d 1024 (1937) (also holding that state legislative rejection of a proposed constitutional amendment cannot be reconsidered); Coleman v. Miller, 146 Kan. 390, 71 P.2d 518 (1937) (dicta). The issue was discussed, though not passed on by the Court, in Chief Justice Hughes' opinion in Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 447-50 (1938).

[82] This rule would take precedence over the action of Congress in refusing to permit New Jersey and Ohio to rescind their ratifications of the fourteenth amendment. The right to ratify after a previous rejection would confirm precedents established in connection with the ratifications of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. See generally Myers, The Process of Constitutional Amendment, S. Doc. No. 314, 76th Cong., 3rd Sess. (1940).

[83] S. Rep. No. 336, 92nd Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1971).

Appendix A

This appendix is designed to capsulize our comments regarding various principles reflected in S. 1272 and to cross-reference pertinent parts of our report. The underlining, insertions (noted by brackets) and deletions which appear in S. 1272 have been supplied by us for the purpose of illustrating our comments.

93rd Congress
1st Session
S. 1272

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
March 19, 1973
Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary
Passed the Senate July 9, 1973

COMMENTS

A BILL

Our views as to the desirability of legislation implementing the convention method of initiating amendments appear at pages 7 to 9.

To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that this Act may be cited as the "Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act".

APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Sec. 2 Our views as to the limitability of a convention are set forth at pages 9 to 17.

The phrase "nature of the amendment or amendments" is unclear and differs from the phraseology contained in Sections 4, 5, 6, 8, 10 and 11. Our discussion of this item appears at pages 18, 19, 30 and 31.

SEC. 2. The legislature of a State, in making application to the Congress for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States on and after the enactment of this Act, shall adopt a resolution pursuant to this Act stating, in substance, that the legislature requests the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more amendments to the Constitution of the United States and stating the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

59-609 O - 80 - 9

APPLICATION PROCEDURE

Sec.3
(a) For the reasons set forth at pages 28 to 30, we believe that a state governor should have no part in the process by which a state legislature applies for a convention. This section is unclear as to whether a state may on its own initiative assign a role to the governor. The phraseology concerning the governor also is different from that employed in Section 12(b) with respect to ratification. Additionally, the requirement that state statutory procedures "shall" apply to applications differs from the terminology of Section 12(b) as well as raises questions under Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221 (1920), and Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922). See Trombetta v. Florida, 393 F. Supp. 575 (D. Fla. 1973).

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting or rescinding a resolution pursuant to section 2 and section 5, the State legislature shall follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute by that legislature, but without the need for approval of the legislature's action by the governor of the State.

(b) As discussed at pages 20 to 25, the Committee believes that limited judicial review is necessary and desirable and has specifically so provided in a new proposed Section 16. The introduction of such review requires the deletion of the language regarding the binding nature of congressional determinations. The "clearly erroneous" standard suggested in our proposed Section 16 acknowledges the appropriateness of initial congressional determinations in this area but withdraws the finality of such decisions.

(b) Questions concerning the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act shall be [determined]
~~determinable~~ by the Congress of the United States ~~and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts~~.

TRANSMITTAL OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 4 (a) Within thirty days after the adoption by the legislature of a State of a resolution to apply for the calling of a constitutional convention, the secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Each copy of the application so made by any State shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution;

[(2) to the extent practicable a list of all state applications in effect on the date of adoption whose subject or subjects are substantially the same as the subject or subjects set forth in the application;]

(2) New. Inasmuch as each legislature receives a copy of all valid applications pursuant to Section 4(d) [4 (c) in S.1272], preparation of the list would be a simple task. In doing so, the state would be able to express the purpose of its application in relation to those already received, thereby assisting Congress in rendering its determination pursuant to Section 6 (a) as to whether the requisite number of applications have been received on "the same subject."

[3]

~~(2)~~ the exact text of the resolution signed by the presiding officer of each house of the State legislature; and

[4]

~~(3)~~ The date on which the legislature adopted the resolution; and shall be accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution.

[(c) Upon receipt, an application shall be deemed valid and in compliance with article V of the Constitution and this Act, unless both Houses of Congress prior to the expiration of 60 days of continous session of Congress following the receipt of such application shall by concurrent resolution determine the application is invalid, either in whole or in part. Failure of Congress to act within the specified period is a determination subject to review under section 16 of this Act. Such resolution shall set forth with particularity the ground or grounds for any such determination. The 60-day period referred to herein shall be computed in accordance with section 11(b) (2) of this Act.]

(c) New. The adoption of judicial review requires that courts be able to define the accrual of grievances with particularity. S.1272 leaves uncertain the status of an application or rescission absent specific congressional action. Our proposed new Section 4(c) limits the period of uncertainty to 60 days. If Congress does not act upon a state transmittal within that period, it is deemed valid. The period for judicial review thus begins to run no later than 60 days after receipt of the application.

The possibility of a Senate filibuster blocking rejection of a patently defective application, thus causing the application to be deemed valid under Section 4(c), is offset by the fact that an action would lie under Section 16(a) for declaratory relief. Section 4(c) expressly notes that such a failure to act is subject to review under Section 16. State legislators as well as members of Congress would appear to qualify as "aggrieved" parties. See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

Section 4(c) thus results in an early determination of the application's procedural aspects. Only the question of the similarity of an application's subject to the subject of other applications is reserved for later determination by Congress.

(d) Same as present Section 4(c) of S.1272 except for the suggested insertions, which are designed to reflect the introduction of judicial review. The requirement for transmittal of applications to state legislatures is limited to valid applications.

[d]
~~(e)~~ Within ten days after receipt of a copy of any such application, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall report to the House of which he is the presiding officer, identifying the State making application, the subject of the application, and the number of States then having made application on such subject. [Within the 60-day period provided for in Section 4(c),] the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall jointly cause copies of such application to be sent to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of every other State and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, [provided, however, that an application declared invalid shall not be so transmitted.]

EFFECTIVE PERIOD OF APPLICATION

(a) For the reasons set forth at pages 31 and 32, the Committee agrees that some time limitation is necessary and desirable but takes no position on the exact time, except believes that four or seven years would be reasonable and that a congressional determination as to either should be accepted.

The Committee's views as to the use of the "same subject" test appear at pages 18, 19, 30 and 31.

SEC. 5 (a) An application submitted to the Congress by a State, unless sooner rescinded by the State legislature shall remain effective for seven calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, except that whenever within a period of seven calendar years two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same subject all such applications shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution pursuant to section 6, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) We believe that it is desirable to have a rule such as that contained in this section permitting the withdrawal of an application. See our discussion of this point at pages 32 and 33.

(b) A State may rescind its application calling for a constitutional convention by adopting and transmitting to the Congress a resolution of rescission in conformity with the procedure specified in sections 3 and 4, except that no such rescission shall be effective as to any valid application made for a constitutional convention upon any subject after the date on which two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have valid applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same subjects.

As for the requirement respecting the procedures to be followed, see our comments to Section 3(a).

(c) See our comments to Section 3(b).

Questions concerning the recission of a State's application shall be determined by the Congress of the United States ~~and its decisions shall be binding on all others including State and Federal courts~~.

CALLING OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

With regard to "the nature of the amendment or amendments" phraseology, see our comments to Section 2.

The concurrent resolution calling the convention may also have to deal with such questions as to when the election of delegates will take place.

The position that the President has no place in the calling process is discussed at pages 25 to 28.

SEC. 6. (a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to maintain a record of all applications received by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives from States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon each subject. Whenever applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same subject have been received, the Secretary and the Clerk shall so report in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer thereupon shall announce on the floor of the House of which he is an officer the substance of such report. It shall be the duty of such House to determine that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds of the States with respect to the same subject. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and time of meeting of the convention, and (2) set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called. A copy of each such concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress shall be transmitted forthwith to the Governor and to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of each State.

(b) The convention shall be convened not later than one year after adoption of the resolution.

DELEGATES

The Committee believes that the principle of one person, one vote applies and that Section 7(a) violates that principle. The Committee is of the view that an apportionment plan which allotted to each state a number of delegates equal to its representation in the House of Representatives should be an acceptable compliance with those standards. This subject is discussed at pages 34 to 37.

The persons entitled to vote for delegates could be more clearly stated to include all persons entitled to vote for members of the House of Representatives. The manner of nominating persons for delegate election might, as provided by S.1272, best be left to each state.

The question of the eligibility of members of Congress to be delegates is discussed at page 37.

SEC. 7. (a) A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. In each State two delegates shall be elected at large and one delegate shall be elected from each congressional district in the manner provided by State law. Any vacancy occurring in a State delegation shall be filled by appointment of the Governor of each state.

(b) The secretary of state of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function shall certify to the Vice President of the United States the name of each delegate elected or appointed by the Governor pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(d) Each delegate shall receive compensation for each day of service and shall be compensated for traveling and related expenses. Provision shall be made therefor in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. The convention shall fix the compensation of employees of the convention.

CONVENING THE CONVENTION

SEC. 8. (a) The Vice President of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office of the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe to an oath by which he shall be committed during the conduct of the convention to refrain from proposing or casting his vote in favor of any proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to any subject which is not named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called. Upon the election of permanent officers of the convention, the names of such officers shall be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the elected presiding officer of the convention. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as the convention may adopt.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses of the convention.

(c) The Administrator of General Services shall provide such facilities, and the Congress and each executive department and agency shall provide such information and assistance, as the convention may require, upon written request made by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

PROCEDURES OF THE CONVENTION

The Committee agrees with the principle that each delegate have one vote.

SEC. 9. (a) In voting on any question before the convention, including the proposal of amendments, each delegate shall have one vote.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily verbatim record of its proceedings and publish the same. The vote of the delegates on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

(d) Within thirty days after the termination of the proceedings of the convention, the presiding officer shall transmit to the Archivist of the United States all records of official proceedings of the convention.

PROPOSAL OF AMENDMENTS

(a) The Committee believes that Congress should not impose a vote requirement on a convention. It views as unwise and of questionable validity any attempt to regulate the internal procedures of a convention. It also notes that the vote requirement in S.1272 based on the total number of delegates is more stringent than that required for amendments proposed by Congress. See pages 17 to 20 of this report.

SEC. 10. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a vote of two-thirds of the total number of delegates to the convention.

(b) See our comments to Section 2 with regard to the underlining and our comments to Section 3(b) as for the deletions.

(b) No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. Questions arising under this subsection shall be determined ~~solely~~ by the Congress of the United States ~~and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts~~.

APPROVAL BY THE CONGRESS AND TRANSMITTAL TO THE STATES FOR RATIFICATION

SEC. 11. (a) The presiding officer of the convention shall, within thirty days after the termination of its proceedings, submit to the Congress the exact text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention.

(b) The position that the President has no place in this process is discussed at pages 25 to 28.

(b) (1) Whenever a constitutional convention called under this Act has transmitted to the Congress a proposed amendment to the Constitution, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such amendment to the Administrator of General Services upon the expiration of the first period of ninety days of continuous session of the Congress following the date of receipt of such amendment unless within that period both Houses of the Congress have agreed to (a) a concurrent resolution directing the earlier transmission of such amendment to the Administrator of General Services and specifying in accordance with article V of the Constitution the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified, or (B) a concurrent resolution stating that the Congress disapproves the submission of such proposed amendment to the States because such proposed amendment relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called, or because the procedures followed by the convention in proposing the amendment were not in substantial conformity with the provisions of this Act. No measure agreed to by the Congress which expresses disapproval of any such proposed amendment for any other reason, or without a statement of any reason, shall relieve the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the obligations imposed upon them by the first sentence of this paragraph.

As for the language "relates to or includes a subject" in (B), see our comments to Section 2.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1) of this subsection, (A) the continuity of a session of the Congress shall be broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and (B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of the period of ninety days.

(c) Upon receipt of any such proposed amendment to the Constitution, the Administrator shall transmit forthwith to each of the several States a duly certified copy thereof, a copy of any concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress which prescribes the time within which and the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified, and a copy of this Act.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. (a) Any amendment proposed by the convention and submitted to the States in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when duly ratified by three-fourths of the States in the manner and within the time specified.

(b) It is not clear whether this section would accept any special limitation adopted by a state with respect to ratification, other than the assent of the governor or any other body. See our comments to Section 3(a).

The exclusion of the governor from the process, with which we agree, is discussed at pages 28 to 30.

(b) Acts of ratification shall be by convention or by State legislative action as the Congress may direct or as specified in subsection (c) of this section. For the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments transmitted to the States pursuant to this Act the State legislatures shall adopt their own rules of procedure. Any State action ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

(c) Except as otherwise prescribed by concurrent resolution of the Congress, any proposed amendment to the Constitution shall become valid when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of the submission thereof to the States, or within such other period of time as may be prescribed by such proposed amendment.

(d) The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State action ratifying any proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services.

RECISSION OF RATIFICATIONS

(a)-(b) As discussed at pages 37 and 38, the Committee agrees with the principle permitting a state to rescind a ratification or rejection vote.

SEC. 13. (a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment by the same processes by which it ratified the proposed amendment, except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendments by three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.

(c) See our comments to Section 3(b).

(c) Questions concerning State ratification or rejection of amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States, shall be determined ~~solely~~ by the Congress of the United States ~~and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.~~

PROCLAMATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 14. The Administrator of General Services, when three-fourths of the several States have ratified a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 15. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date specified therein or, if no date is specified, then on the date on which the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the States of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

[SEC. 16. (a) Determinations and findings made by Congress pursuant to the Act shall be binding and final unless clearly erroneous. Any person aggrieved by any such determination or finding or by any failure of Congress to make a determination or finding within the periods provided in this Act may bring an action in a district court of the United States in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 1331 and 28 U.S.C. § 2201 without regard to the amount in controversy. The action may be brought against the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives or, where appropriate, the Administrator of General Services, and such other parties as may be necessary to afford the relief sought. The district courts of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of any proceedings instituted pursuant to this Act, and such proceedings shall be heard and determined by three judges in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 2284. Any appeal shall be to the Supreme Court.]

New. The purpose of our proposed Section 16 is to provide limited judicial review of controversies arising under S.1272. The procedural framework of the bill sets forth clear standards for adjudication of many of the potential controversies, and to this extent judicial interpretation of the act does not differ from the normal role of the courts. Moreover, determinations such as the similarity of applications or the conformity of proposed amendments to the scope of the convention call are no more difficult than, say, interpretation of the general language of the antitrust laws or the securities acts. The fact that these questions occur in a constitutional context does not diminish the skill of the Bench to interpret and develop the law in light of the factual situations of a given controversy.

Selection of a three-judge district court as the initial forum for controversies acknowledges that many controversies may be essentially state questions. For example, Congress might reject an application because of a defect in the composition of the state legislature. Cf., Petuskey v. Rampton, 307 F. Supp. 231, 235 (D. Utah 1969), aff'd, 431 F. 2d 378 (10th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 913. In this instance, it seems preferable to provide that the district court, schooled in state matters, make the initial review. Appeal from three-judge courts would lie in the United States Supreme Court.

New. This subsection would establish a short limitation period. Since the introduction of judicial review should not be allowed to delay the amending process unduly, any claim must be raised promptly. The limitations period combined with expedited judicial procedures is designed to result in early presentation and resolution of any dispute.

[(b) Every claim arising under this Act shall be barred unless suit is filed thereon within sixty days after such claim first arises.]

Appendix B

Article V Applications Submitted Since 1789

PART ONE: A Tabulation of Applications by States and Subjects

By Barbara Prager and Gregory Milmoe*

A Note on the Table:

This table is offered as a comprehensive compilation of Article V applications categorized by state and by application content. The table maximizes the number of applications, i.e., whenever any source recognizes an application, it has been included in this table. For this reason it must be emphasized that the totals are valuable only as an overview and not for the purpose of determining whether two-thirds of the states have applied for a convention on any given category.

Allowing for slight semantic differences among the authorities consulted, the categories used are, for the most part, generally accepted. Any readily discernible differences are set forth in the notes below. A more serious problem is the sometimes sharp disparity among the sources consulted with regard to what should be recognized as an application. Rather than attempt to make definitive judgments as to what applications should be treated as such, we have set out in the notes below the generally recognized applications followed by the applications recognized by particular sources.

A total of six sources were selected for consultation in the preparation of this table. They are:

(continued on page 62)

*Barbara Prager is a student at New York Law School and Gregory Milmoe a student at Fordham Law School. We are deeply grateful to them for their time and efforts in preparing these documents for our Committee and are pleased to have them accompany our report. We believe they present an excellent overview of the types of applications which have been submitted to Congress since the adoption of the Constitution.

MISSISSIPPI					1					1		1						2		2	7
MISSOURI	1	3							1			2								1	8
MONTANA		6	1		1		1					2			1					1	13
NEBRASKA		4	1		1							1			1	1					9
NEVADA		6		1	1							3						1			12
NEW HAMPSHIRE			1		2							1					1				5
NEW JERSEY	1	1		1	1	1											1			1	7
NEW MEXICO					1							1									2
NEW YORK	1		1	1																2	5
NORTH CAROLINA	1	2				1						1									5
NORTH DAKOTA		1	1									2		1			1				6
OHIO	1	2	1														2				6
OKLAHOMA		1	1		1				1			2			1			1			8
OREGON	1	6	1														1			1	10
PENNSYLVANIA		1	2		1															1	5
RHODE ISLAND					1							1					1			1	4
SOUTH CAROLINA	1		1		1				1			2	1								7
SOUTH DAKOTA		3	1		1				3			2			1		1				12
TENNESSEE		4	1		1							1							1	1	9
TEXAS	1	2	1		1				2			2			1		1	1		3	15
UTAH		1			1							2			1						5
VERMONT			1																		1
VIRGINIA	2				1				1	1		2				1			1	1	10
WASHINGTON	1	1	2									1									5
WEST VIRGINIA			1														1				2
WISCONSIN	2	3	1	1	1		1								1					1	11
WYOMING		1			2				1			1	1							1	7
TOTAL APPLICATIONS BY SUBJECT	18	75	30	5	42	8	5	3	19	6	4	54	5	4	11	3	21	7	4	36	356

Twenty Categories of Applications:	GENERAL	DIRECT ELECTION OF SENATORS	ANTI-POLYGAMY	REPEAL OF PROHIBITION 21ST AMEND.	LIMITATION OF FED. TAXING, REPEAL 16TH AMEND.	WORLD FEDERAL GOVERNMENT	LIMIT PRESIDENTIAL TENURE	TREATY MAKING	REVISION OF ARTICLE V	EXCLUSIVE STATE JURISDICTION OVER SCHOOLS	SUPREME COURT DECISIONS	APPORTIONMENT	COURT OF THE UNION	PRAYER IN SCHOOLS	REDISTRIB. OF PRES. ELECTORS	PRESIDENTIAL DISABILITY & SUCCESSION	REVENUE SHARING	FREEDOM OF CHOICE OF SCHOOLS	PROHIBIT STATE OR MUNI. BOND TAX	MISC.	TOTALS BY STATE
ALABAMA					1							2	1				1			3	8
ALASKA												1									1
ARIZONA												1		1							2
ARKANSAS		3			1				1		1	2	1		1					1	11
CALIFORNIA		3	1			1						1				1				3	9
COLORADO		1			1							2				1				1	7
CONNECTICUT			1			1											1			1	3
DELAWARE			1		1												1				3
FLORIDA					1	3		1	1		1	1	1				2			1	12
GEORGIA	1				1			1		3	1	1					1				9
HAWAII								1											1		1
IDAHO		2			1				2			2								2	9
ILLINOIS	1	3	1		1		1		2			2			1		1			1	14
INDIANA	1	1			2			1	1			2					1			1	9
IOWA		4	1		2		1					1				1					10
KANSAS		4			1				1			2			1						9
KENTUCKY	2	1			1						1	1									5
LOUISIANA		1	1		2					1	1	1				1	2	1	1	2	13
MAINE		1	1		2	1											1				6
MARYLAND			2		1							1		1			1				6
MASSACHUSETTS				1	1									1						3	6
MICHIGAN		1			2		1		1									1			7
MINNESOTA		2	1									1									4

(continued from page 59)

Buckwalter, "Constitutional Conventions and State Legislators," 20 J.Pub.L. 543 (1971) [hereinafter cited as Buckwalter]; Graham, "The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments," 49 A.B.A.J. 1175 (1963) [hereinafter cited as Graham]; E. Hutton, State Applications to Congress Calling for Conventions to Propose Constitutional Amendments (January 1963 to June 8, 1973), June 12, 1973 (Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, American Law Division Paper) [hereinafter cited as Library of Congress Study]; Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 115-18 (1967) [hereinafter cited as 1967 Hearings]; Tydings, Federal Constitutional Convention, S. Doc. No. 78, 71st Cong., 2d Sess. (1930) [hereinafter cited as 1930 S.Doc.]; and W. Pullen, "The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution," 1951 (unpublished dissertation in Univ. of North Carolina Library) [hereinafter cited as Pullen].

It should be noted that certain of the studies consider only limited time periods and, therefore, were consulted only for the time periods indicated: Buckwalter (1788-1971); Graham (1788-1963); Library of Congress Study (1963-73); 1967 Hearings (1963-67); 1930 S. Doc. (1788-1911); Pullen (1788-1951).

General

Buckwalter, Pullen, 1930 S. Doc. and Graham were consulted. All sources cite: Ga. 1832; Mo. 1907; N.Y. 1789; Tex. 1899; Ga. 1788; Wis. 1929.

Buckwalter, Pullen and Graham cite: Ill. 1861; Ind. 1861; Ky. 1861; Ohio 1861; Wash. 1901; Wis. 1911.

Buckwalter and Graham cite: Va. 1861.

Pullen cites: Ky. 1863; N.J. 1861; N.C. 1866; Ore. 1864; S.C. 1832.

Buckwalter apparently categorized 15 applications as "General" applications, which he also included in his "Direct Election of Senators" category. They are: Colo. 1901; Ill. 1903; Iowa 1907, 1909; Kan. 1901, 1905, 1907; La. 1907; Mont. 1911; Neb. 1907; Nev. 1907; N.C. 1907; Okla. 1908; Ore. 1901; Wash. 1903.

Direct Election of Senators

Pullen, Graham, 1930 S. Doc., and Buckwalter were consulted. All sources cite: Ark. 1901, 1903; Cal. 1903, 1911; Colo. 1901; Idaho 1903; Ill. 1903, 1907, 1909; Ind. 1907; Idaho 1901*; Iowa 1904, 1909; Kan. 1907; Ky. 1902; La. 1907; Me. 1911; Mich. 1901; Minn. 1901; Mo. 1901, 1905; Mont. 1901, 1905, 1907, 1911; Neb. 1893, 1901, 1903, 1907; Nev. 1901, 1903, 1907; N.J. 1907; N.C. 1901, 1907; Ore. 1901, 1903, 1909; Pa. 1901; S.D. 1901, 1907, 1909; Tenn. 1901, 1905; Tex. 1901; Utah 1903; Wash. 1903; Wis. 1903, 1907.

Pullen, Graham and Buckwalter cite: Ark. 1911; Iowa 1907; Minn. 1911; Mo. 1903; Mont. 1903; Nev. 1905; N.D. 1903; Ohio 1908, 1911; Okla. 1908 [1930 S. Doc. dated this application 1909]; Tenn. 1903; Tex. 1911.

Graham, Buckwalter and 1930 S. Doc. cite: Kan. 1901; Wyo. 1895.

Graham and Buckwalter cite: Kan. 1905, 1909; Mont. 1908; Wis. 1908; Ore. 1907.

Pullen, Graham and 1930 S. Doc. cite: [as second applications] Ore. 1901, 1903.

1930 S. Doc. cites: [second applications] Iowa 1904.

Pullen cites: [second applications] Cal. 1911; Tenn. 1901; Nev. 1901; Iowa 1911; Ore. 1909.

Graham, Pullen* and 1930 S. Doc. note that this application proposed the direct election of the President and Vice President as well as Senators.

Anti-Polygamy

Pullen, Graham, Buckwalter and 1930 S. Doc. were consulted. All sources cite: Del. 1907; Ill. 1913; Mich. 1913; Mont. 1911; Neb. 1911; N.Y. 1906; Ohio 1911; S.D. 1909; Tenn. 1911; Vt. 1912; Wash. 1909; Wis. 1913.

Pullen, Graham, and Buckwalter cite: Cal. 1909; Conn. 1915; Iowa 1906; La. 1916; Me. 1907; Md. 1908, 1914; Minn. 1909; N.H. 1911; Okla. 1911; Ore. 1913; Pa. 1907, 1913; S.C. 1915; Tex. 1911; W. Va. 1907.

Graham and Buckwalter cite: N.D. 1907; Wash. 1910.

59-609 O - 80 - 10

Repeal of Prohibition	Pullen, Buckwalter and Graham were consulted. All sources cite: Mass. 1931; Nev. 1925; N.J. 1932; N.Y. 1931; Wis. 1931.
Limitation of Federal Taxing Power and Repeal of 16th Amendment	Graham and Buckwalter were consulted.+ All sources cite: Ala. 1943[r]; Ark. 1943[r]; Del. 1943; Fla. 1951; Ga. 1952[(a)]; Ill. 1943[r]; Ind. 1943, 1957; Iowa 1941[r] 1951; Kan. 1951; Ky. 1944[r]; La. 1950[r]; Me. 1941, 1951[r]; Mass. 1941[r]; Mich. 1941, 1949; Miss. 1940; Neb. 1949[r]; N.H. 1943, 1951; N.J. 1944[r]; N.M. 1951; Nev. 1960[(a)]; Okla. 1955; Pa. 1943; R.I. 1940[r]; Utah 1951; Va. 1952[(a)]; Wis. 1943[r]; Wyo. 1939; S.C. 1962[(a)]. +Packard, "Constitutional Law; The States and the Amending Process," 45 A.B.A.J. 161 (1959), limiting his discussion to this subject, lists applications (undated) from: Idaho, Mont., S.D. and Tenn., none of which are cited by any other source. Graham cites: Colo. 1963; La. 1960[(a)]; Md. 1939; Tex. 1961[(a)]; Wyo. 1959[(a)]. [(a)] Repeal of 16th Amendment. Graham* cites these as Repeal applications while Buckwalter merely cites them as tax limitation applications. r = Rescinded
World Federal Government	Pullen, Graham, and Buckwalter were consulted. All sources cite: Cal. 1949*; Conn. 1949; Fla. 1949; Me. 1949; N.J. 1949*; N.C. 1949* Graham and Buckwalter cite: Fla. 1943, 1945. *Rescinded
Limit Presidential Tenure	Pullen, Graham, and Buckwalter were consulted. All sources cite: Ill. 1943; Iowa. 1943; Mich. 1943; Mont. 1947; Wis. 1943.
Treaty Making of the President	Pullen, Graham, and Buckwalter were consulted. All sources cite: Fla. 1945. Buckwalter and Graham cite: Ga. 1952; Ind. 1957.
Revision of Article V	Buckwalter, Graham, and *Library of Congress Study were consulted. All sources cite: Ark. 1963; Fla. 1963; Idaho 1963; Ill. 1963; Kan. 1963[r]; Mo. 1963; Okla. 1963; S.C. 1963; S.D. 1963; Tex. 1963; Wyo. 1963.

Buckwalter and Graham cite: Idaho 1957; Ill. 1953; Ind. 1957; Mich. 1956; S.D. 1953, 1955; Tex. 1955.

*The Graham study continued through 1963, while the Library of Congress Study began in 1963.

r = Rescinded

Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study cite: Va. 1965.

Give States Exclusive Jurisdiction Over Public Schools

Buckwalter, Graham and Library of Congress Study were consulted.

Buckwalter and Graham cite: Ga. 1955, 1959.

Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study cite: Ga. 1965; La. 1965; Miss. 1965.

Graham cites: Va. 1960*

*The Graham study continued through 1963, while the Library of Congress Study began in 1963.

Supreme Court Decisions

Graham was the only source consulted.

Graham cites: Ark. 1961; Fla. 1957; Ga. 1961; La. 1960.

Apportionment

Buckwalter, 1967 Hearings, and Library of Congress Study were consulted. All sources cite: Ala. 1965; Ariz. 1965; Ark. 1963, 1965; Colo. 1965; Fla. 1965; Idaho 1963, 1965; Ill. 1967; Ind. 1967; Kan. 1963[r], 1965[r]; Ky. 1965; Md. 1965; Minn. 1965; Miss. 1965; Mo. 1963, 1965; Mont. 1963, 1965; Neb. 1965; Nev. 1963, 1967; N.H. 1965; N.M. 1966; N.C. 1965; N.D. 1967; Okla. 1965; S.C. 1965; S.D. 1965; Tenn. 1966; Tex. 1963, 1965; Utah 1965; Va. 1964, 1965; Wash. 1963; Wyo. 1963.

Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study cite: Ala. 1966; Colo. 1967; Iowa 1969; Ill. 1965; N.D. 1965.

Buckwalter and 1967 Hearings cite: Ga. 1965; La. 1965; S.C. 1963.

Library of Congress Study and 1967 Hearings cite: S.D. 1963.

Buckwalter cites: Ind. 1957.

Library of Congress Study cites: Alaska 1965; Cal.

1965; Nev. 1965; Okla. 1963; R.I. 1965; Utah 1963.

r = Rescinded

Court of the Union

Graham, Library of Congress Study, and Buckwalter were consulted. All sources cite: Ala. 1963; Ark. 1963; Fla. 1963.

Graham and Buckwalter cite: S.C. 1963; Wyo. 1963.

Prayer in Schools

Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study were consulted. All sources cite: Mass. 1964.

Library of Congress Study cites: Ariz. 1972; Md. 1966; N.D. 1963.

Redistribution of Presidential Electors

Buckwalter, Graham, and Library of Congress Study were consulted. All sources cite: Ark. 1963; Kan. 1963[r]; Mont. 1963; Utah 1963; Wis. 1963.

Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study cite: Neb. 1965; Okla. 1965.

Buckwalter and Graham cite: Tex. 1963.

Buckwalter cites: Ill. 1967.

While Buckwalter cites Colo. 1965 and S.D. 1965, Graham cites those applications as Colo. 1963 and S.D. 1963.

r = Rescinded

Presidential Disability and Succession

Library of Congress Study was the only source consulted. The study cites: Colo. 1965; Neb. 1965; Va. 1965.

Revenue Sharing

Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study were consulted. All sources cite: Ala. 1967; Fla. 1969; Ill. 1965: Ohio 1965; Tex. 1967.

Buckwalter cites: N.H. 1969.

Library of Congress Study cites: Del. 1971; Fla. 1971; Ga. 1967; Iowa 1972; La. 1970*, 1971; Mass. 1971; N.J. 1970; N.D. 1971; Ore. 1971; S.D. 1971; Ohio 1971; W. Va. 1971.

Received by the Committee from the Attorney Generals of the respective states: Me. 1971; R.I. 1971.

*The La. 1970 application was approved by its House of Representatives only.

Freedom of Choice in Selection of Schools

Library of Congress Study was the only source consulted. The study cites: La. 1970; Mich. 1971; Miss. 1970, 1973; Nev. 1973; Okla. 1973; Tex. 1973.

Prohibit Taxation of State or Municipal Bonds

Library of Congress Study was the only source consulted. The study cites: Hawaii 1970; La. 1970; Tenn. 1970; Va. 1970.

Miscellaneous

Alabama
1833—Nullification: 1930 S. Doc. and Graham. Because the resolution of the Alabama Legislature was worded "This assembly . . . recommends to the Congress . . ." Pullen views it as merely a recommendation rather than a formal application.
1957—Selection of Federal Judges: Graham.
1959—Federal Pre-emption: Graham.

Arkansas
1959—Examination of 14th Amendment Ratification: Buckwalter and Graham.

California
1935—Federal Regulation of Wages and Hours: Buckwalter and Graham.
1935—Taxation of Federal and State Securities: Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.
1952—Distribution of Proceeds of Federal Taxes on Gasoline: Buckwalter and Graham.

Colorado
1963—Direct Election of President and Vice President: Library of Congress Study.

Connecticut
1958—State Tax on Income of Non-residents: Graham.

Florida
1972—Replace the Vice President as Head of the Senate: Library of Congress Study.

Idaho
1927—Taxation of Federal and State Securities: Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.
1963—Federal Debt Limit: Buckwalter, Graham, and Library of Congress Study.

Illinois
1911—Prevention and Suppression of Monopolies:

Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.

Indiana
1957—Balancing the Budget: Buckwalter and Graham.

Louisiana
1920—Popular Ratification of Amendments: Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.
1970—Sedition and Criminal Anarchy: Library of Congress Study.

Massachusetts
1964—Pensions to Persons Over 65: Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study.
1967—Bible Reading in Public Schools: Library of Congress Study. Buckwalter cites this application as 1964.
1973—Public Funds for Secular Education: Library of Congress Study.

Mississippi
1965—Control Communist Party in U.S.: Buckwalter and Library of Congress Study.
1973—Prayer in Public Buildings: Library of Congress Study.

Missouri
1913—Constitutionality of State Enactments: Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.

Montana
1963—Direct Election of President and Vice President: Library of Congress Study.

New Jersey
1965—Residence of Members of Congress: Library of Congress Study.

New York
1965—Equal Rights for Women: Library of Congress Study.
1972—Public Funds for Secular Education: Library of Congress Study.

Oregon
1939—Townsend Plan: Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.

Pennsylvania
1943—Prohibition of Conditions in Grants—in—Aid: Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.

Rhode Island
1790—Revision of Constitution: Graham.

Tennessee
1972—Prohibit Interference with Neighborhood Schools: Library of Congress Study.

Texas
1949—Tidelands Problem: Buckwalter, Graham, and Pullen.
1957—Oil and Mineral Rights: Graham
1957—Preservation of States' Rights: Graham

Virginia
1973—Prohibiting Deficit Spending: Library of Congress Study.

Wisconsin
1973—Right to Life: Received by the Committee from the Attorney General of the state.

Wyoming
1961—Balancing of Budget: Buckwalter

PART TWO: A History of Applications

by Barbara Prager

Introduction

Article V of the Constitution provides that "The Congress on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the Several States shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments . . ." Since 1788, despite a total of more than 300 applications from every state in the Union, there has never been a convention convened by this process. The purpose of this paper is to analyze the unsuccessful attempts made to amend the Constitution by this procedure. When applicable, the following factors will be discussed: description of the problem, reasons for the use of the application process, nature of the requests, reasoning of the states declining to make application to Congress, and the resolution of the problem.

Bill of Rights

The first group of applications was provoked by dissatisfaction with the scope of the Constitution. The Anti-Federalists felt that the Constitution had not provided for certain basic rights of mankind. During the ratification of the Constitution, the Virginia and New York legislatures submitted separate resolutions to Congress applying for a convention. The text of the Virginia resolution read in part:

> that a convention be immediately called . . . with full power to take into their consideration the defects of this constitution that have been suggested by the State conventions . . . and secure to ourselves and our latest posterity the great and unalienable rights of mankind.[1]

Madison and Jefferson opposed the idea of a second convention. Madison expresssed the view that a second convention would suggest a lack of confidence in the first. Others believed that proposing amendments to the Constitution might better be accomplished by Congress. These sentiments found support in the state legislatures. Pennsylvania and Massachusetts explicitly rejected the idea of a second convention, and the remaining states took no final action in making application to Congress.[2]

The underlying issue was resolved in 1789 when Congress proposed the Bill of Rights.

The Nullification Applications

South Carolina was in severe economic difficulty in the eighteen-twenties. Believing that this problem was a result of the high protective tariff levied by the federal government, the state developed the nullification theory, i.e., that a sovereign state could declare an act of Congress null and void. James Hamilton, Jr. advocated a convention of the states to resolve this conflict and recommended to the South Carolina legislature that they apply to Congress for such a convention. South Carolina's petition and a similar application from Georgia took the form of resolutions that Congress call a convention for the purpose of resolving questions of disputed power.[3] Alabama recommended to her co-states and to Congress that a convention be called to resolve the nullification problem and to make "such other amendments and alterations in the Constitution as time and experience have discovered to be necessary."[4]

No other state petitioned for a convention. The problem was considered and the idea of a convention rejected in eight states.[5] Opposition to the South Carolina proposal was manifold. Some objecting to the terminology of the proposal, maintained that an article V convention must be a convention of the people's delegates, and not a convention of the states' representatives. Others, disagreeing with South Carolina's statement that the convention would have the power to determine the constitutional issue, asserted that the convention was limited to proposing amendments. Still others feared the potentially disastrous effects of a convention or considered the call of a convention impolitic, inexpedient, unnecessary, or an appalling task.

The states that declined to apply to Congress during this period apparently were not reaching the merits of the issue. Rather, they rejected the idea of a convention on two main grounds: (1) that South Carolina hoped to invest the convention with arbitration power not provided for by the Constitution; and (2) that such a body would not be subject to sufficient control and might therefore upset the existing governmental structure.

Slavery

The devisive issue of slavery was the next issue to provoke state applications. In 1860 the secession of the lower southern states seemed probable. Seeking to effect a reconciliation, President Buchanan proposed that an explanatory amendment to the Constitution be initiated either by Congress or by the application procedure. In support of this suggestion several Congressmen introduced resolutions in Congress to encourage the legislatures of the states to make applications for the call of a convention. This represented the first attempt by Congress to stimulate the application process. The process received further support from newly elected President Lincoln who in his inaugural address stated:

> the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves; instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others, not especially chosen for the purpose, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish to accept or refuse. . . .[6]

The states, however, were less enthusiastic. During the entire Civil War period, only seven states took affirmative action.[7] The applications tended to be broad in scope, requesting a convention to propose amendments to the Constitution. Several resolutions were merely recommendations that Congress call a convention, while others favored a convention only as a last resort and preferred to rely on Congress to propose any amendments. Many resolutions were tabled in the state legislatures or were referred to a committee which failed to report them back to the legislature. The state of Iowa observed that since eleven states were in open rebellion against the Union, no amendment could be ratified without the votes of at least two rebel states.[8]

Procedural problems played a large role in the states' failure to make successful use of the application process during the Civil War period. Given the frenetic pace of the times, the states failed either to act in strict conformity with article V or to direct their energies to the completion of the process.

Modern Period

Since the turn of the twentieth century, the application process has been used primarily to encourage Congress to propose specific amendments.

Direct Election of Senators

In the eighteen-nineties public sentiment grew for an amendment providing for the direct election of U.S. Senators. On several occasions from 1893 to 1902, the House passed resolutions proposing such an amendment which never came to a vote in the Senate.

In 1906, motivated by the inaction of Congress, a conference of twelve states met and decided to initiate a campaign to urge applications on the direct election issue from the requisite number of states. Thirty states adopted sixty-nine applications for the call of a convention during the period from 1901 to 1911.[9] Opposition came primarily from two sources: (1) those who objected to the substance of the amendment; and (2) those who feared the potential power of such a convention. The latter group expressed the view that a convention would open the door to recommendations for amendments on a wide variety of sectional interests. The issue was resolved in 1912 when Congress proposed the seventeenth amendment.

Polygamy

Utah was admitted into the Union in 1896, on the condition that her constitution included an irrevocable prohibition of polygamous marriages. Later, when it was brought to public attention that the state was not enforcing this provision, an anti-polygamy amendment to the Constitution which would give the United States jurisdiction of the matter was proposed as a possible solution. However, the amendment was opposed on several grounds: it would interfere with the sovereignty of the states; the subject was not of sufficient importance to merit a constitutional amendment; and the problem was susceptible of resolution by other means. The state legislatures, however, did not dismiss the problem as quickly as Congress did. From 1906 to 1916, twenty-six states made almost identical applications requesting a convention to propose an amendment prohibiting polygamous marriages.[10] But after this surge of applications, polygamy ceased to be an issue.

Repeal of Prohibition

A movement for the repeal of prohibition began in the nineteen-twenties. Eleven states considered applications to Congress for a constitutional convention. Five adopted resolutions for a limited convention to propose the specific amendment. Congress responded to the pressure by proposing the twenty-first amendment.

Limitation of Federal Taxes

Federal taxes were greatly increased during the mid-nineteen-thirties. The American Taxpayers Association failed in its efforts to exert pressure on Congress for an amendment to limit the federal taxing power. The group then began a quiet campaign to apply pressure by use of the application procedure of article V. By 1945, seventeen states had submitted resolutions for the call of a convention.[11] The movement lost momentum but was revived again at the end of the decade. Representative Wright Patman from Texas attacked the advocates of the amendment, claiming that their purpose was to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. He advised the states to rescind their applications. By 1963, there were claims that thirty-four states had made applications to Congress, thus meeting the constitutional requirements for a convention.[12] Opponents of the amendment pointed to deficiencies in these claims: twelve states had rescinded their applications;[13] some resolutions had not requested a convention, but merely had asked Congress to propose the amendment; some applications were for other purposes; and the validity of resolutions passed fifteen or twenty years earlier was questionable.

Limitation of Presidential Tenure

When Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected to a third term, the belief that the tenure of the office of President should be limited gained adherents. In 1943, four states submitted applications to Congress requesting a national convention to propose an amendment to that effect. A few years later, an additional state adopted a similar resolution. Congress then proposed an amendment limiting the number of successive presidential terms.

World Federal Governments

At the beginning of the second world war, there was some support for the idea that the United States should commit itself to a world organization aimed at preserving peace. Twenty-three states adopted resolutions urging their representatives in Congress to support such a commitment. In 1949, six states made formal applications to Congress for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment authorizing the United States to participate in a limited world government. Within the following two years, half of the states rescinded their applications.[14]

Apportionment

The Supreme Court decisions establishing the "one-person-one-vote" principle and applying it to state legislature apportionment sparked the latest bout of serious interest in a national constitution convention.

The Council of State Governments in 1962 suggested a constitutional convention to propose amendments a) removing apportionment cases from federal jurisdiction, b) establishing a "Court of the Union" to hear certain appeals from the Supreme Court, and c) easing the process whereby states themselves may initiate constitutional amendments under article V.

In 1964, the Council of State Governments suggested an amendment exempting one house of any state legislature from the "one-person-one-vote" rule. When an amendment to that effect failed in the Senate in 1965 (gaining a majority of the votes but not the constitutionally required two-thirds), the Council and Senator Everett Dirksen initiated a national campaign to convene a constitutional convention to deal with the apportionment problem.[15]

By 1967, thirty-two states had applied for a constitutional convention, although their applications differed in form, content, and specificity. In the following years, one more state petitioned for a convention, and one withdrew its original application. Since 1969, no further applications have been submitted on this issue.

Throughout the 1960's and into the present decade particularly salient issues have at one time or another provoked scattered applications for a constitutional convention; e.g., school prayer in the early 1960's, revenue sharing and busing of school children to achieve integration more recently. None of these issues, however, has produced applications totalling near the two-thirds required by article V.[16]

Conclusion

It is submitted that the majority of applications presented issues of potentially national concern. In some instances, such as the nullification or the slavery issues, the question was initially a sectional concern, but national ramifications developed.

Another generalization that emerges from an historical analysis of the application process is that the majority of concerns raised in state applications have been resolved in some way other than by convention. In a large number of situations Congress took over the initiative and proposed the requested amendment to the Constitution. Numerous examples are readily available. The 1788 and 1789 applications of Virginia and New York for a general convention were resolved by congressionally proposed amendments—the Bill of Rights. Similarly, in the twentieth century, state applications that advocated direct election of senators, the limitation of presidential tenure, presidential disability and succession and the repeal of prohibition were resolved by congressionally proposed amendments. The problems raised by the state applications during the slavery period were resolved in a more revolutionary way. The Civil War and ultimately the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments rendered the applications moot.

However, there are a number of situations in which there has been no resolution of the problem. In some instances, such as the issue of polygamy, a change in social attitudes over time led to the abandonment of the issue.

This example highlights a problem which may be inherent in the procedure itself: sluggishness. The problem has its roots in a fundamental distinction between the ratification process and the amendment process. While the former only requires the state legislatures to respond to an already formulated amendment the latter requires affirmative action. This is time-consuming since typically before drafting a resolution both houses of each state legislature consider all the other applications on the subject submitted to Congress by other states. The slavery period provides numerous examples of potential applications that were tabled in the state legislatures or were never reported back from committees. Action on the resolution is further delayed by the fact that state legislatures convene at different times during the year. Additional problems arise because Congress has not provided for adequate machinery to handle the applications presented to them. Thus, with the passage of time, new interests tend to replace the proposed interests, so that the issue is eventually resolved by a means other than the convention method or not resolved at all.

It is further evident that the issues that have called for a convention have been popular ones. Historically, although an individual state did not petition Congress for a convention on a particular issue, the state more often than not considered submitting a resolution. The states declining to submit applications generally did not reject the application procedure based on the substantive merits of the problem. Rather, the states expressed fear of the power of a constitutional convention and its potential for revolutionary change.

Notes

1 37 American State papers 6-7.

2 [redacted]. Pullen, The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution 22-28 (1951) (unpublished dissertation in Univ. of North Carolina Library) [hereinafter cited as Pullen].

3 Id. at 38-39.

4 Massachusetts General Court Committee on the Library, State Papers on Nullification 223 (1834). The quote is from the resolution addressed to her co-states. The recommendation to Congress varies slightly.

5 Pullen at 66.

6 S. Jour., 36th Cong., Spec. Sess. 404 (1861).

7 Pullen at 102.

8 1861 Iowa S. Jour. 68-69.

9 Pullen at 108.

10 Id. at 115.

11 Id. at 119.

12 Graham, The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments, 49 A.B.A.J. 1175, 1176-77 (1963).

13 See Appendix B.

14 Pullen at 126.

15 See Dirksen, The Supreme Court and the People, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 837 (1968).

16 See Appendix B, Part One, for a complete listing.

Treatises

Allen, T., and Ransone, C., Constitutional Revision in Theory and Practice (1962).

Brown, E., Ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States: State Convention Records and Laws (1938).

Cooley, T., The General Principles of Constitutional Law in the United States of America 221 (3d. ed. 1898).

Curtis, G., Constitutional History of the United States, Vol. I., pp. 614-15, Vol. II, pp. 160-62 (1889).

Dodd, W., The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions (1910).

Elliot, J., The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution (2d ed.1836).

The Federalist, Nos. 43 and 85.

Hoar, R. S., Constitutional Conventions: Their Nature, Powers and Limitations (1917).

Jameson, J., A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions: Their History, Powers and Modes of Proceeding (4th ed. 1887).

Orfield, L., The Amending of the Federal Constitution (1942).

Pomeroy, J., An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States §§ 109-20 (5th ed. 1880).

Poore, B., The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws of the United States, Vol. 1, pp. 273, 383, 828, 972; Vol. 2, pp. 1293, 1310, 1328, 1409, 1541, 1548, 1627.

Story, J., Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § § 1826-28 (5th ed. 1905).

The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, Vol. 1, pp. 28, 117, 121, 126, 194, 202, 206, 227, 237, 478; Vol. 2, pp. 87, 133, 136, 148, 159, 174, 188, 461, 467, 555-59, 578, 602, 629-31, 662; Vol. 3, pp. 120, 121, 126, 357, 367, 400, 609, 630 (Farrand ed. 1937 and 1966 paper bound ed.).

Willoughby, W., The Constitutional Law of the United States, Vol. I, § 331 (2d ed. 1929).

Periodicals

Ames, "The Amending Provisions of the Federal Constitution in Practice," 63 Proc. of the Am. Philos. Soc'y 62 (1924).

Ames, "Recent Development of the Amending Power as Applied to the Federal Constitution," 72 Proc. of the Am. Philos. Soc'y 87 (1933).

Black, "The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster," 72 Yale L.J. 957 (1963).

Bonfield, "Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems," 39 Notre Dame Lawyer 659 (1964).

Brown, "The Ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment, 29 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 1005 (1935).

Buckwalter, "Constitutional Conventions and State Legislators," 20 J. of Pub. Law 543 (1971).

Clark, "The Supreme Court and the Amending Process," 39 Va. L. Rev. 621 (1953).

Comment, "Ratification of Proposed Federal Amendment After Prior Rejection," 11 So. Calif. L. Rev. 472 (1938).

Corwin & Ramsey, "The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment," 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 185 (1951).

Current Legislation, "Amendment to Constitution: Ratification by State Convention," 7 St. John's L. Rev. 375 (1933).

Cuvillier, "Shall We Revise the Constitution?," 77 Forum 321 (1927).

Dodd, "Amending the Federal Constitution," 30 Yale L.J. 321 (1921).

Dowling, "A New Experiment in Ratification," 19 A.B.A.J. 383 (1933).

59-609 O - 80 - 11

Dowling, "Clarifying the Amending Process," 1 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 215 (1940).

Fennell, "The States Rights Amendments—Debates of the 'Founding Fathers' Cast Doubts on Current Proposals," 35 N.Y.S.B.A.J. 465 (1963).

Fensterwald, "Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process—A Reply," 46 A.B.A.J. 717 (1960).

Forkosch, "The Alternative Amending Clause in Article V: Reflections and Suggestions," 51 Minn. L. Rev. 1053 (1967).

Graham, "Efforts to Amend the Constitution on Districts Gain," N.Y. Times, March 18, 1967, at 1, col. 6.

Graham, "The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments," 49 A.B.A.J. 1175 (1963).

Grinnell, "Finality of State's Ratification of a Constitutional Amendment," 11 A.B.A.J. 192 (1925).

Grinnell, "Petitioning Congress for a Convention: Cannot a State Change Its Mind?," 45 A.B.A.J. 1164 (1959).

Ireland, "Constitutional Amendments—Power of Conventions, 6 Tul. L. Rev. 75 (1931).

Lincoln, "Ratification by Conventions," 18 Mass. L.Q. 287 (1933).

Loeb, "Constitution by Convention," 33 Nat. Mun. Rev. 14 (1944).

MacDonald, "The Constitution of the United States Needs to be Fixed," Esquire, Vol. LXX, p. 143 (Oct. 1968).

Martig, "Amending the Constitution—Article V: The Keystone of the Arch," 35 Mich. L. Rev. 1253 (1937).

Martin, "The Application Clause of Article Five," 85 Pol Sci. Q. 616 (1970).

Miller, "Amendment of the Federal Constitution: Should It Be Made More Difficult?," 10 Minn. L. Rev. 185 (1926).

Mitchell, W.D., "Methods of Amending the Constitution," 25 Lawyer and Banker 265 (1932).

Note, "The Constitutional Convention, Its Nature and Powers—And the Amending Procedure," 1966 Utah L. Rev. 390.

Note, "Power to Call a Constitutional Convention Limited to Consideration of Specific Topics," 3 Vand. L. Rev. 111 (1949).

Note, "Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution," 85 Harv. L. Rev. 1612 (1972).

Note, "Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention," 70 Harv. L. Rev. 1067 (1957).

Note, "Ratification of Constitutional Amendment by State Conventions," 2 Geo Wash. L. Rev. 216 (1934).

Note, "Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions," 30 Chi-Kent L. Rev. 339 (1952).

Oberst, "The Genesis of the Three States Rights Amendments of 1963," 39 Notre Dame Lawyer 644 (1964).

Packard, "Constitutional Law: The States and Amending Process," 45 A.B.A.J. 161 (1959).

Packard, "Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program," 30 Chi-Kent L. Rev. 128 (1952).

Pei, "The Case for a Constitutional Convention," Modern Age, Vol. 12, p. 8 (Winter, 1967-8).

Phillips, "Has the Congress the Power Under Article V of the Constitution to Call and Regulate the Holding of Ratifying Conventions Independent of State Legislatures?," 6 Fla. S.B.A.L.J. 573 (1933).

Platz, "Article Five of the Federal Constitution," 3 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 17 (1934).

Pullen, "The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution" (unpublished dissertation, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1951).

Quarles, "Amendments to the Federal Constitution," 26 A.B.A.J. 617 (1940).

Scharpf, "Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Analysis," 75 Yale L. J. 517 (1966).

Scheips, "The Significance and Adoption of Article

V of the Constitution," 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 46 (1950).

Shanahan, "Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Will Strengthen Federal-State Relations," 49 A.B.A.J. 631 (1963).

Smith, "Has Congress Power to Call Conventions in the States to Consider Constitutional Amendment," 2 J. Bar Ass'n of Kansas 1 (1933).

Sorensen, "The Quiet Campaign to Rewrite the Constitution," Sat. Rev., July 15, 1967, at 17.

Sprague, "Shall We Have a Federal Constitutional Convention, and What Shall It Do?," 3 Maine L. Rev. 115 (1910).

Symposium on the Article V Convention Process, 66 Mich. L. Rev.: Bonfield, "The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process" 949; Carson, "Disadvantages of a Federal Constitutional Convention" 921; Dirksen, "The Supreme Court and the People" 837; Dixon, "Article V: The Comatose Article of Our Living Constitution?" 931; Ervin, "Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution" 875; Kauper, "The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations" 903; McCleskey, "Along the Midway: Some Thoughts on Democratic Constitution-Amending" 1001 (1968).

Tugwell, "Rewriting the Constitution: A Center Report," Center Magazine, Vol. 1, (March 1968).

Tuller, "A Convention to Amend the Constitution—Why Needed—How It May Be Obtained," 193 N. Amer. Rev. 369 (1911).

Tydings "Speaking Out: They Want to Tamper with the Constitution; States Calling for a National Constitutional Convention," Sat. Eve. Post, July 17, 1967, at 10.

Weinfield, "Power of Congress Over State Ratifying Conventions," 51 Harv. L. Rev. 473 (1938).

Wheeler, "Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?," 21 Ill. L. Rev. 782 (1927).

Wolf, "An Antireapportionment Amendment: Can It Be Legally Ratified?," 52 A.B.A.J. 326 (1966).

Congressional Materials

Ames, H., The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the U.S. During the First Century of Its History, H.R. Doc. No. 353, pt. 2, 54th Cong., 2d Sess. (1897).

Brickfield, C., Staff of House Comm. on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess., Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention (Comm. Print 1957).*

113 Cong. Rec. 7551-52, 7573-85 (March 22, 1967), 9342-43 (April 13), 10101-15 (April 19), 12267-74 (May 10).

117 Cong. Rec. S16519-35 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

Hearings on Reapportionment of State Legislatures Before the Subcomm. on Constitutional Amendments of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. (1965).

Hearings on S.2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (Oct. 30 and 31, 1967).

Myers, D., The Process of Constitutional Amendment, S. Doc. No. 314, 76th Cong., 3d Sess. (1940).

S. Rep. No. 92-336, 92nd Cong., 1st Sess. (July 31, 1971).
S. Rep. No. 93-293, 93rd Cong. 1st Sess. (1973).

S. Doc. No. 78, 71st Cong., 2d Sess., "Compilation Showing the Applications Made From Time to Time to the Senate by the Legislatures of Various States for the Calling of a Constitutional Convention for the Purpose of Proposing Certain Amendments to the Constitution of the United States" (1930).

Staff of House Comm. on the Judiciary, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., "Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates" (Comm. Print, 1952).

Reports and Other Materials

Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 36 State Gov't 10 (1963).

*Contains an excellent bibliography at pages 104-12.

American Enterprise Institute For Public Policy Research, "A Convention to Amend the Constitution: Questions Involved in Calling a Convention upon Applications by State Legislatures" (Special Analysis No. 5, 1967).

Letter of Charles L. Black, Jr., to Hon. Emanuel Celler dated February 28, 1972.

Report of Committee on National Constitutional Conventions, American Bar Association Section on Individual Rights and Responsibilities (Sept. 20, 1972).

Report of Proposed Procedures for Federal Constitutional Conventions (S.215), 11 Reports of Committees of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York Concerned with Federal Legislation (1972); also reprinted in The Record of N.Y.C.B.A. 327 (May 1972).

"A Report on Three Amendments to the United States Constitution Proposed by the Council of State Governments," 2 Reports of Committees of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York Concerned with Federal Legislation 21 (1963).

Small, N.J., "Procedures for Amending the United States Constitution," Library of Congress, Legislative Reference Service, American Law Division (1965).

Yadlosky, E., "State Petitions and Memorials to Congress on the Subject of State Legislatures," Library of Congress, Legislative Reference Service Report JK140C-32/205R (to Aug. 5, 1965).

Supreme Court Decisions

Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

Hawke v. Smith (No. 1), 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922).

Rhode Island v. Palmer (National Prohibition Cases), 253 U.S. 350 (1920).

Whitehill v. Elkins, 389 U.S. 54, 57 (1967).

State Constitutional Convention Materials

Treatises and Documents

Arkansas Constitutional Revision Study Commission, Revising the Arkansas Constitution (Little Rock, 1968).

Bartley, E. R., "Methods of Constitutional Change," in W. Brooke Graves (ed.) Major Problems in State Constitutional Revision (Chicago: Pub. Adm. Ser. 1960).

Breuer, E. H., Constitutional Developments in New York, 1777-1958; A Bibliography of Conventions and Constitutions With Selected References for Constitutional Research (Albany; Univ. of State of N.Y., the State Education Dep't, 1958).

Citizens Research Council of Michigan, "A Comparison of Organization and Procedures of Six State Constitutional Conventions" (Detroit, 1961).

Connecticut, Constitutional Convention 1965, Journal (Hartford, 1965).

Connors, R.J., The Process of Constitutional Revision in New Jersey, 1940-1947 (Nat. Mun. L. 1970).

Cornwell, E. E., Jr., and Goodman, J. S., The Politics of the Rhode Island Constitutional Convention (Nat. Mun. L. 1969).

Englebert, A., State Constitutional Revision in California (Calif. Univ. of Bur. Gov't Res., 1961).

Friedman, R. S., The Michigan Constitutional Convention and Adminstrative Organization: A Case Study in the Politics of Constitution-Making (Inst. of Pub. Adm. Univ. of Mich. 1963).

Graves, W. B., ed., Major Problems in State Constitutional Revision: (Chicago: Pub. Adm. Ser., 1960).

Halevy, J., A Selective Bibliography on State Constitutional Revision; Supplement Compiled by Myron Fink (Nat. Mun. L. 1967).

Maryland, Report of the Constitutional Convention Commission (1967).

New York Temporary State Commission on the Constitutional Convention, Report No. 5, Convention Organization and Rules For Effective Constitutional Review (1967).

Pollock, J. K., Making Michigan's New Constitution, 1961-62 (Wahr. 1962).

Sturm, A. L., Constitution-Making in Michigan, 1961-62 (Inst. of Pub. Adm. Univ. of Mich. 1963).

Sturm, A. L., & Whitaker, M., Implementing a New Constitution: The Michigan Experience (Mich. Inst. of Pub. Adm., 1968).

Sturm, A. L., Methods of State Constitutional Reform (1954).

Sturm, A. L., Selective Bibliography on State Constitutional Revision (Tallahassee, Fla. St. Univ. Inst. of Gov't Res. 1967).

Sturm, A. L., Thirty Years of State Constitution Making, 1938-1968 (with an epilogue on developments in 1969) (Nat. Mun. L. 1970).

Uhl, R., Stoudmire, H., & Sherrill, G., Constitutional Conventions; Organization, Powers, Function, and Procedures (Bureau of Pub. Adm., Univ. of South Carolina, 1951).

Wheeler, J. P., The Constitutional Convention; A Manual on its Planning, Organization and Operation (Nat. Mun. L. 1961).

Wheeler, John P., ed., Salient Issues of Constitutional Revision (Nat. Mun. L. 1961).

Wolf, G. D., Constitutional Revision in Pennsylvania; The Dual Tactic of Amendment and Limited Convention (Nat. Mun. L. 1969).

Periodicals

Adrian, "Trends in State Constitutions," 5 Harv. J. of Leg. 311 (1968).

Bebout, "Organizing the Constitutional Convention," 28 Acad. of Pol. Sci. Proc. 250 (1967).

Bebout, "Recent Constitution Writing," 35 Tex. L. Rev. 1071 (1957).

Beiser, Goodman & Cornwell, "Judicial Role in a Non-Judicial Setting, Some Empirical Manifestations and Consequences," 5 Law and Soc. Rev. 571 (1971).

Braxton, "Powers of Conventions," 7 Va. L. Reg. 79 (1901).

Dixon & Hatheway, "The Seminal Issues in State Constitutional Revision: Reapportionment Method and Standards," 10 W & M. L. Rev. 888 (1969).

Dodd, "Judicial Control Over the Amendment of State Constitutions," 10 Colum. L. Rev. 618 (1910).

Dodd, "State Constitutional Conventions and State Legislative Powers," 2 Vand. L. Rev. 27 (1948).

Fuld, "Court of Appeals and the 1967 Constitutional Convention," 39 N.Y.S.B.J. 99 (1967).

Goldings, "Massachusetts Amends: A Decade of State Constitutional Revision," 5 Harv. J. of Leg. 373 (1968).

Gooch, "The Recent Limited Constitutional Convention in Virginia," 31 Va. L. Rev. 708 (1945).

Graves, "Current Trends in State Constitutional Revision," 40 Neb. L. Rev. 560 (1961).

Handler & Sills, "The Imbroglio of Constitutional Revision—Another By-Product of Reapportionment," 20 Rutgers L. Rev. 1 (1965).

Harvard, "Notes on a Theory of State Constitutional Change: The Florida Experience," 21 J. of Pol. 80 (1959).

Hempelmann, "Convening a Constitutional Convention in Washington Through the Use of the Popular Initiative," 45 Wash. L. Rev. 535 (1970).

Hindman, "Roadblocks to Conventions," 37 Nat. Mun. Rev. 129 (1948).

Mogan, "The Constitutional Convention and the Courts," N.Y. L. J., June 7, 8, 9, 1967.

J. vanden Heuvel, "Reflections on Constitutional Conventions," 40 N.Y.S.B.J. 261 (1968).

Kaden, "The People: No! Some Observations on the 1967 New York Constitutional Convention," 5 Harv. J. of Leg. 343 (1968).

Laub, "Issues Before the Judiciary Committee of the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention," 39 Penn. B.A.Q. 390 (1968).

Martineau, "The Mandatory Referendum on Calling a State Constitutional Convention: Enforcing the People's Right to Reform Their Government," 31 Ohio S. L. Rev. 421 (1970).

Martineau, "Maryland's 1967-68 Constitutional Convention: Some Lessons for Reformers," 55 Iowa L. Rev. 1196 (1970).

McGeary, "Pennsylvania's Constitutional Convention in Perspective," 41 Penn. B.A.Q. 175 (1970).

McKay, "Constitutional Revision in New York

State: Disaster in 1967," 19 Syracuse L. R. 207 (1967).

Mosley, "Limited Constitutional Convention," 21 Tenn. L. Rev. 867 (1951).

Note, "Constitutional Revision by a Restricted Convention," 35 Minn. L. Rev. 283 (1951).

Note, "Judicial Reform Through Total Revisions of State Constitutions," 51 Amer. Soc. Jud. 347 (1968).

Note, "State Constitutional Change: the Constitutional Convention," 54 Va. L. Rev. 995 (1968).

Note, "State Constitutional Conventions: Limitations on Their Powers," 55 Iowa L. Rev. 244 (1969).

Note, "The Constitutional Convention, Its Nature and Powers—And the Amending Process," 1966 Utah L. Rev. 390 (1966).

Note, "The Powers of Constitutional Conventions," 29 Harv. L. Rev. 528 (1916).

Powell, "Constitutional Growth and Revision in the South," 10 J. Pol. 354 (1948).

Sandelius, "The Kansas Experience; State Constitutional Revision and the Moral Element," 40 Neb. L. Rev. 575 (1961).

Shull, "Legislature and the Process of Constitutional Amendment," 53 Ken. L. J. 531 (1964).

Sidman, "Constitutional Revision in Pennsylvania: Problems and Procedures," 71 W. Va. L. Rev. 306 (1969).

Sprague, Cornwell & Goodman, "Judicial Role in a Non-Judicial Setting: Some Survey Evidence," 4 Law and Soc. Rev. 371 (1970).

Sturm & Craig, "State Constitutional Commissions: Fifteen Years of Increasing Use," 39 State Govt. 56 (1966).

Sturm & Craig, "State Constitutional Conventions: 1950-1965," 39 State Govt. 152 (1966).

Sumner, "Constitutional Revision in California," 40 State Govt. 224 (1967).

Symposium on Constitutional Revision, 72 W. Va. L. Rev. 33: Frasure, "Constitutional Revision—The Legislature" 33; Howard, "Constitutional Revision—Virginia's Approach" 41; Shelton, "Constitutional Revision—The Counties" 60 (1969).

Symposium on the 1964 New Hampshire Constitutional Convention, 6 N.H.B.J. 212 (1964).

Thomas, "The Electorate and State Constitutional Revision . . . An Analysis of Four Michigan Referanda," 12 Midwest J. of Pol. Sci. 115 (1968).

Wheeler, "Constitutional Reform Fails in the Free State: The Maryland Constitutional Convention of 1967-68," 26 Wash. & Lee 218 (1969).

White, "Amendment and Revision of State Constitutions," 100 Penn. L. Rev. 1132 (1952).

[American Bar Association Journal, March 1974]

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION THROUGH A CONVENTION

(By John D. Feerick)

The murky procedures and processes of amending the Constitution by means of a convention requested by the states present many questions and could become the reason for a constitutional crisis. An American Bar Association committee has completed a two-year study of the legal and constitutional problems, and the Association has approved its report. Several of the key questions are dealt with in the report.

In times of confrontation and crisis a heavy strain is placed on our system of government. It is especially severe if there are no procedures for dealing with the problem at hand. The temptation is strong to be result oriented, sometimes at the risk of bending constitutional principles. Whether our constitutional system satisfactorily provides in advance for situations of fundamental stress is a basic measure of its ultimate viability.

One source of potential crisis that has not been dealt with is the provision of Article V of the Constitution "that Congress, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the Several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments. . . ." Although Congress has never convened a convention, more than three hundred applications for a convention have been submitted to Congress since 1789. Every state has submitted at least one application. In the period since 1940 there have been almost two hundred applications. From 1940 to 1962 more than thirty states petitioned for a convention to deal with the federal taxing power, and between 1963 and 1969 thirty-three states, one less than two thirds, submitted petitions on the issue of legislative reapportionment, although one rescinded its application.

The reapportionment petitions in particular brought into sharp focus unsettled questions concerning the convention method of initiating amendments. Does Article V leave it to the discretion of Congress to call a convention? Can a convention be limited to a particular subject or would it be free to roam over the entire Constitution and propose an entirely new document? Do the executive and judiciary have, or should they have, a role in the process? What is a valid application? How long does it remain valid? Can it be withdrawn once it has been submitted?

Prompted by the controversy over the convention method generated by the reapportionment applications, the American Bar Association in 1971 established a special committee to look into the questions of law entailed in the calling of a national constitutional convention. The chairman of the committee was C. Clyde Atkins, a federal district judge, and the committee included two other judges, Sarah T. Hughes and William S. Thompson; a former deputy attorney general of the United States, Warren Christopher; two law school professors, David Dow and Dean Albert M. Sachs; two former presidents of state constitutional conventions, Adrian M. Foley, Jr., of New Jersey, and Samuel W. Witwer of Illinois; and the writer, a practicing lawyer.

The committee conducted a two-year study on the subject and rendered a series of recommendations that were adopted by the Association at its August, 1973, meeting. These recommendations, some of which take strong issue with features of the legislation that passed the Senate unanimously in October, 1971, and July, 1973, under the sponsorship of Senator Ervin, deserve the attention of Congress and the bar.

CONGRESS SHOULD ESTABLISH SAFEGUARDS AND GUIDELINES

First, the committee concluded that it was desirable for Congress to establish procedures governing the call of a convention. While recognizing that this would focus attention on the process and thereby possibly have the effect of encouraging states to resort to it, the committee felt that it was prudent and better governmental technique to confront the subject forthrightly and supply guidelines and safeguards in advance of specific petitions and their attendant political issues. To defer the establishment of procedures to a time when their use was imminent, it was felt, would court a constitutional crisis by encouraging result-oriented approaches.

As for the argument that procedures should not be adopted in advance because a subsequent Congress could change them, the committee was of the view that legislation, fashioned after objective and intensive study, would be entitled to great weight as a constitutional interpretation and be of considerable precedential value. It also would assist in focusing and channeling the discussion at a future time when many applications were pending. The committee also noted that Congress has adopted legislation in other areas of a similar type—for example, electoral vote disputes and contested elections to the House of Representatives.

After concluding that legislation is highly desirable, the committee turned to the critical question of whether an Article V convention can be limited to a specific subject. Answering in the affirmative, the committee noted that the text of Article V authorizes only the state legislatures to initiate the process and that the origins and history of the article indicate that the authority of the state legislatures reaches as far as calling for a convention general in scope. On the other hand, the committee expressed its opinion that the state legislatures could exercise only a portion of their authority by calling for a convention limited to a specific subject. Under these circumstances, the committee reasoned, Congress is empowered—indeed obliged—to convene a convention limited to the subject stated in the petitions. This conclusion finds support in both the text and history of Article V.

ARTICLE V SUGGESTS NEED FOR CONSENSUS

The text of Article V evidences an intent that there be a national consensus in order to amend the Constitution. A two-thirds vote is necessary in each house of Congress to propose an amendment; there must be applications from two-thirds of the states to call a convention; ratification by three fourths of the states is necessary to ratify an amendment proposed under either method. This suggests that there must be a consensus of purpose among the states to hold a convention. When the states are at odds on the purpose of a convention, it seems inconsistent with Article V to call one. Conversely, when two thirds of the states are in agreement on a particular, limited purpose, the conclusion is strong that a convention should be called, limited to that purpose.

As for the history of Article V, the amendment articles of a number of state constitutions adopted before the United States Constitution suggest that a constitutional convention can be limited substantively. The language of the earliest draft of Article V submitted to the Constitutional Convention by the committee of detail indicates that a convention limited substantively was within its contemplation. That provision read: "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of the Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a convention for that purpose" (emphasis supplied).

Sometimes the Constitutional Convention of 1787 itself is cited for the proposition that an Article V convention may not be limited, but that premise seems wholly inapposite. The 1787 convention took place before the adoption of the Constitution when the states were independent and there was no effective national government. In addition, its work was submitted to the Continental Congress, consented to by that congress, and transmitted by it to the states for ratification.

As for whether Congress is obliged to call a convention when the requisite number of applications have been submitted, the committee had little doubt. The language of Article V is mandatory, and the intent the framers in this regard was made clear in numerous ways. On August 30, 1787, the convention rejected a proposal that would have given Congress the discreation as to whether to call a convention. In the House of Representatives debate of May 5, 1789, surrounding receipt of the first state application, Madison stated that when two thirds of the states had concurred in an application, it would be "out of the power of Congress to decline complying, the words of the Constitution being express and positive relative to the agency Congress may have in case of applications of this nature." In The Federalist (No. 85) Hamilton stated that the words of Article V "are peremptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."

Once a convention is called for a particular purpose and delegates are elected by the people to that limited convention, it would seem unreasonable and out of line with Article V for the convention to have the power to act with respect to other subjects. Were it to deviate from the subject that brought it into being and propose amendments on other subjects, Congress should be able to deal with the deviation by exercising its control over the ratification process and refusing to submit the amendments to the states. A mechanism to accomplish this is contained in the legislation that passed the Senate.

"IF THE GOVERNMENT SHOULD BECOME OPPRESSIVE . . ."

The debates at the Constitutional Convention are silent as to other matters concerning a convention. With his usual foresight, Madison noted that with the convention method "difficulties might arise to to the form, the quorum &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided."

From its study of the Article V process and conventions generally, the American Bar Association's committee was led to the conclusion that in order for a convention to be responsive to and representative of the people, its delegates must be elected by the people. This seems especially appropriate since the method was intended to supply the "people" with an alternative way of obtaining amendments "if the Government should become oppressive . . . ," to quote George Mason's remark at the Convention of 1787.

On the question of the apportionment of delegates to an Article V convention, the committee was of the view that in light of he governmental functions to be performed, the one-person, one-vote standards should govern. It doubted that the formula contained in the pending federal legislation, which affords each state a number of delegates equal to its total representation in Congress, would be held constitutional, since under that formula fifteen states would be overrepresented at a convention by 50 percent or more. For example, Alaska would be overrepresented by close to 375 percent, and California would be underrepresented by nearly 20 percent. The committee stated its view that an apportionment scheme based on representation in the House of Representatives would be acceptable compliance, since it would respect existing state and district boundaries and assure each state at least one delegate.

As for the necessary vote at a convention, the committee felt it was unwise and of questionable validity for legislation to prescribe a minimum vote by which the convention might propose an amendment, as does S. 1272, since it would intrude into an area touching on the essential characteristic of a convention as a deliberative body and would be inconsistent with the framers' design that the convention process be as free as possible from congressional control. S. 1272 requires a two-thirds vote of the total number of delegates to the convention. It is noteworthy that the Constitutional Convention of 1787, the territorial conventions held under acts of Congress, and most state constitutional conventions have determined their own vote.

As for the involvement of the judiciary in the convention process, the committee was of the strong belief that legislation should provide for limited judicial review of congressional determinations made in the process. It recommended that review would be appropriate only if a congressional determination were "clearly erroneous" and relief would be limited to declaratory relief. It was influenced in this regard by the view that the convention process likely would be used to effect a constitutional change opposed by vested interests and against the backdrop of some congressional inaction. Under these circumstances, the committee believed, it was desirable to have our independent judiciary serve as the arbiter and thereby assure the legitimacy of the process.

The committee questioned both the wisdom and validity of the pending legislation's thrust excluding the courts from any involvement stating: "It is questionable whether the power [of Congress to withdraw matters from the jurisdiction of the federal courts] reaches so far as to permit Congress to change results required by other provisions of the Constitution or to deny a remedy to enforce constitutional rights. Moreover, we are unaware of any authority upholding this power in cases of original jurisdiction."

Since the convention process was intended to deal with situations involving an "oppressive Congress," to remove from judicial review congressional determinations such as whether to call a convention and whether a convention has proposed an amendment on another subject is contrary to the intent of the framers and dangerous.

On the question of whether a convention call is required to be presented to the president, the committee concluded that it was not. It was of the opinion that the submission of that question to the president would be inconsistent with the mandatory nature of Congress duty to call a convention when proper applications have been submitted from the requisite number of states. As the president historically has not had a role in the process by which Congress proposes amendments, it also would alter the parallelism and intended equality between the two methods of initiating amendments. Also supporting the conclusion is the Supreme Court's decision in Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dallas 378 (1798), which held that Article I, Section 7 (the veto provision), applies to "ordinary cases of legislation" and "has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution." The Court ruled the Eleventh Amendment to be valid although it had not been presented to the president.

For somewhat similar reasons, the committee concluded that the state governor is not assigned a role in the process by which a state legislature applies for a convention or ratifies a proposed amendment. This conclusion is supported by the Supreme Court's decision in Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920), and Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922).

In Hawke the Court held that it was improper for a state to subject the ratification of a proposed amendment to a popular referendum, declaring that ratification was not ordinary legislation but rather an expression of assent in which "no legislative action is authorized or required." The Court emphasized that the agency for ratification was the "state legislature," that is, the representative lawmaking body of the state. The lawmaking procedures of the state, the Court held, were not applicable to the act of ratification. If the act of ratification does not invoke these procedures, which customarily include the governor's veto, it is hard to see why the application, a task specifically assigned to the legislatures by the Constitution, would do so.

TIME LIMIT COULD AVOID CONFUSION

On other questions, such as the length of time during which an application remains valid, the committee recommended that a limitation of some period should be adopted in the interests of certainty, to avoid the type of controversy and confusion that surrounded the apportionment applications, and to help determine the existence of a consensus of purpose among the states. The committee also expressed itself in favor of a statutory rule allowing a state the opportunity to withdraw an application before two thirds have submitted applications on the same subject, as well as a rule permitting a state to rescind a ratification of a proposed amendment so long as three fourths of the states have not ratified. These are desirable, given the relative permanency of an amendment, and they help assure that an amendment will be the result of a "contemporaneously felt need" existing from the inception of the process through its conclusion.

Although the ratification rule would represent a departure from precedents established in connection with the Fourteenth Amendment, the committee believed that the principle of seeking an agreement of public support reflected in Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921), favored the rule. In Dillon the Court held that Congress has the power to fix a reasonable time for ratification of an amendment proposed to the state legislatures.

LEGISLATION SHOULD REFLECT INTENT OF ARTICLE V

The committee took the present text of Article V as the foundation for its study. While members of the committee expressed individual preferences for the congressional method of initiating amendments, the committee was strongly of the conviction that regardless of preferences, fidelity to democratic principles required wholly objective consideration of the subject entrusted to it. The committee unanimously agreed with these views of the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1971 in Senate Report No. 336:

"The committee believes that the responsibility of Congress under the Constitution is to enact legislation which makes Article V meaningful. This responsibility dictates that legislation implementing the article should not be formulated with the objective of making the convention route a dead letter by placing insurmountable procedural obstacles in its way. Nor on the other hand should Congress, in the guise of implementing legislation, create procedures designed to facilitate the adoption of any particular constitutional change."

So long as Congress continues to be responsive to the people, there is little likelihood of a convention's being called. But if there should come a time in our history when two thirds of the states apply for a convention on the same subject, the process should be allowed to function as intended. If special circumstances cause that event to occur, there is no reason why a convention, functioning pursuant to the Constitution and in the context of appropriate federal legislation, cannot be an orderly mechanism for constitutional change.

[The National Law Journal, March 2, 1979]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

(By John D. Feerick)*

ABA REPORT: RULES NEEDED TO GOVERN CALLING OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

If we fail to deal now with the uncertainties of the convention method, we could be courting a constitutional crisis of grave proportions. We would be running the enormous risk that procedures for a national constitutional convention would have to be forged in time of divisive controversy and confusion when there would be a high premium on obstructive and result-oriented tactics.

"It is far more prudent, we believe, to confront the problem openly and to supply safeguards and general rules in advance ... So long as the Constitution envisions the convention method, we think the procedures should be ready if there is a 'contemporaneously felt need' by the required two-thirds of the state legislatures. Fidelity to democratic principles requires no less." [1]

These views were expressed several years ago in a 100-page report by a special Constitutional Convention Study Committee of the American Bar Association. The committee was composed of two federal judges, one superior court judge, a present and a former law school dean, two former presidents of state constitutional conventions, a former deputy attorney general of the United States, and a practicing attorney.[2]

After a two-year study, the committee, whose recommendations were adopted by the ABA, concluded that it is desirable for Congress to establish procedures to govern the process for amending the Constitution by the convention method.

Although the Senate twice unanimously passed measures that would have established procedures for the calling of a national constitutional convention,[3] no action was ever taken by the House of Representatives, with the result that our nation must deal on an ad hoc basis with the growing number of state applications calling for a convention to propose an amendment regarding a balanced federal budget.

Article V of the Constitution sets forth two methods of initiating and of ratifying constitutional amendments: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for prosposing Amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

In Federalist No. 43, James Madison explained the reasons for Article V: "That useful alterations [in the Constitution] will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other."

The Virginia Plan of government introduced in the Convention on May 29, 1787 provided "that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto." [4]

After a number of suggestions were advanced, the following clause was included in the Committee of Detail's report of Aug. 6, 1787: "On the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose." [5]

This clause for amending the Constitution was adopted by the Convention on Aug. 30, which rejected a suggestion that day by Gouverneur Morris that Congress be free to call a convention "whenever it pleased." [6] It appears that the

---

*Mr. Feerick was a member of the ABA's Special constitutional convention study committee (1971–73).

For footnotes, see "References" on pp. 175–76.

Convention contemplated under the proposal adopted on Aug. 30 "was the last step in the amending process, and its decision did not require any ratification by anybody." [7]

On Sept. 10, Elbridge Gerry moved to reconsider this action. He observed that under the Aug. 30 proposal "two-thirds of the States may obtain a Convention, a majority of which can bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the State-Constitutions altogether." [8] Alexander Hamilton and other delegates agreed with Mr. Gerry's motion. Mr. Hamilton noted that it was difficult to introduce amendments under the Articles of Confederation and suggested that "an easy mode should be established for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new System." [9] Mr. Hamilton stated that Congress would be the "first to perceive" and be "most sensible to the necessity of Amendments," and ought, therefore, to be authorized to call a convention whenever two-thirds of each House agreed on the need for a convention.

Also critical of the Aug. 30 proposal was James Madison. During the debate of Sept. 10 he asked: "How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?" Mr. Madison thereupon successfully proposed the following provision in lieu of that adopted on Aug. 30: "The Legislature of the U.S. whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U.S." [10]

The debate on the amending article, however, was not over. On Sept. 15, George Mason expressed his objection to the Sept. 10 proposal. He stated that both modes of initiating amendments depended on Congress so that "no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive. . . ." [11] Mr. Mason's draft of the Constitution, as it stood at that point in the Convention, contained the following notations:

"Article 5th—By this article Congress only have the power of proposing amendments at any future time to this constitution and should it prove ever so oppressive, the whole people of America can't make, or even propose alterations to it; a doctrine utterly subversive of the fundamental principles of the rights and liberties of the people." [12]

As a result of Mr. Mason's attack on the amending article, Messrs. Gerry and Morris moved to modify the provision "so as to require a convention on application of" two-thirds of the states.[13] In response, Mr. Madison said that he "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two-thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application." He added that he had no objection against providing for a convention for the purpose of amendments "except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum, etc., which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided." [14]

The Gerry-Morris motion, however, was passed so as to include the convention method as it now reads.

Little discussion of Article V occurred in the state ratifying conventions. In Federalist paper 85, Mr. Hamilton referred to Article V as contemplating "a single proposition." Congress would be obliged to call a convention, he stated, whenever two-thirds of the states concurred. He added: "The words of this article are preemptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."

In the first Congress, surrounding receipt of the first state application, Mr. Madison stated that when two-thirds of the state had concurred in an application, it would be "out of the power of Congress to decline complying, the words of the Constitution being express and positive relative to the agency Congress may have in case of applications of this nature." [15]

Through the present time all amendments have been proposed on single subjects by the Congress and all but the 21st Amendment (repealing Prohibition) were ratified by the state legislative method. Although there has never been a national constitutional convention since the adoption of the federal constitution, there have been several hundred applications from state legislatures calling for a convention on various subjects.[16] Rarely have the applications on any specific subject been sufficient to raise the question of whether Article V has been triggered.

In the aftermath of the Supreme Court's one person, one vote decisions, however, an effort was made for a constitutional convention to modify this principle of representative democracy, which culminated in more than 30 states submitting applications calling for a convention of the question of apportionment. Although the effort failed, it served to emphasize the existence of the constitutional convention vehicle of proposing amendments.

In earlier periods of American history the application clause of Article V was resorted to by the states primarily to encourage Congress to propose specific amendments. Particularly effective was a campaign at the turn of the century for an amendment providing for the direct election of U.S. Senators. It is reported that more than 30 states submitted applications for the call of a convention on that subject. The issue, however, was rendered academic when Congress proposed the 17th Amendment. In the 1930's and 1940's an effort was made to pressure Congress for an amendment to limit the federal taxing power; but it failed.

Almost invariably whenever the application clause of Article V has been resorted to by the states in any significant manner questions have been raised as to the meaning of Article V, including among these questions are the following:

1. Is Congress under a duty to call a convention when two-thirds of the state legislature apply for one on a specific matter?
2. If called, is the convention limited to that matter or free to propose amendments on other matters?
3. What constitutes a valid application which Congress must count?
4. What rules apply as to the selection of convention delegates and as to the voting at a convention?
5. What are the roles of the President, state governors and courts in the process?
6. Can a state withdraw an application once it has been submitted to Congress?
7. How much power does Congress have as to the scope of a convention?

In its study of the subject, which was aided by 12 law students, the ABA Study Committee attempted to answer these questions. It took the present text of Article V as the foundation for its study. While members of the committee expressed individual preferences for the congressional method of initiating amendments, the committee was strongly of the conviction that regardless of preference, fidelity to principle required wholly objective consideration of its assignment from the ABA's governing body. In seeking the answers to the questions of law raised, the committee studied, among other things, the text and origins of the amending provision, the intent of the Framers, and the history and workings of the amending Article since 1789. Since I am in complete agreement with the conclusions of the Committee, of which I was a member, the ensuing discussion focuses on those conclusions.[17]

After concluding, as previously noted, that legislation governing the convention process is highly desirable, the ABA committee addressed the question of whether an Article V convention can be limited to a specific subject. Answering in the affirmative, the committee noted that the text of Article V authorizes only the state legislatures to initiate the process and that the origins of the Article indicate that the authority of the state legislatures reaches as far as calling for a convention general in scope.

On the other hand, the committee expressed its view that the state legislatures could exercise only a portion of their authority by calling for a convention limited to a specific subject. In this regard, the committee noted that at the state level, at which there have been more than 200 constitutional conventions, it seemed settled that the electorate may choose to delegate only a portion of its authority to a state convention and so limit it substantively.[18]

With respect to the view that Article V sanctions only general conventions, the committee stated: "Such an interpretation would relegate the alternative method to an 'unequal' method of initiating amendments. Even if the state legislatures overwhelmingly felt that there was a necessity for limited change in the Constitution, they would be discouraged from calling for a convention if that convention would automatically have the power to propose a complete revision of the Constitution." [19]

The committee found support in both the text and history of Article V for its conclusion that a convention could be limited. The text of Article V evidences an intent that there be a national consensus in order to amend the Constitution. A two-thirds vote is necessary in each house of Congress to propose an amendment; there must be applications from two-thirds of the states to call a convention; ratification by three-fourths of the states is necessary to ratify an amendment proposed under either method of initiation. This suggests that there must be a consensus of purpose among the states to hold a convention. When the states are at odds on the purpose of a convention, it seems wholly inconsistent with Article V to call one. Conversely when two-thirds of the states are in agreement on a particular, limited purpose, the conclusion is strong that a convention should be called, limited to that purpose.

As for the history of Article V, the amendment articles of a number of state constitutions adopted before the U.S. Constitution also suggested to the committee that a constitutional convention can be limited substantively.[20] The language of the earliest draft of Article V submitted to the Constitutional Convention by the committee on detail indicates that a convention limited substantively was within its contemplation. That provision read: "On the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of the Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a convention for that purpose (emphasis supplied).

Sometimes the Constitutional Convention of 1787 itself is cited for the proposition that an Article V convention may not be limited, but that premise seems wholly inapposite. As the ABA report noted: "While the Constitutional Convention of 1787 may have exceeded the purpose of its call in framing the Constitution, it does not follow that a convention convened under Article V and subject to the Constitution can lawfully assume such authority.[21]

The 1787 convention took place before the adoption of the Constitution when the states were independent and there was no effective national government. In addition, its work was submitted to the Continental Congress, consented to by that congress, and transmitted by it to the states for ratification. Moreover, as Thomas Cooley has observed, the 1787 convention was "a revolutionary proceeding, and could be justified only by the circumstances which had brought the Union to the brink of dissolution." [22]

As for whether Congress is obliged to call a convention when the requisite number of applications have been submitted, the committee had little doubt. The language of Article V is mandatory and the intent of the Framers was made clear in the debate of Aug. 30, 1787, the Federalist, in the First Congress upon receipt of the first state application, and during other discussions.

Once a convention is called for a particular purpose, the committee concluded that the convention would have no authority to act with respect to other subjects. Were it to deviate from the subject that brought it into being and propose amendments on other subjects, the committee suggested that Congress could deal with the deviation by exercising its power over choosing the method of ratification and refusing to submit the amendments to the states. Judicial relief might also be appropriate under such circumstances.

Content. Article V explicitly gives Congress the power to call a convention upon receipt of applications from two-thirds of the state legislatures. As a necessary incident of the power to call, the committee reasoned, Congress has the power to determine initially whether the conditions requiring a call have been satisfied. not every state application, of course, is necessarily valid.

As the committee stated: "A reading of Article V makes clear that an application should contain a request to Congress to call a national convention that would have the authority to propose an amendment to the Constitution. An application which simply expressed a state's opinion on a given problem or requested Congress itself to propose an amendment would not be sufficient for purposes of Article V. Nor would an application seem proper if it called for a convention with more authority than to vote a specific amendment set forth therein up or down, since the convention would be effectively stripped of its deliberative function. A convention should have latitude to amend, as Congress does, by evaluating and dealing with a problem." [22]

The committee added that an application which expressed the result sought by an amendment (i.e., direct popular election of the President) should be proper since the convention would have the freedom to decide on the terms of the specific amendment. The committee also felt that it should not be necessary that each application be identical or propose similar changes in the same subject matter.

Timeliness.—In Dillon v. Gloss, the Supreme Court stated that "the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal, which Congress is free to fix." It stated that "as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do." [24]

The committee expressed its view that this reasoning also was applicable to state applications for a constitutional convention. As the committee observed, the convening of a convention to deal with a certain matter certainly should reflect the "will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period. . . ." [25]

In the absence of a uniform rule, the timeliness or untimeliness of state applications would vary, it seemed to the committee, from case to case. It would involve, as the Supreme Court suggested with respect to the ratification area in Coleman v. Miller,[26] a consideration of "political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the [applications]." [27]

Withdrawal. Although there is uncertainty over whether a state may withdraw an application, the ABA committee reasoned that there should be a rule allowing withdrawal. "In view of the importance and comparatively permanent nature of an amendment, it seems desirable that state legislatures be able to set aside applications that may have been hastily submitted or that no longer reflect the social, economic and political factors in effect when the applications were originally adopted. We believe Congress has the power to so provide." [28]

Election of Delegates.—From its study of Article V and conventions generally, the ABA committee was led to the conclusion that in order for a convention to be representative of the people, its delegates should be elected by the people. It felt this was especially appropriate for the extraordinary happening of a national constitutional convention since the method was intended to supply the "people" with an alternative way of obtaining amendments "if the Government should become oppressive . . .," to quote George Mason's remark at the Convention of 1787.

Apportionment of Delegates. On the question of the apportionment of delegates to an Article V convention, the committee was of the view that in light of the government function to be performed, the one-person, one-vote standards should govern. The committee stated its view that an apportionment scheme based on representation in the House of Representatives also would be acceptable compliance, since it would respect existing state and district boundaries and assure each state at least one delegate. It doubted that a formula which afforded each state a number of delegates equal to its total representation in Congress would be held constitutional, since under that formula fifteen states would be overrepresented at a convention by 50 percent or more.

Convention Vote.—As for the necessary vote at a convention, the committee felt it was unwise and of questionable validity for Congress to prescribe a minimum vote by which the convention might propose an amendment, since such action would intrude into an area touching on the essential characteristic of a convention as a deliberative body and would be inconsistent with the framers' design that the convention process be as free as possible from congressional control. It is noteworthy that the territorial conventions held under acts of Congress, most state constitutional conventions and the Convention of 1787 have determined their own vote.

Presidential Involvement.—On the question of whether a convention call is required to be presented to the President, the committee concluded that it was not. It believed that the submission of that question to the President would be inconsistent with the mandatory nature of Congress' duty to call a convention when proper applications had been submitted from the requisite number of states. As the President historically has not had a role in the process by which Congress proposes amendments, it also would alter the parallelism and intended equality between the two methods of initiating amendments. Also supporting the conclusion is the Supreme Court's decision in Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[29] which held that Article I, Section 7 (the veto provision), applies to "ordinary cases of legislation" and "has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution." The Court ruled the 11th Amendment to be valid although it had not been presented to the President.

Gubernatorial Involvement.—For somewhat similar reasons as above, the committee concluded that the state governor is not assigned a role in the process by which a state legislature applies for a convention or ratifies a proposed amendment. It believed this followed from the Supreme Court's decisions in Hawke v. Smith,[30] and Leser v. Garnett.[31]

In Hawke the Court held that it was improper for a state to subject the ratification of a proposed amendment to a popular referendum, declaring that ratification was not ordinary legislation but rather an expression of assent in which "no legislative action is authorized or required." The Court emphasized that the agency for ratification was the "state legislature," that is, the representative lawmaking procedures of the state, the Court held, were not applicable to the act of ratification. If the act of ratification does not invoke these procedures, which customarily included the governor's veto, it is hard to see why the application, a task specifically assigned to the legislatures by the Constitution, would do so.

Judicial Involvement.—The committee, in its report, stated that it was desirable and feasible to have in any implementing legislation a limited judicial review of congressional determinations made in the convention process.[32] It was influenced in this regard by the view that the convention process likely would be used to effect a constitutional change opposed by vested interests and against the backdrop of some congressional inaction. Under these circumstances, the committee believed, it was desirable to have our independent judiciary serve as the arbiter and thereby assure the legitimacy of the process.

The committee questioned both the wisdom and validity of legislation excluding the courts from any involvement, stating: "It is questionable whether the power [of Congress to withdraw matters from the jurisdiction of the federal courts] reaches so far as to permit Congress to change results required by other provisions of the Constitution or to deny a remedy to enforce constitutional rights. Moreover, we are unaware of any authority upholding this power in cases of original jurisdiction." [33]

The committee suggested limits on judicial review in any legislation adopted on the subject. First, it suggested that a congressional determination should be overturned only if "clearly erroneous," which would acknowledge Congress' political role and at the same time guard against arbitrary action. Second, it recommended that judicial remedies be limited to declaratory relief so as to dimnish actual conflict between the branches of government. Finally, if stated that judicial review should not be allowed to delay the amending process unduly; accordingly, it recommended a short limitation period combined with expedited judicial procedures.

In my view, the confusion about the convention method strongly argues, as long as the convention method remains part of the Constitution, for the establishment of procedures governing the process—procedures which neither facilitate the adoption of any particular constitutional change nor make practically impossible any resort to the convention method. As the ABA Committee noted: "The integrity of our system requires that when the convention method is properly resorted to, it be allowed to function as intended." [34]

REFERENCES

(1) See Report of the ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, entitled "Amendment of the Constitution By the Convention Method Under Article V (1974), p. 8.

(2) The committee consisted of U.S. District Court Judge C. Clyde Atkins, as chairman; Warren Christopher, a former U.S. Deputy Attorney General and now Deputy Under Secretary of State; Professor David Dow, a former Dean of Nebraska Law School; Adrian M. Foley, Jr., President of the Fourth New Jersey Constitutional Convention; U.S. District Court Judge Sarah T. Hughes; Dean Albert M. Sachs of Harvard Law School; JudgeWilliam S. Thompson of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia; Samuel W. Witwer, President of the Sixth Illinois Constitutional Convention; and the writer of this article.

(3) 117 Cong. Rec. 36803-06 (1971) (84 to 0 vote); 119 Cong. Rec. S 12728 (July 9, 1973).

(4) The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 22 (Farrand ed. 1937) (hereinafter cited as Farrand).

(5) 2 Id. 188 (emphasis added).

(6) 2 Id. 468.

(7) Weinfeld, "Power of Congress over State Ratifying Conventions," 51 Harv.L.Rev.473, 481 (1938).

(8) 2 Farrand 557-58.

(9) 2 Farrand 558.
(10) Id. 559.
(11) Id. 629.
(12) Id. 629 and n. 8.
(13) Id. 629.
(14) Id. 629, 630.
(15) 1 Annals of Congress, Cols. 248–51 (1789). See also IV Elliot, The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 178 (2d ed. 1836) (remarks of delegate James Iredell of North Carolina) ; 1 Annals of Congress, col. 498 (1796) (remarks of Rep. William Smith of South Carolina during debate on a proposed treaty with Great Britain) ; Cong. Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess. 630–31 (1865) (remarks of Senator Johnson).
(16) See ABA Report 60–61 for a tabulation by subject matter.
(17) I should note that I have adapted to this article parts of my article entitled "Amending the Constitution Through a Convention," 60 A.B.A.J. 285 (1974), and parts of the ABA Report.
(18) See ABA Report 16 and authorities cited.
(19) ABA Report 16.
(20) Thus, Georgia's Constitution of 1777 provided that "no alteration shall be made in this constitution without petitions from a majority of the counties, . . . at which time the assembly shall order a convention to be called for that purpose, specifying the alterations to be made, according to the petitions referred to the assembly by a majority of the counties as aforesaid."

Pennsylvania's Constitution of 1776 provided for the election of a Council of Censors with power to call a convention "if there appear to them an absolute necessity of amending any article of the constitution which may be defective. . . . But the articles to be amended, and the amendment proposed, and such articles as are proposed to be added or abolished, shall be promulgated at least six months before the day appointed for the election of such convention, for the previous consideration of the people, that they may have an opportunity of instructing their delegates on the subject."

For other precedents on the early awareness of the binding effect of a limitation on a convention, see ABA Report 15–16.
(21) ABA Report 14.
(22) T. Cooley, The General Principles of Constitutional Law in the United States of America 15 (2d ed. 1891).
(23) ABA Report 30.
(24) 256 U.S. 368, 375 (1921).
(25) ABA Report 31.
(26) 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
(27) 307 U.S. 433, 453–54 (1939).
(28) ABA Report 33.
(29) 3 U.S. (3Dall.) 378 (1798).
(30) 253 U.S. 221 (1920).
(31) 285 U.S. 355 (1932).
(32) ABA Report 24.
(33) ABA Report 20–21.
(34) ABA Report 40.

Senator BAYH. We will now move to our first panel, if I might. I will ask Prof. Charles Black of Yale Law School and Prof. Walter Dellinger of Duke University Law School to join us.

Professor Dellinger, is that your budding constitutional expert?

Mr. DELLINGER. Yes, sir. That is my son, Hampton. He said, "Senator Bayh has been chairman of the committee for 16 years?" And I said, "Yes," and he said, "In all that time there wasn't a single constitutional convention?"

I explained to him that the committee had other duties.

Senator BAYH. I appreciate his perception.

Professor Black, it is good to have you with us. Why don't you start first since you have a constraint in time.

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

I have a statement, which I shall condense. I have it and copies of certain publications of mine for the record.

Senator BAYH. We will put them in the record at the end of your testimony.

TESTIMONY OF PROF. CHARLES L. BLACK, JR., YALE LAW SCHOOL, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Mr. BLACK. Now, we all know what we are talking about, so I will not go through the preliminaries again, but I do want to talk to one point which I think is important; that is that, as far as I or anyone else has been able to discover, all of the few applications, pursuant to this provision we are talking about, that were submitted by State legislatures, for more than 100 years after the adoption of the Constitution, were drawn on the assumption that the provisions in article V authorized the legislatures to apply only for a general convention. At least that is all they applied for.

It was apparently not until 1893 that any legislature sent in an application based on the assumption that such applications were valid, when they sought to dictate the agenda, or perhaps I should say the agendum, in the singular, of the "convention for proposing amendments."

Mr. Chairman, think what this means. Through the controversies over the alien and sedition laws in the latter part of the 18th century, over the embargo, the War of 1812, the internal improvements bills, over the Bank of the United States, over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, over the early fugitive slave laws—not one single legislature acted as though it had the power to force Congress to call a convention limited to one of those topics.

It did not even occur to Kentucky and Virginia, when they were busying themselves with attempted interposition against what they considered to be unconstitutional acts of Congress, to go after an article V convention. Even in the great nullification and slavery controversies in the 1830's and 1860's; the States that submitted applications made them general.

Just twice, in the 1890's, long after any original understanding, and then with growing frequency, as we know, down to our own times, legislatures have submitted applications so drawn as to reflect the assumption that the article V language authorizes the State legislatures to force the calling of a convention limited to a subject, or even an amendment whose text is dictated by the State legislatures.

I shall soon go into my reasons for believing that this assumption, though obviously convenient for the State legislatures, is a wrong assumption, one that mistakes the meaning of the article V language, "for proposing amendments." But I bring this historical point up front, because, as I have fought tenaciously now for nearly 17 years on this very battlefield, I have found that the very hardest thing to overcome is the tacit—and I am afraid often unconsidered—assumption that applications to a subject-limited, or text-limited, convention would be valid and could so force Congress to call such a convention. This assumption, I wanted to stress at the very beginning, arises from and only from the actions of the State legislatures themselves, as good as entirely in our own century.

There is no precedent anywhere outside of that, no authoritative precedent. The assumption that this power lies in the State legislatures is based altogether on their own implied claims, which are obviously in the nature of self-serving declarations, and which began to be put forward 105 years after the going into effect of the Constitution—on these and nothing else.

My hope is that this will clear the way for our seeing this question for what it is, a new question, coming before us in 1979, without any presumption.

Senate bill S. 3, now before you, is drawn on the theory that these limited applications are valid. My own position is that they are not valid, because they are not, in my view, applications for the thing that article V authorizes the States legislatures to apply for, and so they do not place Congress under any legal or moral obligation to do anything.

This view, if right, has two important and obviously connected consequences. First, it compels the judgment that S. 3 and similar bills are not in pursuance of the Constitution because that bill, in its crucial section 2 and throughout its length, rests upon and only upon the assumption that the article V language refers to a convention restricted as to the "the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed."

Second, my view means that most, if not all, the convention applications now pending before the Congress are nullities and that Congress, whatever their number, neither need nor constitutionally may act upon them. Thirty-four times zero is zero. That will be just as true in January, 1980, as it is now. The question whether S. 3 is in pursuance of the Constitution is therefore the very same question as the question whether the applications now before the Congress are valid article V applications. The bill and the applications are drawn exactly on the same theory, and stand or fall together.

I have defended this view in a number of published writings which I have placed on the record, but I will try orally, now, to hit the high spots.

Now, the question, first and last, alpha to omega, is "what is meant in Article V by the words, 'a convention for proposing amendments?' "

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, and Senators, that the best approach to ascertaining the plain meaning of these words is to ask what they would mean without modification in the very procedural context in which they are intended and anticipated to be used.

Now, as you know, in their pleadings, lawyers sometimes do what we call "track the statute," phrazing allegations or prayers in the exact statutory language, and no more.

Suppose a State legislature, tracking article V in this way, were to transmit to Congress a paper saying, "Application is hereby made, by the legislature of this State that Congress call a convention for proposing amendments," period, end of application, signature of the officer, and stopping right there.

Now two and only two questions could be moved in that situation: First, would such an application be valid? Second, what would it mean?

First, the application so worded would, of course, be valid. Thirty-four such applications would oblige Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments, providing Congress could agree on constituency and so forth, and I think every Member of Congress would be under a duty to try so to agree.

That would be true exactly because article V is tracked. How could it be that an application in the very words of the article would not be valid?

Second, the words used would mean a general, unlimited convention, to propose such amendments as it thinks ought to be proposed. Since I see no possible basis for doubting this, I can't think how to support the contention other than by saying just that.

Observe, Mr. Chairman, how putting the matter this way transforms the plain meaning and textual issues. We are not talking any longer, if one buys my conclusion about this tracking application, we are not talking any longer about which of two plain meanings, among two mutually exclusive alternatives, the article V language has—unless one is prepared to contest these two conclusions regarding the tracking applications, and I don't see how anyone could. Then one must start with and stick with the position that article V language has one plain meaning that is beyond all doubt, that the words "a convention for proposing amendments," whatever else they may mean, plainly do mean a general, unlimited convention.

Let me put into the record the observation that there is here an important legislative fact. The astonishing fact is that S. 3, in its crucial section 2, and throughout, would actually make impermissible and ineffective the filing of the only kind of application that is certainly valid under article V of the Constitution; namely, an application that tracks the article verbatim.

I urge you to consider, Mr. Chairman, and Senators, whether such a glaring and plan constitutional defect in a bill that has been around as long as this one has does not suggest some respectful skepticism about the soundness of the constitutional counseling that went into its drafting?

Establishment of this crucial point, about the tracking application for a general convention, quite changes the focus of inquiry. When we inquire now whether a State application for a limited convention asks for what article V means, we are inquiring whether, in addition to its incontestably plain conferral, on the legislatures, of what is beyond all doubt a most significant power, very nearly an ultimate power, the power to force the call of a general constitutional convention, article V is to be taken to give them, as well, a different power, not at all obviously meant by article V—the power to force the call of a subject- or text-limited convention. In an inquiry concerning correct amendment procedure, where, more than anywhere else, very clear legitimacy is requisite, great clarity of justification should be looked for before one adds, to a fixed plain meaning, another meaning far from plain. There is, I submit, no justification at all for this addition of a second and different meaning, except the very late but now long-continued self-serving assumptions of the legislatures themselves.

I think I might usefully refer here to the 1974 American Bar Association committee report on this subject, for a sampling of some of the reasons that have been put forward for adding something else to the plain and obvious meaning of the article V words.

The prestigeful report, for example, invokes the always appealing concept of equality. The convention method, it says, was intended to stand on an "equal footing" with the congressional method. I don't know why they raise that issue, because so it stands, if and only if article V be taken to refer only to a general convention with full freedom of proposal. Such a convention, as one of the two proposing bodies in article V, would stand exactly on an "equal footing" with Congress, the other proposing body under article V. Is not the equality as to national concerns, an equality between the two national bodies to which the proposing function is given?

This symmetrical equality is exactly what my own view leads to.

The bar report puts forward a "greater includes the lesser" argument, seeing "no sound reason as to why they—the State legislatures—cannot invoke limitations on exercising * * *" their authority to procure a convention call. This argument ignores the fact—which underlies much of the bar report's other reasonings, and which underlies, indeed, the most crucial provisions of S. 3 itself—that a general convention on the one hand, and, on the other, a subject- or text-limited convention, are different not in degree but in kind. They are as different in kind as: (1) The freedom to marry; and (2) the freedom to marry 1 of 2 or 3 or even 100 people designated by somebody else. The power to force the call of a convention, and to dictate its agenda, is, if anything, a greater power than the power to force the call of a convention without dictating its agenda. That is exactly why the State legislatures are so eager to claim it.

Now, I urge upon you that these general considerations do not reach at all to the length of justifying an addition to the uncontestedly plain meaning of article V.

I would turn to another aspect of the bar committee report which has come to be a sort of "law and the prophets" in this field. They go through the records of the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and bring in some material from the State constitutions in the late 18th century. Quite obviously these historical matters are not for oral argument, even to such a patient committee as this. I am a man of mercy. But I do want to draw this committee's attention to my full, but I think not terribly prolix argument in my letter of June 1 to Senator Kennedy, to which I have already referred. This letter has been published in the Oklahoma Law Review, and is one of the documents which I have, with your permission, handed up for the record.

These passages in that letter—and I, of course, invite you to read it—do, I think, succeed in justifying to the hilt my statement, elsewhere in the same letter, that the bar committee report, which now exerts a powerful influence, is "deeply flawed, and entirely fails to make its case." I stand firmly by that statement, and if you doubt its rightness, then I do invite your particular attention to those passages in my Kennedy letter in which I deal with their handling of the 1787 Convention, and particularly of the earlier State constitutions.

I believe you will be surprised. I believe that, after the first surprise is over, you never will feel quite the same about this bar committee report. And I make that statement, of course, with the material in your hands. I am not simply boasting without having it there. I am simply omitting it through mercy given the time.

Neither "plain meaning," then, nor context nor history—as I have tried to develop it in the material which you have—will permit our reading into these simple words, "a convention for proposing amendments," a power in the State legislature, a power unsuspected for a full century after the Constitution came to light, to propose amendments at which the nominally "proposing" body is merely to ratify.

But I think one thing more needs to be said. It is the genius of American constitutional interpretation to read our Constitution in a sensible way, as responsive to need. The following of this master maxim of interpretation is an expression of fidelity, the deepest possible fidelity, to the overriding and dominated intent of the summer of 1787 in Philadelphia, the intention that the document be so read as to work well.

It is not irrelevant, then, even as a matter of law, to point out how thoroughly all national needs for constitutional amendment are already provided for without our straining words to give the State legislatures the power, in effect, to "propose amendments."

The other House of Congress stands every 2 years for election, and represents the American people in their proportion. The Senate was so designed as to represent the States, one by one; each Senator represents and must answer to the people of a whole State.

These two bodies can set in motion and send out to the States any amendment their constituencies want. There is a strange mythical world—familiar to political cartoonists, for example—in which Congress so carefully built to represent the American people by numbers and by States, is looked on as though it were some kind of alien power.

In fact, the constituencies of Congress and the State legislatures are exactly the same people by Constitutional command, and the difference—and it is a distinct though an intangible one—is in the conception of office. The same people are represented here as in the State legislatures, but it would be utterly impossible for a constitutional amendment to be whooped and hollered through these two Houses as they have been in a great many State legislatures. The State legislator ought not to be expected to form just that blend of constituency concern and national concern which ideally characterizes the Congressman and the Senator, and which is, in my observation and judgment, often approximated in congressional and senatorial reality. But that difference between Congress and the legislatures suggests that by far the better place for the origination of piecemeal amendments is Congress, where the overall interest, as well as the constituency interest, is always in view. In refusing to put the new gloss that S. 3 would put on the words of article V, we would not be shutting off a road in any way demonstrated to be needed, or likely to be needed. The whole history of the country fails to show any serious trouble that resulted from difficulty about amending the Constitution.

The route opened up by S. 3 is one which it is very hard to think of as either symmetrical with the traditional route, and its broad consensus among the whole people—well, the way to talk in these high political questions is in numbers. Let's talk for a moment in numbers. States containing considerably less than 40 percent of the whole population could force a convention limited to proposing a given amendment, if S. 3 is judged to be pursuant to the Constitution and passed.

Under the electoral college plan in the bill, delegates representing less than a majority of the people could implement these proposals. These delegates could be people who, unlike all of you here, and all those across the Capitol, never have to face another election.

Then States containing as few as 40 percent of the people could ratify—a condition, by the way, which did not obtain in 1789, and which I find sometimes astounds people to whom you state it. Three-quarters of the States can be put together that contain 40 percent of the people.

Of course these extremes would not probably ever be reached, but they mark the end of a continuous range of possibility, within which it could easily happen that amendment after amendment could be passed without anything like that heavy preponderance of affirmative desire that the other method, the always-used method, requires.

Of course, that is exactly why this method of amendment is being pressed so hard.

Now, these last considerations would not suffice to overcome a clearly-expressed constitutional command. But there is no such command.

I mention these things to show the utter fallaciousness of any argument that says that any text limitation must be imported in the words of article V, because the importation of such language is politically desirable.

There is no historical warrant, no warrant in common sense, no warrant at all for our seeing in the article V language, which so plainly refers to a general convention, reference to limited conventions as well.

This conclusion, if you come to accept it, must lead not only to the rejection of S. 3, as not in pursuance of the Constitution, but also to the judgment that most of the pending applications are invalid, for the simple and sufficient reason that they do not ask what article V means.

I have argued here for the conclusion that an article V convention must be entirely general, and that if a State application asks for something other than that, it is void. I fully believe in this view, and I have persevered in it a long time, Mr. Chairman. I think if I am wrong about it, it is what the theologians call "invincible ignorance."

I am prepared to argue from any stump. Tom O'Neill asked me if I would go on the road, and I said I sure would.

But would be quite sufficient now to hold to the more modest, and I should think reasonably self-evident proposition that, at the least, an application for the assembling of a national constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing a textually set out or minutely described amendment is a mere travesty of grown-up constitutionalism. Assembling a national convention from Maine, Alaska, Florida, and Hawaii, and reserving the rooms and getting the requisite three chaplains, one from each of the major faiths, deciding who is going to get the gavel, or which pieces of it, after it is over, people coming in to perform such a ministerial or rigorously channeled function, is a bit of foolish pageantry that no one can think the Constitution calls for.

It reminds me of Henry VIII's congés d'élire, which gave cathedral chapters leave to elect a bishop, namely, the bishop designated by Henry VIII.

The differences here—since the tactics have changed somewhat—the differences between a directly quoted amendment to be proposed, and a minutely described amendment to be proposed, is utterly trivial. I hope at least that the Congress will not be intimidated by these. They cannot possibly be what article V means, because article V was drawn by serious people, and they should be regarded as without force. I have heard it said that, while these narrowly-drawn applications, for proposing one amendment described in advance may be invalid, in that their attempt at limitation fails, nevertheless, that Congress ought to treat them hospitably and call a convention anyhow. After all, what is constitutional law among friends? I think such thoughts must proceed from people who have not read the applications that are coming in.

As to the applications with the words, "sole and exclusive purpose," and a self-destruct clause in some of them, if that purpose is departed from at all, as to these, the suggested hospitality, Mr. Chairman, is the hospitality which says that we are strong for you and love you, and please come right in, but leave your left leg outside. It is the hospitality of the spider to the fly.

In the main, it is entirely clear that the applying legislatures very much desire not to have any but the severely limited convention applied for. That would be nothing but irony in the concept of deference to the State legislatures, when that deference consists in giving them what they have said they very much don't want.

I have in my statement a number of specific points which are of importance, but not of this dominating overall importance, concerning defects which I first noted in the bill that was one of Senator Ervin's bills, which was antecedent to this, and which still exist in this bill, but I believe I will stop there for time purposes.

I very gladly will answer, or deal with, any questions that anybody wants to ask.

Senator BAYH. Thank you very much, Professor Black, for your well thought out and enthusiastically given testimony.

Are you under a time limitation, so that we should perhaps ask questions now?

Mr. BLACK. I am not under that kind of time line. I have to be in New York at 6:30 for a testimonial dinner for Jack Greenberg of the NAACP defense funds. I will be there in plenty of time.

Senator BAYH. Is it all right to let Professor Dellinger go now, then?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

[Mr. Black's prepared statement and additional material follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF PROFESSOR L. BLACK, JR.

Mr. Chairman and Senators, I thank you for the chance to appear before you on this occasion. My remarks will be directed formally at S. 3, but my scanning of the staff analysis of the House bills tells me they differ very little among themselves or from S. 3, and not at all on the principal point I shall try to make.

The Constitution's Article V provides for a method of amendment never yet used. "On Applicaton of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States * * * Congress shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments * * *" The proposals emanating from such a convention, to become effective as Amendments, must be ratified by three-fourths of the States, just as is true of proposals passing through Congress, the method of proposing always used up to now.

So far as I or anyone else can discover, all of the few applications pursuant to this provision that were submitted by state legislatures, for more than one hundred years after the adoption of the Constitution, were drawn on the assumption that the language I have quoted authorized these legislatures to apply for a general constitutional convention. It was apparently not until 1893 that any legislature sent in an application based on the assumption that such applications were valid when they sought to dictate, usually very narrowly, the agenda—or I should say the agendum, in the singular—of the "convention for proposing amendments."

Think what this means. Through the controversies over the Alien and Sedition Laws, over the Embargo and the War of 1812, over the "internal improvements" bills, over the Bank of the United States, over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, over the early fugitive slave laws, not one single state legislature acted as though it thought it had the power to force Congress to call a convention limited to one of these topics. It did not even occur to Kentucky and Virginia, in the late 1790's, when they were busy with "interposition" against what they held to be unconstitutional actions of Congress, to go at the matter via application for a subject-liimted Article V convention. Even in the great nullification and slavery contests, of the 1830's and 1860's respectively, the states that submitted applications made them "general," according to all sources and tabulations I have seen.

Just twice in the 1890's, long after any original understanding can have survived, and then with growing freqeuncy down to our own times, legislatures have submitted applications so drawn as to reflect the assumption that this Article V language authorizes the state legislatures to force the call of a convention limited to a subject, or even to a particular amendment's text, dictated by the state legislatures.

I shall soon go into my reasons for believing that this assumption, though obviously a more than convenient one for the state legislatures, is a wrong assumption, one that quite mistakes the meaning of the Article V phrase, ". . . a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . ." But I chose to bring this roughly striking historical point up front because, having fought tenaciously for nearly seventeen years on this very battlefield, I have found that the hardest thing to overcome is the tacit and, I am afraid often unconsidered assumption that applications for a subject-limited or even a text-limited convention are valid, and place Congress under an obligation to call such a limited convention, if such applications come in from the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. This assumption, I wanted to stress at the beginning, arises from and only from the actions of the state legislatures themselves, as good as entirely in our own century. No judicial court of any kind has ever held anything bearing in any way on this question; as far as I know, not so much as a judicial obiter dictum, in all the years between 1789 and 1979, faintly supports it. There is no precedent, so much as arguably, in any action taken by the Congress. The assumption that this power lies in the state legislatures is based altogether on their own implied claims, which are obviously in the nature of self-serving declarations, and which first began to be put forward 105 years after the going into effect of the Constitution—on these and on nothing else.

My hope is that this preliminary consideration will clear the way for the treating of this question for what it is—a new question, coming before us in 1979 without any presumption.

Senate Bill S. 3, now before you, is drawn on the theory that these limited-convention applications are valid. My own position is that they are not valid, because they are not applications for the thing Article V, properly interpreted, authorizes the state legislatures to apply for—and that, consequently, state legislative applications for subject-limited conventions, being applications for something other than what Article V means, are not capable, whatever their number, of placing the Congress under any legal or moral obligation to do anything.

This view, if it is right, has two important consequences. First, it compels the judgment that S. 520 is not in pursuance of the Constitution, because that bill (in its crucial Section 2 and through all its length) rests upon and only upon the assumption that the Article V language refers to a convention restricted as to the "nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed." [S. 3, sec. 2] Secondly, my view, if correct, means that most if not all the convention applications now pending before Congress are nullities, and that Congress neither need nor constitutionally may act in obedience to them, whatever their number. 34 times zero is zero, and that will be just as true in January 1980 as it is now. The quetsion whether S. 3 is in pursuance of the Constitution is the very same question as the question whether the "applications" now before Congress are valid Article V applications; the bill and the applications are drawn on exactly the same theory, and stand or fall together.

Now I have defended this view of mine in a number of places, but principally in three writings—a 1963 article in the Yale Law Journal, a 1972 publication (in the same Journal) of a letter to former Chairman Celler of House Judiciary, concerning the Ervin bill of that day (a bill substantially the same, on this point at least, as the present S. 3) and a letter this year to Senator Kennedy—a letter very recently published in the Oklahoma Law Review. Being one who loves to show mercy, I am happy to be able to tell you that these writings, products of a controversy spanning 16 years, add up to just 53 pages. I am herewith submitting photocopies of these three writings, for inclusion in the record. This is no hour for mock humility; I hope some of you will have time to read them. [Formal citations: (1) The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatening Disaster, 72 Yale L.J. 957 (1963); (2) Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 Yale L.J. 189 (1972); (3) Amendment By National Constitutional Convention; A Letter to a Senator, 32 Okla.L.Rev. 626 (1979).] Recently, writings by others have supported my position—notably articles by Professor Walter Dellinger of Duke University Law School, and by Professor Bruce Ackerman of the Yale Law School. The Chairman of this Committee has had a letter, I believe, from the distinguished constitutionalist Professor Charles Alan Wright, of the University of Texas Law School, dated 24 August of this year, and agreeing substantially with my position. I don't feel as lonesome as I used to.

But let me try here, orally, to hit the high spots, drawing on my own publications, and so marching on my own feet.

The question, first and last, is what is meant, in Article V, by the words, "* * * a Convention for proposing Amendments * * *" I suggest to you, Senators, that the best approach to ascertaining the plain meaning of these words is to ask what they would mean, without modification, in the procedural context in which they are intended to be used. As you know, in their pleadings lawyers sometimes "track the statute," phrasing allegations or prayers in the exact statutory language. Now suppose a state legislature, "tracking" Article V, were to transmit to Congress a paper saying: "Application is hereby made, by the legislature of this state, that Congress call a Convention for proposing Amendments"—the exact language of Article V—and stopping there. Two and only two questions could arise: First, would such an application be valid? Secondly, what would it mean?

First, the application, so worded, would of course be valid. Thirty-four such applications would oblige Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments (provided Congress could agree on the procedural and constituency specifications—and there would be a duty resting on each member of Congress to try so to agree). That would be true exactly because Article V is "tracked." How could it be that an application for the very thing the Article mentions, in the very words of the Article, would not be valid?

Secondly, the words used would mean, "a general, unlimited convention, to 'propose' such amendments as it thinks ought to be proposed." Since I can think of no possible basis for doubting this, I cannot know how to support this conclusion, beyond pointing to its obviousness. Perhaps one might go so far as to ask, "If not that, what would these words, mean, occurring alone in an application?"

Observe how putting the matter this way transforms and organizes the "plain meaning" and contextual issues. We are not talking, any longer, about which to two "plain meanings" the Article V language has. Unless one is prepared to contest the answers to my two questions regarding this "tracking" application, one must start with and stick to the position that the Article V language has one plain meaning that is beyond all doubt—that the words, "a Convention for proposing Amendmens," whatever else they may mean, plainly means "a general, unlimited convention."

(Let me put in a parenthesis here. The astonishing fact is that S. 3, in its crucial Section 2 and throughout, would actually make impermissible and ineffective the filing of the only kind of application that is certainly valid under Article V of the Constitution—namely, the application that "tracks" the Article verbatim. I urge you to consider, Senators, whether such a glaring and plain constitutional defect, in a bill that has been around as long as this one has, does not suggest some respectful skepticism about the soundness of the constitutional counsel that underlay its drafting.)

Establishment of this crucial point, about the "tracking" application for a general convention, quite changes the focus of inquiry. When we inquire now whether a state application for a limited convention asks for what Article V means, we are inquiring whether, in addition to its incontestably plain conferral, on the legislatures, of what is beyond all doubt a most significant power, very nearly an ultimate power, the power to force the call of a general constitutional convention, Article V is to be taken to give them, as well, a different power, not at all obviously meant by Article V—the power to force the call of a subject- or text-limited convention. In an inquiry concerning correct amendment procedures, where, more than anywhere else, very clear legitimacy is requisite, great clarity of justification should be looked for before one adds, to a fixed plain meaning, another meaning far from plain. There is, I submit, no justification at all for this addition of a second and different meaning, except the very late but now long-continued self-serving assumptions of the legislatures themselves.

I think I might usefully refer here to the 1974 American Bar Association Committee Report on this subject, for a sampling of some of the reasons that have been put forward for adding something else to the plain and obvious meaning of the Article V words.

That prestigeful Report, for example, invokes the always appealing concept of equality: "[T]he convention method (it says) * * * was intended to stand on an equal footing with the congressional method." But so it stands, if (and I think only if) Article V be taken to refer only to a general convention, with full freedom of proposal. Such a convention, as one of the two "proposing" bodies under Article V, would stand exactly on an "equal footing" with Congress, the other "proposing" body under Article V. Is not the equality to be sought, as to national concerns, an equality between the two national bodies to which the "proposing" function is given? This symmetrical equality is just what my own interpretation leads to.

The Bar Report puts forward a "greater includes the lesser" argument, seeing "no sound reason as to why they [the state legislatures] cannot invoke limitations on exercising * * * " their authority to procure a convention call. This argument ignores the fact—which underlies much of the Bar Report's other reasonings, and which underlies, indeed, the most crucial provisions of S. 3 itself—that a general convention on the one hand, and on the other a subject- or text-limited convention, are different not in degree but in kind. They are as different in kind as (1) the freedom to marry; and (2) the freedom to marry one of two or three or even a hundred people designated by somebody else. The power to force the call of a convention, and to dictate its agenda, is if anything a greater power than the power to force the call of a convention without dictating its agenda. That is exactly why the state legislatures are so eager to claim it.

I urge upon you that no such general considerations come close to being sufficient for our adding, to the plain meaning of the words, "a Convention for proposing Amendments," another meaning of great dubiety.

The Bar Committee Report goes through the Records of the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and brings in some material from state constitutions of the late eighteenth century. Quite obviously these historical matters are not for oral argument, even to such a patient Committee as this. I remain a man of mercy. But I do not want to draw this Committee's attention to my full (but I think not terribly prolix) argument of these historical points, in my letter of 1 June to Senator Kennedy, to which I have already referred. In those passages in that letter, I think I succeed in justifying to the hilt my statement, elsewhere in the same letter, that the Bar Committee Report, which "now exerts a powerful influence * * * is deeply flawed, and entirely fails to make its case * * *" I stand firmly by that statement; if you doubt its rightness—and of course you must—then I do invite your particular attention to those passages in my Kennedy letter in which I deal with the Bar Committee's handlings of the 1878 Convention, and of the early state constitutions. I believe you will be surprised.

I believe that, after your first surprise is over, you will never feel quite the same about this Bar Committee Report. I would refer you also to the historical analysis in Professor Dellinger's article, to which I have alluded; he and I, writing quite independently, seem to have wound up at about the same place at the same time.

Neither plain meaning, then, nor context, nor history permit our reading into these simple words, "a Convention for proposing Amendments," a power in the state legislatures, a power unsuspected for a good century after the Constitution began its life, to propose, in effect, amendments which the convention, nominally the proposing body, is merely to ratify. But I think one thing more needs to be said. It is the genius of American constitutional interpretation, to read our Constitution in a sensible way, as responsive to need. The following of this master maxim of interpretation is an expression of fidelity to the overriding and dominating intent of the summer of 1787 in Philadelphia—the intention that the document be so read as to work well. It is not irrelevant then, even as a matter of law, to point out how thoroughly all national needs for constitutional amendment are already provided for without our straining words to give the state legislatures this power, in effect, to propose amendments.

The other House of the Congress stands every two years for election, and represents the American people in their proportion. The Senate was so designed as to represent the states, one by one; each Senator represents and must answer to the whole people of one separate state. By the extraordinary majorities sensibly to be required for constitutional amendment, these two bodies can set in motion, and send out to the states, any amendment their constituencies want.

There is a strange mythical world in which Congress, so carefully built to represent the American people, by numbers and by states, is looked on as though it were an alien power. In fact, the constituencies of Congress and of the state legislatures are exactly the same, by constitutional command. The difference, and it is a distinct though an intangible one, is in the conception of office; though exactly the same people are represented here as in the legislatures, it is utterly impossible to imagine a proposal of an amendment to the Constitution being whooped and hollered through these Houses in the way in which that has happened in a good many legislatures.

The state legislator ought not to be expected to form just that blend of constituency concern and national concern which ideally characterizes the Congressman and the Senator, and which is, in my observation and judgment, often approximated in congressional and senatorial reality. But that difference between Congress and the legislatures suggests that by far the better place for the origination of piecemeal amendments is Congress, where the overall interest, as well as the constituency interest, is always in view. In refusing to put the new gloss that S. 3 would put on the words of Article V, we would not be shutting off a road in any way demonstrated to be needed, or likely to be needed. The whole history of the country fails to show any serious trouble that resulted from difficulty about amending the Constitution.

The route opened up by S. 3, and by the theory underlying it, is one which it is very hard to think of as either symmetrical with the traditional route, or as other than dangerous, if broad consensus, among the whole people, is what is wanted. States containing considerably less than 40 percent of the population could force a convention limited to proposing a given amendment. Under the "electoral college" plan of delegate apportionment in this bill, delegates representing less than a majority of the people could obediently do the nominal "proposing"; these delegates—and this is very important indeed in a democracy—could be people who (unlike all of you here, and all those across the Capitol) never have to face another election. Then, States containing as few as 40 percent of the people could ratify—a condition, by the way, which did not obtain in 1789. Of course, these extremes would not probably often be reached. But they mark the end of a continuous range of possibility, within which it could easily happen that amendment after amendment could be passed without anything like that heavy preponderance of affirmative desire that the other and always used method requires. Of course, that is exactly why this method of amendment is being pressed so hard.

Now these last considerations would not suffice to overcome or to nullify a clearly expressed constitutional command that state legislature applications, though subject- or text-limited, be given the Article V effect. That, however, is not the situation at all. I have mentioned these things only to show the utter fallaciousness of any argument which, in one form or another, says that a power of subject or text limitation must be imported into the words of Article V, because the importation of such a power, into that language, is politically desirable.

In summary on this principal point, there is no contextual warrant, no functional warrant, no historical warrant, no warrant in common sense, no warant at all, for discerning, in that Article V language which so plainly and inevitably refers to a general convention, an added and exceedingly dubious reference to something qualitatively different—a convention led in with blinders put on by the state legislatures. This conclusion, if you come to accept it, must lead not only to the rejection of S. 520, as not in pursuance of the Constitution, but also to the judgment that most or all of the pending applications are invalid, for the simple and sufficient reason that they do not ask for what Article V means to be asked for by the state legislatures, if they are to put Congress under the obligation to take the almost ultimately solemn step of summoning a national constitutional convention.

Let me add one final word: I have argued here (and more amply elsewhere) for the conclusion that an Article V convention must be entirely general, and that a state application asking for something other than that is void. I fully believe in this view. But it would be quite sufficient, for now, to hold to the far most modest (and I should think reasonably self-evident) proposition that, at the least, an application for the summoning of a national constitution convention, "for the purpose of proposing" a textually set-out or minutely described amendment, is a mere travesty of grown-up constitutionalism. Assembling a national convention, from Maine and Alaska, from Florida and Hawaii, for such a ministerial or rigorously channelled function is a bit of foolish pageantry one can by no stretch of fancy think the Constitution calls for. It reminds me of Henry VIII's congés d'élire, which gave cathedral chapters "leave to elect" a bishop—namely, the bishop designated by Henry VIII in the document in which "leave to elect" was given. The difference between a directly quoted amendment to be "proposed," and a minutely described amendment to be "proposed," is trivial. Many—I think most—of the current applications are of this kind. I hope at least Congress will not be intimidated by these. They cannot possibly be what Article V means, for Article V was drawn by serious people, and they should be regarded as obviously without force.

One more thought just here: I have heard it said, though I have not yet seen it printed, that, while these narrowly drawn applications, dictating strict limits to so-called "convention for proposing" one amendment described in advance, are not valid, in the sense that the attempted limitation is futile, nevertheless, Congress ought to treat them "hospitably" and call a convention anyway. After all, what is constitutional law between friends? Such thoughts must proceed from people that have not really read the applications that have been coming in. As to these real applications, the suggested "hospitality" is a hospitality that says, "Come right in, make yourself at home, but please leave your left leg outside." It is the "hospitality" of the spider to the fly. In the main the real applications we have make it entirely clear that the applying legislature very much desires not to have any but the severely limited convention applied for. (There would be nothing but irony in a "deference" to the state legislatures, that consisted in giving them what they have said they don't want.)

This bill, S. 520, founded as it is on an altogether wrong constitutional theory, has many smaller but still enormously important things wrong with it. In my 1972 published Letter to a Congressman, referred to and cited above, I discussed a number of these defects, in a virtually identical bill then pending before House Judiciary. Obviously, I cannot here go into these matters thoroughly, and there is perhaps little use going into them less than thoroughly. I think, however, that I ought just barely to allude to the principal ones among these defects, most respectfully asking that this Committee, before passing out such a bill, consider the very short supporting arguments which I have put in writing and put on this record:

1. This bill, as to the convention-summoning vote commanded in its pivotal Section 6, rests on the constitutionally impossible assumption that this Congress can bind the consciences of successor Congressmen and Senators, on questions of constitutional law and of policy.

2. Even if (as is not the case) the 96th Congress could bind its successors, it would be foolish to settle great constitutional and prudential questions at a time when public and professional attention are not focused on them, and when (with respect to the prudential questions) the conditions of the future are unknowable.

3. Quite without warrant, the bill gives maximum control over the whole process to the state legislatures, including presumptive referral to them, for ratification, of the very amendment they have already, in the normal colloquial sense, "proposed." This comes out very clearly in Section 12(c) of S. 520.

4. The bill's plan of representation at the convention is wholly indefensible. S. 250, Section 7(a) rests on analogy with the electoral college, which I have strongly defended in its own field of operation, but which has no contribution to make here. Generally, this bill fails to provide for that heavily preponderant consensus which ought to precede amendment of the Constitution.

5. The exclusion of the President from the process of calling a convention is flatly and obviously unconstitutional under Article I, Section 7, and the only question about this is how it could be that some who claim to be "strict constructionists" could espouse such a position.

6. The exclusion of state governors from the application process has no rational basis, and invades the normal powers of the states over their own procedures. (S. 520, Section 3(a))

7. The bill's withdrawal of questions of law from the judiciary is unwarranted, dangerous, impractical, and inconsonant with our system of government. Sections 3(b), 5(c), 10(b) and 13(c).

8. The provision for virtually automatic submission of amendments is reckless. Section 11(b) not only makes submission automatic unless within 90 days both Houses direct otherwise, but goes to the astounding length of providing that even this contrary direction shall be valid only if rested on the ground of the amendment's touching the wrong subject, or the convention's not following this one Act. Under this provision, however grossly and notoriously defective and corrupt the proceedings of a convention might have been, however catastrophic the effect of submission might be, the Congress can do nothing at all about it. If you doubt this reading of Section 11(b) in S. 520, please read it for yourself. Now of course no sensible Congressman or Senator of the future would regard such a provision as binding on him or her. The 96th Congress has no power to bind the 99th Congress. But the Administrator of General Services, to whose usually harmless routines this ticking atom bomb is committed by this bill, might very well feel obliged to act, if a resolution could be blocked for just ninety days, or perhaps even if the wrong ground were assigned by the Congress for its action. I ask you, Senators, to consider whether a bill that, after many drafts, over many years, contains such a reckless provision, can be looked on as anything but an attempt to strew flowers in the path of amendments taking this convention route, and to make their passage much easier than passage through the Houses of Congress by two-thirds votes.

I will permit myself one more word. I don't want to win this fight on any other ground than rightness. But it is fair to point out to you the solemn importance of the questions here. The national House of Representatives is the only body, anywhere on earth, wherein the whole American people are represented in proportion to their numbers. The waves of pseudo-populist rhetoric, that would somehow identify the state legislatures with "the people," break against this rock. (This identification, moreover, would have seemed absurd to the delegates in 1787 Philadelphia, who often, in their deliberations, contrasted the legislatures and the people.) About half the American people live in nine states. Three-quarters of the states (the ratifying number) can contain as few as forty percent of the people, and a ratifying combination might therefore easily contain less than half the people. Anything that builds up the power of the state legislatures, counted one by one, is not a facilitation of democracy but strongly in derogation of the American national democracy.

I am not attacking the senatorial system, which I believe in, and have recently defended against attack from another quarter. Nor do I wish to deny to the state legislatures any power that is legitimately theirs. But the population-ratio among states now runs as high as 65 or 70 to one, between five and six times as high as the highest ratio at the coming into effect of the Constitution. A nation believing in democracy ought to think a long time, and weigh evidence and argument very carefully, before it makes a new precedent, or passes a new law, that moves further toward equating the one to the 65. And a nation that believes itself to be a nation ought likewise to hesitate before acquiescing in the flow of new and crucially important power, as to national concerns, out to 50 legislatures meeting in 50 places.

There exists now, as I have shown, not the faintest hint of precedent for this step, whether as to this bill or as to action upon the pending applications. For the reasons I have given, I intensely hope that Congress will not now, after almost 200 years, proceed to make one.

I should be glad to try to deal with any questions anyone may have.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Senators.

Statement on Constitutional Convention Applications

(By Charles L. Black, Jr.)

(Excerpt from "The Constitution and the Budget", American Enterprise Institute (1980))

INTRODUCTORY

The Constitution's Article V provides for a method of amendment never till now used. "On Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States . . . Congress shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . " These proposals, to become effective, must be ratified by three-fourths of the States, just as is true of proposals passing through Congress, the method of proposing always used up to now.

Recently, many State Legislatures have passed resolutions asking Congress to call a Convention "for the purpose of proposing" some specific amendment, spelled out in detail. It now seems possible that one or more of these proposals will be the subject of convention applications from 34 States, the magic two-thirds.

We must separate our judgment on the merits of any particular amendment from our judgment on the legitimacy of the procedure. If we make a wrong precedent now, as to the meaning of Article V, we will open wide a door probably never to be closed. Before we pack our bags for this Convention, let's stop and ask "Is this trip really necessary?"

I think that the applications now on file are nullities, imposing no obligation on Congress. I think the Article V language means a "general Convention," to propose such amendments as seem good to that Convention. And I think that the state applications, to be effective, have to ask for that, and not for something radically different—a severely limited Convention. Applications asking for something other than what is meant by Article V are nullities, and thirty-four times zero is zero.

At the very least—and this is all that really must be decided now—each pending application for a Convention "for the purpose of proposing" some minutely described amendment is a travesty of anything the Framers of Article V could have conceived. Absolutely nothing faintly supports such an absurd distortion of a provision for a deliberative process. I hope Congress will not be intimidated by such "applications"; they place Congress under no obligation whatever.

The state of the controversy on these matters has been heavily affected by a Report by a Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee of the American Bar Association, "Amending of the Constitution by the Convention Method Under Article V" (1974) [hereinafter cited as Bar Report]. This Report commits itself to the view that applications for a subject-limited convention are valid.

I have reason to believe that this Report now exerts a powerful influence. It is my view that it is deeply flawed, and entirely fails to make its case on this issue. I shall cast this statement partly in the form of answers to some of its points. All the most important issues will thus be raised, and their current status indicated.

"PLAIN MEANING" AND CONTEXT

The question, first and last, is what is meant, in Article V, by the words, ". . . a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . " The best approach to ascertaining the plain meaning of these words is to ask what they would mean, without modification, in the procedural context in which they are intended to be used. Lawyers sometimes "track the statute," phrasing allegations or prayers in the exact statutory language. Suppose a state legislature, "tracking" Article V, were to transmit to Congress a paper saying: "Application is hereby made that Congress call a convention for proposing amendments"—the exact language of Article V. Two and only two questions could arise: First, would such an application be valid? Secondly, what would it mean?

I am tempted to say that these critical questions answer themselves. But there has been so much confusion on this that I will—though embarrassed by the obviousness of what I shall have to say—go a little further.

First, the application, so worded, would of course be valid. Thirty-four such applications would oblige Congress to call a convention (provided Congress could agree on the procedural and constituency specifications—and there would be a duty resting on each member of Congress to try so to agree). That would be true exactly because Article V is "tracked." How could it be that an application for the very thing the Article mentions, in the very words of the Article, would not be valid?

Secondly, the words used would mean "a general, unlimited convention, to 'propose' such amendments as it thinks proper." Since I can think of no possible basis for doubting this, I cannot know how to support this conclusion, beyond pointing to its obviousness. Perhaps one might go so far as to ask, "If not that, what would they mean?

Observe how putting the matter this way transforms the "plain meaning" and contextual issues. We are not talking, any longer, about which of two "plain meanings" the Article V language has. Unless one is prepared to contest the answers to my two questions regarding this "tracking" application, one must start from the position that the Article V language has one plain meaning that is beyond doubt—that "a Convention for proposing Amendments," whatever else it may mean, plainly means "a general, unlimited convention."

Establishment of this crucial point quite changes the focus of inquiry. When we inquire now whether a state application for a limited convention asks for what Article V means, we are inquiring whether, in addition to its incontestably plain conferral, on the legislatures, of a very significant power, the power to force the call of a general constitutional convention, Article V is to be taken to give them, as well, a different power, not at all obviously meant by Article V—the power to force the call of a limited convention. In an inquiry concerning correct amendment procedure, where, more than anywhere else, very clear legitimacy is requisite, great clarity of justification should be looked for before one adds, to plain meaning, another meaning far from plain.

The Bar Committee Report adopts, perhaps unconsciously, the rhetorical device of conceding that the general, unlimited convention is a possibility, but of doing so rather off-handedly, after having fully stated its case for the limited convention. But this order of presentation has to be reversed. We start with the plain fact that Article V means at least "a general convention." Seen from that perspective, the Report brings forth nothing near sufficiently weighty to support the addition of a second and far from plain meaning.

The Report invokes the concept of equality: "[T]he convention method . . . was intended to stand on an equal footing with the congressional method." But so it stands, even if Article V be taken to refer only to a general convention. Such a convention, as one of the two "proposing" bodies under Article V, would stand exactly on an "equal footing" with Congress, the other "proposing" body under Article V. The equality to be sought, as to national concerns, is an equality between the two national bodies to which the "proposing" function is given.

The Bar Report [p. 16] puts forward a "greater includes the less" argument, seeing "no sound reason as to why they [the state legislatures] cannot invoke limitations on exercising . . ." their authority to procure a convention call. This argument ignores the fact—which underlies much of the Bar Report's other reasonings—that a general convention and a limited convention are different not in degree but in kind. They are as different in kind as (1) the freedom to marry; and (2) the freedom to marry one of two or three people designated by somebody else.

The Report argues [p. 16] that Article V must mean a limited convention, because otherwise the state legislatures would be "discouraged" from applying for conventions. This argument rests on a poorly concealed begging of the question. Only if we assume in advance that limited conventions are meant by Article V is there anything improper or regrettable in legislatures' being "discouraged" by their not being available. We are all "discouraged" in some ways by the state of the law.

But—more fundamentally—what are the legislatures being "discouraged" from doing? From asking for a general convention? But the assumption of the Bar Report is that they are "discouraged" from that already, by the very nature of the general convention. From asking for limited conventions? But if that is what is meant the argument is a squirrel-cage; the very thing we are talking about is whether the legislatures are entitled at all, as a matter of law, to force the call of limited conventions. The Committee seems to be saying that, if it be held that the sound law of the matter is that Article V does not empower the legislatures to force the call of limited conventions, they will be discouraged from asking for these. Quite.

Rember, too, that the supposed "discouragement" is to arise from a fear of the very thing—a general convention—that is incontestably meant by the Article V language, provided one agrees with the arguments with which I began this section.

(There is, by the way, a startling paradox here. Since three-quarters of the state legislatures must, under the usual procedure, ratify any amendment "proposed" by a general convention, it is a little hard to explain a great fear, on the part of these same legislatures, that they may be overwhelmed by unwanted amendments. Whom are they afraid of? I leave the resolving of this paradox to those who are so vigorously supporting these state-legislature applications. The problem is only shifted by the thought, doubtless not likely of frequent realization, that state conventions may be designated by Congress as the ratifying bodies; fear of the headlong folly of such conventions is a fear of the people who will elect them. Why, indeed, is one so afraid of the general national convention? Is it well to trust any part at all of the amendment process to people who, you think, would go wild if you turned them loose?)

These Bar Report arguments are poor stuff in themselves. To put them in the context I believe to be established by the opening paragraphs of this section they are obviously not of a weight sufficient to support a second meaning, far less than plain, in addition to the quite plain meaning of the phrase, ". . . a Convention for proposing Amendments . . ."

I stress once again that, if I am right about the meaning of the Article V language, applications for a limited convention are not application for the thing meant by Article V, are therefore not valid Article V applications, and so impose no obligation on Congress.

THE DEBATES IN THE 1787 CONVENTION

The Bar Report's treatment of these should be set out in full:

"The debates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 make clear that the convention method of proposing amendments was intended to stand on an equal footing with the congressional method. As Madison observed: Article V 'equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other.' The 'state' method, as it was labeled, was prompted largely by the belief that the national government might abuse its powers. It was felt that such abuses might go unremedied unless there was a vehicle of initiating amendments other than Congress.

"The earliest proposal on amendments was contained in the Virginia Plan of government introduced in the Convention on May 29, 1787 by Edmund Randolph. It provided in resolution 13 "that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislatiure ought not to be required thereto." A number of suggesstions were advanced as to a specific article which eventuated in the following clause in the Convention's Committee of Detail report of August 6, 1787:

> "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose."

"This proposal was adopted by the Convention on August 30. Gouverneur Morris's suggestion on that day that Congress be left at liberty to call a convention 'whenever it pleased' was not accepted. There is reason to believe that the convention contemplated under this proposal 'was the last step in the amending process, and its decisions did not require any ratification by anybody.'

"On September 10, 1787 Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts moved to reconsider the amending provision, stating that under it 'two thirds of the States may obtain a Convention, a majority of which can bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the State-Constitutions altogether.' His motion was supported by Alexander Hamilton and other delegates. Hamilton pointed to the difficulty of introducing amendments under the Articles of Confederation and stated that 'an easy mode should be established for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new System.' He felt that Congress would be 'the first to perceive' and be 'most sensible to the necessity of Amendments,' and ought also to be authorized to call a convention whenever two-thirds of each branch concurred on the need for a convention. Madison also criticized the August 30 proposal, stating that the vagueness of the expression 'call a convention for the purpose' was sufficient reason for reconsideration. He then asked: 'How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?' As a result of the debate, the clause adopted on August 30 was dropped in favor of the following provision proposed by Madison:

> "The Legislature of the U.S. whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several states, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U.S."

"On September 15, after the Committee of Style had returned its report, George Mason strongly objected to the amending article on the ground that both modes of initiating amendments depended on Congress so that 'no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive. . . .' Gerry and Gouverneur Morris then moved to amend the article 'so as to require a convention on application of' two-thirds of the states. In response Madison said that he 'did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application.' He added that he had no objection against providing for a convention for the purpose of amendments 'except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided.'

"Thereupon, the motion by Morris and Gerry was agreed to and the amending article was thereby modified so as to include the convention method as it now reads. Morris then successfully moved to include in Article V the proviso that 'no state, without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.' "

As to the first paragraph: I have already dealt with the "equal footing" point. I don't know of anything in the 1787 debates at Philadelphia that supports the statement with which the above quotation opens. I dare say the Bar Committee didn't either, for the Madison quote is not from the Philadelphia records, but from the Federalist. Nor does it weigh very much on either side of the present controversy; the origination "of the amendment of errors" might be accomplished by forcing the call of a general convention. As to what "prompted" the "state" method, or who on earth "labeled" it that, there is little or no evidence; the Bar Report cites none. The last sentence of the paragraph weighs nothing on the present scale; a general convention would of course be a "vehicle of initiating amendments other than Congress," quite as well as would a limited convention. More so.

For whatever reason, the Bar Report, in mentioning the Virginia Plan's provision for amendment without the assent of the "National Legislature, does not tell us that this latter provision, excluding Congress, was repeatedly postponed, by vote after vote, and never passed, so that the Committee of Detail went into session with nothing resolved on except that there should be "Provision . . . for the Amendment of the Articles of Union . . ." [2 Farrand's Records 133]. The suggestion that any policy at all emerges from all this would be (or is?) simply ridiculous.

The rest of the Bar Report's just-quoted treatment of the 1787 Philadelphia debates is of a not unknown genre of "legislative history"—the kind that tells you a few things here and there, but never quite gets down to explaining why they prove what they are obviously put forward to prove. Marching on my own feet, I will discuss first the most critical juncture, the action on September 15, 1787, by which the language now under scrutiny was added. I think it well to put before your eyes the whole (very short) episode, as reported by Madison, beginning with the provision as it stood before the final change:

"Art— V. The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the (1 & 4 clauses in the 9.) section of article I .

"Mr. Sherman expressed his fears that three fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether or depriving them of their equality in the Senate. He thought it reasonable that the proviso in favor of the States importing slaves should be extended so as to provide that no State should be affected in its internal police, or deprived of its equality in the Senate.

"Col: Mason thought the plan of amending the Constitution exceptionable & dangerous. As the proposing of amendments is in both the modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second, ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case.

"Mr. Govr. Morris & Mr. Gerry moved to amend the article so as to require a Convention on application of ⅔ of the Sts

"Mr Madison did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application. He saw no objection however against providing for a Convention for the purpose of amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided.

"The motion of Mr. Govr Morris and Mr. Gerry was agreed to nem: con (see: the first part of the article as finally past)." [2 Farrand Records, 629–30] (footnotes omitted)

You will note that not only Mason but also Sherman objected to the amending article, as it then stood. The Bar Report mentions only Mason; I can't think why. While Mason, broadly, thought amendment was too difficult under the article as it stood, Sherman thought, broadly, that it was too easy, and therefore dangerous. He feared, specifically, the amending power of the States. Why does the Bar Committee think the immediately following alteration (which was to the present form) was proposed by Morris and Gerry to meet Mason's fears, and not to meet Sherman's fears. As Madison immediately saw and said, the Morris-Gerry proposal did not respond to Mason's fears at all, so far as Congress's role went. The proposal, instead, put another body, the convention, between the state legislatures and the passage of an amendment to the Constitution. This interposition of another, nationally-oriented body might more plausibly be seen as a response to Sherman's fears of "the States."

In only one way was this change possibly responsive to Mason's speech. He was, you will note, afraid that "the people" could not obtain amendments they wanted. If any one thing is certain about 1787 thinking, it is that "the people" and "the legislatures" were not thought to be the same thing—as some recent blusterings seem to assume they are. On the other hand, it was conventions that were seen as the organs of "the people." This is why the Constitution was sent out for ratification by conventions rather than by the legislatures. I am not guessing; this thought occurs at many points, but is best expressed by Madison, on June 5, 1787, in defending this submission to conventions: ". . . [H]e thought it indispensable that the new Constitution should be ratified in the most unexceptional form, and by the supreme authority of the people themselves." [1 Farrand's Records 123] That is what he thought a convention embodied.

It is possible then, that the insertion of a convention mode of proposal may have been conceived as a partial satisfaction of Mason's concern about "the people." But if that is true, then the suggestion is not that such a body, the visible organ of "the people," was to be led in with blinders put on by the legislatures, who were contrasted with "the people" in the discussion of the mode of ratification to be chosen for the new Constitution. Mason's fears, if they concerned the power of "the people," would be best answered by a provision for a general convention, wherein "the people" would have most ample scope of authority.

It is to be noted, moreover, that Gerry (who co-proposed the present language) and Mason (whom it was supposed to mollify) were both, some minutes later on the same day, going to refuse to sign the new Constitution on the ground that a new "general Convention" was not to be absolutely mandatory, as they thought it should be. How likely is it that people so minded would be pushing on the same day for subject-limited conventions? Is it not more likely that, disappointed in not getting an absolutely mandatory second general convention, they were pushing for the next best thing—the chance to get such a general convention by legislative applications?

The only other passages of any importance concern the Committee of Detail's August 6 provision (quoted by the Bar Report, above) and the September 10 change therein.

The Bar Report rightly sees that the August 6 proposal was for a convention, to be summoned on application of two-thirds of the legislatures, that would have final power to amend, without "ratification by anybody." [Bar Report p. 12] What the Bar Committee seems not to have seen is that, even if this provision did allow the legislatures to limit such a convention to a particular subject or proposal, the propriety of that dispensation, in the case of a convention with final power, needing no ratification, is a different thing, by light-years, from the propriety or necessity of limiting a convention whose proposals do have to be ratified. The two things have nothing to do with each other.

Above all, the Bar Committee does not seem impressed by the fact that this August 6 proposal, on which they seem to be placing some sort of reliance, was rejected and thrown out, on September 10, on the grounds that it gave too much power to two-thirds of the states (Gerry) and that "The State Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers" (Hamilton). [2 Farrand's Reports 557–558] (Gerry, be it remembered, was a co-mover of the language now in Article V.)

The most curious thing, confounding confusion, is that the phrase "for an amendment of this Constitution" (see the August 6 provision, quoted in the Bar Report, above) probably meant "for a process of amendment of . . ."—using the word "amendment" to mean this process of amending or its general result, rather than what we would call, in a different phrase, "an amendment to" the Constitution. I have three contemporary examples of this usage. Williamson, a delegate, wrote James Iredell, on July 22, 1787, from Philadelphia, that he hoped the whole "system" agreed on in Philadelphia "may fairly be called an amendment of the Federal Government." [3 Farrand's Records 61] Charles Pinckney, in the South Carolina ratification debates, spoke of the aim in Philadelphia as "the formation of a new, or the amendment of the existing system." [3 Farrand's Records 248]. In Federalist No. 40, Madison refers to the Virginia proposal of the Annapolis Convention as being "toward a partial amendment of the confederation." The use of the word "partial" implies that "an amendment of the confederation," without that word, would have meant "an unlimited process of alteration." By no possibility does even the phrase "toward a partial amendment," applied to the Virginia initiative for Annapolis, refer to a specific alteration. "An amendment of the Constitution" did not mean the same thing to these people as "an amendment to the Constitution"; I would be interested in seeing examples to the contrary.

Now what does all this prove? Of course, next to nothing. I have been through all this material only because the Bar Committee seem somehow to be assuming it helps their case, without ever saying how or why. I submit that my discussion destroys that assumption. And I think that some of the points I have made may help my own case a little. But the over-riding fact is that, however desperately we would like to, we don't know very much about what underlay each vote in Philadelphia in 1787. The records are obviously fragmentary; it is known they became more so as the summer wore on, toward that September 15 on which the crucial vote was taken, two days before fatigued adjournment.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY RECORD

In an earlier writing of mine on this subject, in the Yale Law Journal, I said that the notion that state legislatures may limit the subject-matter in their applications for conventions was nothing but a product of the creative imagination of the state legislatures themselves in the twentieth century. I used Brickfield's tables, there cited, to establish that, until around the turn of our cenury, through all the turmoils until that time, nothing but general-convention applications were transmitted to Congress by the States. This, if true, is very important, because it shows that, for more than a century after the Constitution went into effect, his Article V provision was not generally understood to empower the state legislatures to set the agenda of any convention they applied for, or to apply for a convention so limited in agenda.

The Bar Report [pp. 59–69] presents data on former state applications that confirm my former statement. As far as these eyes can make out, all applications are classified as "general" by the Bar Report, until 1893. There was one that year for direct election of Senators, and another such in 1895. The next subject-matter limited application was in our own century. (The Bar Report cites a source of their own, an unpublished thesis not previously known to me, which agrees with my own conclusion [82 Yale L.J. at p. 202] that the 1833 Alabama memorial, dealing with "nullification" was not really an Article V application at all. And for some reason they do not put a 1790 application for "revision of the Constitution" under the "general" category, where of course it belongs.)

Think what this means. Through the controversies over the Alien and Sedition Laws, over the Embargo, over the "internal improvements" bills, over the Bank of the United States, over the early fugitive slave laws, not one single state legislature acted as though it thought it had the power to force Congress to call a convention limited to one of these topics. It did not even occur to Kentucky and Virginia, in the 1790's, when they were busy with "interposition" against what they felt to be unconstitutional actions of Congress, to go at the matter via a limited Article V convention. Even in the great nullification and slavery contests, of the 1830's and 1860's respectively, the states that submitted applications made them "general," according to the Bar Report's own sources and tabulations.

This is powerful evidence of an original and long-continued understanding, broken (except for the two 1890's applications mentioned above) only in this century, when some state legislatures thought up a bright (and entirely self-serving) notion.

CONCLUSION

There is no good argument and no solid evidence to support the Bar Report. Nothing so much as tends to sustain their conclusion except the prestige of the Committee's members, and that is not enough to be decisive on a fundamental question regarding ultimate constitutional power.

Let me add one final word: I have argued here for the conclusion that an Article V convention must be entirely general, and that a state application asking for something other than that is void. I fully believe in this view. But it would be quite sufficient, for now, to hold to the far more modest proposition that, at the least, an application "for the purpose of proposing" a minutely described amendment is a mere travesty of grownup constitutionalism. Assembling a national convention for such a ministerial or rigorously channelled function is a bit of foolishness one can by no stretch of fancy think the Constitution calls for. It reminds me of Henry VIII's congés d'elire, which gave cathedral chapters the "right to elect" a bishop—namely, the bishop designated by Henry VIII. The difference between a directly quoted amendment to be "proposed," and a clearly described amendment to be "proposed," is trivial. Many of the current applications are of this kind. I hope at least Congress will not be intimidated by these. They cannot possibly be what Article V means, and should be regarded as obviously without force.

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF ARTICLE V: A THREATENED DISASTER

By

CHARLES L. BLACK, JR.

Reprinted from the Yale Law Journal
Volume 72, Number 5, April 1963

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF ARTICLE V: A THREATENED DISASTER

CHARLES L. BLACK, JR.†

THREE proposals for amending the Constitution have recently come from the Council of State Governments, and are being propelled down the never before used alternative route of article V—the route via state applications to Congress for the calling of a convention.[1] Of the three, one (which would establish a Court of the Union, composed of the state Chief Justices in all their multitude, to meet on extraordinary occasions to review judgments of the Supreme Court)[2] is so patently absurd that it will probably sink without trace. Another, eradicating[3] Baker v. Carr[4] concerns a special subject, and hence does not generally affect the federal power or the whole shape of the Union. The third is of supreme interest to students of constitutional law. Its adoption would effect a constitutional change of a higher order of importance than any since 1787—if one excepts (and that only doubtfully) the de facto change implicit in the result of the Civil War.

It is wonderful that this proposal—which has already commended itself to a number of state legislatures[5]—has been so little noticed. This is doubtless because the proposed change is in procedure. But a change in the procedure of constitutional amendment—unless it is purely formal, and this one is not—is a change in the distribution of ultimate power. The proposed article V, if adopted, would make it easily possible for a proportion of the American people no greater than that which supported Landon in 1936 to impose on the rest of the country any alteration whatever in the Constitution. The people who could do this would be, by and large, those inhabitants of the less populous states

†Henry R. Luce Professor of Jurisprudence, Yale Law School.

1. All are set out in full, with an account of their espousal by the Council, in Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 36 STATE GOV'T 10 (1963).

2. Id. at 13-14.

3. By abolishing all substantive federal guarantees against malapportionment, thus making action by Congress as well as by Court impossible, and by withdrawing the subject entirely from federal judicial power. 36 STATE GOV'T at 12.

4. 369 U.S. 186 (1962) (fourteenth amendment claim against state legislative malapportionment held within federal judicial jurisdiction).

5. According to information informally received, the legislatures of Arkansas, Florida, Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Wyoming have already passed the Resolution set out in text accompanying note 13 infra. In about an equal number of states, one house has passed it.

who reside in the districts that are over-represented in their own state legislatures. "Unto him that hath it shall be given." This component of the population—to which we are all accustomed to conceding a veto power on constitutional amendment, as on many other matters—would under the proposed plan have something very different from a veto power. It would have the affirmative power of forcing its will on the majority, as to anything which may be the subject of constitutional amendment—that is to say, as to everything. Such a proposal ought to be scrutinized with the very greatest care, and the same careful scrutiny should be given to the method by which its proponents hope to coerce its submission to the state legislatures for ratification as an amendment.

The Proposed New Article V.

If this proposal were to win its way through, article V would read as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states. Whenever applications from the Legislatures of two-thirds of the total number of states of the United States shall contain identical texts of an amendment to be proposed, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall so certify, and the amendment as contained in the application shall be deemed to have been proposed, without further action by Congress. No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.[6]

It may be convenient to the reader to have set out the text of the present article V:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.[7]

The proposed plan, it will be seen, abolishes the (never used) "convention" way of amendment, and puts in its place a method wholly under the control, as to substance and procedure, of the state legislatures. It does this by making it mandatory that Congress submit for ratification any amendment called for by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, and by simultaneously taking away Congress' power to elect the state convention mode of ratification.

---

6. 36 State Gov't 11-12 (1963); see text accompanying note 13 infra.
7. U.S. Const. art. V.

At present, an amendment may be passed (and all have actually passed in this way) if two-thirds of each national house wants it, and if it is ratified by three-fourths of the states in the manner chosen by Congress. One might also pass if (on proper application of two-thirds of the states) a convention, summoned by Congress and having such structure as Congress thought wise to give it, proposed the amendment, and if it were then ratified in the manner chosen by Congress.

Along the new route opened by the proposed article V, Congress would control neither substance nor procedure. Three-fourths of the state legislatures, without the consent of any other body, could change the presidency to a committee of three, hobble the treaty power, make the federal judiciary elective, repeal the fourth amendment, make Catholics ineligible for public office, and move the national capital to Topeka. These are (in part at least) cartoon illustrations. But the cartoon accurately renders the de jure picture, and seems exaggerated only because we now conceive that at least some of these actions have no appeal to anybody. Some amendments—e.g., something like the Bricker Amendment—would be very likely of early passage. At present the main dangers would be to civil and political rights, to national conduct of foreign relations, and to the federal taxing power. But (particularly since the proposed change would be absolutely irreversible, thirteen states being enough to block its reversal) the cartoon does not exaggerate the possibilities of the long future. A country in which the large majority would have to dread and sometimes submit to constitutional innovations appealing only to a minority could not call itself, even poetically, a democracy, and the possible tensions between consensus and Constitution would be dangerous in the extreme.

At present, when an amendment passes the House and the Senate by two-thirds, there is fair ground for the inference that there is national consensus upon it; at least the means of ascertaining that crucial fact, though rough, are fairly well adapted to the end. If the national convention method, under the present article V, were ever to be used, Congress, in setting up the convention, could ensure that it be so representative as to be likely to express a national consensus. Congress even retains control over the ratification process; if the state legislatures were in its view to come to be dangerously unrepresentative, Congress could provide for ratification by state conventions so chosen as accurately to reflect the views of each state's people. Properly used, the present article V can ensure that no constitutional change be effected which is disliked, deplored, or detested by a distinct majority of the American people.

What is the situation under the proposed new article V? Here one must talk numbers—even statistics of a rough kind. Let us note first that the thirty-eight least populous states, whose legislatures could under the proposed article V repeal the full faith and credit clause, contain about 40 per cent of the country's population.[8] That really ought to be enough. That these particular people should, in the name of federalism, have a veto power, is acceptable; at least it is accepted beyond change. What rational ground could there be for giving them, in addition, the power affirmatively to govern the rest of the people?

8. Calculated from the 1960 Census, 1963 WORLD ALMANAC 255. The author is ill at reckoning, but the figures given here are not far off.

But of course one cannot stop there. The power given by the new article V is not in the states but in their legislatures. It cannot be too strongly stressed that one need not approve of Baker v. Carr [9] in order to accept the fact, as a fact, that the state legislatures do not accurately represent the people of their states—that a majority in each house of most state legislatures can be made up of votes representing a distinct minority of the state's people. This situation may have a certain romantic appeal;[10] even if one does not appreciate its beauty, one may not think the remedying of it a fit job for the federal courts. But neither of these judgments supports the conclusion that the uncontrolled power of federal constitutional amendment should be turned over to bodies so constituted.

So back to numbers: In the best table accessible,[11] relevant data are given for thirty-four of the thirty-eight least populous states of the Union. On the average, it takes 38 per cent of the people in one of these states to form the constituencies of enough state senators or representatives to pass a measure through the more accurately representative house of the state legislature. Taking this figure as good enough for present purposes, if the proposed article V were in force, the income tax could be abolished, by repeal of the sixteenth amendment, if about 15 per cent of the American people were represented by legislators who desired that result.[12]

Now of course it can be replied that such a coalition cannot be formed without the implication that a good many other people are like-minded with it. Granted. But the margin is enormous. If the right 30 per cent of the people favored some amendment, its chance of passage would be very great indeed, whatever the other 70 per cent might think. And it is very important that the distortion is not random but systematic—it is a distortion operating steadily in favor of rural districts and small towns. It is not too much to say that the proposed article V would enable the inhabitants of such districts to effect any change they persistently wanted in the Constitution of the United States. They may be better and wiser than the rest of us; perceptive fiction and the exacter sociology are not clear on this, but let us assume it is so. Does that justify turning the Constitution over to them, affirmatively and negatively, to keep or to change as they will?

Reference was made above to the result of the Civil War. The proposed article V rests on the theory, at least in part, that that result ought to be revised. The several states now have a crucial part in the process of constitutional amendment; the new proposal would (as far as one alternative method is con-

9. 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

10. See Perrin, In Defense of Country Votes, 52 YALE REV. 16 (1962), especially at 24.

11. Compiled by The National Municipal League, N.Y. Times, March 28, 1962, p. 22, col. 3.

12. This figure is arrived at by taking 38% (the percentage of people in the relevant states necessary, on the average, to control the legislature) of 40% (the percentage of the American people residing in the thirty-eight least populous states).

cerned) give it entirely into their hands, setting at nothing the concept of national consensus among the American people considered as a whole people. It is a proposal for state rule only, on the basis of state-by-state count only, and through state institutions only, with the popular and national principles altogether submerged. If history has any lessons, our history teaches that such a location of ultimate power would put us in mortal danger.

It should only be added that this proposal, as a corollary to its discard of the concept of national consensus as a prerequisite to amendment, does away with national consideration and debate as a part of the amendment process. Under the present article V, any amendment must be examined and considered in a fully national forum—whether Congress or Convention—before it goes out to the several states. Such debate focusses national attention on something which is above all of national concern. Under the proposal, the only public debate would be in fifty separate state legislatures; the rest of the process would be ministerial only. This short-circuiting of national deliberation is actually one of the most offensive features of the plan.

The Mode of Proposal

The plan of the proponents of this amendment is to see it introduced into each of the state legislatures, in the form of a resolution in the following terms:

> A (Joint) Resolution*
> Memorializing Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to Article V thereof.
>
> Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring, that this Legislature respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.
>
> "Article ———
>
> "Section 1. Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows:
>
> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states. Whenever applications from the Legislatures of two-thirds of the total number of states of the United States shall contain identical texts of an amendment to be proposed, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall so certify, and the amendment as contained in the application shall be

*This resolution should be in whatever technical form the state employs for a single resolution of both houses of the legislature which does not require the Governor to approve or veto.[13] deemed to have been proposed, without further action by Congress. No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

13. 36 State Gov't 11-12 (1963).

"Section 2. This Article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states within seven years from the date of its submission."

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that if Congress shall have proposed an amendment to the Constitution identical with that contained in this resolution prior to January 1, 1965, this application for a convention shall no longer be of any force or effect.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each member of the Congress from this State.

The hope is that, if two-thirds of the legislatures submit such a petition, Congress will consider itself bound, under the present article V, to call the "convention" requested.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

A number of questions arise; some of these will be considered here—not as judicial questions, but as questions sure to come into the mind of any Congressman or Senator conscientiously seeking to do his duty.

Is the Document Quoted Above an "Application" Within the Meaning of Article V?

Article V lays down that Congress shall "call a Convention for proposing Amendments," on "Application" of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. The "Application" which can raise a conscientious obligation on Congress' part must be one that asks it to "call a Convention for proposing Amendments." (Emphasis added.) A good case can be made for the proposition that the quoted document is not such an "Application," but an application for something quite different—for a "Convention" to consider whether an amendment already proposed shall be voted up or down.[14]

The process of "proposal" by Congress, contained in the first alternative of article V, obviously includes the process of plenary deliberation upon the whole problem to which the amendment is to address itself. It entails choice among the whole range of alternatives, as to substance and wording. It is "proposal" in the most fully substantial sense, where the proposer controls and works out the content and form of the proposition. It is very doubtful whether the same word two lines later, in the description of the second alternative, ought to be taken to denote a mechanical take-it-or-leave-it process. Under the procedure followed by the draftsmen and proponents of the present "application," the "convention" would be in true function a part of the process of ratification.

14. Even this much is more than the Resolution literally allows; it asks for a convention "for the purpose of proposing" the amendment set out. Is it possible that the sponsors think the convention's role can be made ministerial?

59-609 O - 80 - 14

This doubt is reinforced by the fact that the delegates who approved this language at Philadelphia were just completing the work of a "convention" of their own. Is it not likely that to them the phrase "convention for proposing amendments" meant a convention with a mandate somewhat like the one under which they had worked—a mandate to consider a set of problems and seek solutions?

The difference here is not merely formal, but sounds the deeps of political wisdom. The issue is whether it is contemplated that measures dominantly of national interest should be malleable under debate and deliberation at a national level, before going out to the several states. Such a conception of the "convention" contemplated by article V makes the second route to amendment symmetrical with the first, in the vital respect that, under both, the national problem must be considered as a problem, with a wide range of possible solutions and an opportunity to raise and discuss them all in a body with national responsibility and adequately flexible power. The Congressman or Senator persuaded by this distinction would be justified in concluding that the present "applications," even if two-thirds of the states joined, was not of the sort that obliged Congress to call a convention.[15]

Assuming these "applications" are not within article V, it may still be suggested that a sort of "reformation" might be applied—that Congress, even if not persuaded that the present applications asked for the thing contemplated by article V, ought to call such convention as it thinks it would have been obliged to call if the applications had been of the right sort. This seems clearly wrong, for several reasons. Generally, a high degree of adherence to exact form, at least in matters of importance, is desirable in this ultimate legitimating process; a constitutional amendment ought to go through a process unequivocally binding on all. Congress is given no power to call a constitutional convention when it wants to, or thinks that on the general equities perhaps it should; if Congress desires an amendment, article V very clearly tells how that desire is to be made known. Congress' power as to conventions is not discretionary but strictly conditional, and if the condition is not met Congress not only need not but may not call a valid convention.

It is, moreover, illegitimate to infer, from a state's having asked for a "convention" to vote a textually-given amendment up or down, that it desires some other sort of convention. It is not for Congress to guess whether a state which asks for the one kind of "convention" wants the other as a second choice. Altogether different political considerations might govern.

---

15. It should be noted that another and quite independent defect might be thought to vitiate these "applications." They demand the calling of a convention "for the purpose of proposing" an amendment which is, by its own text, to be ratified by the state legislatures; Congress can be under a duty to comply with these applications, then, only if such applications in sufficient number can place it under a duty to abdicate its own discretionary function, as clear as anything in the Constitution, of choosing between the modes of ratification, whatever may have been the mode of proposal. It is certain, on the face of Article V, that no applications from any number of state legislatures can put Congress under a moral or legal obligation to do that. This quite patent error ought to lead to some suspicion of the whole theory on which these applications are drawn—the theory that Congress and the desired "convention" can be very narrowly confined in function, and that their work can be done for them in advance by the state legislatures.

On the whole, then, no member of Congress could be held to have disregarded a conscientious obligation if he took the view that the "application" quoted above, even if sponsored by two-thirds of the state legislatures, did not make obligatory a convention call. Indeed, he might conclude that Congress would be exceeding its powers in calling such a "convention," the condition to such a call, on a fair construction of article V, not having been met.

If Congress is Obligated to Call a Convention, What Sort Must it Call?

The short fact here is that neither text nor history give any real help. When and if the article V condition is met, Congress "shall call a Convention . . ."; that is all we know. Fortunately, that is all we need to know, for the "necessary and proper" clause,[16] and the common sense of McCulloch v. Maryland,[17] give all the constitutional guidance required. Since Congress is to call the convention, and since no specifications are given, and since no convention can be called without specifications of constituency, mode of election, mandate, majority necessary to "propose," and so on, then Congress obviously may and must specify on these and other necessary matters as its wisdom guides it. (It may be noted that continuing control by Congress of the whole amendment process must have been contemplated, for Congress is given, under article V, the option between modes of ratification, no matter what the method of proposal.)

If this is accepted, then no Senator or Representative is bound to vote for a convention call which in its form fails to safeguard what he believes to be vital national interests. Specifically, insistence would be thoroughly justified on an allocation of voting power by population rather than by states, on the election at large of a state's delegation or its choice in fairly apportioned districts, and on federal conduct of the election of delegates, to prevent racial and other discrimination. Provision for a "two-thirds" rule might well be thought wise, in order to ensure the same kind of consensus on this branch of article V as on the other. Since the adoption of this proposed amendment would make easily possible the future amendment of the Constitution without anything like popular consent, it is thoroughly reasonable for Congress to insist that this surrender be fully voluntary for at least this generation, unless (as is not true) some positive constitutional command to the contrary prevents.

It will probably be argued that the voting in any convention must be by states, since the voting in the original Constitutional Convention was by states. On this point, the analogy is not persuasive. The states then were in a position of at least nominal sovereignty, and were considering whether to unite. The result of the Convention would have bound no dissenting state or its people; the same was true of the acceptance of the new Constitution by the requisite nine. All these conditions are now reversed. We are already in an indissoluble union; there is a whole American people. The question in an amending convention now would be whether innovations, binding on dissenters, were to be offered for ratification. The propriety of a vote by states in the one convention surely cannot settle its rightness in the other.

16. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8.
17. 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).

Has the President a Part in the Convention Call Process?

Article I, section 7, clause 3 is as plain as language can be:

> Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Clearly, this language literally applies to actions of Congress taken under article V.

In Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[18] it was contended that the eleventh amendment had not been validly proposed, since the resolution proposing it had not been sent to the President. Against this and other arguments, the Court, in a brief opinion not touching substance, upheld the amendment. In the course of argument, Justice Chase remarked: "The negative of the president applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation; he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the constitution."[19]

Since that time, the practice has been not to send amendment proposals to the President. These precedents apply, of course, only to the first method prescribed by article V, since that is the only method that has been used. Hollingsworth v. Virginia is inherently weak, as the unreasoned decision must be. It introduces an exception by fiat into the entirely clear language of article I, section 7. But it need not be unfrocked in its own parish, since it is possible that the Court may have had in mind a ground for taking the first alternative of article V out of the veto process; since the congressional proposal must be by two-thirds in each house, it may have been thought that the requirement for overriding the veto was already met. This is not perhaps a very good ground, but the point about it here is that it would not exist at all if Congress, by simple majorities, called a "convention" under article V. Unless some other ground (better than Justice Chase's mere assertion) be stated for holding the contrary, it would seem that such a congressional action would fall as clearly as may be under the terms of article I, section 7, clause 3.

If this is right, then the grounds upon which the President might exercise his veto need be no less than those proper in the case of a Congressman voting on a convention call. If the President believed the structure and mandate of the "convention" significantly wrong, and dangerous to the national well-being, then he would surely be justified in vetoing the Resolution.

---

18. 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

19. Id. at 380 n.a.

Summary

This proposal for amending article V is dangerous. It is to be hoped that it will be defeated in the state legislatures, but they are, after all, voting for or against increasing their own powers. If "Applications," in the form quoted above, reach Congress in sufficient number to force the issue, there is still authentic constitutional ground on which to stand. It may be that these "applications" call for something not contemplated by the second alternative in article V, and hence need be treated, at most, only as memorials to Congress to propose this amendment, a plea addressed entirely to discretion. It is as certain as any such matter can be that no Congressman or Senator is bound to vote for a convention call, even on impeccably proper application, wherein prudent conditions as to mandate, structure, constituency, voting, proper selection of delegates, and all the rest, are not met. There is no real reason why Presidential veto, on the same grounds, is not proper in this matter.

If all this terrain is fought over, then the American people will surrender this ultimate power into the hands of a minority only if they want to, and if they want to nobody can stop them.

The Yale Law Journal
Volume 82, Number 2, December 1972

Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman*

Charles L. Black, Jr.†

There was introduced in the Senate, in the 92d Congress, a bill (S.215)[1] dealing with the procedures to be followed on state applications for a national constitutional convention pursuant to Article V of the Constitution. The bill passed the Senate[2] but was still in the House Judiciary Committee when Congress adjourned.

While it was there, I wrote the following letter to Congressman Emanuel Celler, then Chairman of the Committee, giving my reasons for believing that the passage of a bill such as S.215 would be a national calamity. The letter is reproduced here because I believe the profession ought to be exposed to a full spectrum of opinion on this major question.

There is another reason for its reproduction at this time. The Harvard Law Review, in a student Note,[3] has taken issue with some of the conclusions expressed in the letter. On full reconsideration, I must say that I do not think the authors of this Note have laid a finger on me, but I prefer that the profession be the judge of that, by having access to my own expression of my views, rather than by seeing them through the semi-opaque pane of paraphrase and selective quotation.

I consider it inappropriate at this time to accompany the letter with specific answers to the Harvard Note; in sum, I feel the

* Ed. Note: The Journal is reproducing this letter not only because we believe it to be a significant constitutional commentary, but also because we believe its contents should be disseminated as widely as possible before a new version of S. 215 (which has been inching ever closer to passage since it was first introduced in 1967) is submitted to the 93d Congress. The letter is reproduced as written and sent, save for the addition of footnotes consisting of citations formerly in the text and the relevant portions of the Bill and Senate reports in question.

† Henry R. Luce Professor of Jurisprudence, Yale Law School.

1. S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971) (Senator Ervin) [hereinafter referred to by section number only]. All citations refer to the version of the Bill which passed the Senate and was before the House Judiciary Committee.

2. 117 CONG. REC. S 16569 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

3. Note, Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1612 (1972).

Note's arguments are insufficiently distinct and categorical to be of avail when one is considering the legitimization of constitutional amendments, where, perhaps more than anywhere else, square corners should be cut. I wish to note most emphatically, however, that the Harvard editors flatly and unmistakably concede that, "Of course, legislation governing the calling of a constitutional convention would not bind future Congresses."[4] This concession may be important to future debate; for the present, I shall be content to let the reader judge whether the Harvard editors, having made this concession, follow it with arguments which justify the unexampled step of passing an act known in advance to have no force as law with regard to its principal subject matter.

February 28, 1972

The Honorable Emanuel Celler
Chairman, Judiciary Committee
The House of Representatives
Washington, D.C.

My dear Congressman Celler:

I understand that S.215 ("An Act to provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to Article V of the Constitution"), having passed the Senate, has now been referred to your Committee on the Judiciary. It is my distinct opinion, the result of years of reflection on the very subject, that this bill is, for many reasons, both unconstitutional and unwise. It is also, quite obviously, a most important bill, for it would bring into being new and specific means for amending the Constitution of the United States, in a way that has never before been found needful. Because I think it both a supremely important and a very bad bill, I am taking the liberty of communicating to you at some length my reasons for opposition.

You may, of course, make such use of this letter as you like. I would appreciate its being included in the record of any hearings that might be scheduled on the bill, and would make every effort, if you want me to do so, to attend any such hearings and to testify.

It is hard to know where to begin in criticizing such a thoroughly misconceived piece of legislation as this. Let me first take up two pervading defects, and then go on to particulars. Since my discussion must, to be thorough, be rather long, I think it would be a good idea to put in headings summarizing each point.

4. Id. at 1616.

This bill, as to the vote commanded in its crucial Section 6, rests on the constitutionally impossible assumption that this Congress can bind the consciences of successor Congressmen and Senators, on questions of constitutional law and policy.

The most obvious thing that is generally wrong with the bill is that it attempts to bind successor Congresses to vote in a certain way on controverted questions of constitutionality and policy, a thing which, on the most familiar and fundamental principles, so obvious as rarely to be stated, no Congress for the time being can do. The crux of this (and of the bill) is in the language of Section 6(a). The following strange phraseology is used, phraseology which, in form and plain meaning, is a command addressed by the 92d Congress to all its successor Congresses:

> Whenever applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same subject have been received, the Secretary and the Clerk shall so report in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer thereupon shall announce on the floor of the House of which he is an officer the substance of such report. It shall be the duty of such House to determine that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds of the States with respect to the same subject. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that subject.[5]

Now as I shall show, the question whether there "are in effect," at any such time, valid applications, even if the previously set requirements of S.215 have been met, and whether, in consequence, the Congress is, simply because those requirements have been met, under a constitutional duty to call a convention, is a constitutional question of the first magnitude. It is and will remain a genuinely controverted question; there is much reason on the negative side. A Congressman in, let us say, the 97th Congress might be convinced by these reasons; he might conscientiously believe that, although everything has happened which S.215 says must happen to bring into being the obligation declared in the language I have quoted from Section 6, in fact the things which have occurred do not, as a matter of sound constitutional interpretation, as he sees it, bring that obligation into being. How can anyone think that the 92d Congress can settle, for a Congressman in the 97th Congress, this absolutely fundamental issue as to his own constitutional obligation? Where did the 92d Congress get this power? The answer is, of course, that no Congress has the power to bind the consciences of its successors, with respect to grave questions of constitutional law, and that the Congressman in the 97th Congress will not be in the least obligated to cast the vote which Section 6 says he must cast. If I am still alive, or if some of the numerous other constitutional lawyers like-minded with me are still alive, attention will at that time forcefully be called to this plain fact, and it will then, I think, clearly be seen that no obligation whatever is created by Section 6. In this absolutely fundamental sense, the bill is a brutum fulmen, a mere futility, because the vote which Section 6 tries to coerce or make a matter of obligation cannot be made, by one Congress, a matter of obligation resting on successor Congressmen and Senators in the near or distant future.

5. § 6(a) (emphasis added).

I think this must be known to the sponsors of the bill; certainly it has been drawn to public attention. Anyone must see that there is no way to make a Congressman or Senator in a successor Congress vote against his conscience and against his honest belief on a point of constitutional interpretation. The aim of the bill, therefore—or its only possible effect—must be to create a specious talking-point for use when the time comes, a ground, untenable on full examination, for convincing those who do not think the matter clear through that this obligation exists, though it cannot possibly have been created by the 92d Congress, for the members of the 97th Congress.

A difficulty generically similar to the foregoing is encountered when one reads on past Section 6 into the rest of the bill. The casting of the commanded Section 6 vote not only must rest on the resolution of a prior constitutional question which the 92d Congress has no right or power to resolve for its successors, but would constitute the resolution of both constitutional and policy questions, with respect to the composition and proceedings of the proposed "constitutional convention," and to proceedings thereafter. These questions, again, are questions which the 92d Congress has no right or power to resolve for its successors. Congress, according to Article

V, is to "call a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . on Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States."[6] The report of the Senate Judiciary Committee on this bill is eloquent, and undoubtedly right, in saying that this language necessarily commits to Congress the duty and the power of resolving many issues of policy and of constitutional propriety with respect to the structure and procedure of such a convention.[7] But it does not commit this duty and power to the 92d Congress in any special way. The obligation to call the convention, when and if it arises, is what creates the duty and the power to define the specifics of the convention, and it is the Congress then sitting that, in the nature of the case, has this duty and power. It is a constitutional impossibility for the 92d Congress to bind a Congressman or Senator in the 97th Congress to vote for a convention of a form he believes to be unconstitutional or unwise, or to vote for any other proceedings he believes to be unconstitutional or unwise. But the vote sought to be commanded and made a matter of duty by Section 6, as quoted above, might well be just such a vote, since it sets in train a series of proceedings of dubious constitutionality and wisdom. A Congressman in the 97th Congress might, for example, think that, under the now unforeseeable circumstances then prevailing, it would be inviting catastrophe to allow delegates to the "convention" to be "elected . . . in the manner provided by State law."[8] Yet his vote, seemingly commanded by Section 6, would be a vote for that procedure. There is no moral or political ground for the conclusion that the 92d Congress may create an obligation, resting on a future Congressman, to vote for what he thinks is an invitation to catastrophe.

Here again, the bill might be looked on as a mere futility. Nobody can make any Congressman in 1992 vote for what the 92d Congress thinks well of, and the Congressman in 1992 will know that and will be advised, I am sure, that he is under no obligation to vote as Section 6 tells him he must—that he stands just where the Constitution puts him, responsible for a fresh choice in the light of current conditions. But here, again, there is the danger of the use of the bill, if it becomes law, as a specious talking-point supporting the assertion of an obligation which, on reflection, cannot be created, morally or practically, by the 92d Congress.

6. U.S. CONST. art. V.
7. SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES ACT, S. REP. NO. 92-336, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1971) [hereinafter cited as SENATE REPORT].
8. § 7(a).

This bill, for the foregoing reasons, might be dismissable as a futility, since it cannot, ethically or in fact, bind a successor Congress. This I believe to be its actual force (or lack thereof) as a matter of law, on the most elementary principles concerning the incapacity of one Congress to bind the consciences or coerce the votes of its successors. I would unhesitatingly advise any Congressman or Senator in the future that Section 6 adds absolutely nothing to his obligation to vote or not to vote for a constitutional convention, as that obligation may be created by Article V, and as determined by his own interpretation of that Article and by his own views on the wisdom of the mode of constituting any convention he might think himself obligated to join in calling. But the bill, for the reason I have given, cannot be regarded as utterly innocuous (because utterly futile) since (unlike a command of the 92d Congress that the wind blow north-northeast on July 2, 1985) the bill might exert a quite unwarranted persuasive influence on some who did not think through the question of the capacity of one Congress to command a later Congress to vote in a certain way, on genuinely controverted constitutional and policy judgments.

Even if (as is not the case) the 92d Congress could bind its successors, it would be foolish to settle great constitutional and prudential questions at a time when public and professional attention are not focused on them, and when (with respect to the prudential questions) the conditions of the future are unknowable.

Now let me make a second and quite separate general point. I believe I have shown that the issues S.215 purports to settle cannot, as a matter of law, be settled in advance for future Congresses. Without for a moment implying any doubt about this, let me say that if (per impossible) such advance settlement were possible in law, it would, as a matter of policy, be most unwise to settle these issues for the future at this time. I assert this for two reasons.

First, some of the questions the bill tries to settle are great constitutional questions. It is most unwise to try to settle such questions at a time when national attention is not and cannot be keenly focused upon them, and intense national debate be thus generated. I venture to guess that not one member of the adult public in a thousand has the faintest idea that such a proposal as S.215 exists. Unfortunately, but quite naturally, the only time when public and professional attention can be focused on such a proposal is the time when something substantive is at stake. It is for this reason, mutatis mutandis, that courts do not decide great constitutional questions except when actual present interests are at the bar. True, attitudes toward procedure may be influenced, at such a time, by attitudes toward substance. But to say that Congress would not, when the time came, fairly try to discharge its Article V obligation, is an indictment I refuse to sign (though the authors of the Senate Report are apparently willing to sign it); certainly, I think the risk of that far less than the risk attendant on the impossibility, at a time when nothing is immediately at stake, of focusing public and professional attention sharply on the constitutional and policy questions S.215 tries to settle.

Secondly, the passage now of a bill providing for future proceedings would constitute an attempt to settle for the future a number of prudential questions as to which nothing but knowledge of the conditions of the future can furnish a basis for intelligent action. For example, to take a matter of detail, conditions might arise making one year an unreasonably short time for convening the convention, or, to repeat in this context a far from trivial point made earlier, it might appear from future conditions, quite unknowable now, that the only sound way to select delegates to the convention would be by elections conducted by federal officials, contrary to the requirements of this bill[9]—just as it has been found by Congress that, under some conditions, the only sound way to register voters, even for state elections, is by federal registrars.[10] How can it be thought that 1972 is a good year for deciding what 1995 may require in regard to this or to any other practical question—or, for that matter, what 1974 may require?

(Let me here anticipate and answer the point that the advance setting of procedures for handling controversy is normal. True, for normal, run-of-the-mill procedures. But amendment of the Constitution (let us hope!) will remain a highly unusual thing. If not, then this bill quite plainly greases the path too much. If so, then each occasion will be a separate solemn event, with its own special conditions and problems. These problems can and should be solved when they arise, by the Congress empowered to solve them, and on the basis of all the factors now unknowable and then existing.)

The two general reasons already canvassed—legal and factual—the incapacity of any Congress to bind the consciences of future Congressmen and Senators on judgments of law and policy, and the unwisdom of even trying to settle these questions at a time when public and professional attention is not and cannot be focused on them, and when the conditions one needs to know about before resolving them wisely are unknowable—quite generally vitiate this bill. Strictly speaking, it ought to be unnecessary to examine its particulars. I shall do so, nevertheless, very largely because such examination copiously illustrates the assertion that important and genuinely debatable issues of constitutional law and of policy are resolved by this bill in at least a questionable manner on the merits. This will give substance to and make more than academic the two general points I have made. It also, I think, will show that the bill, even if it were not a futility, even if it did succeed in imposing an obligation on the Congressmen and Senators of the future, and even if it were necessary or wise to decide all these questions now, would still be a bad bill, because it not only resolves but wrongly resolves a good many issues of constitutional law and policy.

9. Id.
10. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. 1973(a) (1965).

With this framework in view, let me go through the bill point by point.

Section 2 (and therefore the whole bill) rests on the erroneous assumption that the Article V phrase, "a Convention for proposing Amendments," means a convention limited as to the "nature" of the amendments the convention may propose.

Section 2 embodies what is in my view a clear and crucial error in constitutional interpretation, an error which of course carries through the rest of the bill. It requires that a State requesting a convention pass a resolution "stating the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed."[11] It is my contention that Article V, properly construed, refers, in the phrase "a Convention for proposing Amendments," to a convention for proposing such amendments as to that convention seem suitable for being proposed.

There is authority tending to support something generally like this view—authority developed in connection with an earlier controversy of somewhat different form. Aside from my own statement of something very like it in the Yale Law Journal,[12] that statement was distinctly approved by a committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York[13] and was seemingly approved by Professor

11. § 2 (emphasis added).
12. Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 957 (1963).
13. COMMITTEE OF THE ASSOCIATION OF THE BAR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK CONCERNED WITH FEDERAL LEGISLATION, THREE AMENDMENTS TO UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION PROPOSED BY THE COUNCIL OF STATE GOVERNMENTS 33 n.2 (1963).

Arthur Bonfield[14] and perhaps others. The Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary refers to none of this authority, but instead ignores outside studies and constructs its own argument.[15] It will be well to examine that argument.

First, there are two quotations from the Federalist. On anything like careful reading, neither of them turns out to have any bearing whatever on the question whether a convention called under the second alternative of Article V may be limited in its scope. The one from Madison[16] simply points out that amendment may be set in train by the State Legislatures as well as by Congress—and so it may, whether the convention they may petition for be limited or not. The one from Hamilton[17] restates the obvious meaning of Article V—that the recommendations from such a convention could (and perhaps must) take the form of specific proposals. Both assertions are clearly true. Neither of them has any tendency to establish that the convention could be or was expected to be limited to making proposals only on a certain subject or subjects. Each proposal, Hamilton says, must go through the ratification process separately, and hence, as he says, is "brought forward singly."[18] If Hamilton's quotation were to be taken (as it certainly need not be taken) to prove any more than that, it would have been shown to prove too much, for it would then prove that the Article V convention not only may but must be limited as to subject matter, a patent absurdity in the interpretation of the phrase "a Convention for proposing Amendments to this Constitution."

The Report next asserts that the theory of the unlimited Con-

14. Bonfield, Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems, 39 NOTRE DAME LAWYER 659, 662 (1964).

15. SENATE REPORT, supra note 7, at 8-10.

16. That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the General and the State Governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or the other.
THE FEDERALIST No. 43 (J. Madison) as quoted in SENATE REPORT, supra note 7, at 8.

17. Every amendment to the Constitution, if one established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise in relation to any other point—no giving or taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently, whenever nine, or rather 10 States, were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place. There can, therefore, be no comparison between the facility of affecting an amendment and that of establishing, in the first instance, a complete Constitution.
THE FEDERALIST No. 85 (A. Hamilton) as quoted in SENATE REPORT, supra note 7, at 8.

18. Id.

vention is "inconsistent with the language"[19] of Article V. What in the world is meant by this? I have just quoted that language. It seems to me that that language most aptly describes a general convention, for proposing such amendments as the convention sees fit. But, at the least, how can it be said that such a meaning is inconsistent with the constitutional language? No explanation of this extraordinary statement is tendered.

The next argument is evidently fallacious:

> The argument that the convention must have general power is also unsound from another point of view. If the convention were to be general, then it would seem that appropriate applications for a limited convention deriving in some States from a dissatisfaction with the school desegregation cases, in others from the school prayer cases, and in still others by reason of objections to the Miranda rule, or because of a desire for reapportionment, revenue sharing by the States, tax relief, or for other reasons, should all be combined to make up the requisite two-thirds of the States needed to meet the requirements of article V. The committee does not believe that this is the type of consensus among the States that the Founders thought to be appropriate to calling for a convention. For if such disparate demands were sufficient, all the applications to date—and there are a large number of them—should be added up to see whether, in what is considered an appropriate span of time, two-thirds of the States have made demands for a constitutional convention to propose amendments, no matter the cause for applications or the specifications contained in them. Indeed, under this theory a convention is long overdue. Since the committee believes that State applications should not be treated as a call for a convention unless they deal with the same subject—a conclusion supported by two centuries of practice—it is unreasonable to suggest that the convention resulting from 34 applications on a single subject is nonetheless free to roam at will in offering changes to the Constitution.[20]

The fallacy is clear. If the view that the convention is illimitable is right, as I and others contend, if that is the kind of convention Article V refers to, then in the case stated, none of the applications which the Report puts on parade would have called for the thing the Constitution names, properly construed. None, therefore, would be effective; none would create any congressional obligation. Thirty-four times zero is zero. The argument tendered thus begs the question. It assumes that, when a state asks for a limited convention, it has asked for the thing meant in Article V, for unless this were true, the State's action would be without any juristic effect. Thus the argument quoted leaves the question of the limitability of the convention entirely open.

19. SENATE REPORT, supra note 7, at 8.
20. Id. at 9.

We touch here on a misunderstanding which so generally pervades discussion of this subject that it is worth spelling the matter out, even at the risk of prolixity and of underlining the obvious. I believe that, in Article V, the words "a Convention for proposing Amendments" mean "a convention for proposing such amendments as that convention decides to propose." This is, to say the least, not a very forced construction, but leave aside for a moment the question whether it is right. Let us consider, rather, what it implies, if it is right—for that is the thing that seems so widely misunderstood.

It does not imply that a convention summoned for the purpose of dealing with electoral malapportionment may kick over the traces and emit proposals dealing with other subjects. It implies something much more fundamental than that; it implies that Congress cannot be obligated, no matter how many States ask for it, to summon a convention for the limited purpose of dealing with electoral apportionment alone, and that such a convention would have no constitutional standing at all. Let us take this step by step.

First, if the quoted words in Article V refer, as I contend, to a convention with power to propose such amendments as it thinks wise, then a State application for a convention limited to one or more proposals or subjects is not an application for the "Convention" denoted by the words in Article V. Few conclusions in constitutional law are compelled by pure logic, with no escape possible, but this one seems to be.

Secondly, if a state applies, or if thirty-four states apply, for something other than what Article V language denotes, then Article V imposes no obligation on Congress to grant the request, or to do anything. This, too, seems a plainly compelled logical step. If thirty-four States may put Congress under a certain obligation by, and only by, requesting X, and thirty-four States request Y instead, then no congressional obligation arises.

Thus, the position that Article V means "a convention for proposing such amendments as to it seem wise" does not imply that a "runaway" convention is possible, for, if the stated position is right, no convention can be called that has anything to run away from. It implies, instead, that State requests for a limited convention create no obligation under Article V, since they are not applications for the thing which, and only which, the States may oblige Congress to call, by requesting it.

The only possible escape from this is sometimes sought in the confused idea, which evaporates on clear statement, that a State's request for a limited convention ought to be looked on and treated as an application for an unlimited convention, if the convention cannot in law be limited.[21] But this paradoxical idea would have to rest on the assumption that a State legislature, by expressing its desire for consideration of amendment with respect to bussing, is expressing its desire for a convention where any amendments, on any subject, may be considered. That is absurd, both logically and politically. The State that asks for a convention on bussing alone is not expressing anything about its views on the desirability of an unlimited convention. The Senate Report seems, obliquely but clearly, to recognize this.[22] If, as I contend, the latter is what Article V means, then the State has taken no action at all under Article V, and has put Congress under no obligation.

The rest of the argument brought forward on this point in the Senate Report is merely conclusory, except that the assertion is made that the construction of Article V to mean "limited convention" is "more desirable and practical than the alternative construction."[23] This passage, very properly, puts desirability and practicality in issue. Where literalism and history are not productive of a conclusive answer, these factors are fitting for consideration; indeed, they are technically legitimate aids to construction, for the users of constitutional language ought to be presumed to have intended the desirable and practical.

I would strongly contend that there is nothing either desirable or practical about building up the power of state legislatures with respect to the initiation of particular amendments to the Constitution, and that there is therefore no validity in attributing such "intent" to the Framers on grounds of desirability and wisdom. The notion that there is always turns out to rest on the absurd mythology of opposition between "the States" and "the federal government." In fact, the people are just the same people. They are represented in Congress just as they are represented in the Legislatures. The first-

21. See the passage in the Senate Report apparently resting in part on this notion, id.
22. "To suggest that the States could not propose specific amendments without risking a general constitutional convention is, in fact, in the committee's view, to destroy the desire and therefore the power of the States to initiate specific amendments by the convention process." Id. at 8-9.
23. Id. at 9.

named and hitherto always used method of amendment—passage by two-thirds of each House of Congress and ratification by three-fourths of the States—would seem prima facie adequate to every real need, and entirely likely to be responsive to that clearly predominant popular will which ought to exist before a Constitution be amended. History has confirmed to the hilt this prima facie impression; the American Constitution has proven to be the most successful political instrument ever devised in all history, and piecemeal amendment by the first method named in Article V has proved, as one might easily have predicted, to be entirely adequate to every real need. What catastrophe, what misfortune—what seriously undesirable condition even—has ever resulted from difficulties about amending the Constitution?

In the very earliest days, before it was known that the new government would be so successful, it may have seemed "desirable and practical" for the States, unused to union and uncertain of its benefits, to have some means of compelling a thorough reconsideration of the new plan. That method would be provided by the second of the alternatives of Article V, if one interprets it to denote a general convention. Indeed, one persuasive authority, Professor Swindler, thinks that that was the principal if not the only reason for the inclusion of this alternative, and that the provision has spent its force and is no longer of effect at all.[24] Though Professor Swindler's careful historical arguments are quite persuasive, and should be thoroughly considered by this Committee, I would not go as far as he does; I would not predict now that no crisis could ever arise which would call for the use of this method. But if we are talking about what is "desirable and practical" (and that is what the Senate Report invites), there is not a shred of support for the notion that it ever was or now is more "desirable and practical" to use this alternative machinery for the piecemeal amendment of the Constitution. On the contrary, the hitherto used and time-proven method is quite desirable and practical, responsive enough when one is dealing with so successful a Constitution, and just as obedient to the will of the people, fully represented as they are, State by State, in Congress and in the ratifying legislatures, as any system can be without destroying stability. Nothing "desirable or practical" is to be served by the alternate route, except a possible need, which now seems likely never to arise, to take care of a general dissatisfaction with the national government, or a breakdown thereof.

The Senate Report says that "history" supports its conclusion as to the meaning of Article V, but fails so much as to cite any relevant history. This was inevitable, for there is no relevant history to support the Report's conclusion. Congress, the body charged with responsibility in the premises, has never had to decide the question of "limited" as against "unlimited" convention. The hundred years following the adoption of the Constitution show little attempted use of this device by the State legislatures.

24. Swindler, The Current Challenge to Federalism, 52 GEO. L.J. 1 (1963).

However, Brickfield's tabulation[25] of the few applications filed before the closing years of the nineteenth century puts to rout the Senate Report's reliance on history, as fully as fragmentary history can. As far as I can make out from Brickfield's table, the record up to the Civil War, is that three states around 1790 submitted applications for a general convention, five states submitted applications for a general convention in 1861, one state submitted an application for a general convention in 1832, and one state, Alabama, submitted an application for a convention on the protective tariff, in 1833.[26] This record in overwhelming predominance supports the view that, for about a hundred years after the adoption of the Constitution, the Legislatures themselves thought that Article V required them to ask for the thing, and only the thing, named in Article V—"a Convention for proposing Amendments"—with no limitations unsupported by the text. In the light of these facts, one is stunned by the Senate Report's statement, in the quoted passage, that its conclusion as to the limitability of the convention is "supported by two centuries of practice." The manner in which this assertion got to be made in an official document should, with respect, be looked into.

Even the Alabama resolution does not unambiguously constitute a State claim of right to limit the convention, or a State's belief that Congress may do so. The following is the Senate Journal entry in full:

> Mr. King presented proceedings of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, recommending to Congress a speedy modification of the tariff laws so as to equalize their burdens and reduce the revenue to the economical expenditures of the Government, and the call of a Federal Convention to propose such amendments to the constitution as may be proper to restrain Congress from exerting the taxing power for the substantive protection of domestic manufactures, and recommending to the State of South Carolina to suspend the operation of her late ordinance, 25. C.F. BRICKFIELD, STATE APPLICATIONS ASKING CONGRESS TO CALL A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 11-16 (87th Cong., 1st Sess., Comm. Print 1961).

26. There were three other applications, all in the 1890's. One was for a general convention. Id.

> and to abstain from the use of military power in enforcing her ordinance, or in resisting the execution of the revenue laws of the United States, and recommending to the General Government to exercise moderation, and to employ only such means as are peaceful and usual to execute the laws of the Union; and
>
> Ordered, That they be laid on the table, and printed.[27]

The underscored words are not in the form of an application under Article V, but in terms of a "recommendation," just as certain actions are "recommended" to South Carolina; they may therefore rest merely on a misapprehension of the general powers of Congress to act in its own right. But, in any case, the understanding of the Alabama legislature is not of noticeable weight, as against the other examples given.

As the most cursory glance at Brickfield's tables[28] will show, the fullblown theory of the convention limited by the tenor of the state petitions is nothing but a child of the twentieth century, and carries no prestige of construction contemporary or anywhere near contemporary with the adoption of Article V. Indeed, what early history there is is strongly to the contrary, as I have just shown. The twentieth-century petitions, embodying this theory, are (on the point of law implicitly resolved by them) nothing but self-serving declarations, assertions of their own power by the state legislatures.

Aside from the history available, which all points away from the S.215 theory, there is nothing but text and common sense to resolve the present question. It seems to me that the most natural meaning of the words "a Convention for proposing Amendments" is "a convention for proposing such amendments it decides to propose"—that is, a general convention—and that the importation of a limitation not in the text is quite unwarranted. Common sense would advise me that where one method is entirely satisfactory, has always been used, and fully registers the requisite consensus of the people of the States, the alternative method ought to be construed to cover extraordinary occasions, which may have been feared at first, but which now are quite unlikely to arise—occasions where, by some unforeseeable mischance, there may be urgently needed the very thing the text seems most certainly to refer to—the general convention. The Senate Report contains exactly no cogent argument to the contrary.

I think that, without arguing the point fully, I have said enough to show that the weight of argument and history is on the "unlimited convention" side. If I am right, the whole bill rests on a false assumption as to the meaning of Article V. The question is at the very least an open one. It will remain an open one, whether S.215 passes or not, because the 92d Congress cannot bind its successors. Let me pass on to another point about this bill.

27. S. JOUR. 194-95 (Feb. 19, 1833) (emphasis added).
28. BRICKFIELD, supra note 25, at 11-16.

Quite without warrant, the bill gives maximum control over the whole process to the state legislatures.

Initiation of the convention call is to come from the state legislatures.[29] They are to prescribe the mode of election of the delegates.[30] Then (unless someone wins, in a short time, the uphill fight of passing a concurrent resolution to the contrary—a process easily blocked by an unfriendly Committee in either House) the legislatures are to ratify.[31] Why should this latter-named method of ratification be presumptively chosen now, for all future contingencies? It is like taking two opinions on a medical case, but taking them from the same doctor. It would seem quite obvious that, if what you want is broadly expressed consensus from differently structured constituencies, the normal method of ratification should be by conventions, selected by means other than control by the Legislatures, since the Legislatures will have commenced the process. A broadly based consensus—of Senate, House and State Legislatures or conventions—is achieved by the first of the methods in Article V, the one always hitherto used. In the bill, the aim seems to be to turn as much as possible of the process over to the State Legislatures.

The bill's plan of representation at the convention is wholly indefensible. Generally, this bill fails to provide for that preponderant consensus which ought to precede amendment.

Section 7(a) provides:

> A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress.[32]

This provision results, of course, in over-representation of the less populous States. Such over-representation, one is tempted to say, is grotesque in the context, because the less populated States are

29. § 3(a).
30. § 7(a).
31. § 12(c).
32. § 7(a).

already grossly over-represented in both other phases of the total process contemplated by the bill. Apparently what is wanted is not a balance but a systematic and pervading over-weighting of the influence of the less populous States.

Nevada, with about one-seventieth of New York's population, counts evenly with New York in applying for the convention. Nevada counts evenly with New York in ratification. Under 7(a), this advantage is not balanced but rather enhanced, for the population of Nevada will once again be grossly over-represented, per capita, at the convention. There is no use looking for a reason for this: a good reason is impossible. Apparently the authors of the Senate Report realized this, for no explanation is tendered.

What seems to be in mind is a parallel with the Electoral College. I am on record as strongly disapproving all fundamental alterations in the Electoral College method of electing the President, but the Electoral College functions in its own context, and the simulacrum of it constructed in this bill would function in a crucially different context. The Electoral College contributes to the balance of government in two ways. At one end of the scale, because the electors of each state are chosen statewide and cast their votes as a block, it gives some edge to the inhabitants of the more populous states, doubtless to compensate for their under-representation in the Senate. Neither condition exists in S.215. At the other end of the scale, by some over-representation of the thinly populated States, the Electoral College system prevents their almost entire obliteration in the process of presidential selection. No such danger exists in the "convention" amendment process; the danger that exists is just the opposite danger.

The rule of representation in Section 7(a) is therefore without any possible defense. It simply loads a little heavier the already loaded dice.

This seems a good place to refer to the Senate Report's presentation of itself as a sort of compromise between making amendment by state-legislature action very easy and making it very difficult.[33] This presentation is emphatically not warranted by the facts.

Here we have a good yardstick of comparison, for we have successfully used another method for almost two centuries. Under the first-named and hitherto used method of amendment, there is required a two-thirds vote of each of the national Houses, wherein the States as such and the people as such are respectively represented in proportion to their respective numbers. Then three-quarters of the States must ratify.[34] This is a process of some difficulty. It ought to be, for only thus is genuine and stable consensus assured, for change in a highly successful Constitution.

33. See SENATE REPORT, supra note 7, at 2.

Under S.215, all that is required is the concurrence of the same three-quarters of the State Legislatures (for, if three-quarters of them would ratify, two-thirds could be brought to petition) and a two-thirds majority of a convention weighted so as not even to provide accurate per capita representation of the American people.[35] This is beyond doubt a substantially easier mode of amendment than the other. How can a mode of amendment substantially easier than the one that has worked be presented as a sound compromise?

Actually, this bill would make amendment far too easy. Amendment would easily be possible without that kind of dominant and stable majority which ought to be required for amendment.

The exclusion of the President from the process of calling a convention is flatly and obviously unconstitutional under Article I, Section 7, and the only question about this is how "strict constructionists" could espouse such a position.

The bill excludes the President from participation in the convention call.[36] This is, of course, in absolutely clear contravention of the entirely plain language of Article I, Section 7:

> Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.[37]

The Senate Report's explanation of this disregard of an unmistakably clear constitutional command is tendered with a confidence that is inversely related to its adequacy:

> Moreover, article I, section 7, is not authorized for Presidential assent to the concurrent resolution calling for a convention or for the congressional action of transmitting a proposed amendment to the States for ratification. The short but suffi-

34. U.S. CONST. art. V.
35. § 12.
36. § 6(a).
37. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 7.

cient answer is to be found in Professor Corwin's annotation of article I, section 7:

> The sweeping nature of this obviously ill-considered provision is emphasized by the single exception specified to its operation. Actually, it was impossible from the first to give it any such scope. Otherwise the intermediate stages of the legislative process would have been bogged down hopelessly, not to mention other highly undesirable results. In a report rendered by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1897 it was shown that the word "necessary" in the clause had come in practice to refer "to the necessity occasioned by the requirement of other provisions of the Constitution, whereby every exercise of 'legislative powers' involves the concurrence of the two Houses"; or more briefly, "necessary" here means necessary if an "order, resolution, or vote" is to have the force of law. Such resolutions have come to be termed "joint resolutions" and stand on a level with "bills," which if "enacted" become statutes. But "votes" taken in either House preliminary to the final passage of legislation need not be submitted to the President, nor resolutions passed by the House concurrently with a view to expressing an opinion or to devising a common program of action (e.g., the concurrent resolutions by which during the fight over Reconstruction the Southern States were excluded from representation in the House and Senate, the Joint Committee on Reconstruction containing members from both Houses was created, etc.), or to directing the expenditure of money appropriated to the use of the two Houses. Within recent years the concurrent resolution has been put to a new use—the termination of powers delegated to the Chief Executive, or the disapproval of particular exercises of power by him. Most of the important legislation enacted for the prosecution of World War II provided that the powers granted to the President should come to an end upon adoption of concurrent resolutions to that effect. Similarly, measures authorizing the President to reorganize executive agencies have provided that a reorganization plan promulgated by him should be reported to Congress and should not become effective if one or both Houses adopted a resolution disapproving it. Also, it was settled as early as 1789 that resolutions of Congress proposing amendments to the Constitution need not be submitted to the President, the Bill of Rights having been referred to the States without being laid before President Washington for his approval—a procedure which the Court ratified in due course. (The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation) 135-36 (S. Doc. No. 39, 88th Cong., first sess., 1964 ed.) Citations omitted.

> The Constitution made the amendment process difficult. It certainly was not the intention of the original Convention to make it impossible. Nor is it possible to attribute to the Founders the concept that amendments originating in the States should have much more difficulty in passage than those proposed by Congress. That issue was fought out in the 1789 Convention and resolved in favor of two originating sources, not one.
>
> Therefore, the committee has concluded that Presidential participation in the operation of article V is not required by the Constitution. Indeed, a strong case is made out that the Constitution, as construed throughout our history, precludes such participation by the Executive in the amendment process.[38]

The murky quotation from Corwin, gruff though it be, offers no instance of congressional action having juristic force, and taken without presidential approval; indeed, Corwin concedes that anything having the force of law must go to the President. Of course preliminary votes do not have to go to the President; they do not even fall within the literal terms of Article I, Section 7, because, as to them, the concurrence of both Houses is not "necessary." Of course expressions of opinion cannot be vetoed, whether emanating from the House and Senate or from you and me. And so on. But a convention call would have the force of law—significant, vital law, comparable to a law establishing any other body with power to act. (As a contrasting example, S. J. Res. 197,[39] setting up an arbitration board for the dock strike, went to the President in routine obedience to Article I, Section 7. What possible reason could there be for not following this procedure as to the setting up of a constitutional convention, more important by several orders of magnitude than an arbitration board?) Can it be thought that Article I, Section 7, can be evaded by mere nomenclature—by merely calling something a "Concurrent" rather than a "Joint" Resolution? How can people put themselves forward as "strict constructionists" and then simply disregard the plain command of Article I, Section 7, on such scarcely even specious grounds as those given in the Senate Report?

There is one matter wherefrom the President is traditionally excluded, and that is the two-thirds passage of amendments in House and Senate, under the first and hitherto invariably used method of amendment. The reasons given in the early case upholding this procedure, Hollingsworth v. Va.,[40] were merely assertive, but the practice is now well established. The only even semirational ground for this is that the two-thirds vote necessary to pass an amendment is enough to overcome a veto, so that submission to the President is otiose. This is not a good ground, because it denigrates the process of reason by disregarding the possibility that some members of Congress might be convinced by the reasons in the President's veto message; why else should he be required to send it? But, good or bad, it has no application to the convention call vote in Section 6 of this bill, which would be by simple majority. The short obvious truth is that the convention call vote of Section 6 of the bill falls squarely under Article I, Section 7, and that the exclusion of the President, and of the possibility of veto, is flatly and indubitably unconstitutional. "Strict constructionists" should be the first to agree to this, but the loosest constructionist can hardly deny it.

38. SENATE REPORT, supra note 7, at 12-13.
39. 92d Cong., 2d Sess. (1972).
40. 3 U.S. 378 (1798).

Since Article I, Section 7 speaks so plainly, and since the power it confers on the President obviously cannot be waived for future Presidents by this Congress or by this President, the omission of the President from his plainly mandated role would cast a permanent shadow of illegitimacy over every amendment originating in any convention called without the command of Article I, Section 7, having been followed. To avoid that shadow, well-justified as it will certainly be, ought to be an absolutely prime aim of those who are devising procedures for change in the fundamental law. Fundamental law should be not merely of arguable, but of clear legitimacy. This exclusion of the President, per contra, is not even arguably right.

In view of the plain unconstitutionality of the bill at this point, it seems almost supererogatory to add that the provision is also unwise. The President would normally veto a convention call only when he saw something seriously wrong about it; where there is that much presidential doubt, would it not be well to make assurance doubly sure by requiring that at least two-thirds of each House think him wrong? To put the matter another way, why should this bill treat the calling of a constitutional convention as though it were a less serious matter than building a lighthouse? But these policy arguments ought not be allowed to obscure the central point here: the exclusion of the President is plainly unconstitutional.

The exclusion of state governors has no rational basis.

Generically similar is the exclusion of the Governors of the States from the application process. The Senate Report uses some pretty strong (if not strikingly fresh) rhetoric to justify this, but the authority it cites, Hawke v. Smith No. 1,[41] had, with respect, nothing whatever to do with the question, as anyone who reads that opinion can see. The policy reason given—that gubernatorial veto is just too high a hurdle—is more than unconvincing; the amendment process should not be made easy, and the inclusion in it of the governors of the states, popularly elected statewide, would be a desirable further check. We have here, again, an excellent yardstick of comparison. What possible reason can there be for ordaining that so solemn a step as a State's applying for a national constitutional convention is to go through an easier process than a state law changing the speed limit? It would seem that the very least that ought to be required is that a state express its desire for constitutional change through procedures as protective as those it uses for ordinary and sometimes quite trivial law.

But the paradoxical thing here is that the sponsors of this bill are, by and large, "States' rights" people. Why not, then, at least leave this matter to the States? As it stands, even if Texas very strongly desires that no application be submitted in her name without gubernatorial approval, S.215 says she cannot be indulged in that desire. Why should Congress, now or in the future, tell the States what they are to do to express their own will?

The bill's withdrawal of questions of law from the judiciary is unwarranted, dangerous, impractical, and inconsonant with our system of government.

Another major and, to me, rather sinister defect in the bill should be noted. It withdraws from the state and federal judiciaries all questions concerning applications, rescissions, convention procedures, and ratification.[42] Now the judiciary often does exclude itself from such questions. But insofar as they are not "political questions" (now as always a term of most uncertain meaning) they may arise legitimately in lawsuits, under any branch of state or federal jurisdiction. It seems to me clear beyond doubt, on the most fundamental principles of Marbury v. Madison, that no court, state or federal, can be coerced by Congress into acting on the basis of an amendment which that

41. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

42. Questions concerning the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this act shall be determinable by the Congress of the United States and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts. § 3(b). See also §§ 5(c), 10(b), and 13(c) for other preclusions of judicial review.

court believes has not the force of law, where that court conscientiously concludes, as a matter of law, that the tendered issue is justiciable. One cannot foresee what cases will arise, or what issues will be tendered. But this withdrawal of all such issues from judicial cognizance is, in the class of cases I have designated, plainly unconstitutional. As a matter of policy, moreover, why should it be desired?

Since these exclusions of the judiciary rest on quite rudimentarily erroneous constitutional views, I am driven to rehearse the rudiments. Congress has a very wide power over the jurisdiction of the federal courts. It has some (presumably lesser) power over the jurisdiction of the state courts, though I am not aware that Congress has ever attempted to deprive state courts of any jurisdiction without creating a corresponding federal jurisdiction.

But the issue here is not one of jurisdiction. This issue is whether Congress may tell the courts, state or federal, that they may not inquire into certain issues of law, in cases where they do have jurisdiction. Unless the whole theory of Marbury v. Madison is wrong, it is inconceivable that Congress has such power.

Let us take a simple example. The federal district courts have diversity-of-citizenship jurisdiction. Congress could, of course, abolish the jurisdiction. But suppose Congress does not do so; there is no reason to think it will, and even if it did there are other headings of jurisdiction.

Now in a diversity case, one litigant may rely on what purports to be an amendment, and the other litigant may contend that, as a matter of law, the purported amendment is not really such. In many such cases the court itself will, as a matter of law, hold this question "non-justiciable," finding something in the history of purported passage of the amendment which is "conclusive" of its validity. But there is no assurance that this will always be so, or ought always to be so. Where it is not so, can Congress tell the courts that they must decide cases in violation of what they, the courts, find to be right law under the Constitution? If so, then let us rethink the whole foundation of American constitutionalism.

Questions, moreover, may arise at some earlier stage, say the stage of application. In Hawke v. Smith[43] (actually cited by the Senate Report), the Supreme Court clearly treated as justiciable a question involving ratification. In Coleman v. Miller,[44] the Court divided equally on whether the question of the propriety of the Lieutenant-Governor's participating in the ratification process was justiciable. Suppose a question were to arise as to the right of a Lieutenant-Governor to break a tie in the State Senate in a vote on an application for a convention. And suppose this question is, in the view of the Supreme Court, a justiciable one—a holding clearly possible in view of the equal division in Coleman v. Miller. Having found the question justiciable, can the Court be forbidden to resolve it, one way or another? Has Congress the power to forbid the courts to look into all the law applicable to cases within their jurisdiction? If it does not (and it is shocking to think that it does) then Section 3(b) is unconstitutional, as are all the other sections withdrawing questions of law from the courts of law.

43. See p. 210 supra.
44. 307 U.S. 433, 446 (1939).

There are other difficulties about this withdrawal. Suppose a state court (taking that view of its duty which I think to be right) disregards these "withdrawal" sections as unconstitutional, and utters a judgment based in part on its resolution of some question concerning, say, application, which it regards as justiciable. Let us say that a certiorari petition is filed in the Supreme Court. Should that Court deny certiorari, citing Section 3(b)? Or should it summarily reverse, citing Section 3(b)? If it does the former, then the state judgment stands, Section 3(b) has had no effect, and there has been no federal review. If it does the latter, or even remands with directions to dismiss for want of jurisdiction (a procedure not always practical) the petitioner for certiorari, in effect, prevails on the merits, in every practical sense, though his position may be wrong as a matter of law.

There is another difficulty about these Sections. Congress may not, in rapidly developing political situations, get around to deciding every question concerning, say, the validity of applications, multifarious as these questions may be, and with up to fifty states involved. Indeed, this is likely—perhaps one ought to say certain. If the Sections mean "exclusively determinable by Congress," then all the difficulties I have already been through will in such cases arise. If the Sections mean "determinable by Congress, and, if Congress determines them, then that determination binds the courts, but until then judicial business shall be done in a normal manner," then equally great difficulties arise. What are the courts to do if a question about an application or a ratification arises in a lawsuit, and Congress has not determined it? If they determine it, then Congress may soon or much later reach, in the same or in some other case, an opposite conclusion. Meanwhile, the court case will have become res judicata, and (more important) may have been acted on irreversibly. If they do not determine it, what is the assurance that Congress ever will?

There is not much use in going on with this. The withdrawal of questions of law from the courts of law is absolutely unconformable to the American system and to the Constitution. Of course it will create multiple and in part unforeseeable difficulties, besides being shocking. What is the motive behind the introduction of this exotic provision into the orderly set of relations among the courts, the Congress, and the law of the Constitution? Astoundingly, the Senate Report tenders no reason—I repeat, for it seems incredible, no reason—but blandly designates the congressional committees to which law questions withdrawn from the law courts are to go.[45]

The provision for virtually automatic submission of amendments is reckless.

This bill has a good many other defects, but I am going to mention just one more—itself thoroughly unwise and dangerous. Section 11(b)(1) reads as follows:

> Whenever a constitutional convention called under this Act has transmitted to the Congress a proposed amendment to the Constitution, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such amendment to the Administrator of General Services upon the expiration of the first period of ninety days of continuous session of the Congress following the date of receipt of such amendment unless within that period both Houses of the Congress have agreed to (A) a concurrent resolution directing the earlier transmission of such amendment to the Administrator of General Services and specifying in accordance with article V of the Constitution the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified, or (B) a concurrent resolution stating that the Congress disapproves the submission of such proposed amendment to the States because such proposed amendment relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called, or because the procedures followed by the convention in proposing the amendment were not in substantial conformity with the provisions of this Act. No measure agreed to by the Congress which expresses disapproval of any such proposed amendment for any other reason, or without a statement of any reason, shall relieve the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the obligation imposed upon them by the first sentence of this paragraph.[46]

45. SENATE REPORT, supra note 7, at 14.

Now let us consider what this means. It means that, however grossly defective or corrupt the proceedings of the convention may have been, or even however fraudulent the certification of the convention's presiding officer may be, and however catastrophic the possible consequences, the proposed amendment nevertheless goes out to the States in ninety days, unless Congress, in that time, affirmatively passes a forbidding concurrent resolution. I am writing to and for Members of Congress, and they know perfectly well that such a resolution could sometimes be blocked for ninety days by a small minority strategically placed, even though a large majority in both Houses, when the matter came to a vote, would take note of and act upon the defect. This provision is so clearly reckless that further comment is needless.

SUMMARY

This is a bad bill in so many ways as to boggle the mind. It rests on radical disregard of the fundamental principle that no Congress can bind its successors to vote against their own consciences on issues of constitutional law or of high policy. It proceeds to try to settle such issues of law and policy at a time when public and professional attention cannot be concentrated on them, and when the factors that must affect their wise settlement cannot be known. It proceeds on a strained and unhistoric view of what Article V means in referring to "a Convention for proposing Amendments." It unwisely commits to the State Legislatures the superintendence of election of delegates to the Convention. It sets up a distortive scheme of representation at the convention. In a flatly unconstitutional provision, it excludes the President from the role unmistakably given him by Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution. It excludes State Governors from exercising, in this supremely important matter, as much function as they exercise in regard to every state law, however trivial. Unexplainedly and inexplicably, it makes Congress into a court of law, and forbids the real courts of law to decide legal questions arising under the Constitution. It provides for what, practically speaking, could and sometimes undoubtedly would amount to automatic submission of amendments proposed, or certified as having been proposed, by the "convention," however gross and palpable the defects in the convention procedures.

46. § 11(b)(1) (emphasis added).

There are other things wrong with this bill, but I believe I have identified its chief defects. I hope your Committee will do everything possible to see that it not become law.

Respectfully,
Charles L. Black, Jr. /s/
Luce Professor of Jurisprudence

ENRICHMENT SERIES

Amendment By National Constitutional Convention: A Letter to a Senator

CHARLES L. BLACK, JR.*

[Introductory Note: Article V of the United States Constitution provides that "the Congress,...on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments...." This language, seemingly clear in meaning on the surface, has spawned a constitutional controversy of significant dimensions. In short, does the Article V language authorize state applications for a national Constitutional Convention limited as to subject matter, or does the Article solely recognize state applications for a general convention, to propose such amendments as seem proper to the Convention?

Recently, Professor Black wrote the following letter concerning the controversy to Senator Edward Kennedy (D. Mass.), Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The letter provides a valuable dissertation on the history and meaning of the applicable language of Article V, according to a leading constitutional scholar. In particular, the letter takes issue with the finding of a special committee of the American Bar Association that Article V authorizes Congress to establish procedures limiting a Constitutional Convention to the subject matter propounded in the state applications. The letter is reproduced as written, save for the addition of footnotes to sources cited in the manuscript.— Ed.]

* * *

YALE LAW SCHOOL
New Haven, Connecticut 06520

June 1, 1979

Honorable Edward Kennedy, Chairman
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, D.C.

My Dear Senator Kennedy:

About seven years ago, Senator Sam Ervin's bill,[1] concerning the processing of state-legislative applications for a constitutional convention under Article V, had passed the Senate and was in the House Judiciary Committee. At that time, I wrote a letter to the late Congressman Celler, concerning this bill, which I thought a very bad one, both as to policy and as to constitutionality. This letter was afterwards published by the Yale Law Journal, under the title, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman.[2] I enclose a copy of this composition as printed.

*B.A., 1935; M.A. 1938, Texas; LL.B., 1943, Yale; LL.D. (hon.) 1975, Boston. Sterling Professor, Yale Law School.— Ed.

[1] S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971) (Senator Ervin). For the version of the bill as it passed the Senate, see S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess., 117 CONG. REC. 36804 (1971).

59-609 O - 80 - 16

That letter addressed itself to the whole Ervin bill; much of it is not therefore relevant to any pressing current issue, and will not become so relevant unless some version of this bill surfaces again. But the most important question raised by the bill was the question whether state applications for a convention limited as to subject-matter were valid, and so effectively imposed an obligation on Congress to call a convention. The Ervin bill rested on the assumption that they were valid; my contention was that they were not, and that consequently no number of them could create a legal or moral obligation on Congress's part.[3] This issue, as you have shown yourself to be aware, is today, or may shortly become, a live one.

I have had occasion recently to go very carefully over what I then wrote on this issue, and I stand by every word I said.

One very important development must be noted. The state of this controversy has been heavily affected by the appearance, since my letter to Congressman Celler was written, of a Report by a Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee of the American Bar Association, Amending of the Constitution by the Convention Method Under Article V (1974) [hereinafter cited as Bar Report]. This Report commits itself to the view that applications for a subject-limited convention are valid.

I have reason to believe that this Report now exerts a powerful influence. It is my view that it is deeply flawed, and entirely fails to make its case on this issue. I am sure you will agree that such a fateful question as this cannot be decided on the basis of the respective aggregate prestige of the sponsors of the respective views, but must at last be settled, rather, by the weight of argument. I intend, therefore, to give you my grounds for persevering in my former conviction. I shall not reargue the entire case, since my earlier writings are in your hands, but shall confine myself to considering new aspects either directly raised or suggested by the Bar Report.

I shall, for clarity's sake, put headings over my principal topics.

[2] Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 YALE L.J. 189 (1972) [hereinafter cited as Black].

[3] Id. at 196-204, especially 199.

Introductory

The Constitution's Article V provides for a method of amendment never till now used. "The Congress,...on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments...."[4] These proposals, to become effective, must be ratified by three-fourths of the States, just as is true of proposals passing through Congress, the method of proposing always used up to now.[5]

Recently, many State Legislatures have passed resolutions asking Congress to call a Convention "for the purpose of proposing" some specific amendment, spelled out in detail. It now seems possible that one or more of these proposals will be the subject of convention applications from 34 States, the magic two-thirds.

We must separate our judgment on the merits of any particular amendment from our judgment on the legitimacy of the procedure. If we make a wrong precedent now, as to the meaning of Article V, we will open wide a door probably never to be closed. Before we pack our bags for this Convention, let's stop and ask "Is this trip really necessary?"

I think that the applications now on file are nullities, imposing no obligation on Congress. I think the Article V language means a "general Convention," to propose such amendments as seem good to that Convention. And I think that the state applications, to be effective, have to ask for that, and not for something radically different—a severely limited Convention. Applications asking for something other than what is meant by Article V are nullities, and thirty-four times zero is zero.

At the very least—and this is all that really must be decided now—each pending application for a Convention "for the purpose of proposing" some minutely described amendment is a travesty of anything the Framers of Article V could have conceived. Absolutely nothing faintly supports such an absurd distortion of a provision for a deliberative process. I hope Congress will not be intimidated by such "applications"; they place Congress under no obligation whatever.

"Plain Meaning" and Context

The question, first and last, is what is meant, in Article V, by the words, "...a Convention for proposing Amendments...." The best approach to ascertaining the plain meaning of these words is to ask what they would mean, without modification, in the procedural context in which they are intended to be used. Lawyers sometimes "track the statute," phrasing allegations or prayers in the exact statutory language. Suppose a state legislature, "tracking" Article V, were to transmit to Congress a paper saying: "Application is hereby made that Congress call a convention for proposing amendments"—the exact language of Article V. Two and only two questions could arise: First, would such an application be valid. Secondly, what would it mean.

[4] U.S. CONST. art. V.

[5] Id.

I am tempted to say that these critical questions answer themselves. But there has been so much confusion on this that I will—though embarrassed by the obviousness of what I shall have to say—go a little further.

First, the application, so worded, would of course be valid. Thirty-four such applications would oblige Congress to call a convention (provided Congress could agree on the procedural and constituency specifications—and there would be a duty resting on each member of Congress to try so to agree). That would be true exactly because Article V is "tracked." How could it be that an application for the very thing the Article mentions, in the very words of the Article, would not be valid?

Secondly, the words used would mean "a general, unlimited convention to 'propose' such amendments as it thinks proper." Since I can think of no possible basis for doubting this, I cannot know how to support this conclusion, beyond pointing to its obviousness. Perhaps one might go so far as to ask, "If not that, what would they mean?"

Observe how putting the matter this way transforms the "plain meaning" and contextual issues. We are not talking, any longer, about which of two "plain meanings" the Article V language has. Unless one is prepared to contest the answers to my two questions regarding this "tracking" application, one must start from the position that the Article V language has one plain meaning that is beyond doubt—that "a Convention for proposing Amendments," whatever else it may mean, plainly means "a general, unlimited convention."

Establishment of this crucial point quite changes the focus of inquiry. When we inquire now whether a state application for a limited convention asks for what Article V means, we are inquiring whether, in addition to its incontestably plain conferral, on the legislatures, of a very significant power, the power to force the call of a general constitutional convention, Article V is to be taken to give them, as well, a different power, not at all obviously meant by Article V. In an inquiry concerning correct amendment procedure, where, more than anywhere else, very clear legitimacy is requisite, I should think that great clarity of justification should be looked for before one adds, to plain meaning, another meaning far from plain.

The Bar Committee Report adopts, perhaps unconsciously, the rhetorical device of conceding that the general, unlimited convention is a possibility, but of doing so rather off-handedly, after having fully stated its case for the limited convention.[6] (The Report does not, so far as I can tell, explicitly bring out that the very bill before them, the Ervin bill, was unconstitutional root and branch, even on the Bar Committee's own view, because, in its Section 2, it limited the state legislatures to asking for subject-limited conventions.[7])

But this order of presentation has to be reversed. We start with the plain fact that Article V means at least "a general convention." Seen from that perspective, the Report brings forth nothing near sufficiently weighty to support the addition of a second and far from plain meaning.

The Report invokes the concept of equality: "[T]he convention method...was intended to stand on an equal footing with the congressional method."[8] But so it stands, if Article V be taken to refer only to a general convention. Such a convention, as one of the two "proposing" bodies under Article V, would stand exactly on an "equal footing" with Congress, the other "proposing" body under Article V. The equality to be sought, as to national concerns, is an equality between the two national bodies to which the "proposing" function is given.

The Bar Report puts forward a "greater includes the less" argument, seeing "no sound reason as to why they [the state legislatures] cannot invoke limitations in exercising..." their authority to procure a convention call.[9] (Note here the assumption that the burden of persuasion rests on the adversary, without saying why. This is hardly worthy of the Bar Association!) This argument ignores the fact—which underlies much of the Bar Report's other reasonings—that a general convention and a limited convention are different in kind. They are as different in kind as (1) the freedom to marry; and (2) the freedom to marry one of two or three people designated by somebody else.

The Report argues that Article V must mean a limited convention, because otherwise the state legislatures would be "discouraged" from applying for conventions.[10] This argument rests on a poorly concealed begging of the question. Only if we assume in advance that limited conven-

[6] ABA SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION STUDY COMMITTEE, AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION BY THE CONVENTION METHOD UNDER ARTICLE V, (1974) [hereinafter cited as BAR REPORT].

[7] The BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 18, states: "[W]e consider it essential that implementing legislation not preclude the states from applying for a general convention. Legislation which did so would be of questionable validity since neither the language nor history of Article V reveals an intention to prohibit another general convention." See also discussion in Black, supra note 2, at 189, 196-204.

[8] BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 11-12.

[9] Id. at 16.

[10] Id.

tions are meant by Article V is there anything improper or regrettable in legislatures' being "discouraged" by their not being available. We are all "discouraged" in some ways by the state of the law.

But—more fundamentally—what are the legislatures being "discouraged" from doing? From asking for a general convention? But the assumption of the Bar Report is that they are "discouraged" from that already, by the very nature of the general convention. From asking for limited conventions? But if that is what is meant the argument is a squirrel-cage; the very thing we are talking about is whether the legislatures are entitled at all, as a matter of law, to force the call of limited conventions. The Committee seems to be saying that, if it be held that the sound law of the matter is that Article V does not empower the legislatures to force the call of limited conventions, they will be discouraged from asking for these. Quite.

Remember, too, Senator, that the supposed "discouragement" is to arise from a fear of the very thing—a general convention—that is incontestably meant by the Article V language, provided one agrees with the arguments with which I began this section.

(There is, by the way, a startling paradox here. Since three-quarters of the state legislatures must, under the usual procedure, ratify any amendment "proposed" by a general convention, it is a little hard to explain a great fear, on the part of these same legislatures, that they may be overwhelmed by unwanted amendments. Whom are they afraid of? I leave the resolving of this paradox to those who are so vigorously supporting these state-legislature applications. The problem is only shifted by the thought, doubtless not likely of frequent realization, that state conventions may be designated by Congress as the ratifying bodies; fear of the headlong folly of such conventions is a fear of the people who will elect them. Why, indeed, is one so afraid of the general national convention? Is it well to trust any part at all of the amendment process to people who, you think, would go wild if you turned them loose?)

These Bar Report arguments are poor stuff in themselves. To put them in the context I believe to be established by the opening paragraphs of this section, they are obviously not of a weight sufficient to support a second meaning, far less than plain, in addition to the quite plain meaning of the phrase, "...a Convention for proposing Amendments..."

I stress once again that, if I am right about the meaning of the Article V language, applications for a limited convention are not applications for the thing meant by Article V, are therefore not valid Article V applications, and so impose no obligation on Congress.

The Debates in the 1787 Convention

The Bar Report's treatment of these should be set out in full:

The debates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 make clear that the convention method of proposing amendments was intended to stand on an equal footing with the congressional method. As Madison observed: Article V "equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other." The "state" method, as it was labeled, was prompted largely by the belief that the national government might abuse its powers. It was felt that such abuses might go unremedied unless there was a vehicle of initiating amendments other than Congress.

The earliest proposal on amendments was contained in the Virginia Plan of government introduced in the Convention on May 29, 1787 by Edmund Randolph. It provided in resolution 13 "that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto." A number of suggestions were advanced as to a specific article which eventuated in the following clause in the Convention's Committee of Detail report of August 6, 1787: "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose."

This proposal was adopted by the Convention on August 30. Gouverneur Morris's suggestion on that day that Congress be left at liberty to call a convention "whenever it pleased" was not accepted. There is reason to believe that the convention contemplated under this proposal "was the last step in the amending process, and its decisions did not require any ratification by anybody."

On September 10, 1787 Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts moved to reconsider the amending provision, stating that under it "two thirds of the States may obtain a Convention, a majority of which can bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the State-Constitutions altogether." His motion was supported by Alexander Hamilton and other delegates. Hamilton pointed to the difficulty of introducing amendments under the Articles of Confederation and stated that "an easy mode should be established for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new System." He felt that Congress would be "the first to perceive" and be "most sensible to the necessity of Amendments," and ought also to be authorized to call a convention whenever two-thirds of each branch concurred on the need for a convention. Madison also criticized the August 30 proposal, stating that the vagueness of the expression "call a convention for the purpose" was sufficient reason for reconsideration. He then asked: "How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?" As a result of the debate, the clause adopted on August 30 was dropped in favor of the following provision proposed by Madison:

"The Legislature of the U.S. whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U.S."

On September 15, after the Committee of Style had returned its report, George Mason strongly objected to the amending article on the ground that both modes of initiating amendments depended on Congress so that "no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive...." Gerry and Gouveneur Morris then moved to amend the article "so as to require a convention on application of" two-thirds of the states. In response Madison said that he "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application." He added that he had no objection against providing for a convention for the purpose of amendments "except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided."

Thereupon, the motion by Morris and Gerry was agreed to and the amending article was thereby modified so as to include the convention method as it now reads. Morris then successfully moved to include in Article V the proviso that "no state, without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."[11]

As to the first paragraph in this passage: I have already dealt with the "equal footing" point.[12] I don't know of anything in the 1787 debates at Philadelphia that supports the statement with which the above quotation opens. I dare say the Bar Committee didn't either, for the Madison quote is not from the Philadelphia records, but from the Federalist.[13] Nor does it weigh very much on either side of the present controversy; the origination "of the amendment of errors" might be accomplished by forcing the call of a general convention. As to what "prompted" the "state" method, or who on earth "labeled" it that, there is little or no evidence; the Bar Report cites none. The last sentence of the paragraph weighs nothing on the present scale; a general convention would of course be a "vehicle of initiating amendments other than Congress," quite as well as would a limited convention. More so.

[11] Id. at 11-14.

[12] See text accompanying note 8 and following, supra.

[13] THE FEDERALIST No. 43, at 315 (Wright ed. 1961 Belknap Press) (J. Madison).

For whatever reason, the Bar Report, in mentioning the Virginia Plan's provision for amendment without the assent of the National Legislature, does not tell us that this latter provision, excluding Congress, was repeatedly postponed, by vote after vote, and never passed, so that the Committee of Detail went into session with nothing resolved on except that there should be "Provision...for the Amendment of the Articles of Union...."[14] The suggestion that any policy at all emerges from all this would be (or is?) simply ridiculous.

The rest of the Bar Report's quoted treatment of the 1787 Philadelphia debates is of a not unknown genre of "legislative history" —the kind that tells you a few things here and there, but never quite gets down to explaining why they prove what they are obviously put forward to prove. Marching on my own feet, I will discuss first the most critical juncture, the action on September 15, 1787, by which the language now under scrutiny was added. I think it well to put before your eyes the whole (very short) episode, as reported by Madison, beginning with the Article as it stood before this language was voted in:

> Art—V. "The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the (1 & 4 clauses in the 9.) section of article 1."
>
> Mr. Sherman expressed his fears that three fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether or depriving them of their equality in the Senate. He thought it reasonable that the proviso in favor of the States importing slaves should be extended so as to provide that no State should be affected in its internal police, or deprived of its equality in the Senate.
>
> Col: Mason thought the plan of amending the Constitution exceptionable & dangerous. As the proposing of amendments is in both the modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second, ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case.

[14] 2 THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 133 (Farrand ed. 1937) [hereinafter cited as FARRAND].

Mr. Govr. Morris & Mr. Gerry moved to amend the article so as to require a Convention on application of 2/3 of the Sts

Mr Madison did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call Convention on the like application. He saw no objection however against providing for a Convention for the purpose of amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided.

The motion of Mr. Govr Morris and Mr. Gerry was agreed to nem: con (see: the first part of the article as finally past).[15]

You will note that not only Mason but also Sherman objected to the amending article, as it then stood. The Bar Report mentions only Mason; I can't think why. While Mason, broadly, thought amendment was too difficult under the article as it stood, Sherman thought, broadly, that it was too easy, and therefore dangerous. He feared, specifically, the amending power of the States. Why does the Bar Committee think the immediately following alteration (which was to the present form) was proposed by Morris and Gerry to meet Mason's fears, and not to meet Sherman's fears? As Madison immediately saw and said, the Morris-Gerry proposal did not respond to Mason's fears at all, so far as Congress's role went. The proposal, instead, put another body, the convention, between the state legislatures and the passage of an amendment to the Constitution. This interposition of another, nationally-oriented body might more plausibly be seen as a response to Sherman's fears of "the States."

In only one way was this change possibly responsive to Mason's speech. He was, you will note, afraid that "the people" could not obtain amendments they wanted. If any one thing is certain about 1787 thinking, it is that "the people" and "the legislatures" were not thought to be the same thing—as some recent blusterings seem to assume they are. On the other hand, it was conventions that were seen as the organs of "the people." This is why the new Constitution was sent out for ratification by conventions rather than by the legislatures. I am not guessing; this thought occurs at many points, but is best expressed by Madison, on June 5, 1787, in defending this submission to conventions: "...[H]e thought it indispensable that the new Constitution should be ratified in the most unexceptionable form, and by the supreme authority of the people themselves."[16] That is what he thought a convention embodied.

[15] Id. at 629-30 (footnotes omitted).

[16] 1 FARRAND, supra note 14, at 123.

It is possible then, that the insertion of a convention mode of proposal may have been conceived as a partial satisfaction of Mason's concern about "the people." But if that is true, then the suggestion is not that such a body, the visible organ of "the people," was to be led in with blinders put on by the legislatures, who were contrasted with "the people" in the discussion of the mode of ratification to be chosen for the new Constitution. Mason's fears, if they concerned the power of "the people," would be best answered by a provision for a general convention, wherein "the people" had most ample scope of authority.

It is to be noted, moreover, that Gerry (who co-proposed the present language) and Mason (whom it was supposed to mollify) were both, some minutes later on the same day, going to refuse to sign the new Constitution on the ground that a new "general Convention" was not to be absolutely mandatory, as they thought it should be.[17] How likely is it that people so minded would be pushing on the same day for subject-limited conventions? Is it not more likely that, disappointed in not getting an absolutely mandatory second general convention, they were pushing for the next best thing—the chance to get such a general convention by legislative applications?

The only other passages of any importance concern the Committee of Detail's August 6 provision (quoted by the Bar Report, above) and the September 10 change therein.

The Bar Report rightly sees that the August 6 proposal was for a convention, to be summoned on application of two-thirds of the legislatures, that would have final power to amend, without "ratification by anybody."[18] What the Bar Committee seems not to have seen is that, even if this provision did allow the legislatures to limit such a convention to a particular subject or proposal, the propriety of that dispensation, in the case of a convention with final power, needing no ratification, is a different thing, by light-years, from the propriety or necessity of limiting a convention whose proposals do have to be ratified. The two things have nothing to do with each other. The Bar Committee's failure to see this is the more remarkable since it is a difference alluded to in an article they cite just at this point, and on the very page they cite.[19]

Above all, the Bar Committee does not seem impressed by the fact that this August 6 proposal, on which they seem to be placing some sort of reliance, was rejected and thrown out, on September 10, on the grounds that it gave too much power to two-thirds of the states (Gerry)[20] and that "The State Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers" (Hamilton).[21] (Gerry, be it remembered, was a co-mover of the language now in Article V.)

[17] 2 FARRAND, at 631-32.

[18] BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 12.

[19] See Weinfeld, Power of Congress Over State Ratifying Conventions, 51 HARV. L. REV. 473, 481 (1938), cited at BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 42 n.21.

The most curious thing, confounding confusion, is that the phrase "for an amendment of this Constitution" (see the August 6 provision, quoted in the Bar Report, above) probably meant "for the process of amendment of..."—using the word "amendment" to mean this process of amending or its general result, rather than what we would call, in a different phrase, "an amendment to" the Constitution. I have three contemporary examples of this usage. Williamson, a delegate, wrote James Iredell, on July 22, 1787, from Philadelphia, that he hoped the whole "system" agreed on in Philadelphia "may fairly be called an amendment of the Federal Government."[22] Charles Pinckney, in the South Carolina ratification debates, spoke of the aim in Philadelphia as "the formation of a new, or the amendment of the existing system."[23] In Federalist No. 40, Madison refers to the Virginia proposal of the Annapolis Convention as being "towards a partial amendment of the Confederation."[24] The use of the word "partial" implies that "an amendment of the confederation," without that word, would have meant "an unlimited process of alteration." By no possibility does even the phrase "toward a partial amendment," applied to the Virginia initiative for Annapolis, refer to a specific alteration. "An amendment of the Constitution" did not mean the same thing to these people as "an amendment to the Constitution"; I would be interested in seeing examples to the contrary.

Now what does all this prove? Of course, next to nothing. I have been through all this material only because the Bar Committee seems somehow to be assuming it helps their case, without ever saying how or why. I submit that my discussion destroys that assumption. And I think that some of the points I have made may help my own case a little. But the overriding fact is that, however desperately we would like to, we don't know very much about what underlay each vote in Philadelphia in 1787. The records are obviously fragmentary; it is known they became more so as the summer wore on, toward that September 15 on which the crucial vote was taken,[25] two days before fatigued adjournment.

[20] 2 FARRAND, supra note 14, at 557-58.
[21] Id. at 558.
[22] 3 FARRAND, at 61.
[23] Id. at 248.
[24] THE FEDERALIST No. 40, at 291 (Wright ed. 1961 Belknap Press) (J. Madison).
[25] The proceedings of Sept. 15, 1787, are recorded in 2 FARRAND, supra note 14, at 621-40.

The Bar Report's Treatment of Eighteenth Century State Material

Again, I think it best to put before your eyes the short Bar Report passage:

> Both pre-1787 convention practices and the general tenor of the amending provisions of the first state constitutions lend support to the conclusions that a convention could be convened for a specific purpose and that, once convened, it would have no authority to exceed that purpose.
>
> Of the first state constitutions, four provided for amendment by conventions and three by other methods. Georgia's Constitution provided that
>
> "no alteration shall be made in this constitution without petitions from a majority of the counties,...at which time the assembly shall order a *convention to be called for that purpose, specifying the alterations to be made, according to the petitions referred to the assembly by a majority of the counties as aforesaid."
>
> Pennsylvania's Constitution of 1776 provided for the election of a Council of Censors with power to call a convention
>
> "if there appear to them an absolute necessity of amending any article of the constitution which may be defective....But the articles to be amended, and the amendment proposed, and such articles as are proposed to be added or abolished, shall be promulgated at least six months before the day appointed for the election of such convention, for the previous consideration of the people, that they may have an opportunity of instructing their delegates on the subject."
>
> The Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 directed the General Court to have the qualified voters of the respective towns and plantations convened in 1795 to collect their sentiments on the necessity or expediency of amendments. If two-thirds of the qualified voters throughout the state favored "revision or amendment," it was provided that a convention of delegates would meet "for the purpose aforesaid."[26]
>
> *Note the similarity between this language (emphasis ours) and the language contained in the earliest drafts of Article V [footnote by the Committee].

(I have left in the starred footnote, which is on the same page as the quoted text, because it is an excellent illustration of the embarrassing inconsequence of many of the semi-reasonings in the Bar Report. The reference is to the August 6 proposal of the Committee of Detail, which I have discussed above. Note the following: First, this August 6 proposal was not a "draft" of Article V; it was a provision that was rejected, and replaced by Article V.[27] But that is the least of it, for, secondly, one reels at the idea that the mere use of the general and neutral word "purpose," in two different passages, implies that the "purposes" themselves resemble each other in any way. Thirdly, if the Committee thinks this similarity does have any probative force, what in the world do they make of the fact that the word (like the phrase containing it) is not found in the version of Article V that actually did pass and is now in the Constitution?

[26] BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 14-15.

This footnote is typical. A hint is dropped that something is being proved or suggested by some such "evidence" as this. (If that is not the intention, why the footnote?) On anything like competent analysis, this insinuated probative force turns out to be zero. But meanwhile a cumulation of such hints creates, in the minds of the unwary, the impression that there is a rich historical foundation for the Bar Committee's conclusions. I hope you will ponder this example well.)

To turn to the text of the Bar Report, just quoted: The Georgia material cited by the Bar Committee has to do with a "convention" that is to be empowered to alter the Georgia Constitution—not merely to "propose" alterations.[28] I can't see how anyone would think that the propriety of firm instructions to a convention so empowered could have anything to do with the interpretation of a provision (in our Article V) regarding a convention that is merely to "propose." (The Bar Committee seems chronically blind on this; see above .)[29]

Perhaps even stranger, however, is the fact that the ABA Committee did not turn four pages further along in Poore (their source) and note that the Georgia Constitution of 1789 (more nearly contemporary to the federal Constitution than was the one they do cite) provided:

> Sec. 7. At the general election for members of assembly, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, the electors in each county shall elect three persons to represent them in a convention, for the purpose of taking into consideration the alterations necessary to be made in this constitution, who shall meet at such time and place as the general assembly may appoint; and if two-thirds of the whole number shall meet and concur, they shall proceed to agree on such alterations and amendments as they may think proper; Provided, That after two-thirds shall have concurred to proceed to [27] See 2 FARRAND, supra note 14, 557-59, 629-30.

[28] See GA. CONST. art. LXIII (1777), at 1 B. POORE, THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, COLONIAL CHARTERS, AND OTHER ORGANIC LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES 383 (1878) [hereinafter cited as POORE].

[29] See text accompanying notes 18-19, supra.

> alterations and amendments, a majority shall determine on the particulars of such alterations and amendments.[30]

This "convention," even though fully empowered to amend without further need of ratification, was made a "general" convention. How can Georgia be counted as on the Bar Committee side?

The Pennsylvania Convention, also relied on by the Bar Report, is to be a convention empowered to change the Constitution, and not merely to propose changes.[31] How, again, can the proprieties as to limitation of such a convention be thought to carry over to the Article V "convention," whose acts must, to have effect, be ratified by three-quarters of the States?

Just flipping the pages of Poore, the authority cited by the ABA Committee, I am surprised (or perhaps when younger would have been surprised) that they didn't go just a little further into Poore's two volumes than they did. It might have been instructive to know, for example, that the New Hampshire Constitution of 1784—much closer in time to the federal Convention than is either of the two State Constitutions they do choose to cite—provides for the call of an unlimited convention for proposing amendments.[32]

Their handling of the Massachusetts material needs special treatment; I refer you to the just-quoted part of the Bar Report.[33]

Although the reference there is specific, and there is direct quotation, no citation is given. The obvious reference is, however, to Chapter VI, Article X, of the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780. Let me set out this Article, without deletions:

> X. In order the more effectually to adhere to the principles of the constitution, and to correct those violations which by any means may be made therein, as well as to form such alterations as from experience shall be found necessary, the general court which shall be in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five shall issue precepts to the selectmen of the several towns, and to the assessors of the unincorporated plantations, directing them to convene the qualified voters of their respective towns and plantations, for the purpose of collecting their sentiments on the necessity or expediency of revising the constitution in order to amendments.
>
> And if it shall appear, by the returns made, that two-thirds of the qualified voters throughout the State, who shall assemble and vote in consequence of the said precepts, are in favor of such revision or amendment, the general court shall issue precepts, or direct them to be issued from the secretary's of-

[30] GA. CONST. art. IV, § 7 (1789), in 1 POORE, supra note 28, at 387.
[31] See PA. CONST. § 47 (1776), in 2 POORE, at 1548.
[32] N.H. CONST. pt. II (1784), in 2 POORE, at 1548.
[33] See text accompanying note 26, supra.

fice, to the several towns to elect delegates to meet in convention for the purpose aforesaid.

And said delegates to be chosen in the same manner and proportion as their representatives in the second branch of the legislature are by this constitution to be chosen.[34]

When you see this whole passage it is obvious that "the purpose aforesaid" is "revising the Constitution, in order to amendments." The voters are not to be canvassed on their wishes as to one or more specific amendments, but "for the purpose of collecting their sentiments on the necessity or expediency of revising the Constitution, in order to amendments."

This is completely confirmed by the title of this Article in the 1780 Massachusetts Constitution: "Provision for a future Revisal of the Constitution."[!][35]

One will look in vain in this passage for any suggestion that the vote to be taken by the General Court is to be on anything but the general question of the "necessity or expediency of revising the Constitution in order to amendments."

This latter phrase is not natural to us, but the only meaning it can bear in the context is "in order to make amendments." Exactly this usage of the phrase "in order to" is attested in the Oxford Dictionary, s.v. "order,"28b with a 1773 example from Burke [...in order to a treaty]. "Revise" undoubtedly bears its etymological meaning, given in the Oxford Dictionary with examples before and after 1780, of "To go over again, reexamine, in order to improve or amend."[36] All this easy dictionary learning—which took me ten minutes and would have taken the Bar Association Committee ten minutes—simply confirms what would be obvious anyway—that this Article X embodies a perfectly straightforward plan for collecting the sentiments of the voters on whether the constitution needs to be looked over with a view to its amendment, and if the voters are of this opinion, the summoning of a convention with a view to its amendment. There is not a hint, anywhere, that instructions as to subject-matter are to bind such a convention, or even to be issued to it. The Massachusetts system, as embodied in the Article, not only does not fit the use the Bar Committee made of it, but is a clearcut example of provision for a general convention to be called when the people think a new look at the constitution is needed, with a view to its amendment—exactly the sort of convention I believe is mandated by our Article V. Who would have guessed this, from the chosen quotations and summary given us by the Bar Committee?

[34] MASS. CONST. ch. VI, art. X (1780), in 1 POORE, at 972.

[35] MASS. CONST. ch. VI (1780), in 1 POORE, at 970.

[36] THE SHORTER OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY 1821 (3d ed. 1973).

The Nineteenth Century Record

In my earlier letter to Congressman Celler, described and cited above, I said that the notion that state legislatures may limit the subject-matter in their applications for conventions was "nothing but a child of the twentieth century."[37] I used Brickfield's tables, there cited, to establish that, until around the turn of our century, through all the turmoils until that time, nothing but general-convention applications were transmitted to Congress by the States.[38] This, if true, is very important, because it shows that, for more than a century after the Constitution went into effect, this Article V provision was not generally understood as empowering the state legislatures to set the agenda of any convention they applied for, or to apply for a convention so limited.

The Bar Report presents data on former state applications in such a manner as to make it difficult to get at the nineteenth century pattern.[39] But if you persevere through their material, you can see that it confirms my former statement. As far as these eyes can make out, all applications are in effect classified as "general" by the Bar Report, until 1893. There was one that year for direct election of Senators, and another such in 1895.[40] The next subject-matter limited application was in our own century. (The Bar Report cites a source of their own, an unpublished thesis not previously known to me,[41] which agrees with my own conclusion that the 1833 Alabama memorial, dealing with "nullification" was not really an Article V application at all.[42] And for some reason they do not put a 1790 application for "revision of the Constitution" under the "general" category, where of course it belongs.[43])

Think what this means. Through the controversies over the Alien and Sedition Laws, over the Embargo, over the "internal improvements" bills, over the Bank of the United States, over the early fugitive-slave laws, not one single state legislature acted as though it thought it had the power to force Congress to call a convention limited to one of these topics. It did not [37] Black, supra note 2, at 189, 203.

[38] Id. at 202-203.

[39] BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 59-69.

[40] Id. at 63.

[41] See Pullen, "The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution," 1951 (unpublished dissertation in Univ. of North Carolina Library), cited at BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 62.

[42] See BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 67; and Black, supra note 2, at 202.

[43] BAR REPORT, supra note 6, at 68.

even occur to Kentucky and Virginia, in the 1790's, when they were busy with "interposition" against what they felt to be unconstitutional actions of Congress, to go at the matter via a limited Article V convention. Even in the great nullification and slavery contests, of the 1830's and 1860's respectively, the states that submitted applications made them "general," according to the Bar Report's own sources and tabulations.

This is overpowering evidence of an original and long-continued understanding, broken (except for the two 1890's applications mentioned above) only in this century, when some state legislatures thought up a bright (and entirely self-serving) notion.

Conclusion

There is no good argument and no solid evidence to support the Bar Report—not enough to serve even after the Bar Committee, quite without warrant, tries to turn the question around so the burden of persuasion seems to lie on the other side. Their treatment of the 1787 Convention debates is either languid or fanciful. Nothing solid so much as tends to sustain their conclusion except the prestige of the Committee's members, and that is not enough to be decisive on a fundamental question regarding ultimate constitutional power.

I don't want to win this fight on any other ground than rightness. But it is fair to point out to you the great importance of the question. The national House of Representatives is the only body, anywhere, wherein the whole American people are represented in proportion to their numbers. The waves of pseudo-populist bilge, that would somehow identify the state legislatures with "the people," break against this rock. (This identification, moreover, would have seemed absurd to the delegates in Philadelphia, as I have already shown.) About half the American people live in nine states. Three-quarters of the states can contain as few as forty percent of the people. Anything that builds up the power of the state legislatures, counted one by one, is not a facilitation of democracy but in derogation of the American national democracy.

I am not attacking the senatorial system, which I believe in. (Indeed, I am just currently working on a defense of the senatorial pattern of representation, now under attack from another quarter.) Nor do I wish to deny to the state legislatures any power that is legitimately theirs. But the population-ratio among states now runs as high as 65 or 70 to one, between five and six times as high as the highest ratio at the coming into effect of the Constitution. A nation believing in democracy ought to think a long time, and weigh evidence and argument very carefully, before it makes a new precedent that moves further toward equating the one to the 65. And a nation that believes itself to be a nation ought likewise to hesitate before acquiescing in the flow of new power out to 50 legislatures.

I stress the word "precedent," Man and boy, I have been fighting off these "convention" applications for a long time. And I can assure you that if this road, now only a gleam in the legislatures' eyes, is ever opened, the "budget-balancing" amendment, silly and anti-constitutional as it is, will not be the worst you will see. Not by far.

Let me add one final word, of crucial present importance: I have argued, here as in my Celler letter, for the conclusion that an Article V convention must be entirely general, and that a state application asking for something other than that is void. I fully believe in this view. But it would be quite sufficient, for now, to hold to the far more modest proposition that, at the least, an application "for the purpose of proposing" a minutely described amendment is a mere travesty of grown-up constitutionalism, and indeed of the very word "propose," as applied to a solemnly assembled national constitutional convention. Assembling a convention for such a ministerial or rigorously channelled function is a bit of foolishness one can by no stretch of fancy think the Constitution calls for. It reminds me of Henry VIII's congés d'élire, which gave cathedral chapters the "right to elect" a bishop—namely, the bishop designated by Henry VIII. I fully argued this point in a 1963 article, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster.[44] The difference between a directly quoted amendment to be "proposed," and a clearly described amendment to be "proposed," is trivial. Many of the current applications are of this kind. I hope at least that Congress will not be intimidated by these. They cannot possibly be what Article V means, and should be regarded as obviously without force.

Yours very respectfully,

Charles L. Black, Jr.
Sterling Professor of Law

CLB/lm
Enclosures

[44] Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 957, 961-64 (1963).

TESTIMONY OF WALTER E. DELLINGER, PROFESSOR OF LAW, DUKE UNIVERSITY

Mr. DELLINGER. My mentor, Charles Black, has done such a fine job with this question that I do not think that I will recount, Senator, the historical review that is contained in my prepared statement. My view of that history was that the convention itself, and not Congress or the State legislatures, was granted the authority to determine the agenda of a convention and to determine the scope of its deliberations.

Rather than re-cover that well-trod ground, I thought it would be useful to take a few minutes and examine these bills from a slightly broader perspective.

The bills before the committee, it seems, have one evident purpose: to control and to domesticate an article V Constitutional Convention. With all respect to the very laudatory intentions of Senator Hatch and former Senator Ervin and the others behind these efforts——

Senator BAYH. I must confess that I must plead guilty here as being in that camp that is trying, as I am sure you observed from the question I asked John Feerick, I am trying, but I think it is important, of course, not to delude ourselves into recommending to people that which we are not quite sure we can deliver.

Mr. DELLINGER. I understand, Senator, that what you want to do is basically to domesticate and put some controls on a constitutional convention.

My belief that the legislation is ill considered is based on the notion that it threatens both to trivialize and to emasculate the convention method for proposing amendments.

I think the legislation is ill considered for two very different kinds of reasons.

First, I think it is unwise because it encourages State legislatures to make overfrequent resort to this mechanism by calling special-interest conventions for inappropriately narrow and shortsighted purposes.

My second and quite different objection is that this legislation could establish a precedent for congressional power to frustrate and hamstring the work of a wholly legitimate and proper constitutional convention if and when one should ever be needed.

Now, I am convinced, unlike some others, that the constitutional convention mechanism is a salutary one, and even though added in the last days of the Philadelphia meeting, is an important addition to the Constitution.

Properly conceived, it is a very important safeguard of ultimate democratic control over the organic law of the Nation.

I also agree, however, with Charles Pinckney, who said that "Conventions are serious things and ought not often be repeated."

Senator Hatch asked whether the convention mechanism was a dead letter. I think, Senator, it is proper to view the convention as an awesome device but one which serves us well, even as it stands and waits.

In this respect, it has much in common with another constitutional mechanism, the power to impeach and remove a President of the United States.

That, too, is a mechanism which has never been put to final use, but it is by no means a dead letter for that reason. The convention, like the power to impeach and remove a President, is an important part of the Constitution.

I think it is too important to be called into use for a narrow or trivially limited purpose.

Senator HATCH. If I could interrupt you for a second, one thing that bothers me, and I have great regard for both of you, is that under your interpretation where you can only call for a general convention, the only way you are going to have a convention under article V is if there is a general discontent with the Constitution itself.

If the States have no right to call for a convention on a specific issue, and have concern only about a specific issue, it seems to me we would never have a convention. Maybe I have oversimplified it, but that is a problem and concern that I have.

Mr. BLACK. It is not a dead letter to my mind. It is a final recourse. We have plenty of experience in amending the Constitution. We have amended it piecemeal on the one hand, and here we have the recourse if there is general discontent with the Government.

Senator HATCH. If the State has the sovereign right to call for the convention, it seems to me they should also have the right, to call for one on a limited basis or on a general basis. I am going to read your comments, and I certainly don't want to jump to any conclusions. If I am correct, it appears to me that Professor Black has taken the more extreme approach here today, extreme in the sense that he says that only a call for a general convention is in itself valid whereas others, such as Professor Dellinger, would at least countenance the validity of such applications, even though they could not actually limit the convention itself.

Would that be an accurate statement?

Senator BAYH. I am not sure Professor Dellinger had finished.

Senator HATCH. Why don't I let you finish.

Mr. DELLINGER. I will come to that point.

I think there is no difference on constitutional law between Professor Black and myself. I can conceive of circumstances in which Congress, perhaps, had become so oppressive that there was a critical need for a particular and very important amendment, or series of amendments, that States would seek a constitutional convention, fully realizing that it was within the convention's prerogative to survey the problem and determine what amendments the convention thought ought to be proposed. That convention might very well limit its deliberation to the pressing issue which called it into existence without necessarily reviewing all 26 amendments and every article of the Constitution, so that it would not in that sense be a "general convention" to produce a new document, but one called in very serious circumstances, and a convention that we would treat seriously by saying that this is indeed the body that was to propose the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. It might simplify things if I say I agree that a convention may limit itself, naturally.

Senator HATCH. I think anybody could agree with that.

Mr. DELLINGER. The position of the American Bar Association takes a different view than that I espouse, and I think their view proceeds largely from the underlying premise that what we are talking about is what they call the State mode of proposing constitutional amendments.

It naturally follows that if this is the "State mode," the State legislatures ought to be able to put it to any use they wish. I think that was the thrust of Senator Thurmond's remarks.

That is the fundamental error. There is no "State mode" for proposing amendments to the Constitution.

Senator HATCH. Professor Black says that the States, in calling for a constitutional convention, may only call one that is general.

You are saying that the States may call for a limited convention—this is not automatically invalid—but that the convention itself must be general.

Mr. DELLINGER. I can be quite precise about that point.

A proper convention, and the only proper convention under article V in my view, is one which has the authority to determine what amendment it ought to propose for ratification.

In asking whether a State legislature has applied validly for a convention, one is asking essentially a matter of statutory interpretation. Having concluded that a proper constitutional convention can propose any amendment it thinks necessary and desirable one can look at one of the State applications such as Idaho, and ask if Idaho has requested us to convene that kind of convention—what they asked for is a convention limited to the question of the balanced budget convention.

I suggest to you, Senator, if you read the Idaho application, you will see that they make it quite clear they are opposed to a convention that has authority to do anything other than propose an amendment, the very details of which are expressly set forth in the application. Therefore, one certainly should not construe their application as one calling for that which they make clear they oppose.

The proper response would be to inform Idaho that a convention has the power to decide finally what amendments are proposed. "If you understand that, and wish to invoke such a convention, we will do so and will honor your request if you are joined by 33 other States. But you may not control that convention and may not put limits on it. Let us know whether you want such a convention or not."

I think the States have been confused by the process of earlier State applications and the consideration of this legislation in Congress.

As I say, there is no "State mode" for proposing amendments. There is a congressional mode and a convention mode for proposing amendments.

One theme that emerges from the Philadelphia debates on article V is the expressed fear that State legislatures would enhance their own power at the expense of the central government. That takes on clear meaning if one considers, for example, the apportionment controversy, where if State legislatures could submit an amendment constitutionalizing malapportionment, and vote it up or down, and send it back to the same State legislatures for an up or down vote on ratification that is the very situation that Hamilton and others wanted to avoid.

It was a proposal——

Senator BAYH. Excuse me. Is there anything to keep the State legislators who petition from also being elected as delegates to the convention?

Mr. DELLINGER. No.

Senator BAYH. Could we constitutionally prescribe who can and who can't? Can we say that no Member of Congress or member of the State legislature can run for delegate?

Mr. DELLINGER. I would have grave doubts, Senator, about the validity of any congressional provisions for the convention other than those which are necessary to establish—minimally necessary—to establish the convention. It runs the risk of Congress hamstringing the convention.

Senator HATCH. Would you excuse me a second?

I apologize to both of you and to the other witnesses, because I have to go. I am going to read very carefully what you have to say. As Professor Black knows, I have in the past praised him a great deal.

If you will forgive me, I hate to leave this, because it has been an extremely interesting hearing, one of the more interesting and useful ones that we have had recently. I have presently disposed on the side of the right to have a limited convention, but I do have an open mind on these extremely difficult and novel constitutional questions.

There are many questions that are unanswered in my mind.

I am going to ask my staff member to ask some of these questions of you, if that is all right with you.

I will have one more question, if you are finished. Are you?

Mr. DELLINGER. No.

Senator HATCH. Excuse me. Go ahead, please.

Mr. DELLINGER. The "limited" convention, moreover seems to me to be a very bad way to make law, fundamental law.

The limited convention is a form of special interest politics run rampant. It allows aggressive single-issue fringe groups to engage in low-visibility lobbying through State legislatures for narrow proposals which then could be presented to a convention on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. I think that the record of the Constitutional Convention indicates that a deliberative process is what was in mind and not one that was conducted by a plebiscite of State legislatures which lends itself to single-interest politics which we have seen on the rise in this country.

I think what Congress should be telling the State legislatures is, "If you want a Constitutional Convention, the procedure for applying for one is simple." But the additional message to be conveyed is that the convention is a serious matter. It doesn't mean that you have to revise the whole Constitution, but any convention should be a mature, responsible body fully empowered to engage in constitutional drafting to evolve the amendment that the convention believes best responsive to the country's needs.

The States should be given that message, and not the message of this bill, which encourages single issue politics which allows a lobbying group to come in with a single-shot proposal and have the convention take it or leave it.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

Mr. DELLINGER. Mr. Chairman, my second objection is of a different nature. That is, that I think these bills run a risk of establishing a precedent of congressional power that could be used to destroy the viability of a convention as an essential but seldom-used safeguard against serious oppression.

Now, I don't have the sense from the Philadelphia Convention that there was any anticipation that this would be a frequent mode of amendment. Congress is much better situated, as you well know, to propose amendments, and to foresee the need for them. But on some occasions it was feared that this method of proposing amendments might fail.

What occasions would those be? Obviously, very serious ones indeed, where a constitutional amendment that would be desired by 38 ratifying States, after mature and thoughtful deliberation, could not be sent to them because of the recalcitrance of an oppressive and abusive Congress.

Senator BAYH. Let me be the devil's advocate here, if I might, because this is very interesting, and I think very helpful. It is just that feeling, I think, that some people have out in the country right now about Congress and about the fiscal question that causes this issue.

So you might crank that into your thoughts on the circumstances.

Mr. DELLINGER. I do not have any interest in taking a position on that particular issue. I am confident that if two-thirds of the people of this country seriously desired that amendment after informed reflection upon it, that it would be forthcoming from Congress.

We are talking about the need to utilize this other device only on those occasions in which Congress is simply not movable in spite of a mandated three-fourths, what we hope are three-fourths of the people who desire an amendment and Congress will not act.

Now, that is a time of very serious crisis in the country, and the convention mechanism, I think, was designed to be usable on such an occasion.

As George Mason said, when Congress becomes oppressive, there has to be some avenue of relief.

Now, I think that it would be wholly proper to have a Constitutional Convention at such a time, but what is critical about that kind of convention, one called to deal with a serious problem to which Congress was unresponsive, is that it should not be subject to the control of Congress.

From the very outset of the Philadelphia Convention, it was suggested in the words of the Virginia resolution that there must be a method of amending the Constitution for which the consent of Congress was unnecessary. That evolved as a convention mode, and yet under these bills, no amendments can proceed to the States without the assent of Congress.

Congress arrogates to itself the power to determine the scope of the convention's subject matter, and to block ratification of any proposed amendment which in Congress own view relates to or includes the general subject different from that set out by Congress.

Senator BAYH. I find a real test here on separating my thoughts from a specific amendment and a broader convention.

I might, to direct your thinking, point out that even in the Constitution, in the fifth amendment, as I recall, the convention is not immune from congressional action. It doesn't say on petition of a direct number of States, two-thirds of the States, that a convention shall meet, or automatically take place. It says Congress shall call one, and it is that "shall call" that we are dealing with here, I think—under what rules, regulations, or restraints may be placed, and so forth.

You are being very helpful here as to what were the limitations on the ability of Congress to meet that.

Mr. DELLINGER. I have no doubt that when two-thirds of the States submit valid applications, the Congress must call a convention. But such a convention is intended to be free of congressional control. That was the whole point of the matter. These bills, in the process of trying to domesticate the convention and make it usable for these single-issue constituencies, run the risk of creating a precedent for congressional control over the convention at a future time when a convention might truly be needed as a counter to congressional abuse.

Now, we have debated the issue, in the literature, of whether Congress has the power to set limits on a convention.

Senator Hatch's bill is subject to different interpretations. I read it as saying that Congress, itself, may undertake to frame what is the "general subject" to which the convention is limited, perhaps extrapolating or subsuming a number of different State applications into what Congress thinks is an appropriate general subject, and then Congress in its sole determination has the power to exercise what is essentially censorship over the content of any proposals that emanate from a Constitutional Convention and say, "No, they don't meet the standards we set up, they don't meet what we think is in the general subject, and we will not forward them to the States."

Were there ever a time in which the Nation needed to limit congressional abuse, this power would be quite dysfunctional and contrary to the notion that the convention mode was to be independent of Congress.

So what these bills do are really two different things that look in different directions.

They first of all encourage the use of the convention in a trivial matter for single-shot special-interest groups and hope to make that a viable possibility by controlling, domesticating, and shackling the convention under congressional superintendence or State legislative applications.

Then, on the other hand, these bills cripple the use of the convention as a serious deliberative body free and independent as the framers intended, by setting a precedent that it is up to Congress to control one of these conventions.

They do that by the subject matter limitations and by setting a precedent for further controls by Congress, such as a congressionally imposed voting requirement.

I enjoyed rereading the debate which you had, Senator Bayh, with Senator Ervin over the proper voting majority in a constitutional convention.

With all due respect, this is one issue on which I think the American Bar Association report was correct, that this is not a matter for this body to decide.

If we take a convention for proposing amendments seriously, and keep ever in mind the essential attribute that the proposing body is independent of Congress, then that convention itself ought to set its own agenda and its own voting requirements.

Mr. BLACK. I totally agree with that.

Mr. DELLINGER. Senator Bayh suggested that if there is one issue at the convention, the delegates are going to count noses, and if there is a bare majority for our side, but not two-thirds, the majority would not put through a two-thirds requirement. Such an outcome is not clear, however, if the convention is going to have the authority to determine the scope of its own deliberations and what subjects it will consider.

At that point, delegates who favor by a bare majority proposition X may well vote in favor of a two-thirds majority out of fear that if they do not propositions Y and Z may also be proposed.

I am not saying they would decide to require two-thirds, but it is more likely than it would be in the case you analyzed of a single issue convention. If there is only one issue, everybody knows how you want to vote on the voting majority question as soon as the convention meets.

My point is that if Congress can say to a convention for proposing amendments, that "You must submit for ratification any measure which a bare majority favored," as Senator Ervin's original bill provided, or if Congress may say to the convention, "You may not submit for ratification any provision that two-thirds agree on," why not impose a requirement of four-fifths, or 90 percent?

That seems to me to make clear the fact that in attempting to domesticate this device to make it useful to the single-issue, special-interest groups, what we have done is set up a system in which Congress need never fear that its abuses might be checked by a Constitutional Convention. As long as Congress can determine what the voting majority will be, and how broad or narrow the subject matter must be, and determine in its own view whether any proposed amendment satisfies congressional judgment in terms of its content, whether it is in or out of that proposed standard, then Congress need never fear that this is a device that would be used to hamstring the power of the Congress.

Senator BAYH. Let me look at the consequences.

I had two concerns about two-thirds. One is the procedural substantive one which I mentioned, and the other one I just sort of referred to tangentially, that an amendment to the Constitution should have a broad cross-section of support, a consensus of support and Mr. Black pointed out that we had to get three-fourths of the States, rather than three-fourths of the people.

What you are saying, then, gentlemen, is that you agree that article V does not give the States the right to petition for a limited convention, and basically you think that is good.

Mr. DELLINGER. I do, Senator, and Professor Black doesn't disagree, that the State might petition for a convention and recommend in the application, recommend a specific amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. It is entirely possible that a convention could be summoned and in fact one amendment only would be proposed, but that is a different thing than an obligation.

Mr. DELLINGER. That is right.

Senator BAYH. What concerns me is that if one follows your conclusion, and you may very well be right, and it really concerns me that you are right, and if we go ahead with this business of trying to do something, that we are holding out false hopes and we sort of turn cannon loose on the deck, but what concerns me about the no limitations interpretation is that we could then be confronted, either accidentally or we could intentionally, getting two-thirds. States asking for a general convention, and we could make the proposal repealing the Bill of Rights, and that may sound ridiculous, but when you see the issues and the emotions that have existed in this country at one time or another, and looking at Miranda, and other things, it might be that that convention could vitiate the greatest act in the history of mankind.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with that. If I had a choice, I would put in the two-thirds vote provision in Article V, but I cannot see how it can be read into it. The ordinary common rule is that you have to have a majority of the vote.

I think one defect of this bill is that in reporting on the Electoral College—which is something I have strongly defended—that would increase the power of less populous States.

If a convention were called with proportional representation, it couldn't pass anything without a majority. When they come together the first thing they have to pass is their rules, and they would certainly have to be passed by a majority. I wish it had said two-thirds, but since it is a way of circumventing Congress in whatever field of operation, I cannot read into it the power in Congress to set the voting rules for such a convention. I think it would be—it is too bad that it is not there, but I can't see it there.

Mr. DELLINGER. Senator, I understand your concern about not unleashing something we cannot control, and I think that the best way to insure that we don't have irresponsible use of a Constitutional Convention would be for this Congress to make it clear to the States, through legislation and otherwise, that exactly to the contrary to section 10 of this bill, that exactly to the contrary, a convention for amendments could propose whatever amendments they desire, and again, exactly opposite to section 10, that the convention shall propose whatever amendments the convention thinks appropriate.

I think that would have a very salutary effect of curbing the desire to submit petitions for a convention by legislatures which have not really taken it seriously.

I think it would totally change the dynamics of the State legislative process if a State legislator could confidently assert to his fellow members: "If we want to have a convention on nationalizing the broccoli industry, we can have one, but the convention will be free to propose whatever it wants, and I don't think nationalizing the broccoli industry is important enough a matter for this State legislature and 33 others to summon a Constitutional Convention."

I think we would find that caution exhibited in State after State.

Senator BAYH. You have been very kind. I would like to submit some questions to you in writing and then put them in the record.

Mr. DELLINGER. My colleague from Duke disagrees with my views, so I am trying to scoop my papers up quickly and give him a chance to speak.

Senator BAYH. I hope Senator Hatch's staff could address some questions.

Mr. DELLINGER. I am sorry. I think he did have some questions.

Senator BAYH. Why don't we give our colleague from Utah the same right to present questions in writing.

I know how busy you are, gentlemen, and thank you very much for appearing.

Mr. BLACK. May I submit this to you for the record?

Senator BAYH. Yes.

Thank you very much.

[Mr. Dellinger's prepared statement and additional material follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF PROF. WALTER E. DELLINGER

Mr. Chairman, the principal bill before this committee (S. 1710. "The Constitutional Convention Implementation Act of 1979", introduced by Senator Hatch) is predicated upon the fundamentally flawed premise that Congress or the state legislatures may exercise substantial control over the outcome of a "Convention for proposing Amendments". The specific erroneous assumptions underlying this bill are (1) that Congress may control any convention called for proposing amendments by limiting in advance the subject matter authority of that convention; (2) that state legislatures may validly specify in their applications that the convention be formally so limited; and (3) that Congress, in response to these limited requests, must call a limited convention, define, in rough or precise accord with the state applications, the scope of matters that may be considered, and mandate that the convention stay within those pre-set limits. It is possible that this legislation is also based upon an assumption that Congress can take applications for a narrowly limited convention, broaden those applications into a "general subject" defined by Congress, and call a convention on that more "general subject"—even if many of the applying state legislatures are in fact opposed to a convention with an expanded mandate.

For the reasons I have set forth at greater length in a recent article ("The Recurring Question of the 'Limited' Constitutional Convention", 88 Yale Law Journal 1623 (1979) I am persuaded that any Article V convention was intended to be free of the control both of Congress and of the state legislatures. One theme that emerges from the Philadelphia debates in 1787 is that Congress should not be given the exclusive authority to propose amendments; another is the fear expressed by Hamilton and others that state legislatures would propose amendments that would seek to enhance their own power at the expense of the national government. The framers of Article V therefore rejected a plan which would have permitted state legislatures to propose particular amendments for ratification. They created instead an alternative amendment method free of congressional or state legislative control: a constitutional convention free to determine the nature of the problem, free to define the "subject matter" and free to compromise the competing interests at stake in the process of drafting a corrective amendment. State legislatures may call for such a convention, but neither they nor Congress may control it.

A state legislature is free, of course, to suggest the particular problems it believes need to be addressed by a convention and free to recommend that the convention confine itself to those subjects. Any formal limitation on the subject matter authority of such a convention, however, would be inconsistent with one of the principal reasons for the creation of the convention device. If the state legislatures could limit the convention to consideration of a precisely worded amendment (as might be possible under the bill proposed by Senator Helms, S. 520), and restrict the convention to either proposing that exact amendment or taking no action at all, effective proposal power would have been shifted to the state legislatures and would exclude any national body from having an effective voice in shaping the amendment. If, on the other hand, the convention were confined not to an exact amendment, but rather to a "general subject" (as would be the case under the proposal by Senator Hatch, S. 1710) then Congress would likely become involved in defining and enforcing limits on the convention in the process of framing the call and judging whether the convention's product was within the "subject" established by Congress. This would conflict with a different goal of the drafters of Article V: the desire to create an alternative amendment process in which Congress had no significant control over the outcome.

An example of impermissible Congressional influence over a convention limited to a "general subject" by Congress may be drawn from Senator Hatch's own remarks. Senator Hatch's bill attempts to avoid the problem of undue state legislative control over the outcome of a convention by broadening the scope of limits over a convention to those of a "general subject". In explicating the term "general subject", Senator Hatch informed the Senate that a state application for a convention for the purpose of "improving the functioning of the executive branch of the Federal Government" would not fall within the same "general subject" as an application for a convention to consider "changes in the length of the presidential term of office." 125 Cong. Rec. S. 11872 (daily ed. Sept. 5, 1979). It strikes me as far from self-evident that these two proposals are not related to the same general subject: lengthening the term of the President would certainly be one conceivable way of improving the functioning of the executive branch. A Congress free to define the "general subject" of a convention called for by a series of different applications would have a good bit of influence over the agenda and the possible outcomes of such a convention. And a Congress free to reject a convention's proposed amendment changing the term of the President because it did not properly relate to the "general subject" of the functioning of the executive branch, as Senator Hatch suggests would be proper is a Congress with substantial control over the final product. Since the convention method was established as an alternative to Congress, the influential task of defining the agenda should be left where Article V intended it to be left: with the "Convention for proposing Amendments".

Legislation which attempts, as each of the proposed bills pending before the House and Senate does, to limit the authority of the convention to propose whatever amendments the convention may think appropriate is thus inconsistent with Article V in either or both of two ways. Limitations confining a convention to an amendment whose "nature" or text is narrowly defined impermissibly transfer proposing power to the applying state legislatures; more generous limitations to a "general subject" mitigate this flaw, but only at the risk of creating another: an impermissible transfer to Congress of power to define the subject and to check a convention's proposing authority by rejecting amendments which in Congress' own view are inconsistent with the "general subject" as defined by Congress.

Because the term "general subject" is so elastic, it is difficult to ascertain from S. 1710 to what extent it would permit legislatures narrowly to confine the scope of a convention, and to what extent it would permit Congress to define the contours of the convention's authority. In either case, I believe it impermissibly withdraws from a "Convention for proposing Amendments" the authority to determine what amendments to propose. It may be useful to the committee, however, to go beyond this basic objection and to consider how this bill might operate in practice. How, for example, would the presently pending applications for a convention to propose a balanced budget amendment fare if tested by standards set out in Senator Hatch's bill? Senator Hatch has stated that "the imminence of a convention [on] the matter of a balanced budget has clearly created the urgency for this legislation". 125 Cong. Rec. 11872 (daily ed. Sept. 5, 1979). It is therefore ironic that virtually all of the pending applications for such a convention would presumably be invalid under the standards proposed by S. 1710. This bill requires legislatures to state in their applications the "general subject" of the proposed convention, requires Congress to limit the convention to such a "general subject" and permits a convention to propose any amendments pertaining to that "general subject". Senator Hatch recognizes that thoughtful constitution drafting cannot be conducted as a plebiscite among a series of resolution passing state legislatures which specify the very amendment to be "proposed" by the convention. He notes that

". . . to the extent that a petition was required to be precise, either with respect to the specific amendment sought, or the specific language sought, there would be litle use for the convention itself. To limit the convention to the consideration of a single, meticulously worded amendment is to make the convention a farce."

The thirty "balanced budget" amendments now pending before Congress contemplate that the convention will be limited to the consideration of just such an impermissibly narrow amendment proposal. Arizona, for example, seeks a convention for "the specific and exclusive purpose" of requiring in the absence of a national emergency that the total of all federal appropriations made by the Congress for any fiscal year may not exceed the total of all estimated federal revenue for that fiscal year." None of the thirty applications comes close to stating anything that could conceivably be called a "general subject" and therefore do not provide a basis for calling a limited convention under Senator Hatch's bill.

Some might suggest, however, that the proper response to such applications under the Hatch bill would be for Congress itself to define a "general subject" (such as "federal fiscal policy" or "inflation control") under which these specific applications could be subsumed, and then proceed, once the requisite number of appliations had been reached, to call a convention limited only by this expanded "general subject." Such action by Congress, however, would be flatly inconsistent with the expressed wishes of many of the applying state legislatures. They have made it clear in their applications that they oppose a convention with an expanded mandate. The following states, for example, have stated in their applications that they seek a convention limied to the "specific and exclusive purpose" of considering an amendment that federal expenditures may not exceed federal revenues: Alabama, Colorado, Georgia, Maryland, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvaina, South Carolina, Virginia, Wyoming, Nebraska, Idaho, South Dakota, Arkansas, Utah, Texas, Arizona and Iowa. Half a dozen states (Colorado, Delaware, Louisiana, Idaho, North Carolina and Utah) explicitly provide that their applications are not to be counted towards the calling of a convention if the convention has the authority to propose an amendment which varies from the very narrowly defined "subject" set forth in the applications. Congress should not, under the Hatch bill or otherwise, act upon such applications, since they call for a convention shackled by narrow constraints that Congress has no power to impose, and since they expressly or by implication oppose the calling of a convention on any other basis.

One particular flaw of the proposed Hatch bill deserves separate mention: it flatly disregards the provision of Article V which grants to Congress the authority to determine whether amendments shall be ratified by state conventions or by state legislatures. Article V provides that amendments, whether proposed by Congress or by a constitutional convention, shall be valid "when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several states, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

Section 11(b) of Senator Hatch's bill provides that when a constitutional convention transmits an amendment to Congress, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House shall after 30 days automatically transmit that proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services, if Congress has failed to take action within that period. The Administrator of General Services must, in turn, transmit the proposed amendment to "the States" under Section 11(c). The amendment becomes valid when ratified by three-fourths of "the States" under Sec. 12. Who is to decide in the case of congressional inaction whether ratification is to be by the legislatures or by conventions? The Administrator of General Services? Each state legislature? The bill does not say.

The original Ervin bill, and its present counterpart, S. 520, introduced by Senator Helms, attempt to deal with this problem by specifying that if Congress takes no action on an amendment sent to it by a constitutional convention, ratification shall be by state legislatures. (Sec. 12(c)). (The Helms proposal itself is arguably objectionable on the ground that the choice of mode of ratification should be made affirmatively for each particular amendmend proposal by the Congress sitting at the time the amendment is proposed.) The Hatch bill deals with the problem by ignoring it altogether. Under the Hatch bill, an amendment could be sent to "the States" without any Congress (the Congress which enacted the 1979 implementing legislation, the Congress which received the convention's proposed amendment, or any other) ever having selected a mode of ratification. In attempting to provide for virually automatic submission of convention proposals to the states for ratification, the Hatch bill short circuits the one power that Congress must clearly exercise over a proposed amendment: selecting the mode of ratification.

If this Congress were to enact any legislation regulating constitutional conventions, I would suggest that an appropriate bill would contain the following provisions. First, and foremost, the legislation should clearly state, exactly to the contrary of Sec. 10 of S. 1710, that a "Convention for proposing Amendments" may propose for ratification whatever amendment the convention deems necessary. The bill should permit state legislatures which apply for a convention to recommend the subject or subjects which the convention should consider, and may even permit legislatures to append suggested texts of proposed amendments. The legislation should clearly inform applying legislatures, however, that the final determination of the subjects to be considered and the amendment(s) to be proposed rests with the convention itself. When 34 applications from state legislatures are received which call for a convention which the legislatures understand will have the final authority over its own agenda. Congress should proceed to call such a convention. Only applications received within a four or five year period should be aggregated, and states should be permitted to rescind applications at any time before the requisite total is reached. Such a convention may very well decide to limit itself to the subject recommended by applying state legislatures. Any amendments proposed by such a convention, however, should be submitted for ratification, with Congress determining, in accordance with Article V, whether ratification should be by state conventions or by state legislatures.

A further word is in order on the suggested four or five year limit for applications and on the suggestion that states should be permitted to rescind applications. A constitutional convention should be held only if there exists a genuine national consensus that such a convention is necessary, If, as I have suggested, state legislatures may not specify mandatory limits to be imposed on a convention, one device for establishing the existence of a consensus—agreement on the subject matter limits for the convention—is not available. A reasonably short time period within which "unlimited" applications are to be aggregated would help insure that a consensus existed that a convention was desired at given time in history, even if different states sought a convention with different purposes in mind. Permitting recission of applications would also facilitate the calling of a convention only when there was a consensus about the need for a convention. (Permitting states to rescind applications can quite arguably be distinguished from the controversial question concerning the right of states to rescind ratifications. A state which ratifies a proposed amendment has substantially all the information it needs—the text of the amendment—to make a formal, final and binding decision to ratify. A state which has applied for a constitutional convention, however, may be acting at an early, fluid stage of the amending process. It may have sought a convention in the expectation that the convention would likely confine itself to what appeared to be the only pressing problem calling for an amendment. In a subsequent year, it may appear that there are forces seeking a convention which would bend it to the consideration of other potential amendments which the first applying state did not desire to have considered. In those circumstances, a rescission of the application might properly commend itself to the first state.) If rescission of applications were permitted, it might be appropriate to extend the time within which "unlimited" applications are to be aggregated to six or seven years.

One further observation deserves reiteration. Congress has no authority under Article V or any other provision of the Constitution to call a constitutional convention merely because it feels that such a convention is necessary or desired by a number of people. Congress may call a convention only upon receipt of 34 valid applications. If 34 states seek only a so-called "limited convention", while opposing the calling of a real convention invested with full authority to propose amendments as contemplated by Article V, then Congress has a constitutional duty to decline to call a convention. Since S. 1710 purports to impose a contrary duty upon future Congresses, it is inconsistent with Article V.

[From the Duke Law Journal, Nov. 5, 1979]

Who Controls A Constitutional Convention—A Response

(By Walter E. Dellinger*)

Although I am pleased to have provoked such thoughtful comments from my colleague,[1] I do not agree that his objections to the thesis of my recent Yale Law Journal article[2] are either slight or marginal. I append this brief note to clarify the extent of the disagreement.

There are, to be sure, important points on which we agree. We agree, for example, that it would not be inappropriate for a constitutional convention to consider but a single subject and to propose a single corrective amendment.[3]

We differ quite sharply, however, with respect to a critical question: who is empowered to control a constitutional convention? Professor Van Alstyne has suggested that a group of applying state legislatures may dictate to a constitutional convention the exact text of the amendment the convention is to "propose" (if it takes any action at all). I have argued, on the contrary, that the "Convention for proposing Amendments"[4] is granted final authority under Article V to define the issues to be addressed and to determine the nature and extent of any amendments to be proposed for ratification.

I need not recount in detail the arguments I have previously set forth in support of this conclusion. Drawing upon the debates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787, I argued that the convention mode was created to provide a method of proposing amendments that was an alternative to proposal by Congress, but

---

*Professor of Law, Duke University; A.B. 1963, University of North Carolina; LL.B. 1966, Yale University.

[1] Van Alstyne, The "Limited" Constitutional Convention—The Recurring Answer, 1979 Duke L. J. 000.

[2] Dellinger, The Recurring Question of the "Limited" Constitutional Convention, 88 Yale L. J. 1623 (1979).

[3] For a contrary view, see Ackerman, Unconstitutional Convention, New Republic, Mar 3, 1979, at 8.

[4] U.S. Const. art. V.

independent as well of the state legislatures.[5] I suggested that the framers' rejection of a draft plan that would have permitted state legislatures to propose, as well as to ratify, amendments was in part a reflection of the concern expressed by Hamilton and others that "[t]he State Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers * * *"[6] By substituting a constitutional convention for the state legislatures as a body to propose amendments, the drafters created an alternative proposing mechanism free of both the possible self-interest of Congress and the potential parochialism of the state legislatures. By leaving to the states the final authority to ratify all amendments, the framers carefully divided the power to amend the Constitution between state and national interests.

Professor Van Alstyne's narrow reading of the authority of a constitutional convention is reflected in his recurring references to the convention method as the "state mode"[7] of proposing amendments. But there is no "state mode" for proposing amendments created by Article V; it provides, on the contrary, for a "Convention for proposing Amendments."[8] The phrase "state mode" is one which, as far as I can ascertain, was never used at the Philadelphia Convention. There was considerable discussion of the need for a method of proposing amendments that was independent of Congress. The alternative chosen, however, was proposal by a national convention, and not proposal by state legislatures.

If I am correct that a "Convention for proposing Amendments" has the final authority to determine what amendments to propose, how should Congress treat state legislative applications that may erroneously presume to predetermine the subject or even the exact text of any amendment that is to be "proposed" by the convention? The question is essentially one of construing the intent of the applying state legislature: Does the applying legislature wish its application to be counted as one seeking a convention if that convention will have final authority to determine the amendments to be proposed?

The hypothetical state application with which Professor Van Alstyne ends his correspondence obscures this critical issue, for it provides scant basis for determining whether the hypothetical legislature—which seeks a convention "for the purpose of" proposing a specific amendment—would favor or oppose calling an Article V convention authorized to make its own final judgment concerning what amendments to propose. As I noted in my earlier article, "[t]he use of the phrase 'for the purpose of' is not necessarily inconsistent with recognition by the applying legislature that the convention would be free to consider other amendments."[9] Having no knowledge of the context in which this future hypothetical application might then be brought forward (or of what the settled professional opinion might then be about these issues), one cannot confidently speculate about the assumptions made by such a legislature. My answer to Professor Van Alstyne's hypothetical is intended to emphasize that an application is not necessarily invalid simply because it is accompanied by a suggested amendment, as long as the applying legislature understands its proposed amendment only to have the force of a recommendation.

It is important to note, however, that most of the applications presently pending in the real world are free from this ambiguity. With only one or two exceptions, they apply for the calling of a convention for the sole and exclusive purpose of proposing an amendment the exact text of which is set out in the applications. These applications implicitly, and still others by express provision,[10] make it clear that they are opposed to a "Convention for proposing Amendments" if such a convention is empowered to determine for itself what amendments to propose. Professor Van Alstyne considers such applications to be valid. I do not.[11]

---

[5] See Dellinger, supra note 2, at 1624–30.
[6] II The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 558 (M. Farrand ed. 1937).
[7] See, e.g., Van Alstyne, supra note 1, at 1303.
[8] U.S. Const. art. V.
[9] Dellinger, supra note 2, at 1637.
[10] The North Carolina application, for example, sets out the exact text of the amendment it proposes and explicitly proves that "this application and request be deemed rescinded in the event that the convention is not limited to the subject of this application." N.C.S.J. Res. 5 (1979), reprinted in 125 Cong. Rec. S1123 (daily ed. Feb. 6, 1979).
[11] Professor Van Alstyne would have Congress act upon a sufficient number of such applications by calling a convention and imposing upon that convention whatever strictures of subject matter or predrafted text had been sought by 34 identical applications. I would not have Congress act upon such applications, since they call only for a convention shackled by constraints that Congress has no power to impose, and since they expressly or by implication oppose the calling of a convention on any other basis.

The Yale Law Journal

Volume 88
Number 8
July 1979

The Recurring Question of the "Limited" Constitutional Convention

by

Walter E. Dellinger

88 YALE L.J. 1623

59-609 O - 80 - 18

The Recurring Question of the "Limited" Constitutional Convention

Walter E. Dellinger†

Article V of the United States Constitution requires Congress to call "a Convention for proposing Amendments" upon application of two-thirds of the states.[1] Amendments proposed by such a convention, if subsequently ratified by three-fourths of the states, become part of the Constitution. Thus far in the history of the republic, no such convention has been called. In the last few years, however, thirty states[2] have submitted applications to Congress calling for a convention restricted to consideration of an amendment requiring a balanced federal budget. Only four more applications are necessary to reach the total of two-thirds specified by Article V; Congress is said to have been brought "to the brink of calling a constitutional convention."[3]

For a century following the Constitutional Convention in 1787, the only applications submitted by state legislatures under Article V contemplated conventions that would be free to determine their own agendas.[4] Only in this century have legislatures begun to submit ap-

† Professor of Law, Duke University.

1. Article V reads as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that . . . no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

2. As of May 31, 1979, twenty-nine of these state resolutions had been printed in the Congressional Record: 125 CONG. REC. S6085 (daily ed. May 16, 1979) (New Hampshire); id. at S5017 (daily ed. May 1, 1979) (Indiana); id. at S2363 (daily ed. Mar. 8, 1979) (Arkansas and Utah); id. at S1931 (daily ed. Mar. 1, 1979) (South Dakota); id. at S1932 (Idaho); id. at S1306 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979) (Alabama, Arizona, and Colorado); id. at S1307 (Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kansas, and Louisiana); id. at S1308 (Maryland and Mississippi); id. at S1309 (Nebraska and Nevada); id. at S1310 (New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, and Oregon); id. at S1311 (Pennsylvania and South Carolina); id. at S1312 (Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia); id. at S1313 (Wyoming); id. at S1123 (daily ed. Feb. 6, 1979) (North Carolina). As of May 31, 1979, the resolution by Iowa, S. J. Res. 1 (1979), had not been printed in the Congressional Record. For a discussion of the validity of these applications, see p. 1636 infra.

3. National Law Journal, Mar. 5, 1979, at 1, col. 2.

4. See Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 YALE L.J. 189, 202-03 (1972).

plications reflecting a different view. These applications are premised upon three assumptions: (1) Congress may limit in advance the subject matter authority of any convention called for proposing amendments; (2) it is valid for states to specify in their applications that the convention be formally limited; and (3) Congress, in response to these requests for a "limited subject matter" convention, must call a limited convention, define the scope of the matters that may be considered in accordance with the state applications, and require that the convention stay within those limits.[5]

This article, however, argues that any new constitutional convention must have authority to study, debate, and submit to the states for ratification whatever amendments it considers appropriate. Although such a convention might well decide to focus upon one issue, it cannot be required to do so by Congress or the state legislatures. This article also concludes that any state convention applications that are premised on the erroneous view that a convention can be limited in advance must be treated by Congress as invalid.

I. Evolution of Article V at the Philadelphia Convention

An examination of the debates over Article V at the Philadelphia Convention establishes that the framers were concerned about the role constitutional amendments might play in the allocation of power between the state legislatures and the federal government. An analysis of the evolution of Article V illuminates the framers' intentions with respect to the role constitutional conventions should play, and supports the conclusion that the subject matter of such conventions cannot be limited.

The delegates in Philadelphia generally agreed that provision should

5. The most insightful piece supporting the state legislatures' position is a recent article by Professor William Van Alstyne, Does Article V Restrict the States to Calling Unlimited Conventions Only?—A Letter to a Colleague, 1978 DUKE L.J. 1295. For earlier arguments supporting the position that mandatory limits can be imposed on a convention, see Rhodes, A Limited Federal Constitutional Convention, 26 U. FLA. L. REV. 1 (1973); Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and The Article V Convention Process, 66 MICH. L. REV. 949 (1968); Note, Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1612, 1629 (1972). Other arguments defending the validity of limited applications are included in Memorandum from J. Anthony Kline, Legal Affairs Secretary, to Edmund G. Brown, Jr., Governor of California (Jan. 31, 1979) (on file with Yale Law Journal) [hereinafter cited as California Memorandum]; SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION STUDY COMM., AMERICAN BAR ASSOC., AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION BY THE CONVENTION METHOD UNDER ARTICLE V (1974) [hereinafter cited as ABA REPORT].

Professor Charles Black has been the leading advocate of the view that Article V conventions cannot be limited in scope by either Congress or the state legislatures and that state requests for the limited convention are invalid. See Black, supra note 4, at 189.

be made for amendment of the new Constitution. Experience under the Articles of Confederation, which provided that a single state could veto amendments,[6] persuaded the delegates of the need for an easier revision process. But it also was understood that casual or frequent amendment would threaten both the stability of the new government and the delicate balance of compromises hammered out at the first Convention.

The Philadelphia Convention readily agreed upon a method for ratifying proposed amendments to the new Constitution. After considering motions to require unanimous ratification by the states, or ratification by two-thirds, the Convention decided that approval by three-fourths of the states should be necessary in order to ratify amendments.[7] But a critical question remained: who should propose amendments? What organ of government should be empowered to initiate, develop and submit amendments for ratification? It proved particularly difficult to decide whether Congress should have the power to veto amendments the state legislatures wished to submit for ratification. The resolution chosen by the delegates midway through the deliberations was a grant of concurrent power to Congress and the state legislatures to initiate the amendment process. The Convention easily agreed on the method by which Congress would propose amendments,[8] and debate centered upon the alternative mode. Mason of Virginia objected to congressional control over the proposal of amendments because congressional abuses of power might be the cause of the perceived need for reform.[9] Set against this concern was the threat, perceived by Hamilton, that the states would seek amendment to enhance their power at the expense of the federal government.[10] This debate reflected the tension felt throughout the entire Convention between the need to create an effective national structure, significantly stronger than the one existing under the Articles of Confederation, and the desire to guard against delegating excessive power to the central government.

The drafters' answer to this dilemma was to provide that a national

6. Art. XIII of the Articles of Confederation provided that "[no] alteration [shall] at any time hereafter be made in [these Articles . . .,] unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State." U.S.C. xxxv, xxxviii (1976).

7. II THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 555 (M. Farrand ed. 1937) [hereinafter cited without cross-reference as II FARRAND].

8. II FARRAND at 559. This provision was not discussed or altered in later debates on Article V.

9. I THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 202-03 (M. Farrand ed. 1937) [hereinafter cited without cross-reference as I FARRAND].

10. II FARRAND at 558.

convention to propose amendments be summoned at the request of two-thirds of the state legislatures.[11] Such a convention would be, like Congress, a deliberative body with a national perspective, capable of assessing the need for constitutional change as well as developing proposals to be submitted for ratification; yet it would not be Congress itself. Thus the convention mode of amendment would avoid both the problem of congressional obstruction of needed reforms and the problem posed by parochial state self-interest.

The debates of the Philadelphia Convention trace the evolution of the delegates' decision to adopt a convention mode. The Virginia Resolutions, presented at the outset of the Convention by Edmund Randolph, made the first mention of the need to provide for amendments and reflected Randolph's concern over the danger of congressional control of the amendment process. The Thirteenth Virginia Resolve, introduced on May 29, 1787, stated "that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto."[12] Although some delegates did not see the necessity of providing for amendment at all,[13] the principal issue, according to Madison's notes, was "the propriety of making the consent of the Natl. Legisl. unnecessary."[14] Randolph and Mason of Virginia defended the part of the resolution that made congressional assent unnecessary.[15] The delegates were divided on the issue, however, and the Convention voted to postpone consideration of that part of the resolution.[16]

When the Convention next addressed the resolution, the controversial portion had been removed; Randolph's new Seventeenth Virginia Resolve simply read, "Resolved that provision ought to be made

11. In the latter part of the eighteenth century, conventions rather than legislatures were considered to be the institutions that most nearly embodied popular sovereignty. See generally G. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic, 1776-1787, at 306-43 (1969). With regard to the decision to ratify the Constitution by convention in each state, Professor Herman Ames wrote, "This was in harmony with the prevailing theory of the age, namely, that the sovereign people spoke directly through a convention elected for a specific purpose." Ames, Recent Development of the Amending Power as Applied to the Federal Constitution, 72 Proc. Am. Philosophical Soc. 87, 92 (1933).

12. I The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 245 (M. Jensen ed. 1976) [hereinafter cited without cross-reference as I Documentary History].

13. I Farrand at 202.

14. Id.

15. See id. at 203 (statement of Mason) ("It would be improper to require the consent of the Natl. Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse, may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendmt.") for the amendment of the articles of Union, whensoever it shall seem necessary."[17] The resolution did not specify methods for either proposal or ratification of amendments. The Convention submitted it in this ambiguous form to the Committee of Detail on July 24.[18] When a draft constitution emerged from the Committee of Detail on August 6, the Nineteenth Article stated, "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose."[19] It is not clear whether this draft contemplated that the states could apply for a convention specifically limited to consideration of a particular amendment to the Constitution, or whether the provision contemplated conventions with authority to provide generally for the revision and amendment of the Constitution.[20] A more serious defect was the article's failure to specify any method of ratification.

16. Id.

Although the Convention approved the draft Article on August 30,[21] Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts moved to reconsider it on September 10.[22] Gerry was troubled that a convention apparently could amend the Constitution without any further requirement of ratification. He feared that a majority at a convention could "bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the State-Constitutions altogether."[23] His motion was seconded by Hamilton, who "did not object to the consequences stated by Mr. Gerry,"[24] but opposed the Article for different reasons. Hamilton warned that "[t]he State Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers. . . ."[25] Hamilton suggested that the national legislature be authorized to call a constitutional convention upon the affirmative vote of two-thirds of both Houses. Roger Sherman proposed an amendment providing for the national legislature to propose amendments without a convention.[26]

17. I DOCUMENTARY HISTORY at 250.
18. Id. at 255, 259.
19. Id. at 269.
20. The ABA Report underscores the phrase "an amendment" in quoting this draft, presumably to suggest that the draft contemplated that state legislatures would apply for conventions to propose single amendments to the Constitution. ABA REPORT, supra note 5, at 12. The phrase used in the draft, however, is not "an amendment to" the Constitution, but rather "an amendment of" the Constitution. The more natural reading is that this phrase is used in the sense of "a revision of" the Constitution.
21. II FARRAND at 467-68.
22. Id. at 557.
23. Id. at 557-58.
24. Id. at 558.
25. Id.
26. Id.

Madison then offered the substitute draft that provided the structure and substance of what eventually became Article V. It read:

> The Legislature of the U.S. whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislatures of the U.S.[27]

The Convention tentatively adopted Madison's proposal by a vote of nine states in favor, one against, one divided. The Madison draft did not provide for any convention method of proposing amendments; Congress was to propose amendments "whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary" or "on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States." The article was submitted to the Committee of Style,[28] which returned it several days later with only minor stylistic changes.[29]

On September 15, the Article was reconsidered by the Convention. Debate centered on the section of the Madison draft that provided that state legislatures could propose amendments, which Congress would submit for state ratification.[30] Since the draft gave authority to Congress to propose amendments on its own initiative, it would seem to follow that the provision permitting states to apply to Congress to "propose amendments" would allow them to suggest the content of those amendments. Thus, the most plausible reading of the Madison proposal is that it would have permitted two-thirds of the state legislatures to propose amendments to the Constitution; Congress would merely transmit those amendments to be ratified.

The Constitutional Convention rejected that provision in Madison's draft. On the motion of Gouverneur Morris and Elbridge Gerry, the Convention voted without dissent to substitute language requiring Congress to call a constitutional convention on the application of two-thirds of the state legislatures.[31] This accomplished the following change in Article V: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Consti-

27. Id. at 559.
28. I DOCUMENTARY HISTORY, at 270, 285.
29. II FARRAND, at 629.
30. Id. at 629-30.
31. Id.

tution, or on the application ~~of two thirds~~ of the legislatures of two thirds of the several states, shall ~~propose amendments to this constitution~~, call a Convention for proposing Amendments, ..."[32]

The accompanying discussion at the Convention does not clearly reveal the basis for the changes. Under Madison's draft, there was no guarantee that a national forum would be involved in the drafting of amendment proposals. Roger Sherman, one of the two recorded speakers, expressed "fears" in reference to the unamended Madison proposal "that three fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether or depriving them of their equality in the Senate."[33] The Morris-Gerry motion might be seen as responsive to Sherman's concern,[34] for it provided that a national convention, rather than the states, would formulate proposed amendments.

Mason of Virginia expressed a different—indeed, almost opposite—objection to the Madison draft.[35] In his opinion, the draft did not impose a mandatory duty upon Congress to submit the state legislatures' suggested amendments for ratification. Instead, he read it as giving Congress either discretion to withhold the suggested amendments or considerable influence in the drafting of the amendments. This plan was "exceptionable & dangerous" in Mason's view:

> As the proposing of amendments is in both the modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second, ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case.[36]

Though this seems a curious objection, given the seemingly mandatory language of the Madison draft,[37] it may have been based on Mason's

32. I DOCUMENTARY HISTORY at 284, 295. (The parts of the Article submitted to the Convention by the Committee of Style and left unchanged are in roman type; the deletions by the Convention are in lined-out type; changes made by the Convention are in italics; stylistic changes are not reflected here.)

33. II FARRAND at 629.

34. It is possible that Sherman's objection might have been directed not at the allocation of authority to propose amendments, but rather at the lack of substantive limits on the amending power. These objections were partially met by the subsequent action of the delegates in adding a provision to Article V whereby no state could, without its consent, be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

35. II FARRAND at 629.

36. Id.

37. Madison could not understand this objection in light of the delegates' clear expectation that Congress would call a convention in response to state applications: "Mr. Madison did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application." II FARRAND at 629-30.

belief in the practical necessity of having a single deliberative body undertake the consultation, debate, drafting, compromise, and revision necessary to produce an amendment.

Mason may have supposed that Congress, during the process of proposing amendments in response to a variety of state applications, would exercise great influence on the shape and substance of the amendments. The Morris-Gerry alternative convention mode, however, could be read as imposing a ministerial duty on Congress but not involving it in shaping amendments. Mason as well as the other delegates could thus support the requirement that Congress call a convention upon application by the states as a plan that realistically limited the duty imposed upon Congress, while leaving the determination of the subject matter and the drafting of any amendments to the convention itself.[38]

II. Controlling the Agenda of Constitutional Conventions

The accounts of the Philadelphia Convention do not expressly answer the question of whether a convention can be limited by either the states or by Congress. Two themes, however, do emerge from the debates: Congress should not have exclusive power to propose amendments; and state legislatures should not be able to propose and ratify amendments that enhance their power at the expense of the national government. States were empowered under Article V to ratify amendments; the power to propose amendments was lodged in two national bodies, Congress and a convention. The proceedings suggest that the framers did not want to permit enactment of amendments by a process of state proposal followed by state ratification without the substantive involvement of a national forum. Permitting the states to limit the subject matter of a constitutional convention would be inconsistent with this aim. If the state legislatures could not only control the text of the proposed amendment, but also limit the convention to that subject, effective proposal power would have been shifted to the state legislatures. If the states could confine the convention to a general

38. Such a view of Article V is expressed in the first state application for a constitutional convention, submitted by Virginia in 1787:

> We do, therefore, in behalf of our constituents, in the most earnest and solemn manner, make this application to Congress, that a convention be immediately called, of deputies from the several States, with full power to take into their consideration the defects of this Constitution that have been suggested by the State Conventions, and report such amendments thereto as they shall find best suited to promote our common interests, and secure to ourselves and our latest posterity the great and unalienable rights of mankind.

I ANNALS OF CONGRESS at col. 259-60 (Gales & Seaton eds. 1834) (emphasis added).

subject, but not to a specific amendment, and the applying legislatures suggested different limitations, then Congress would be forced to define and enforce limits on the convention. Such action would conflict with a different aim of the drafters: the desire to create a mode of proposing amendments in which Congress played no significant role. In order to satisfy the various objectives of the framers, a convention must be free to define for itself the subject matter it will address; the state legislatures may call for such a convention, but they should not be permitted to control it.

A. Conventions Limited to a Single Amendment

The most stringent limitation upon a convention would be a congressional requirement that it consider only a draft amendment, the wording of which had been ordained in advance by the applying state legislatures. One example of this kind of limitation is found in Delaware's 1975 application to Congress "to call a convention for the proposing of the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States: . . . The costs of operating the Federal Government shall not exceed its income during any fiscal year, except in the event of declared war."[39] The Delaware application makes clear the state's desire to limit the convention to consideration of this amendment. The application expressly states that > the General Assembly of the State of Delaware interprets Article V to mean that if two-thirds of the states make application for a convention to propose an identical amendment to the Constitution for ratification with a limitation that such amendment be the only matter before it, that such convention would have power only to propose the specified amendment and would be limited to such proposal and would not have power to vary the text therof nor would it have power to propose other amendments on the same or different propositions.[40]

Professor Van Alstyne, an advocate of the view that state-imposed limitations on the authority of conventions are constitutionally permissible, has argued that > Congress could least decline to call a convention if, in keeping with [thirty-four resolutions such as Delaware's] the sole function of that convention would be to do no more than to deliberate and 39. Del. H. Con. Res. No. 36 (1975), reprinted in 125 Cong. Rec. S1307 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979).

40. Id. (emphasis added).

> to debate the pros and cons of an exactly particularized proposal, with choice at the convention's conclusion for the delegates only to vote 'yea' or 'nay.'[41]

He argues that the framers intended the states to have a ready means of curing defects that Congress would not address, and suggests that > [i]f two-thirds of the state legislatures might perchance agree on the exact wording of an amendment they would wish to be reviewed in a called convention for discussion and vote, this would seem to me to state the paradigm case in which Congress should proceed with the call—and limit the agenda exactly in accordance with the unequivocal expressions of those solely responsible for the event.[42]

This approach, though it provides a means of proposing amendments that is free of congressional control, is not responsive to the second aim of the Philadelphia Convention; state legislatures should not be given authority to propose amendments without the involvement of some national body in the formulation of such amendments. To permit the state legislatures to dictate to the convention the exact terms of its proposals is to short-circuit the carefully structured division of authority between state and national interests.

If the aim had been to give the state legislatures the power to propose as well as to ratify amendments, it would have been unnecessary to provide for conventions. The drafters could simply have provided that when two-thirds of the state legislatures agree on the wording of an amendment, some central authority must automatically submit that amendment for ratification by the required three-fourths of the states. Of course, a convention whose sole authority would be to vote "yes" or "no" on a proposal dictated in advance by state legislatures could, by delaying the amendment process, serve an important function by allowing time for reflection and debate and by providing an additional hurdle for any proposed amendment. Assembling a tightly controlled convention for this limited purpose, however, would have made little sense to the drafters in 1787. The difficulty of choosing and assembling delegates from all the states was extraordinary; commencement of national meetings was sometimes delayed for weeks by the late arrival of many of the delegates.[43] Delegates to such a convention would likely

41. Van Alstyne, supra note 5, at 1305.

42. Id. at 1305-06.

43. See M. FARRAND, THE FRAMING OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 54 (1913) (Constitutional Convention called to meet on May 14, 1787, but "[p]artly owing to the difficulties and slowness of travel . . . it was not until Friday, the twenty-fifth of May, that seven states were represented and the convention could proceed to organize.") be frustrated by the delay and anxious to get on with the sole official act permitted them: voting on an amendment whose wording had been determined beforehand. The framers understood that "[c]onventions are serious things,"[44] and it is doubtful that they meant to suggest such a meeting by the phrase "a Convention for proposing Amendments."

B. Conventions Limited to a Particular Subject

Even when the applying state legislatures seek only to limit the convention with respect to subject matter, the case against the validity of the applications is still persuasive. Narrowly defined subject matter limits have to a lesser extent the same difficulty as limits that confine a convention to consideration of a specific text: they transfer the proposing power from the convention to the state legislatures. The more restricted the alternatives available to a convention, the greater the chance that any amendment will in effect have been predetermined.[45] Moreover, restricting the convention's subject matter may have a deleterious effect on the amendment process. The framers knew from their experience in Philadelphia that issues are often fundamentally redefined in the course of their resolution; accommodations in seemingly unrelated areas may permit resolution of complex issues in an unanticipated manner. Narrowly defining in advance the subject matter of a convention would seriously hamper the process of creative compromise that had been central to the success of the Philadelphia Convention.

Although this predetermination argument applies less directly to broader limitations on a convention, other problems arise if only general subject matter limitations are imposed. Such limits differ importantly from "exact text" limitations in that the process of setting the subject matter agenda of a convention is likely to give Congress a significant degree of control over the convention. It is conceivable that thirty-four state legislatures would agree on exactly the same limitation of a convention's subject matter. However, it is more likely that state

44. II FARRAND at 632 (statement of Charles Pinkney).

45. This critical point is overlooked in both the California Memorandum, supra note 5, and the ABA REPORT, supra note 5. The California Memorandum states:

> The notion that the states lack the power to limit a convention is also at war with the principle major continet in se minus; that is, absent an expressed intent to the contrary, a body vested with specified powers inherently possesses and may exercise lesser powers. As stated by the ABA Committee, "since Article V specifically and exclusively vests the state Legislatures with the authority to apply for a convention, we perceive no sound reason as to why they cannot invoke limitations in exercising that authority."

California Memorandum, supra note 5, at 14. The difficulty with this argument is its unwarranted assumption that the power to define a convention's agenda and restrict its deliberations is a lesser power than the authority to call the convention.

applications would vary in both their description of the problem giving rise to the applications, and their suggested revisions. Congress, in framing the call for the convention, would then assume a major role in defining the subject matter.[46] That role should be left to the convention itself in order to avoid undue congressional influence over the convention mode of amendment.[47]

Proponents of the view that "limited convention" applications are valid also rely on the argument that the convention mode should be free of congressional control. Professor Van Alstyne argues that con-

46. An alternative solution would leave the definition and enforcement of any limits to the judiciary. The courts could enjoin the ratification process on the ground that an amendment proposal was not within the subject matter limits set by the original applications, or could refuse to give effect to the amendment after ratification on the ground that it was beyond the proposing authority of the convention. This alternative would merely substitute judicial control of the convention for congressional control. There is nothing in the deliberations to indicate that the drafters contemplated either congressional or judicial control over the subject matter of a constitutional convention.

47. Consider the example of the Bill of Rights. Several state conventions accompanied ratification of the Constitution with a recommendation that amendments be adopted. Different states proposed different amendments on a variety of subjects. Compare the amendments proposed by Virginia, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS ON THE ADOPTION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION AT PHILADELPHIA IN 1787, vol. 3 at 657-63 (J. Elliot ed. 1937) with the proposals by Massachusetts, id., vol. 2 at 176-78. Had these amendments been proposed by convention rather than by Congress, it would have been highly inappropriate for Congress, the body whose powers were to be constrained by a number of the suggested revisions, to attempt to limit the questions to be considered.

It does not appear to have occurred to James Madison that Congress could call a "limited" convention to propose a bill of rights. In a letter written to George Eve on Jan. 2, 1789, Madison expressed his preference, under the circumstances, for the congressional mode of proposing amendments:

> The Congress who will be appointed to execute as well as to amend the Government, will probably be careful not to destroy or endanger it. A Convention, on the other hand, meeting in the present ferment of parties, and containing perhaps insidious characters from different parts of America, would at least spread a general alarm, and be but too likely to turn everything into confusion and uncertainty. It is to be observed however that the question concerning a General Convention, will not belong to the federal Legislature. If 2/3 of the States apply for one, Congress cannot refuse to call it; if not, the other mode of amendments must be pursued.

5 THE WRITINGS OF JAMES MADISON 321 (G. Hunt ed. 1904). In a letter to Phillip Mazzei dated December 10, 1788, Madison stated his belief that

> The object of the Anti-Federalists is to bring about another general Convention, which would either agree on nothing, as would be agreeable to some, and throw everything into confusion, or expunge from the Constitution parts which are held by its friends to be essential to it.

Id. at 316. Madison did not suggest the possibility of countering the drive for a "general convention" by seeking to limit the convention's subject matter authority in advance. See Martin, Madison's Precedent of Legislative Ratification for Constitutional Amendments, 109 PROC. AM. PHILOSOPHICAL SOC. 47, 49-50 (1965).

Two passages in The Federalist, one of them by Madison, have been cited in support of the position that the framers believed "the convention need not be unlimited in scope." Note, supra note 5, at 1629. This argument has been rebutted by Professor Black, see Black, supra note 4, at 197, and is further undermined by these passages from Madison's correspondence.

gressional authority to treat "limited" applications as invalid could be used to obstruct state initiation of constitutional conventions:

> the state mode for getting amendments proposed was not to be contingent upon any significant cooperation or discretion in Congress. . . . Congress was supposed to be mere clerk of the process convoking state-called conventions. Certainly it was not imagined to sit astride that process as a hostile censor, a body entitled to impose such stringent requirements upon the states as effectively to render the state mode of securing particular amendments nearly impossible.[48]

This point is not without merit. A generous construction by Congress of what constitutes a valid application may be seen as most consistent with the limited role Congress was to perform under the convention mode of amendment. But if Congress is to be "mere clerk of the process," it should leave the influential task of agenda-setting to the convention itself. Moreover, Congress could establish a precedent that applications are valid if and only if applying states understand that the convention will be free to set its own limits. This determination would be significantly less intrusive than if Congress were to undertake with each set of applications to infer and enforce limits on the subject matter authority of the convention.[49]

It is possible that a set of state applications could establish subject matter limitations sufficiently broad to provide latitude for compromise and consensus-building at the convention and sufficiently uniform to enable Congress to define and enforce those limits without

48. Van Alstyne, supra note 5, at 1303.

49. The extent to which Congress could exercise influence over a "limited convention" is suggested by the provisions of the Ervin Bill, which passed the Senate in 1971, S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess., 117 CONG. REC. 36804-06 (1971), but was not acted upon by the House. The Ervin Bill sought to establish in advance procedures by which a constitutional convention would be called if Congress ever received the requisite number of applications. The bill was thoroughly premised upon a "limited convention" view of Article V and provided, among other things: that each state resolution should "stat[e] the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed," id. at § 2; that Congress, in calling the convention, should "set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called," id. at § 6(a); that "[b]efore taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe to an oath . . . to refrain from proposing . . . [any] amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to any subject which is not named . . . in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called," id. at § 8(a); that "[n]o convention . . . may propose any amendment or amendments of a nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution [of Congress] calling the convention," id. at § 10(b); and that questions concerning whether a proposed amendment is within the limits set by the congressional resolution "shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States . . ." id. at § 13(c).

unduly intruding into the convention's work.[50] It is more likely, however, that state applications attempting to limit the subject matter of a convention will result in either impermissible state control of the proposal process or undue congressional influence over that process.[51] Consequently, while a convention should be influenced in its choice of agenda by the grievances that led the states to apply for its convocation, the authority to determine the agenda and to draft the amendments to be proposed should rest with the convention rather than with Congress or the state legislatures.

III. Determining the Validity of State Applications

If Congress and the state legislatures lack the power to limit a constitutional convention to consideration of a particular amendment or subject, the issue arises whether state applications calling for Congress to convene a limited convention are valid. Professor Charles Black argues that, "[s]tate requests for a limited convention create no obligation under Article V, since they are not applications for the thing which, and only which, the States may oblige Congress to call."[52] Professor Black rejects the argument that a state's request for a limited convention should be treated as an application for an unlimited convention.[53]

There is often a question, however, whether a state has in fact called for a limited convention. Nothing in the argument against the limitation of subject matter suggests that states may not validly recommend that a convention deal with a single subject, or that it consider a draft text of an amendment, so long as the applications do not assume that the applying state legislatures or Congress can limit the convention's agenda. For example, a state application that requests Congress to call a convention, and recommends that the convention be limited to consideration of an amendment requiring a balanced federal budget, should be deemed valid, provided it is clear that the suggested limit is only a recommendation.

50. An example of a limited convention that would involve minimal congressional control is one called for the sole purpose of repealing an earlier amendment. In that case, strict definition of the subject in state applications would preclude a convention from considering options such as a partial repeal.

51. Although it is possible to imagine a hypothetical set of legislative applications requiring a limited convention that might not as seriously implicate the concerns that animated the drafters, it is those possibilities that are most likely that should influence our interpretation of what the drafters meant by "a Convention for proposing Amendments."

52. Black, supra note 4, at 199-200 (emphasis in original).

53. Id. at 200.

An application may be ambiguous on this last point. Suppose that a state legislature applies to Congress for a constitutional convention "for the purpose of" proposing an amendment, the text of which is set out in the application. The use of the phrase "for the purpose of" is not necessarily inconsistent with recognition by the applying legislature that the convention would be free to consider other amendments. Nevertheless, in light of the widespread assumption that the state legislatures and Congress can impose subject matter limits on a convention,[54] the applying legislature may have assumed that the convention would be strictly limited to considering the suggested draft amendment. Before summoning a convention, Congress ought to be confident that those who applied for the convention did so with a proper understanding of the convention's authority.

State applications recently submitted to Congress, calling for a convention on a balanced federal budget, illustrate this point. With one or two exceptions,[55] the thirty "balanced budget" applications are clearly premised on the assumption that a convention's subject matter can be limited by the state legislatures and Congress. At least twenty-two of the applications request Congress to call a convention "for the specific and exclusive purpose"[56] or "the sole and exclusive purpose"[57] of proposing an amendment requiring a balanced federal budget. If Congress lacks the power to limit a convention to consideration of a particular amendment, then these applications request something that Congress cannot grant. Moreover, there is no reason to assume that every state that requested a convention for the "sole and exclusive" purpose of approving a draft amendment would wish Congress, if it could not call a limited convention, to call instead a convention free to set its own agenda.

This last point need not be left to conjecture, however; a number of state resolutions are explicit on this point, and render any debate over the proper treatment of such applications academic. The Colorado legislature, for example, in applying for a convention for "the specific and exclusive purpose" of proposing an amendment prohibiting "deficit spending," expressly resolved "that this application and request be deemed null and void, rescinded, and of no effect in the event that

54. See note 5 supra.

55. See, e.g., N.D. S. Con. Res. No. 4018 (1975), reprinted in 125 CONG. REC. S1310 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979) (calling "for a convention for such purpose as provided by Article V of the Constitution," while proposing specific balanced budget amendment).

56. See, e.g., Ala. H.J. Res. 227 (1976), reprinted in 125 CONG. REC. S1306 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979) (emphasis added).

57. See, e.g., Kan. S. Con. Res. 1661 (1978), reprinted in 125 CONG. REC. S1307 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979) (emphasis added).

such convention not be limited to such specific and exclusive purpose."[58] The applications submitted to Congress by Idaho[59] and North Carolina[60] contain similar restrictions. The Utah application expresses its limitation even more precisely, resolving > that this application for a Convention Call for proposing amendments be limited to the subject matter of this Resolution and that the State of Utah be counted as part of the necessary two-thirds states for such a call only if the convention is limited to the subject matter of this Resolution.[61]

Thus, if Congress lacks the power to limit a convention to the exclusive consideration of a particular narrow amendment, applications such as these, now being counted as part of the total, simply self-destruct. They are obviously invalid under the test set out, as are other applications that erroneously assume congressional authority to limit a convention.

IV. The Viability of an Unlimited Convention

If neither the state legislatures nor Congress may limit a convention's agenda, the question arises whether the only kind of convention contemplated by Article V is one to revise the entire Constitution. Professor Black suggests that the convention method was designed to provide "some means of compelling a thorough reconsideration of the new plan."[62] The convention mechanism, in Professor Bruce Ackerman's view, should be reserved for those occasions "when the states are willing to assert the need for an unconditional reappraisal of constitutional foundations."[63] If conventions must propose general revisions, then Professor Van Alstyne is correct in observing that it "all but eliminates [Article V's] use in response to specific, limited state dissatisfactions."[64]

There is, however, no basis in Article V for asserting that a convention is required to reappraise the whole Constitution, or that states

58. Colo. S. J. Mem. 1 (1978), reprinted in 125 CONG. REC. S1306-07 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979).

59. Idaho H. Con. Res. 7 (1979), reprinted in 125 CONG. REC. S1932 (daily ed. Mar. 1, 1979).

60. N.C. S. J. Res. 5 (1979), reprinted in 125 CONG. REC. S1123 (daily ed. Feb. 6, 1979).

61. Utah H.J. Res. 12 (1979), reprinted in 125 CONG. REC. S2363-64 (daily ed. Mar. 8, 1979).

62. Black, supra note 4, at 201.

63. Ackerman, Unconstitutional Convention, NEW REPUBLIC, Mar. 3, 1979, at 8.

64. Van Alstyne, supra note 5, at 1303. Ackerman's argument permits Van Alstyne to characterize this position as one that tells the states that they may not seek a convention for the purpose of considering the repeal of one amendment "unless they mean also to consider a repeal of the other twenty-five and of all six articles as well (and to manifest that willingness in the resolutions they submit to Congress). . . ." Id. at 1306.

would have to favor such revision before they could apply for a convention. It is reasonable to expect that a convention would choose to confine itself to considering amendments addressing the problem that led states to apply for the convention. If the prospect of a "runaway convention"[65] is frightening,[66] then delegate candidates are likely to campaign for office on a pledge to limit the convention's agenda and that pledge is likely to have popular appeal. While some delegates would undoubtedly lobby to have the convention propose amendments on other subjects, such appeals would not be likely to commend themselves to a majority of the delegates.[67]

It is probably true that the state legislatures "would be less likely to take advantage of the convention method of amendment if they believed a convention, once convened, would be free to propose drastic changes."[68] If a convention is free to set its own agenda, there is a chance that the convention, in spite of the recommendations of the applying states, would consider subjects other than those recommended. However, a majority of delegates would have to be persuaded to support those amendments on "extraneous" subjects, and three-fourths of the states would still have to ratify them. Thus it is unlikely that delegates at the Philadelphia Convention considered this risk to be so substantial that they would have assumed that no convention would be viable unless Congress and the applying states could control its deliberations. Moreover, Congress itself was granted unlimited power to propose constitutional amendments; there is no reason why a convention, possessed of the very same authority to propose amendments, would have been viewed by the drafters as too frightening a prospect to be a practical method of proposing amendments.[69]

65. As Professor Black has noted, the term "runaway convention" is a misnomer. If a properly called convention is constitutionally free to exercise its own judgment about the limits of its deliberations, then "no convention can be called that has anything to run away from." Black, supra note 4, at 199. I use the term here to refer to a convention that, acting within its constitutional authority, proposes an amendment different from the amendment sought by those who requested the convention.

The California Memorandum, in arguing for the validity of applications for a limited convention, suggests that one defense against a "runaway convention" is "the enormous control that Congress can and should impose upon a constitutional convention." California Memorandum, supra note 5, at 22. The argument here is that such control is impermissible and is likely to be unnecessary.

66. In 1789, James Madison opposed the calling of a convention to propose a Bill of Rights, for fear that it would "turn everything into confusion." See note 47 supra.

67. But cf. W. KEEFE & M. OGUL, THE AMERICAN LEGISLATIVE PROCESS 242 (4th ed. 1977) ("logrolling" enables minority positions to gain majority support).

68. Note, supra note 5, at 1629.

69. This point was apparently overlooked by the author of the California Memorandum, who states that if the legislatures and Congress lack the power to limit the agenda of a constitutional convention, then the convention would be an unthinkable "black hole of absolute power." California Memorandum, supra note 5, at 16.

Conclusion

If the legislatures of thirty-four states request Congress to call a general constitutional convention, Congress has a constitutional duty to summon such a convention. If those thirty-four states recommend in their applications that the convention consider only a particular subject, Congress still must call a convention and leave to the convention the ultimate determination of the agenda and the nature of the amendments it may choose to propose. If, however, a state's application is based on the erroneous assumption that Congress is empowered to impose subject-matter limits on the convention, such an application must be considered invalid. Many of the state applications calling for a convention on a balanced budget amendment are invalid under this test. Congress has no authority to call a convention in the absence of valid applications from two-thirds of the states. Therefore, even if the total number of applications reaches thirty-four, Congress must decline to call a constitutional convention.

Senator BAYH. Let's move along to our next panel, Prof. William Van Alstyne and Prof. Gerald Gunther of Stanford University School of Law.

TESTIMONY OF PROF. WILLIAM W. VAN ALSTYNE, DUKE UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL, DURHAM, N.C.

Senator BAYH. We appreciate your both being here with us.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It is a pleasure to be here and it is good to see you again.

I have submitted a prepared statement that I do not wish to read, and it is about 22 pages. In addition, I have submitted to the staff of the committee two published pieces on some historical observations that I think——

Senator BAYH. We will put the statement in the record.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I have not even taken the care to prepare a truncated version, because knowing the order in which I would appear as a witness, I thought that might be an exercise in futility and not be responsive to the prior presentations. So if my remarks seem extemporized, please bear in mind that I tried to prepare them while listening to the morning discussion.

This is in my opinion long overdue legislation for the instruction of Congress and the instruction of the State legislatures in the use of article V. Whatever you do, within fairly substantial guidelines I believe that your work product should be sustained to the extent at all that it were subject to challenge by a State legislature or by members of a convention or thereafter.

I simply want to set the general context so as to reduce the degree of enthusiasm that each one of us might feel for some more particular professional view that person holds on the one construction of article V. Generally, with regard to these matters, subject to an outside boundary which might informally be described as an act of manifest abuse, my opinion is that the Supreme Court, in a case appropriately brought before it testing what you might do with respect to legislation of this kind, would defer to the manner in which Congress has resolved these questions to its own satisfaction. That is not to say that they are literally nonjusticiable, or that there are no boundary lines. It is rather to set before you my general view with regard to these problems.

Generally speaking, the Court will display an unusual degree of latitude toward Congress with respect to the implementation of article V. If there is a qualification there might be a greater modicum of judicial review in the manner in which Congress deals with this portion of article V than when the Court might review amendments proposed by Congress. That is to say, the deference of the Court should be at its maximum, relating to the congressional use of the amending process.

On the other hand, because I am quite clear in my mind that this feature in article V, that having to do with the State initiation of changes to the Constitution, is emphatically for the benefit of the States, the degree of judicial review might be less deferential to Congress insofar as the view of Congress carried into law is hostile to State opportunities to secure amendments through this feature of article V. But in regard to most of the particulars that are featured in S. 1710, while I may differ, as I do, in some respects as to which attitude more faithfully executes my own understanding of article V. I do not regard the alternatives as too far apart in the main as being likely to be settled by a Supreme Court decision.

The State-initiated mode of securing amendments is not in contemplation of wholesale revision; it is, rather, to secure to State legislatures a means of getting a fairly efficient response, albeit under the auspices of a national convention, to grievances of a rather particularized and limited nature. This is not to say that the use of the article is limited to such a function. Indeed State legislatures may compose their agenda in the nature of the call they submit by way of their petitions, to their own satisfaction. But a petition to secure attention to particular issues is by far the most expected kind.

If there is adequate consensus among 34 State legislatures, is Congress placed under an obligation? In my view, it is, respectfully, to respond to that consensus and furnish that kind of convention.

An analogy has been suggested to you, rather by way of improvization, I think, to the power to impeach and remove a President. There is also power of the Congress to declare war. War, even more than impeachment, is of utmost gravity. It was in recognition of its gravity that the power and necessity to get a congressional declaration of war was put into the Constitution, so as to forestall the unilateral activity of the Executive to drag in the country, by rather slow degrees, into war.

So the power to deal with declaring war is given to Congress. To be sure, insofar as one does not want war to be declared at all, ever, under any circumstances, then consistent with that view one might mount a highly intelligent argument that when Congress does trigger its power to declare war, the only kind of war it may declare is a total war, an all-out war, a war against the world, or at least an all-out unconditional surrender type of war against a designated country.

It is long settled, however, that that non sequitur is profoundly untrue. The function of the declaration of war clause is to locate a judgment in Congress as to whether this country shall embark upon sustaining overseas military action. If in the judgment of Congress a limited engagement is an appropriate one under the circumstances, then it defeats the purpose of the law itself to lay upon the Congress the preposterous injunction that it may have no war at all unless it has total war.

I do no mean to borrow a different history from a different clause by drawing your attention to the Declaration of War clause. Analogies are only that. They are highly imperfect. There are different purposes. My analogy is used to correct a misimpression, and put this issue back on a more proper footing.

I do think, however, a suggestive analogy would put before you the notion that insofar as the Executive carries out the war, nevertheless, the boundaries within which he proceeds as Commander in Chief can be laid down and prescribed by this Congress. Correspondingly, under article V, this mode of amending the Constitution is meant to commit to the discretion of State legislatures when they arrive at the requisite extraordinary consensus of two-thirds to set in motion a convention of such dimensions as they believe responds to their perceptions of an oversight in the Constitution, or a defect in the Government.

The draft proposed by James Madison made no provision for a convention at all. It was but a two-step process. If the legislatures of two-thirds of the States agreed upon the particular wording of a specific amendment, then under Madison's formulation, which he maintained preference for throughout the proceedings, that proposed amendment would at once have to be submitted to the legislatures of all of the States, such that upon ratification by three-fourths of them, it would at once become part of the Constitution.

The convention was inserted. Madison's reservation was of the kind that has tied up this Congress. It was the vexation of knowing how to deal with these matters of not unimportant details. Where shall it be held? How shall the delegates be selected? What votes may be required? Madison preferred the simpler alternative of not having a convention at all. He lost on that point, and I do not mean to diminish the significance of the change. It is rather, again, merely to bring to your attention that it was well recognized that Congress would have to make a provision for its execution.

If Congress were to make a provision for the place of holding a convention, a contingency obviously contemplated within article V, and designated Quebec City, I would suggest to you that that is a case of manifest abuse which is so far from keeping with the idea that this article V provision could be useful, that the legislatures and the Supreme Court should overthrow the selection of that site. Similarly, if Congress required that no amendment could be proposed but by four-fifths of the convention, that is so far from any compatibility of holding a convention responding to the grievances of the States and still allow the convention to go forward that four-fifths would not be accepted by the Court.

Senator BAYH. How about two-thirds?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It is sufficiently reasonable and measured in terms that you have previously spoken to and those formerly endorsed by Professor Freund and by others, that I do not regard it as abusive, and do not think it makes it intolerable or unreasonably hard to obtain amendments pursuant to article V. Whether it is well advised, or whether some alternative is better, such as a simple majority, I do not hold any particularly powerful views for that, but I do feel there is much to be said that delegates may be selected one way or another, and may or may not come under instruction from the sources that elected them, and depending on the resolution of the neighboring issues, it may well be a sensible sort of self restraint on the operation of that convention; that is, to take care that any amendment that comes from that body has indeed mounted a two-thirds majority rule.

On the main issue, however, and despite what has been said here in such a passionate fashion, I do not doubt that the most anticipated use of the State mode was to get a response in convention to identify a specific grievance. Petitions contemplating such a convention should, therefore, be respected by Congress.

If you resolve your will that only petitions seeking all-out conventions are tolerable, you must still exercise judgment and the line that you will draw will itself be somewhat arbitrary at the very edge of the line. What judgment is that? Obviously, it must be a judgment as to whether or not these petitions all call for an open-ended convention, and whether they have come together in a reasonable period of time, sufficient in Congress view that the expression of State legislative consensus is adequately contemporary so that the petitions, all of which call for an open-ended convention, can be related to one another. Indeed, if you do not exercise that kind of limited judgment, then I think a petition originally filed in 1798 must still be counted with those filed in 1979, a thoroughly silly result. So you are called upon to exercise judgment as to whether an adequate number of State legislatures are present in any event.

Professor Dellinger said that to contemplate a convention call at the request of 34 States for a limited purpose is to trivialize article V. I submit that is false. The subject may, of course, be of breathtaking sweep. It might even be a proposal to repeal outright the first amendment to the Constitution, which I would view as not trivial, but horrendous. It might be less controversial. I can hypothesize a situation where the President of the United States may be enormously popular, but barred from reelection by the 22d amendment, and whether the other party in Congress has a majority in Congress, so that there is no chance for Congress to propose repeal of the 22d amendment, but nonetheless, two-thirds of the State legislatures think it important enough to consider repeal of the 22d amendment to submit uniform petitions requesting a convention to consider exactly that subject, the repeal of the 22d amendment.

Some may think the topic trivial. I would not. I would regard it as intermediate importance, somewhat more important than the prohibition amendment, the 18th, or its repeal, in the 21st, or as somewhat less important than a convention to consider the repeal of the first amendment.

I hold that this part of article V is an express vehicle by means of which State legislatures, when they are dissatisfied with the response of Congress, may proceed on their own. This is a possible use of it, the hypothetical 22d amendment situation.

I submit to you respectfully that it is altogether in keeping with the proper use that Congress, as it convokes the convention, to appropriately limit the convention to the purpose it was convoked for in the first instance.

Insofar as, by some untoward event, that convention—called for that purpose, and under these auspices—were suddenly to run away with itself and, instead, produce an antiabortion amendment, for example, so far from the exercise that brought it into being, and from the common understanding of those who brought it into being, that it would be entirely proper to reject that amendment on abortion.

It is so obviously nongermane to the auspices of the convention otherwise properly assembled, it would be entirely proper for Congress to reject it. I add that in anticipation, frankly, of Professor Gunther's objection; that although Congress might provide for a convention with a limited agenda, the convention once in being is a plenary body that may do entirely as it pleases. I wholly disagree. Merely as a prudential matter, moreover, I think that a limitation by Congress announcing in advance that an amendment not in keeping with the agenda as previously determined according to the concensus of the petition of the 34 States would not, in turn, be submitted, would be useful. Such a guideline is constructive and will be extremely helpful to the convention itself so you could minimize the likelihood in fact of such maverick proposals being entertained by the convention.

Finally, the insertion into article V that there be a convention was undoubtedly meant as a buffer. It is to get solemn consideration in a national form, inclusive of States that have not previously considered the matter, or did not choose to join in the call, so as to consider the proposal or variety of proposals germane to that subject. It is a national form, it is broader, it takes more time, it insulates the process and it utterly fulfills, in my best view, the function for holding a convention.

Others who see this as triviality may hold to their opinion. I do not. I see it as originally intended, the function originally intended.

With respect to S. 1710, to the extent that it is compatible with the interpretation I share with you today, I think it is basically a sound bill. There are portions of the bill that I attempt to address in my prepared statement going to the rescission of ratification, which I strongly oppose as being probably unconstitutional and at best, being unwise for Congress to do, but that deals with matters beyond the scope of our discussion this morning.

Thank you.

Senator BAYH. So as not to prolong the questioning, and I have several questions I would like to submit in writing if I could, Professor. I appreciate your testimony.

On that last note, do you feel that inclusion in any procedure of the rescission clause is unconstitutional?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Yes, I do, and I think it is utterly unwise for Congress to adopt it. I think it is unconstitutional, but that is a debatable point, and I am not sure that a court would see it abusive of Congress' power so that they would take the case, but I think it is unwise, and it ought to be deleted.

Were I a member of the Congress, in view of the good faith controversy over the pending 27th amendment, the uncertain status of the attempted rescissions there, I could not in conscience vote for a bill which contained a provision like this, which, though not directly applicable to the 27th amendment, would provide additional ground for argument for its ultimate demise, which I think would be totally unfortunate and entirely unwarranted.

Senator BAYH. Thank you very much.

[Mr. Van Alstyne's prepared statement and responses to questions from Senator Bayh and Senator Thurmond follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF WILLIAM W. VAN ALSTYNE*

INTRODUCTION

Article V of the Constitution provides that Amendments may proceed from "a Convention" convoked "on application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states." Article V does not itself provide any details respecting requirements of form or of substance of those state legislative applications.

*William R. Perkins and Thomas C. Perkins Professor of Law, Duke University.

Neither does it presume to describe the manner of composing a Convention, the place for it to meet, or the procedures for its conduct. That all of these questions would eventually have to be addressed in some responsible fashion, however, was itself anticipated and understood in 1787 when Article V was under consideration. The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 (vol. II, M. Farrand ed., at p. 558) register James Madison's initial concerns:

"Mr. Madison remarked on the vagueness of the terms, 'call a Convention for the purpose,' as sufficient reason for reconsidering the article. How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?"

That such questions as there would indeed subsequently have to be resolved incidental to the effective use of this portion of Article V, moreover, was well understood. But their admitted uncertainty, and the omission to provide for them in Article V itself, were not deemed sufficient reason either to abandon the provision in Article V or to outfit the Article with further details. It is true that James Madison personally preferred a mode of state legislative initiated amendment altogether avoiding these uncertainties. His preferred alternative was to provide that whenever two-thirds of the state legislatures had severally agreed upon the terms of a proposed amendment, Congress should thereupon submit such amendments to all the legislatures of the several states (or to conventions in all of the states), with the amendment becoming effective once ratified by three-fourths of those legislatures (or conventions), thus obviating the need to route proposed amendments through a called national convention. See II Farrand at p. 559. But as Madison also declared (id. at 629–30):

"He saw no objection however against providing for a Convention for the purpose of amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to form, the quorum, etc. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided."

Senate Bill 1710 is a contemporary effort to provide effective guidelines for the information and instruction of state legislatures and for Congress itself in respect to the very kinds of matters understandably omitted from Article V. It is not perpetually binding on subsequent Congresses of the United States (i.e., as an Act of Congress it is of course subject to repeal) and it may not be immune from judicial review under all circumstances. Yet, neither of these considerations is sufficient in itself for regarding SB 1710 as either pointless or ill advised. To the contrary. Insofar as this Bill does not attempt to prevent its own ultimate review in the Supreme Court (to whatever limited extent that that Court may otherwise conclude is within the range of "justiciable" questions), I regard this Bill as superior and less presumptuous than alternatives which would presume to do so. And insofar as some subsequent congress may wish to alter one or another of its provisions prospectively, in keeping with difficulties that may hereafter appear (but are not now obvious), that power in Congress should similarly be regarded reassuringly, rather than with frustration or animus.

Since 1787, there has been an aggregate of more than two hundred state legislative applications in contemplation of constitutional conventions pursuant to Article V. Although at no time were there outstanding petitions sufficiently contemporary in time and sufficiently similar in content as to have produced a called convention (the closest were petitions contemplating an amendment to provide for the election of Senators—which petitions were mooted when Congress itself proposed the Seventeenth Amendment so providing), it is quite plain that this portion of Article V was meant to be as available for use as that portion reposing a power in Congress to propose amendments by two-thirds vote of both Houses. And insofar as the very substantial details necessary to make this portion of Article V more perfectly operational were expected to be provided, it strikes me as eminently reasonable that Congress should attempt to do so in legislation directed to the subject generally, rather than to some particular problem ad hoc. Proceeding in this fashion would appear to be in keeping with the expectations attending the original debates on Article V itself and extremely useful for the guidance of state legislatures. for any Convention convoked upon their application. and for Congress as well. The general propriety and usefulness of this kind of Bill, therefore, impress me as both worthy and right.

II. QUESTIONS OF POLITICAL, BUT NOT OF CONSTITUTIONAL, SIGNIFICANCE

Given the background and text of Article V itself, and given the substantial number of Supreme Court decisions which either hold or imply that the implementation of Article V by Congress will be respected by that court (at least in the absence of egregious or manifest abuse by Congress), in my opinion most of the questions that this Committee is concerned with under Senate Bill 1710 are questions of statescraft, fairness, and prudence—rather than questions of constitutional power. Objective standards, readily identified and plainly disallowing any of the provisions of Senate Bill 1710 even as now drafted, do not exist. In their absence (and as confirmed by the general deference the Supreme Court has observed toward Congress with respect to Article V questions), I think it most unlikely that the Bill can be discredited on the claim of simple unconstitutionality.

Many of its provisions (e.g., that which assigns to each state a number of convention delegates equal to its whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress; that which provides that each delegate's vote shall count individually [rather than each state voting qua state, as was the case in the 1787 Convention]; that which provides for delegate selection as each state legislature shall decide) are planly subjects of reasonable differences of opinion as to their wisdom and effect. None of these seems to me beyond the boundary of congressional preference, however, and while there are doubtless equally "constitutional" alternatives that Congress might provide, it may be sufficient that (a) these provisions appear to be both fair and workable and (b) they do establish a uniform standard which state legislatures may thus take into account in considering the desirability of applying for a convention in the light of these standards, that they are at least demonstrable superior to the utter uncertainty of providing no standard at all. That uncertainty, I suggest, favors only those who are so very apprehensive of any use of the state legislative mode of securing amendments to the Constitution (which apprehension I share to some extent but believe is not a just reason to omit any provision respecting state legislative-called conventions) that they prefer an indefinite state of complete uncertainty.

Questions similar to those noted above, albeit probably less significant than those questions, can be seen elsewhere in the Bill. For example, that the most senior state supreme court chief justice shall preside until a convention shall elect a presiding officer, that "any aggrieved State" may sue in the Supreme Court with respect to alleged congressional errors under Sections 6 or 11 (but must do so within sixty days after such claim first arises (?), without such opportunity otherwise forbidding suits appropriate under the Constitution or any other laws), and that the G.S.A. shall provide "such facilities" as the convention may require (but that no federal funds are to be appropriated for convention expenses), are questions of this kind. Again, without at all disparaging questions or alternatives that may sensibly be pressed by others on issues such as these, those questions and alternatives do seem to me to be less matters of constitutional power and propriety than of specific political wisdom and preference. Other than as questions may arise in this Hearing, I mean therefore not to address them further in this statement.

III. QUESTIONS OF CONSTITUTIONAL POWER AND OF CONSTITUTIONAL WISDOM

In this summary presentation, submitted in the advance of the actual hearings, there are but three issues of constitutional power or propriety that I believe warrant comment:

1. The Manner in which S. 1710 describes an acceptable state legislative application;

2. The Manner in which S. 1710 describes the obligation of Congress in response to such applications;

3. The Manner in which S. 1710 provides for state legislative rescissions either of applications or of subseqeunt ratifications.

In respect to the sufficiency of a state legislative application for a constitutional convention, I believe that S. 1710 stands in need of some clarification—but that that clarification can be provided in the accompanying legislative history of the Bill and that it may, therefore, be sound and sufficient as it stands. The function of Article V's provision for state legislative applications is as Madison noted in The Federalist (No. 43): "It * * * equally enables * * * the State governments to originate the amendment of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side, or on the other." Whether the errors that might be perceived would be particular errors or general errors is not assumed either way, and I have no doubt that state legislatures were meant to be left free to their own perceptions respecting the kinds of errors suitable in their view for correction under the auspices of a constitutional convention. If this is so, as

I think it was so, the kind of state application which would be a "valid" application under Article V may be any of a large possible variety. Accordingly, the sole check on the breadth (or narrowness) of a given state legislative application is the check provided for by Article V itself—that two-thirds of all the state legislatures must be in manifest agreement respecting the scope of the convention they ask to be called, the necessity of each state so to secure like applications from thirty-three other states providing the limitation set by Article V itself.

It is conceivable, for instance, that a state may be so agitated by dissatisfaction with the entire Constitution that its legislature may apply for a convention in which wholesale revision may be entertained. That state's application is a valid one, not to be disregarded by Congress, but necessarily leading to no called convention unless matched within a reasonable period of time by like applications from thirty-three other states.

It is somewhat more likely, on the other hand, that a given state legislature will have a particular subject of tentative amendment which alone moves it to apply for a convention, and yet not be confident that the particularity of its own concern is shared by a sufficient number of other state legislatures as to give rise to the requisite number of like applications from those other states. In that event, as a matter of securing the requisite consensus, it may submit an application identifying the particular occasion or subject that animates its own interest, while yet providing expressly that the convention for which it makes application shall also be free to consider such additional subjects as any other state may wish to have considered as well. By that means, it may hope to frame an appeal sufficient to attract like applications from thirty-three other states, some of which may not share the particular concern of the first state's application but are willing to have that state's concern reviewed in convention equally with a different concern of their own. Under such circumstances, Congress would be bound to call a convention which would perforce be free to consider such subjects or proposals as the delegates in attendance saw fit to bring forward on behalf of their state, as the valid applications each and all so specified.

It follows similarly that when thirty-four states do share a limited concern which they wish to have addressed in convention, and yet stand opposed to possible revisions to other portions of the Constitution with which they find no fault, they should equally be allowed to submit applications reflecting that view—with the expectation that Congress will respect the uniformity of their requests. It is imaginable, for instance, that a state legislature may wish to have considered in convention an amendment which, when proposed and ratified, would simply repeal the twenty-second amendment (which limits eligibility for election as President to two four-year terms). If that state legislature wishes to act on its own confidence that thirty-three other state legislatures can be persuaded to apply for a conventioon in which that amendment of repeal would be reviewed for proposal, and no other alteration could be entertained, I know of no basis for Congress to regard its application to that effect as less than "valid," or to decline to call a convention if, indeed, thirty-three like applications were forthcoming from the other states.

An almost unlimited number of intermediate permutations are also imaginable. Some state legislatures may conclude that repeal of the twenty-second amendment is desirable, for instance, but seeing no prospect that that desirability will appeal to Congress and despairing that an application seeking a convention only for consideration of that one subject will strike sufficient response in thirty-three other state legislatures, it frames its application more broadly. Yet, eager to have its repealer amendment considered, and willing on that account (in order to secure a convention) to have certain other subjects (of more urgent concern to other state legislatures) considered as well, still that state legislature may prefer that there be no convention at all rather than that there be a convention in which, say, the First Amendment could be modified or repealed. In that circumstance, I suppose it may frame an application suitable to its view: an application for a convention in which repeal of the twenty-second amendment shall be considered together with such other proposals as may be brought before the convention, exclusive, however, of any proposal which would alter or abolish the First Amendment. Again, supposing that thirty-three like applications were shortly thereafter forthcoming, I would think Congress then to be bound to provide for the convention in keeping with the common description of the requisite number of state legislative applications.

The point of all of these illustrations is the same: a state legislative application is not more or less "valid" that another because of its breadth, rather, each application is "valid" regardless of its specificity or its breadth. And the question in each instance is simply the question as to whether a sufficient number of applications of sufficient consensus have been received as to require, on the part of Congress, the calling of a convention responsive to that consensus.

S. 1710 appears to recognized the matter in this light and, accordingly, I believe it reflects the right approach. Section 2(a) provides that state legislative resolutions shall state "the general subject of the amendment or amendments to be proposed." Section 6(a) provides that when the requisite applications "with respect to the same general subject" have been received, the Congress shall proceed to call a convention "upon that general subject." Section 10 tracks the same view by providing that a called convention shall propose only such amendments as deal with the same subject (or subjects) as that reflected in the convoking resolution, and Section 11(b)(1)(B) contemplates rejection of a convention-proposed amendment only if "such proposed amendment relates to or includes a general subject which differs from or was not included as one of the general subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called."

If there are difficulties in this aspect of S. 1710, they are probably difficulties of reasonable interpretation only and I am not satisfied that alternative formulations would be any better. For instance, I take it to be consistent with the Bill that it does not mean to preclude an application which would mean to leave the convention agenda of subject matter completely open, despite the provision requiring that such legislative resolutions state "the general subject of the amendment or amendments to be proposed" in convention. Presumably, consistent with that requirement, a state may submit an application requesting a convention "for the purpose of considering such amendments to the Constitution as the convention may decide to propose." Alternatively, I assume the provision is meant to allow an application which, while designating a particular subject that that state believes to provide the occasion for a convention, provides also that the convention may consider and dispose of "such other proposals as any other state may wish to bring before it." If S. 1710 were meant to forbid a called convention free to set its own agenda in keeping with the sponsoring applications of thirty-four identically inclined state legislatures, I would doubt its validity—as I do not doubt that such a convention is contemplated by Article V. But I do not read the bill that way and, accordingly, have no problem of that kind.

Similarly, I assume that its provisions are satisfied even were there thirty-four applications in very clear agreement on the particularity of a given subject (e.g., "a convention to be called for the purpose of proposing an amendment which, when ratified, would repeal the twenty-second amendment.") That is, I suppose the provision that the applications reflect consensus at least as to "the same general subject" (emphasis added) is meant to be generous, rather than restrictive: that it is enough that a common subject (or subjects) be shared by applications to count each as valid with respect to that subject, despite marginal differences in phraseology. If, on the other hand, S. 1710 were meant to disallow the convoking of a convention even when thirty-four identically framed state applications were very clear in agreeing to a very particular and limited subject (i.e., "a convention called solely to consider repeal of the twenty-second amendment"), then I would doubt its validity—as I do not doubt that such a convention is itself contemplated by Article V. But I do not read the bill in this way either, and accordingly I have no problem of this kind.

Rather, I take it to be the function of the bill in this respect to lay down instructive and useful guidelines in keeping with the interpretation of Article V I believe to be sound. A state may apply for whatever scope of constitutional convention it believes best responds to its felt interests, understanding at the same time that no such convention is to be called unless thirty-three additional applications agreeable to the same kind of convention are also received by Congress within the prescribed reasonable time limits. When it becomes clear to Congress' reasonable satisfaction that sufficient applications in contemplation of the same kind of convention (respecting the scope of its work) have been received, Congress shall indeed call that convention and, accordingly, prescribe the scope of its work. A convention thus called may accordingly consider, reject, or propose amendments responsive to the subject or subjects within the scope of that agenda and not otherwise. Thus, the original applicant states may be assured that the convention will meet and consider all matters however broad, that characterized their applications. Correspondingly, when their original expressed concern was modest in scope, they need not fear that their applications can be rejected by Congress on that account or that a convention may presume to disregard the boundaries of the subject or subjects which solely occasioned its being called at all.

If this construction of the Bill is correct, then I think the Bill is itself both correct and desirable. It does not eliminate all areas of good faith disagreement, but on this subject no bill can and this bill does provide for a degree of understanding and coherence that we have lacked for too long.

Objection may be made to this interpretation of Article V that it leaves much to Congress, i.e., that it assigns to Congress the necessity of assessing various state legislative applications to determine whether the requisite two-thirds consensus on any subject exists. It will likewise doubtless be urged that all such difficulties can be avoided if Congress now presumes to declare that there is only one kind of "valid" state legislative application, and that agreement on the requisites of that one kind of "valid" application would virtually eliminate the alleged difficulties. Specifically, it may be argued that the only "valid" state legislative application is one which is submitted in contemplation of a convention of unlimited revisory authority over the whole of the Constitution—and that any state application not manifesting an understanding of that power shall not be counted as all. According to this view, a state may of course identify a subject that occasions its application, but it must do so in an application that nonetheless makes plain that the application extends to a convention called not merely to treat of that subject but to treat of any and of every other subject that delegates may introduce for discussion and proposal.

A number of able individuals have urged this course. (If it were adopted, incidentally, it would not necessarily require any change in S. 1710 in either Section 2(a) or Section 6(a); each of these will bear the interpretation that while every state application must state "the general subject" of an amendment (or amendments) to be proposed, these statements are but advisory and that when called, a convention may nonetheless consider whatever else any delegate sees fit to bring before it.) (On the other hand, adoption of this view would require a change in Sections 10 and 11(b)(1)(B), insofar as the first of these two sections purports to restrict the agenda of a called Convention to the subject or subjects identified in the state applications, and the second impliedly authorizes Congress to refuse to submit to ratification such amendments as a convention may propose not within the subject or subjects identified in the state applications.)

Despite the respect I have for those who urge this course, I disagree with them entirely and believe that they are mistaken. Rather, I agree with the Special Report of the American Bar Association, the view of Brickfield in his Study for the House, and the view held also by Professor Kurland of the University of Chicago, Kauper at Michigan, Noonan at California, Bonfield at Iowa, and the rest of the substantial majority of persons who have reviewed this matter. My reasons for this conclusion are set forth in two pieces of writing, both of which are appended to this Summary—and for that reason I will not reiterate them in any detail here. Essentially, they come to this. I do not believe that Article V meant, either advertently or inadvertently, to attach a "price" to the use of Article V by concerned state legislatures. In my view, the most expected use of Article V was to respond to particular perceived grievances against Congress, and to particular perceived shortcomings in the Constitution following its adoption.

The most expected use of Article V was to permit the states a reasonably efficient and prompt means of perfecting amendments occasioned by particular developments, e.g., omissions by Congress or Acts of Congress both surprising and alarming in view of what had been supposed would be the case, and/or decisions by the Supreme Court reflecting unexpected interpretations of the Constitution. Two-thirds of the states could at once set on foot the necessary corrective measure which, if found suitable and responsive in a deliberative convention in which all the states would be represented, three-fourths of the states might unite by subsequent ratification to make a part of the Constitution itself. If two-thirds of all the state legislatures do indeed manifest agreement on the particular subject for review in a constitutional convention, therefore, I see no reason to disallow the validity of their applications and no reason to disregard their will that no other subjects, not then agitating them, should be treated in that convention. This view seems to me more reflective than any alternative of what Hamilton wrote in Federalist No. 85. Urging that the Constitution be ratified despite different kinds of misgivings in some states as to different parts of the Constitution, Hamilton observed:

"If * * * the Constitution proposed should once be ratified by all the States as it stands, alterations in it may at any time be effected by nine States. Here, then, the chances are as thirteen to nine in favor of subsequent amendment, rather than of the original adoption of an entire system. [Hamilton's footnote, reads instructively: "It may rather be said TEN, for though two thirds may set on foot the measure, three fourths must ratify."] * * * [E]very amendment to the Constitution, if [the constitution is] once established, would be single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise, in relation to any other point—no giving nor taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently, whenever nine, or rather ten States, were united in the desire of a particular amendment that amendment must infallibly take place. There can, therefore, be no comparison between the facility of affecting an amendment, and that of establishing in the first instance a complete Constitution."

I am satisfied from canvassing all of the early constitutional materials as well as the writings of my colleagues that the requirements of holding a convention was to buffer state-legislative proposals for specific amendment from being at once submitted for ratification by requiring their review by a national, deliberative body as a prerequisite to ratification. It was not, on the other hand, to establish a plenary and uncabinable proceeding free to act ultra vires the expressed will of the state legislatures which called it into being.

A sense of prudence and of self-interest among state legislatures is expected to operate in such fashion that few will submit applications so narrow and confined that they assume the risk that thirty-three other state legislatures will not see fit to submit applications identically narrow and confined. A state legislature may ignore that risk, of course, and submit a very narrow application, and have it counted as valid—for what it is. If Congress, acting in good faith (as Congress is expected to do under Article V) concludes that that state's statement of restrictions on the subject of a convention are narrower or more exclusive than other states find acceptable in their own applications, then Congress will simply count that application as "valid"—but valid merely for what it is, i.e., a convention of so confined description that there is but one valid application before it calling for a convention of that description.

Correspondingly, where it is plain to Congress that thirty-four applications have been received in which the consensus respecting the scope of the convention is clear and unmistakable, whether that consensus be on a scope of considerable breadth or of considerable specificity, it should at once proceed to call a convention responsive to that consensus. As I think S. 1710 (albeit requiring some modest interpretation) so provides, I believe it to be sound and desirable.

On the last question I mean to address in this submitted statement, lack of time requires me to be even more succinct. I oppose the provision which provides that a state legislative ratification of a constitutional amendment may be withdrawn or rescinded and, albeit not with equal rigor, similarly oppose the provision providing for withdrawal or rescission of convention applications. Congress has never intimidated to the States that an act of ratification is less than final. Twice at least, moreover, Congress has declined to accede to purported rescissions. While there is no adjudicated settlement respecting the constitutionality of purported rescissions, I believe that the past practice of congress reflects the better view of the matter by far.

Article V itself nowhere speaks of "rescissions," but only of ratification. An amendment may lie before a state legislature for a reasonable period of years and may not, of course, at once impress that legislature as sufficiently worthy or free of doubt to be approved. That is as it ought to be, as ratification should be a considerate act. And it is a far more considerate act when undertaken with the understanding, thus far confirmed by congressional practice, that when done it is final. The power of the state to ratify an amendment, moreover, is derived wholly from Article V; it is not, as in respect to ordinary matters of state legislation, a byproduct of the state's own constitution as several Supreme Court decisions make quite clear. It thus bears no fair analogy to the enactment of a state law which, being found unsatisfactory to a succeeding legislature, may at once be repealed. Rather, once exercised, the Article V power to ratify is at an end; it is functus officio.

Were the matter legitimately doubtful, however, still it is the better course for Congress not now to introduce an additional instability in the ratification process. A license to rescind, even as expressly authorized by Congress, is of uncertain constitutionality at the very least. An apparent prerogative to rescind may encourage states more blithely to "ratify" a proposed amendment, carrying it through quite inconsiderately on the supposition that at least so long as less than thirty-seven other states have not yet ratified, it may at will reconsider and recall its casual sponsorship. That unsteady casualness, with the prospect of states dropping in and out again of the ratification list (as differing coalitions may produce different majorities within the same legislature after each election), impresses me as wholly unwise for Congress itself to encourage. Insofar as at least two amendments (the fourteenth and the fifteenth) were promulgated by Congress which refused to grant any standing to purported "rescissions," moreover, a different disposition (generally to "permit" rescissions) by the present Congress may unnecessarily reopen attempts to unsettle those amendments. To be sure, the Supreme Court has generally indicated that such questions are "nonjusticiable," i.e., not suitable for judicial resolution but most suitable, rather, for Congress. If, however, Congress itself is inconstant in the manner in which it purports to settle such questions (for instance, disallowing rescissions as to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, but allowing them for the twenty-second amendment or, as contemplated by S. 1710 more generally), a fair question is raised as to whether Article V permits Congress to be inconsistent in its own rules of decision.

All of these (and other questions too) are avoided by revising S. 1710 to provide that ratification by a state is indeed a final act and may not be recalled—a modification I think to be desirable. Assuming, however, that this issue were sufficiently divisive within the current Congress that that change cannot be made without unreasonable delay and possible prejudice to the balance of S. 1710, at the least the section now providing for rescission should be dropped; those Members of Congress concerned with the implications of the current provisions with respect to the pending Equal Rights Amendment, as well as those opposed to providing for such a license either as a matter of wise policy or as a matter of constitutional propriety, will rightly oppose S. 1710 altogether rather than become a party to the "enactment" of so doubtful a provision as this.

The arguments I find persuasive and correct against the propriety of purported rescissions of ratifications apply in substantial measure, but not in full measure, to the provision respecting rescissions of state applications seeking a constitutional convention. On balance, I support the same conclusion here as well: a state having filed an application describing an amendment or a subject it wishes to have considered in convention ought to understand that its proposal is meant to encourage the legislatures of other states to consider and thereupon to join in that call—a license to pull back the application within the period of time S. 1710 otherwise provides to other states to file similar applications destabilizes the whole process and makes the application an unruly sport, subjecting each state legislature to uncertainty about the seriousness with which other states have acted, encouraging applications more likely than otherwise to be rather casual, and inviting new controversy in each state that has already filed a petition to jockey for position to secure its recall. When Congress itself has set a reasonable outside time limit within which like petitions from thirty-three other states must have been received in order to require a called convention, it strikes me that providing also for a (questionable) license to withdraw a petition is both unwise and unnecessary.

One may acknowledge, however, that applications seeking a constitutional convention may reasonably be seen as different in some elementary respects from acts of ratification—and that a different rule in respect to applications may be defensible. The procedure provided by Article V for state legislatures to initiate a called convention is, after all, principally a provision intended to provide recourse to secure amendments against the failure or resolve of Congress not itself to initiate the desired kind of amendment; it is a provision meant emphatically to provide a means to the states to petition for a redress of constitutional grievances against perceived usurpations by the national government and to make repairs of a kind the national government itself might lack the motive or capability to propose. Insofar as the state-called convention mode of proposing amendments proceeds from that concern, then it may be fair to compare the filing of a state application to a petition for redress of grievances which, if the filing state itself determines no longer to be a just grievance, the state should be permitted to withdraw—rather than compelling the holding of a convention that does not now have its support. Our history of state applications, unlike our history of ratifications, is itself somewhat consistent with this view of the matter; i.e., some petitions have doubtless been filed more as a signal of anger or distress (to "send a message to Congress" as it were), than from more measured thought that a convention would be called. Ratification has a different history and, I think, a different gravity. A different rule respecting the different phenomena would, though I do not favor it, be understandable.

Overall, subject to the observations and reservations I have summarized, I believe that S. 1710 is desirable legislation. The present complete uncertainty respecting the adequacy of state applications, the procedure for convoking a convention, the boundaries of its agenda, and the representation of states in that convention, and plainly undesirable. Article V's provision respecting state applications to secure review of perceived constitutional shortcomings in convention was neither casual nor trivial. It was meant to be highly important and expected to be most useful. The omission of congress to provide a framework to enable state legislatures to measure the wisdom and efficacy of proceeding by application has been regrettable. That omission, leaving virtually all questions associated with this part of Article V unsettled (and even incoherent), has been unworthy of Congress itself. Legislation which can be altered insofar as experience may show such alterations to be sensible is virtually two centuries overdue and S. 1710 is basically a sound occasion to correct that oversight.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BAYH FOR PROF. WILLIAM VAN ALSTYNE

1. It has been recommended that the procedures issue should be confronted at a time when the problem can be faced in the open and without pressure, in order to be prepared in advance of state action. Since most scholars agree that one Congress cannot bind another, would it be a prudent use of the Congress' time to consider implementing legislation before applications are received from the states for a convention? Should Congress routinely enact procedures legislation at the beginning of each Congress in order to be prepared?

2. Section 3(b) of S. 1710 provides that questions "concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption or withdrawal of a State resolution cognizable under this Act are determinable by the State legislature." Would this provision take away all power of Congress to consider the validity of a resolution, regardless of the circumstances surrounding its alleged adoption?

3. Likewise, in Section 3(b) and Section 5(b) of S. 1710, the power is removed from Congress to determine the validity of any withdrawal of an application. What are your thoughts on these sections?

4. In many of the petitions that have been submitted, it appears there has been consideration by the State governor and in many instances the governor's signature appears on the petition. Would this indicate that State's preference for including the governor in the process, or possibly the tradition of that State's legislative policy

5. There have been several petitions submitted to Congress which state, in effect, that a convention is to be called on a specific subject, including specific language for an amendment, and if any other subject or language is adopted the petition is to be considered null and void. What are your thoughts as to the consequences, if after a convention is called, several states were to withdraw their petitions or refuse to participate further?

6. If a procedures bill were to be adopted by Congress which included a provision for the calling of a limited convention, do you have an opinion as to the odds of that convention ultimately expanding the subjects for review and discussion?

7. The procedures legislation pending before this Subcommittee contain a clause with respect to each delegate taking an oath to refrain from discussing any subject other than that subject which was authorized by the petitioning states. Other than a moral exhortation, what means of enforcement is available?

8. The ABA and several constitutional scholars have recommended that convention delegates be popularly elected. Can you foresee any problems that may be connected with those elections with state laws, or possibly the necessity of amending state laws to accommodate those elections?

9. What are your thoughts on convention delegates being appointed? Would that appointment be made by the governor or the State legislature?

10. The ABA Report states there is no evidence of any federal constitutional bar against a member of Congress serving as a delegate. Do you have an opinion on that?

11. What are your thoughts with respect to a State legislator serving as a delegate to a convention? What are the ramifications of a State legislator serving as a delegate, proposing an amendment and then returning to the State and ratifying that amendment?

12. Would a provision in procedures legislation, such as that contained in S. 1710, Sec. 7(a) which states that no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed as a delegate—be an effective bar?

13. Is the exclusion of Federal employees as delegates justified in light of the fact that State employees would not be excluded?

14. Is it appropriate for Congress to include in the implementing legislation, a clause designating either the Federal government or the States to provide funds for the convention?

15. In your opinion, which entity should bear financial responsibility for a convention?

16. S. 1710 embodies the basic tenants of federalism and the sovereignty of the States. In Section 8(b), which states that with respect to no federal funds appropriated for a convention, the states shall bear all expenses incurred. The constitutional question seems to be how can the Congress require the legislatures of the sovereign States to appropriate funds for the support of a federal constitutional convention? In the past there has been instances of "matching funds" but precedent would be set for total financial support by the States. The convention would be totally dependent upon the goodwill of each and every State to pay its share, which as we know, was one of the problems faced by the Convention of 1787.

17. In S. 1710, the State supreme court justice with the most tenure shall convene the constitutional convention and administer the oath of office to each delegate and preside until officers are elected. What are your thoughts on this provision as to the practicalities and political impact?

18. As we know, the original convention was in session roughly five months and drafted the entire Constitution, do you have any recommendation as to the duration of any future convention?

19. Section 9 of S. 1710 eliminates the provision in S. 3 which provides that a constitutional convention shall terminate in one year unless extended by Congress. Would this omission effectively authorize a continuing convention?

20. I would like to draw your attention to the fact that S. 1710 does not provide for a vote on final passage of an amendment by the convention. If S. 1710 was to be passed by Congress, do you think it could be implied that the convention itself has the authority to determine the mode and margin of the vote, or would that become a matter to be decided by the courts?

21. By what vote, whether required by procedures legislation or left to the convention to decide, do you think should be required for passage of an amendment? A simple majority or two-thirds or possibly some other fraction?

22. What provisions for judicial review should be incorporated in any procedures bill, or would the convention itself have to provide for any review by the courts?

23. What would be the status of any lawsuit brought before a convention assumes its responsibilities?

24. The ABA report suggests that a three judge district court panel be authorized to review any disputes that may arise with respect to a constitutional convention. Do you have an opinion as to the advisability of this panel? How do you foresee this panel being selected?

25. As you know, S. 3 does not provide for any judicial review, whereas S. 1710 makes provision for an aggrieved State to bring an action in the Supreme Court directly, which was rejected by the ABA feeling that the initiation of suit in the Supreme Court necessarily escalated the level of the controversy without regard to the significance of the basic dispute. What are your thoughts on this?

59-609 O - 80 - 20

26. Do you think Section 15(a) of S. 1710 is constitutionally consistant with Article III of the Constitution, which establishes the original and appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court?

27. Should time constraints be put upon any court, panel or arbitrating body for a determination of any dispute or legal action brought by any individual or State in connection with any procedures legislation or action by the convention?

28. Section 12 of S. 1710 fails to include any provision for dealing with a situation where Congress fails to enact a concurrent resolution providing for the mode of ratification, but the proposed amendment is submitted to the States for ratification by the Administrator of the General Services Administration anyway. What are your thoughts as to whether this leaves a serious gap in the ratification procedure?

29. Section 13 of S. 1710 omits a provision included in S. 3 which states that Congress shall decide questions "concerning State ratification or rejection" of proposed amendments. This power to determine the validity of a State ratification or rejection is one that Congress has traditionally exercised. In the alternative, what other institution could make that determination or would be better qualified?

Brief Response to the 29 Questions Asked by Senator Bayh

Responses to a number of these questions appear in my prepared testimony before the Subcommittee on The Constitution, and I hope that testimony will be helpful. Some of that testimony is amplified in the two brief published essays I submitted with that prepared testimony, and some parts may also have been clarified in the course of the brief oral presentation I made to the Subcommittee.

In one portion of my prepared testimony, I took care to note that there are, of course, many questions of practical significance associated with S. 1710 and with the operation of a called constitutional convention. Part II of my prepared testimony ("Questions of Political, But Not of Constitutional, Significance") identified several such questions and some of these overlap some of the twenty-nine questions framed in Senator Bayh's addendum. Similarly, Professor Tribe (in his essay published in the Pacific Law Review) noted a very considerable number of such matters. With respect to nearly all of them, as I said in my prepared testimony:

"[W]ithout at all disparaging questions or alternatives that may sensibly be pressed by others on [such] issues, those questions and alternatives do seem to me to be less matters of constitutional power and propriety than of specific political wisdom and preference."

Because that is so, I accordingly do not value my own opinion respecting the best way of providing for each such question and for that reason I respectfully do not wish to submit advice which frankly cannot warrant more credence than the well-informed opinions of the members of the Subcommittee itself—but which advice, once given in this setting, may at once appear to claim some special insight. For whatever guidance it may yield to the Subcommittee in response to the more particular questions before it (other than questions of constitutional magnitude to which I have attempted rather fully to respond), my basic thoughts are merely these:

1. As I am firmly of the view that the state-initiated mode of securing amendments to be proposed was meant to be of practical availability (and not meant as mere "window-dressing" carrying the appearance but not the means of securing constitutional modifications), I think that, accordingly, congressional legislation providing for its use should be drafted to make its use practical rather than to make its use virtually impossible;

2. As I think also that a constitutional convention is indeed meant to be a deliberative body (albeit a deliberative body convoked in contemplation of a reasonably specific agenda rather than a revision of the whole Constitution at large), it would be more in keeping with that view that in cases of doubt respecting the procedures of the convention, Congress should generally defer to the discretion of the convention in the formulation of such procedures or, if Congress elects to provide some procedures, it should provide procedures which facilitate the Convention's proceedings as against procedures rendering such proceedings difficult and frustrating.

3. As I think legislation reflecting the central features of S. 1710 is both long overdue and clearly superior to the utter uncertainty of providing no standards of any kind whatever (which, as I said in my prepared testimony, favors only those "who are so very apprehensive of any use of the state legislative mode of securing amendments * * * that they prefer an indefinite state of complete uncertainty"), insofar as the Subcommittee does not feel strongly (or insofar as it finds itself divided) on some of the secondary questions it may be better advised at this time to adopt a limited bill than either (a) to do nothing, or (b) draft in such detail as must necessarily involve both a high level of speculation and a high level of political controversy.

These are, of course, statements at a fairly reified level of abstraction—and may on that account appear to do no one much good. But I think that they may do some good, as but one or two examples may help to show. Questions fourteen and fifteen, for instance, are directed to the preference or appropriateness of federal and/or state funding to defray convention expenses. I hold no strong opinion with respect to either alternative, though it strikes me that there is no impropriety were Congress to provide for reasonable federal funding, even while omitting any provision from this bill with respect to that particular subject would also be understandable and by no means so "serious" an omission as to make the balance of the bill either useless or undesirable. (Assuming, even as question sixteen recalls was true of the original Philadelphia Convention, that money problems should turn out to embarrass the convention—then even as was true of the original convention it is hardly a matter of constitutional significance.) Similarly, question seventeen directs its attention to the proposal that the most senior state supreme court justice act briefly as presiding officer until a presiding officer is chosen by the convention itself. Omission to provide for such a matter would seem to me altogether understandable—though the provision as it now appears seems hardly subject to more than mincing criticism (e.g., such as who shall momentarily preside should the most senior state supreme court justice refuse to serve?). Similarly, a question of somewhat greater political significance is doubtless question eight:

"The ABA and several constitutional scholars have recommended that convention delegates be popularly elected. Can you foresee any problems that may be connected with those elections with state laws, or possibly the necessity of amending state laws to accommodate those elections?"

Yes, surely there are such problems—but presumably there may be problems as well though state legislatures were left free to designate that state's complement of delegates other than by popular election. Assuming that popular election seems highly desirable (a view I think has its own pros and cons and would prefer to leave to each state consistent only with each acting with sufficient dispatch as not to delay the convening of the convention which in most instances I anticipate will be a limited convention), however, insofar as provision for such election proceeds pursuant to legislation enacted under Article V, I should think that such legislation may be controlling with respect to its special subject matter and not require any general alterations in state election laws.

Yet, even as I sketch these brief responses, the original point makes itself clearer than before: some of those proposed provisions may be thought by others clearly important to have and, if so, I have no personal basis for strongly opposing them. Nearly all invite marginal disagreements and add targets for objections, on the other hand, and insofar as most of them are not essential to address in basic guideline legislation (which in my view is all that legislation of this kind need now be) either some change in or outright omission of many of them would be understandable. The legislation should preferably be generous and be brief. Congress would thus be better advised at this time to adopt a limited bill than either to do nothing or to draft in such detail as necessarily engages a very high level of speculation and unnecessary controversy.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR THURMOND FOR PROF. WILLIAM VAN ALSTYNE

Question. You feel that the state applications and Congressional call for a Convention can limit the subject matter at that Convention. If the Convention ignores the limitations, how would those limits be enforced?

Answer. By Congress, declining to submit such ultra vires proposals for ratification.

Question. Do you believe that every state application which calls for a Convention is valid no matter how restricted a Convention the application envisions? That is, is every application valid, even if it cannot be used with other applications to achieve the aggregate two-thirds, because it addresses a unique issue?

Answer. Yes.

Senator BAYH. Professor Gunther, you are a patient soul.

Mr. GUNTHER. You are patient, too, and in light of the hour, I think the best service I can perform is to keep this brief.

Senator BAYH. I would like nothing better than to spend a whole afternoon, or a whole weekend, with the four of you gentlemen, having a chance, without reservation, to discuss this.

TESTIMONY OF GERALD GUNTHER, A WILLIAM NELSON CROMWELL PROFESSOR OF LAW, STANFORD UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW, STANFORD, CALIF.

Mr. GUNTHER. It sounds like an attractive seminar to me. Maybe we could give academic credit as an inducement to hold it.

I have submitted a prepared statement and I have appended to that a fuller exposition of my written views, the Sibley lecture that I gave a few months ago at the University of Georgia and that is about to be published in the Georgia Law Review.

I won't belabor my constitutional position set forth at length in the Georgia lecture. My prepared statement was designed to give a shorter, 10-minute version of my position but I now think even that is too long for this purpose, and I will try to give you a shorter version.

Senator BAYH. We will put the entire statement in the record.

Mr. GUNTHER. Let me focus primarily on a problem you raised earlier on, Senator Bayh.

One of your concerns, you said, was that you did not want to hold out false hopes to the States, to the country, in enacting legislation purporting to curb the agenda of a Constitutional Convention. I think that is properly a central issue that you ought to consider. I think that if today's discussion demonstrates anything, it should persuade you and your colleagues on the subcommittee and on the full committee and in the Senate of the United States that indeed you risk holding out false hopes to the extent that you purport to enact anything like the Helms bill or the Hatch bill—enactment which, as Professor Dellinger pointed out, would be taken by the States as assurances that they could readily have a limited convention.

I think there are two problems about that. I won't dwell at any length here on the first one—namely, that legislation curbing a convention rests on a very questionable constitutional understanding of article V.

The problem I would like to dwell on, because it hasn't been dealt with today, is the political dynamics you could confront even if you were to enact legislation designed to curb a convention. How effective would it be in keeping a good faith convention—not a mad or a crazy, but a good faith convention—and good faith convention delegates running for election from proposing discussion of subjects other than the ones Congress chose to put in its call?

I think it is a very real and very high responsibility of this Congress to inform the country on these matters, to advise about this process, and above all to warn the people and the State legislatures that a congressional effort to limit the convention agenda cannot guarantee that the limit will be effective.

Senator BAYH. May I just, so that we will understand what we are talking about, say this: We are talking about a convention that is called for by the initiation of State legislatures, with the Congress as a conduit for the calling process.

Mr. GUNTHER. What has been often overlooked, is the question of what it is that the States are initiating: It is a convention as contemplated by article V, not necessarily a convention of the sort the States would like to have.

Senator BAYH. Yes. What I was suddenly struck with was the precedents. Is it the States that do the calling, and have a vehicle that is then beyond their control? There is some debate about whether it is beyond the control of Congress or not. There can be no question that the States who called the convention, or asked the Congress to call the convention, who in good faith and reasonable assurance that the call is limited, are powerless to do anything about it if it isn't limited, except not ratify it.

Mr. GUNTHER. There are lots of problems with what you are saying, in all deference, Senator.

One of the central problems is that you are talking about States in good faith thinking they can do something which—as Professor Black argues and Professor Dellinger argues, and as I argue as well, though somewhat differently—the Constitution does not provide for. All that the States are capable of calling, despite their mistaken good faith belief, is a convention that has the power to set its own agenda.

In California last February, the legislature held hearings on some of the problems we are discussing here today. The California legislature was extraordinary because it was the first legislature that even considered in any detail what they would be voting for if in fact they applied for a convention. California, so informed, voted down the application for a convention. The votes in every other legislature before February 1979 came amidst not just confusion, but pervasive inattention to what an article V convention was really all about.

The votes in most legislatures were up and down votes as the symbol of a balanced budget, not on the nature of an article V convention. I have talked with legislative leaders in various States, and they have often confirmed this. In California as elsewhere, some legislators had the initial misimpression that they could constitutionally have a process such as only Professor Van Alstyne has endorsed—where the legislature can, in fact, go so far as to specify the detailed terms of a proposed amendment and compel Congress to call a convention that would be limited to a yes or no vote on a specific amendment. That is a misimpression. That would not be a deliberative convention as contemplated by article V.

Congress bears part of the responsibility for reinforcing that misimpression, by not holding hearings before now and by not enacting legislation that would clarify the constitutional process and apprise the States of the risks. The State legislatures have acted in good faith, I agree, but, more important, they have also acted on the basis of a combination of inattention and, I think, misunderstanding. Your main question should be: What can Congress do to help toward a proper understanding of the convention process?

May I point out that Professor Van Alstyne is the only person I have found, other than some confused State legislators, who will tell you what he just told you and what he has said in his recent writings—that a State legislature can, in fact, take the National Taxpayers Union's or the Right to Life movement's specific proposals for amendment, put them verbatim into a State application for a convention, and compel Congress to call a convention that would be limited to voting up and down on that specific proposal. The ABA doesn't say that and no other commentator has said that. And even Professor Van Alstyne hadn't said that at the time 28 legislatures voted for a balanced budget convention.

I think and hope it will give your committee pause to contemplate today's testimony. You ought to be, and I hope you will be, impressed by the fact that most constitutional scholars here disagree with the central assumption of the bills before you—the assumption that Congress has constitutional power effectively to limit a convention's agenda. I believe that if you gathered another panel of four constitutional lawyers and then another panel of four constitutional lawyers and then another such panel, the breakdown would be very much like we have today—three people telling you that it is not possible constitutionally to limit the convention's agenda and only one person supporting the misapprehensions that I think underlie S. 1710 and the other bills.

Does anybody care what academics think about all this? I think you should, when you contemplate the false hope you may be holding out to the country if you enact this legislation—the false hope that you can assure that a convention will be limited.

Our views are on record and in print. Others are ready to say the same thing to you. If and when a convention gets underway, I am prepared to tell a convention delegate that if he perceives his constituency is interested in a subject not listed in the congressional call, be it the cutting off of funds for abortions or increasing funds for energy, he is free to propose constitutional amendments on these subjects at the convention.

Senator BAYH. What about repealing the first amendment?

Mr. GUNTHER. If in the course of the convention process, that were to be done, I think that it would be constitutionally legitimate, although I would argue vehemently that it should not be done. I recognize that my former employer, Chief Justice Warren, used to include in some of his commencement speeches a reference to an old "Time" poll which suggested that if you asked the people about particular applications of each one of the Bill of Rights, each one of the first eight amendments, you would not get majority support today for most of the Bill of Rights. But I also think—or at least I hope I have enough faith in the country—that the Bill of Rights would not be repealed. But, my point is, that it is not your legitimate function, if I may say so, to prevent this country from repealing the Bill of Rights if it so chooses, in a process where the people elect the delegates to a convention designed to propose constitutional changes. To assume that Congress has the power to keep a convention from considering "bad" amendments is to stand article V and its history on its head. I don't think it is contemplated by the constitutional scheme, and I don't think the political and legal dynamics are such, that Congress can operate as a body which could or would keep an anti-Bill-of-Rights view of the people from being effectuated at a convention. Article V clearly rejects the notion that Congress is the guardian of the substantive deliberations at a convention.

Let me briefly indicate where my own constitutional position stands on the spectrum of views you have heard today. We have on one extreme, Professor Van Alstyne, who is the only one here—and, I think, the only constitutional lawyer in the country—who supports the legitimacy of the narrowest limitations on a convention that one could conceive of. He says that a convention can be limited to a yes-or-no vote on the text of a specific amendment. No other scholar has ever said that. At the other extreme, I suppose, stands Professor Black, claiming that a State application which purports to say anything about subject matter is entirely void. He insists that only an unlimited convention application is proper. In between, you have Professor Dellinger and me, with some slight disagreements, but we are somewhere in the middle. But I should add that, as to the ultimate scope of a convention, we are much more in Professor Black's camp then in the ABA or the Van Alstyne camp. We believe that a convention is a separate, largely autonomous body that has a legitimate claim to have its views effectuated on the convention floor and above all to exercise ultimate control over its own agenda.

Professor Dellinger and I do not agree on everything, but we are remarkably close. I am impressed by that, though I don't see any reason why you should necessarily be. I am impressed because my view and that of Professor Dellinger, while very close, were arrived at entirely independently. I did not know that he was writing about this issue, nor did he know that I was thinking and speaking and writing about it. I think it is not insignificant that two reasonably independent, reasonably non-ax-grinding scholars reached such similar conclusions after several months of entirely individual thought.

All that is background. It does not show that either I, or Professor Dellinger, or anybody else is right. It does suggest that there are significantly different views about the proper scope of a convention. And for the Congress to embrace one of those views for the purpose of curbing a convention may therefore well be a very misguided notion. Congress would surely add to the confusion and raise false hopes if, by enacting S. 3 or S. 1710, it conveyed the impression a convention could be effectively limited in the face of the fact that so many of us argue that that is not true.

So your false hope concern is a very genuine, admirable, central concern, Senator Bayh. If you are really concerned about conventions that may rewrite the Bill of Rights or do other substantial, damaging things to the basic document that has served us so well for a couple of hundred years, I would urge you to follow Professor Dellinger's suggestion and my own; namely, enact legislation which would adopt minimal housekeeping guidelines, but which would not have congressional veto powers of the sort before you. You should make it clear to the States that they can adopt an application which would produce a congressional call stating: "We hereby call a convention because 34 States want to discuss this issue responsibly." But it is of the greatest importance that you also make it clear to the States that you believe that that convention will have a plausible reason to go beyond the subjects suggested in the application and the call. In short, I think it is your duty to apprise the States of the risk of an unlimited convention.

Such congressional action would, I think, change the political dynamics in the States right now. I think many States would reconsider and repeal their applications. I think such congressional action would also be true and more faithful to Congress proper constitutional role in our constitutional scheme.

To summarize very briefly: My view is that States can specify a subject in their applications, can say what they would like a convention to discuss; and that Congress can state that subject in its call. But I differ with the premises of the bills before you and with Professor Van Alstyne and with the ABA committee when it comes to the force of that statement. In my view, the statement of the subject in your call and in the State applications is largely an informational device and, at most, a moral exhortation to the convention, in effect saying, "We hope you will stick to this subject." But such a statement of the subject does not go so far as to effectively bind that convention; ultimately, the presumption created by the statement of subject can be overcome; ultimately, the convention delegates are free to respond to the call of the voters and to get their own agenda.

I say all that as a matter of constitutional interpretation. But I also want to spend a couple of minutes on an amateur effort at analyzing the political and legal dynamics—dynamics which make it very unlikely that any congressional attempt to impose a binding limit on the convention's agenda can or will be effective in any ironclad way. I have participated in a number of debates around the country on the issues before us today. I have found people on both sides with respect to the proper constitutional interpretation of article V. But I can assure you that very few people will tell you that anything you say in your call in order to limit a convention will have an overriding probability of really succeeding. Even those disagreeing with constituional interpretations such as those of Black or Dellinger or Gunther will typically agree that a congressional effort to limit may not work.

Professor Van Alstyne tells you that the courts may defer to a congressional judgment. But the Federal courts are themselves part of the very National Government that the article V convention method was intended largely to circumvent, so that the Supreme Court may not be very cooperative in getting into the fray and siding with Congress. If you passed the bill to limit the subject matter, the Supreme Court may well—and, I suspect, wisely—delegate the ultimate decision to the convention itself, and to the delegate selection process.

I say in my prepared statement that I believe my views are supported not only by sound constitutional interpretation, but also by considerations of political dynamics. Let me dwell very briefly on those dynamics. Suppose Congress were to specify subject to its call, were to enact an exhortation that a convention should address only that particular subject. The next step would be the selection of delegates to a convention. The convention delegates would probably be chosen in popular elections, where passions and delegates would be hostile to congressional control, where issues other than the specified ones, would no doubt be raised, and where some successful candidates would respond to those pressures.

I believe that, when the elected delegates gathered at the convention, they could legitimately speak as representatives of the people, chosen at the most recent nationwide election. Those delegates could make the justifiable argument that they were charged with considering all those constitutional issues perceived as of significance by the people who elected them—essentially, that the convention was entitled to set its own agenda.

The convention accordingly might propose a number of amendments going beyond the subject mentioned in the call. Under the bills before you, Congress could veto such "unauthorized" proposals, could refuse to submit such convention proposals to the States for ratification. But I believe that that kind of congressional veto effort would encounter not only substantial constitutional arguments but also substantial political restraints.

As I noted, the convention delegates could make a plausible constitutional argument that they were essentially in control of their own agenda. They could make even more powerful arguments that a congressional refusal to submit the convention's proposals would thwart the opportunity of the people to be heard once again in the ratification process. They could claim, too, that a congressional veto would fly in the face of one of the really dominant themes in the constitutional history: That the article V convention method was designed to minimize the role of Congress in the amendment process.

In the light of those constraints, in the face of those political dynamics and those legal arguments, might not Congress find it impolitic to refuse to submit the convention's proposals to ratification? I suggest that it is not at all inconceivable that Congress, despite its initial hope that it could confine the agenda of the convention by specifying the subject, would ultimately find it to be the course of least resistance, as well as the course truest to the constitutional scheme, to submit all of the proposals emanating from a convention of delegates by the people to the ratification process, where the people would have another say.

Permissible specifications of subject matter in State applications and in the congressional call, but, ultimately, no effective or proper limit on the scope of the convention's deliberations: That, I submit, is the most plausible understanding of the article V convention method.

That, I believe, is the understanding this committee should embrace and convey to the State legislatures and the Nation, in order to dispel the prevailing uncertainties about the article V convention method. That understanding, I submit, should govern this committee's scrutiny of the pending proposals; that understanding supports those provisions of S. 3 and S. 1710 dealing with minimum procedural, housekeeping ground rules, but not those seeking to impose substantive constraints on a convention's deliberations.

Obviously, those premises lead me to disagree with the ABA committee as to congressionally imposed limits. Instead, I—and, in different ways, Professors Black and Dellinger—insist that it is not for Congress to impose an effective substantive limit on the convention's agenda. That is not to say that I would be opposed to Congress identifying in its call—for the purpose of informing the delegates and as a matter of exhortation—those concerns that were uppermost in the State legislatures' minds when they applied for a convention.

I think, however, that you would be holding out a false hope and adding to rather than alleviating the prevalent confusion if you told the country that you had, by enacting S. 3 or S. 1710, effectively cleared the way for a limited convention which would be controlled by you or by the Federal courts or by any other national agency. That would be contrary to the view of many of us who have considered the constitutional history and the dynamics of the political process.

I have gone on longer than I planned. I apologize.

Senator BAYH. Neither of you gentlemen has had as much time as I think you deserve. I regret the restrictions. It is now 1:30. Permit us, if we might, to read the full record, and then present whatever questions we might have in writing.

Mr. GUNTHER. I will be glad to do so.

Senator BAYH. I appreciate your taking the time to be with us. Unfortunately, article V and the Philadelphia proceedings, are not replete with precedents.

Mr. GUNTHER. I am just starting a revision of my constitutional law casebook, which I hope to get to the printer in the short time of 3 months; and you will be interested to know that in the constitutional law literature, there is very little discussion of this difficult constitutional issue. In the 1,650 pages of my own book, for example, I do not mention this issue once. But I plan to correct that omission in the new edition. My colleagues here can tell me what chapter the subject belongs in.

Senator BAYH. Somewhat painfully, as we went through the process of extension of the Equal Rights Amendment, it is slim pickings to find out what was meant. Some of our colleagues reached one conclusion, and some another, but it is certainly not the kind of thing where there is a wealth of information to draw from.

Let me ask one question, Mr. Gunther. I don't think you volunteered your assessment of this, and if you care to, you may, but Professor Van Alstyne did relative to the question of rescission.

Mr. GUNTHER. On the rescission of State ratifications? I disagree with Professor Van Alstyne on that question, too, although I must say, as he said, that by and large we agree on almost everything else in constitutional law.

Senator BAYH. That specifically was not the question, but that is all right. Has either of you gentlemen views on the ability of the State legislators to rescind petitions, applications, and resolutions?

Mr. GUNTHER. I have no doubt in my own mind that one of the few clear things required by article V is substantially contemporaneous State application for a convention, and that the State legislatures are perfectly free to change their minds, before the requisite 34 are in hand, as to whether they want a convention or not.

Indeed, my own view is that if Congress were to adopt legislation based on my consitutional understanding, instead of the misguided understanding that underlies the pending legislation, that would cause some State legislators, including some I have talked with, to re-examine what they have done; I believe that quite a few legislators would then vote to withdraw existing State applications. The most useful thing you can do is to make it clear that Congress or the States cannot guarantee a limited convention; I think you will then have withdrawals from a number of State legislatures.

Senator BAYH. Professor Van Alstyne, do you have a comment on that?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Yes, I do, if I understand Professor Gunther correctly. The basis for his conclusion proves too much for me, insofar as his view would go to the process of rescinding ratifications as well. So that is not a satisfactory answer.

Mr. GUNTHER. It is for me, of course.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Not for those who think it is appropriate for Congress to first permit States to ratify and then look at the tally and reconsider. But with regard to petitions for a convention, at least, a different argument can be made. In my view, ratification is meant to be deliberate, and it is more so by being considered final when done. It may be considered several times, but not called back again once released.

The view on the other side of the question, with regard to calling back petitions for a convention, on the other hand, could be seen like a petition seeking redress of grievances; and insofar as any one of the States having submitted its request with respect to that, alters its views, even within a short range of years and no longer feels as aggrieved as it did on the spur of the moment, when it may have called up the petition, then I think there are good reasons for Congress to contemplate a different rule.

That does make it harder to get 34 petitions outstanding, because there would be political jockeying for position among the legislatures who had previously submitted positions, making the process more difficult to operate at all. I do not know anything starkly unconstitutional about either alternative.

I only suggest that the difference in treatment between petitions for application and ratification seem to me to have an arguably sound foundation, and I would want you to stay with that because of your own interest in the amendment process, Senator Bayh, and your successful efforts on behalf of the 27th amendment, I do urge you as an individual, Senator, to think carefully about any bill that would tend to have a carryover effect.

There is a widespread understanding that ratifications are disallowed. Encouragement of the contrary understanding is not at all historical either with regard to this amendment or to the general proposition.

Mr. GUNTHER. I would urge you not to be unduly concerned about what you were just told about the spillover effect of the question before us on the ERA ratification problem. I supported the ERA, but I did not support the arguments of those who prevailed on the ratification issue. However, I also believe, that, since ERA is a congressionally submitted amendment, Congress was entitled to enact a different view as to whether it would allow rescissions of ratifications. In short, I think there is no doubt that the ERA extension action was a constitutionally authorized thing for Congress to do. But when dealing with the convention route, I think it is very important to bear in mind that the congressional role in governing the process is far more minimal than when Congress initiates the amendment process. So I think the spillover effect is clearer on the surface than when one thinks about it. The spillover argument risks comparing apples and oranges.

Senator BAYH. Thank you, gentlemen, both of you, for your contribution here. I apologize for keeping you here until almost 2 o'clock. Thank you.

Mr. GUNTHER. Thank you. We appreciate the opportunity of being here.

[Whereupon, at 1:42 p.m., the subcommittee recessed to reconvene subject to the call of the Chair.]

[Mr. Gunther's prepared statement with attachments and answers to questions from Senator Bayh and Senator Thurmond follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF GERALD GUNTHER

I appreciate the opportunity to participate in these important hearings. They are important for at least two related reasons.

First, I believe that Congress has the responsibility to air and help eliminate some of the uncertainties and difficulties pertaining to the convention method of amendment under Article V of the Constitution. As you know, about 30 state legislatures have applied for a constitutional convention; in most of those legislatures, there has been virtually no attention to the question of what the calling of such a convention would entail; and many of the state legislators voting for applications have acted on the mistaken assumption that it is within the states' power to initiate a convention limited to an up-and-down vote on a very specific amendment proposal.

Second, I believe that Congress has the responsibility to address the question of enacting procedural legislation pertaining to the calling of a convention under Article V. We have never used that amendment method; no guidelines are on the books pertaining to a congressional response to the requisite number of applications from the states. I have grave constitutional doubts about some of the provisions in the constitutional convention bills pending before you; but I do not doubt that addressing these proposals and the questions they raise can shed important and helpful light on the process—light which is surely preferable to the darkness in which the state legislatures have groped and stumbled, without adequate information and deliberation, toward the brink of a convention.

During recent months, I have spoken and written extensively about a range of problems raised by the untried and uncertain convention method under Article V. In this brief statement, I will limit myself to a central problem: Are there legitimate and effective means to limit a constitutional convention to a single subject specified in advance? In my view, the answer is "no."

I would summarize my views as follows: I believe that state legislatures are entitled to state in their applications the subject which prompted their vote. I believe, moreover, that Congress may, in its call of a convention, state the subject which has prompted the initiation of the convention process. But I would add that those recitals of subject matter in the state applications and in the congressional call are not ultimately binding on the convention. I think that the convention delegates should treat those recitals as informational devices and as moral exhortations; but I also believe that those recitals create no more than a presumption that the convention should confine itself to the stated subject. Ultimately, I believe, the convention is empowered to set its own agenda. In my view, the convention delegates will have a valid claim to consider and propose amendments on any subject of constitutional dimension of concern to the electorate who chose them. I accordingly believe that, although Congress may properly enact minimal housekeeping provisions regarding the receipt of state applications and the convening of a convention, it cannot legitimately compel the convention to limit itself to a specified subject matter, either through imposing oaths or other obligations on the delegates or through threats to veto so-called "unauthorized" convention proposals. I would add, moreover, that even if the congressional call purported to confine a convention to a stated subject, the dynamics of politics as well as the most persuasive constitutional arguments would generate powerful forces making it highly unlikely that Congress could and would effectively interpose itself between the convention's allegedly "unauthorized" proposals and the ratification process.

My examination of the text, history and structure of Article V persuades me that the convention was to be a substantially autonomous body, and that the role of Congress in channeling the convention method of amendment was to be a minimal one. To me, the most significant aspect of the debates on the amendment process in Philadelphia in 1787 was the deliberate introduction of the convention device into Article V. That device makes the state-initiated amendment route very different from the traditionally used alternative, whereby Congress proposes amendments and the states ratify. Under the convention route, states cannot propose specific amendments and may only initiate a convention; Congress must call a convention when the requisite number of valid state applications are at hand; and, most important, it is the convention that is the central body in formulating proposed amendments.

The convention mechanism was a compromise between centralist and localist forces. It was designed to still the fears of those who thought that state legislatures might have power to dictate the terms of proposed amendments on their own, without the intervention of a national deliberative body at the proposal stage. At the same time, it was a method likely to calm the anxieties of those who feared that Congress would have undue control over proposals emerging from the state-initiated amendment route. In short, the convention—understood to be a powerful mechanism in 1787, both from the kind of convention contemplated early in the Philadelphia convention and from the Framers' experience at the Philadelphia Convention itself—was conceived as the central institution in the state-initiated amendment process, a genuinely deliberative body with very considerable autonomy of its own.

Even a cursory examination of the sources relevant to constitutional interpretation undercuts the basic premise of those who argue that the state-initiated amendment route must be construed as parallel or essentially synonymous to the congressionally-initiated one, that it must be as "easy" to use, and that the convention's agenda must accordingly be limited to the subject specified in the state applications and in the congressional call. The Philadelphia Convention did not accept Madison's proposal to make two-thirds of the states coequal with Congress in proposing amendments. Instead, the 1787 debates limited the states' initiative to one applying for a convention, and it inserted the convention as the institution that would undertake the actual proposing. True, Congress has full control over the terms of the proposed amendment when it rather than the states initiates the process. But, given the nature of the convention mechanism set up by the Constitution and the background of that mechanism, the state-initiated convention route cannot be synonymous. Under that route, state legislatures can voice their grievances and demand a convention; the national legislature's control is sharply limited; and it is the convention that is the dominant national forum to consider constitutional defects and debate and propose desirable amendments.

In short, what I think the Framers had primarily in mind was that the states should have the opportunity to initiate the constitutional revision process if Congress became unresponsive, arrogant, or tyrannical. That does not mean that any convention called under Article V must be as far-reaching as the one in 1787. I see no reason why the states cannot voice the grievance that prompts the applications, or why the articulation of that grievance should not have appropriate weight when it is repeated in the congressional call. But I do insist that the convention contemplated is not limited to consideration of the specified grievance. I believe that a convention is entitled to consider all major constitutional issues of concern to the country at the time the delegates are selected and the convention meets.

My constitutional position stands in between the extremes: I do not agree with those who claim that only a limited convention is contemplated by Article V nor with those who argue that only an unlimited convention is permissible, so that Congress must consider void and ineffectual any state application for a limited convention. Instead, I believe that specifications of subject matter by the states and by Congress are permissible, but that the convention is a separate, independent body ultimately not controllable by the applying states or by Congress. My view does not preclude the possibility of a single-issue convention if there is only one, overriding constitutional problem before the country when the delegates are selected and the convention gathers; but if several constitutional issues are of concern to the nation, I believe that the delegates may consider them. My reading is akin to that of the "limited convention" advocates in giving some weight to state and congressional specifications of subject matter; but it is allied with the "unlimited convention" position in insisting on ultimate control by the convention of its own agenda.

I believe that my position is supported not only by sound interpretation of the constitutional scheme but also by considerations of political dynamics. Consider those dynamics for a moment.

Suppose that Congress were to specify a subject in its call—an exhortation that the convention address only that particular subject. The next step would be the selection of delegates for a convention. The convention delegates would probably be chosen in popular elections—elections where the platforms and debates would be outside effective congressional control, where interest groups would surely seek to raise issues other than the specified one, and where some successful candidates would probably respond to those pressures. I believe that when the delegates gather at a convention, they can legitimately claim to speak as representatives of the people, reflecting voter desires expressed at the most recent nationwide election. And these delegates could accordingly make a very plausible argument that they were charged with considering all those constitutional issues perceived as major concerns by the American people who elected them—in essence, that the convention is entitled to sets its own agenda. Acting on those premises, the convention might well propose a number of amendments, including amendments on subjects not specified in the congressional call.

Now, if the convention were to report such allegedly "unauthorized" proposals to Congress for submission to ratification, would Congress truly be in a position effectively to ignore them? I doubt it: I believe any such congressional veto effort would encounter not only substantial constitutional arguments but also substantial political restraints.

Consider the possible context in which congressional consideration of a veto of the convention's efforts would arise. The delegates elected to serve at "a Convention for proposing Amendments" (in the words of Article V) could make plausible constitutional arguments that they acted with justification, despite the prior congressional specification of the subject. They could make even more powerful arguments that a congressional refusal to submit the convention's proposed amendments to ratification would thwart the opportunity of the people to be heard once again, in the ratification process. They could claim, too, that any significatnt congressional control and confinement of the convention route would fly in the face of one of the dominant themes of the constitutional history: if the state-initiated method for amending the Constitution was designed for anything, it was designed to minimize the role of Congress. Congress was given only two responsibilities in the Article V convention route; and, properly construed, these are extremely narrow responsibilities. First, Congress must call the convention when 34 valid applications are at hand (and it is of course a necessary part of that task to consider the validity of the applications and to set up housekeeping details regarding the receipt of applications and the convening of the convention). Second, after the convention has submitted its proposals, Congress has the responsibility for choosing the method of ratification. And that, it can be persuasively argued, is all that Congress can properly do.

In the face of those political dynamics and those legal arguments, might not Congress find it impolitic to refuse to submit the convention's proposals to ratification? I suggest that it is not at all inconceivable that Congress—despite its initial hope that it could confine the agenda of the convention by specifying the subject—would ultimately find it to be the course of least resistance (as well as the course truest to the constitutional scheme) to submit all of the proposals emanating from a convention of delegates elected by the people to the ratification process, where the people would have another say.

Permissible specifications of subject matter in state applications and in the congressional call, but, ultimately, no effective or proper limit on the scope of the convention's deliberations: that, I submit, is the most plausible understanding of the Article V convention method.

That, I believe, is the understanding this committee should adopt and convey to the state legislatures and the nation in order to dispel the prevailing uncertainties about the Article V convention method. That understanding, I submit, should govern this committee's scrutiny of the pending proposals; that understanding supports those provisions dealing with minimum procedural groundrules, but not those seeking to impose substantive constraints on a convention's deliberations.

In this statement, I have not been able to spell out all of the arguments supporting that understanding. I will of course be glad to answer questions. And, with your permission, I will submit for the record the fullest written elaboration of my views, the text of an article soon to be published in the Georgia Law Review based on the John A. Sibley Lecture I gave at that University some months ago.

GEORGIA LAW REVIEW

VOLUME 14 FALL 1979 NUMBER 1

THE CONVENTION METHOD OF AMENDING THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION*

*Gerald Gunther

In April, 1978, when I accepted the invitation to speak in your distinguished series of John A. Sibley Lectures, I was quite confident that I would speak on one of my two major preoccupations—the work of the Burger Court and the life of Learned Hand. But one cannot work in constitutional law for long without appreciating the hazards of guesses about the future. Not only is it foolhardy to place bets on outcomes of pending cases or to venture predictions about impending shifts of doctrine; it is equally risky to make confident assertions about where one's interests may lie a year hence.

In recent months, much of my attention has been directed to a problem that was not at all on my mind a year ago. The problem is the meaning of Article V of our Constitution[1]—in particular, the meaning of the provision which states that, "on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States," Congress "shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." As you know, we have had only twenty-six amendments to our remarkably brief Constitution in our nearly two hundred years of national existence. All of those amendments have been initiated through the first of the two methods provided by Article V: they have been proposed by a two-

---

* The John A. Sibley Lecture in Law delivered at the University of Georgia School of Law on May 24, 1979, revised and annotated for publication.

 William Nelson Cromwell Professor of Law, Stanford University. B.A., Brooklyn College, 1949; M.A., Columbia University, 1950; LL.B., Harvard University, 1953.

[1] It states, in relevant part:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislature of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . . .

U.S. CONST. art. V.

thirds vote of Congress, with subsequent ratification by three-fourths of the states. We have never tried the alternative method of amendment, the constitutional convention process. And that constitutional convention route bristles with unanswered questions. Those questions have prompted me to do some reading and thinking in recent months in the unaccustomed and refreshing realm of constitutional interpretation unguided (and unobscured) by judicial pronouncements.

The constitutional convention issue entered most people's consciousness only this spring, largely through the efforts of a specialist in consciousness-raising, California Governor Jerry Brown. Early in 1979, the Governor urged in his inaugural speech that the states apply for a convention to achieve adoption of a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced federal budget.[2] And the Governor has ever since campaigned in support of the drive to call the first constitutional convention since the Philadelphia one in 1787.[3] That drive is momentous indeed: as of mid-1979, thirty states had applied to Congress for a convention;[4] and under Article V, it is clear that, when thirty-four valid applications are at hand, Congress is under a duty to call a convention—a constitutional convention for which there are no guidelines regarding such central problems as the selection of delegates, the duration of its meeting, and, above all, its agenda and authority.

In examining the constitutional convention process, I will begin with some comments on the current drive to persuade two-thirds of the states to apply for a convention.[5] I especially want to scrutinize the assurances of the budget amendment advocates that their campaign will not produce a "runaway" convention.[6] I will then offer my own view of what the Constitution contemplates about the contours of a constitutional convention called under Article V.[7] Finally, I want to address the question of what Congress should do now, and

---

[2] See excerpts from Brown's inaugural address in Brown's Twin Speeches: Presidential-Campaign-Inaugural and Routine State-of-the-State, 10 CAL. J. 73, 73 (1979).

[3] Interview with Edmund G. Brown, Jr., Governor of California, in San Francisco, California (Oct. 6, 1979), reported in King, Brown Starting Drive in Northeast to Eliminate Carter as Candidate, N.Y. Times, Oct. 7, 1979, at 26, col. 1-2.

[4] For a convenient listing of the applying states as of May 31, 1979 (with references to the pages of the Congressional Record in which the text of the resolutions have been printed), see Dellinger, The Recurring Question of the "Limited" Constitutional Convention, 88 YALE L.J. 1623, 1623 n.2 (1979).

[5] See text accompanying notes 9-12, infra.

[6] See text accompanying notes 13-23, infra.

[7] See text accompanying notes 24-43, infra.

59-609 O - 80 - 21

especially the problems raised by pending proposals for federal legislation establishing the machinery for (and delineating the bounds of) Article V constitutional conventions.[8]

I. The Current Campaign

The ongoing balanced budget campaign is a threat to launch the first Article V convention in our history. The fact that we have never used the convention route does not make it illegitimate, of course: it is there in the Constitution, and it is there to be used when appropriate. But it is an uncertain route because it hasn't been tried, because it raises a lot of questions, and because those questions haven't begun to be resolved. If thirty-four state legislatures deliberately and thoughtfully want to take this uncertain course, with adequate awareness that they risk prompting a convention that will be able to consider issues ranging far beyond the balanced budget, so be it. But the present campaign has in fact largely been an exercise in constitutional irresponsibility—constitutional roulette, or brinksmanship if you will, a stumbling toward a constitutional convention that more resembles blindman's buff than serious attention to deliberate revision of our basic law.

Although he is largely responsible for making most of us aware that such a campaign is in fact under way, California Governor Brown did not initiate it. When the Governor got aboard last January, we were already well along towards a convention. The National Taxpayers Union had long been at work on a nationwide, little noticed, but remarkably successful drive,[9] a drive that had persuaded about two dozen state legislatures to apply to Congress for a call of a convention. Even before Governor Brown joined in, the campaign had already gotten the support of about half of the states. These state legislatures had voted with the most remarkable inattention to what they were really doing. Typically, the legislatures did not even hold hearings on the unresolved questions of Article V. Typically, the legislative debates were brief and perfunctory, essentially up-and-down votes on whether one was for or against a balanced budget. Yet what was adopted, typically, was a resolution which said that, unless Congress submitted a budget amendment of its own, the state was applying under Article V for a constitutional convention.[10] I think it is fair to say that the questions of what such a convention might do, and especially whether such a convention could and would be limited to the balanced budget issue, were largely ignored.

[8] See text accompanying notes 44-64, infra.

[9] See Mohr, Tax Union Playing Chief Role in Drive, N.Y. Times, May 15, 1979, at D18, col. 1; Wall St. J., Feb. 1, 1979, at 17 (Western ed.) (NTU full-page advertisement advocating federal balanced budget amendment).

When Governor Brown joined the campaign, the public began to take it more seriously. In February 1979, a committee of the California Assembly became the first state legislative body to hold extensive hearings on what the convention process really might look like.[11] The California legislature rejected the convention proposal after those hearings. Many people then assumed that the drive was dead. But it continues. By the summer of 1979, New Hampshire had become the thirtieth state to ask for a convention.[12] The chief proponents, the National Taxpayers Union and the California Governor, plan to press the campaign in other state legislatures during 1980. If four more states join the campaign, I suppose everyone will become aware that a truly major constitutional issue confronts us.

II. The Unpersuasive Assurances of the Budget Amendment Advocates

A major reason why so many serious questions have been ignored is that the advocates of the balanced budget amendment have uttered frequent assurances that a constitutional convention can readily be limited to a single, narrow subject and that the process won't get out of hand. One way of examining the problems of the convention route is to scrutinize those assurances, in which I perceive three major recurrent themes. First, we are told that a constitutional convention is not likely to come about, since the real aim of this drive is to spur Congress into proposing a budget amendment of its own. Second, we are told that, even if a convention is called, it will be confined to the budget issue and will not become a "runaway" convention, as the 1787 Convention of course was. And, third, we are told that even if the convention were to become a "runaway" convention that proposed amendments going beyond the budget issue, its proposals would never become part of the Constitution because three-fourths of the states would never ratify them.

---

[10] See, e.g., Del. H. Con. Res. No. 36 (1975), reprinted in 125 Cong. Rec. S1307 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979).

[11] California Assembly Comm. on Ways and Means Report 79-1, Transcript of Hearings on the Balance the Federal Budget Resolutions (1979) [hereinafter cited as California Hearings].

[12] See N.H. POM-223 (1979), reprinted in 125 Cong. Rec. S6085 (daily ed. May 16, 1979).

In my view, there is no adequate basis for those assurances, and certainly not for the confidence with which they are persented. I believe that the convention route promises uncertainty, controversy, and divisiveness at every turn. With respect to the central constitutional question—whether a convention would and could be limited to a single subject—I am convinced that there is a serious risk that it would not and could not in fact be so limited.

Let me take a closer look at the major arguments of those who seek to allay concerns about the risks of the convention route.

First, we are promised that there isn't likely to be a convention, because the campaign is simply a device to press Congress into proposing a budget amendment of its own. That claim seems to me the simplest to challenge: a threat to induce congressional action needs to be a credible threat; a strategy that rests on the threat of a convention must surely take account of the possibility that a convention will actually convene. Moreover, one of the very few issues about the convention route on which scholars agree is that, once thirty-four proper applications for a convention are submitted, Congress is under a duty to call a convention and does not have a legitimate discretion to ignore the applications.

Second, we are told that any convention would be limited to the subject matter of the state applications. That is of course the central constitutional problem, and it raises a number of questions for which there are no authoritative answers. Let me touch on just a few of the issues that raise doubt about the possibility of truly limiting a convention, and let me consider several scenarios that might quite possibly confront us in the months to come.

Let me begin by recalling the various steps broadly delineated in Article V of the Constitution. The first step is "the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States" for a convention. After proper "Applications" are received, Congress, as the second step, "shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." Incident to that "call," Congress will have to provide for the selection of delegates; choosing those delegates is the third step in the process. Then, as the fourth step, the convention meets. After the convention reports its proposals, Congress is called upon to take the fifth step: to select the "mode of Ratification" of the proposed amendments—ratification either by the "Legislatures of three fourths of the several States" or by ratifying conventions in three-fourths of the states. The sixth and final step is the actual consideration of ratification in the states.

With respect to the first step, some scholars believe that the only valid state "Application" is one calling for a general, unlimited convention.[13] A larger number of scholars believe that applications that are somewhat limited can be considered valid, so long as they are not so narrowly circumscribed as to deprive the convention of a real opportunity to deliberate, to debate alternatives, and to compromise among measures.[14] Hardly anyone believes that a very specific application, such as one asking for an up-or-down vote on the text of a particular amendment, is the kind of "Application" contemplated by Article V.[15] Yet the typical proposals adopted by the states so far quite specifically seek a balanced budget amendment; they are accordingly open to the charge that they are not proper "Applicatons" in the Article V sense.

But the question of what the state legislatures may properly in-

---

[13] Professor Charles L. Black, Jr., of Yale Law School has long been the most vigorous advocate of the "unlimited convention" position. See, e.g., Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 YALE L.J. 189 (1972); his testimony at the California legislative hearings in February, 1979, California Hearings, supra note 11, at 126-54; and his statement at a conference sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute in May 1979. American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, Conference on the Constitution and the Budget: Are Constitutional Limits on Tax, Spending and Budget Powers Desirable at the Federal Level? 19-28 (May 23, 1979) (unpublished transcript) [hereinafter cited as AEI Conference]. See also Ackerman, Unconstitutional Convention, NEW REPUBLIC, Mar. 3, 1979, at 8. For a more recent analysis somewhat similar to the Black-Ackerman position, see the thoughtful discussion in Dellinger, supra note 4.

[14] See, e.g., AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION STUDY COMM., AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION BY THE CONVENTION METHOD UNDER ARTICLE V (1974) [hereinafter cited as ABA REPORT]; Memorandum from J. Anthony Kline, Legal Affairs Secretary, to Edmund G. Brown, Governor of California (Jan. 31, 1979) [hereinafter cited as Kline-Brown Memorandum]; Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process, 66 MICH. L. REV. 949 (1968); Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875 (1968).

The articles by Professor Bonfield and Senator Ervin were part of a Michigan Law Review symposium on the constitutional convention method which has also been published as THE ARTICLE V CONVENTION PROCESS—A SYMPOSIUM (L. Levy ed. 1971). Senator Ervin's arguments in his symposium piece strongly reflect the position of Professor Philip B. Kurland at the 1967 Ervin committee hearings on proposed convention procedure legislation. Federal Constitutional Convention: Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 233 (1967) [hereinafter cited as 1967 Hearings] (statement of Philip B. Kurland).

The testimony of the late Professor Alexander Bickel at those hearings affords an unusually eloquent statement that a convention must have a real opportunity to deliberate, debate and compromise. Id. at 60 (statement of Alexander Bickel). My own analysis of the problem is heavily indebted to his probing discussion.

[15] When I delivered this lecture in May, 1979, I said that I didn't know of a single scholar who believed that a specific application for an up-or-down vote was valid. Since then, a respected scholar, William W. Van Alstyne of Duke, has made just such an argument. Van Alstyne, Does Article V Restrict the States to Calling Unlimited Conventions Only?—A Letter to a Colleague, 1978 DUKE L.J. 1295 (1979).

clude in their "Applications" is only a preliminary problem. The main difficulties lie in what Congress could and would do, what the dynamics of the delegate selection process would be, and, above all, what a convention could and would do. If Congress, in the second step of the Article V convention process, adopted the position that only unlimited applications are proper, it could simply ignore the limited ones, and the process would stop right there, at least for the time being.[16] Or, Congress, still acting on the belief that all conventions had to be general ones, might disregard the specifications of the subject matter in the applications and issue a call for a general convention.

I suspect that Congress would adopt neither alternative. My guess is that Congress would first of all turn to the question of whether the applications at hand were valid ones. They are not all properly addressed to the correct recipient in Washington, according to some members of Congress.[17] They are not identical in text. Moreover, they typically contain conditions--for example, that the application is to be considered only if Congress fails to propose its own budget amendment, and that it is to be viewed only as an application for a convention with limited scope. If some plans that have been discussed in Washington materialize, congressional committees would hold hearings narrowly confined to the question of the validity of the individual applications. If that happens, we may see a process in which Congress finds flaws in most of the applications submitted. I certainly hope that Congress does not take that route: what could do more to reinforce the feeling of distrust of Washington that underlies the balanced budget campaign than to have Congress strike, one by one, the applications before it, on various technicalities?

I believe that the most probable congressional action if thirty-four states adopt valid applications (and if Congress doesn't propose an amendment of its own) is this: Congress would attempt to heed the grievance that stirred the budget amendment applications but would call a convention with a scope broad enough to still the qualms about excessively narrow conventions. Congress might, for example, call a convention to address the issue of fiscal responsibility. If the convention bowed to that congressional delineation of its agenda, it could, for instance, consider the spending limitation supported by Milton Friedman[18] as well as the balanced budget proposal supported by Governor Brown. If Congress took that route, it would presumably enact—at last—some legislation that would set up machinery for a convention: legislation similar to that proposed by Senator Sam Ervin a decade ago; legislation that presents a troublesome set of problems of its own, as I will elaborate later.[19]

---

[16] See Dellinger, supra note 4.

[17] Late last winter, while most sources were reporting that valid applications had been approved by 26 or 27 state legislatures, Senator Alan Cranston of California counted only 14 and Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana counted 16 while disputing six of Cranston's tally. N.Y. Times, February 7, 1979, § 1, at 16, col. 1.

But all that takes us only through the first two steps of the convention route. The uncertainties at those stages are grave enough, but they are as nothing compared to what confronts us at the all-important third stage, the convention itself. Even if Congress were satisfied that the quite specific balanced budget applications constituted valid "Applications," and even if Congress were satisfied that it had the power to confine a convention to the subject matter it defined (both debatable assumptions), that would not resolve the problem of what might take place at the convention itself. The convention delegates would probably be chosen in popular elections,[20] elections where the platforms and debates would be outside of congressional control, where interest groups would surely seek to raise issues other than the budget, and where some successful candidates would probably respond to those pressures. Those convention delegates could legitimately speak as representatives of the people. And those delegates could make a plausible case that a convention

---

[18] See Friedman, The Limitations of Tax Limitation, POLICY REVIEW, Summer, 1978, at 7; National Tax-Limitation Committee, Memo Re: Proposed Constitutional Amendment to Limit Federal Spending (January 30, 1979) (unpublished memorandum on file with Georgia Law Review).

[19] See text accompanying notes 44-64, infra.

[20] Popular election of delegates has been the assumption in most modern discussions of Article V constitutional conventions. See, e.g., ABA REPORT, supra note 14. Moreover, proposed convention legislation has typically provided for popular election. See Note, Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1612 (1972). See also the Ervin bill passed by the Senate in 1971, S.215, 92d Cong. 1st Sess., 117 CONG. REC. 36804 (1971), and its more recent counterpart, the Helms bill, S.520, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 CONG. REC. S.1935 (1979). The Ervin-Helms proposal would give each state a number of delegates equivalent to the number of its representatives and senators, with two delegates elected on a statewide basis and the others by congressional district.

A more recent proposal, by Senator Hatch—the Constitutional Convention Implementation Act of 1979, S.1710, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. (1979)—leaves the manner of selection of delegates to the states. The Hatch bill provides: "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of delegates, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the state may be entitled in the Congress." Id. at § 7(a). But even Senator Hatch stated in introducing it on the floor that "each of the States will undoubtedly introduce some means of popular election for the delegate positions." 125 Cong. Rec. 11874 (daily ed. Sept. 5, 1979).

is entitled to set its own agenda. They could, for example, claim that the limitation in the congressional "call" was to be taken as a moral exhortation, but not as a binding restriction on the convention's discussion. They could argue that they were charged with considering all those constitutional issues perceived as major concerns by the American people who elected them. And, acting on those premises, the convention might well propose a number of amendments, amendments going not only to fiscal responsibility but also to such issues as nuclear power or abortion or defense spending or health insurance or school prayers.

If the convention were to report proposals such as those to Congress for submission to ratification, the argument would of course be made that the convention had gone beyond the bounds set by Congress. I have heard it said that Congress could easily invalidate the efforts of any such "runaway" convention by "simply ignoring" the proposed amendments on issues exceeding the limits. I do not doubt that Congress could make a constitutional argument for refusing to submit the convention's allegedly "unauthorized" proposals to ratification. But any such congressional veto effort would, I believe, run into substantial constitutional counterarguments and equally substantial political restraints.

Consider the possible context—the legal and political dynamics—in which congressional consideration of a veto of the convention's efforts would arise. The delegates elected to serve at "a Convention for proposing Amendments" (in the words of Article V) could make plausible constitutional arguments that they acted with justification, despite the congressional effort to impose a limit. They could make even more powerful arguments that a congressional refusal to submit the proposed amendments to ratification would thwart the opportunity of the people to be heard through the ratification process. Indeed, one of the supposed "safeguards" heralded by advocates of the convention route—the requirement of ratification by three-fourths of the states—could well become the instrument that would quell any congressional inclination to bury so-called "unauthorized" proposals by the convention.

In the face of such arguments, might not Congress find it impolitic to refuse to submit the convention's proposals to ratification? I suggest that it is not at all inconceivable that Congress, despite its initial belief that it could impose limits, and despite its effort to impose such limits, would ultimately find it to be the course of least resistance to submit all of the proposals emanating from a convention of delegates elected by the people to the ratification process, where the people would have another say.

I am not reassured by the argument that if Congress attempted to submit such allegedly "unauthorized" proposals to ratification, a lawsuit would stop the effort in its tracks. There is a real question as to whether the courts would consider this an area in which they could intervene; other aspects of the amendment process have been held by the courts to raise nonjusticiable questions.[21] Moreover, since the convention route was designed to provide an amendment method largely free of national control,[22] curbs emanating from the national judiciary may prove no more palatable than restraints imposed by the national legislature. And, even if the courts decided to rule, they might reject the constitutional challenge. In any event, the prospect of such a lawsuit simply adds to the potentially divisive confrontations along the convention road—a confrontation between Court and Congress, to go with the possible other confrontations, between Congress and the convention, between Congress and the states, and perhaps between the Supreme Court and the states.[23]

That brings me to the third reassurance about the low-risk nature of the convention route. We are told that the requirement that three-fourths of the states must ratify a proposed amendment guarantees that the convention won't endorse wide-ranging, radical changes in the Constitution. I think there is a fatal flaw in that argument as well. It assumes that a convention would either limit itself to a narrow subject or "run amok" with wild-eyed proposals. But that overlooks a large part of the spectrum in between. Can there really be confidence that there are no issues of constitutional dimension other than a balanced budget that could conceivably elicit the support of the convention delegates and, ultimately, the requisite support in the states?

True, it can be argued that one should not worry about a method of producing constitutional amendments if three-fourths of the states are ultimately prepared to ratify. But I am concerned about the process, a process in which serious focus on a broad range of possible constitutional amendments does not emerge until quite

---

[21] See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939). See also Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922). See generally the discussion of justiciability in Note, The Process of Constitutional Amendment, 79 COLUM. L. REV. 106 (1979).

[22] See text accompanying notes 24-43, infra.

[23] See statement of Professor Laurence H. Tribe, which was based on his memorandum to the White House, California Hearings, supra note 11, at 70.

late. What we risk is a process which starts with a state focus on the balanced budget, leads to a congressional call of a convention to consider fiscal problems, develops into delegate election campaigns where amendments dealing with discrimination and health are also debated, and culminates in a constitutional convention considering amendments on a wide range of other issues as well. Is it really deliberate, conscientious constitution-making to add major amendments through a process that begins with a mix of narrow, single-issue focus and inattention and ignorance, that does not expand to a broader focus until the campaigns for electing convention delegates are under way, and that does not mushroom into broad constitutional revision until the convention deliberates?

III. The Understanding of the Framers: A Suggested Reading

I must confess that it is a good deal easier to challenge the reassurances of the budget amendment advocates that a constitutional convention can readily be limited to a narrow subject than to arrive with adequate confidence at one's own understanding of how the process should work. What is clear is that no one can make absolutely confident assertions about how the convention method was intended to operate. The inferences that can be drawn from the historical materials and the structure of Article V are not unambiguous; and, as might be expected, there is no consensus among commentators.

That lack of consensus has not prevented some supporters of the budget amendment from making confident assertions that there is overwhelming agreement among constitutional scholars that a convention can be readily limited to a specific subject.[24] But those assertions are wrong: amidst the widely varying commentaries on Article V, the point of agreement that most often emerges is that the argument for an effectively limited constitutional convention is shaky indeed.[25] Moreover, the very existence of divergent views in [24] For example, Governor Brown of California repeatedly uttered such assertions in public statements after joining the balanced budget-constitutional convention drive early in 1979. See also Kline-Brown Memorandum, supra note 14.

---

[25] For example, even scholars who argue that as a matter of constitutional interpretation a limited convention is possible concede that there is no effective machinery to keep within bounds a convention determined to set its own agenda. See, e.g., California Hearings, supra note 11, at 106 (statement of Dean Gerhard Casper); Mishkin, A Question of Trust, Newsweek, March 5, 1979, at 17; and American Enterprise Institute: Public Policy Forum, A Constitutional Convention: How Well Would It Work? (May 23, 1979) (unpublished transcript) (remarks of Professor Paul Bator).

the literature adds strength to the warning that venturing down the convention road is risky business. But responsible examination of Article V should and can go beyond acknowledgment of the prevailing uncertainties. My own thinking about the materials relevant to constitutional interpretation convinces me that it is possible not only to distinguish between more and less persuasive readings but also to articulate the single most compelling interpretation.

Most of the literature clusters around one of two fairly extreme positions—the "limited convention" theme and the "unlimited convention" argument. In my view, the truth lies somewhere in between.

The "limited convention" position, illustrated by Professor Philip Kurland's arguments,[26] relies heavily on the assumption that the two amendment routes in Article V must be viewed as parallel and essentially synonymous methods, that states initiating the convention process in order to obtain an amendment on a particular subject must have as ready an avenue to achieve their objectives as Congress does when proposing a specific amendment on its own initiative. Closely related to that structural submission by the "limited convention" defenders is the allegedly practical consideration that any clouding of the "limited convention" possibility would unduly inhibit the states from initiating the amendment process.

At the other extreme, the "unlimited convention" believers, epitomized by Professor Charles L. Black, Jr.,[27] point to the open-ended Philadelphia Convention of 1787 as the obvious model for the Article V convention, insist on the total autonomy of the convention, and go on to argue that a state application for a limited convention is wholly void and should carry no weight at all with Congress, because it seeks a gathering which the Constitution does not contemplate.

My own view eschews those extremes in favor of a point in the middle of the spectrum of possible readings of Article V. To me, the most persuasive interpretation is that states may legitimately articulate the specific grievances prompting their applications for a convention; that Congress may heed those complaints by specifying the subject matter of the state grievances in its call for a convention; but that the congressional specification of the subject is not ultimately binding on the convention. Rather, the congressional specification serves the purpose of informing the convention delegates of the subject matter that prompted the applications and operates as a moral exhortation to the convention. I insist, however, that the convention is a separate, independent body ultimately not controllable by the applying states or by the Congress issuing the call. The convention, which in modern times will no doubt be composed of popularly elected delegates, should treat the congressional specification as creating a presumption that the articulated subject designates the business before the convention; but that presumption can be overcome. I believe that the final authority to determine the convention's agenda rests with the convention itself, and that the convention delegates are authorized to consider any issue perceived by the people who elected them as sufficiently significant to warrant constitutional change. My own view, in short, does not preclude the possibility of a single issue convention, if there is only one, overriding constitutional problem before the country when the delegates are selected and the convention gathers; but when a wider range of constitutional issues are of concern to the people, Article V in my view permits the convention to go beyond the single issue stated in the applications and specified in the call. This reading is akin to that of the "limited convention" camp in permitting and giving some weight to state and congressional specifications of subject matter; but it is allied with the "unlimited convention" position in insisting on ultimate control by the convention of its own agenda.

---

[26] 1967 Hearings, supra note 14, at 233. For a fuller elaboration of the essence of the Kurland position, see Ervin, supra note 14. See also ABA REPORT, supra note 14.

[27] See Black, supra note 13.

The relevant historical materials and the structural considerations reflected in Article V support my interpretation. The readily available reviews of the 1787 context make it unnecessary to rehearse the history of Article V in detail here.[28] But the dynamics of the evolution of Article V during that long, hot Philadelphia summer of 1787 are worth recalling.

From the outset, there was agreement that the new Constitution, unlike the Articles of Confederation, should not require the unanimous vote of the states for amendment, but that amendment should be difficult enough to be more than a casual exercise. The problem that most persistently divided the delegates was the proper forum for the proposing of amendments. As with so many other issues in the framing of the Constitution, the underlying tension was between localism and centralization, between state control and national power. At the outset of the Convention, one of the Virginia Resolves proposed excluding "the National Legislature" entirely from the amendment process,[29] and the draft that emerged from the Committee of Detail early in August substantially reflected that emphasis: "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose."[30] That amendment process would have been initiated solely by the states; the role of Congress would have been minimal; and the convention would have been the sole source of amendments and apparently could have made changes in the Constitution on its own, without any further requirement of ratification.

[28] For Philip B. Kurland's memorandum outlining the historical data, see 1967 Hearings, supra note 13, at 234. For an especially useful recent review of the 1787 background, see Dellinger, supra note 4.

But in the closing days of the 1787 Convention—and with some haste, in debates that are not fully recorded—that scheme for a wholly autonomous convention was set aside, because of the concerns voiced by both localist and centralist delegates. Localists feared that the wholly autonomous convention could subvert states' rights;[31] centralists feared that barring Congress from any initiating role would skew any constitutional change toward an unduly localist direction.[32]

These contending positions produced a compromise, originally sketched by Madison but significantly changed before final adoption. Under the Madison scheme, Congress would have been the sole body to propose amendments, but would have acted "on the applications of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States" as well as on its own initiative.[33] The Madison scheme resembles the final product in giving state legislatures as well as Congress a share in the initiating function; but it is different from the ultimate Article V in eliminating any reference to a convention. An all-powerful convention had been the sole proposing mechanism at the outset; Madison's compromise eliminated that device altogether.

The most important result of the debates on Madison's substitute was that the convention scheme resurfaced and became part of Article V. As finally adopted, the state initiative was limited to applying

---

[29] I THE DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION 245 (M. Jensen ed. 1976) (Thirteenth Virginia Resolve, May 29, 1787).

[30] Id. at 269 (draft constitution by the committee of detail, August 6, 1787).

[31] I THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 557-58 (M. Farrand ed. 1937) [hereinafter cited as II FARRAND] (statement of Elbridge Gerry).

[32] Id. at 558 (statement of Alexander Hamilton).

[33] Id. at 559 (proposal by James Madison).

to Congress for the call of a convention; it was that convention that was given the authority to propose amendments, with ratification left to subsequent action in the states.[34] Madison's draft was changed because, once again, objections were raised by both sides. One critic of the Madison plan, Roger Sherman, feared "that three fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States."[35] Another critic, George Mason of Virginia, feared that Congress was given too much control: since, under Madison's scheme, Congress was the sole proposer of amendments, either on its initiative or that of the states, "no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case."[36]

In response to those objections, Gouverneur Morris and Elbridge Gerry proposed substitute language that ultimately found its way into Article V. It provided that, in the state-initiated amendment process, the congressional task was limited to the calling of a convention, with a constitutional convention reinstated to undertake the actual proposing of amendments.[37] That was a compromise, though it was certainly not Madison's compromise. Congress could initiate amendments on its own, as Madison had provided; but the state-initiated process was substantially altered, with the state applications serving merely to get a convention under way, with the role of Congress unmistakably reduced to a largely ministerial one, and, most important, with the convention device reintroduced as the prime instrument for considering and proposing amendments.[38]

---

[34] See text of Article V, supra note 1.

[35] II FARRAND, supra note 31, at 629.

[36] Id. at 629.

[37] Id.

[38] One recent article expresses a viewpoint similar to my own. See Dellinger, supra note 4. Professor Dellinger argues that, so long as state applications merely recommend that a convention consider a particular subject, they must be counted; but if the state applications insist on a limited convention, they ask for action beyond the authority of Congress, so that the applications "simply self-destruct." I agree with Professor Dellinger's view that a convention is ultimately entitled to set its own agenda, but I do not share his view that most pending state applications must be considered invalid.

The Dellinger article, published after this lecture was delivered, is an unusually thoughtful discussion of the constitutional convention problem, and I welcome its publication. His recital of the historical evolution of Article V relieves me of the burden of retracing that ground in detail.

I agree with Professor Dellinger's summary and interpretation of that background, with the exception of one passing statement. Professor Dellinger describes Madison's substitute draft as providing "the structure and substance of what eventually became Article V." That kind

The convention device under Article V was clearly not as powerful as that considered early in the 1787 Convention, for its proposals would have to survive a ratification process before becoming part of the Constitution. But, in view of the evolution of the Article V compromise, the introduction of the convention device into the Constitution made the convention a prominent body indeed. It was plainly a mechanism to still the fears of those who thought that state legislatures might have power to dictate the terms of proposed amendments on their own. At the same time, it was a method likely to calm the anxieties of those who feared that Congress would have undue control over proposed amendments emerging from the state-initiated route. In short, the convention—understood to be a powerful mechanism both from the kind of convention contemplated early in the Philadelphia Convention and from the experience of the delegates throughout that Convention—was apparently conceived of as the central institution in the state-initiated amendment process, a body with very considerable autonomy.

Even a cursory overview of that history undercuts the basic premise of the "limited convention" position—that the state-initiated amendment route must be construed as parallel or essentially synonymous to the congressionally initiated one, and that the convention's agenda must accordingly be limited to the subject specified in the state applications and the congressional call. True, Congress has full control over the terms of the proposed amendment when it rather than the states initiates the process. But, given the nature of the mechanism set up by the Constitution and the background of that mechanism, the state-initiated convention route surely cannot be synonymous. The Philadelphia Convention did not accept Madison's proposal to make two-thirds of the states coequal with Congress in proposing amendments. Instead, those debates in the closing hours of the 1787 sessions limited the states' initiative to one of applying for a convention, and the framers inserted the convention as the institution that would undertake the actual proposing. That convention step inevitably makes the state-initiated of characterization has misled many supporters of the "limited convention" argument. Though it is true that Madison was the first to propose the division of the initiating function between the national and state legislatures, Article V as ultimately adopted differed in one very significant respect from Madison's "structure and substance": it added the institution of a constitutional convention, lacking in Madison's scheme. As Professor Dellinger himself recognizes after crediting Madison with the ultimate "structure and substance" of Article V, "[t]he Madison draft did not provide for any convention method of proposing amendments . . . ." Dellinger, supra note 4, at 1628.

---

route a different, not a closely parallel alternative.

What I think the framers had primarily in mind, then, was that the states should have an opportunity to initiate the constitutional revision process if Congress became unresponsive, arrogant, and tyrannical. No doubt, the notion of a convention most familiar to the framers was precisely the kind of convention they were attending in Philadelphia—one that set its own agenda and undertook a major overhaul of an unsatisfactory basic document. That does not mean, however, that any convention called under Article V must be as far-reaching as the one in 1787. In my view, the existence of the Philadelphia model does not support the position of the "unlimited convention" camp that state applications specifying a particular subject are illegitimate and should be treated by Congress as ineffectual. I see no reason why the states cannot voice the grievance that prompts their applications, even if it is a grievance as "limited" as a particular Supreme Court decision or a particular congressional program. Nor do I see any reason why the articulation of that grievance should not have appropriate weight when it is repeated in the congressional call. But I do insist that the convention contemplated is not limited to consideration of the specified grievance and is entitled to consider all major constitutional issues of concern to the country. If the balanced budget question were the only major issue of national concern today, a single issue balanced budget convention would be entirely feasible. But the actual, unavoidable problem today is that there are other constitutional issues of concern; and, if they are of concern, in my view the convention may consider them.

The strained attempt by the "limited convention" advocates to make the state-initiated amendment route parallel to and as easy to utilize as the congressionally initiated one not only overlooks history but, ironically, fails to achieve its objective of giving overpowering significance to state specifications of grievances. For example, even Philip Kurland concedes that state applications cannot attain a convention limited to an up-and-down vote on a particular proposal; even in his view, a convention must be able to consider alternative solutions to a problem.[39] In the "limited convention" proponents' search for a "mediating position,"[40] they accordingly give Congress—the body clearly intended to play a very minor role on the convention road—a very considerable authority. Congress, in their view, must broaden the call from something as narrow as the National Taxpayers Union's budget proposal to something more expansive, such as "fiscal problems." I of course do not believe that a convention can ultimately be confined even to such broader limits. But I would add that even a convention limited to a subject as narrow as the "budget" could still be a quite far-ranging one: as any legislator who has sat on a budget committee knows, discussion of a budget can readily include consideration of particular items in a budget. If a convention cannot be limited to simply voting "yes" or "no" on a particular balanced budget scheme, what is to prevent it from considering such questions as permissible or impermissible expenditures for, say, abortions or health insurance or nuclear power?

[39] 1967 Hearings, supra note 14, at 233.

[40] The "mediating position" phrase is Professor Paul Bator's. AEI Conference, supra note 13 (statements of Professor Paul Bator). See, e.g., California Hearings, supra note 11, at 106 (statement of Dean Gerhard Casper); Ervin, supra note 14.

A convention capable of considering a broad range of issues, capable of determining its own agenda in the face of curtailment efforts in the state applications or in the congressional call: that view, I believe, is what the historical background as well as the constitutional text suggest. Yet advocates of the "limited convention" position nevertheless argue that such a reading should be rejected as not being sensible. The argument goes that such a reading makes the state-initiated route preposterously hard to use and does not give the states as much of a chance to initiate constitutional changes as Congress has.[41] To the extent that this argument advocates an organic view of the constitution, a freedom to reinterpret it according to alleged modern needs, it strikes me as resting on questionable principles of constitutional interpretation. If the text does not limit the convention, and if the relevant history leaves the convention quite a broad scope, is there justification for reinterpretation of an important structural provision because of strongly felt contemporary perceptions?

Even if one were to grant the premise that current needs justify constitutional reinterpretation, I find no compelling case for such a necessity. My interpretation emphasizes the notion that a convention is serious business, as the framers clearly intended it to be,[42]

---

[41] See authorities cited in note 14, supra.

[42] See, e.g., Charles Pinckney's statement in 1787, that conventions "are serious things." II FARRAND, supra note 31, at 632. See also Professor Dellinger's illuminating review of Madison's opposition, in 1787, to a constitutional convention to propose a bill of rights. Dellinger, supra note 4, at 1634. James Madison, in a letter to George Eve on January 2, 1787, noted that a convention would be "too likely to turn everything into confusion and uncerand as I think it should be. My view does not deprive the states' concern with a particular issue of all force; my reading makes a relatively narrow convention possible, but not on a risk-free basis.

The case for viewing the convention as the central forum in the state-initiated Article V process is considerably reinforced, in my view, by a structural consideration. Congress is ordinarily our one national deliberative body, and that national body is the forum for considering proposed amendments when Congress chooses to take the initiative under Article V. An Article V constitutional convention, when called upon the application of the requisite number of states, provides another, extraordinary national deliberative body as an alternative forum for considering such weighty business as changing our basic law. Thirty-four state legislatures acting separately simply are not as likely to act as seriously as a single national forum in the proposing of constitutional amendments. Certainly, thirty-four states acting individually cannot engage in the kind of give-and-take and compromise possible in Congress (and in a convention as well) when an amendment proposal is under consideration.

Surely, our recent experience illustrates that point forcefully. Most of the state legislatures that have adopted balanced budget-constitutional convention resolutions have acted as if they were merely making a symbolic gesture, without fully realizing that they might be part of a triggering mass of thirty-four that would get a convention under way. Contrast a rare recent exception to the typical consideration in state legislatures, the deliberations earlier this year in the legislature of Montana.[43] Montana came close to becoming the thirtieth state to approve the budget proposal. But shortly before the final vote, one of its legislative leaders urged his colleagues to think of themselves as if they constituted the thirty-fourth state. That sobering warning had a dramatic effect: the admonition prompted the state legislators to ponder the seriousness of their responsibility, and Montana drew back and refused to approve the resolution.

For all these reasons, then, I prefer my own reading of Article V. My approach to interpretation insists that one ordinarily follows the most plausible inferences of text, history and structure, and that one does not deviate from those, if at all, unless there are truly tainty." 5 THE WRITINGS OF JAMES MADISON 321 (G. Hunt ed. 1904), cited in Dellinger, supra note 4, at 1634 n.47.

---

[43] See S.F. Chronicle, Mar. 23, 1979, at 7, col. 3.

overpowering reasons for modifications which the text is capable of bearing. In my view, the implications of the text, history and structure of the convention provision in Article V are reasonably clear, and I can find no compelling reasons of contemporary necessity to modify that interpretation.

IV. What Can Congress Do?—The Ervin-Helms Proposals

One lecture is hardly adequate for a full exploration of the large number of unresolved questions posed by the constitutional convention route. But there is one more set of problems that I want to address before concluding. I said earlier that Congress may soon have to deal with an issue that it has side-stepped for nearly 200 years: enacting some legislation regarding the machinery of a constitutional convention, for use when thirty-four states submit valid applicatons for a convention. More than ten years ago, when Senator Everett Dirksen's campaign to overturn the Supreme Court's one person-one vote ruling was before the country, Senator Sam Ervin waged a crusade to get Congress to remove some of the uncertainties about the convention route by enacting guideline legislation.[44] He repeatedly held hearings on his proposals before his subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The hearings in 1967 were especially useful, for they produced an impressive colloquy between Professors Kurland and Bickel.[45] Senator Ervin's campaign finally bore fruit in the Senate; there, the Ervin bill was adopted in 1971 and again in 1973,[46] but each time the House failed to act.

A carbon copy of the Ervin proposal is once again pending before Congress. On January 15 of this year, Senator Helms of North Carolina introduced a proposed "Federal Constitutional Procedures Act."[47] And this time, Congress may be pushed to give it serious

---

[44] See, e.g., S.2307, 70th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967); 1967 Hearings, supra note 14, at 2; Ervin, supra note 14, at 876-79.

[45] 1967 Hearings, supra note 14, at 72-78.

[46] S.215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess., 117 Cong. Rec. 36804-06 (1971); S.1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess., 119 Cong. Rec. 22731-37 (1973).

[47] S.3, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 Cong. Rec. S.33 (1979). On March 1, 1979, Senator Helms reintroduced the bill with no changes as S.520, supra note 20, and it was placed on the Senate calendar under that number. 125 Cong. Rec. S.4138. All references in the ensuing discussion of the pending legislation patterned on the Ervin proposal will be to section numbers in the current Helms bill, S.520.

In the Senate, Senator Hatch has recently introduced another bill—the Constitutional Convention Implementation Act of 1979—S.1710, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 Cong. Rec. S.11871 (1979). For a section-by-section analysis of that bill, see 125 Cong. Rec. 11871-75. Moreover, there are various convention procedures proposals pending in the House: H.R.2587, attention by the mounting force of the balanced budget campaign.[48]

If the Ervin-Helms proposal were now on the books, and if it were accepted as valid legislation, a lot of the uncertainty that now besets the convention route would be removed. But Congress has not acted; and, more important, there are serious questions about its authority to enact all of the provisions of the pending proposal.

The bill does take care of some necessary housekeeping chores, and those aspects seem to me clearly within congressional authority, as essential to the exercise of its power to call a convention. For example, the bill specifies the proper national addressees of state applications,[49] and that would resolve an area of controversy that has erupted this year.[50] It provides, moreover, that an application will ordinarily be effective for seven years, and that a state may ordinarily rescind its application.[51] It also resolves important issues about the composition of the convention: it provides for popular elections; it states that there shall be "as many delegates from each state as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress"; and it prescribes that "[i]n each state two delegates shall be elected at large and one delegate shall be elected from each Congressional district."[52]

Provisions such as these seem to me not only clarifying but also constitutionally legitimate. But there are other provisions that raise grave constitutional doubts. For example, the bill repeatedly states that any disputes at various stages of the process shall be determined finally by Congress, with congressional decisions

---

96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 CONG. REC. H.1055 (1979) (Rep. Volkmer); H.R.2274, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 CONG. REC. H.814 (1979) (Rep. Devine); H.R.1964, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 CONG. REC. H.555 (1979) (Rep. Hyde); H.R.1664, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 CONG. REC. H.402 (1979) (Reps. Fountain, Jones, Whitley, and Hefner); H.R.500, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 CONG. REC. H.170 (1979) (Rep. Hyde); H.R.84, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 CONG. REC. H.128 (1979) (Rep. McClory). For a comparison of these bills, see Staff Memorandum, Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, Analysis and Comparison of Six House Bills on Constitutional Conventions, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. (Aug. 24, 1979).

[48] Senator Bayh's Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Senate Judiciary Committee held the first of a series of meetings on the pending convention proposals on November 29, 1979. Senator Bayh agreed to hold such hearings in the course of the debate on the extension of the federal Civil Rights Commission legislation in June. See 125 CONG. REC. S.7172-75 (June 7, 1979) (remarks of Sen. Bayh); Letter from B. Bayh to G. Gunther (August 8, 1979).

[49] S.520, supra note 20, at § 4(a) (a State's secretary of state or other qualified officer "shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives").

[50] See note 17, supra and accompanying text.

[51] S.520, supra note 20, at § 5.

[52] Id. at § 7(a).

"binding on all others, including state and federal courts."[53] Moreover, the Helms bill imposes a time limit on the deliberations of the convention: ordinarily, the convention shall "terminate" one year after the date of its first meeting.[54] Even more troublingly, it insists that each state application must state "the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed."[55] That language suggests that a state application for a general convention is unacceptable—even though that kind of convention was the one most clearly contemplated in 1787.[56] Pursuing its insistence on state specifications of subject matter, the Helms bill goes on to say that the congressional call must specify the "subject" of the state applications as a directive to the convention.[57] To put teeth into that congressional effort to limit the scope of the convention, Section 8(a) provides, with highly questionable authority, that each delegate to the convention shall, prior to taking his seat, > subscribe to an oath by which he shall be committed during the conduct of the convention to refrain from proposing or casting his vote in favor of any proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to any subject which is not named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called.[58]

Apparently, the drafters were not entirely sure that delegates' oaths would work, for a later provision authorizes Congress to block the

---

[53] See id. at §§ 5(c), 10(b), and 13(c). But see H.R.2587, supra note 47, at § 16 (United States District Court for the District of Columbia may reverse congressional determinations if "clearly erroneous"); S.1710, supra note 47, at § 15 (a state may bring an action in the Supreme Court to challenge findings, determinations, or failures to act in Congress, within 60 days after its claim first arises; further judicial review may be had "as is otherwise provided by the Constitution or any other law of the United States").

[54] S.520, supra note 20, at § 9(c).

[55] Id. at § 2.

[56] See text accompanying notes 24-43, supra; cf. Black, supra note 13, at 203 (theory of limited convention is 20th century innovation); Dellinger, supra note 4, at 1630-31 (framers intended that convention alone have power to set its agenda).

[57] S.520, supra note 20, at § 6(a):

> If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and the time of meeting of the convention, and (2) set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called.

[58] Id. at § 8(a).

submission of a convention-proposed amendment to the states when "such proposed amendment relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described [by] Congress" when it called the convention, "or because the procedures followed by the convention in proposing the amendment were not in substantial conformity with" the congressional act.[59]

I have the most serious doubts about the validity of this last group of provisions—provisions such as the time limit, and especially the effort to control the convention agenda through delegates' oath requirements and through congressional veto of convention proposals. I believe these requirements are quite distinguishable from such minimal, essential guidelines as those pertaining to the selection and expenses of the delegates.

In my view, the text, history and structure of Article V make a congressional claim to play a substantial role in setting the agenda of the convention highly questionable. If the state-initiated method for amending the Constitution was designed for anything, it was designed to minimize the role of Congress.[60] Congress was given only two responsibilities under that portion of Article V, and I believe that, properly construed, these are extremely narrow responsibilities. First, Congress must call the convention when thirty-four valid applications are at hand (and it is of course a necessary part of that task to consider the validity of the applications and to set up the machinery for convening the convention). Second, Congress has the responsibility for choosing a method of ratification once the convention submits its proposals. I am convinced that is all that Congress can properly do.

I suspect that the Ervin-Helms effort at congressional guardianship over the scope of the convention's deliberations rests on the mistaken assumption that the approach of McCulloch v. Maryland[61]—the view of broad discretionary powers of Congress so familiar in other circumstances—is appropriate to congressional action under Article V. True, the Necessary and Proper Clause[62] applies to all powers of Congress; but the scope of the implementing powers surely turns on the nature of the underlying authority and its context in the Constitution. The delineation of congressional authority

---

[59] Id. at § 11(b)(1)(B).

[60] See text accompanying notes 29-37, supra.

[61] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).

[62] U.S. CONST., art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

regarding the convention route must heed the fact that it is a route largely intended to bypass Congress, to place the initiative for beginning the process in the states, and to give the central role in the proposing of amendments to the constitutional convention itself. Congress seems to me to go well beyond legitimate bounds when it does more than setting up necessary machinery and when it goes on to impose substantive limitations on the scope and duration of convention deliberations. In short, I agree generally with the very persuasive doubts raised by the late Alexander Bickel at hearings on Senator Ervin's bill in the 1960's, doubts which led him to brand mechanisms such as congressionally-imposed delegates' oaths as illegitimate and "quite wrong."[63]

These doubts about the constitutional legitimacy of some of the Ervin-Helms proposals do not mean that Congress should continue to avoid confronting proposals such as the Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act. Minimum mechanisms to implement the Article V convention route are necessary, and addressing the issues raised by the Helms bill is long overdue.

That observation prompts some comments about additional congressional action that may be appropriate now. I think it is high time that Congress not only consider the pending legislative proposals, but also pay serious attention to the pending budget convention campaign. I believe that general hearings on the problems of the constitutional convention route are in order, and that they are needed now. If there is merit to my tale of confusion and uncertainty, Congress surely owes it to the country to consider the differing views about Article V and to clarify the misimpressions under which so many state legislatures may have acted. For example, as I have noted, almost all scholars agree that the states cannot compel a convention to vote up-or-down on the balanced budget proposal; yet that seems to be the assumption of most of the resolutions that have so far gained state approval. If Congress is of the view that it can convert such narrow applications into a somewhat broader convention subject such as fiscal responsibility, surely it ought to apprise the states, so that they may have a chance to reconsider their applications. Moreover, if Congress should conclude that a convention has ultimate authority to set its own, even less confined agenda, the state legislatures should surely be told.

---

[63] See 1967 Hearings, supra note 14, at 65; Letter from A. Bickel to P. Kurland (Oct. 2, 1967), reprinted in id. at 230-33.

I fear, however, that Congress will make no move until thirty-four applications are at hand. At that time, if Congress believes that an unlimited convention is possible, it may rely on that premise to set aside the state applications and in effect to remand them to the state legislatures for reconsideration.[64] Whatever the logical soundness of that course, it would surely be perceived as one more effort by Washington to squelch local initiative. Would it not be better if Congress moved promptly to address and clarify the uncertainties, before the thirty-fourth state has acted and before its back is against the wall?

Conclusion

Everything I have said constitutes conjecture about the past and advice about the future. What we have now is an ongoing, nearly successful campaign to get thirty-four states behind the balanced budget drive. Given that present reality, let me conclude with this: If the nation, with open eyes and after more careful attention than we have so far had in most state legislatures, considers a balanced budget amendment so important as to justify the risks of the convention route, that path ought to be taken; but surely it ought not to be taken without the most serious thought about the road ahead. It is a road that promises controversy and confusion and confrontation at every turn. It is a road that may lead to a convention able to consider a wide range of constitutional controversies. My major concern in all this is simply to argue that, as we proceed along this road, we should comprehend the full dimensions of the risks. It is that conviction which leads me to urge that state legislatures not endorse the balanced budget-constitutional convention campaign on the basis of overconfident answers to unanswered and unanswerable questions, or of blithe statements that inadvertently or intentionally blind us to the genuine hazards.

---

[64] This is in effect the process urged by Dellinger, supra note 4, at 1636-40.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BAYH TO PROF. GERALD GUNTHER, WITH RESPONSES

Question 1. It has been recommended that the procedures issue should be confronted at a time when the problem can be faced in the open and without pressure, in order to be prepared in advance of state action. Since most scholars agree that one Congress cannot bind another, would it be a prudent use of the Congress' time to consider implementing legislation before applications are received from the states for a convention? Should Congress routinely enact procedures legislation at the beginning of each Congress in order to be prepared?

Answer 1. I believe it would be a prudent use of the Congress' time to consider implementing legislation before 34 valid applications are received from the states for a convention. Indeed, as I have argued in my Georgia lecture, I believe that Congress has something of a moral obligation to consider such legislation before it finds itself confronted by the requisite number of state applications. My main reason for urging this is that I believe Congress has an important role to play in apprising the state legislatures of the contours and risks of the convention process, so that state legislators voting on applications may have a clearer understanding of what they are asked to vote on. The very recent history of state consideration of applications for a balanced budget convention demonstrates graphically that state legislatures have mostly acted in confusion and ignorance. Most often, those who have thought about the implication of Article V at all have assumed without discussion that the states can bring about a convention limited to an up-and-down vote on a very specific amendment proposal. Hardly any scholars believe that the states have such a power. If I am correct in my view that state and congressional specifications of subject matter are not ultimately binding on a convention—that states and Congress can exhort convention delegates to address a particular subject, but cannot force them to limit themselves in that way—it is particularly important that Congress air that view at a time when state legislatures have not taken final action on convention applications. In short, I view congressional consideration of implementing legislation as virtually the only available national forum to clear the air about the prevailing confusion regarding the contours and limits of a constitutional convention under Article V.

I do not believe that, if Congress were to air the problems I have adverted to in the near future, it need routinely address procedures legislation again at the beginning of each Congress. One congressional statement of desirable implementing methods should be adequate until a later Congress is persuaded that the premises of such legislation are inaccurate; later Congresses are of course free to enact new legislation if that is the case. I would reiterate that the major obligation of Congress is to air the problems of the convention route. Even if Congress were to adopt the view that it had the authority to limit a convention's agenda (a view with which I disagree, but which is incorporated in the pending legislation), I believe Congress has the additional obligation to advise the nation and especially the state legislators that there is a substantial and, I believe, respectable body of opinion among scholars and others that such a congressional effort carries no guarantee of effectiveness—that, instead, a strong case can be made that a convention is ultimately entitled to go beyond the subject specified by Congress.

Question 2. Section 3(b) of S. 1710 provides that questions "concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption or withdrawal of a State resolution cognizable under this Act are determinable by the State legislature." Would this provision take away all power of Congress to consider the validity of a resolution, regardless of the circumstances surrounding its alleged adoption?

Answer 2. I read Section 3(b) of S. 1710 as being addressed primarily to internal state legislative procedures leading to the adoption of an application. As such, I think it is consistent with the constitutional scheme of leaving the initiating function to the state legislatures. I do not read the provision as taking away the legitimate power of Congress to consider whether the resolution as adopted is a "valid" resolution entitled to be counted in determining whether two-thirds of the states have applied for a convention under Article V. That kind of "validity" seems to me to involve such questions as, for example, whether a state is really calling for a convention or merely issuing a general exhortation that Congress propose an amendment. I do not believe that Congress is charged with examining the circumstances surrounding the adoption of such a resolution, however. For example, I do not think Congress may ignore an application because it believes that the extent and thoroughness and depth of the debate in a state legislature was inadequate or poorly informed or subject to excessive lobbying pressure.

Question 3. Likewise, in Section 3(b) and Section 5(b) of S. 1710, the power is removed from Congress to determine the validity of any withdrawal of an application. What are your thoughts on these sections?

Answer 3. I believe principles similar to those just noted govern the answer to this question as well. I read the provisions as suggesting essentially that preenactment internal legislature procedures in the states are of no legitimate concern to Congress: Congress must of course use its judgment on the product of the state legislative process in determining whether the requisite number of valid applications is at hand; but Congress is not, I believe, properly charged with intervening in preenactment state legislative procedures in exercising its responsibilities under Article V. (For further comments on state withdrawals of applications, see my responses in the closing pages of the record of the oral testimony.)

Question 4. In many of the petitions that have been submitted, it appears there has been consideration by the State governor and in many instances the governor's signature appears on the petition. Would this indicate that State's preference for including the governor in the process, or possibly the tradition of that State's legislative policy?

Answer 4. I would suspect that the answer to that question is yes; but, more basically, I believe that a state's judgment on involving its chief executive in its legislative process ought to be respected for purposes of congressional evaluation of the validity of state applications under Article V.

Question 5. There have been several petitions submitted to Congress which state, in effect, that a convention is to be called on a specific subject, including specific language for an amendment, and if any other subject or language is adopted the petition is to be considered null and void. What are your thoughts as to the consequences, if after a convention is called, several states were to withdraw their petitions or refuse to participate further?

Answer 5. I believe that state actions after a convention is called should be viewed as ineffective. It seems to me that the state's responsibility ends when it sends purported applications for a convention to Congress (except with respect to withdrawal of a state application at a time when 34 valid ones have not yet been submitted). Congress then takes over to determine whether the requisite number of valid applications are at hand; and if so, it must call a convention. Efforts by the states to intrude into the process after a state legislature has sent its "application" to Washington and after a convention has been called seem to me inappropriate under the constitutional scheme.

Question 6. If a procedures bill were to be adopted by Congress which included a provision for the calling of a limited convention, do you have an opinion as to the odds of that convention ultimately expanding the subjects for review and discussion?

Answer 6. The odds are difficult to evaluate: they depend very much on the situation in the country and the wishes of the voters in the delegate election campaigns at the time a convention process gets underway. As I have noted in my prepared statement and my Georgia lecture, I believe that the convention delegates are entitled to address any constitutional issue perceived as of concern to the voters who chose them. If the convention were to be called, say, in the spring of 1980, my guess would be that the odds are about 50:50 that the convention would ultimately expand its agenda beyond the subject specified in the applications and the congressional call. But the odds might be different two or four or six years hence.

The more important underlying point raised by this question is in my view this: there is a risk, more or less substantial in accordance with the circumstances and times, that a convention will go beyond the specified subjects, despite any congressional effort to provide for the calling of a limited convention. That risk, not insignificant, ought to be aired by Congress in these hearings and ought to be part of the history and even the language of any implementing legislation Congress may enact. I would reiterate that if Congress were to enact implementing legislation purporting to limit conventions without adverting to those risks, it would be holding out a false and confusing hope to the state legislature. Congress could legitimately say: "We are trying our best to provide a limited convention, but we cannot assure you that our efforts will be effective." I do not believe that Congress can responsibly say: "Here are the mechanisms for calling a limited convention; we guarantee that our mechanism will work." Even a superficial survey of scholarly opinion will reveal that the latter statement does not enjoy significant support among those who have attempted to make constitutional sense of the Article V convention text, structure and history.

Question 7. The procedures legislation pending before this Subcommittee contain a clause with respect to each delegate taking an oath to refrain from discussing any subject other than that subject which was authorized by the petitioning states. Other than a moral exhortation, what means of enforcement is available?

Answer 7. As I note in my Georgia lecture, I believe such an ultimate requirement is unconstitutional if it purports to be an effective requirement. At least, it is misleading to the extent it seeks to convey a sense to the states and the people that Congress is guaranteering an effectively limited convention. I believe, with the late Alexander Bickel at the 1967 hearings before Senator Ervin's committee, that oath provisions are illegitimate and "quite wrong." Not only are there no effective means of enforcement in my view; I do not believe that such a provision can even serve as a respectable moral exhortation, for a convention delegate can quite readily claim that the provision is drained of all moral and legitimate content by the fact that it is a congressional measure way beyond legitimate congressional powers under Article V. (I would distinguish the specification of subject matter in the congressional call, which I believe can, at the most, be viewed as a moral exhortation. The oath provision seems to me a much more blatant attempt by Congress to bind the actions of a convention—an effort by the very national body that the Framers in Philadelphia in 1787 sought to limit to a very minor, minimal housekeeping role along the constitutional convention route under Article V.)

Question 8. The ABA and several constitutional scholars have recommended that convention delegates be popularly elected. Can you foresee any problems that may be connected with those elections with state laws, or possibly the necessity of amending state laws to accommodate those elections?

Answer 8. I agree that popular election is the most desirable (though not constitutionally mandated) method in the late twentieth century. Since the composition of the convention seems to me one of those matters which is necessary to getting the convention process underway, I believe Congress has the authority under Article V to require popular election of delegates; and as valid congressional legislation, it will of course supersede any contrary state laws under the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution.

Question 9. What are your thoughts on convention delegates being appointed? Would that appointment be made by the governor or the State legislature?

Answer 9. I would hope that, for the reasons given by the ABA committee and others, convention delegates would be elected rather than appointed. If appointment were the chosen route, I do not know who would do the appointing.

Question 10. The ABA Report states there is no evidence of any federal constitutional bar against a member of Congress serving as a delegate. Do you have an opinion on that?

Answer 10. I agree with the ABA committee that there is no federal constitutional bar against a member of Congress—or anyone else—serving as a delegate to a national constitutional convention under Article V.

Question 11. What are your thoughts with respect to a State legislator serving as a delegate to a convention? What are the ramifications of a State legislator serving as a delegate, proposing an amendment and then running to the State and ratifying that amendment?

Answer 11. I see no reason why a state legislator should be barred from serving as a delegate to a convention. Certainly in the late eighteenth century, and in most state constitutional convention processes since, the convention has properly been viewed as a separate body elected by the people to revise their basic charter of government; and the tradition has rightly been that there ought to be no significant barriers regarding the peoples' choice of whom they want to represent them at so solemn an occasion. Judges and federal legislators as well as state legislators have frequently served at state constitutional conventions throughout our history.

Consider the early nineteenth century practice, for example. Chief Justice Marshall sat in a Virginia constitutional convention in the late 1820s; Justice Story, at a Massachusetts convention; Chancellor Kent of the New York State bench, at a New York constitutional convention. I am quite clear that all of these then setting judges would have thought it entirely inappropriate if they had simultaneously served in the executive or legislative branches of their governments, or run for office in those branches. They did not hesitate about serving in state constitutional conventions. They rightly understood that state constitutional conventions are not institutions for the day-by-day running of government, but solemn occasions for the reexamination of the basic structure of government, and that even judges could serve at such assemblages.

I accordingly do not believe that Congress ought to enact significant barriers on who may serve as a constitutional convention delegate. I see no significant conflict of interest in a state legislator serving as a convention delegate and then considering ratification as a member of the state legislature. I think it is fanciful to believe that a substantial number of members of any single state legislature would be elected as delegates; and even if they were, that would represent the people's expression of preference as to the constitutional convention.

Question 12. Would a provision in procedures legislation, such as that contained in S. 1710, Sec. 7(a) which states that no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed as a delegate—be an effective bar?

Answer 12. For the reasons given in my preceding answers, I believe a bar on federal office holders sitting as convention delegates would be entirely inappropriate. I doubt it would be effective; I know it would be illegitimate.

Question 13. Is the exclusion of Federal employees as delegates justified in light of the fact that State employees would not be excluded?

Answer 13. Again, my earlier answers apply here: selecting groups of office holders for exclusion from eligibility as convention delegates seems to me to miss the point as to the nature of a convention. Accordingly, exclusion of federal employees seems to me entirely unjustified.

Question 14. Is it appropriate for Congress to include in the implementing legislation, a clause designating either the Federal government or the States to provide funds for the convention?

Answer 14. I believe it is entirely appropriate for Congress to provide for funding of a convention. My basic principle, as explained in my Georgia lecture and elsewhere, is that Congress is charged with the necessary housekeeping details to get a convention process underway when the requisite number of valid applications are on hand. Providing for funding surely is an essential housekeeping matter.

Question 15. In your opinion, which entity should bear financial responsibility for a convention?

Answer 15. Since the purpose of a convention under Article V is to provide a national forum for the consideration of proposed amendments—an alternative to the national forum that is Congress when the other, traditionally invoked amendment-proposing route under Article V is used—, I believe that the federal government is the appropriate entity to bear financial responsibility for a convention.

Question 16. S. 1710 embodies the basic tenets of federalism and the sovereignty of the States. In Section 8(b), which states that with respect to no federal funds appropriated for a convention, the states shall bear all expenses incurred. The constitutional question seems to be how can the Congress require the legislatures of the soverign States to appropriate funds for the support of a federal constitutional convention? In the past there has been instances of "matching funds" but precedent would be set for total financial support by the States. The convention would be totally dependent upon the goodwill of each and every State to pay its share, which as we know, was one of the problems faced by the Convention of 1787.

Answer 16. I agree with the implications of this statement: for reasons noted earlier, I believe that Congress, not the states, is the appropriate funding source. I believe Section 8(b) of S. 1710 is misguided, and that a provision such as Section 8(b) in S. 520—similar to a provision in the earlier Helms bill as well as in the Ervin bill—reflects the proper response to the funding issue.

Question 17. In S. 1710, the State supreme court justice with the most tenure shall convene the constitutional convention and administer the oath of office to each delegate and preside until officers are elected. What are your thoughts on this provision as to the practicalities and political impact?

Answer 17. I have no strong feelings about the initial presiding officer—whether it is the senior state supreme court justice as in S. 1710 or the Vice President of the United States, as in Section 8(a) of the Helms and Ervin bills. Either choice would present few practical difficulties, I should think; either choice may have some political impact, depending on the incumbents. Forced to a choice, I think I would support the solution suggested by Senators Ervin and Helms.

Question 18. As we know, the original convention was in session roughly five months and drafted the entire Constitution, do you have any recommendation as to the duration of any future convention?

Answer 18. As I have said in my Georgia lecture, I do not believe it is the business of Congress to limit the duration of a convention. Durational limits, like those going to oaths, seem to me to go beyond the proper bounds of the congressional role in attending to the necessary housekeeping details regarding the convention. Acknowledging such a congressional power would give Congress a powerful weapon to control the deliberations of the convention; and Congress was not intended to have any such power under the Article V scheme. My recommendation, therefore, is that congressional legislation should contain no provision as to the duration of a convention.

Question 19. Section 9 of S. 1710 eliminates the provision in S. 3 which provides that a constitutional convention shall terminate in one year unless extended by Congress. Would this omission effectively autnorize a continuing convention?

Answer 19. For reasons just noted, I believe Section 9 of S. 1710 is correct (and that Section 9(c) of S. 3 is mistaken) in attempting to limit the duration of the convention. I suppose S. 1710 would effectively authorize a continuing convention—certainly a continuation beyond a one year limit, without congressional approval. Here, again, the wishes of the voters and the judgment of the convention delegates seems to me the proper source of decision. It is difficult to conceive of political circumstances that would in fact produce a "continuing convention"; but if they arose, I think the constitutional purpose is to bar Congress from contravening the will of the people and the delegates.

Question 20. I would like to draw your attention to the fact that S. 1710 does not provide for a vote on final passage of an amendment by the convention. If S. 1710 was to be passed by Congress, do you think it could be implied that the convention itself has the authority to determine the mode and margin of the vote, or would that become a matter to be decided by the courts?

Answer 20. I believe that, under S. 1710, it would be implied that the convention itself has the authority to determine the mode and margin of the vote on final passage of an amendment proposal. Not only is that the proper implication from the statute, in my view; it is also the proper implication from the Constitution. Again, in accordance with my view that the congressional role is limited to necessary housekeeping details, any effort by Congress to govern the voting mechanism at the convention would strike me as constitutionally illegitimate.

Question 21. By what vote, whether required by procedures legislation or left to the convention to decide, do you think should be required for passage of an amendment? A simple majority or two-thirds or possibly some other fraction?

Answer 21. I believe a simple majority vote would be appropriate.

Question 22. What provisions for judicial review should be incorporated in any procedures bill, or would the convention itself have to provide for any review by the courts?

Answer 22. I lean toward the ABA committee view on the question of provisions for judicial review, albeit somewhat reluctantly. For reasons suggested in my Georgia lecture, I rather doubt that the federal courts will want to get involved in reviewing the amendment process even when the convention route is invoked. Moreover, the federal courts are national courts, and it would not be an undue strain of the constitutional history to suggest a constitutional antipathy to national control of the substance of the state-initiated convention process for amendment; and that national control can come from the federal courts as well as Congress.

Question 23. What would be the status of any lawsuit brought before a convention assumes its responsibilities?

Answer 23. I have not given sufficient thought to this problem to have an informed answer.

Question 24. The ABA report suggests that a three judge district court panel be authorized to review any disputes that may arise with respect to a constitutional convention. Do you have an opinion as to the advisability of this panel? How do you foresee this panel being selected?

Answer 24. If federal court review is provided—a matter as to which I have some doubt, as I have just noted, but on which I lean slightly in the direction of the ABA committee report—I think a three judge district court would be appropriate. I have not thought about the selection or such a panel. Indeed, the problems about an appropriate selection tend to reinforce my doubts about the desirability of much if any judicial review authorizations in the bill. Wouldn't it be preferable to handle this delicate and difficult issue by expressing no view on it in the legislation?

Question 25. As you know, S. 3 does not provide for any judicial review, whereas S. 1710 makes provision for an aggrieved State to bring an action in the Supreme Court directly, which was rejected by the ABA feeling that the initiation of suit in the Supreme Court necessarily escalated the level of the controversy without regard to the significance of the basic dispute. What are your thoughts on this?

Answer 25. Without much careful thought, I think the provision of S. 1710 in this regard has a good deal of appeal. An aggrieved state has the strongest claim of anyone for judicial review, for the convention route was after all to be a state-initiated route. And any claim an aggrieved state may raise does I think warrant the dignity of direct access to the Supreme Court, in accordance with the role originally contemplated for the Supreme Court in state-involved cases. On this matter, the ABA feeling does not seem persuasive: any time a state disagrees with respect to a state-protective amendment procedure, it seems to me questionable implicitly to label the dispute as "insignificant."

Question 26. Do you think Section 15(a) of S. 1710 is constitutionally consistant with Article III of the Constitution, which establishes the original and appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court?

Answer 26. Without extensive thought, and without adequate time to elaborate here, I believe that Section 15(a) is consistent with the provisions of Article III of the Constitution with respect to the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

Question 27. Should time constraints be put upon any court, panel or arbitrating body for a determination of any dispute or legal action brought by any individual or State in connection with any procedures legislation or action by the convention?

Answer 27. No.

Question 28. Section 12 of S. 1710 fails to include any provision for dealing with a situation where Congress fails to enact a concurrent resolution providing for the mode of ratification, but the proposed amendment is submitted to the States for ratification by the Administrator of the General Services Administration anyway. What are your thoughts as to whether this leaves a serious gap in the ratification procedure?

Answer 28. I believe that Section 12 of S. 1710 does leave a serious gap in the ratification procedure. As I reiterate frequently in my writings on convention problems, congressional powers with respect to the convention process of amendment are very limited; but one of the very few clear powers and indeed duties of Congress under Article V is to select the mode of ratification for a proposed amendment. I think any congressional legislation ought to reiterate that clear constitutional duty of Congress. Indeed, Section 12 of S. 1710 strikes me as ironic indeed, in light of my other writings and some of my earlier answers to your questions. S. 1710, in earlier provisions, seems to me to go beyond the legitimate congressional powers with respect to the calling of a convention when it seeks to limit the scope of a convention's deliberations; yet, after exceeding legitimate congressional powers in that respect, it proceeds in Section 12 to fail to reiterate a duty of Congress, with respect to choosing a mode of ratification for proposed amendments. Section 12 seems to me to illustrate that it, like the other proposals pending before you (such as S. 3), rests on an inadequate understanding of the constitutional groundrules.

Question 29. Section 13 of S. 1710 omits a provision included in S. 3 which states that Congress shall decide questions "concerning State ratification or rejection" of proposed amendments. This power to determine the validity of a State ratification or rejection is one that Congress has traditionally exercised. In the alternative, what other institution could make that determination or would be better qualified?

Answer 29. Sections 13(a) and (b) of S. 1710 do include provisions regarding ratification and recissions, much as S. 3 and S. 520 do. In short, it does involve congressional determination of some questions "concerning State ratification." True, S. 1710 omits Section 13(c) of the Helms proposal, the general provision as to congressional decision of such questions. I believe that omission is ill advised: I believe that the traditional congressional role with regard to state ratifications or rejections is as appropriate under the convention route as under the usually used, congressionally initiated amendment route. I do not believe that any other institution is more appropriate for the decision of such questions.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR THURMOND TO PROF. GERALD GUNTHER, WITH RESPONSE

Question 1. While you would allow permissible specifications of subject matter in state applications, what effect would this specification have on the validity of the application?

Answer 1. I believe that a state specification of subject matter in an application for a constitutional convention is consistent with a valid application under Article V. The fact that a constitutional convention called in response to such application would nevertheless be able to control its agenda (see my prepared statement and my Georgia lecture) does not deprive a states "limited" application of validity. The crux of the matter is that a "convention" called under Article V is ultimately free to set its own agenda, as a matter of law as well as political dynamics; the scope of such a convention is not within the states' control. It is partly for that reason that I have long urged your committee to hold hearings on this issue, so that Congress may air the widely held belief among scholars that convention delegates would have a powerful practical and legal claim to make proposals on all constitutional issues they think of significance to the electorate. In my view, it is only by such airing of what a convention may indeed entail that the states can be adequately informed as to what they are really voting for when they apply for a convention.

Question 2. When you state that you would give "some weight" to state or Congressional specifications, what do you mean by "some weight", in light of your decision that the Convention would control its own agenda,

Answer 2. When I say that specifications of subject matter in state applications and congressional calls can be given "some weight," I mean that such specifications are properly read as signifying at least the subject that prompted the congressional call and that Congress would like the convention to discuss. In other words, the specifications are legitimate at least as information-conveying devices. I believe, moreover, that the specification of subject in the congressional call can properly be read as a moral exhortation to the convention that the specified subject should be the delegates' initial focus. But the specifications are entitled, I suggest, only to "some weight" and not to conclusive weight. Despite the specifications, the convention may proceed to consider additional subjects, in accordance with the legal and practical arguments set forth in my opening statement and in my Georgia lecture. The specification of subject matter in the call, under my view, would create at most a rebuttable presumption that the convention should address only that subject; the significant limit on the weight of the specification—a limit of which the state legislatures should be apprised by Congress—is that the presumption can be overcome, and that the convention delegates are ultimately free of any legally or practically effective restraint in setting their own agenda.

APPENDIX

PART 1—ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS, NEW ARTICLES, AND CORRESPONDENCE

A Second Constitutional Convention: The View From the First Convention

(By Jeffrey T. Bergner)

At this moment thirty states have called for a second constitutional convention to propose an amendment to balance the Federal budget. The total is just four states short of the thirty-four states required to compel the Congress to call a convention. This is by no means the first campaign for another constitutional convention. Indeed, before the Constitutional Convention of 1787 had adjourned, some of its delegates were already calling for a second convention to consider matters not resolved to their satisfaction in the first convention. To date over three hundred petitions for another convention have been filed by the states on various subjects, and every state in the union has filed at least one.[1]

Because we are a nation which lives under a written constitution, our discussions of policy tend naturally to revolve around the meaning of this document. Our laws are structured and judged in terms of their appropriateness to the Constitution. Even proposed amendments to the Constitution must justify themselves in terms of the spirit and the other language of the Constitution if they are to have a chance of adoption. All changes in our political life must demonstrate their conformity with the fundamental law which is the Constitution. Because all questions ultimately turn on the meaning of the Constitution, the intentions of the framers of the Constitution become highly significant. This is a legacy of the framers themselves, and it has been well said that great men necessarily condemn lesser men to interpret them.

For this reason the intentions of the framers in drafting the amending article of the Constitution invite discussion. But such discussion is required for another reason as well. The balanced budget amendment has evoked highly emotional opposition, and opponents have offered a variety of interested, but wholly unjustified, interpretations of the meaning of Article V of the Constitution. One scholar, basing his opinion upon a single letter of a single word in Federalist No. 85, has argued that a second convention can be called only for a general revision of the Constitution, and not for proposing a single, specific amendment. Another scholar, less attracted to subtlety, has simply asserted that the framers did not intend the convention mode of amendment as a serious possibility. In light of such novel views, it is all the more useful to consider the deliberations of the framers themselves concerning the amendment process.

These deliberations reveal that the framers regarded the convention mode of amendment "to be as desirable and as viable as that which allows for constitutional amendment at the initiation of Congress." [2] Indeed, this conclusion understates the importance of the convention mode and overstates the importance of the Congressional mode. For, as Madison remarked, the issue facing the Convention of 1787 was not whether popular conventions should be excluded from the amendment process, but whether the Congress should be excluded from the process.[3] Any interpretation of the intentions of the delegates to the Convention of 1787

[1] Amendment of the Constitution by the Convention Method Under Article V, The American Bar Association, 1974, p. 69.
[2] Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act, S. Rep. No. 293, 93d Congress, 1st Session 7 (1973).
[3] The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, edited by Max Farrand, vol. I, p. 202.

59-609 O - 80 - 23

must finally confront the fact that the states are given a paramount role in the amending process. There is an old German saying that "Mann denkt, Gott lenkt," which may be roughly translated as "Man proposes, God disposes." The sense of this saying is preserved in the amending process: amendments must be both proposed and disposed. In amending the Constitution, there are two ways of proposing and two ways of disposing. Either the Congress or the states may propose, but only the state may dispose. In the last analysis, the power of the disposition—as the old saying suggests—is the greater of the powers. When it is coupled with the power of proposition, its power is complete. A manifestly greater power is thus given in principle to the states than to the Congress in amending the Constitution. The states may act as proposers and disposers; the Congress may act only as proposer. Let us turn to the deliberations of the Convention of 1787 in ordered to see why this is so.

II.

Prior to the Convention, the Virginia delegation drew up a list of resolutions as a focus for the discussions of the Convention. The first mention of the amending process is found in the thirteenth of these resolutions, listed in the Record on May 29th. It reads in full: "13. Resd. that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislation ought not to be required thereto." In this formulation the Congress (the National Legislature-to-be) was deliberately excluded from the amending process. This formulation differed from the procedure for amending the Articles of Confederation in two ways. First, it excluded the Congress from any role in the amending process. Under the Articles of Confederation the Continental Congress was the sole proposer of amendments. Second, it did not specify the necessity of unanimity of the states to adopt any proposed amendment. It remained silent on this point. The Articles of Confederation had demanded unanimity, a feature which was an acknowledged deficiency of the arrangement which made the Confederation largely an alliance of states. We may note one thing about this resolution. Whereas the entire intent of the Convention was to construct a stronger national government, there was not an equal concern to expand or even to maintain the power of the national legislature to propose alterations in the fundamental law. Indeed, it might be suggested that simply because a so much stronger national legislature was contemplated, the Virginia delegation saw reason to place the amending power in the hands of the states alone.

Resolution thirteen was considered formally on June 11th. On that day there was apparently discussion about the propriety of excluding the national legislature from the amending process. George Mason of Virginia was on that day and throughout the Convention the strongest advocate of excluding the national legislature from the amending process. He was supported by fellow Virginian Edmund Randolph. Mason argued that the Congress might refuse its consent to a proposed amendment, because the amendment might attempt to remedy an abuse of power by the Congress itself. Such an amendemnt, directed at the prerogatives of Congress itself, would be unlikely to secure the assent of Congress. This view was part and parcel of the general view of human and institutional nature prevalent among the delegates to the Convention of 1787. Whether we have reason to reject that view in favor of a more optimistic one has certainly not been adequately demonstrated.

No agreement was reached on the exclusion of the Congress on that day, and the Convention turned to a discussion of another issue. The delegates agreed only that some provision for amendments ought to be made in the new Constitution. This minimal agreement was reflected subsequently in resolution seventeen, listed in Madison's notes on June 13th. Resolution seventeen was considered formally on July 23rd and unanimously adopted in the following form: "That provision ought to be made for the amendment of the articles of union, whensoever it shall seem necessary."

On August 6th, Madison reported in his notes the form given to the resolution (now number XIX) in the report of the Committee of Detail. The Committee, chaired by Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina, proposed the amending article as follows: "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose." From this we can see that the Committee had attempted in the interim to give a role, however slight, to the Congress. The Committee proposed that the Congress should call a convention if applied for by the legislatures of two thirds of the states. This was quite a natural role for the Congress to assume. First, it was through the Continental Congress that the Convention of 1787 was called into being. Second, it was not clear what other body besides the Congress would be in a position to facilitate the call for a new convention. Presumably, this was not a power which the delegates thought of granting to the executive. The power of amending the fundamental law of the nation was simply irrelevant to the task of the executive, who was but to administer the present laws. The role of the Congress is restricted to calling a convention. It is not empowered to propose amendments. Indeed, it is given no discretion in calling a convention: it "shall" call a convention, if requested to do so. It is given no discretion to call a convention only for certain purposes, such as "general revisions" of the Constitution: it shall call a convention "for an amendment of this Constitution" (emphasis mine).

This resolution was reconsidered during the last week of the Convention in September. On September 10th, Elbridge Gerry moved reconsideration of the resolution. Gerry's concern, however, was not to secure an expanded role for the Congress in the amending process. Rather, he was concerned that two thirds of the states might call a new convention and introduce binding "innovations" upon the remaining states. There was no solicitude here for the power of the Congress to alter the new Constitution.

At that point, Alexander Hamilton seconded the motion to reconsider the resolution, although for a different reason. He argued that the Articles of Confederation did not provide sufficient ease of amendment, and that the new Constitution ought not to fall victim to the same defect. The proposed mode of amendment was inadequate and needed supplementation. The only reason that state legislatures would apply for amendments, Hamilton argued, would be to increase their powers. The new Congress, on the other hand, would be more sensible of the defects of the new Constitution. Here at last, in Hamilton, there is a defender of the Congress' power to amend. But two points must be observed. First, Hamilton raised this matter in the context of supplying an expanded amending power. He was not distressed by the ease of amending the Constitution, but by the difficulty of amending it. Second, Hamilton did not propose at this point granting the Congress the power to propose, much less to dispose, amendments. He contended only that the Congress (by two thirds vote of both Houses) ought to be empowered to call a convention. This, Hamilton argued, would not be "dangerous," because the "people" would have in the convention the proximate power of proposing and the final power of disposing amendments. Hamilton simply urged that the possible defects of the new Constitution be brought to light from more than one source.

Madison then concurred that the resolution ought to be reconsidered, but for a third reason. The phrase "calling a convention," he said, was a vague one. Thus, although there were no less than three reasons for reconsideration, none of them turned on a deficiency of Congressional power either to propose or to dispose amendments. The motion to reconsider was accepted 9–1–1.

At this point, Mr. Sherman moved for the first time (just five days before the adjournment of the Convention) that the national legislature be authorized to propose amendments to the states. He added that no amendment ought to be binding without the consent of the several states. Presumably the consent of the "several states" meant the consent of each and every state. Mr. Wilson then moved that the consent of only two thirds of the states be required. Once again the central debate ensued over the states' power vis-à-vis other states to amend the new Constitution. Mr. Wilson's motion was defeated 5–6. Another motion requiring the consent of three fourths of the states was substituted, and it was agreed to without objection. The state delegations clearly wished to maintain a strong control over the disposition of amendments without, however, going so far as to require a unanimity which would be difficult or impossible to obtain.

At this point, Madison introduced a new proposal which embodied the three-fourths requirement just adopted. Madison's proposal read: "The Legislature of the U.S. whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U.S." Madison's proposal was adopted 9–1–1. What is missing from Madison's proposal is the idea of a national constitutional convention, called for by the states. The meaning of this omission was not revealed until Madison commented further upon it later in the week.

On the present day, however, Mr. Rutledge argued that the three-fourths provision, although good in principle, did not offer sufficient protection of the interests of the slave states from the possible designs of the non-slave states. He offered the motion that no amendment should affect the slavery question prior to 1808. Whatever the feelings of the various delegates, this was well understood to be an issue of such intense interest that it must be reckoned with in some form or subvert the entire end of the Convention. It was passed.

The September 12th report of the Committee of Style—comprised of Mssrs. Johnson, Hamilton, Morris, Madison, and King—followed the language proposed by Madison on the 10th. Final discussion of this matter occurred on the 15th, the last day of the Convention. Discussion was initiated once again by the concern for what the states might do to one another by means of amendments to the Constitution. Sherman argued that the protection provided in the exemption of the slavery clause from amendment ought to be generalized to other areas of state concerns. Madison, however, argued that further exemptions would be demanded by every state, and that it was better to restrict exemptions from amendments to the barest minimum. Sherman's amendment was defeated, 3–8. Governor Morris then offered a compromise, including with the slavery clause the provision that "no State, without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." This provision, which is arguably the most explicitly anti-democratic provision of the Constitution, was accepted without formal objection, and is the language of the Constitution.

George Mason then raised the question of the Congressional role in amending the Constitution. He argued that both modes of amendment in the Committee report depended too heavily on the cooperation of the Congress. If, as he believed it would, the Congress were to become oppressive, the people would have no convenient manner of effecting amendments to counteract the practices of the Congress. Mason clearly wished for at least one mode of amendment in which the Congress simply was not involved. Morris and Gerry then moved to amend the article to require a convention on the application of two thirds of the states. To this Madison responded that he "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application" (emphasis mine). Madison clearly regarded the Congress to be obliged to propose amendments applied for by the states. In saying this, he also clarified the reason why the convention mode was omitted from his motion on September 10th, viz., that the Congress was bound to honor the wishes of two thirds of the states and that this mode was essentially independent of the Congress. Madison went on to say that he "saw no objection . . . against providing for a Convention for the purpose of amendments," save that practical difficulties might attend such a procedure. Such difficulties he seemed to regard as a technical problem, and not one of much substance. Examples include quorums, forms, procedures of the convention, and the like. That he did not regard these difficulties as fundamental is proven by the fact that he did not think them fit subjects for constitutional regulations. The question, however, remains: if regulations for a new convention were not specified in the Constitution, who is to make them?

On this question the Convention of 1787 remained silent. It might be reasonably supposed that Congress could and should provide such regulations as are necessary to facilitate the calling of a new convention if it is requested by two thirds of the states. The limit of Congressional power in this regard would be the point at which it conflicted with the clear intention of the Convention of 1787 to provide a genuine alternative to Congressional proposition of amendments. The convention motion was adopted on September 15th without objection, perhaps the clearest possible testimony that the delegates to the Convention of 1787 did not wish to preclude another convention if two thirds of the states desired one. What other reasonable interpretation could be put on this unanimity is difficult to imagine.

John Sherman once again expressed his fear that some states might amend the Constitution in ways unfavorable to the remaining states. He proposed to remove the requirement that three fourths of the state legislatures be necessary to ratify amendments. This he did under a concern for "flexibility," i.e., that future conventions ought to be allowed to adopt, as it were, their own standards of what would count as ratification of their work. His motive for presenting his demand in this form is perhaps clear enough. At any rate, the Convention rejected his motion 3–7–1. The "legislative history" of the Convention of 1787 is thus straightforward: the Convention of 1787 rejected the motion that future conventions are free to propose new modes or new standards for the ratification of new amendments—unless, of course, these new modes or new standards are themselves first adopted in a constitutional way, i.e., by ratification by three fourths of the state legislatures or state conventions. The claims of current opponents of a second constitutional convention—that new conventions will be free to propose new modes of ratification—thus appear to be baseless. An amendment proposed by a new convention, but not yet ratified by three fourths of the states, would not yet be a part of the Constitution. It would have no more standing than an amendment proposed by the Congress, such as the Equal Rights Amendment, which has not yet been ratified by three fourths of the states. This would be so no matter what the delegates to a second constitutional convention asserted. A new convention would itself be constitutional, unlike the first convention which was not itself legitimated under the Articles of Confederation.

The Convention of 1787 was in every way an extraordinary gathering. A second convention, if requested by two thirds of the states, would derive its existence from authority given in the Constitution, and would be bound by that authority. Such a view is consistent with the fact that amendments are listed after the original language of the Constitution. In 1787, Roger Sherman insisted that this procedure be adopted in order to indicate that all amendments are empowered by and in accord with the document which is the Constitution. A rogue convention would be a usurper of the Constitution, and true supporters of the Constitution would be obliged to defend it against excesses with whatever means necessary. Fortunately, there is nothing whatever on the horizon at this moment which would suggest the danger of a rogue convention bent upon opposing the Constitution. Rather, the current requests for another convention seem fully within the spirit of the Constitution.

As the Convention of 1787 drew to a close, Edmund Randolph spoke of the "dangerous power" given to the Congress in the new Constitution. He proposed that the ratifying conventions in the states be authorized to propose amendments to the new Constitution, and that these be deliberated upon by a second constitutional convention. George Mason spoke in support of this plan, expressing once again his fear of the national government. To this plan Mr. Pinckney countered that only confusion could spring from an invitation to the states to propose amendments to be considered by a second convention. He argued that the diversity of views and subjects to be considered at a new convention would be so great that a national government would not be likely to emerge from it. He concluded that "Conventions are serious things, and ought not to be repeated."

The reason for his conclusion is instructive. His reason was that a second convention would be unable to produce agreement. This is a very different concern from that of present opponents of a second constitutional convention, who fear precisely that a new convention would produce agreement. Pinckney said that "the States will never agree in their plans," and for him that was conclusive. But why was general disagreement to be feared? Pinckney referred to the absence of an effective national government in 1787 (indeed, he feared the "contemptible weakness and dependence of the Executive" even in the new Constitution); he said that failing the creation of a national government, there would be a decision "by the sword." Hamilton later echoed this view in Federalist No. 85: "There can, therefore, be no comparison between the facility of effecting an amendment and that of establishing, in the first instance, a complete Constitution." Surely the present situation is not analogous to the circumstance of 1787. Who could reasonably argue that at present the national government suffers from contemptible weakness and too little power? Indeed, it is the power of the national government that has prompted most of the current demands for another constitutional convention. Would a great danger to the republic be found in a sitting convention, empowered only to propose amendments, while the national government continues to govern? Might not the national government govern more carefully and more responsively with such "competition" at hand?

Having seen the difficulty of securing a minimal agreement on the part of jealous states, the delegates to the Convention of 1787 were not about to risk their fragile success before a national government was even established. The plan to instruct the states to propose amendments to a mandated second convention, and hence to continue to operate under the Articles of Confederation, was rejected by all of the state delegations. The new Constitution was then agreed to unanimously.

IV.

A mandated second convention was thus rejected in the year 1787. It was rejected, however, because of the need for an immediate, functioning national government with the authority to act independently of the will of each and every state of the union. It was perhaps rejected, too, because a constitution ought not to be "up for amendment" without a clear demand arising for it. Madison made himself clear enough on this in his cool response to Jefferson's notion that the Constitution ought to be reconsidered every generation. Such a mechanical formula—amendment of the Constitution whether it needs it or not, as it were—Madison rejected as unwise. But a second convention was not rejected by the framers out of a fear that the states or the people might agree, i.e., might wish to effect a widely advocated change. Those who now oppose another convention on this ground reveal an anti-democratic sentiment that might even Hamilton blush.

The Convention of 1787 did not fear the convention mode of amendment. Quite to the contrary: the Convention of 1787 began and ended by affirming it. What power was given to the Congress was never conceived as a substitute for state power to amend, but as an addition to it. Three fourths of the states are given the power to dispose amendments, either in conventions or in state legislatures. Two fundamentally different modes of proposing amendments are established, each to offer amendments to correct deficiencies discovered from different perspectives. Madison speaks with his usual clarity in Federalist No. 43: "That useful alterations (in the Constitution) will be suggested by experience could not but be foreseen. It was requisite, therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility, which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty, which might perpetuate its discovered faults." The provision that three fourths of the states dispose of amendments secures the permanence of the Constitution; the provision of different modes of proposing amendments secures its responsiveness and flexibility.

The framers had no intention whatever of constructing an immutable document. The framers' attitude toward amendment of the Constitution is revealed in the several modes for amending the Constitution which they included in Article V: when unable to agree on one single mode, they simply established two modes. The new found solicitude for the sanctity of the Constitution on the part of some factions is touching; opposition to another convention, however, is simply not defensible in terms of the understanding of the delegates to the Convention of 1787. Hamilton wrote in Federalist No. 85: "The will of the requisite number (of states) would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently, whenever nine, or rather ten States (now thirty four or thirty eight states, respectively) were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place" (emphasis mine). There appears, to Hamilton's mind at least, no doubt that amendments might be brought forth, singly or otherwise, by the states, and be adopted without the decisive participation of the Congress. Federalist No. 85 speaks in the clearest imaginable language: "the national rulers, whenever nine States (now thirty four states) concur, will have no option on the subject. By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obliged 'on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the States (which at present amount to nine), to call a convention for proposing amendments which shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof.'

"The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence all the declamation about the disinclination to a change vanishes in air. Nor however difficult it may be supposed to unite two thirds or three fourths of the State legislatures in amendments which may affect local interests can there be any room to apprehend any such difficulty in a union on points which are merely relative to the general liberty or security of the people. We may safely rely on the disposition of the State legislatures to erect barriers against the encroachments of the national authority." Difficulties ought to attend the amending process when it affects only local or special interests; difficulties ought not to attend the amending process when it concerns the liberty of the people. These are not the words of a man who fears a convention relative to the general liberties of the people; they are the words of Alexander Hamilton.

A REVIVAL, JUST IN CASE

(By James J. Kilpatrick)

The Congress has a piece of unfinished business left over from 1971. When the two houses have nothing better to do, which is most of the time, they ought to get at it. This is an act to provide for the holding of a constitutional convention.

Once again the states are applying pressure. At the last count, no fewer than 22 states had filed petitions with Congress, asking that a convention be called in accordance with Article V of the Constitution. The petitioning states want an amendment to require a balanced federal budget. They are going at it the hard way.

Not many persons are acquainted with the "state application" provision of Article V, and this is not surprising; the provision never has been successfully invoked. Every amendment to the Constitution thus far, has come into being through the familiar procedure by which two thirds of each house of Congress approves a proposal and sends it out to the states.

The founding fathers, fearful of an intransigent national legislature, wisely provided an alternative course. "The Congress on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several states shall call a convention for proposing amendments." Note that the provision is not discretionary; it is mandatory: The Congress "shall" call.

Over the past 19 years, every state in the union at one time or another has petitioned Congress in this fashion. Amendments have been sought embracing everything from polygamy to prohibition. Early in the century, so many states petitioned for the direct election of senators that Congress itself put in motion the resolution that resulted in the 17th Amendment. At the time of a study by the American Bar Association in 1971, more than 300 such petitions had been filed.

The ABA report stemmed from a sudden onrush of state applications having to do with the issue of reapportionment. Many of the state legislatures were infuriated by the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote, decree in Baker v. Carr. They set about passing resolutions, many of them identically phrased, demanding that Congres call a constitutional convention to undo what the high court had done.

Then as now, 34 states (representing two thirds of all the states) would have triggered the call. Amazingly, by mid-1967 the count actually got to 32. Sen. Everett Dirksen of Illinois, grand marshal of this remarkable parade, was ecstatic. His colleague, Paul Douglas, was aghast. Douglas suggested that if a 34th application should materialize, Congress ought to refuse the call anyhow. That set Dirksen into flights of oratory scarcely equaled since Cicero took off on the Carthaginians. Such senators as Javits of New York, Proxmire of Wisconsin and Robert Kennedy of New York denounced the very idea of the constitutional convention.

One thing led to another, and in October of 1967 the Senate Judiciary Committee conducted hearings on the whole business. The hearings led to a bill sponsored by Sam Ervin of North Carolina that passed the Senate 84–0 in October of 1971: Then interest waned, and nothing much had been heard of the matter until the latest campaign began to gather momentum.

Prudence suggests that Congress send for the Ervin bill and trot it around the track once more. It seems to be doubtful that 12 more states will make application under Article V, but you never know. It would be far better to provide the machinery now than to hustle up a bill, as the ABA study observed, in a time of "divisive controversy and confusion." An act should provide for validating the applications, for electing and paying delegates to a convention, and for other housekeeping matters.

For the record, even a faint prospect of a constitutional convention gives me the willies. Scholars disagree, but there is good reason to believe a convention could not be limited to proposing a single amendment on tax limitation. A convention could conceivably propose a complete rewriting of our fundamental law. The wisest course would be for Congress voluntarily to restrain its profligate impulses, and meanwhile, to revive the Ervin bill—just in case.

[From Christianity and Crisis, vol. 39, Apr. 16, 1979]

A New Constitutional Convention?

HARNESSING THE TIGER

(By Frank Thompson, Jr., and Daniel H. Pollitt)[1]

Twenty-seven States have now enacted resolutions calling upon Congress to convene a constitutional convention to require a balanced Federal budget; often with lopsided margins, generally with bare minutes of debate. North Carolina Iowa and Utah joined this number in recent weeks. Similar measures have passed one of the houses in the legislatures of California, Indiana and South Dakota, and the issue is now calendared for legislative action in both Montana and Washington.

In short, it appears very likely that the requisite 34 states will have joined in the call within the near future. When and if this happens, we will have our second constitutional convention. It is time to think hard about this clear and present possibility.

Article V of the Constitution mandates the Congress "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states" to "call a convention for proposing amendments." The amendments proposed at the convention "shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified" either by the "Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states" or by "Conventions in three-fourths thereof" as the "one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

Large majorities of Americans polled on the subject favor both a balanced budget (legally mandated) and a constitutional convention if need be to secure one. Simply put, they are fed up with high taxes, inflation and deficit spending, and they place the blame for these ills on wasteful government spending. California's Governor Jerry Brown urges a constitutional convention for more lofty reasons befitting a (still bashful) Presidential candidate—a balanced budget, he contends, is a "philosophical symbol" for the "kind of discipline this country needs." Declared Presidential candidate John Connally of Texas sides with Governor Brown in the need for a constitutional convention. But most of the national leadership is opposed.

President Carter warned that a constitutional convention would be "completely uncontrollable, with multitudes of amendments originating therefrom." Senator Edward Kennedy labeled the current drive an "ominous development" and a "serious threat to the integrity of the Constitution." Senator Edward Muskie of Maine sees it as nothing less than a "constitutional crisis," and Senator John Stennis of Mississippi describes himself as "alarmed and frightened" by the prospect. Columnist James J. Kilpatrick declares that "even a faint prospect" of a convention "gives me the willies": Howard Jarvis, father of California's Proposition 13, fears that a convention would put the Constitution "back on the drawing board" where "radical crackpots" would "rewrite the supreme law of the land."

Is this fear of a "runaway convention" justified in fact? Equally important, if not more so, can this fear and opposition be justified in democratic political theory? To begin analyzing these questions one must consider why the Constitution includes two methods of amendment. The first and original process requires that amendments originate in the Congress by two-thirds votes in both the House and Senate, to take effect only when ratified by vote of three-fourths of the states. The second mode was accepted as a means of goading a reluctant Congress, and on at least one occasion was applied to achieve this very purpose. In the early 1900's there was a national clamor for the direct election of United States Senators. This clamor fell on deaf ears in the Senate (the incumbents were quite happy with the system that resulted in their being where they were), but then a number of states proposed a constitutional convention for this purpose. As this movement gained momentum—and not until then—two-thirds of the Senate joined the House in proposing what is now the 17th Amendment.

---

[1] Frank Thompson, Jr., M.C., represents New Jersey's Fourth Congressional District and is chairman of the Committee on Administration in the House of Representatives. Daniel H. Pollitt is Kenan Professor of Law at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. His previous contribution, "The Wilmington Ten: Carolina Closes the Door" (C&C Feb. 20, 1976) was reprinted in other publications including the Chicago Sun-Times and the Washington Star.

What, one may ask, is wrong with utilizing this constitutional road for constitutional amendment? Sanctioned by and in the Constitution, it rests on the democratic conviction that the ultimate power lies with the people acting directly through their elected representatives at the state level. Those who met in Philadelphia in 1787 to draft our Constitution realized that imperfections inevitably would appear as time wore on and conditions changed. That is why Article V makes change possible.

A FLAWED PROCESS

Against this argument, what is suggested here is that the second method of amendment is itself one of these imperfections. In historical fact it was proposed late in the hot summer months as a substitute for the earlier proposal, and not so much out of pure democratic preference as out of a desire to increase the power of the states over against that of the central government. Time and temper were running out, and in a spirit of compromise it was decided to adopt both methods of amendment. Accordingly, there were no sharp questions about the second mode, no explorations of consequence; above all, no guidance for procedures of operation. Obvious questions were ignored: How are convention delegates to be selected? Will all states have equal voting strength, regardless of population? Will a simple convention majority suffice to move an amendment to the states for ratification?

The failure to answer these questions in a democratic way means that what originally was intended as a safeguard against authoritarian Congressional arrogence might easily be used in an anti-populist, nti-majoritarian way. Consider the following scenario.

Thirty-four states (the required two-thirds) petition Congress for a constitutional convention. Congress, obedient to the Constitution, calls for a convention in Philadelphia and authorizes the necessary financing. In the call, Congress sets forth the number of delegates allocated to each state (one for each member of Congress), but otherwise it makes no procedural stipulations. The result could well be that the delegates, or many of them, are not elected on the one-person-one-vote principle, but instead are selected by the Governor, by the legislature or by specially held conventions. The democratic process undergoes its first defeat.

Suppose further that upon arrival in Philadelphia the small states (Idaho, Wyoming, South Dakota, Rhode Island, etc.) hold a caucus and, fearing domination by a liberal coalition of large states (California, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, etc.), move that each state have one, and only one, vote. The roll is called (Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, etc.), and the plan is adopted by the convention.

Once organized, the convention turns to its primary purpose "of proposing amendments." A majority of states (quite possibly representing a minority of the people) vote for the "balanced budget" amendment; and then (still on fiscal matters) vote to prohibit all public funding (Federal and state) of abortions; to prohibit all public funding of "busing" in connection with school integration; but in a spirit of fiscal generosity, vote to authorize tuition reimbursement for parents who send their children to parochial schools. This package of four amendments is then transmitted back to the states (from whence it originated). Who is so bold as to predict that three-fourths of them—again, perhaps including only a minority of the people—would not give approval?

This is the specter of the "runaway" convention that haunts President Carter, Senators Kennedy, Muskie and Stennis, and the commentators.

Turning loose a constitutional convention is like riding a tiger. It is a reckless and unnecessary gamble. The traditional method for constitutional change is available, and it works with all deliberate speed.

We have amended the constitution by this process on 11 occasions in this century alone—approximately once every seven years. In 1913 we authorized a Federal graduated income tax (the 16th Amendment). Then we prohibited alcoholic beverages (18th Amendment), but on sober second thought repealed the prohibition (21st Amendment). Most of the amendments perfect our concept that the best governments rests on the consent of the governed. We have provided for the direct election of Senators (17th Amendment) ; and have extended the franchise to women (19th Ameriment), to residents of the District of Columbia (23rd Amendment), and to persons over 18 (26th Amendment). We abolished the poll tax that disenfranchised the indigent (24th Amendment). We have eliminated the "lame duck" President (20th Amendment), limited every President to two full terms in office(22nd Amendment) and provided for the transfer of Presidential authority to the Vice President when the Chief Executive is unable to perform the duties of the office (25th Amendment). In short, the people of the United States can and have worked their constitutional will through this time-tried process of amendment.

CONSTITUTIONAL SAFEGUARDS

It is a cautious process, but our whole constitutional system is a cautious one. We have built-in checks and balances. The two houses of Congress check each other, and their legislative power is balanced by that of the President, who can checkmate the Congress with a veto (good unless overruled by a three-fourths vote in each House). Finally, the judiciary can reverse them both in a process which generally takes several years. Those on our highest courts (our own Platonic Guardians) take a long second look when the heat and passion of the moment are forgotten, and ensure that the legislative and executive action conforms to our constitutional norm.

This process of deliberation permeates our form and system of government. It is implicit in all that we do. Clearly, the movement for a constitutional convention puts this spirit of deliberative caution greatly at risk. And yet we must face the very strong possibility that the movement will not be checked before it reaches the point at which Congress must acquiesce.

Like it or not, then, it may be that we will have to ride the tiger of a constitutional convention. If so, we must begin now to fashion a proper harness. And that can be done. If and when Congress issues its call for a convention, it will have to settle on a time and place, provide funding, define the convention's purpose and set up the procedures under which it is to act. It is in creating these procedures that the Congress—whose members, like the President and the Justices of the Supreme Court, are duty bound to respect the Constitution—can provide safeguards against ill-considered or anti-democratic action by the convention. The following are suggested as illustrative.

First, as already mentioned. Congress should establish the time and place for the convention (Philadelphia would be traditional) and provide the necessary financing.

Second, Congress should set the total number of delegates at a level which generates the strong possibility that women, youth and minorities will be elected. All views should be present for consideration when the Constitution is up for debate.

Third, Congress should apportion the delegates among the states on the basis of population. This should be a convention of and by the people, not a convention of and by the states.

Fourth, Congress should require that delegates be elected, not handpicked by the Governor, by the state legislative body or by a controlled state convention.

Fifth, the delegates should be elected from Congressional districts, not on a statewide basis. This would ensure that differing elements within a state would all have a chance to be heard.

Sixth, a one-delegate-one-vote rule should be required. Congress should prohibit any kind of unit rule that gags minority views and votes within a state delegation.

Seventh, Congress should require a two-thirds vote for the enactment of a proposed amendment. This is the requirement in both houses when constitutional amendments are proposed by the traditional route. The requirement of a supermajority approval is equally appropriate, no matter which route for constitutional change is followed.

Eighth, Congress should hold any proposed amendments for at least one year to provide ample opportunity for discussion and debate. Some minimum opportunity for second thought is a traditional safeguard in our system.

Ninth, Congress should restrict the convention agenda to the items listed in the state petitions, i.e., a balanced Federal budget. There have been many movements for a constitutional convention in our history. At the turn of the century, many states joined in a convention petition to ban polygamy. During the early decade, the subject was the direct election of United States Senators. During the depression years. Wisconsin proposed that Congress call a convention for a general reexamination of the entire Constitution. During and shortly after World War II, a number of states petitioned for a convention to authorize some form of world government. More recently, in direct revolt against Supreme Court decisions, there have been proposals for constitutional conventions to deal with such matters as one-person-one-vote, school prayer and busing. Currently, some 12 states have called on Congress to convene a convention to outlaw abortion.

These efforts failed. The people rejected them. They should not be swept into consideration now, under the umbrella of a balanced budget amendent. Should a convention be called to consider a balanced budget, and then adopt any of these previously rejected proposals (a runaway convention), Congress properly should refuse to refer them to the states for approval. Only thus can the constitutional requirement of prior approval by 34 states for consideration of an amendment be maintained.

Tenth, Congress should provide opportunity for judicial review. The law is somewhat confused on this subject. In 1871, the Supreme Court held that the issue of whether the Civil War Amendments had been properly ratified was a matter left exclusively to the political departments of the Government [see White v. Hart, 80 U.S. 646 (1871)]. Again, in 1939 the Supreme Court repeated the concept that matters of constitutional ratification are not subject to judicial review. It refused to consider the effect of a previous rejection of the Child Labor Amendment by the state of Kansas; and it refused to consider whether a proposed constitutional amendment died a natural death 13 years after proposal [Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939)].

On the other hand, the Supreme Court has held that Congress has the power to set a reasonable time limit upon the ratification process [Dillion v. Gloss. 256 U.S. 368 (1921)], and has sustained the power of Congress to establish the manner of ratification [Hawke v. Smith. 253 U.S. 221 (1920)]. While the matter is not free from doubt, it seems that if Congress establishes procedural and substantive rights as suggested above, it should have the power to authorize jurisdiction in the Federal courts to hear any "case or controversy" alleging a denial or forfeiture of these congressionally created obligations.

HOW STRONG THE REINS?

Will any of the above proposals "work"? Scholars certainly are divided on the subject. The Constitution itself is vague, and we have almost no historical precedent. The last constitutional convention we had was called by the Continental Congress in 1787 "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation." We can be grateful that it saw the need for larger action and gave us our nation.

Today, however, most Americans are profoundly committed to preserving the essence of our foundational law. Whatever the merits of the proposal for a constitutionally mandated budgeting policy, the movement in its support is not a popular call for radical tinkering with the Constitution, and surely it is not a call for Congressional abdication or for carelessness.

When the Founding Fathers finished their work of drafting the Constitution, South Carolina delegate Charles Pinckney looked back over the long hot summer months and observed that "conventions are serious things and ought not to be repeated." For almost 200 years we have taken this wisdom to heart. If we are now to depart from this admonition, we should do so with all deliberate caution. The time for safeguarding our heritage is now.

[From the Federal Bar News, April 1979]

BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT: CONGRESS VERSUS STATES?

(By Meredith McCoy)

Up until January when California Governor Edmund G. (Jerry) Brown announced in his inaugural address his support for the campaign to launch a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing a constitutional amendment to require balancing of the federal budget, only a few groups such as the National Taxpayers' Union were paying serious attention to and keeping tabs on the slow trickle of petitions coming from the States. The constitutional convention drive actually started about four years ago and beggan to pick up steam last summer in the wake of the controversy surrounding California's Proposition 13. Brown's subsequent declaration of support 6 weeks aggo added new impetus to the drive and won for it national media attention.

The National Taxpayers' Union, the Washington-based lobbying group helping to coordinate the campaign, currently lists 28, and possibly 29 of the required 34 states as having approved a resolution. The group expects more to be passed within the coming weeks.

Of course, Congress will not begin to scrutinize the applications received unless the states continue to demand a convention on the budget issue, and once it does so, the campaign could suffer serious set backs because of unresolved questions surrounding the validity of some of the petitions. Even if the intent is clear, the existing applications represent a "hodge podge" of proposals, and at least 16 petitions call for a convention only in the face of congressional inaction on the subject. Whether such conditional requests remain valid is unknown, since the case of Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920), which held that a state may not condition its ratification upon the outcome of a binding popular referendum, is applicable to the proposing stages of the amending process only by analogy.

Although 5 states have passed resolutions since mid-January, the earlier gained momentum may have reached a peak partly due to the defeat of a resolution in Brown's own state, California, and partly due to a burgeoning congressional backlash, particularly by the leadership in both the House and the Senate. In addition to the hearings already held by Birch Bayh's subcommittee on the Constitution and those scheduled later by another Senate committee, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Peter W. Rodino, Jr., (D-N.J.), plans a cautious and very deliberate investigation into the legal, economic, and budgetary effects and ramifications of the various budget proposals introduced this year, particularly those which specifically emphasize a limit of federal spending.

As a result of the prodding effect of requests from the states, congressional repsonse has tended to take two directions. While many members of Congress are unhappy with the balanced budget movement, most members understand that voters are concerned about inflation, high taxes, and government spending. But if Congress is apprehensive about the economic problems besetting the country, many members perceive as far more serious the threat of a wide-open constitutional convention. Because the thought of a "runaway" convention that would rewrite the country's fundamental laws is such a fearsome prospect, and because the political futures of some might depend upon the response to the balanced budget issue, the States' action thus far may prompt serious consideration of the alternatives available. Even the wide divergence among legal scholars as to the nature of a constitutional convention may not detract from the motivating effect of a convention call.

The problem Congress will try to resolve is how to prevent the states from getting into the amending business by way of convention while offering them some means of assuring a curb on federal spending.

The special fears surrounding the use of the convention method have their source in the fact that the lack of historical and legal precedent gives rise to nothing but unanswered and unanswerable questions with respect to not only the procedural aspects of the convention method but also the knotty substantive issues such as the limits and sources of congressional power in the area.

Among the constitutional uncertainties which abound are a number of initial obstacles which would have to be overcome before Congress could call a convention. For example, it would have to determine whether the petitions as worded constitute a national consensus as to the necessity for an amendment; whether the requirement of timeliness is met; and whether an application is valid if conditionally phrased, or vetoed by the state governor, or improperly certified by state officials. The Constitution is silent on all these questions just as it is silent on the question of whether a state can withdraw its application once it is sent to Congress. The requirement of timeliness or contemporaneity is derived from the case of Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921), which held that ratification under Article V must be within a reasonable time, and presumably, this standard would also apply to the proposing stage of the amending process.

Although most commentators agree that Congress is impliedly delegated such "housekeeping" functions as setting the time, place, and financing of a convention, many theorists are diametrically opposed as to the extent of Congress' power to regulate or govern the operations of a convention either through enactment of a regulatory statute, such as proposed by Senator Sam Irvin in 1973, or through the refusal of Congress to submit to the States for ratification a disfavored amendment produced by a convention. Could Congress limit the scope and powers of a convention? This is perhaps the most debated question on the subject and the one on which the opinions are often carried to the furthest extremes. For example, Charles L. Black, Jr., of Yale University Law School believes that a constitutional convention by definition is illimitable, but this is a minority opinion and not shared by Attorney General Griffin Bell. Others view Congress as the appropriate body for assuring uniformity of operation on issues of national importance, and therefore, the proper institution for resolution of some of the technical questions concerning procedure, but not as a supervisor of a convention once it is launched. A distinction is made between the power to establish and the power to interfere. Other unanswered questions include the method of selection and apportionment of delegates. Should the convention comport with the one man one vote rulings of the Supreme Court or be based on a congressional model?

Moreover, whether Congress acts by proposing its own amendment, enacts a regulatory statute, or simply ignores the critics from the state legislatures, there remains the final issue of judicial review. In Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), four Justices stated in a concurring opinion that the amending process is political in its entirety and not subject to judicial guidance or control. Although expressly upheld in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), this case and the political question doctrine as a whole do not constitute a particularly firm foundation for any absolutist view on the abstinence from judicial action on the subject. The Supreme Court has dipped into the area several times in the past, although it is sheer speculation as to how it would react, if at all, until after the initial determinations were made by Congress and subsequent action taken in reliance upon that legislative judgment.

If Congress decides to propose its own amendment instead, the difficulty would be in deducing what it is that the States really want. Several irate Members of Congress, including Senator Edmund Muskie of Maine, have already threatened the States with an end to revenue sharing and the Federal Grants-in-aid as a means of cutting the budget. Proponents of a balanced budget amendment believe that eliminating the federal deficit would reduce inflation, thereby strengthening the dollar; while critics of this approach charge that deficit spending is necessary for flexible government, and that such deficits are not the source of the oil price increases, cost of hospital care increases, and food price increases.

But the advocates are unmoved by the threats of cuts in federal aid and steadfastly assert that only the injection of fiscal discipline into the Constitution will circumvent an economic catastrophe.

Some of the resolutions thus far introduced simply call for outlays not to exceed revenues except in the case of a national emergency. Others propose that government spending not exceed a fixed percentage of the gross national product. One proposal, the so-called Friedman amendment, propounded by the National Tax Limitation Committee from California, would tie the rate of spending growth to that of the gross national product, but if the rate of inflation exceeded 3 percent, the allowable spending increase would be cut. At the time of this writing, a final version of this proposal had not yet been introduced.

The myriad of questions on the effect of "constitutionalizing" economic and budget policy is equal to the legal morass surrounding the calling of a constitutional convention. First of all, what does and does not constitute the budget probably cannot be defined or characterized in a manner suitable to the forming of a constitutional amendment. If economists and budget experts have a hard time measuring and defining terms such as "gross national product" and "total outlays," then the politicians will be totally unable to agree on what would be encompassed by the phrase "national emergency." Is a national emergency a war, catastrophic weather conditions, mild recession, or severe economic depression?

If such an amendment were ratified. how would it be enforced? By presidential impoundment of funds? Or would there be a limited right of judicial review included in the amendment, as with the case of the Friedman proposal? Furthermore, if what the states are attempting in reality to achieve is a decrease in governmental intrusion into and regulation of our lives, a balanced budget is unlikely to achieve this effect. Notwithstanding the cry of the critics that a balanced budget amendment would "tie the hands of Congress," perhaps the greatest fear is that of the unknown. That is, many of the implications and potential effects on federal-state, congressional-executive, and national-foreign relations are hidden beneath the surface of the present political situation. The balanced budget gospel presently being preached belies the possibility that some of the hardest questions may not have been asked.

Constitutional Convention Procedures

Statement of James A. Michener

One of the rare privileges of my life was to serve as the secretary of the Constitutional Convention which rewrote the basic laws of the Commowealth of Pennsylvania. We met for ninety days, under a strict set of instructions from the legislature and with severe limitations in three areas: we could not alter the term of the governorship, for this had only recently been attended to by the legislature; we could not impose a state income tax; and among ourselves we agreed not to bring up the thorny question of state aid to parochial schools, for this was being handled elsewhere.

We succeeded within those limitations in becoming the only major state to successfully revise its entire constitution, New York and Maryland having failed conspicuously at about the same time that we were working. We succeeded in part, I think, because of the brilliant leadership provided by Former-Governor William Scranton, a superb public servant who helped keep the convention from becoming polarized as to political party. The Republicans had a slight majority in numbers and could have dominated the convention structure, had they wished; we Democrats had a high supply of mercurial debaters and could have tied things up in a knot had we been forced to do so. Thanks to Scranton's sober leadership, we avoided this internecine struggle and worked instead as a single unit, something that did not happen in other states.

In a dozen major areas we brought in new concepts of law while preserving the best of the old. We got rid of our preposterous minor judiciary which was paid according to the percentage of charged persons who were found guilty, substituting for it a well paid, well trained, well housed preliminary judiciary which works very well indeed. We arranged for removal of judges for cause and in such a way as to preserve an old man's dignity when his powers were obviously fading. We paved the way for sensible area forms of government which cut across ancient boundaries. And we revised our tax law completely, paving the way for an orderly transition to the statewide income tax, which we knew would come along shortly, even though we were forbidden to enact one.

Of all the writing I have done in my life, I am proudest of what I helped do in rewriting this basic law of a great state, and I am pleased to see that in the years that followed this labor, the young men who served with me have gone on to positions of great eminence: to Congress, to judgeships, to Federal attorneys, and in the person of Richard Thornburgh to the governorship itself. It formed one of the happiest and most productive experiences of my life, and it forms the basis whereby Pennsylvania can govern itself prudently and constructively for the next century.

I am, however, totally opposed to any measure that would encourage the 50 states of our union to amend our national Constitution by means of the convention method, for I, better than most, appreciate the hidden dangers inherent in this system.

The people of the United States are certainly entitled to use this device if they wish. The framers of the Constitution realizing that what they did was not perfect or sacrosanct, laid plans for its revision, and two procedures were spelled out: the houses of Congress could propose changes which the legislature of the states could accept or reject (the way in which our present 26 amendments have been added); or the legislatures of the states themselves, bypassing the federal legislature, could assemble a convention which would propose amendments, which would then be ratified either by the state legislatures or by conventions called together in the states.

The first procedure having worked so effectively, both for proposing amendments and for removing one when it did not function as planned, we have never used the second plan. Indeed, the day-by-day procedures under which such conventions would be called and the rules under which they would operate have never been spelled out by Congress, but it is proposed now to remedy that deficiency by laws which would lay down the ground rules.

So the convention method of amending the Constitution is totally legal, and it has the most honorable sponsorship, for it was specifically authorized by the Founding Fathers. Why should anyone object to its implementation now?

I object for two reasons. The plan we are using has served us so well and so constructively in the 182 years since 1789 that as a traditionalist I see no need for meddling with the system; but more important, I know from history and from experience that once a constituent assembly has been convened, there is no power that can restrict it to limits arbitrarily set.

Any such convention contains the right and the implied power to become a runaway convention, and this is a most dangerous possibility that should be avoided if at all possible. And in a case like the present, when we already have a splendidly functioning system of amendment, it would be folly to lurch off irresponsibly to an alternative method which has not been proved and which contains dangers of the most treacherous kind.

History is replete with examples of innocent conventions, assembled for one purpose, which exploded into unforseen directions, the two most memorable being the Legislative Assembly which gave hideous guidance to the French Revolution and the Long Parliament which supervised the more peaceful revolution in England. I am afraid of such runaway conventions.

But, it is argued, if the United States convened such a constitutional convention its powers would be strictly limited by the enabling legislation which summoned it into being. And here precisely is the trouble. I do believe that any prior law, no matter how carefully drawn, cannot inhibit, or restrict, or delimit a constituent assembly once it convenes. Of course those initiating the convention would say, 'But it's field of legal operation is limited. We have said so.' My contention is that it cannot be so limited. At the moment a convention is assembled and sworn in, it becomes a self-directing body with only such limitations as it prudently places upon itself, and the prior restraints which have so carefully been placed upon it no longer apply.

My personal experience in this field is relevant. I have explained how carefully the Pennsylvania legislature spelled out the limits within which the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention must act, and since we stayed within those limits it would seem that this proved the efficacy of that system of policing a convention.

Quite the contrary. As secretary of the convention I became aware of the intense pressure on some members to break out of the limits thus arbitrarily set. Again and again we ran up to the margins of our commission like little boys playing at the edges of a bonfire, and with a few bad breaks we could have destroyed the entire procedure.

I should like to describe one crisis. We had solemnly agreed among ourselves not to raise the inflammable issue of State aid to parochial schools, and we did so for two reasons: (1) this matter was being handled with such intelligence in another way; and (2) we knew we would break the convention wide open and destroy every good chance we had if we attempted to solve that problem when a state-wide consensus had not yet been reached.

Gingerly we skirted this explosive issue and were congratulating ourselves on having avoided disaster when a young member of the convention, seeing a chance to gain some glory for himself and some advantage for his religion, announced late in the day that on the following morning he would be proposing a measure that would tear the convention wide apart. The fat was in the fire, just as I had expected all along that it would be.

Since the young man was a Democrat, I was given the job of trying to dissuade him from this disruptive action, but he had already gained so much applause that he ignored my pleas. Catholic members from each party argued with him, for they did not want to see the convention destroyed by an issue which was being handled capably elsewhere, but they accomplished nothing. Elder statesmen of both parties argued with him, and they too were powerless, so I went to bed disheartened.

But at breakfast a Republican member came to me and whispered, 'I think everything will be all right. Charley Murray talked with him at midnight.' And when we convened at 0900 a chastened young man arose and informed us that he was not going to present his bill. We all sighed and then applauded and our convention proceeded to a finel conclusion.

I was so grateful that I went to the young man to express my appreciation and to ask him why he had changed his mind when Murray talked with him when I had been able to accomplish nothing. 'Mr. Murray gave me a different explanation,' he said.

So I went to Murray and asked, "What did you tell him?" and Murray, a stocky, tough Philadelphia politician of the old school replied, "I took him out in the street where no one could hear. It was about one in the morning; the street was deserted. I grabbed him and said, 'If you bring in that bill I'll break both your arms above the elbow.' At last he understood."

The story, which could have ended so disastrously, actually ended rather well. After the convention Charley Murray, because of his excellent performance, was chosen sheriff of Philadelphia, a job he filled for many years with generosity and distinction. One of the first deputies he employed was the young man who had given him so much trouble at the convention. "I liked him," Sheriff Murray said, "because he knew how to take orders."

The simple moral of this tale if by chance we do convene a constitutional convention, be sure that Sheriff Murray is one of the delegates. A more philosophical caution is that preliminary rules or agreements do not always prevail once an assembly meets.

I know with that difficulty we kept our convention on track and how perilous some of our adventures were. Had we been a convention covering the entire nation and had our members been driven by great sectional and moral imperatives, I doubt that discipline could have been maintained. I caution most seriously against turning loose any convention which has runaway potentials, especially when it is not needed.

Can Congress or any other body limit the subjects to be tackled by a convention? I think not, and the whole pressure of history warns us that it can not.

Can the convention, once legally assembled, do pretty much what it wants? I think so, and history gives us many examples of this riotous behavior.

Can the Supreme Court throw out those parts of an assembly's results if such results exceed the commission? I suspect not, for the new enactments are now part of the Constitution. The court could interpret but not reject.

Should we expect legal and perhaps physical battles if the court tried to reject the results of the convention? I fear so, and this is a risk we do not need to take.

Could the convention, once legally assembled, decide on its own to take a look at the Bill of Rights and amend it as it felt current circumstances required? Yes. Judging from what such assemblies have done in the past, the revision of the Bill of Rights would be one of their simplest and easiest acts.

Have we no safeguards at all? Of course we do. Article V states that when the convention is finished with its work, its proposals must be ratified by three-fourths of the States before they can become part of the Constitution. This means that 38 States must approve, which means that only 13 are needed to prevent the proposals from becoming part of our national governance. That seems a prudent number, one calculated to prevent wild or ill-considered proposals from becoming part of the Constitution.

But there is a further provision which scares me. Approval of the States can be given not only by the legislatures thereof but also by State conventions. This means that were the Nation to be gripped by some mania, and this happens often with nations, a vast uprising of the people could in the first instance demand a constitutional convention and then dominate State conventions also, producing hysterical results which might not be in the interests of the general population.

Already proponents of the convention method have sneered at such warnings as inflammatory or irresponsible. I believe they are sensible and prudent. I believe the protectors of a democracy ought always to anticipate the worst possibilities and then protect the Nation from those possibilities. We must look soberly at the possible consequences of behavior which though authorized has never been tested.

So that there need be no confusion as to where I stand on this matter, I state that because of my experience in the United States and elsewhere I am afraid that a runaway convention might revoke or alter the fundamental laws which have enabled this nation to exist for so long and with such distinction. I believe without question that a convention meeting in a crisis situation might do irreperable damage to our form of government and might indeed revoke some of our basic protections.

Are those who want to change in some particular area powerless? Not at all. The amendment process is wide open and has been used most constructively in all past decades of our national history. (We often forget that the original bill of rights contained 12 proposed amendments, not 10. Two were judged not in the best interests of the Nation and were rejected.) At periodic intervals we have added to our basic law and can be expected to do so in the future. By no means are we a monolithic government irresponsive to the demands of the people.

Were a constitutional convention to be held now I would fear for two parts of our present Constitution: the provisions governing the Supreme Court (Article III) and the law governing the freedom of the press (Amendment One). The temper of the times is such that radical revisions of those two parts of our basic law might easily be proposed and enacted, and I suppose that many would like to alter the fifth amendment, which gives the accused the right to remain silent rather to speak in a way which might self-incriminate.

I do not want to subject our Constitution to frivolous or hasty amendment.

It seems to me that the classic example of how best to amend the Constitution, even against the foot-dragging of the Congress, came with the 17th amendment of 1913. For many years citizens had demanded the direct election of senators, like the direct election of representatives; but the Constitution stated specifically that senators of a state must be "chosen by the legislature thereof."

Normal political agitation accomplished little, because the Senate was not likely to sponsor an amendment which would alter its prerogatives. So by the beginning of 1912 29 States had devised tricks and stratagems whereby their citizens could participate in the selection of their Senators, and finally Congress realized that if they didn't act promptly, the States were going to convene a constitutional convention as authorized by Article V. Belatedly the Congress proposed an amendment, in the traditional way, and the convention was avoided. The amendment passed quickly, after which Senators were elected in the manner the people wanted.

This, I think, is the safe and honorable way. Let the people bring pressure upon the Congress. Let the Congress react, as speedily or as slowly as events dictate. Let the States ratify in due process. And let the new laws take effect, if that is the will of the people. With such a stately and time-honored procedure there seems no reason to adopt one less tested.

Finally, since the alternative method is authorized in the Constitution, and since no one today knows what the specific procedures would be for instituting or governing such a convention, I see some logic in having Congress today set forth specifically what those rules should be, on the grounds that it would be best to devise the laws now, in a time of tranquility, rather than later in some time of distress. But if the passage of such law were to become either an invitation or an excitation to use it immediately, I would be strongly against such passage.

I am all in favor of abiding by the time-honored, court-tested procedures which have served us so well for so long.

59-609 O - 80 - 24

The Convention Method of Amending the Constitution

by the Hon. Sam J. Ervin, Jr.
(former Senior Senator from North Carolina)

Published in the public interest by Americans for a Constitutional Convention

Suite 825 • 529 14th Street, NW • Washington DC 20045

As a public service, Americans for a Constitutional Convention is privileged to make available "The Convention Method of Amending the Constitution" by the Honorable Sam J. Ervin, Jr., former United States Senator from North Carolina, and one of our nation's most distinguished constitutional authorities.

Everything that Senator Ervin discusses in this remarkable article is of vital importance as we move forward in our Call for a Constitutional Convention which will undo the fateful January 22, 1973 decision of the United States Supreme Court legalizing abortion-on-demand nationwide.

The subject of an open or limited Convention, the obligation of Congress to call a Convention, the sufficiency of state applications, the role of state governors, the calling of the convention itself, its procedures and voting, the ratification of proposed Amendments — all are among the questions considered by Senator Ervin.

The facts and information in this article should be of great value to anyone interested in the Convention method, and certainly will aid those directly involved in considering a Convention Call. It is truly amazing to sit through (as I have) legislative hearings and to listen to the maze of misinformation passed off as fact by those who are determined now more than ever to defeat a Convention Call. Senator Ervin's article can do much to remedy this situation.

We believe the greatest strength of the anti-abortion movement is in the state legislatures, which are much closer to the people than our Senators and Representatives in far-off Washington, and certainly far closer than the seven judges who rendered the abortion decisions. The Supreme Court, in these cases (as in many others), intruded upon and seized the power of our state legislatures. Prior to 1973 only two of 50 states permitted easy abortion, and even in those two states it was by no means as permissive as what the Court has forced on the whole nation.

The people have the opportunity to assert the power granted them by the Founders of the American Republic by resorting to a Constitutional Convention to restore decency and sanity to our nation on the subject of abortion-on-demand.

In 1974, the Special Constitutional Study Committee of the American Bar Association unanimously agreed that "Our two-year study of the subject has led us to conclude that a national Constitutional Convention can be channeled so as . . . to be . . . an orderly mechanism of effecting constitutional change when circumstances require it."

Certainly circumstances require it now, more than four years after abortion-on-demand became the law of the land, followed by the death of millions of unborn babies, with no meaningful action by Congress to end this terrible crime against humanity and blemish against our nation.

We believe Senator Ervin's article to be one of the best available and we hope that you will find it an important weapon in the fight for the rights of the unborn.

DAN BUCKLEY
Chairman

[The following article is reprinted without alteration from the Spring, 1977 issue of The Human Life Review (150 East 35 St., New York, NY 10016); it originally appeared in The Michigan Law Review (Vol. 66, No. 5) in March, 1968. © 1968 by The Michigan Law Review Association.]

The Convention Method of Amending the Constitution

Sam J. Ervin, Jr.

ARTICLE V of the Constitution of the United States[1] provides that constitutional amendments may be proposed in either of two ways — by two-thirds of both houses of the Congress or by a convention called by the Congress in response to the applications of two-thirds of the state legislatures. Although the framers of the Constitution evidently contemplated that the two methods of initiating amendments would operate as parallel procedures, neither superior to the other, this has not been the case historically. Each of the twenty-five constitutional amendments ratified to date was proposed by the Congress under the first alternative. As a result, although the mechanics and limitations of congressional power under the first alternative are generally understood, very little exists in the way of precedent or learning relating to the unused alternative method in article V. This became distressingly clear recently, following the disclosure that thirty-two state legislatures had, in one form or another, petitioned the Congress to call a convention to propose a constitutional amendment permitting states to apportion their legislatures on the basis of some standard other than the Supreme Court's "one man-one vote" requirement. The scant information and considerable misinformation and even outright ignorance displayed on the subject of constitutional amendment, both within the Congress and outside of it — and particularly the dangerous precedents threatened by acceptance of some of the constitutional misconceptions put forth — prompted me to introduce in the Senate a legislative proposal designed to implement the convention amendment provision in article V. This article will discuss that provision of the Constitution, the major questions involved in its implementation, and the answers to those questions supplied by the provisions of the bill, Senate Bill No. 2307.[2]

II. Background

On March 26, 1962, the United States Supreme Court, in the landmark case of Baker v. Carr,[3] held that state legislative appor-

Sam J. Ervin, Jr., is a former U.S. Senator from North Carolina (he retired in January, 1975). This article first appeared in The Michigan Law Review (Vol. 66, No. 5) in March, 1968, and is reprinted here with permission of the author and the Review tionment is subject to judicial review in federal courts, thus overruling a long line of earlier decisions to the contrary. Two years later, on June 15, 1964, in Reynolds v. Sims,[4] the controversial "one man-one vote" decision, the Court held that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that both houses of bicameral state legislatures be apportioned on a population basis.

The two decisions evoked a storm of controversy. In the Congress, dissatisfaction with the Court's intrusion into the hitherto nonjusticiable political thicket resulted in attempts in both houses to reverse the rulings by legislation or constitutional amendment. On August 19, 1964, the House of Representatives passed a bill introduced by Representative Tuck of Virginia which would have stripped federal district courts of jurisdiction over state apportionment cases and denied the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over such cases. The Senate declined to invoke that extreme remedy, passing instead a "sense of Congress" resolution that the state legislatures should be given time to reapportion before the federal judiciary intervened further. In both 1965 and 1966, however, a majority of the Senate voted to propose the so-called "Dirksen amendment" to the Constitution, which would permit a state to apportion one house of its bicameral legislature on some standard other than population. But the amendment failed both times to get the required two-thirds vote, failing fifty-seven to thirty-nine in 1965 and fifty-five to thirty-eight in 1966.

A more extraordinary effect of the rulings in Baker v. Carr and Reynolds v. Sims was the activity generated in the state legislatures designed to reverse the Court's rulings by means of a constitutional amendment proposed by a convention convened under the second clause of article V. In December 1962, following Baker v. Carr, the Council of State Governments, at its Sixteenth Biennial General Assembly of the States, recommended that the state legislatures petition the Congress for a constitutional convention to propose three amendments, including an amendment to accomplish essentially the same purpose as the Tuck bill, that is, the denial to federal courts of original and appellate jurisdiction over state legislative apportionment cases. In response to this call, twelve state petitions were sent to the Congress during 1963 requesting a constitutional convention to propose such an amendment.[5] Although this was the largest number of petitions on the same subject ever received by the Congress in any one year, the total was far below the required thirty-four, and their receipt caused no excitement in the Congress and attracted no public attention.

In December 1964, following the decision in Reynolds v. Sims, the Seventeenth Biennial General Assembly of the States recommended that the state legislatures petition the Congress to convene a constitutional convention to propose an amendment along the lines of the Dirksen amendment, permitting the states to apportion one house of a bicameral legislature on some standard other than population. The response to this call was even greater than in 1963. Twenty-two states submitted constitutional convention petitions to Congress during the Eighty-ninth Congress (1965 and 1966) and four more during the first session of the Ninetieth Congress (1967). If one counted the petitions adopted by four other states, questionable in regard to their proper receipt by Congress,[6] this brought the total number of state petitions on the subject of state legislative apportionment to thirty-two.

At this point, March 1967, the situation attracted the first attention in the press. A New York Times story on March 18, 1967,[7] reported that only two more petitions were necessary to invoke the convention amendment procedure. The immediate reaction was a rash of newspaper editorials and articles, almost uniformly critical of the effort to obtain a convention, and a flurry of speeches on the subject in the Congress. Whether favorable or unfavorable to the efforts by the states, all of these press items and all of the congressional speeches had one common denominator. They all bore the obvious imprint of the authors' feelings about the merits of state legislative apportionment. Those newspapers that had editorially supported the Supreme Court's decisions now decried the states' "back-door assault on the Constitution."[8] Those newspapers that had criticized "one man-one vote" now applauded the effort by the state legislators to overrule the new principle by constitutional amendment. Much more disturbing to me was the fact that many of my colleagues in the Senate seemed to be influenced more by their views on the reapportionment issue than by concern for the need to answer objectively some of the perplexing constitutional questions raised by the states' action. Those Senators who had been critical of the "one man-one vote" decision and were eager to undo it now expressed the conviction that the Congress was obligated to call a convention when thirty-four petitions were on hand and that it had little power to judge the validity of state petitions. Those Senators who agreed with the Supreme Court's ruling were now contending that some or all of the petitions were invalid for a variety of reasons and should be discounted, and that, in any case, Congress did not have to call a convention if it did not wish to. Most distressing of all was the apparent readiness of everyone to concede that any convention, once convened, would be unlimited in the scope of its authority and empowered to run rampant over the Constitution, proposing any amendment or amendments that happened to strike its fancy. That interpretation, supported neither by logic nor constitutional history, served the convenience of both sides in the apportionment controversy. Those who did not want to call a convention that might propose a reapportionment amendment pointed out that an open convention would surely be a constitutional nightmare. Opponents of "one man-one vote" cited the horrors of an open convention as an additional reason for proposal of a reapportionment amendment by the Congress.

My conviction was that the constitutional questions involved were far more important than the reapportionment issue that had brought them to light, and that they should receive more orderly and objective consideration than they had so far been accorded. Certainly it would be grossly unfortunate if the partisanship over state legislative apportionment — and I am admittedly a partisan on that issue — should be allowed to distort an attempt at clarification of the amendment process, which in the long run must command a higher obligation and duty than any single issue that might be the subject of that process. Any congressional action on this subject would be a precedent for the future, and the unseemly squabble that had already erupted was to me a certain indication that only bad precedents could result from an effort to settle questions of procedure under article V simultaneously with the presentation of a substantive issue by two-thirds of the states. Although it is not easy to anticipate all of the problems that may develop in the convention amendment process, nor to deal with those problems wisely in the abstract, I nevertheless felt that the wisest course would be to consider and enact permanent legislation to implement the convention amendment provision in article V.

I introduced S. 2307 on August 17, 1967. In my statement accompanying introduction, I stressed that I was not committed to the provisions of the bill as then drafted. I was convinced only of the necessity for action on the subject, action that might forestall a congressional choice between chaos on the one hand and refusal to abide the commands of article V on the other. Open hearings on the bill were held on October 30 and 31, 1967, before the Senate Subcommitte on Separation of Powers. The testimony revealed deficiencies in the bill and suggested modifications and additions. As a result, I have subsequently amended the bill in several respects.

In discussing specific questions raised by the bill, I shall describe the relevant provision of the original draft and note the amendments made since the hearings.

III. Questions Raised by the Bill

Before going to specific issues and matters of detail, it seems appropriate to discuss briefly two threshold problems posed by the bill: whether the Congress has the power to enact such legislation, and, if it does, what policy considerations should guide it in exercising such power.

I have no doubt that the Congress has the power to legislate about the process of amendment by convention. The Congress is made the agency for calling the convention, and it is hard to see why the Congress should have been involved in this alternative method of proposal at all unless it was expected to determine such questions as when sufficient appropriate applications had been received and to provide for the membership and procedures of the convention and for review and ratification of its proposals. Obviously the fifty state legislatures cannot themselves legislate on this subject. The constitutional convention cannot do so for it must first be brought into being. All that is left, therefore, is the Congress, which, in respect to this and other issues not specifically settled by the Constitution, has the residual power to legislate on matters that require uniform settlement. Add to this the weight of such decisions as Coleman v. Miller,[9] to the effect that questions arising in the amending process are nonjusticiable political questions exclusively in the congressional domain, and the conclusion seems inescapable that the Congress has plenary power to legislate on the subject by amendment by convention and to settle every point not actually settled by article V of the Constitution itself.

With respect to the second problem, within what general policy limitations that power should be exercised, I think the Congress should be extremely careful to close as few doors as possible. Any legislation on this subject will be what might be called "quasi-organic" legislation; in England it would be recognized as a constitutional statute. When dealing with such a measure, it is wise to bear in mind Marshall's well-worn aphorism that it is a Constitution we are expounding and not get involved in "an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must [be] seen dimly, and which can best be provided for as they occur."[10] This approach is reflected at several points in the bill, notably in its failure to try to anticipate and enumerate the various grounds on which Congress might justifiably rule a state petition invalid, and its failure to prescribe rigid rules of procedure for the convention. In addition, I think the Congress, in exercising its power under article V, should bear in mind that the Framers meant the convention method of amendment to be an attainable means of constitutional change. This legislation can be drawn so as to place as many hurdles as possible in the way of effective use of the process; or it can be drawn in a manner that will make such a process a possible, however improbable, method of amendment. The first alternative would be a flagrant disavowal of the clear language and intended function of article V. I have assumed that the Congress will wish to take the second road, and the bill is drawn with that principle in mind.

Open or Limited Convention?

Perhaps the most important issue raised by the bill is the question of the power of the Congress to limit the scope and authority of a convention convened under article V in accordance with the desires of the states as set forth in their applications. This was, as I have noted, one of the issues that most troubled me when I first heard of the efforts by the states to call a convention.

It has been argued that the subject matter of a convention convened under article V cannot be limited, since a constitutional convention is a premier assembly of the people, exercising all the power that the people themselves possess, and therefore supreme to all other governmental branches or agencies. Certainly, according to this argument, the states may not themselves, in their applications, dictate limitations on the convention's deliberations. They may not require the Congress to submit to the convention a given text of an amendment, nor even a single subject or idea. For the convention must be free to "propose" amendments, which suggests the freedom to canvass matters afresh and to weigh all possibilities and alternatives rather than ratify a single text or idea. The states may in their applications specify the amendment or amendments they would hope the convention would propose. But once the Congress calls the convention, those specifications would not control its deliberations. The convention could not be restricted to the consideration of certain topics and forbidden to consider certain other topics, nor could it be forbidden to write a new constitution if it should choose to do so.

I will concede that such an interpretation can be wrenched from article V — but only through a mechanical and literal reading of the words of the article, totally removed from the context of their promulgation and history. My reading of the debates on article V at the Philadelphia Convention and the other historical materials bearing on the intended function of the amendment process[11] leads me to the opposite conclusion. As I understand the debates, the Founders were concerned, first, that they not place the new government in the same straitjacket that inhibited the Confederation, unable to change fundamental law without the consent of every state. The amendment process, rather a novelty for the time, was therefore included in the Constitution itself. Second, the final form of article V was dictated by a major compromise between those delegates who would utilize the state legislatures as the sole means of initiating amendments and those who would lodge that power exclusively in the national legislature. The forces at the convention that sought to limit the power of originating amendments to the states were at first dominant. The original Virginia Plan, first approved by the convention, excluded the national legislature from participation in the amendment process. On reconsideration, the forces that would limit the power of origination of amendments to the national legislature became prevalent. The arguments on both sides were persuasive: the improprieties or excess of power in the national government would not likely be corrected except by state initiative, while improprieties by the state governments or deficiencies in national power would not likely be corrected except by national initiative. In the spirit that typified the 1787 Convention, the result was acceptance of a Madison compromise proposal which read, as the final article was to read, in terms of alternative methods.

It is clear that neither of the two methods of amendment was expected by the Framers to be superior to the other or easier of accomplishment. There is certainly no indication that the national legislature was intended to promote individual amendments while the state legislatures were to be concerned with more extensive revisions. On the contrary, there is strong evidence that what the members of the convention were concerned with in both cases was the power to make specific amendments. They did not appear to anticipate a need for a general revision of the Constitution. And certainly this was understandable, in light of the difficulties that they had in finding the compromises to satisfy the divergent interests needed for ratification of their efforts. Provision in article V for two exceptions to the amendment power[12] underlines the notion that the convention anticipated specific amendment or amendments rather than general revision. For it is doubtful that these exceptions could have been expected to control a later general revision.

This construction is supported by references to the amendment process in the Federalist Papers. In Federalist No. 43, James Madison explained the need and function of article V as follows:

> That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors as as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other.

Hamilton, in Federalist No. 85, was even more emphatic in pointing out the possibility of specific as well as general amendment of the Constitution on the initiative of the state legislatures:

> But every amendment to the constitution, if once established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise, in relation to any other point, no giving nor taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently whenever nine or rather ten states, were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place.

Apart from being inconsistent with the language and history of article V, the contention that any constitutional convention must be a wide open one is neither a practicable nor a desirable one. If the subject matter of amendments were to be left entirely to the convention, it would be hard to expect the states to call for a convention in the absence of a general discontent with the existing constitutional system. This construction would effectively destroy the power of the states to originate the amendment of errors pointed out by experience, as Madison expected them to do. Alternatively, under that construction, applications for a limited convention deriving in some states from a dissatisfaction with the school desegregation cases, in others because of the school prayer cases, and in still others by reason of objection to the Miranda rule, could all be combined to make up the requisite two-thirds of the states needed to meet the requirements of article V. I find it hard to believe that this is the type of consensus that was thought to be appropriate to calling for a convention. For if such disparate demands were sufficient, all the applications to date — and there are a large number of them — should be added up to see whether, in what is considered an appropriate span of time, two-thirds of the states have made demands for a constitutional convention to propose amendments, no matter the cause for applications or the specifications contained in them. Moreover, once such a convention were convened, it could refuse to consider any of the problems or subjects specified in the states' applications, and instead propose amendments on other subjects or rewrite the Constitution in a manner unacceptable to any of the applicant states.

My construction of article V, with reference to the initiation of the amendment procedure by the state legislatures, is consistent with the literal language of the article as well as its history, and is more desirable and practicable than the alternative construction. As I see it, the intention of article V was to place the power of initiation of amendments in the state legislatures. The function of the convention was to provide a mechanism for effectuating this initiative. The role of the states in filing their applications would be to identify the problem or problems that they believed to call for resolution by way of amendment. The role of the convention that would be called by reason of such action by the states would then be to decide whether the problem called for correction by constitutional amendment and, if so, to frame the amendment itself and propose it for ratification as provided in article V. The bill carries out this intention in keeping not only with the letter but also with the spirit of article V.

The bill provides that state petitions to the Congress which request the calling of a convention under article V shall state the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed by such convention. Upon receipt of valid applications from two-thirds or more of the states requesting a convention on the same subject or subjects, the Congress is required to call a convention by concurrent resolution, specifying in the resolution the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is being called. The convention may not propose amendments on other subjects and, if it does, the Congress may refuse to submit them to the states for ratification.

Under the provisions, the states could not require the Congress to submit to a convention a given text of an amendment, demanding an up or down vote on it alone. But they could require the Congress to submit a single subject or problem, demanding action on it alone. They could not, however, define the subject so narrowly as a deprive the convention of all deliberative freedom. To use the reapportionment issue as an example, the states could not require the Congress to call a convention to accept or reject the exact text of the reapportionment amendment recommended by the Council of State Governments, for then the convention would be merely a ratifying body. But they could properly petition for a convention to consider the propriety of proposing a constitutional amendment to deal with the reapportionment problems raised by the Supreme Court decision, defining those problems in specific terms. The convention would then be confined to that subject, but it would be free to consider the propriety of proposing any amendment and the form the amendment should take — that of the Dirksen proposal, the Tuck proposal, or some other form. To take another example, those states which might desire a convention to deal with the Escobedo-Miranda issue could phrase their petitions generally in terms of the problem of federal control over the criminal processes of the states. The convention would then be confined to that subject, but would nevertheless have great deliberative freedom to canvass all possible solutions and propose whatever amendment or amendments it deemed appropriate to respond to the problems identified by the states.

I am convinced that these provisions of the bill fully accord with the mandate of article V, its history, and intended function.

May Congress Refuse to Call a Convention?

Perhaps the next most important question raised by the bill is whether the Congress has any discretion to refuse to call a convention in the face of appropriate applications from a sufficient number of states.

Article V states that Congress "shall" call a convention upon the applications of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. I have absolutely no doubt that the article is peremptory and that the duty is mandatory, leaving no discretion to the Congress to review the wisdom of the state applications. Certainly this is the more desirable construction, consonant with the intended arrangement of article V as described in the preceding section of this article. The founders included the convention alternative in the amending article to enable the states to initiate constitutional reform in the event the national legislature refused to do so. To concede to the Congress any discretion to consider the wisdom and necessity of a particular convention call would in effect destroy the role of the states.

The comments of both Madison and Hamilton, subsequent to the 1787 Convention, sustain this construction. In a letter on the subject, Madison observed that the question concerning the calling of a convention "will not belong to the Federal Legislature. If two-thirds of the states apply for one, Congress cannot refuse to call it:

if not, the other mode of amendments must be pursued."[13] Hamilton, in the Federalist No. 85, stated:

> By the fifth article of the plan the congress will be obliged, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, (which at present amounts to nine) to call a convention for proposing amendments, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof." The words of this article are peremptory. The congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion.

It has been argued forcefully that, notwithstanding the language of article V, the Congress need not call a convention if it does not wish to do so, and that, in any event no legislation such as this can commit a future Congress to call a convention against its judgment. This argument is based on the premise that although article V provides that Congress "shall" call a convention if enough states apply, this word may be interpreted to mean "may" for all practical purposes, since the courts are not apt to try to enforce the obligation if Congress wishes to evade it. I cannot accept such a flagrant disregard of clear language and purpose.

Although it may be true that no legislation by one Congress can bind a subsequent Congress to vote for a convention, and that the courts will not intervene, it is my strong feeling that the bill should recognize the fact that the Congress has a strict constitutional duty to call a convention if a sufficient number of proper applications are received. The bill does this by providing that it shall be the duty of both houses to agree to a concurrent resolution calling a convention whenever it shall be determined that two-thirds of the state legislatures have properly petitioned for a convention to propose an amendment or amendments on the same subject. Concededly, the Congress cannot be forced by the courts or by the provisions of this bill to vote for a particular convention. However, every member has taken an oath to support the Constitution, and I cannot believe a majority of the Congress will choose to ignore its clear obligation, I would hope, moreover, that this bill will facilitate the path to congressional action by underlining the obligation of the Congress to act.

Sufficiency of State Applications

Assuming the Congress may not weigh the wisdom and necessity of state applications requesting the calling of a constitutional convention, does it have the power to judge the validity of state applications and state legislative procedures adopting such applications? Clearly the Congress has some such power. The fact alone that Congress is made the agency for convening the convention upon the receipt of the requisite number of state applications suggests that it must exercise some power to judge the validity of those applications. The impotence or withdrawal of the courts underlines the necessity for lodging some such power in the Congress. The relevant question, then, concerns the extent of that power.

It has been contended that Congress must have broad powers to judge the validity of state applications and that such power must include the authority to look beyond the content of an application, and its formal compliance with article V, to the legislative procedures followed in adopting the application. The counterargument is that to grant Congress the power to reject applications, particularly if that power is not carefully circumscribed, would be to supply it with a means of avoiding altogether the obligation to call a convention. The result would be that the Congress could arbitrarily reject all applications on subjects it did not consider appropriate for amendment, leaving us in effect with only one amendment process.

In drafting the bill I was mainly concerned with limiting the power of the Congress to frustrate the initiative of the states, particularly since the debate on the Senate floor at the time indicated that some Senators were inclined to seize on any slight irregularity in a petition as a basis for not counting it. My bill, as introduced, therefore set forth only requirements as to the content of state applications, leaving questions of legislative procedure for determination solely by the individual states, with their decisions made binding on the Congress and the courts. However, I think the hearing amply demonstrated the danger of disabling the Congress from reviewing the procedural validity of state petitions. In general, state legislatures ought to be masters of their own procedures. But this is a federal function that they would be performing, and the Congress should retain some power uniformly to settle the questions of irregularity that might arise. The bill has therefore been amended to remove the disability of the Congress to review legislative procedures. Under the amended bill, Congress would retain broad powers in this respect, indeterminate and unforeseeable in nature, but to be exercised, I would hope, rarely and with restraint.

It might be well to say something at this point on a question that is much debated: whether a legislature that has been held to be malapportioned, or that is under a decree requiring it to reap-

...tion and perhaps qualifying its powers in some measure before reapportionment, can validly pass a resolution for a constitutional convention. I should think in general that it could, unless an outstanding decree forbids it to do so, either specifically or by mention of some analogous forbidden function. To open to congressional review the question of the propriety of state legislative composition would be to open a Pandora's box of constitutional doubts about the validity even of the Fourteenth Amendment.

However, the bill does not expressly answer this question. This is one of the many questions of irregularity on which the Congress will have to work its will should the question be squarely presented in the form of thirty-four state applications including some passed by malapportioned legislatures.

One further important point should be mentioned. Most of the states obviously do not now understand their role in designating subjects or problems for resolution by amendment, and many of them do not even know where to send their applications. By setting forth the formal requirements with respect to content of state applications and designating the congressional officers to whom they must be transmitted, the bill furnishes guidance to the states on these questions and promises to avert in the future some of the problems that have arisen in the current effort to convene a convention. The bill also requires that all applications received by the Congress be printed in the Congressional Record and that copies be sent to all members of Congress and to the legislature of each of the other states. In this way, the element of congressional surprise can be eliminated, and each state can be given prompt and full opportunity to join in any call for a convention in which it concurs.

The Role of State Governors

The argument has been made that a state application for a constitutional convention must be approved by both the legislature and the governor of the state to be effective. This argument rests on the claim that article V intended state participation in the process to involve the whole legislative process of the state as defined in the state constitution. I do not agree with that argument. We do not have here any question about the exercise of the lawmaking process by a state legislature in combination with whatever executive participation might be called for by state law. We have rather a question of heeding the voice of the people of a state in expressing the possible need for a change in the fundamental document. It seems clear to me that the Founders properly viewed the state legislatures as the sole representative of the people on such a matter, since the executive veto, a carryover from the requirement of royal assent, was not regarded as the expression of popular opinion at the time of the 1787 Convention. And, to resort to the kind of literalism invoked by others as appropriate for construction of other provisions of article V, the language of the article definitely asserts that the appropriate applications are to come from "legislatures."

Closely analogous court decisions support this interpretation. The Supreme Court in Hawke v. Smith, No. 1[14] interpreted the term "legislatures" in the ratification clause of article V to mean the representative lawmaking bodies of the states, since ratification of a constitutional amendment "is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word."[15] Certainly the term "legislature" should have the same meaning in both the application clause and the ratification clause of article V. Further support is found in the decision in Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[16] in which the Court held that a constitutional amendment approved for proposal to the states by a two-thirds vote of Congress need not be submitted to the President for his signature or veto.

The bill therefore provides specifically that a state application need not be approved by the state's governor in order to be effective.

May a State Rescind Its Applications?

The question of whether a state should be allowed to rescind an application previously forwarded to the Congress is another of the political questions to which the courts have not supplied answers and presumably cannot. The Supreme Court has held that questions concerning the rescission of prior ratifications or rejections of amendments proposed by the Congress are determined solely by Congress.[17] Presumably, then, the question of rescission of an application for a convention is also political and nonjusticiable. Although the Congress has previously taken the position that a state may not rescind its prior ratification of an amendment, it has taken no position concerning rescission of applications. My strong conviction is that rescission should be permitted. Since a two-thirds consensus among the states at some point in time is necessary in order for the Congress to call a convention, the Congress should consider whether there has been a change of mind among some states that have earlier applied. Moreover, an application is not a final action, since it serves merely to initiate a convention, and does not commit even the applicant state to any substantive amendment that might eventually be proposed.

59-609 O - 80 - 25

The bill therefore provides that a state may rescind at any time before its application is included among an accumulation of applications from two-thirds of the states, at which time the obligation of the Congress to call a convention becomes fixed. Incidentally, the bill also provides that a state may rescind its prior ratification of an amendment proposed by the convention up until the time there are existing valid ratifications by three-fourths of the states, and that a state may change its mind and ratify a proposed amendment that it previously has rejected.

Another much debated point concerning state applications for a constitutional convention is timing. In order to be effective to mandate the Congress to act, within how long a period must applications be received from two-thirds of the state legislatures? Article V is silent on this question, and neither the Congress nor the courts has supplied an answer.

The Congress and the courts have agreed that constitutional amendments proposed by the Congress and submitted to the states for ratification can properly remain valid for ratification for a period of seven years. It has been felt that there should be a "reasonably contemporaneous" expression by three-fourths of the states that an amendment is acceptable in order for the Congress to conclude that a consensus in favor of the amendment exists among the people, and that ratification within a seven-year period satisfies this requirement.[18] Presumably, the same principle should govern the application stage of the constitutional amendment process. If so, the Congress would not be required, nor empowered, to call a convention unless it received "relatively contemporaneous" valid applications from the necessary number of states. This rule seems sensible. The Constitution contemplates a concurrent desire for a convention on the part of the legislatures of a sufficient number of states, and such a concurrent desire can scarcely be said to exist, or to reflect in each state the will of the people, if too long a period of time has passed from the date of enactment of the first application to the date of enactment of the last. It is true that legislatures are free under the bill to change their minds and rescind their applications; but the passage of a repealer is a different and more difficult political act than the defeat, starting fresh, of an application calling for a constitutional convention. The fact, therefore, that a legislature has not rescinded an application calling for a convention is an insufficient indication that the state in question, after the passage of a long period of time, still favors the calling of a convention.

What, then, is a proper period during which tendered applications are sufficiently contemporaneous to be counted together? Some Senators and scholars have suggested that two years, the lifetime of a Congress, would be a reasonable period. Others have suggested that petitions should remain valid for a generation. My feeling when I drafted the bill was that six years would be a reasonable compromise. However, the hearings revealed a general disposition among the witnesses to agree on a four-year period. Since this would be long enough to afford ample opportunity to all the state legislatures to join in the call for a convention — particularly in view of the requirement in the bill that all other states be given immediate notice of any application received by the Congress — I have concluded that a four-year period is preferable.

The bill has therefore been amended to provide that an application shall remain valid for four years after receipt by the Congress unless sooner rescinded. The bill also provides that rescission must be accomplished by means of the same legislative procedures followed in adopting the application in question, and that the Congress retains power to judge the validity of those proceedings.

Calling the Convention

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall keep a record of the number of state applications received, according to subject matter. Whenever two-thirds of the states have submitted applications on the same subject or subjects, the presiding officer of each house shall be notified and shall announce the same on the floor. Each house is left free to adopt its own rules for determining the validity of the applicants, presumably by reference to a committee followed by floor action. Once a determination has been made that there are valid applications from two-thirds or more of the state legislatures on the same subject or subjects, each house must agree to a concurrent resolution providing for the convening of a constitutional convention on such subject or subjects. The concurrent resolution would designate the place and time of meeting of the convention, set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments the convention is empowered to consider and propose, and provide for such other things as the provision of funds to pay the expenses of the convention and to compensate the delegates. The convention would be required to be convened not later than one year after adoption of the resolution.

As introduced, the bill required the Congress to designate in the concurrent resolution convening a convention the manner in which any amendments proposed by the convention must be ratified by the states and the period within which they must be ratified or deemed inoperative. Testimony at the hearings suggested that these determinations might properly be influenced by the nature of the amendments proposed and that they should therefore not be required to be made at the time the convention is called. For example, certain proposed amendments might call for ratification by state conventions rather than state legislatures, and certain circumstances might indicate a shorter or longer period than usual during which ratification should take place. The Congress should be able to make those decisions after it has the convention's proposals. The bill therefore has been amended to so provide.

The bill as introduced provided that each state should have as many delegates as it is entitled to representatives in Congress, to be elected or appointed as provided by state law. However, the hearings revealed a general feeling that the national interest is too closely affected to permit each state to decide how its delegates to a national constitutional convention shall be elected, or, indeed, appointed. For this reason, the bill has been amended to require that delegates be elected — not appointed — and that they be elected by the same constituency that elects the states' representatives in Congress. Under the amended bill, each state will be entitled to as many delegates as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. Two delegates in each state will be elected at large and one delegate will be elected from each congressional district in the manner provided by state law. Vacancies in a state's delegation will be filled by appointment of the governor.

Convention Procedure and Voting

The bill provides that the Vice President of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention, administer the oath of office of the delegates and preside until a presiding officer is elected. The presiding officer will then preside over the election of other officers and thereafter. Further proceedings of the convention will be in accordance with rules adopted by the convention. A daily record of all convention proceedings, including the votes of delegates, shall be kept, and shall be transmitted to the Archivist of the United States within thirty days after the convention terminates. The convention must terminate its proceedings within one year of its opening unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

As introduced, the bill provided that each state should have one vote on all matters before the convention, including the proposal of amendments. This was decided upon in deference to the method followed in the 1787 Convention rather than from a conviction that this would be the necessarily proper procedure in conventions called under article V. On the basis of the testimony presented at the hearings, I have decided that unit voting would not be appropriate for such conventions. The reasons for unit voting in the 1787 Convention were peculiar to the background against which that convention worked and are not valid today. Moreover, the states, as units, will have equal say in the ratification process. It seems appropriate, therefore, to recognize the interests of majority rule in the method of proposing amendments. Hence, the bill has been amended to provide that each state delegate shall have one vote so that the voting strength of each state will be in proportion to its population.

Finally, the bill provides that amendments may be proposed by the convention by a vote of a majority of the total number of delegates to the convention. The alternative would be to impose a two-thirds voting requirement analogous to the requirement for congressional proposal of amendments. However, article V does not call for this, and I think that such a requirement would place an undue and unnecessary obstacle in the way of effective utilization of the convention amendment process.

Ratification of Proposed Amendments

The bill provides that any amendment proposed by the convention must be transmitted to the Congress within the thirty days after the convention terminates its proceedings. The Congress must then transmit the proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services for submission to the states. However, the Congress may, by concurrent resolution, refuse to approve an amendment for submission to the states for ratification, on the grounds of procedural irregularities in the convention or failure of the amendment to conform to the limitations on subject matter imposed by the Congress in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. The intent is to provide a means of remedying a refusal by the convention to abide by the limitations on its authority to amend the Constitution. Of course, unlimited power in the Congress to refuse to submit proposed amendments for ratification would destroy the independence of the second alternative amending process. Therefore, the Congress is explicitly forbidden to refuse to submit a proposed amendment for ratification because of doubts about the merits of its substantive provisions. The power is reserved for use only with respect to amendments outside the scope of the convention's authority or in the case of serious procedural irregularities.

Ratification by the states must be by state legislative action or convention, as the Congress may direct, and within the time period specified by the Congress. The Congress retains the power to review the validity of ratification procedures. As noted earlier, any state may rescind its prior ratification of an amendment by the same processes by which it ratified it, except that no state may rescind after that amendment has been validly ratified by three-fourths of the states. When three-fourths of the states have ratified a proposed amendment, the Administrator of General Services shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is a part of the Constitution, effective from the date of the last necessary ratification.

IV. Conclusion

There is some evidence that the current effort to require the Congress to call a convention to propose a reapportionment amendment has failed and that the danger of a constitutional crisis has passed. The two additional applications needed to bring the total to thirty-four have not been received and there is a strong likelihood that some applicant states will rescind their applications. Even if this is the case, however, the need for legislation to implement article V remains. There may well be other attempts to utilize the convention amendment process and, in the absence of legislation, the same unanswered questions will return to plague us. The legislation therefore is still timely, and the Congress may now have the opportunity to deal with the sensitive constitutional issues objectively, uninfluenced by competing views on state apportionment or any other substantive issue.

Some have argued that the convention method of amendment is an anomaly in the law, out of step with modern notions of majority rule and the relationship between the states and the federal government. If so, that part of article V should be stricken from the Constitution by the appropriate amendment process. It should not, however, be undermined by erecting every possible barrier in the way of its effective use. Such a course would be a disavowal of the clear language and history of article V. The Constitution made the amendment process difficult, and properly so. It certainly was not the intention of the original Convention to make it impossible. Nor is it possible to conclude that the Founders intended that amendments originating in the states should have so much harder a time of it than those proposed by Congress. As I have pointed out, that issue was fought out in 1787 Convention and resolved in favor of two originating sources, both difficult of achievement, but neither impossible and neither more difficult than the other. My bill seeks to preserve the symmetry of article V by implementing the convention alternative so as to make it a practicable but not easy method of constitutional amendment.

NOTES

1. The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate. U.S. Const. Art. V.

2. The text of the bill, as amended, is set forth as an appendix to this Article. As of this writing, the amended bill has not been approved by the Committee on the Judiciary. The reported bill may include additional amendments.

3. 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

4. 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

5. Copies of the applications referred to herein are on file in the offices of the Committees on the Judiciary of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

6. New Hampshire, Colorado, Utah, and Georgia have adopted applications, but copies are not on file with the Senate and House Judiciary Committees.

7. The New York Times, March 18, 1967 (city ed.), at 1, col. 6.

8. Editorial, The Washington Post, March 21, 1967, at A-10, col. 1.

9. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

10. McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 407, 415 (1819).

11. E.g., LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERV., LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA; ANALYSIS AND INTERPRETATION, S. DOC. NO. 39, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 135-36 (1964); THE FEDERALIST NOS. 43 & 85 (J. Cooke ed. 1961); L. ORFIELD, AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION (1942); THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787 (M. Farrand ed. 1937). The relevant excerpts from these and other sources are printed as an appendix to the Hearings on the Federal Constitutional Convention Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Oct. 30 and 31, 1967.

12. See the text of Art. V quoted in note 1 supra.

13. U.S. BUREAU OF ROLLS AND LIBRARY, DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA V, 141, 143, quoting Madison's letter to Mr. Eve, dated Jan. 2, 1789.

14. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

15. Id. at 229.

16. 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

17. Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 448-49 (1939).

18. Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

Bill S. 2307

To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Constitution Convention Amendment Act."

Applications for Constitutional Convention

SEC. 2. The legislature of a State, in making application to the Congress for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States, shall adopt a resolution pursuant to this Act stating, in substance, that the legislature requests the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more amendments to the Constitution of the United States and stating the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

Application Procedure

SEC. 3(a) For the purpose of adopting or rescinding a resolution pursuant to section 2, the State legislature shall follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute by that legislature, but without the need for approval of the legislature's action by the governor of the State.

(b) Questions concerning the State legislature procedure and the validity of the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act shall be determinable by the Congress of the United States and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

Transmittal of Applications

SEC. 4(a) Within thirty days after the adoption by the legislature of a State of a resolution to apply for the calling of a constitutional convention, the secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Each copy of the application so made by any State shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution.

(2) the exact text of the resolution, signed by the presiding officer of each house of the State legislature, and

(3) the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution; and shall be accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets for the text of the resolution.

(c) Within ten days after receipt of a copy of any such application, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall report to the House of which he is presiding officer, identifying the State making application, the subject of the application, and the number of States then having made application on such subject. The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause copies of such application to be sent to the presiding officer of each House of the legislature of every other State and to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

Effective Period of Applications

SEC. 5(a) An application submitted to the Congress by a State pursuant to this Act, unless sooner rescinded by the State legislature, shall remain effective for four calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, except that whenever the Congress determines that within a period of four calendar years two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted a valid application calling for a constitutional convention on the same subject all such applications shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 8, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State may rescind its application calling for a constitutional convention by adopting and transmitting to the Congress a resolution of rescission in conformity with the procedure specified in sections 3 and 4, except that no such rescission shall be effective as to any valid application made for a constitutional convention upon any subject after the date on which two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have valid applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same subject.

(c) Questions concerning the rescission of a State's application shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

Calling of a Constitutional Convention

SEC. 6(a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to maintain a record of all applications received by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives from States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon each subject. Whenever the Secretary or the Clerk has reason to believe that valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same subject are in effect, he shall so report in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer thereupon shall announce upon the floor of the House of which he is an officer the substance of such report. Pursuant to such rules as such House may adopt, it shall be the duty of such House to determine whether the recitation contained in any such report is correct. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and time of meeting of the convention; (2) set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called; and (3) authorize the appropriation of moneys for the payment of all expenses of the convention, including the compensation of delegates and employees. A copy of each such concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress shall be transmitted forthwith to the presiding officer of each House of the Legislature of each State.

(b) The convention shall be convened not later than one year after the adoption of the resolution.

Delegates

SEC. 7(a) A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. In each State two delegates shall be elected at large and one delegate shall be elected from each Congressional district in the manner provided by State law. Any vacancy occurring in a State delegation shall be filled by appointment of the Governor of that State.

(b) The secretary of state of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function shall certify to the Vice President of the United States the name of each delegate elected or appointed by the Governor pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(d) Each delegate shall receive compensation for each day of service and shall be compensated for traveling and related expenses. Provision shall be made therefore in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. The convention shall fix the compensation of employees of the convention.

Convening the Convention

SEC. 8(a) The Vice President of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office of the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe an oath not to attempt to change or alter any section, clause or article of the Constitution or propose additions thereto except in conformity with the concurrent resolution calling the convention. Upon the election of permanent officers of the convention, the names of such officers shall be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the elected presiding officer of the convention. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as the convention may adopt.

(b) The Congress shall appropriate moneys for the payment of all expenses of the convention.

(c) Under such regulations as the President shall prescribe, the Administrator of General Services shall provide such facilities, and each executive department and agency shall provide such information, as the convention may require, upon written request made by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

Procedures of the Convention

SEC. 9(a) In voting on any question before the convention, including the proposal of amendments, each delegate shall have one vote.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily verbatim record of its proceedings and publish the same. The votes of the delegates on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

(d) Within thirty days after the termination of the proceedings of the convention, the presiding officer shall transmit to the Archivist of the United States all records of official proceedings of the convention.

Proposal of Amendments

SEC. 10(a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a vote of a majority of the total number of delegates to the convention.

(b) No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a general nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. Questions arising under this subsection shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including state and Federal courts.

Approval by the Congress and Transmittal to the States for Ratification

SEC. 11(a) The presiding officer of the convention shall, within thirty days after the termination of its proceedings, submit the exact text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention to the Congress for approval and transmittal to the several States for their ratification.

(b) The Congress, before the expiration of the first period of three months of continuous session following receipt of any proposed amendment, shall, by concurrent resolution, transmit such proposed amendment to the States for ratification, prescribing the time within which such amendment shall be ratified or deemed inoperative and the manner in which such amendment shall be ratified in accordance with Article V of the Constitution: Provided, that, within such period, the Congress may, by concurrent resolution, disapprove the submission of the proposed amendment to the States for ratification on the ground that its general nature is different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention or that the proposal of the amendment by the convention was not in conformity with the provisions of this Act: Provided further, that the Congress shall not disapprove the submission of a proposed amendment for ratification by the States because of its substantive provisions.

(c) If, upon the expiration of the period prescribed in the preceding subsection, the Congress has not adopted a concurrent resolution transmitting or disapproving the transmittal of a proposed amendment to the States for ratification, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services for submission to the States. The Administrator of General Services shall transmit exact copies of the same, together with his certification thereof, to the legislatures of the several States.

Ratification of Proposed Amendments

SEC. 12(a) Any amendment proposed by the convention and submitted to the States in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when duly ratified by three-fourths of the States in the manner and within the time specified.

(b) Acts of ratification shall be by convention or by State legislative action as the Congress may direct or as specified in subsection (c) of this section. For the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments transmitted to the States pursuant to this Act the State legislatures shall adopt their own rules of procedure. Any State action ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

(c) Any proposed amendment transmitted to the States pursuant to the provisions of section 11(c) of this Act shall be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years of the date of transmittal or be deemed inoperative.

(d) The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State action ratifying any proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services.

Rescission of Ratifications

SEC. 13(a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment by the same processes by which it ratified the proposed amendment, except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendment by three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.

(c) Questions concerning State ratification or rejection of amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

Proclamation of Constitutional Amendments

SEC. 14. The Administrator of General Services, when three-fourths of the several States have ratified a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States.

Effective Date of Amendments

SEC. 15. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date specified therein or, if no date is specified, then on the date on which the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the States of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

The Convention Method of Constitutional Amendment: Its Meaning, Usefulness, and Wisdom

by John T. Noonan, Jr.
Professor of Law, University of California at Berkeley

(Comm. on Ways & Means, Calif. State Assembly, February 15, 1979

The Convention Method of Constitutional Amendment: Its Meaning, Usefulness and Wisdom

One of the great American innovations at the founding of our Republic was a Constitution which could be amended. At the time "it was heresy to suggest the possibility of change in governments divinely established and ensured."[1] To provide in the written instrument itself for change was to take the position in advance that experience would show defects, that change would sometimes be desirable and good, and that the people of the next generation or the twelfth generation later could be as wise and trustworthy as the founding fathers themselves.

The Meaning of the Method

Two methods of amendment were provided. One was dependent on the initiative of Congress, the other on the initiative of the States. The methods were intended to be parallel ways of changing the Constitution. In Madison's words in The Federalist the Article on Amendments "equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors."[2] It was recognized that those in power in the national government might have a disinclination to give up any of their prerogatives, so that it was particularly necessary to leave open the initiative of the States; and so Hamilton pointed out in his Final Plea for Ratification in The Federalist, the second method of Amendment had been provided in order that Congress would be under a "peremptory" duty to call a Convention when two-thirds of the States made application for one.[3]

You have been told that the second method of amendment provided by Article V of the Constitution is unworkable; that it is "shrouded in legal mystery of the most fundamental sort," that it is full of "fundamental uncertitudes," that it will lead to confrontations between branches of government of "nightmarish dimensions," and that its invocation will lead to trauma for the country.[4] Reading these prophecies of doom, I have been reminded of what an inveterate Tory might have pronounced in 1789 as our new Constitution was launched. Every word — legal mystery, fundamental incertitudes, confrontations between branches of government — could have been used and would in some sense have been true; but what distrust of popular government it would have been to act on such gloomy guesses! What distrust it shows today both in the wisdom of the founding fathers who gave us Article V and in ourselves to predict that we cannot safely use the second great mode of amendment offered by our Constitution.

The principal objection offered to the convention method is that a Convention may be a runaway body enacting Amendments on all kinds of matters not within its call. In the most flamboyant expositions of this danger it is even suggested that the Convention could repeal the Bill of Rights. Is there anything at all to such fears? The language of the Constitution is clear. Congress is to call a Convention on the application of the legislatures of the States. Congress is not free to call a Convention at its pleasure. It can only act upon the States' application; and if it can only act upon their application it cannot go beyond what they have applied for. If they apply for a Convention on a balanced budget Congress must call a Convention on a balanced budget. It cannot at its pleasure enlarge the topics. Nor can the Convention go beyond what Congress has specified in the call. The Convention's powers are derived from Article V and they cannot exceed what Article V specifies. The Convention meets at the call of Congress on the subject which the States have set out and Congress has called the Convention for.[5]

This understanding of the Article is confirmed by both Madison and Hamilton. Madison says explicitly that the national and State governments have equal powers of amendment.[6] It is obvious that the powers are very unequal if the national government can propose individual amendments but the States can only propose amendment of the whole Constitution. If Congress can propose one amendment at a time, so can the States. Hamilton is, if anything, even more explicit. He says in so many words that every amendment "would be a single proposition and might be forwarded singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise, in relation to any other point — no giving or taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently, whenever nine, or rather ten States, were united in the desire of a particular amendment that amendment must infallibly take place."[7] There is absolutely nothing in this authoritative exposition that suggests that the States can only call a general Convention where the whole Constitution will be on the table to be bargained over. What is contemplated and assured by Article V is entirely different: two-thirds of the States agree on an amendment and "that amendment must infallibly take place."

There are no mysteries here, no fundamental incertitudes unless one is not willing to trust Congress and the Convention it calls to act lawfully and constitutionally. Of course one can always imagine bad men usurping the functions of a Convention as bad men could act as usurpers in Congress or the Executive Branch or the Judiciary. But the Constitution is not addressed to men of bad will. It is addressed to the great law-abiding American people. It assumes that responsible people will act in accordance with what the Constitution provides. If they do so, there can be no runaway Convention.

It has been argued to you by Professor Charles Black of Yale that States can only call general Conventions, that any lesser and more specific call is void. Professor Black is wiser than the legislatures of all the States which have acted under Article V in this century. All of them, according to his theory, have done vain acts. I cannot believe that only Professor Black knows what the Constitution means. I cannot believe that Congress or the Supreme Court would adopt his ingenious and unique exposition, which defies Hamilton and Madison's contemporaneous expositions of the meaning.

It has been argued to you by Professor Gerald Gunther of Stanford that not bad men but reasonable men could expand the subject of the proposed Amendment to include matters remote from the intention of the proposers. I do not doubt the ability of lawyers — and lawyers are preeminently reasonable men! — to connect one subject with another: they are trained in the art of showing seamless webs, just as they are trained in taking such webs apart. But Professor Gunther's sagacious argument goes too far. If, with a show of reason, almost any topic can be linked with any other topic, a limited Convention is never possible. In a subtle form Professor Gunther's argument restates Professor Black's position: only general Conventions may be asked for by the States. But this conclusion, contra Hamilton and Madison, is to leave the States helpless to mandate action by Congress on the specific grievances.

The proper answer to Professor Gunther, therefore, must be that while reason can connect all things, when a Convention is called on a specific subject, all those subjects which are tangential and remote from the main issue must be eschewed by the Convention delegates. It is not beyond human wit to draw lines or beyond human sense to observe them. If the delegates wander, Congress need not transmit their wanderings. If irrelevancies are appended by a Convention, the States need not ratify them. If the States vote on matters not within the scope of the call, the Supreme Court can strike the surplusage. There is a triple check, a triple lock, of Congress, States, and Court. These bodies are surely competent to confine a Convention to the matter on which it was asked to act. The Convention is as safe and stable an instrument of governmental power as any other of the great institutions set up by the Constitution on a fundament of trust in the people.

The Usefulness of the Convention Method

The usefulness of the States' application for a Convention may be doubted because in fact a Convention has never been called. Is application for a Convention merely a way for a State legislature to blow off steam, harmlessly, without effect? In the almost two hundred years of our constitutional history there have been over 300 such applications by the States; every State has made at least one.[8] No doubt some of the applications were fulminations in the air without result. But at least three of the topics addressed by application were made the subjects of amendments by Congress — the limitation of presidential tenure to two terms; the repeal of Prohibition; and the direct election of senators. It is fair to say that in each case the expression of the will of the States for a Convention was a factor contributing to congressional action; and that in the case of the direct election of senators the application for a Convention was a critical factor.[9]

For a decade Congress had refused to amend the Constitution to take from the State legislatures the power to elect senators. The reform threatened a power bloc in the Senate. The House had proposed the amendment several times. But the Senate each time killed it by referral to a committee. In 1906, twelve states met and planned concerted action to apply for a Convention.[10] The number of States calling for a Convention rapidly mounted toward the requisite two-thirds. In 1911 the proponents of reform laid the States' petitions before the Senate. It was at this juncture that Senator Heyburn of Idaho, whom Professor Laurence Tribe invokes as a constitutional authority, opined that a Convention could "repeal every section" of the Constitution. Heyburn was one of the diehard reactionaries, trying to scare off the needed change. But by 1911 thirty States had applied for a Convention on direct election. In 1912 the retrograde Senate surrendered and Congress proposed the Seventeenth Amendment.

The lessons are clear: A reform that strikes at the power of Congress may only be adopted if effective pressure is generated by the States. The way of generating effective pressure is the way provided by the Founding Fathers — application by the legislatures of the States for a convention.

The Wisdom of the Convention Method

You have heard testimony that it would "trivialize" the Constitution to propose an amendment requiring a balanced budget.[1] I am surprised at what your witness viewed as trivial. No one, I should suppose, regards the Sixteenth Amendment as setting up a trivial tax. It is very hard to understand how an Amendment dealing with the limits of governmental expenditures is more trivial than an Amendment granting one form of taxing power. It is evident to most people that the limits of governmental finance are fundamental to the economic stability of the nation and are as properly a subject of constitutional concern as any specific form of taxation.

You have also been advised that a Convention would cause national trauma. In that warning I hear the voices of those supremely content with the country as it is, who, if they do not believe the Constitution is divinely established, at least have for the present system sentiments of satisfaction which they do not want disturbed by any democratic action of the people. To them the best answer, perhaps, lies in the words of Abraham Lincoln speaking at a time of grave national peril and giving his First Inaugural Address:

> I fully recognize the rightful authority of the people over the whole subject [amendment of the Constitution], to be exercised in either of the modes prescribed in the instrument itself, and I should, under existing circumstances, favor, rather than oppose, a fair opportunity being [illegible]

> the people to act upon it. I will venture to add that to me the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves; instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others, not especially chosen for the purpose, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish to accept or refuse . . .[12]

A method sanctioned by Lincoln, by Hamilton, by Madison, by Washington and Franklin, and by all the makers of the Constitution, and invoked from time to time by every state, is indeed a workable, useful, and wise way of keeping our Constitution a living instrument of the people.

NOTES

1. Roger Merriam, The Written Constitution and the Unwritten Attitude (1931) 6.
2. The Federalist, number 43 (Madison).
3. Ibid. number 85 (Hamilton).
4. Laurence Tribe, Statement before the Ways and Means Committee of the Assembly, February 1, 1979 at 12 and 14.
5. See the conclusions of the Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee of the American Bar Association, Amendment of the Constitution (1974) p. 17. Among the members of this committee reaching this unanimous conclusion were Judge Sarah Hughes of the Federal District Court and Dean Albert Sacks of Harvard Law School. The same conclusion is reached by Professor Paul G. Kauper of the University of Michigan Law School, "The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations," 64 Michigan Law Review 903 at 912 (1968) and by Note, Harvard Law Review 85 (1974) 1612 at 1629.
6. The Federalist, no. 43 (Madison).
7. Ibid. no. 85 (Hamilton).
8. ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, Op. cit. at 69.
9. See Edward S. Corwin and Mary Louise Ramsey, "The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment," 26 Notre Dame Lawyer (1951) 185 at 196.
10. ABA Committee, 72.
11. Tribe, Statement at 3.
12. Abraham Lincoln, First Inaugural Address, March 4, 1861, Lincoln, Collected Works, ed. Roy P. Basler (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press 1953) 4, 269-270.

DOES ARTICLE V RESTRICT THE STATES TO CALLING UNLIMITED CONVENTIONS ONLY?—A LETTER TO A COLLEAGUE

WILLIAM W. VAN ALSTYNE*

From time to time, various state legislatures have adopted resolutions designed to require Congress to call a limited convention in which one or another possible amendments to the Constitution might be proposed. In 1967, thirty-two states, two short of the requisite two-thirds, filed such resolutions requesting a convention for the purpose of considering an amendment to "overrule" the Supreme Court's principal reapportionment decisions. In 1971, Senator Ervin of North Carolina introduced a bill to provide guidelines to be followed upon a state call for a convention. This year, approximately twenty-eight states have adopted some kind of resolution for the purpose of considering an amendment to impose fiscal restraint upon the federal government—to require a "balanced budget."

Curiously, the convention mode of proposing amendments remains completely untested: no such convention has ever been assembled. Yet the amending convention obviously is contemplated by article V of the Constitution:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . . .[1]

Several scholars, including Professors Charles L. Black, Jr.[2] and Bruce A. Ackerman,[11] both of Yale Law School, have argued that unless the state legislative resolution reflects a desire to convoke a constitutional convention having the authority to propose an unlimited variety of fundamental changes in the Constitution, Congress should treat the state resolu-

---

* William R. Perkins Professor of Law, Duke University.

1. U.S. CONST. art. V.
2. Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 YALE L.J. 189 (1972).
3. Ackerman, Unconstitutional Convention, NEW REPUBLIC, Mar. 3, 1979, at 8.

tion as a nullity. Recently, Professor Ackerman sent Professor Van Alstyne a reprint of his New Republic editorial and asked Professor Van Alstyne whether he had "any thoughts on this." The following is Professor Van Alstyne's reply. Footnotes have been added by the editors.

March 9, 1979

Professor Bruce Ackerman
Yale Law School
New Haven, Connecticut

Dear Bruce,

I do have some thoughts, albeit very incomplete ones. By chance, your note and enclosure found me in the midst of reading old and musty material—Farrand, Elliot, Madison's Dairy, The Federalist, early congressional discussions, recollections from varieties of inputs into article V. This unglamorous exercise was occasioned by the very subject of the editorial you sent me and, more particularly, by a fresh reading of Charles Black's Yale Law Journal Letter on the same point.

I understand that the basic point being urged is this: unless Congress concludes that thirty-four states have submitted resolutions contemplating an unrestricted convention for proposing amendments, Congress should decline to "call a convention." A qualified or limited or restricted state legislative resolution, one which would display an unwillingness to have the convention free to consider and to propose whatever amendments it deems appropriate to be submitted for possible ratification, should be regarded by Congress as falling short of the requisite commitment by that state. A "qualified" application by a state legislature is, in contemplation of article V, no sufficient application at all.

Accordingly, even if, by chance, thirty-four state legislatures were to submit identically phrased qualified applications (e.g., identically worded "single-item amendment agenda"), thus manifesting a concurrence and identical purpose to have that one proposal considered for full discussion and a flat up-or-down vote in convention, Congress should nonetheless, in fidelity to the requirements of article V, decline to call a convention. As each such resolution is incomplete insofar as it is thus qualified, each such resolution is no different than no resolution at all. As Charles puts it: thirty-four times zero is still zero.[4] I gather you agree. Disappointingly, I do not—although I do think a cogent argument can be made (as you and Charles have made it) which, by being accepted, tends thus to fulfill itself and to pass into the received wisdom.

4. Black, supra note 2, at 198.

Before sharing with you my misgivings about this view of article V, however, let me quickly concede in what several respects the argument cannot be easily disposed of and, indeed, has very considerable plausibility. First, it goes without mention that I know of no judicial decisions that offer any resistance. Second, I have found nothing in the early materials I have been canvassing that specifically anticipates the argument or that specifically discredits it; a question in the form you and Charles have raised was, so far as I can determine, never raised at all. There is thus no expression of views, favoring it or deriding it. Third, the language of article V assuredly is not inconsistent with the argument and may, without uncommon strain, even be read as mildly implying the rightness of the argument. Fourth, as Charles notes,[5] insofar as a convention is seen as equivalent to Congress in its authority, the requirement of "equivalent" power to propose amendments favors the argument. Let me pause on these last two points before going on.

So far as text is concerned, the argument derives consistency, at the least, merely from noting: "The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . ."[6] Congress, of course, has no limited agenda (and no limit*able* agenda) in respect to its proposing authority. Correspondingly, it may (as Charles has done) be nicely observed that a convention summoned in substitution of, or as an alternative or equivalent to, Congress ought not be conceived of as properly subject to constraints of any greater force: the convention cannot be confined in its authority any more than Congress may be so confined. A plausible argument derives from Charles' larger views of "structure and relation"[7]—a convention must relate to the amendment power as Congress is related to the same amendment power; they are but alternative forums in which either must have authority "for an unconditional reappraisal of constitutional foundations."[8]

Fifth, the nearest thing we have to "early practice" on the use of this mode to secure amendments is in no respect inconsistent with the argument; to the contrary, it is wholly consistent with the argument. The early practice I have in mind consists of such possibly interesting

5. See id.
6. U.S. CONST. art. V (emphasis added).
7. C. BLACK, STRUCTURE AND RELATIONSHIP IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (1969).
8. Ackerman, supra note 3, at 8 (emphasis added).

shards of history as these:

(a) Despite grumbling and protest that the Philadelphia Convention of 1787 had no authority to propose a wholly new Constitution or to propose it under terms of ratification plainly disallowed as an authorized mode for altering the Articles of Confederation, once assembled that Convention presumed to reach its own conclusion that something more than the subjects proposed for revision by the various state legislatures was called for. States nonetheless ratifying the resulting product have reason to understand, therefore, that since the Convention they sent delegates to in 1787 did not deem itself constrained by whatever particular or limited items that may have been of exclusive or particular interest to some of them, they are on historical notice (as it were) of the uncabinable discretion of such conventions. More to the point, insofar as ratifying conventions within those same states elected to ratify that Constitution despite the extent to which its proposals greatly exceeded the originally limited purposes for which delegates from some states were sent to that Convention, the states must correspondingly concede that, evidently, such conventions cannot properly be subject to limited-agenda constraints.

(b) Among the states ratifying the Constitution, a good number did so very reluctantly—principally, although not exclusively, because of the absence of any kind of Bill of Rights. Concurrent with unconditional ratification, however, several of these state conventions accompanied their resolutions of ratification with a call for amendments, either by proposal by Congress or by a convention to be summoned for the purpose (presumably as contemplated by article V). Different state conventions had different amendments they wished to have considered: some dealt with identical subjects, but dealt with them in various degrees; some dealt with subjects not dealt with by others at all. There did appear to be a tacit assumption that insofar as Congress might respond by calling a convention rather than, as it did, by itself proposing twelve amendments, the convention to be called in keeping with article V would not (could not?) be constrained by the particular and limited amendment-interests of the calling states. In short, the mention of particular amendments to be considered did not imply an intention that no others could be considered or that, if any other amendments were to be considered then, in that event, the petitioning state convention would rather have no amending convention at all.

Sixth, the view of the matter that you and Charles take may claim additional strength from a sense of article V as a whole. What is that sense? Arguably, it is that amending the Constitution is a serious business. Alterations in the fundamental law should be possible, but not easy. You yourself make the point well in your New Republic editorial. It could be expanded. Supermajorities are required; a special mix of different constituencies is demanded. Short of virtual impossibility of change, which was regarded to be the problem under the Articles of Confederation where unanimous approval by all the states was required, the dominant function of article V (as Brandeis opined to be true with respect to the dominant function of separate powers[9]) is not to facilitate, but to clog; not to make haste in the furor of ad hoc dissatisfactions, but to require a more profound dissatisfaction—then to assemble in convention, to give pause to the felt necessity for changes, et cetera.

The argument has obvious application, in support of your view, as an article V "price tag." Amendments are a serious business, especially in the less-structured auspices of a convention. The notion that state legislatures may precipitate such events to blow off steam, a notion encouraged if single-item resolutions are deemed sufficient to mandate a convention, should be discouraged. It may best be discouraged by having state legislatures understand that just as there is no such thing as a "qualified" ratification of an amendment and just as it was uniformly understood in 1787 that there was no such thing as a "qualified" ratification of the Constitution, neither is there such a thing as a "qualified" call for an amending convention.

Seventh, your view is also helpful, were it adopted, in two eminently practical and important ways. First, it eliminates the plain and arbitrary difficulty of expecting a reasonable Congress to decide whether, given different forms in which these state resolutions are submitted (the current example of the "budget-balancers" is itself a fine example), a sufficient "consensus" has in fact been expressed for a given kind of limited convention? It avoids, too, the plain and related problem (supposing Congress agrees that a sufficient, albeit limited-agenda, consensus has been expressed), of what Congress is expected to do in describing the agenda for the convention thus called. Endless (and endlessly intractable) administrative and political questions at once arise in both respects. Neither kind of question arises, however, when only one kind of convention is deemed proper—the kind you argue for. Perhaps a better way of expressing this concern is as follows: as between two constructions of article V, one of which will necessarily generate an entire series of additional questions for which there are no objective criteria to resolve, and the other of which wholly eliminates any need to consider such questions, other things being roughly equal, is it not far better to prefer the latter construction?

9. Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 293 (1926) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

Complementary to this preceding argument, your view is equally helpful as these same practical issues identically must confront the convention to be assembled. How shall such a convention reasonably determine whether one or another proposal is within its mandate? Suppose a "budget-balancing" single-item agenda is supplanted with a substitute offered from the floor to cap the national debt—or, instead, to adopt the monetarist view of the problem, by restricting the volume of paper money (and of government credit) to be allowed in circulation, etc., etc. Additionally, is there not a belittling of such a convention insofar as its agenda is authoritatively (whether by itself or by Congress) deemed to be tightly restricted? What sort of convention is it, anyway, that convenes to discuss national economics, for instance, if after all is said and done its exclusive alternatives are to vote "yea" or "nay" on a single proposition that the convention is deemed to have no authority to modify in any way?

And, again, what is to happen with the work products from a "limited" convention? If they are to be routed through Congress as the conduit by which they are then to be submitted for ratification by "the one or the other Mode of Ratification" as "Congress" is to determine (according to article V itself), what then does Congress do? Should Congress decline to submit such proposed amendments to either mode of ratification if reasonably persuaded that the convention acted ultra vires? The point is not that no reasonable answer can be suggested but rather that we eliminate these kinds of issues outright by accepting the interpretation you and Charles support.

So, Bruce, all in all I think there is much going for the view that (a) amendment conventions cannot be circumscribed; and (b) state legislative resolutions inconsistent with a convention understood to have unqualified proposing authority are not to be counted. (This second point is consistent, however, with a state legislative resolution calling for a convention even while expressing a statement of subjects which that state deems sufficient to warrant the call.) In brief recapitulation, the points are these:

1. Such a construction of article V wholly avoids difficulties that must necessarily arise under any other construction—difficulties for which there are no self-evident answers even for those who would attempt to cope with them in good faith and the mere contemplation of which itself suggests that such a construction could not have been intended and ought not be preferred.

2. Such a construction of article V regards the authority of conventions as fully equal to that of Congress (rather than as more limited). This is far more in keeping with federal principles because the means accessible to states for proposing amendments to the Constitution is as generous in its authority as the means accessible to Congress.

3. Such a construction is also in keeping with the history of the Constitution itself. No small or passing disadvantage should be thought sufficient to assemble in convention to alter the nation's fundamental charter; when sufficient need is perceived to assemble in convention, that convention may set its own course respecting the alterations it may see fit to propose. This view of the matter was, in one sense, "ratified" in Philadelphia, and the propriety of that conduct was itself "ratified" in state conventions.

4. Even though the power of a convention should appropriately be equal to the power of Congress (when convened consistent with article V), no state should be provided encouragement to solicit so important an event merely to entertain some grievance or proposal peculiar to itself. No one's "call" for a convention should be deemed bona fide by Congress unless it is plain that the call contemplates a willingness to have a truly open convention assembled—a convention capable of entertaining other kinds of amendments than that of particular or narrow interest to "triggering" states. Since article V is not simply a means of changing the Constitution, but is at the same time a deliberate constraint on the ease of doing so, each state is made to put its own interests in the Constitution "at risk" insofar as it would, on its own account, put other states (and other people) at risk by the amendments it thinks proper to propose in such a convention.

The argument I have recapitulated, borrowed in large measure from you and from Charles, might well be persuasive to Congress. Insofar as Congress may consider it sound, I think it most unlikely the Supreme Court would gainsay the congressional judgment. Even assuming the Court would deem the issue a justiciable one (when presented in an otherwise suitable test case), I would guess that there is nothing so plainly incorrect about this congressional interpretation of article V that a majority could be mustered on the Court to override the congressional view.

If this be correct, the argument would be validated in every practical sense and for every practical purpose once Congress itself becomes persuaded of its rightness and utility: not because congressional opinion alone is enough, but because the Court can be expected to yield to that opinion under circumstances where congressional opinion is not plainly wrong. Judicial deference presumably is greatest in respect to article V questions, as virtually all the cases suggest. In this area of judicial review, probably nothing less than Thayer's "plain error" standard of judicial review would move the Court to hold against Congress. And, again, I see no "plain" error in this argument.

If the issue is, however, not the expediency of this interpretation of article V but its rightness (as, for instance, a conscientious Member of Congress might personally wish to consider), I should feel obliged to suggest that the interpretation is unsound. The argument I have attempted to restate, whether considered as a whole or in any particular part, really does not convince me at all, not because I do not think it "convincing," but simply because I do not think it is true. Rather, my sense of things from the reading I have been doing (which, quite unfairly, I cannot put into neat citation here) is very different.

During virtually all the time the Constitution was being composed, and during the subsequent months it lay before conventions assembled in the states (except in Rhode Island, which refused to have anything to do with it at any stage), uncertainty accompanied its passage. This thoroughly eclectic instrument was marked by features very different from the lesser document it was meant to replace. It also embodied a variety of features different from the English experience. Most parts were untested in colonial or state experience; the document was not woven from any one thread of political science or classical experience. Rereading all of the principal discussions of the period, rather than merely indexed portions on article V in particular, makes plain what one otherwise might tend to forget: in many, many particulars the "workability" of the Constitution was felt to be highly uncertain. The thing is full of close compromises—the propriety of which was stoutly defended, to be sure, but the long-term suitability of which (and even the short-term consequences of which) were, admittedly, highly indeterminate.

That occasion for particular repairs might well arise almost at once was diffidently recognized. Such an occasion might depend, for example, upon the chance circumstances of what the national government might in fact be like—once transformed from paper description to protean reality. It would surely depend, too, upon the uncertain impact the conduct of that national government could have upon the states (and, more especially, on their retained home-rule powers). Such occasions might separately arise, and most obviously (as seen at the time) upon the recognized eventuality that the omission of a Bill of Rights should prove to have been an awful error—even as Jefferson insisted to be true and as was reflected in the serious misgivings of others.

Then, following proposal of the Constitution, the task of securing ratification by nine states proved nearly insurmountable insofar as the scant provisions in article I, section 9 struck many in the state conventions as yielding far too little security against the possibility of self-serving interpretations Congress might presume to make of its peculiarly enumerated powers and the Supreme Court—as an agency of that same national government—might presume to sustain. Providing for modes of change was thus not lightly considered or casually arrived at: only by being persuaded that these would be ample against every contingency could doubting persons be made to think the plan safe to try at all—notwithstanding substantial sentiment that the Articles of Confederation were themselves a failure.

More to the point, the fact that no one could foresee just how responsive the untried "Congress" might be to the felt necessities for amendment meant, necessarily, that no critical reliance could be placed upon Congress as a plausible sole or even plausible best source for every kind of amendment. That the "state mode" of introducing amendments by called convention never, by itself, produced a single amendment to the Constitution does not derogate from this in the slightest. Rather, it may show only that the Congress proved to be better than expected—itself responsive with sufficient adequacy to carry into amendment every major and sustained demand for that kind of change.

The various stages of drafting through which article V passed convey an additional impression as well: that the state mode for getting amendments proposed was not to be contingent upon any significant cooperation or discretion in Congress. Except as to its option in choosing between two procedures for ratification, either "by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof," Congress was supposed to be mere clerk of the process convoking state-called conventions. Certainly it was not imagined to sit astride that process as a hostile censor, a body entitled to impose such stringent requirements upon the states as effectively to render the state mode of securing particular amendments nearly impossible. To put the matter simply, a generous construction of what suffices to present a valid application by a state, for consideration of a particular subject or of a particular amendment in convention, is far more responsive to the anticipated uses of article V than a demanding construction that all but eliminates its use in response to specific, limited state dissatisfactions.

To be sure, concern was expressed (principally by Madison) over just what Congress was expected to do in the execution of its duty to "call a Convention" when required so to do "on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States." Madison thought that far too little attention was given to that problem in Philadelphia. The Philadelphia Convention was itself remiss in this regard, even as all of the writings that centered on Senator Ervin's proposed guideline legislation in the 1960s make quite clear. But neither that oversight in the Convention nor any writings suggest that anything less than a permissive construction, rather than an exclusionary one, is closest in keeping with the expected uses of this feature of article V.

In several places, moreover, it is made very plain that certain kinds of amendments state legislatures might wish to have considered by a convention would be precisely the kinds least likely to be forthcoming from Congress—indeed, the very kinds to which Congress could be expected to be hostile. Congress might prove to be a wholly reliable instrument to propose amendments occasioned by discovered shortcomings most felt at the national level. But insofar as the felt shortcoming was one of Congress' own doing (for instance, in the self-aggrandizement of its powers at the expense of state powers), a check for a specific shortcoming of that kind was the power of states to mount adequate support from like-minded legislatures elsewhere, to convoke a convention where a corrective measure might be approved, subject thereafter only to ratification pursuant to whichever mode of ratification Congress elected.

What, then, is the contemplated function of a called convention under these anticipated circumstances? Surely not that the only kind of appropriate (and thus legitimate) convention is one within which a complete reapprasial of the whole Constitution would be either desirable or required. Surely not that Congress could turn aside even identically phrased, single-item resolutions submitted by more than two-thirds of the states resolved to have a particular (constitutional) grievance considered in convention, by suddenly placing a wholly unexpected price tag (a "Catch 22" as it were) on that right—that unless these same states were also willing that the proposed convention consider anything else appealing to the individual fancy of some delegates, some special interests, or some other states, then Congress was at liberty to refuse to call any convention at all.

There is, in all the places I have looked, no discussion anywhere of this "Catch 22" interpretation of article V. I cannot believe that the reason for this lack of discussion is that such an interpretation was itself so widely assumed, and so widely regarded as so utterly uncontroversial, as universally to have been taken for granted. Rather, I believe it is because the very notion that such an idea would be thought of even as a possible interpretation of article V, much less as a plausible interpretation, was beyond imagination. That interpretation stands the whole matter on its head.

That a general convention, itself like the one at Philadelphia, convoked deliberately to undertake (in your words) "an unconditional reappraisal of constitutional foundations"[10] is the only kind of convention or even the typical kind of convention anticipated under article V strikes me as decidedly untrue. To the contrary, while allowed by article V, such a convention is the least likely to be the foreseeable object of states expected to make use of their collective authority in article V. An event most likely to provide the most expected (and legitimate) use of this power would be just that: a particular event, an untoward happening, itself seen as a departure from, or as a suddenly exposed oversight within, the Constitution. The event would be the kind of thing, however, Congress might not be expected swiftly to repair, especially if Congress were itself the source of the mischief; the kind of thing, rather, providing specific occasion for parallel state resolutions to consider a particular proposal (or alternative proposals) in convention at once to be called for the purpose.

In sum, on the basic issue I quite agree with the student's view stated in the Harvard Law Review seven years ago:

> Although it would be contrary to article V if Congress attempted to limit the scope of a convention when the states had applied for an open convention, it would seem to be consistent with, if not compelled by, the article for Congress to limit the convention in accordance with the express desires of the applicant states.[11]

So far as I would differ from this view, it is a very mild difference. It is perfectly plausible that Congress might leave all debatable degrees of germaneness to the discretion of the convention itself. When convinced that within a reasonable number of years (e.g., seven) that it has in fact received applications from two-thirds of the several states requesting a call for convention consideration of a given subject of sufficient common description that further insistence for more perfect agreement among the applications would clearly be unreasonable, however, Congress is under a constitutional obligation to call a convention responsive in good faith to those applications.

Indeed, I think that Congress could least decline to call a convention if, in keeping with identically worded state legislative resolutions to this effect, the sole function of that convention would be to do no more than to deliberate and to debate the pros and cons of an exactly particularized proposal, with choice at the convention's conclusion for the delegates only to vote "yea" or "nay." If two-thirds of the state legislatures might perchance agree on the exact wording of an amendment they would wish to be reviewed in a called convention for discussion and vote, this would seem to me to state the paradigm case in which Congress should proceed with the call—and limit the agenda exactly in accordance with the unequivocal expressions of those solely responsible for the event. On the other hand, were Congress to presume altogether to disregard these resolutions, as though neither singly nor in the aggregate did they qualify as proper applications under article V, I should think it outrageous.

10. Ackerman, supra note 3, at 8.

11. Note, Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1612, 1628-29 (1972) (footnote omitted).

The notion that nothing may be considered by means of convention unless everything may be considered in that same convention seems to me a non sequitur having no basis whatever in article V. The typical convention called under article V would surely least be like—rather than most be like—the Convention of 1787. The most proper use, rather than the least proper use, of such a convention would be in contemplation of a fairly modest change rather than a wholesale change. That thirty-four states could be instructed by Congress that they may not resolve a common call for a convention for the sole purpose of considering a repeal of the sixteenth amendment unless they mean also to consider a repeal of the other twenty-five and of all six articles as well (and to manifest that willingness in the resolutions they submit to Congress) seems to me the ultimate in congressional cynicism. Yet all of this is explicit in the position that you and Charles have suggested. I do, as I said at the beginning, have some doubts.

Cordially,
William Van Alstyne /s/

[From ADA World, May–June 1979]

DON'T LET'EM OPEN THAT CAN!

(by Stina Santiestevan)

"Americans for Democratic Action notes with alarm that 28 states have passed resolutions calling for a constitutional convention to mandate a balanced federal budget. We reject this approach as impractical and injurious to our system on both constitutional and economic grounds."

With these words, ADA's national board in March served notice that ADA had joined the nation-wide battle against Con-Con.

One week earlier ADA—with representatives of the AFL–CIO, NEA, Common Cause, Congress Watch, and a number of other progressive groups—announced formation of Citizens for the Constitution, an ad hoc coalition formed to combat the proposed constitutional convention.

Citizens for the Constitution is headed by Massachusetts' lieutenant governor, Tom O'Neill, who says the organization will concentrate on lobbying legislatures which are considering the issue or are expected to do so soon, including Alaska, Ohio, New Hampshire, Montana, Rhode Island, Vermont, Maine, and West Virginia.

The National Taxpayers Union, the major force behind Con-Con and a front for assorted Right Wing organizations, has claimed it will have the necessary 34 states by the middle of the year. (It requires two-thirds of the states, or 34, to force Congress to call a constitutional convention, but any amendment to the constitution would require ratification by 38 states.)

NTU, which is loosely related to some 500 state and local groups, was founded in 1969, claims over 100,000 members, and spent $1 million on "education" in 1978. It says it will double that amount this year.

NTU opposes federal spending of all kinds, and "never alienates supporters by specifying what it would cut," according to the UAW. The AFL–CIO'c Committee on Political Education says NTU is linked to the John Birch Society, the NAM, the Heritage Foundation, and Americans Against Union Control of Government.

The statement issued by ADA's board in March said in part:

". . . a constitutional convention will surely plunge us into a crisis of mammoth proportions, for there is no precedent. The only opinion constitutional experts can agree upon is that there is no clear approach to a constitutional convention. No one is sure how delegates would be selected. No one is sure of the convention procedures. Worse, no one is sure whether the convention is limited to a single issue or whether convention delegates may take on the entire document . . . needlessly amending the constitution can only initiate an erosion of our political system and diminish the power of the document to define fundamental national values."

Economists, constitutional scholars, and political leaders are frightened at this prospect—whether they are liberals or conservatives. Experts have pointed out that delegates would gather after a popular election and could argue that a convention has the right to set its own agenda. It is unlikely that the agenda would be limited to the federal budget. Liberals fear such acts as repeal of the income tax, reversal of the "one-man-one-vote" Supreme Court decision, establishment of a compulsory open shop policy, or the outlawing of abortion, forced busing, and gun control. Thoughtful conservatives fear efforts to legalize drugs or outlaw guns or establish an environmental "bill of rights."

Economists point out that the federal budget can be "balanced" in one of several ways: by raising taxes, or by cutting expendiutres—especially the $89 billion in grants to state and local governments, or by accounting devices which shift capital expenditures out of the budget entirely. About three-quarters of each budget is pre-set by long-term legislation, leaving only about one-quarter to be controlled by annual budgets.

In its statement, ADA's national board warned that our $2.3 trillion economy is complex. "The fiscal and monetary policies of the federal government are a crucial component of our ability to fine-tune and stabilize our economy. To impose a rigid requirement on a system that requires flexibility would mean that mild recessions would turn into repeats of the 1930s."

The Effects of S.3 and S.1710 on State Procedures for the Adoption of Applications for a Constitutional Convention

(By David Gillespie)

Article V of the United States Constitution provides: "The Congress * * * on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments * * *." Two bills pending in the United States Senate, S.3 and S.1710, attempt to address many of the thorny procedural issues inherent in the convention provision. Although the two bills differ in various particulars, they are substantially identical in terms of their underlying constitutional theories. Both bills regulate state procedures for the adoption of convention applications and the role of state governors in the application process. They also provide mechanisms for the resolution of procedural questions that arise in the course of the application process. This analysis concentrates on two aspects of the proposed legislation: the scheme these bills provide for the regulation of state procedures for the adoption of convention applications; and, their proviso to nullify the State Governors' veto power over convention applications.

The Constitution vests power to apply for constitutional conventions in the legislatures of the several States. Article V does not supply the States with a procedure for application, nor does it vest power to control the application procedure in Congress. The raison d'être for the convention method of constitutional amendment is to provide the States with a means to circumvent the congressional route of amendment. Any attempt by Congress to meddle with this domain of state power violates the language and intent of Art. V. The convention method of amendment is the constitutional co-equal of the congressional method. Congress has no more power to constrain the power of constitutional conventions than it has to limit the enumerated powers of other branches of the Federal Government. Thus, Congress has no power to regulate substantively the application process, which is an inteegral element of the convention power. Under Act. V, the sole power of Congress with respect to constitutional conventions is to tabulate applications and to "call" a convention when the requisite number of valid applications is received.

Although Congress has no power to interfere with State application procedures, the constitutional mandate to call a convention rests with Congress. Congress must be in a position to judge the validity of state applications. S.3 and S.1710 provide different procedures for the resolution of questions that arise concerning the validity of applications. S.3 Sec. 3(b) vests power in Congress to make final determinations of "* * * questions concerning the adoption of * * * State resolution(s) cognizable under this Act." The most fundamental difficulty with this provision is that no basis exists in Art. V to support such a broad assertion of congressional power. Furthermore, Congress lacks both the procedure and the expertise to resolve such questions of state law. Vexatious as they may be, the laws and procedures of the 50 States must provide the standard by which the validity of convention applications is judged. Both bills crudely recognize this principle when they provide in Sec. 3(a) that in adopting applications, "* * * the State legislature shall follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute by that legislature." Unfortunately, this formulation of the principle of state primacy in the realm of application procedure presents a myriad problems.

The approach of S. 1710 Sec. 3(b) is more consonant with constitutional principles than its S. 3 counterpart. If Justice Holmes is correct in his observation that "* * * there is no Canon against using common sense in construing laws as saying what they obviously mean," Roschen v. Ward, 279 U.S. 337, 339 (1929); Art. V means that State legislatures have the power to decide whether or not they have adopted an application for a convention. To deny the States the ability to make this decision, as does S. 3, is to eliminate a substantial element of the States' application power. S. 1710 comports with the basic constitutional principle of allowing the States to determine whether they have applied for a convention. The problem with the procedure under Sec. 3(b) in S. 1710 is that it makes a questionable bedfellow for Sec. 3(a). The States do not have full power under Sec. 3(b) to determine "Questions concerning the validity of State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption or withdrawal of a State resolution cognizable under this Act," if, as required by Sec. 3(a), the legislature is constrained to "* * * follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute (emphasis mine) by that legislature." Sec. 3(b) gives the legislatures a measure of power that Sec. 3(a) takes away. This paradox is treated at greater length below.

Sec. 3(a) in both S. 3 and S. 1710 limits the State legislatures' choice of procedures for the adoption of convention applications. However, for Congress to require that the adoption of applications proceed in the same manner as the adoption of statutes places a restriction on the States' application power that is not supported by Art. V. Not only is the imposition of such a stricture beyond the pale of Congress' Art. V power, it is a poorly thought out procedural rule that prevents States from consideration and adoption of special procedures for the purpose of adopting convention applications. If a State is constrained to follow procedures for the adoption of statutes when in the process of adopting a convention application, the State is prevented from developing a set of procedures suited to the unique function allotted to it by Art. V. Many States have constitutional provisions that govern the proposal of amendments to their respective constitutions. Many have provisions that govern the calling of conventions to propose amendments or to propose large scale constitutional revision. To place a State in this procedural strait jacket not only prevents the development of parallel state legislative response to the Federal application problem, it creates many additional difficulties due to the baggage that goes along with legislative procedures for the adoption of statutes. Depending upon the State in question, S. 3 and S. 1710 may have the effect of either making it too easy or too difficult for the States to adopt convention applications.

Similar problems arise with a congressional attempt to proscribe the role of State governors in the application process. Sec. 3(a) of S. 3 and S. 1710 makes just such an attempt. Sec. 3(a) accomplishes two things: it binds the State legislatures to procedures that govern the enactment of statutes; and, it removes governors from any significant role in the application process. The authors of S. 3 and S. 1710 are oblivious to the fact that Congress has no constitutional authority to interfere with the role of governors in the convention application process. Plenary power to apply for constitutional conventions is vested by Art. V in the State legislatures. The power to exclude governors from the application process rests with the State legislatures, and by simple logical extension, the power to include them in the process rests with the State legislatures. Under Art. V, the State legislatures are free to adopt their own procedures for the adoption of convention applications, and this freedom includes the provision of a substantial role for their respective governors in the application process. Under a guise of constitutional soundness which uses language that suggests congressional deference State legislative procedures, S. 3 and S. 1710 act so as to regulate unconstitutionally the method of convention application adoption.

The most obvious problem created by the elimination of governors from the application process arises when a governor vetoes a convention application. The simple question to be answered: What result? Before reaching the "simple" solution, we shall turn to an investigation of the veto power of the Governor of the State of Nevada. The reason for our choice of State is twofold: Nevada is one of 48 States which provides its Governor with veto power; and, the Governor of this State vetoed the legislature's application for a constitutional convention (Con. Rec., Feb. 21, 1979, H 808).

Article 4 section 35 of the Nevada Constitution grants the governor veto power over bills. The constitution does not provide him with a pocket-veto power. The governor has 5 days in which to return bills with his objections, for reconsideration. A two-thirds majority of both houses is needed to override a veto. The veto power also extends to joint resolutions under Nevada Statute 218.420. Joint resolutions are treated by the Nevada legislature in the same manner as bills, just as in the United States Congress, where the ". . . two forms are often used indiscriminately (Charles J. Zinn, "How Our Laws Are Made," p. 8, U. S. Government Printing Office, 1974)." The Nevada convention application exists in the form of a joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution No. 8, and is therefore within the full ambit of the Governor's veto power.

The Governor's veto power is strictly construed by the Supreme Court of Nevada. An act of the legislature has force of law only in the following three circumstances: if the act is signed by the Governor; if the Governor gives his tacit approval by not returning the act; or, if the act commands a majority of two-thirds of both houses of the legislature. Standing by itself, a simple majority of both houses has no force of law in the State of Nevada.

Without the express approval of the Executive, there are but two ways by which an Act of the Legislature can become a law: 1st. By receiving a two-thirds vote of both houses of the Legislature after it has been vetoed by the Governor. 2d. By a failure on the part of the Governor to return it to the house where it originated within five days after its reception by him whilst the Legislature is in session, or within 10 days after the adjournment of that body. In both of these cases the Act becomes a law without the signature or approval of the Executive. (Vide Constitution, Art. 4, Sec. 35.) These are the only cases, however, in which the approval of the Governor can be dispensed with. In all other cases, such approval is as essential to give it the sovereign authority of law as the passage by the Legislature itself. Birdsall v. Carrick, 3 Nev. 154, 156 (1867).

S. 3 and S. 1710 create a contest between the long-established veto power of Nevada's Governor, and the authority of Congress under Art. V to ride roughshod over a State constitution.

A veto by the Governor raises two additional problems: What response is possible on the part of Congress or the Nevada legislature if the secretary of state fails to sign or send the vetoed application to Congress as Sec. 4 of both S. 3 and S. 1710 requires; and, is this situation resolvable under the respective Sec. 3(b) provisions which address the resolution of questions concerning state legislative procedure?

S. 3 and S. 1710 charge the secretary of state with the certification and the transmission of applications. Under Nevada law, a joint resolution that is vetoed by the governor and which fails to muster two-thirds of both houses of the State legislature is a nullity. Do S. 3 and S. 1710 compell the secretary of state to certify and transmit a joint resolution that is void under State law? If these bills do not so compell the secretary, and congressional authority based on Art. V to support such compulsion is dubious, then he has the power to kill applications by not sending or not certifying them within the 30-day period which Sec. 4 of S. 3 and S. 1710 enunciate. Not only does the secretary have the potential to kill applications that are void under State law, Nevada law may require that he burke such applications.

Neither S. 3 nor S. 1710 addresses the problem of harmonizing the functions of the State legislature under State law with the functions of the Executive under State law, and neither provides a mechanism for resolving inter-branch disputes. The bills only address questions of adoption and withdrawal of applications. Even assuming the ability of Congress to compell the Secretary of State to certify and transmit applications in spite of State law, these procedures bills do not indicate how to achieve this compulsion. Nor do they indicate whether a situation involving a recalcitrant secretary mitigates the effect of Sec. 4's thirty day transmission requirement with respect to the validity of applications. At the very least, S. 3 and S. 1710 create the possibility that a Secretary of State has the power to frustrate convention applications by deliberately or carelessly failing to transmit or certify them within the congressionally specified time period.

S. 3 and S. 1710 create another more subtle dilemma for state executive departments, and all those who must evaluate the states' convention applications. Assuming arguendo that the secretary can be compelled to certify and transmit convention applications that are void under Nevada law if these applications constitute valid convention applications under one of Congress' procedures acts, the manner in which the secretary, Congress and the Nevada legislature are to discover the configuration of a valid application remains to be established. Sec. 3(a) instructs the state legislatures to follow procedures for the enactment of statutes, with the caveat that actions of the States' Governors will not affect the validity of applications. To recapitulate, a Nevada statute can be passed under the three following circumstances: (one), with a simple majority in both houses of the legislature and with the signature of the Governor; (two), with a simple majority of both houses and with the tacit approval or acquiescence of the Governor; (three), with a two-thirds majority of both houses in the event of a veto from the governor.

In all three cases, the Governor has power to affect the course of legislation. If the Governor uses his veto power, the legislature is powerless to act without a two-thrids majority. There are only two circumstances in which the legislature can pass valid joint resolutions without the overt approval of the Governor: (one), when the Governor acquiesces in a resolution, a simple majority of both houses suffices to carry the legislation; (two), when the Governor vetos a resolution, a two-thirds majority of both houses is necessary to carry the legislation.

The question remains: What type of majority is sufficient to produce a valid application in Nevada? Under the doctrine of S. 3. Sec. 3(b), Congress has power to dictate to the States the size of majority that would produce a valid application. Thus, S. 3 opens the door to complete or substantial congressional control of the application process in direct opposition to the Framers' intention to provide an extra-congressional route for the proposal of constitutional amendments. S. 1710's solution to this problem is superior to that of S. 3 in terms of constitutional probity, because S. 1710 does not blatantly usurp the Art. V power of state legislatures to apply for the calling of a convention. However, S. 1710 Sec. 3(a) has the distinct liability of providing a solution that is: problematic; poorly drafted; or, both of the above. Presumably, S. 1710 would allow the Nevada legislature to pass a joint resolution to determine the size and constitution of a valid majority for a convention application. However, this resolution is then subject to the Governor's veto power. On dubious constitutional grounds, S. 1701 excludes the Governor from the application adoption and withdrawal process, but, Sec. 3(b) does not prohibit the Governor from participating in the process of determining the validity of the adoption procedures.

S. 1710 prevents the Governor from successfully vetoing an application and thereby necessitating a two-thirds majority to secure passage, but the bill does not prohibit him from vetoing a joint resolution (or any other act of the legislature) which establishes the size of a valid majority for the passage of an application, or which resolves some other procedural matter. Sec. 3(b) allows the Governor to exercise a power more fundamental than the power Sec. 3(a) attempts to constrain. If Sec. 3(b) read: "Questions . . . are determinable by the State legislature, and that action shall be valid, without the assent of the Governor of the State," then the bill at least would possess internal consistency with respect to its treatment of state executive power. The bill does not so read.

Thus, S. 3 and S. 1710 offer no clear guidance to State legislatures in determining the nature of a valid majority for the adoption of convention applications. What they do provide is that State legislatures are to follow procedures that govern the enactment of statutes. In Nevada, some of these procedures are themselves a matter of statute. For example, Nevada is one of more than 30 States which has a statute or rule requiring that proposed legislation likely to affect the State's fiscal liability include a "fiscal note," or "fiscal impact statement" (See "The Fiscal Letter," National Conference of State Legislatures, Vol. 1, No. 4, June 1979). More specifically, Nevada Statute 218.272 provides:

"Before any bill which makes an appropriation or changes any existing appropriation, fiscal liability or revenue which appears to be in excess of $2,000 is considered at a public hearing of any committee of the assembly or the senate, or before any vote is taken thereon by such committee, the legislative counsel shall obtain a fiscal note containing a reliable estimate of the anticipated change in appropriation authority, fiscal liability or state revenue under the bill, including, to the extent possible, a projection of such changes in future biennia."

Nevada Statute 218.2754 requires that the summaries of all bills include a comment on the disposition of their respective fiscal notes.

Nevada's fiscal note statute can apply to joint resolutions (the form of Nevada's convention application) as well as to bills. According to Ron Sparks, Fiscal Analyst for the Department of Legislative Counsal, State of Nevada (as per conversations on January 24 and February 8, 1980), the fiscal note requirement can be interpreted as applying to all actions of the Nevada legislature which alter the State's fiscal liability to the extent of $2,000 or more. Although the fiscal note requirement has not been applied to joint resolutions, this is because joint resolutions normally do not generate substantial fiscal liabilities. The statute is not limited to appropriation bills or to bills which describe a particular liability or revenue. Any action of the legislature that creates a potential $2,000 fiscal liability invokes the statute. No magic words are needed to trigger the statute into effect, nor is its application limited to legislative acts that affect only state or local appropriations. The fiscal note requirement applies to any legislation that affects the disposition of local, State or Federal funds.

Senate Joint Resolution No. 8 of the 60th Session of the Nevada legislature is an application to Congress for the calling of a constitutional convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution requiring that, in the absence of a national emergency, federal appropriations not exceed estimated revenues. The degree to which the adoption of such an amenndment would affect the fiscal liabilities of Nevada is indeterminate, but the potential effects are of considerable magnitude. Any curtailment of the federal budget is certain to have effects on revenue-sharing and other types of Federal assistance to the States. Of course, the liability resulting from the adoption of a balanced budget amendment, or any other type of amendment affecting Federal spending, is contingent. However, contingent liabilities are within the scope of the fiscal note statute if they "appear" to be $2,000 or more.

Aside from the liability that results from the adoption of a balanced budget amendment, the states are certain to incur a substantial liability from the mere holding of a convention. Neither S. 3 nor S. 1710 makes any provision for expenses incurred at the State level in the selection, transportation and remuneration of convention delegates. S. 1710 places the entire cost of a convention on the States. It provides that "No Federal funds may be appropriated specifically for the purposes of payment of the expenses of the convention." If Nevada's application for a convention is successful, this State is certain to suffer a change in fiscal liability from the transportation and remuneration of a single convention delegate which exceeds $2,000.

A fiscal note to this effect is appropriate under the Nevada statute and it may be mandatory. No fiscal note was prepared with respect to Nevada's convention application. The cost of delegates and possibly the entire cost of a convention are expenses borne by the States regardless of the type of amendment to be proposed. In the case of an application for a convention to propose an amendment to impose fiscal restraint on the Federal Government, it is ironic indeed that the Nevada Legislature fails to comply solicitously with its own recently enacted statutory device for monitoring its own fiscal responsibility.

The failure of the Nevada Legislature to prepare a fiscal note for its convention application makes that action of questionable validity under Sec. 3 and Sec. 4 of both S. 3 and S. 1710. Sec. 3 requires a State to follow procedures that govern the enactment of statutes. The Nevada fiscal note requirement is one of those procedures. The legislature's failure to prepare a fiscal note is a possible violation of Nevada procedure, and therefore, a violation of Sec. 3. If the legislature must prepare a fiscal statement, and the copies of the joint resolution-convention application submitted to Congress do not include the appropriate notation mandated by Nevada Statute 218.2754, the application fails to comport with Sec. 4, which requires the submission of a copy of the exact text of the resolution-application. To comply with Nevada Statute 218.2754, the application must include one of the following statements: Fiscal Note: Yes; Fiscal Note: No; Fiscal Note: Effect less than $2,000. Whether or not a bill changes the state's liability more than $2,000, it must include one of the preceeding comments in order to demonstrate that the appropriate effort was made to accommodate the terms of the statute.

Not only may the Senate bills require the preparation of a fiscal note for the Nevada application (under Sec. 3), but they may also require that it contain the notation described in 218.2754. It is not enough for the legislature simply to prepare a fiscal note under Sec. 4 of the Senate bills, the application sent to Congress must state whether or not a fiscal note has been prepared.

The dilemmas that S. 3 and S. 1710 create for the Nevada legislature are largely the result of Sec. 3(a) and its problematic instruction for the states to follow procedures that govern the enactment of statutes and to ignore the Governor's veto power. As discussed above, Sec. 3 creates three major initial problems: what happens if the Governor vetoes an application?; what type of majority is needed to pass a valid convention application?; and, do all of the requirements that attend the passage of statutes, such as the fiscal note requirement, also apply to the passage of a convention application? These problems would be ameliorated if the States are free to adopt their own methods of application in accordance with state law and the XIVth Amendment.

The Nevada Constitution provides procedures both for amendment and for the calling of conventions to make State constitutional revisions. Either of these procedures would provide a better procedure for the Nevada Legislature to follow when considering application for a Federal constitutional convention than the procedures required by S. 3 and S. 1710. Article 16 section 1 sets out the procedure for amending the Nevada Constitution. A majority of the members of both houses during two successive legislatures must vote to propose an amendment.

Then, the amendment must receive the vote of a majority of the State's electors. In order to call a constitutional convention, two-thirds of both houses must vote to recommend the calling of a convention, and then, this recommendation must meet with the favor of a majority of the electors. A simple majority of the legislature has no power to call a state constitutional convention or to propose constitutional amendments.

Under the Supremacy Clause of Art. VI, the United States Constitution is of greater dignity than any state law, including state constitutions. It would be anomalous in the extreme if the procedures instituted for calling a constitutional convention to propose amendments to the Federal Constitution were more lax, wide-open and ambiguous than the procedures for calling a convention to propose changes in the constitution of the State of Nevada, or any other state. The flaw in such procedures becomes even more glaring in light of what a noted constitutional scholar has referred to as the way in which convention applications have been "whooped and hollered" through a good many state legislatures. The plain meaning of Art. V is not: "The Congress . . . on the Application of a simple majority of the Legislatures of two thirds of the Several States, shall call a Convention. . . ." In the case of Nevada, if a simple majority of the legislature can make valid applications for a federal constitutional convention, passage of such an application would be easier than passage of a state parking regulation (see, e.g., Nevada Statute 484.399). The latter requires the assent of the Governor or a two-thirds majority of the legislature. At the recent Senate hearings on constitutional conventions conducted by the Subcommittee on the Constitution, Professor Charles Black stated, "It is the genius of American constitutional interpretation to read our Constitution in a sensible way. . . ."

It is hardly "sensible" to have a Federal mandate requiring that applications for constitutional conventions be easier to push through state legislatures than parking regulations.

If Congress does not have the constitutional authority to dictate procedures to the States for the adoption of con titutional convention appli ations, then Sec. 3 (a) lies beyond the ambit of congressional power. If Congress does have the authority to control the procedures for making applications, then Congress has the duty to come up with a better set of procedures than the problematic instructions which S. 3 and S. 1710 offer to the states.

Excerpt, Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of The United States 1789-1889, Herman V. Ames. (1896) Reprinted: 1970

CHAPTER VI.

PROCEDURE AS TO CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

176. METHOD OF AMENDMENT.

The Constitution of the United States, in Article V, provides for its own amendment whenever two-thirds of the Houses of Congress, or a convention called upon the application of two-thirds of the State legislatures, shall propose amendments, which in either case shall be valid when ratified by the legislatures of or conventions in three-fourths of the several States, as Congress may direct.[1]

Thus it appears that amendments may be proposed in one of two ways—either by Congress or a convention called by Congress in response to the request of the necessary number of the State legislatures. Also discretionary power is given to Congress to choose one of the two methods of ratification permissible, namely, either by the legislatures of States or by conventions in the several States. The amount of discretion allowed in this clause plainly indicates the expectation of the framers of the Constitution, that the amending machinery would be frequently put into operation.[2] It is therefore remarkable that only one of the methods of proposing amendments has been used, and that it has always been accompanied by one method of ratification.[3]

177. GENERAL CONVENTIONS.

In making provision for a Federal convention,[4] the framers of the Constitution doubtless had in mind the possibility of a future fundamental revision, and in addition wished to provide when necessary for a body having a direct mandate from the people to propose amendments.[5] The fact that nearly two

[1] Of the two exceptions enumerated in the article one is obsolete; the other, in regard to equal representation of a State in the Senate, has as much force to-day as ever.

[2] See Hamilton's remarks in the Federal Convention, Elliot, V, 530.

[3] With the exception of the proposed thirteenth amendment in 1861, which was ratified by a convention in Illinois in 1862. See post, par. 179.

[4] The first provision agreed to for securing amendments provided only for a convention, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, August 6, 1787. Elliot, V. 381.

[5] See advantages of a convention referred to by Nicholas in the Virginia convention, Ibid., III, 101-102.

hundred constitutional conventions have been called to frame or revise the State constitutions,[1] renders it all the more remarkable that this method of proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States has never been put in operation. This may be accounted for in part by the fact that there has never been a time when a general revision of the Constitution has been widely desired. Although conventions for the proposal or ratification of amendments have never been assembled, yet occasions have arisen when their trial has been urged. Passing over the propositions for a second convention, which were made in the Federal Convention itself, and in the States at the time of their ratification of the Constitution,[2] we find that the Government had scarcely been established when Virginia and New York made application for a convention to draft amendments.[3] In the winter of 1832–33, the legislature of South Carolina passed resolutions declaring it "expedient that a convention of the States be called as early as practicable to consider and determine such questions of disputed powers as have arisen between the States of this Confederacy and the General Government."[4] This seems to have led to the legislatures of Georgia and Alabama passing resolutions in conformity to Article V, petitioning Congress to call a Federal convention to consider the proposal of amendments.[5] The legislature of Delaware, on the other hand, in reply to the resolutions of South Carolina, declared that the Constitution does not recognize any such tribunal or political assemblage as a convention of the States, but has provided for modes of amendment, if amendment be necessary, in the fifth article; * * * "any other mode, therefore, must be repugnant to its provisions;" that any such convention "must be a convention of the people," "and not a convention of the States;"[6] and "that it is not expedient for Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments at this time."[7]

---

[1] Jameson, Constitutional Convention, p. 550. Tiedman, Unwritten Constitution, p. 42.

[2] Article by E. P. Smith in Jameson's Essays, p. 46.

[3] App., Nos. 125, 126.

[4] Senate Journal, Twenty-second Congress, second session, p. 83.

[5] App., Nos. 612a, 613–625.

[6] "That such a convention of the States, if assembled, could have no such power as that set forth by the resolutions of South Carolina."

[7] Senate Journal, Twenty-second Congress, second session, pp. 157–158. For Resolves of Massachusetts in disapproval to Resolves of South Carolina, see Resolves of Massachusetts, Vol. XIX, pp. 401–402; for report and reply of Massachusetts legislature disapproving of the Georgia resolutions, see ibid., pp. 411–423.

Again, in the sessions of Congress just previous to the rebellion, when there was a general desire that every means should be tried before resorting to a civil war, petitions from the legislatures of six States,[1] besides nine propositions from members of Congress, were received calling for a drafting convention.[2] On the invitation of Virginia, a peace convention was also held, at which commissioners from twenty-one States were present.[3] As a result of its work, the convention recommended to Congress a series of amendments to the Constitution.[4] In this same session of Congress, Mr. Florence of Pennsylvania offered the following singular amendment: "The reserved power of the people in three-fourths of the States to call and form a national convention to alter, amend, or abolish this Constitution, according to its provisions, shall never be questioned, notwithstanding the direction in Article V of the Constitution."[5]

Propositions for a convention were also offered at three different times during the period of the civil war, and again in 1866.[6] Of those presented during the course of the war, the first was introduced by Mr. Vallandigham, in 1861, the other two by Senator Davis of Kentucky, who proposed such a convention of the States for the purpose of bringing about the restoration of peace and the Union.[7]

---

[1] Virginia, Kentucky, New Jersey, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana. The convention in Missouri also approved of a similar course. Stephen, War between the States, II, p. 364.

[2] App., Nos. 812, 834, 835, 873, 895, 900, 908, 911, 931a, 941, 954, 970, 970a, 940a.

[3] App., No. 873. See ante, pars. 106, 107. Chittenden, Debates and Proceedings of the Peace Convention; McPherson, History of the Rebellion, pp. 67-70. Twenty-two States appointed commissioners, but several did not attend. Foster, Commentary on Constitution, I, p. 173.

[4] App., Nos. 917.

[5] App., No. 892.

[6] App., Nos. 972, 976, 1039a, 1115. The latter by Senator Lane of Kansas, for the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of calling a convention. The framers of the Confederate constitution, evidently profiting by the experience of the past, determined to make it easier to assemble a convention to amend. Provision was made that upon the demand of any three States legally assembled in their several conventions, the congress shall summon a convention of all the States to take into consideration such amendments as the said States shall concur in suggesting at the time when the said demand is made; the same to be submitted to the States for ratification, if agreed on by said convention, voting by States. Article V, of Confederate constitution. McPherson, History of the Rebellion, p. 99.

[7] App., No. 976, submitted in 1862, called for a convention to meet in Louisville, Ky., on the first Monday in April, 1863, to take into consideration the condition of the United States and the proper means for the restoration of the Union. Each State to send as many delegates as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. App., No. 1039a (1864), called for a convention for a similar purpose, and for the vindication of the Constitution, and the construction of additional and adequate guaranties of the rights and liberties of the people. He presented a series of propositions as the basis of a lasting settlement of all difficulties. See ante, par. 103.

Senator Ingalls, in 1876, in consequence of the disputed Presidential election in that year, introduced a resolution recommending the legislatures of the States to apply to Congress to call a convention to revise and amend the Constitution.[1] This resolution made full provision for the holding of the convention, and for the submission of the revised draft of the Constitution to a convention in each State, chosen by the people thereof.[2] In 1884 an attempt was made to create a commission to call a convention,[3] and as recently as 1886 a minority report of the Committee on Election of President and Vice-President suggested the recommendation of such a convention, owing to "the imperative necessity of a substantial change in the organic law," and the failure of Congress to give due consideration thereto.[4]

[1] App., No. 1429.

[2] This made provision for a convention composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. Two to be chosen by the legislature in each State, the others in the Congressional districts, but no person holding any office of profit or honor under any State or the United States to be eligible as a delegate. The convention should assemble at Columbus, Ohio, May 2, 1877, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to be the presiding officer. Said convention should revise the Constitution and report "such alterations and amendments in the nature of an entire instrument," which should be reported to the President of the United States, who should immediately submit the same to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, under recommendation of the legislature, for their assent and ratification.

[3] App., No. 1631. This resolution, after reciting the failure of Congress to recommend needed amendments, provided for the appointment of a commission of seventy-six persons by the President, composed of two persons from each State from different political parties, for the purpose of considering and proposing to the States the propriety of the legislatures of at least two-thirds of the States uniting in calling a convention on the 4th of July, 1887, for the purpose of proposing amendments to the Constitution.

[4] App., No. 1660. House Rep., No. 2493, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, p. 5. See ante, par. 35.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF BRIAN W. FITZGERALD, STUDENT AT THE ANTIOCH SCHOOL OF LAW, WASHINGTON, D.C.

THE COST OF A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, HOW MUCH? AND WHO PAYS?

One issue raised by the calling of a Federal constitutional convention which is often overlooked because of more heavily debated and contested issues involved, but one we certainly cannot afford to forget about, is the effect such a convention would have on the taxpayers of the United States. How much would a Federal constitutional convention cost the taxpayers and how and by whom would the expenses of the convention be paid?

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE COST ESTIMATE

The Congressional Budget Office estimates the cost of holding a Federal constitutional convention, at 1981 and 1983 cost levels, excluding the cost of a delegate election process, to be as the following table presents.

ESTIMATED COSTS

[In millions of dollars]

Type of expenditure	1981 price levels	1983 price levels
Salary and per diem for delegates	24.3	29.2
Air fare for delegates	.1	.2
Staff salaries and benefits	1.7	2.0
Other expenses	7.0	8.4
Total	33.1	39.8

In preparing this cost estimate, the Congressional Budget Office based the estimate primarily on the following assumptions: (1) the convention lasting 12 months; (2) the meeting taking place in Washington, D.C. or another city such as Chicago, Ill.; (3) the delegates apportioned from each State as that State is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress; and (4) the delegates receiving compensation for each day of the convention, plus per diem and one round-trip airfare between their homes and either Washington or Chicago.

The following explains the assumptions and data used by the Congressional Budget Office to determine the cost of each of the items found in the table. Except for the delegates' compensation, airfare and per diem, all costs are based on data for each type of expenditure obtained from the Democratic and Republican National Committees for the 1976 National Conventions, and from the States of Arkansas, Illinois, Louisiana, Montana, North Dakota, New Hampshire, Tennessee, and Texas for their state constitutional conventions.

1. Delegate salaries are assumed to be $2,300 per month.

2. Delegate per diem expenses are based on the rate currently allowed by the federal government for Washington, D.C. and Chicago.

3. Current airfares were used to estimate the cost of airfare for the delegates. The delegates, except for those residing near the convention city, were assumed to fly coach class from the capital city of their respective states to the convention city.

4. For the determination of the size of the convention staff it has been assumed, based on the experience of the eight States, that 35 core staff personnel will be required to organize and run the convention with an additional 50 people, (including, pages, stenographers, security staff, etc.) needed during the time the convention is in session. It is estimated that the core staff will need at least 3 months prior to the convention to make all necessary preparations, and to perform all advance legal and research work, etc., plus an additional month after the convention is adjourned to finalize administrative and procedural details. An average annual salary of $20,500 plus benefits has been used for the core staff, and $11,400 plus benefits for the additional convention staff.

To estimate other miscellaneous costs that would be involved, since the data collected for the Democratic and Republic National Conventions and the eight

State conventions are for varying lengths (anywhere from 4 days to 2 years) the relationship of their total compensation and benefits (including travel and per diem but excluding delegate salaries) to other costs was used to estimate the relationship for a Federal convention. Specifically, for these 10 different conventions, other expenses were approximatley 60 percent of total compensation and benefits. When applied to a Federal convention this would mean an additional 7 million at 1981 price levels.

In addition to the costs shown in the table, the election of the delegates would cost State and local governments approximately $120 million if a separate election was held in 1981 for this purpose. If the delegates were put on a general election ballot, the cost would be approximately $1 million and would be somewhat higher if put on the primary ballots, since some jurisdictions do not hold primaries and would have to do so for the purpose of electing convention delegates. According to the Federal Election Commission the cost of elections rises about 10 percent each year. Therefore, if the delegates were selected in 1983 through a separate election, the cost would be approximately $150 million; if put on a general ballot, the cost would be $1.5 million.

This estimate does not include the additional costs for the reservation and use of a convention meeting place. It has been assumed that if a convention was to be held in major hotel, the hotel would not charge for the use of its ballroom if it was going to house most of the delegates. (All housing costs of the delegates were included as a part of the per diem expenditures.) However, no major hotel would be able to tie up its ballroom facilities for a year without reservations having been made many years in advance. Thus, if arrangements for holding the convention in a major hotel were not made well in advance in order to secure their ballroom cost free, such an additional cost might have to be included in the total cost estimate. A ballroom in one of the major hotels in Washington would cost approximately $1,500 to $2,000 per day if no housing or meal services were provided.

It should be noted here that the Congressional Budget Office, in its discussions with the various managements of the major hotels in the Washington area, found that these hotels are somewhat less than enthusiastic about becoming involved with such a convention. Management seems to feel that the indefinite and possible extended duration poses a serious scheduling problem; one they feel may not be worth the notoriety of being the host of a national constitutional convention.

Other possibilities for a convention meeting site would be a facility owned by the Federal Government, such as the Department of Agriculture's Auditorium in Washington. The current charge for its use is $55 per hour, plus $14 per hour for technical service. It is most unlikely that local government facilities would be available for this convention. For instance, the City of Chicago is unlikely to donate the use of its convention halls for this purpose, even though it would make them available for such events as the Democratic National Convention, because of the potential duration of a Federal convention and the fact that a Federal convention would involve only approximately one-tenth the number of people. In other words, the convention does not have the potential revenue generating capacity for Chicago's various businesses in order to make it an attractive guest for the city's convention halls, particularly when the convention may possibly be a long term guest.

Most evidently, the cost of holding the convention will increase, due to inflation, the later the convention is held. Accordingly, the 1983 costs found in the table are based on the 1981 estimate adjusted for the Congressional Budget Office projection of the rate of increase in the consumer price index.

HISTORICAL PRECEDENT: WHO PAID FOR THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787

The delegates of the 1787 Convention[1] were paid by their respective states.[2]

The Constitutional Convention itself passed a resolution[3] on the 5th of September calling on the Continental Congress in New York to pay the Secretary, William Jackson, and the other officers of the Convention for their services.

[1] Max Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, Vol. III, App. B, pp. 557–559, (3rd ed. 1927).
[2] Id. at Vol. III. App. A, IV, XXXVIII, XLIII, XLIV, LII, LXI, XCIII; App. B, pp. 557–559.
[3] Id. at Vol. II, p. 510, 511.

"Resolved that the U.S. in Congress be requested to allow and cause to be paid to the Secretary and other officers of this Convention such sums in proportion to their respectives times of Service, as are allowed to the Secretary & similar officers of Congress."

"Ordered that the Secretary make out & transmit to the Treasury office of the U.S. an account for the said Services, & for the incidental expenses of this convention."

In addition to the above provisions for the payment of the delegates and other members' expenses, the Continental Congress, by resolution on the 23rd of April, 1787 gave all members the privilege of sending and receiving letters and packages free of postage.[4]

On the motion of Mr. Carrington seconded by Mr. Johnson Resolved That the priviledge of sending & receiving letters and packets free of postage be extended to the members of the Convention to be held in Philadelphia on the second Monday in May next in the same manner as is allowed to the members of Congress.—

TODAY: IN THE EVENT OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, WHO SHOULD PAY?

The alternatives for covering the costs of a federal constitutional convention are limited: either the federal government pays all expenses, the states divide up the costs or the federal government and the states somehow divide up the costs.

The first alternative, the federal government paying all the costs, is one provided for in the Senate bill S. 3.[5] S. 3 provides in section 8 (b) the following: "There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses of the convention." This approach is, as it appears, very straight forward and uncomplicated. The United States Congress would merely appropriate the necessary monies in order to cover all the costs of the convention.

The second option, as mentioned above, is one provided for in Senate bill S. 1710.[6] S. 1710 provides in section 8 (b) the following: "No federal funds may be appropriated specifically for the purposes of payment of the expenses of the convention." This would mean that the states would somehow have to share the costs of the convention. This approach poses two serious questions that are not addressed by S. 1710.

The first of which is how the cost would be apportioned among the States under the provision in S. 1710. Should each state share equally one-fiftieth of the total cost or should each State only be responsible for that percentage of its representation of the total number of delegates in attendance. For example: under the provisions for selection of delegates found in S. 3 and S. 1710, each state would be entitled to as many delegates as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. This would mean that under present circumstances, a total number of 485 delegates would be attending the convention. (The recent census may change the number of delegates in the near future.) Pursuant to the above mentioned provisions of S. 3 and S. 1710, Rhode Island would be entitled to only four delegates, while California would have 45 delegates. Rhode Island's four delegates represent only approximately .9 percent of the total number of delegates; California's 45 delegates represent approximately 9.2 percent of the total number. Should Rhode Island be expected to share equally with California, each paying one-fiftieth the total cost, when California would have more than 10 times the number of delegates and representation at the convention or should Rhode Island pay only .9 percent of the total cost and California pay 9.2 percent of the total? If the states are to be expected to cover the costs of the convention, as S. 1710 provides, this question will have to be addressed.

The second question that arises is one that is most fundamental and one never lacking in controversy: federalism and states' rights. In other words, how and under what authority can the federal government require the states to pay the costs of a national constitutional convention.

---

[4] Id. at Vol. III, App. A, V; Documentary History of the Constitution, IV, p. 121.

[5] S. 3. Senator Helms introduced the bill on Jan. 15, 1979. The bill was referred to the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Judiciary Committee on Feb. 27, 1979. No further action has been taken on the bill.

[6] S. 1710. Introduced by Senator Hatch on Sept. 5, 1979. No further action has been taken on the bill.

The other alternative method for paying the costs of a convention would be to somehow divide up the costs between the Federal Government and the States as was done in the 1787 Convention. This could be done in any number of different ways too numerous to be spelled out here. The main advantage of such an approach would be that it would be a middle of the road compromise between those persons who feel the Federal Government should pay and those who feel the states should cover the costs.

[The Washington Star, March 1, 1979]

GOVERNMENT UNIONS OPPOSE BALANCED BUDGET CONVENTION

(By Joseph Young)

Government employee unions have embarked on a battle they consider as vital to federal and postal workers as any they fought in the past.

The unions are seeking to block adoption of the constitutional amendment convention that would be called for the purpose of requiring a balanced federal budget.

Employee leaders believe such a constitutional convention could wipe out as many as 300,000 to 400,000 federal and postal jobs and reduce pay and fringe benefits of government workers.

In addition, they fear that such a constitutional convention would adopt other amendments harmful to government workers.

The AFL–CIO American Federation of Government Employees has instructed its membership throughout the country to campaign at state legislature levels and work with other groups to block ratification of the constitutional amendment. Already 28 of the 34 states required for ratification of such a constitutional amendment convention have voted their approval.

The AFL–CIO National Association of Letter Carriers has asked its membership to join other interested groups in lobbying at state levels to block the constitutional amendments from being approved.

Vincent Sombrotto, NALC president, and Tony Huerta, the union's executive vice president, told the membership:

"The real trouble is that such a convention would undoubtedly be dominated by right-wing activists and nothing could prevent the delegates from considering extremist issues such as 'Right to Work,' uniting the federal retirement program with Social Security, repeal of the income tax, and turning the Postal Service to private enterprise."

Government employee leaders emphasize that such a convention would not only eliminate hundreds of thousands of government jobs, it also would eliminate many valuable and necessary publice services.

The NALC charged such action would "seriously threaten national security, increase unemployment and induce a national depression."

* * * * * * *

GOLDWATER V. CARTER:[1] ITS IMPLICATIONS FOR JUSTICIABILITY ISSUES IN THE CONVENTION METHOD OF AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

(By Kenneth F. Ripple*)

A. INTRODUCTION

On December 13, 1979, the Supreme Court of the United States decided, in summary fashion, the challenge of certain members of Congress to the President's unilateral decision to terminate the United States' Mutual Defense Treaty with the Republic of China. The Court's three and one-quarter line order simply recites that the petition for certiorari is granted, the judgment of the Court of Appeals[2] is vacated and the case is remanded to the District Court[3] wih directions to dis-

[1] 48 U.S.L.W. 3402 (U.S. Dec. 13, 1979) (No. 79–856).

*Associate Professor of Law, University of Notre Dame. A.B. Fordham University; J.D. University of Virginia; LL.M. George Washington University. The writer gratefully acknowledges the assistance of Miss Mollie A. Murphy, '80, Notre Dame Law School.

[2] Goldwater v. Carter, No. 79–2246 (D.C.Cir. Nov. 30, 1979) (en banc).

[3] Goldwater v. Carter, No. 78–2412 (D.D.C. Oct. 17, 1979).

miss the complaint. The Court thus leaves us, quite deliberately, with no precedent at any level of judicial review either on the important threshold questions of justiciability or on the merits of the dispute. However, two members of the Court filed statements addressing various aspects of the justiciability issue. The purpose of this short paper is to relate these recent statements by members of the Court on the question of justiciability to the question of whether Congressional determinations pursuant to its responsibilities under Article V's convention method are reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States.

B. THE STATEMENTS

1. Mr. Justice Powell

Writing only for himself, Mr. Justice Powell viewed the substantive issue as basically involving "the allocation of power between the President and the Congress * * *" [4] In his judgment, that matter was not ripe since those two branches had not yet reached "a constitutional impasse." [5] Neither the House nor the Senate had definitely rejected the President's position. Justice Powell concluded: "If the Congress chooses not to confront the President, it is not our task to do so." [6] The Justice made it clear, however, that, in the event of such a constitutional impasse, "it would be the duty of * * * [the] * * * Court to resolve the issue." [7] He found no "'textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political branch'" [8] since "[n]o constitutional provision explicitly confers upon the President the power to terminate treaties." [9] Moreover, the question could be resolved by the application of "normal principles of interpretation to the constitutional provisions at issue" [10] without "an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for non-judicial discretion." [11] Such judicial action does not imply, he argued, "lack of respect for a coordinate branch" [12] since it would eliminate, not create, multiple constitutional interpretations.

2. Mr. Justice Rehnquist

Writing for himself, the Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Stewart, and Mr. Justice Stevens (one vote short of a majority), Mr. Justice Rehnquist took the position that the case presented a political question. The Justice argued that his conclusion followed a fortiori from the holding in Coleman v. Miller.[13] Central to his analysis was Chief Justice Hughes' observation in Coleman that Article V contains no explicit provision concerning rejection of an amendment by a state legislature and that Congress therefore retained final authority to decide whether "by lapse of time its proposal of the amendment had lost its vitality prior to the required ratifications." [14] The Constitution is similarly silent on the manner in which a treaty is to be terminated, Justice Rehnquist noted, and, since "different termination procedures may be appropriate for different treaties," [15] the matter "'must surely be controlled by political standards.'" [16] Indeed, he added, the justification for such a conclusion is even greater here since the matter involved the conduct of foreign relations. The steel seizure case, Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer [17] could be distinguished on the ground that that suit involved a challenge to the President's authority by private litigants, while, in this case, the dispute was between "coequal branches of our government, each of which has resources available to protect and assert its interests, resources not available to private litigants outside the judicial forum." [18]

---

[4] Goldwater v. Carter, 48 U.S.L.W. at 3402.
[5] Id.
[6] Id.
[7] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403.
[8] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3402, quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).
[9] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3402.
[10] Id.
[11] See note 8 supra.
[12] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403, citing Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 548 (1969).
[13] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
[14] Id. at 456.
[15] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403.
[16] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403, quoting Dyer v. Blair, 390 F.Supp. 1291, 1302 (N.D. Ill. 1975).
[17] 343 U.S. 579 (1952).
[18] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403. On an accompanying footnote, Mr. Justice Rehnquist quoted at length from the opinion of Chief Judge Wright (joined by Judge Tamm) in the Court of Appeals which catalogued the political tools of retaliation possessed by the Congress. Judge Wright concluded: "As our political history demonstrates, treaty creation and termination are complex phenomena rooted in the dynamic relationship between the two political branches of our government." Slip opinion at p. 13.

C. ANALYSIS

Our task is to assess the import of these statements on the issue of whether congressional determinations with respect to the convention method of amendment are justiciable. From that perspective, it would be quite easy to read too much into these statements. First, a general caveat is indicated. As Justices Blackmun and White most pointedly noted,[19] the writings in this case are not the product of the usual deliberative process reserved for cases taken for plenary review. Certainly, the level of analysis manifested in the statements of Mr. Justice Powell and Mr. Justice Rehnquist are not the equals of other efforts on comparable topics by the same authors.[20] Quite simply, these writings were forged in a "hydraulic pressure" [21] not present in deliberations on a case heard and decided in due course.

With that general caution noted, it is possible to cull from the statement of Mr. Justice Rehnquist a limited amount of relevant analysis. Certainly, his reliance on Coleman does seem to establish that at least four Justices of the present Court are willing to accept the holding of Coleman that Congress alone may accept or reject a state's ratification of a proposed amendment. These same Justices would apparently reject Justice Powell's comment [22] that Coleman can be limited to circumstances where the particular proposed amendment would overrule a decision of the Court. More significantly, these Justices would apparently reject the view that absence of a textual provision covering Congressional rejection of a petition for convention or a proposed amendment or the failure of Congress to act makes the matter any less a political question. It appears that they would consider such issues committed to another branch of government (and thus not judicially manageable in the sense of the Baker v. Carr [23] criteria) as long as the subject matter was clearly committed by the text to the exclusive control of that other branch. Such a structural approach to constitutional interpretation, especially in the area of separation of powers, is certainly not novel [24] and has, indeed, a certain common sense quality.

Mr. Justice Rehnquist's statement takes the further position that Goldwater is actually a stronger case for the application of the political question doctrine than Coleman since it deals with foreign affairs, a matter which he is willing to accept as a traditional area of Executive exclusivity.[25] Here, Justice Rehnquist ignores the crucial fact that, in Goldwater, the Court was confronted with a question of allocating power between two branches of government, a task which, as Mr. Justice Powell notes, the Court has been quite able to undertake in some contexts and where it has performed the important function of preserving the separation of powers by the allocation of power.[26] On the other hand, Coleman and situations posed by the pending constitutional convention procedures bill do not involve a dispute between two branches of the Federal Government. Rather they require the Court to second-guess a judgment which it has already found to be the exclusive prerogative of one other branch. Arguably, in this latter situation, there is far less need for the Court to act and a far greater possibility of unresolved "multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question." [27]

Since Justice Powell relies so heavily on the duty of the Court to arbitrate interbranch disputes over the allocation of power, it is difficult to assess how his remarks bear on the justiciability of Congressional determinations with respect to the convention method of amending the constitution. As noted, supra, cases arising under the procedures bill would not involve allocating power between two branches of government. They would, however, involve fact-specific review of Congressional action or inaction. Such litigation would be quite

---

[19] These Justices filed a short statement indicating that they would not have decided the case without plenary consideration, including oral argument.

[20] See, e.g., Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490 (1975).

[21] Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U.S. 197, 401 (1904) (dissenting opinion of Holmes, J.).

[22] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403, n. 2.

[23] 369 U.S. at 217.

[24] See, e.g., United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 703–713 (1974); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 634 (1952) (concurring opinion of Jackson, J.).

[25] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403, citing United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 315 (1936).

[26] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3403, citing Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 138 (1976); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 707 (1974); The Pocket Veto Case, 279 U.S. 655, 676–678 (1929); Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926).

[27] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. at 217.

analogous to the example of a non-justiciable controversy which Mr. Justice Powell offers in Goldwater—the review of a President's decision to act or not to act pursuant to a treaty provision in a given situation.[28]

D. CONCLUSION

Goldwater deals with a justiciability question quite different from the one which is posed by current legislative proposals purporting to make Congressional determinations with respect to a constitution convention reviewable in the courts. Goldwater involves an interbranch dispute; the latter situations would not. It is clear from Goldwater, however, that at least four Justices appear disposed to follow a structural rather than literal approach in deciding if a given activity is committed to the exclusive care of another branch. Moreover, at least five Justices seem ready to declare non-justiciable any dispute calling for a fact-specific review of a determination which another branch clearly had the prerogative to make alone. These developments make the justiciability of Congressional determinations under a convention procedures bill even more suspect than they appeared before Goldwater. They reemphasize the Court's reassessment in recent years of the proper role of the judiciary in resolving policy matters which the Constitutional scheme leaves to the more democratically responsive branches.

---

[28] 48 U.S.L.W. at 3402.

Is There a Constitutional Convention in Your Future?

By Tom Dybdahl

Financial D 7 ...nadio

...SDAY, JULY 2, 1981 Subscription Rates See Box A2 25c

First Amendment Repealed

July 2, 1981—The National Constitutional Convention, meeting this week in Kansas City, voted today to repeal the First Amendment to the Constitution and replace it with a more restricted statement permitting free speech and free exercise of religion only within well-defined guidelines.

As currently written, the First Amendment places no restrictions on freedom of speech, freedom of the press, or the free exercise of religion, and guarantees the separation of church and state, as well as the right of the people to assemble peaceably.

"We wish to make it clear," a spokesman for the convention said, "that we are not opposed to these freedoms. But unless there are some limits, freedom of speech and freedom of religious practice can become tyranny by tiny minorities. We are in danger of being destroyed by those who promote unorthodox and dangerous ideas under the guise of 'exercising their constitutional rights.'"

The spokesman said further that the convention's decision "was not a negative action abolishing important rights, but a positive action that will bring about constructive and necessary changes in our society. We need to get back to the faith of our founders."

When asked about specific recommendations the convention had discussed, the spokesman said, "There have been no final decisions, but the guidelines will likely include required prayer in public schools and a national day of worship." A definite announcement is expected at the convention's closing session on July 4.

Tomorrow's news story? Probably not. An impossible fantasy? Certainly not. It could become a reality if the accelerating effort to call a constitutional convention is successful.

By early 1980, 30 state legislatures—four short of the required two thirds—had passed resolutions asking Congress to call a constitutional convention to approve an amendment requiring a balanced federal budget. The National Taxpayers Union, which is spearheading the drive for the convention, predicts they'll have the 34 states necessary to convene a convention before the year is over.

But what is the connection between an effort to force the federal government to balance its budget and our First Amendment rights? Is there really any potential danger from a constitutional convention (sometimes abbreviated con-con)?

When the Founding Fathers approved the Constitution, they recognized that changes might be needed. Congress was given the right to make amendments subject to the approval of three quarters of the states. Article V, however, provides that a constitutional convention shall be called when two thirds of the state legislatures petition Congress for one. Alexander Hamilton, writing in The Federalist, No. LXXXV, reinforced this point: "The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress shall call a convention.'" (Italics supplied.) As with congressional amendments, any amendment proposed by a convention requires approval from three fourths of the states.

In addition to calling a convention, Congress has the responsibility of deciding such secondary but crucial matters as how many delegates shall attend, how they shall be chosen, and the manner in which each state is to be represented.

After that, however, the situation becomes much less clear and much more ominous. Can Congress, for instance, set boundaries for a con-con by specifying what issues it may properly consider? If Congress does impose guidelines, must the convention honor them and stick to the specific issue(s) for which it was called, or may it consider other matters, as well?

Most of those who favor a con-con claim that fear of a freewheeling convention—such as one that might repeal all or part of the Bill of Rights—is preposterous. They have no less a dig-

---

Tom Dybdahl is an assistant editor, book division, Rodale Press, Emmaus, Pennsylvania.

"When the Constitution was first framed I predicted that it would last fifty years. I was mistaken. But I was mistaken only in point of time. The crash will come, but not quite so quick as I thought."

—Ascribed to Aaron Burr, circa 1835, in Life and Times of Aaron Burr (1858), by James Parton.

ure than former U.S. Attorney General Griffin Bell on their side. "Limits can be set," he has said. "Congress has a duty to do so."

But others are less certain. Howard Jarvis, the antispending crusader who led the fight for California's Proposition 13, warned that in a constitutional convention "every radical crackpot or special-interest group would have the chance to write the supreme law of the land." Congressman Barber Conable (R-N.Y.) says such a gathering would be a kind of "constitutional Russian roulette."

Such fears are not entirely unfounded. The precedent of the only other constitutional convention, which met in Philadelphia in 1787, is somewhat less than reassuring. It was assigned the job of amending the Articles of Confederation. What it did—and perfectly legally—was to abandon that document completely and write another, very different, charter. That could happen again.

The prospect has given rise to all kinds of fantasies. Amendments on several subjects are currently pending before Congress. Many people would like to reinstate school prayer. A considerable number of very determined people would like to see a constitutional amendment that would prohibit abortion. (At this writing 15 states have called for a con-con on that issue.) What would prevent a delegate from putting forward one of these amendments at a constitutional convention gathered to consider the federal budget?

Of course, Congress can call a con-con and limit its subject. However, the convention could then—legally—declare itself superior to Congress and ignore any limitations that had been set (as did the 1787 convention). It could also—for good measure—vote to amend the Constitution to eliminate the Supreme Court. And no rules approved by one Congress would necessarily be binding on any other Congress or on the convention.

Even if Congress could successfully limit a convention's powers, how could the debate be focused? Various states have approved different resolutions, some very short and general, others long and specific. The one approved in Delaware calls for a convention only if the other states approve a resolution identical to Delaware's; no other state has yet done so.

Another approach could be to limit the convention to a single subject, such as the federal budget. But in that case, those who favor school prayer could propose that no federal funds go to states that don't permit prayer in public schools. Or antiabortionists could offer an amendment cutting off welfare funds to any state that allowed abortion.

If, as proponents sometimes suggest, Congress is fearful of a con-con, the convention strategy might be just the prod needed to get the legislators moving. This has happened before. Both the Seventeenth Amendment, providing for the direct election of Senators, and the Twenty-first, repealing prohibition, were passed after drives for special conventions were under way. Conservative Columnist William Safire believes that this is, in fact, the purpose of Article V. It was, he says, "provided by the Founding Fathers as a way of lighting a fire under Congress if the government in Washington did not prove sensitive to the will of most of the states."

According to this scenario, Congress would short-circuit a constitutional convention by passing its own amendment. The problem here is that while many members of Congress would like to balance the budget, and while they love to tell their constituents about their efforts in this regard, there is a limited amount of support for an iron-clad amendment requiring it.

Supporters of a con-con say discussions of possible dangers from such a convention are just a way of dodging the real issue—the need for a balanced budget. They point to opinion polls that show that 70 percent of Americans want a balanced budget, along with some sort of law requiring one. Even if the convention is wide open, they say, there is nothing to fear. California Governor Jerry Brown, a leading con-con advocate, argues that "the idea that the American people want to junk the Bill of Rights is absurd."

Most people would agree that repeal of the First Amendment—or any other part of the Bill of Rights—is highly unlikely. At the same time, an unlimited convention could work other sorts of serious mischief. The judgment of "the people" may generally be good, but we all have lapses. Consider the fact that less than thirty years ago an amendment was seriously proposed that would have set aside the First Amendment and replaced it with the assertion that "this nation devoutly recognizes the authority and law of Jesus Christ, Saviour and Ruler of Nations, through whom are bestowed the blessings of Almighty God." Noble as that sentiment may be, America would be in real trouble if that were, in fact, our First Amendment!

Most of those who support a constitutional convention believe they are acting in the best interests of their country. They are not part of a plot to deprive us of any of our freedoms, including religious ones. But history confirms that good intentions are not enough. A constitutional convention, whatever its merits, offers the possibility of serious problems. For those of us who cherish all our rights, it is a possibility better avoided. □

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF CONGRESSIONAL DETERMINATIONS PURSUANT TO THE CONVENTION METHOD OF AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

(By Kenneth F. Ripple*)

SUMMARY

Recent holdings of the Supreme Court dealing with various aspects of justiciability have further clouded the issue of whether Congressional determinations pursuant to the Article V amendment procedures are justiciable. Certainly, the provisions of S. 1710 do not create a scheme particularly compatible with the constitutional policy concerns most frequently articulated by the Court in its recent decisions.

INTRODUCTION

The constitutional and practical feasibility of providing for judicial review of Congressional action with respect to the calling of a federal constitutional convention [1] has been discussed rather frequently in the literature.[2] This presentation will not attempt to plough that ground again. Rather, it will identify, in light of recent trends in Supreme Court case law, the arguments which ought to serve as the focus of the current debate over the proposed constitutional procedures legislation.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONSIDERATIONS FAVORING JUDICIAL REVIEW

Setting aside, for the moment, the particular language of this bill, it must be stated at the outset that a significant and respected portion of the legal community clearly favors limited judicial review of Congressional action with respect to a constitutional convention. For instance, the Report of the ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee addressed the matter rather extensively and, pursuant to that Report, the House of Delegates resolved that "[a]ny Congressional legislation dealing with such a process for amending the Constitution should provide for limited judicial review of Congressional determinations concerning a constitutional convention." [3]

Indeed, the ABA Study Committee Report probably sets forth the case in favor of a provision for judicial review in a convention procedures bill most succinctly:

1. Although, in each case, the matter arose in a context other than the actual proposal and ratification procedure, the courts have already adjudicated many questions which would arise in legislative action pursuant to a convention procedures bill: [4]

a. Whether Congress may choose the "state legislature" method of ratification for proposed amendments which expand federal power; [5]

b. Whether a proposed amendment requires the approval of the President; [6]

c. Whether Congress may fix a reasonable time for ratification of a proposed amendment by state legislatures; [7]

d. whether the states may restrict the power of the legislatures to ratify amendments or submit the decision to a popular referendum; [8]

e. the meaning of the requirement of a two-thirds vote of both Houses.[9]

---

*Associate Professor of Law, University of Notre Dame and Director, Thomas and Alberta White Center for Law, Government and Human Rights, University of Notre Dame. The author gratefully acknowledges the assistance of Raymond M. Ripple, Esquire of the Connecticut Bar and Miss Mollie A. Murphy, his student assistant. The author is solely responsible for the opinions expressed herein.

[1] U.S. Const. Article V.

[2] See, e.g., ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, Amendment of the Constitution by the Convention Method Under Article V (1974) thereinafter ABA Report); Proposals for a Constitutional Convention to Require a Balanced Budget (AEI 1979); Note, "The Process of Constitutional Amendment," 79 Col. L. Rev. 108, 138–172 (1979); Note, "Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution," 85 Harv. L. Rev. 1612 (1972).

[3] ABA Report vii–viii.

[4] But see Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922) (official notice of ratification conclusive on the courts), Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126 (1922) (a citizen may not institute suit in federal court to obtain indirectly an advisory opinion on the validity of an amendment.)

[5] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

[6] Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall) 378 (1798).

[7] Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[8] Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

[9] National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920).

2. The subsequent case of Coleman v. Miller[10] placed in doubt whether all of the foregoing issues remain justiciable.[11] However, Coleman itself may have been significantly restricted by the Court's later decisions in Baker v. Carr,[12] and Powell v. McCormack.[13] Arguably, the rationale of Powell, with its strong emphasis on the interest of voters in having the person they elect take a seat in Congress, would also control a situation where Congress refused to call a convention despite the requisite number of petitions. Clearly, the convention method was meant to permit the states, expressing the will of the people, to bring about change despite congressional opposition.[14] Baker, moreover, may suggest that, despite dicta to the contrary in Powell,[15] the Court, in vindicating such a frustration of the popular will, need not restrict itself to declaratory relief but might fashion a more extensive remedy.[16]

CONSTITUTIONAL CONSIDERATIONS AGAINST JUDICIAL REVIEW

1. The case against the justiciability of Congressional decisions in the convention amendment procedure must begin with the reality of Coleman v. Miller[17] which, while ambiguous on the actual scope of its rationale, charts attitudinally a course of judicial non-involvement.[18] Coleman can be read as acknowledging that the amending process by convention involves, in the words of Baker, a "textually demonstrable commitment"[19] to another branch. Moreover, if the Court is required to second-guess the decision of Congress as to whether the petitions deal with the same general topic, the possibility for head-to-head confrontation with the Congress in an area devoid of real standards would be acute.[20] Baker itself can be distinguished on the ground that it did not involve a confrontation with a coordinate branch of the federal government but rather involved the obligation to enforce federal constitutional standards upon nonconforming state action. Powell, of course, did involve Congressional action. The Court acted, however, only after it was convinced that there was not a textually demonstrable commitment of the question to a coordinate branch and then only when it was clear that simple declaratory relief would suffice.

2. More importantly, in the years following the ABA Study Committee Report, the Court had several occasions to examine further the concept of justiciability. Significantly, these cases involved constitutional provisions which, like Article V, deal with institutional responsibilities and not individual rights. These cases manifiest, at least at the hands of the present Court, a distinct propensity to acknnowledge the right and responsibility of the other branches to interpret definitively such clauses. For instance, in United States v. Richardson,[21] the

---

[10] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[11] In the words of the ABA Report (p. 21–22): In Coleman, the Court held that a group of state legislators who had voted not to ratify the child labor amendment had standing to question the validity of their state's ratification. Four Justices dissented on this point. The Court held two questions non-justiciable: the issue of undue time lapse for ratification and the power of a state legislature to ratify after having first rejected ratification. In reading these conclusions, the Court pointed to the absence of criteria either in the Constitution or a statute relating to the ratification process. The four Justices who dissented on standing concurred on non-justiciability. They felt, however, that the Court should have disapproved Dillon v. Gloss insofar as it decided judicially that seven years is a reasonable period of time for ratification, stating that Article V gave control of the amending process to Congress and that the process was "political in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point." Even though the calling of a convention is not precisely within these time limits and the holding in Coleman is not broad, it is not at all surprising that commentators read that case as bringing Article V issues generally within the rubric of "political questions."

[12] 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[13] 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

[14] ABA Report pp. 23–24.

[15] 395 U.S. at 517–518.

[16] ABA Report p. 24.

[17] See note 10, supra. See also Chandler v. Wise, 307 U.S. 474 (1939).

[18] See note 11, supra.

[19] 369 U.S. at 217.

[20] In addition to "a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment . . . to a coordinate political department," Baker lists the following criteria as relevant for ascertaining the presence of a "political question": a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a courts undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment for multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question. 369 U.S. at 217.

[21] 418 U.S. 166 (1974).

Court held that a private citizen did not have standing to maintain an action for the enforcement of the Accounts Clause [22] since he could show no "particular concrete injury" [23] from Congress' refusal to enforce the Clause against the Central Intelligence Agency.[24] Replying on Ex parte Lévitt,[25] the Court readily acknowledge that [i]t can be argued that if respondent is not permitted to litigate this issue, no one can do so. In a very real sense, the absense of any particular individual or class to litigate these claims gives support to the argument that the subject is committed to the surveillance of Congress, and ultimately to the political process.[26]

Mr. Justice Powell's concurring opinion [27] manifested an even greater reluctance to involve the Court in such matters. Speaking of the power of judicial review, he wrote:

"The irreplaceable value of the power (of judicial review) lies in the protection it has afforded the constitutional rights and liberties of individual citizens and minority groups against oppressive or discriminatory government action. It is this role, not some amorphous general supervision of the operations of government, that has maintained public esteem for the federal courts and has permitted the peaceful coexistence of the countermajoritarian implications of judicial review and the democratic principles upon which our Federal Government in the final analysis rests." [28]

Significantly, on the same day, the Court addressed the question of whether a citizen could judicially challenge Congress' non-enforcement of the provisions of the Incompatibility Clause [29] against its own members. [30] Again, the Court declined to entertain the issue, noting that to allow such a suit would "distort the role of the Judiciary in its relationship to the Executive and the Legislature and open the Judiciary to an arguable charge of providing "'government by injunction.'" [31]

It may be argued that, since the foregoing cases deal essentially with the concept of standing, they are inapposite to a determination of whether a particular issue raises a "political question." However, as Chief Justice Warren pointed out in Flast v. Cohen, [32] both of these concepts, standing and political question, have common constitutional roots in the "case or controversy" requirement of Article III. In both situations, the Court must ultimately focus on whether the dispute presents a matter capable of judicial resolution. The common root of these concepts is perhaps best illustrated by one of the cases which reached the Court in the aftermath of the tragedy of Kent State, Gilligan v. Morgan.[33] There the Court held that a request to submit the training and operations of the Ohio National Guard to continuing federal judicial scrutiny was non-justiciable. That conclusion, noted the Court, could be articulated either as a lack of standing or as a political question requiring judicial scrutiny of a subject committed expressly by the Constitution "to a coordinate political department" [34] because of the mandate of the Militia Clause.[35]

Therefore, in the years following the last careful review of Article V in the ABA Report, the Court has demonstrated an increased reluctance to define the constitutional limitations of judicial power so as to require judicial monitoring of the institutional responsibilities of the coordinate branches. At the very least, there is an increased doubt that the reasoning of Baker and Powell affords a realistic basis upon which to premise a statutory judicial review procedure of Congressional determinations pursuant to its responsibilities under Article V.

---

[22] U.S. Const. Art. I, sec. 9, cl. 7.
[23] 418 U.S. at 177.
[24] The Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949, 63 Stat. 208, 50 U.S.C. § 403a et seq. permitted the CIA to account for its expenditures "solely on the certificate of the Director. . . ." 50 U.S.C. § 403j (b).
[25] 302 U.S. 633 (1937).
[26] 418 U.S. at 179.
[27] Id. at 180–197.
[28] Id. at 192.
[29] U.S. Const. Art. I, sec. 6, cl. 2.
[30] Schlesinger v. Reservists Committee to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208 (1974).
[31] Id. at 222.
[32] 392 U.S. 83, 95 (1968). See also Association of Data Processing Service Organizations, Inc. v. Camp, 397 U.S. 150 (1970). There is also a non-constitutional, prudential element to justiability questions which is not of immediate concern here. See Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499 (1975). See generally Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 346–356 (1936) (concurring opinion of Brandeis, J.).
[33] 413 U.S. 1 (1973).
[34] See note 19, supra.
[35] U.S. Const. Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 16.

A CRITIQUE OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION IN LIGHT OF THE FOREGOING CONSIDERATIONS

The bill under consideration is S 1710, 96th Congress, 1st Session. As submitted, section 15 would provide:

"SEC. 15. (a) Any State aggrieved by any determination or finding, or by any failure of Congress to make a determination or finding within the periods provided, under section 6 or section 11 of this Act may bring an action in the Supreme Court of the United States against the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives or, where appropriate, the Administrator of General Services, and such other parties as may be necessary to afford the relief sought. Such an action shall be given priority on the Court's docket.

"(b) Every claim arising under this Act shall be barred unless suit is filed thereon within sixty days after such claim first arises.

"(c) The right to review by the Supreme Court provided under subsection (a) does not limit or restrict the right to judicial review of any other determination or decision made under this Act of such review as is otherwise provided by the Constitution or any other law of the United States."

The foregoing discussion makes clear that a judicial review procedure has the best possibility of surviving judicial scrutiny if it can be characterized as essentially an effort "to strengthen the political system by assuring a higher level of fairness and responsiveness to the political processes." [36] Cast in this light, a provision might be justified on the rationale of Baker. Such a characterization could, moreover, gather a good deal of legitimacy from the fact that the "convention method" of amendment was designed to permit the people to circumvent a Congress which was frustrating the popular will.[37] The bill in question contains several features which appear to detract from the possibility of sustaining such a characterization. While a specific legislative grant of standing to initiate an action is no doubt viewed with favor by the courts,[38] the right to initiate the action is here vested in the states. Arguably, the states need not resort to the judiciary for protection against the Congress since the Constitution specifically provides them with representation in each House.[39] Moreover, the possibility of a finding of non-justiciability is probably increased somewhat by the bill's invocation of the Court's original jurisdiction.[40] Traditionally, the Court appears to have been especially sensitive to the problem of non-justiciability in cases coming within its original jurisdiction.[41] Moreover, as the ABA noted, "[i]nitiation of suit in the Supreme Court necessarily escalates the level of the controversy without regard to the significance of the basic dispute." [42]

Perhaps, more importantly, the proposed section would apparently require the Court to determine the correctness of the Congressional determination that the requisite number of state petitions deal "with the same general subject" [43] or that an amendment proposed by the convention "differs from or was not included as one of the general subjects named or described in the current resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called." [44] Such a judgment might easily involve "judicial review of substantive political judgments entrusted to the coordinate branches of government." [45] It is not at all clear that,

---

[36] 413 U.S. at 11.

[37] See Feerick, "Amending the Constitution Through Convention," 60 ABA J. 285, 287 (1974).

[38] See, e.g., Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 500 (1975).

[39] Cf. Massachusetts v. United States, 435 U.S. 444 (1978). (plurality opinion of Brennan, J.) (relying on Chief Justice Marshall's famous dictum in McCullough v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) at 427, he justifies the narrow scope of a state's immunity from federal taxation on the ground that federal tax policy is the product of the national Congress which, in turn, is composed of state constituencies). But see National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833, 841 n. 12 (1976) (expressing the view that a state's representation in the national legislature is not a sufficient guarantee of its amendment X autonomy against federal use of the Commerce Power).

[40] U.S. Const. Art. III, sec. 2, cl. 2.

[41] See, e.g., Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 483–485 (1923) : Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475 (1866) : Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. 50 (1867). See generally, Stern and Gressman, Supreme Court Practice 5th ed. 610. But see National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920) where the Court apparently assumed jurisdiction in two cases seeking an injunction against the enforcement of criminal statutes enacted pursuant to the Eighteenth Amendment. These cases were decided prior to Coleman v. Miller, note 10 supra, and involved a post facto determination of the validity of the Amendment's ratification procedures. The Court was not asked to interject itself into the actual conduct of those procedures.

[42] ABA Report 25.

[43] Slip bill p. 5, sec. 6.

[44] Id. at 10, sec. 11.

[45] 413 U.S. at 11.

in attempting to fulfill its designated function under this bill, the Court could limit itself to the sort of declaratory relief which sufficed in Powell.[46] The Court could, therefore, find itself in the embarrassing situation of being totally unable to enforce its decision.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE,
WASHINGTON BUREAU,
Washington, D.C., January 9, 1980.

Mr. JOHN MINOR,
Office of Senator Edward Kennedy,
2237 Russell Senate Office Building,

DEAR MR. MINOR: I am enclosing a copy of NAACP's resolution opposing a constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget.

Sincerely yours,

ALTHEA T. L. SIMMONS,
Director, Washington Bureau.

Enclosure.

NAACP 70TH ANNUAL CONVENTION RESOLUTIONS, JUNE 25–29, 1979, LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY

. . .

7. OPPOSITION TO CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION FOR BALANCED BUDGET

Whereas, there is a national climate of negativism and retrenchment towards civil rights generally, and organized groups are attempting to repeal hard-won civil rights gains of black people by instituting fiscal austerity measures that reduce governmental funding of programs which provide for the essential health, education, employment, and welfare of the poor and black citizenry ; and

Whereas, there is now an effort to have the requisite two-thirds of the states to convene a Federal Constitutional Convention for the alleged purpose of amending the United States Constitution in order to require a "Balanced Federal Budget" ; and,

Whereas, a Constitutional Amendment to so balance the Federal Budget would have disastrous and deleterious consequences for the poor, by endangering Federal funding of social and other programs presently aiding poor and black people, and distressed areas of our nation ; and

Whereas, such a convention process is unprecedented, and is likely to be fraught with political posturing, various agendas, and constitutional uncertainty ; and,

Whereas, there is the danger that a Constitutional Convention would be so open-ended a process that amendments might be proposed undermining basic civil rights and civil liberties protections ; and,

Whereas, the Constitutional Convention is NOT an appropriate mechanism for dealing with the problem of inflation, which hurts the poor as well as the rich ; and,

Whereas, there is no way to insure proper black representation at such a convention ; and,

Whereas, there is no way to insure that such a convention would not infringe on civil rights decisions of the courts, based on the Fourteenth Amendment, which have aided and advanced the rights of black people, therefore be it

Resolved, That the NAACP is unalterably opposed to the convening of a Constitutional Convention and call upon its branches, youth councils, members and friends to work promptly and diligently to urge state legislatures either to disapprove of such application for the convening of a convention, or where such measures have passed it urge its units to work for recision by the legislatures of resolutions calling for the convening of such a convention.

---

[46] See note 15, supra.

National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs

RESOLUTION #5

Adopted at the Boston Convention, July 24, 1979

Whereas, There are existing proposals to call a Constitutional Convention covering a variety of subjects or concerns, and

Whereas, The conventional method of state ratification of an amendment to the U.S. Constitution, upon proposal by Congress, has worked satisfactorily to achieve 26 amendments to the Constitution over the entire period since 1789, and

Whereas, No guidelines currently exist as to the convening method, necessary majority, or subjects to be covered, and

Whereas, The National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc. is dedicated to action necessary to protect and insure the basic rights and liberties of the Constitution; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc. go on record opposing a Constitutional Convention; and be it further

Resolved, That in the event of the introduction in Congress of measures calling for such Constitutional Convention, the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc. urge Congress to call a National Conference of representatives of prominent, concerned National Organizations to participate in the establishment of appropriate criteria and parameters for the calling of such a Constitutional Convention; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Member of Congress within thirty (30) days of the conclusion of this Convention.

[Report No. F–7 New York County Lawyers' Association Committee on Federal Legislation June 1979]

REPORT ON THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES ACT

RECOMMENDATION: DISAPPROVAL

S. 520, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. (1979) and similar legislation has been introduced designed to clarify questions arising out of applications by states for convening a constitutional convention pursuant to Article V of the Constitution of the United States.

It is widely assumed that such clarification is automatically desirable, or even mandated by due respect for the Constitutional provision invoked.

However, the Constitutional provision does not expressly require or even provide for implementing legislation. Indeed, the fact that it is not contained in Article I, concerning the powers of Congress, may indicate that legislative implementation, apart from actually calling a constitutional convention in a proper case, is not contemplated.[1]

Moreover, there may be serious dangers to making decisions in advance concerning how applications for a convention under different circumstances ought to be treated. There is always some risk, of course, in all decisions by society concerning how problems that have not yet reached fruition should be handled. This risk is increased where the uncertainty surrounding the circumstances involved, and the consequences of the decisions to be made, may be frought with important dangers.

Specifically, serious questions might well be presented in a given instance concerning whether or not a given series of applications are identical or within a sufficiently close time period to be counted, whether the rescission of an application is effective, and whether under all of the circumstances involved Article V requires the calling of a constitutional convention. A strong argument can be made that attempts to precommit Congress to a particular course of action, beyond whatever is contained in the text of Article V itself, are unwise.

The question of whether a convention should be called is expressly confided to Congress. This may well refer to the Congress sitting at the time, not a prior Congress attempting to deal with contingencies in advance. An attempt by one Congress to bind future Congresses may not be binding.

The decisions of the courts appear to indicate that a matter such as the calling of a constitutional convention is a political question.[2] The Framers, by confiding the decision to Congress, appear to have intended this. An attempt to convert a political judgment into a purely mechanical one may thus contradict the philosphy of Article V as well as creating new difficulties.

In addition, specific decisions contained in the proposed legislation concerning such matters as whether calls for a convention by a state require the approval of the Governor, or whether such matters should be left to state law, may be subject to legitimate debate.

We believe, however, that regardless of the merits of such individual matters, Congress ought not to attempt to bind itself to future action beyond the strictures already contained in Article V.

This position was adopted in unanimous reports of this Committee and the Committee on Federal Legislation of the New York County Lawyers' Association and the Committee on Legislation of the Federal Bar council comprising lawyers practicing in Federal courts in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, in opposing an earlier bill which, while differing in some respects from the present bill, contained the same purported advance commitment of future Congresses to act in particular circumstances. The Federal Bar Council report stated:

"Legislation has been proposed which would commit Congress to call a federal Constitutional Convention under Article V of the Constitution of the United States once applications for such a convention satisfying the mechanical requisites set forth in the legislation were received from the proper number of state legislatures. S. 623, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969).

"By exercising such congressional judgment in advance, the bill would purport to preclude Congress from deciding that an application was untimely because of changed circumstances, stale because it arose from a malapportioned legislature and sought to overturn reapportionment decisions, or was properly rescinded while Congress was considering the question of calling a convention.

---

[1] Cf. United States v. Bergman, 592 F. 2d 533, 536 (9th Cir. 1979).
[2] See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 533 (1939).

"Basically, the bill seeks to exercise in advance of the event the power of Congress under Article V to determine questions concerning the call to any future convention, thus preempting consideration of such issues in their factual context when presented.

"We believe that such a step attempting to bind future elected Federal Legislatures may well be unconstitutional and void, because the calling of a convention is a political function and no court would seek to compel one Congress to exercise its political functions as decreed by its predecessors.

". . . The same may be said of the provision . . . that no application may be withdrawn while the requisite number of applications are under consideration by Congress.

"In our view the calling of a federal Constitutional Convention is a step not to be lightly taken, and no judgment in favor of such a step should be exercised in advance. Otherwise we may gut our 'great instrument of government, intended to endure for unnumbered generations . . .' Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 490 (1935) (Stone, J. dissenting)." Federal Bar Council, Bulleting of Reports Concerning Legislation 9–10 (Jan. 1970).

The same position has been taken by Professor Charles L. Black, Jr., of Yale Law School in a letter to the Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee on February 28, 1972 where he stated:

"This bill, as to the vote commanded in its crucial Section 6, rests on the constitutionally impossible assumption that this Congress can bind the consciences of successor Congressmen and Senators, on questions of contitutional law and policy."

Professor Black also points out that a resolution to call a convention is nowhere exempted from the blanket provision of Article I, section 7(3) of the Constitution that "Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives . . ."

There is historical precedent that amendments to the Constitution proposed by Congress have never been presented for Presidential approval.[3] But such amendments proposed by Congress require a two-thirds vote on the part of both Houses of Congress, the majority necessary to override a veto. Under the proposed legislation, a majority of Congress would be directed by the proposed statute to call a Federal Constitutional Convention—without presenting the matter to the President. The two-thirds approval required by Article I, section 7(3) in the absence of Presidential approval is thus circumvented by a mere statute. We do not think this is either wise or constitutional.

The President's participation is also important because apart from the judiciary, which this bill excludes from all participation in matters concerning the calling of a convention, the President is the only officer involved in the process who represents the entire nation rather than a particularized constituency. Compare Neustadt, Presidential Power (1962); Rossiter, The American Presidency (Mentor ed. 1960); Jaffe, "The Effective Limits of the Administrative Process: A Reevaluation," 67 Harv. L. Rev. 1105, 1107–13 (1954); Jaffe, "Judicial Review: Question of Law," 69 Harv. L. Rev. 239, 273–74 (1955).

The exclusion of the President from action contemplated by the bill is in our view one of the few instances where a statute could be found to violate the Constitution by simply laying the provision "alongside" the Constitution to see "if the latter squares with the former," as Justice Roberts said was done by the Court in United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 62 (1936).

The problem with the bill is that it gives these matters insufficient importance by assuming that the only pertinent questions will be mechanical—i.e. does the number of applications equal two-thirds of the states? This is not necessarily true—indeed the opposite may well be the case in a concrete situation.

---

[3] See Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. 378 (1798); but see Black "The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster," 72 Yale L.J. 957 (1963).

For example, the question of what applications are sufficiently similar, if not identical in all respects, to be counted toward the same request for a convention is far from mechanical.

Referring to the Sherman Act, Chief Justice Hughes once said, "As a charter of freedom, the Act has a generality and adaptability comparable to that found to be desirable in constitutional provisions." Appalachian Coals, Inc. v. United States, 288 U.S. 344, 359–60 (1933). Article V possesses these attributes. The pending bill does not.

In legislation purporting to flesh out the Constitution rather than to deal with specific problems, it is particularly important to avoid what Justice Holmes has called "delusive exactness," Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U.S. 312, 343 et seq. (1921) (Holmes, J. dissenting) and to keep in mind Chief Justice Marshall's famous dictum that "it is a Constitution we are expounding." In seeking to anticipate and provide specific and purportedly binding answers for all future questions under Article V, we could easily fall into the trap described by Karl N. Llewellyn in "Meet Negotiable Instruments," 44 Colum. L. Rev. 299, 322 (1944): "... Once a man starts thinking up unhappy contingencies and sets about the careful legal covering of himself against each of them, he has embarked upon a course which ends only with the incorporation of a fifteen volume encyclopedia of law and procedure or else with plain exhaustion."

This bill, in purporting to be a tight solution with no leeway for the unforeseen, avoids Llewellyn's trap by assuming all of the questions to be mechanical and no real questions exist. If such legislation were passed, and not deemed invalid, a rule of reason would probably be read into it. Cf. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1 (1911); United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106 (1911).

We do not agree, however, that this bill would pass muster either constitutionally or as wise. The bill seeks to prevent full consideration of the question of calling a constitutional convention in its full factual context by settling all possible issues in advance. This we believe to be wrong, unwise and not necessarily binding even if adopted.

Respectfully submitted.

COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL LEGISLATION.

Richard A. Givens, Chairman,
Linda Hawley Asay,
Sandra Lopez Bird,
Edward Brodsky,
Matthew Burns,
Evan A. Davis,
Stephen V. Dubin,
Robert Lawrence Geltzer,
Robert John Grimm,
Eric Thomas Haas,
Jack Harold Halperin,
Michael D. Hess,
Robert Elihu Kushner,
George William Leopold, Jr.,
Henry Mittler,
Solomon D. Monshine,
Peter Henry Morrison,
Ellen M. Poler,
Lorraine Cooper Presnick,
James W. Rayhill,
Peter Repetti,
Martin F. Richman,
Lisa A. Whitney,
Robert W. Wien,
Benjamin J. Zinkin,
Harold Baer, Jr., Ex-Officio,
Daniel C. Draper, Ex-Officio.

This report is issued by the Committee pursuant to the By-laws of the Association which permit such dissemination. It has not been submitted to the Board of Directors for approval and therefore does not necessarily represent the views of the Board.

Political Implications of a National Constitutional Convention

(By Kenneth Kofmehl, Purdue University)

The Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution is considering S. 3 and S. 1710, bills to provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, pursuant to Article V of the Constitution. The basic issue involved in this legislation is whether or not Congress should facilitate recourse to this hitherto unused method of amending the Constitution. Its decision is fraught with grave consequences for our political system and processes. This paper deals with some of these and political factors likely to give rise to them.

IMPACT ON THE CONSTITUTION

Obviously, proponents of invoking the constitutional convention approach expect it will enable them to get amendments proposed that they otherwise could not. Some like California Gov. Jerry Brown have frankly admitted the aim of pressuring Congress to act through fear of what might eventuate from the untried convention procedure. Should that tactic fail, however, most are confident that a constitutional convention would be amenable to their wishes. In either case, the result would be to increase the ease with which the Constitution can be altered. This would seriously jeopardize its nature. The difficulty of persuading Congress to propose amendments has served that document well by protecting its essential character. As a relatively brief statement of fundamental principles couched in general terms, it has been flexibly adapted through interpretation while preserving the appearance of a stable foundation for our political system. As a revered symbol embodying basic procedures indispensable to democracy as a method of government, the Constitution has helped gain acceptance for them and to legitimate policies adopted in accordance with them.

These attributes of the Constitution would be impaired by too frequent alteration or by addition of inappropriate material. As the late Alexander M. Bickel, a leading constitutional scholar, pungently observed, "I fear that with constitutions, as has happened in many of our States, familiarity of amendment will breed a species of contempt." [1]

Experience with state constitutions does indeed confirm the dangers of excessive amendment. According to an eminent authority on the subject, Albert L. Sturm, "The original state constitutions were short, rarely containing more than 5,000 words, and demonstrated the principle that the basic law should be restricted to fundamental matters." [2] However, in the past hundred years or so, most state constitutions underwent a drastic transformation, greatly increasing in length and detail to the extent that in many respects they were indistinguishable from statutory law. By 1969 the worst example was the Louisiana constitution, which numbered over 1,000 pages and ran to an estimated 253,800 words. The average length of the fifty state constitutions that year was 30,075 words. This was about four times as long as the Constitution of the United States, which contained approximately 7,250 words then.[3]

Professor Sturm ascribes the inclusion of much nonfundamental and transitory material of a statutory sort in state constitutions and their mushrooming size to popular distrust of legislatures, public dissatisfaction with judicial interpretations of constitutional provisions, the pressure of special interests for constitutional status, faulty drafting, and the tendency of lengthy constitutions to breed more amendments. He also comments, "The trend in the past has been to impose numerous and excessive restrictions on governmental agents, particularly the lawmaking body.[4]

The similarity of these dynamics to the motives behind current campaigns to call a national constitutional convention is obvious. The instant cause of concern with this procedure, an amendment requiring a balanced budget, reflects distrust

---

[1] U.S. Congress, Senate, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, Hearings on Federal Constitutional Convention, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., Oct. 31, 1967, p. 61.

[2] Thirty Years of State Constitution-Making: 1938–1968 (New York: National Municipal League, 1970), p. 5.

[3] Ibid., pp. 14–15.

[4] Ibid., p. 6.

of Congress and would seriously restrict its control over fiscal measures. The resolute effort to write into the Constitution a ban on abortions expresses intense dissatisfaction with judicial interpretations of that document. If success crowns the endeavors of groups pushing these proposals, other organized interests will be encouraged to insert their pet prescriptions into the Constitution and bring about an upward spiral of amendment.

Besides facilitating the inclusion of inappropriate substantive policies in the Constitution, a national convention might very well produce undesirable changes in the basic framework and procedures of government. Data from state constitutional conventions supports the assumption that a large proportion of the delegates to a national convention would aspire to the public offices whose powers they are authorized to modify. For example, from the 1961–62 Michigan constitutional convention, George Romney, vice president of that body, was elected governor in 1962. In that same election, 45 of the 147 convention delegates sought seats in the state legislature. Others of them were candidates for lieutenant governor, secretary of state, attorney general, state treasurer, university regents, and judgeships, as well as for local offices.[5] Because of coveting the presidency or a seat in Congress, delegates to a national convention would be inclined to propose restrictions on tenure in these offices (e.g., limiting the President to a single six-year term or members of Congress to twelve years of service) to increase the turnover and multiply the chances of competing for them. Blinded by ambition, such delegates might not have due regard for the adverse effects on political accountability of denying an opportunity for reelection or on responsible decisionmaking of forfeiting experience and judgment by automatically removing capable incumbents.

IMPAIRMENT OF POLITICAL PROCESSES

These kinds of modifications of the Constitution could have very untoward effects on our political system. Some would likely engender disillusionment and aggravate political alienation. For instance, several advocates of a balanced budget amendment freely avow that it can serve only as a symbol. Aware of the impossibility of straightjacketing Congress so that necessary measures cannot be taken to deal with unanticipated fiscal emergencies arising out of war, economic depression, or other catastrophes, they have built into their proposal escape clauses that reduce the purported restrictions to mere exhortations. Once such an amendment were adopted and perception of its charade-like character spread among the electorate, the ensuing cynicism about the Constitution would add a new and ominous dimension to political alienation. To date public opinion polls show that despite declining confidence in specific national government institutions—the presidency, Congress and even the Supreme Court—there is still strong support for our political system as a whole. However, disenchantment with the Constitution would erode the foundation for the system itself.

Adoption of the antiabortion amendment or others that represent efforts by a segment of the population to impose its moral views on the rest would further increase disrespect for the Constitution and contribute to a general breakdown of law and order. For such constitutional provisions would surely be flouted by the millions of persons with intensely held convictions based on differential perceptions of morality. Experience with the ill-fated noble experiment of prohibition in the 18th Amendment is instructive in this regard.

Moreover, our ability to achieve consensus on other pressing issues of national policy would be impaired. For a necessary condition to reach that sort of agreement is an underlying consensus on the basic rules of the game for conducting political activities. To the extent that the Constitution, which embodies many of these vital procedural safeguards, becomes discredited, their acceptance is jeopardized. Also, acrimonious struggles over inserting sumptuary legislation into the Constitution would exacerbate the divisiveness that is already too prevalent in our highly fragmented society.

Consensus on public policy is necessary for any political system based on consent of the governed. As J. Roland Pennock, distinguished democratic theorist, has remarked: "It is a commonplace that democracy will fail where a certain undefinable minimum of agreement ceases to exist. Without some degree of consensus, the democratic process and especially bare majority decisions, will not be tolerated." [6]

---

[5] William N. Thompson, "An Analysis of the Legislative Ambitions of State Constitutional Convention Delegates," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 29, No. 3 (Sept., 1976), p. 431.

Because of the great diversity in the United States, consensus has always been especially important in our political process and is becoming even more so as we enter an age of scarcity. For that will result in governmental allocative decisions requiring sacrifices by our citizens. Such decisions will only be acceptable to the citizenry if they are perceived to be just, and they are likely to be so if reached through consensus. Because of its representativeness and procedures, Congress may be our national institution best able to reach consensus decisions.[7]

DANGER TO CONGRESS

Recourse to the national convention approach to amending the Constitution endangers the successful functioning of Congress in a number of ways. As mentioned above, a national convention might propose limits on tenure of members of Congress that would reduce their political accountability and capacity for responsible decision-making. Even the threat of calling a convention might impair the deliberative processes of Congress and conduce to unfortunate legislative outcomes. To avoid the harmful potentialities of such a convention, Congress might approve constitutional amendments it otherwise would not. Or Congress might pass undesirable legislation in order to obviate efforts by a convention to accomplish the same purpose with an amendment that would write statutory language into the Constitution and mar the integrity of that document. Thus, from laudable motives, Congress might be prompted to take ill-advised actions.

If a national constitutional convention ever materialized, the adverse effects on Congress would be even more pronounced. Uncertainties about the scope of congressional powers while a convention was addressing itself to modifying them would inhibit Congress from acting on matters falling within their purview. The propagandizing in the campaigns for election of delegates and rhetoric during the sessions of the convention, which would certainly receive wide media coverage, would further diminish the prestige of Congress. To gain support for restricting Congress or for removing subjects from its jurisdiction, proponents of such action undoubtedly would exaggerate its shortcomings and promote misconceptions in which some of its strengths are perceived as weaknesses; e.g., the slowness with which it acts on a matter on which a consensus takes a long time to develop. Inasmuch as current opinion polls show that Congress has sunk to a record low in public approval, negative reinforcement of this sort is the last thing it needs.[8]

As the campaign for a balanced-budget amendment confirms, there are mounting efforts to impose restrictions on Congress. If any of these succeed, the resulting restraints on Congress would hamper its ability to deal effectively with national problems. In turn, this would further reduce public confidence in Congress. And that would encourage additional attempts to prescribe constitutional remedies for alleged congressional ailments. To protect Congress as an institution against these kinds of assaults, the members would have to engage in time-consuming counterattacks, which would divert their attention from the agenda of important national and international issues which Congress should be considering.

WHAT MANNER OF DELEGATES

Proponents of the national convention procedure attribute anxieties about it to lack of faith in our ability to produce delegates comparable in quality with the framers of the Constitution. They suggest this is a libel on the wisdom and trustworthiness of the present generation. It is nothing of the sort. Nor does it reflect belief in the mythology that the framers were demigods, the like of which no longer walks the earth. No one disputes that there is a large number of intelligent, highly educated, and otherwise gifted persons in the country today, many of whom may well surpass most of the framers in raw ability and rectitude. The basic question is whether or not individuals with appropriate attitudes would be selected from this reservoir of talent. Besides being very

---

[6] J. Roland Pennock, "Responsiveness, Responsibility, and Majority Rule," American Political Science Review, Vol. 46, No. 3 (September 1952), p. 795.

[7] For discussion of this point and the role of Congress in building consensus, see Richard F. Fenno, Jr., Home Style: House Members in Their Districts (Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1978), p. 245.

[8] The 19 percent approval rating given Congress in June, 1979 is 10 points lower than its rating in September 1978 and 29 points below its 48 percent approval rating in August 1974 (George Gallup, "Performance Ratings for Both Carter, Congress Decline to New Lows," The Gallup Poll, June 21, 1979, pp. 1–3).

well educated and experienced in practical politics, the framers were hardheaded pragmatists thoroughly disposed to compromise. They had an acute appreciation of the requisites for a viable constitution, and they were dedicated to producing such an instrument.

Under present conditions, a preponderance of delegates with these characteristics is not apt to be chosen. In the first place, there would predictably be low voter participation in their election. Experience in the states indicates that a smaller proportion of the electorate votes on matters involving constitutional conventions than in other kinds of elections. For example, in Maryland on September 13, 1966, only 13.6 percent of the registered voters took part in a referendum on calling a state constitutional convention. However, 65.2 percent of them voted for governor in the general election on November 8, 1966. Similarly, in New Mexico, 71.4 percent of the registered voters cast their ballots for governor in the 1970 general election. Yet, eleven months earlier, only 30.2 percent of them had bothered to vote on proposals made by a constitutional convention.[9] Generalizing about the pervasiveness of this phenomenon, Professor Sturm writes, "The generally low level of public interest reflected in nonvoting on constitutional issues exists in practically all the states." [10] That there would be a comparably low level of voting for delegates to a national constitutional convention can reasonably be inferred from Austin Ranney's findings about the parallels between low turnout in presidential primaries and other primary elections in the states.[11] It is a truism that in elections with small turnout, voters tend to be atypical. Obviously, they have more intense interest than the rest of the electorate and often hold more extreme views.

Second, during the past two decades, a new type of political activist, dubbed "purist" by Aaron Wildavsky, has displayed remarkable growth in numbers and influence on national politics. Consisting largely of college educated, middle- and upper middle-class professionals, the purists have ample leisure and other resources to participate in political activities. Ideological and issue-oriented, they are averse to compromise. They are more concerned about policy than party and give ideology priority over electoral victory. They possess communications skills of a high order. And they want their views expressed without equivocation.[12]

The synergistic effect of these two factors (low turnout and purists) was demonstrated in the composition of the 1972 Democratic National Nominating Convention, for which more than three fourths of the delegates were elected in state presidential primaries. A large majority of the delegates were purists. In her monumental study of the 1972 nominating conventions, Jeane Kirkpatrick concluded that this outcome was not caused by the imposition of quotas but by the influence of party activists on delegate selection.[13]

Hence, there is every reason to believe that a comparable proportion of delegates to a national constitutional convention would consist of purists. Their mode of selection is almost identical to that for most of the 1972 nominating convention delegates. On the national political scene, purists are as prominent as ever and, if anything, would probably be more influential in delegate elections dealing with abstract issues of constitutional revision than in delegate elections centering on the choice of presidential candidates.

The consequences for the Constitution are obvious. With their characteristic mind set, purists would insist on writing their prepossessions specifically into that document no matter how destructive such action might be of its basic nature as a rather short general statement of fundamental principles of government.

LACK OF INSTITUTIONAL CONSTRAINTS

Whatever the proportion of purists among the delegates to a national constitutional convention, they would be able to act more irresponsibly and to exert more influence than a corresponding number of them in Congress could because of differences in institutional characteristics of the two bodies. Span of exist-

---

[9] Computed from figures in Maryland Manual, 1967–1968 (Annapolis, Md.: Hall of Records Commission of the State of Maryland, 1968), pp. 503, 539, 562; The Book of the States, 1970–1971 (Lexington, Ky.: The Council of State Governments, 1970), p. 26, Table 5; ibid., 1972–1973 (Ibid., 1972), p. 44.

[10] Sturm, Thirty Years of State Constitution-Making, p. 87.

[11] Austin Ranney, "Turnout and Representation in Presidential Primary Elections," American Political Science Review, Vol. 66, No. 1 (March 1972), pp. 23–24.

[12] Nelson W. Polsby and Aaron Wildavsky, Presidential Elections (4th ed.; New York, Scribners, 1976), pp. 22, 29–34; Jeane Kirkpatrick, The New Presidential Elite: Men and Women in National Politics (New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1976), pp. 8–9.

[13] Ibid., pp. 330–331.

ence, procedures, norms, and informal power structures in Congress, a continuing organization, impose constraints that would be absent in a constitutional convention, an ad hoc organization. Convention delegates would not be subject to the check of running for reelection. They would bear none of the burden of passing any legislation required to implement the amendments they initiated. For a convention, the Constitution does not mandate extraordinary majorities for decisions of unusual gravity, such as the two thirds vote of both houses of Congress necessary to propose amendments. Some legal scholars argue that any attempt by Congress to prescribe such a requirement would be unconstitutional. And the short life span of a convention would militate against its voluntarily adopting formal rules necessitating more than a simple majority vote for any kind of decision.

Moreover, all the delegates to a convention would start out on equal footing. All would be newcomers. There would be no seniority or socialization of novices. Actually, there would be no folkways, such as reciprocity or specialization, to be transmitted thusly and to help control the behavior of delegates. And there would be no hierarchy of senior members with informal structures of power built on longstanding friendships, respect, and intricate patterns of mutual understandings and obligations. In a convention, for the most part, there would be only the formal organization, supplemented by such blocs or other groupings as might develop during its brief existence.[14]

In Congress, by exploiting strategic positions in internal power structures, or procedural safeguards like the Senate filibuster, even a few members with an acute grasp of constitutional necessities can block undesirable amendments and can insist on modifying others until they become acceptable. In contrast, at a national constitutional convention, which would lack most such institutional constraints, a bare majority of purists could work its will.

INADEQUACY OF STATE SAFEGUARDS

Eeven supporters of the national convention approach recognize the need for consensus on any proposed amendments to the Constitution. Conceding the institutional deficiencies of a national convention in this respect, they insist nevertheless that the requirements of requests by two thirds of the State legislatures for calling a constitutional convention and of ratification of its output by three fourths of the States would ensure consensus on the end product. But would they? Recent experience with State legislatures in approving applications to Congress to call conventions is not reassuring. From research on the first 21 States to pass petitions for a convention to propose a balanced budget amendment, Common Cause found that some legislatures rushed the petitions through without much deliberation. In two States, no committee in either house of the legislature considered the petitions before they were approved. Committees held hearings where the public was allowed to testify in only six legislatures. Committee reports explaining the proposed action were issued in but six States. And frequently committee consideration was perfunctory. For instance, in the Colorado Legislature, the Senate committee held a half hour discussion of a petition on January 30, 1978, before voting seven to one to report it favorably to the Senate, where it passed without a recorded vote on February 3. On March 9, the House committees discussed the petition for only six minutes before approving it by a vote of six to two. On March 20, after some debate, the House passed it by a vote of 40 to 24.[15]

The campaign for a convention to propose an antiabortion amendment reveals confusion among State legislators when approving petitions for such a purpose and intense pressure brought to bear on some of them by single-issue interest groups. For example, in the Massachusetts Legislature, the night the House passed a petition, Representative Elaine Noble recounts, "It was done on a voice vote, later, in the middle of a lot of other bills. A lot of people didn't really know what they were voting for." [16] In New York after Stanley Steingut, Speaker of the assembly, had played a key role in defeating a petition, he was the target of vituperative lobbying that included a number of full page ads attacking him in the local Albany newspapers.[17]

---

[14] For discussion of such characteristics of state conventions, see Thompson, Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 29, p. 429.

[15] "A Constitutional Convention. The Need for Debate," Current, No. 213 (June, 1979, p. 22).

[16] As quoted in Lisa Cronin Wohl, "Are We 25 Votes Away From Losing the Bill of Rights . . . and the Rest of the Constitution?" MS, Vol. 6, No. 8 (Feb., 1978), p. 97.

[17] Ibid., p. 98.

Moreover, if the required two thirds of the State legislatures applying for a convention were from the 34 least populous states, they would represent only 31.1 percent of the voting age population of the United States. If the three fourths of the State legislatures (or State conventions, depending on which method Congress specified) necessary for ratification were from the 38 smallest States, they would represent only 40.2 percent of the voting age population. Since the vote would undoubtedly be divided in each of these State legislatures, legislators representing somewhere between 16 and 31.1 percent of the voting age population could require a national constitutional convention to be called, and State legislators or State convention delegates representing somewhere between 21 and 40.2 percent of the voting age population could ratify its proposals.[18] This would hardly fit the definition of a national consensus. Such a scenario is not too fanciful because the smaller of these States are predominantly rural, and many of the larger are in the Bible Belt. Hence, on any style of life amendments, they could very well make common cause against the predominantly metropolitan population in the 12 largest States.

UNDESIRABILITY OF GUIDELINE LEGISLATION

Because of the predictably adverse impact on our political system of the national convention approach to amend the Constitution, Congress should strongly discourage recourse to it. Enacting any of the proposed bills setting forth procedures for calling a national constitutional convention would have the opposite effect. To do so would apparently give congressional endorsement to using this method of proposing constitutional amendments. Requiring that copies of each petition received by Congress from a State legislature be sent to every other State legislature, as all the pending bills do, would stimulate interest in campaigns for particular amendments with which many legislatures might otherwise be unfamiliar. By prescribing criteria for petitions, guideline legislation would remove conditions that prevent some State legislatures from participating effectively in these endeavors. Presently, State legislatures are unsure about how to frame a valid request for a national convention, and some do not know where in Congress to send their applications.[19]

Advocates of enacting guidelines now argue that adopting them before receiving 34 applications for a convention on the same subject would avoid controversy—possibly even avert a constitutional crisis—afterward. Quite the contrary, it would cause even greater disputation then. Having fulfilled the statutory specifications for their applications, state legislatures would expect them to be honored by Congress. Yet, the Congress sitting at the time the issue of calling a convention arises might not agree with the criteria in the law and could not be bound by them. To do so would require members of Congress to surrender in advance their judgment on matters of constitutional interpretation on which opinions honestly differ and which circumstances may alter. For example, how long should petitions remain valid? Until recently, there was general agreement that 7 years was a reasonable period to indicate a contemporaneous demand for a convention. However, as a consequence of the struggle over extending the time for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment, thinking has changed in this regard. What once seemed appropriate may no longer be acceptable. Because the context in which issues of this sort may develop cannot be foreseen, Congress should preserve the maximum latitude for deciding them when they arise instead of attempting to bind itself before hand by statutory prescriptions that may be inappropriate then.[20]

MEMORANDUM

To: Hon. Birch Bayh, Chairman, Subcommittee on the Constitution.
From: Kennth Kofmehl, Professor of Political Science, Purdue University.
Date: July 4, 1980.
Subject: Questions on Constitutional Convention Procedures.

To supplement my prepared statement, you have asked me to answer questions on constitutional convention procedures sent to me by Linda Rogers-

[18] Computed from figures in U.S. Bureau of the Census, Statistical Abstract of the United States: 1978 (99th ed.; Washington, D.C., 1978), pp. 14, 522.
[19] U.S., Congressional Record, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., Jan. 15, 1979, Vol. 125 (daily ed.), p. S75.
[20] For supporting arguments, see Charles L. Black, Jr., "Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman," The Yale Law Journal, Vol. 82, No. 2 (December 1972), pp. 189–196.

Kingsbury, Chief Clerk, Subcommittee on the Constitution. The questions are listed below with my answer to each immediately under it.

1. Question. It has been recommended that the procedures issue should be confronted at a time when the problem can be faced in the open and without pressure, in order to be prepared in advance of state action. Since most scholars agree that one Congress cannot bind another, would it be a prudent use of the Congress' time to consider implementing legislation before applications are received from the states for a convention? Should Congress routinely enact procedures legislation at the beginning of each Congress in order to be prepared?

Answer. For several cogent reasons, it would not be a prudent use of the Congress' time to consider implementing legislation for a convention before valid applications were received from two-thirds of the states. First, with regard to many aspects of such legislation, it is impossible to decide in the abstract what are appropriate provisions. Only knowledge of conditions at the time a convention is to be called can furnish a basis for intelligent action. A good example is afforded by the campaign for a constitution convention to propose amendments to frustrate the Supreme Court's reapportionment decisions. Within far less than seven years, many of the state legislatures submitting petitions had been reapportioned. Hence, their applications became stale much short of the time that most proposed implementing legisaltion would keep such petitions effective. Additional illustrations of this point are set forth below in my answers to other of your questions.

Second, such legislation involves major constitutional and policy questions. Congress should not settle them when national attention is directed elsewhere as is presently the case. The only time that the general public can be sufficiently aroused about such procedural issues is when a substantive change in the Constitution is imminent. Even most of the very limited current discussion of these questions in national news media and professional journals has been stimulated by ongoing campaigns for budget-balancing and antiabortion amendments. Not until Congress is confronted with a situation apparently requiring it to call a convention for proposing such amendments will more than a small fraction of the potentially attentive public become interested. Only then will Congress be able to ascertain the preferences of an informed electorate on these momentous issues.

Third, as I stress in my prepared statement, using the national convention approach to amending the Constitution would have predictably adverse effects on our political system. Enacting any of the proposed federal convention procedures bills would encourage recourse to this method of proposing constitutional amendments. Also, adoption of such legislation beforehand would exacerbate any controversy whenever thirty-four applications for a convention on the same subject were received. Having fulfilled the statutory specifications for their applications, state legislatures would expect them to be honored by Congress. Yet, the Congress sitting at that time might not agree with the criteria in the law and could not be bound by them.

In particular, Congress should not routinely enact procedures legislation at the beginning of each Congress in order to be prepared. To do so would compound the shortcomings of adopting such legislation in advance. There would be a strong tendency to endorse perfunctorily provisions of a questionable nature on the assumption that they had already been carefully considered. Yet, they would not have been subjected to the searching scrutiny that comes only from an assessment of relevant conditions at a time a convention is actually going to be called. For instance, two earlier versions of S. 3 (S. 215 of the 92d Congress and S. 1272 of the 93rd Congress) were approved by the Senate. Despite hearings on an antecedent bill (S. 2307 of the 90th Congress) and floor debate and detailed commentary in law journals on S. 215 and S. 1272, their current incarnation, S. 3, contains provisions on basic matters, such as apportionment of delegates, to which strong objections have been raised by several eminent legal scholars.

2. Question. Section 3(b) of S. 1710 provides that questions "concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption or withdrawal of a State resolution cognizable under this Act are determinable by the State legislature." Would this provision take away all power of Congress to consider the validity of a resolution, regardless of the circumstances surrounding its alleged adoption?

Answer. Evidently the drafter of Section 3(b) intended that decisions by a State legislature on questions concerning the adoption or withdrawal of a state resolution shall be binding on the Congress. That is the clear connotation of the word "determinable." Also, otherwise the language would be unnecessary. For no one could dispute the power of a state legislature to decide initially questions concerning the validity of its actions.

3. Question. Likewise, in Section 3(b) and Section 5(b) of S. 1710, the power is removed from Congress to determine the validity of any withdrawal of an application. What are your thoughts on these sections?

Answer. Even by implication, Congress should not waive its authority to determine questions concerning the adoption or withdrawal of a state's application because allegations of irregularity and bad faith on the part of a state legislature might, quite conceivably, arise. And the legitimacy of the Constitution would be weakened if it could plausibly be charged that a constitutional amendment had come into being by means of irregular state procedures.

To avoid any misunderstanding in this respect, I would revise Section 3(b) of S. 1710 as follows:

"(b) Questions concerning the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act shall be determined by the Congress of the United States."

And I would add the following paragraph to Section 5 of S. 1710:

"(c) Questions concerning the withdrawal of a State's application shall be determined by the Congress of the United States."

4. Question. In many of the petitions that have been submitted, it appears there has been consideration by the State governor and in many instances the governor's signature appears on the petition. Would this indicate that State's preference for including the governor in the process, or possibly the tradition of that State's legislative policy?

Answer. Any opinion I might venture on why some States include their governors to varying degrees in the application process would be pure conjecture. However, I do feel very strongly that S. 1710, S. 3, or any other implementing legislation should not exclude governors from the application process. At a minimum, such bills (most of which ironically are imbued with a "States' Rights" philosophy) should leave the decision on participation by the governor to each individual State.

There are no compelling reasons in fact or theory for denying governors a role in the application process. Advocates of exclusion argue by analogy from the decision in Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378 (1798), that amendments proposed by Congress need not be approved by the President. However, being an unreasoned opinion, that precedent is weak, and many distinguished constitutional scholars maintain it is erroneous. Likewise, exclusionists cite Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920), to justify their position. Although this case concerns ratification of a constitutional amendment by a State legislature, it nowhere deals with the role of the governor in that process. Moreover, in Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355 (1932), which was decided 12 years later, the Court found that the term "legisulature" as used in the Constitution does require participation by the governor in the performance of some functions.

In theory a strong case can be made for inclusion of the governor in the application stage of the amending process. As Chief Justice John Marshall convincingly demonstrated in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (1819), it is the people, not the States as such, who are the source of constitutional powers. The people in a given State act through its government to express their will. Who is better able to reflect the preferences of the voters in a State than the governor, who is chosen directly by its entire electorate? Especially since gerrymandering of legislative districts is apt to distort representation in a State legislature, it is desirable that the governor help decide whether the people of a State wish to apply for a constitutional convention.

5. Question. There have been several petitions submitted to Congress which state, in effect, that a convention is to be called on a specific subject, including specific language for an amendment, and if any other subject or language is adopted the petition is to be considered null and void. What are your thoughts as to the consequences, if after a convention is called, several states were to withdraw their petitions or refuse to participate further?

Answer. In the first place, a convention should not be called in response to the kind of petitions described, and Congress would be remiss to do so. A petition setting forth the exact wording of an amendment and stipulating that it must be adopted without change is not a valid application for a convention. Such a petition would deprive the convention of its primary function of proposing amendments and reduce it to being a part of the ratification process. Secondly, both S. 3 and S. 1710 prohibit any state legislature from rescinding a valid application after two-thirds of the states have submitted such applications to Congress. Hence, it would not seem necessary to worry about the withdrawal of petitions after a convention is called.

Of course, at any time, some delegates might refuse to participate further for a variety of reasons. Or because of being bitterly opposed to the whole idea of such a convention, several states might decline to send delegates. With no way of knowing what the magnitude of such abstentions might be, it is impossible to estimate the consequences.

6. Question. If a procedures bill were to be adopted by Congress which included a provision for the calling of a limited convention, do you have an opinion as to the odds of that convention ultimately expanding the subjects for review and discussion?

Answer. The odds are overwhelming that such a convention would ultimately expand the subjects for discussion and consideration because of its nature. A constitutional convention is intrinsically a deliberative body with the power to propose amendments incorporating what it decides are the best solutions to the problems assigned to it. To fulfill this function, a convention must be able to canvass a wide range of possible solutions. In doing so, it may discover implications of a problem that necessitate an entirely different approach than that contemplated in the call for the convention. Or to garner the requisite support for an amendment dealing with a subject entrusted to it, a convention may have to develop and propose an amendment on an unrelated subject as a quid pro quo. This latter possibility is enhanced by the conditions likely to prevail in the election of delegates. As indicated in my prepared statement, voter turnout will be predictably low, and purists will constitute a disproportionate fraction of the electorate. Regardless of the subject of the amendments that a convention has been called to consider, single-interest pressure groups will be out in force doing their best to exact commitments from the candidates to push their pet projects in exchange for their electoral support. Delegates who win election because of endorsing such extraneous issues can be expected to raise them at the convention.

7. Question. The procedures legislation pending before this Subcommittee contain a clause with respect to each delegate taking an oath to refrain from discussing any subject other than that subject which was authorized by the petitioning states. Other than a moral exhortation, what means of enforcement is available?

Answer. There does not seem to be any means of enforcement. If there were, it probably should not be invoked. For such an oath—particularly of the sort prescribed in Section 8(a) of S. 3—may well represent an unconstitutional effort to deprive delegates of the discretion they need to fulfill the function of a constitutional convention, which inherently must be free to consider various subjects.

8. Question. The ABA and several constitutional scholars have recommended that convention delegates be popularly elected. Can you forsee any problems that may be connected with those elections with state laws, or possibly the necessity of amending state laws to accommodate those elections?

Answer. Before responding to your question about the election of delegates, I would like to discuss a related matter, their apportionment. The apportionment formula in both S. 1710 and S. 3 is undesirable. Senators should be counted in determining the number of delegates. There should be as many delegates from each state as it is entitled to Representatives in Congress. In every state one delegate should be elected from each congressional district by the persons entitled to vote for the Representative from that district.

Apportionment of delegates should be based on population. It is especially important to do so because the nation's population is not proportionately represented at either the application or ratification stages of this method of amending the Constitution. Moreover, there are sound reasons for concluding that the one-person, one-vote rule is applicable to a national constitutional convention. Hence, the constitutionality of allowing each state as many delegates as it has Senators and Representatives in Congress is questionable because that distribution would give greater voting weight to the residents in some states than in others. Fifteen states would be overrepresented by 50 percent or more. However, allotting each state as many delegates as it has Representatives in Congress should satisfy one-person, one-vote standards. The small variance in representation that would result from this provision would be preferable to the increased total number of delegates (678) that would be necessary to achieve precisely equal representation if Alaska were allowed one delegate or to the disregard for the integrity of the states that would result from redistricting the entire country without regard to state boundaries.

To answer your question more directly I believe that a number of problems could arise if the procedures legislation provides that "delegates shall be elected . . . in the manner provided by State law." For instance, circumstances might develop that would require federal conduct of elections of delegates to prevent racial or other discrimination. Or in some regions there might be substantial sentiment for choosing delegates in nonpartisan elections. This would necessitate amending state laws to provide appropriate nominating and general election procedures. Some states might do this while others might prefer to continue with partisan elections. The resulting mix of partisan and nonpartisan delegates would pose grave problems in organizing and conducting the constitutional convention. Hence, to avert such difficulties, Congress might have to prescribe a uniform manner of electing delegates. Once again, these hypothetical cases, which could be multiplied many times, demonstrate the wisdom of not enacting implementing legislation until such time as a national constitutional convention is actually going to be called.

9. Question. What are your thoughts on convention delegates being appointed? Would that appointment be made by the governor or the State legislature?

Answer. Most emphatically, I believe that convention delegates should be popularly elected. (Of course, any vacancies that occur in a state delegation might be filled by appointment as discussed below.) It is essential that convention delegates be responsive to the people they represent, for the people are the source of constitutional powers. Popular election is the best available means of achieving such responsiveness. Under no circumstances should delegates be chosen initially through appointment by the state legislature or by some other body it designates. This procedure, which state legislatures are empowered to use for picking presidential electors, is anarchronistic. Since the 19th Century, no state legislature has appointed electors itself, but every one has provided for their popular election.

In a situation where a vacancy occurs in a state delegation, the legislature of that state might not be in session at the time. Hence, it would seem more appropriate to authorize the governor instead of the legislature to fill any such vacancy by appointment.

10. Question. The ABA Report states there is no evidence of any federal constitutional bar against a member of Congress serving as a delegate. Do you have an opinion on that?

Answer. I find the supporting arguments of the ABA Report most persuasive. The Supreme Court has held that the provision of Article I, Section 6 barring Congressmen from holding offices under the United States applies only to an appointive position created pursuant to Article II, Section 2. Obviously this is not the case for an elected delegate to a national constitutional convention. Moreover, the Articles of Confederation contained a clause similar to Article I, Section 6. Yet several delegates to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 were members of the Continental Congress.

11. Question. What are your thoughts with respect to a State legislator serving as a delegate to a convention? What are the ramifications of a State legislator serving as a delegate, proposing an amendment and then returning to the State and ratifying that amendment?

Answer. If a state legislator is popularly elected as a delgate to a national constitutional convention, I see no good reason why he or she should not serve. In my opinion, the most important consideration in this respect is the possibility of excessive influence not by individual state legislators but by the state legislatures. To reduce that danger, any amendments proposed in this way should be ratified by state conventions, which should be popularly elected in accordance with rules prescribed by Congress. Otherwise, the state legislatures would have complete control over the initial and final stages of this method of amending the Constitution. This would tip the balance too far in favor of the state legislatures.

12. Question. Would a provision in procedures legislation, such as that contained in S. 1710, Sec. 7(a) which states that no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed as a delegate—be an effective bar?

Answer. In my opinion, the most important issue is not whether such a bar would be effective but whether it would be desirable. Congress should not ban

Senators, Representatives, or other federal employees from serving as delegates. They would bring to a federal constitutional convention valuable firsthand knowledge of national interests and a sense of responsibility for implementing any constitutional amendments that might ensue. The voters in each state should be free to elect whomever they deem best qualified to represent them as delegates to a national constitutional convention.

13. Question. Is the exclusion of Federal employees as delegates justified in light of the fact that State employees would not be excluded?

Answer. As indicated by my preceding answer, I feel that the exclusion of federal employees as delegates would be neither justified nor desirable.

14. Question. Is it appropriate for Congress to include in the implementing legislation a clause designating either the Federal government or the States to provide funds for the convention?

Answer. In the implementing legislation, it is proper for Congress to authorize appropriations for the payment of the expenses of the convention, as Section 8(b) of S. 3 does. However, Congress can only authorizes the expenditure of federal funds. It would be improper for Congress to try to allocate the costs of the convention among the states, and it would be very difficult to devise a suitable formula for that purpose.

15. Question. In your opinion, which entity should bear financial responsibility for a constitutional convention?

Answer. Very definitely, the federal government shoudl bear financial responsibility for a national constitutional convention because the convention would be performing a federal function.

16. Question. S. 1710 embodies the basic tenets of federalism and the sovereignty of the States. In Section 8(b), which states that with respect to no federal funds appropriated for a convention, the states shall bear all expenses incurred. The constitutional question seems to be how can the Congress require the legislatures of the sovereign States to appropriate funds for the support of a federal constitutional convention? In the past there have been instances of "matching funds", but precedent would be set for total financial support by the States. The convention would be totally dependent upon the goodwill of each and every State to pay its share, which as we know, was one of the problems faced by the Convention of 1787.

Answer. Congress cannot constitutionally require state legislatures to appropriate funds for the support of a federal constitutional convention. Federal grant-in-aid programs that require participating state governments to provide matching funds are not analogous to imposing the costs of a convention on the states. In such programs, state governments have the incentive of receiving federal funds at least equal to and generally much larger than the sums they contribute. Moreover, participation in any federal grant-in-aid program is optional. That could hardly be the case with a national constitutional convention. For its legitimacy would be impaired if a number of states declined to send delegates.

You quite properly point out the difficulty of relying on voluntary contributions from every state government. The inadequacy of voluntarism in fiscal affairs has been repeatedly exemplified not only by the experience of our central government under the Articles of Confederation but also by the present day refusals of member governments to make their payments to the United Nations. In fact, the problem of financing a national constitutional convention would be even greater than in these instances because the states would not know what their respective fair shares of the total outlays were. There is no provision for allocating the costs of a convention among the states.

In addition to to the difficulties you mention, Section 2 of S. 1710 poses severe financial problems for the GSA and other federal agencies. Section 8(b) states, "No Federal funds may be appropriated specifically for the purposes of payment of the expenses of the convention." Yet Section 8(c) ordains that the GSA Administrator shall provide such facilities and that every other federal agency shall provide such information and assistance as the convention may require. The costs of such facilities and services, which are the expenses of the convention, could be very large. How would the GSA and other federal agencies be reimbursed for them if no federal funds could be appropriated specifically for that purpose? Moreover, would it be legal for federal agencies to divert funds appropriated for other programs to pay the costs of such facilities and services? And should these other programs have to absorb such costs as they would have to do if there is no possibility of reimbursement?

17. Question. In S. 1710, the State supreme court justice with the most tenure shall convene the constitutional convention and administer the oath of office to each delegate and preside until officers are elected. What are your thoughts on this provision as to the practicalities and political impact?

Answer. It is difficult even to guess why this provision, which has a potential for considerable inconvenience, was made for filling a position that is largely ceremonial in nature. For instance, when needed to convene and preside initially over the constitutional convention, the most senior chief justice of the state supreme courts might very well be unavailable because of being in the midst of an extremely busy session. The most plausible hypothesis is that some sort of symbolic gesture is intended. If that be the case, I cannot imagine any significant political impact that would result.

In contrast, the provision in S. 3 for the Vice President of the United States to convene and preside at the outset of the convention is more reasonable. The Vice President is already in Washington, D.C., and does not have other pressing duties that would interfere with his discharging this responsibility.

18. Question. As we know, the original convention was in session roughly five months and drafted the entire Constitution, do you have any recommendation as to the duration of any future convention?

Answer. Because of the adverse effects on our political system while such a convention is sitting, some of which are set forth in my prepared statement, I recommend that any future convention terminate its proceedings within six months after the date of its first meeting. That should be ample time to work out one or so specific amendments, which is all that a "limited" convention is supposed to do according to its proponents. And Congress could always extend this period if necessary.

The reasonableness of this period is attested by experience with the 27 state constitutional conventions that assembled during the 31-year period from 1938 through 1968. The average length of these conventions, including both unlimited and limited bodies, was 4.4 months. And if the extraordinarily long Rhode Island convention is excluded, the average duration was only 2.6 months.

19. Question. Section 9 of S. 1710 eliminates the provision in S. 3 which provides that a constitutional convention shall terminate in one year unless extended by Congress. Would this omisssion effectively authorize a continuing convention?

Answer. Yes, this omission would effectively authorize a continuing convention. And if the provision in S. 1710 for state financing of the convention were realizable, Congress would not even be able to terminate its proceedings by cutting off its funds. In any event, implementing legislation should prescribe the maximum duration of the convention.

That the dangers of an unduly protracted convention are not imaginary was demonstrated by a Rhode Island constitutional convention that ran more than 50 months. It convened on December 8, 1964 and did not adjourn sine die until February 17, 1969. Can you imagine the consequences if a national constitutional convention continued for that length of time, which would include one and possibly two presidential elections and two congressional elections for sure!

20. Question. I would like to draw your attention to the fact that S. 1710 does not provide for a vote on final passage of an amendment by the convention. If S. 1710 was to be passed by Congress, do you think it could be implied that the convention itself has the authority to determine the mode and margin of the vote, or would that become a matter to be decided by the courts?

Answer. With respect to the mode of voting, Section 9(a) of S. 1710 does provide, "In voting on any question before the convention, including the proposal of amendments, each delegate shall have one vote." However, S. 1710 does not specify the margin of the vote on final passage of an amendment. And it certainly could be implied that the convention itself has the authority to determine the size of the vote required to propose an amendment. In general, for any internal procedures of a convention that Congress has not prescribed, the convention has inherent power to do so.

21. Question. By what vote, whether required by procedures legislation or left to the convention to decide, do you think should be required for passage of an amendment? A simple majority or two-thirds or possibly some other fraction?

Answer. The vote necessary for proposing amendments should be two-thirds of the convention delegates voting, a quorum being present. A quorum should consist of a majority of the total number of delegates to the convention. This would correspond exactly with the vote required in each house of Congress for final passage of a constitutional amendment.

Whether proposed by Congress or a convention, a constitutional amendment should not be submitted to the states before a substantial consensus on its desirability has been reached by a national deliberative body. A bare majority vote by a convention would not ensure this.

22. Question. What provisions for judicial review should be incorporated in any procedures bill, or would the convention itself have to provide for any review by the courts?

Answer. Neither procedures legislation nor the convention itself has to provide for judicial review. If the Supreme Court decides that questions arising out of this method of amending the Constitution are justiciable, judicial review can be exercised. And the Court will not decline to rule on such matters because Congress has declared that congressional decisions on such questions shall be binding on the courts. Consequently, the provisions of S. 3 which purport to bar judicial review [Sections 3(b), 5(c), 10(b), 13(c)] are undesirable and should be deleted. For they serve no useful purpose and could aggravate the embarrassment caused by Congress by the Court's review.

On the other hand, Congress should not ease the issue of justiciability by providing for judicial review in convention procedures legislation. As the Court has conceded in stating that various aspects of the amending process involve political questions, Congress has better means and facilities available to it to determine such questions than the Court has. Hence, Congress should not act in any way to reduce the long-standing reluctance of the Supreme Court to intrude into this area.

23. Question. What would be the status of any lawsuit brought before a convention assumes its responsibilities?

Answer. To be effectual, any lawsuit seeking injunctive relief from the calling of a convention would have to be decided before the convention assembled, much less assumed its responsibilities.

24. Question. The ABA report suggests that a three judge district court panel be authorized to review any disputes that may arise with respect to a constitutional convention. Do you have an opinion as to the advisability of this panel? How do you foresee this panel being selected?

Answer. As indicated in my answer to Question 22, I do not believe that there should be any provision for judicial review in convention procedures legislation.

25. Question. As you know, S. 3 does not provide for any judicial review, whereas S. 1710 makes provision for an aggrieved State to bring an action in the Supreme Court directly, which was rejected by the ABA feeling that the initiation of suit in the Supreme Court necessarily escalated the level of controversy without regard to the significance of the basic dispute. What are your thoughts on this?

Answer. The same as my answer to Question 24.

26. Question. Do you think Section 15(a) of S. 1710 is constitutionally consistent with Article III of the Constitution, which establishes the original and appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court?

Answer. The same as my answer to Question 24.

27. Question. Should time constraints be put upon any court, panel or arbitrating body for a determination of any dispute or legal action brought by any individual or State in connection with any procedures legislation or action by the convention?

Answer. The same as my answer to Question 24.

28. Question. Section 12 of S. 1710 fails to include any provision for dealing with a situation where Congress fails to enact a concurrent resolution providing for the mode of ratification, but the proposed amendment is submitted to the States for ratification by the Administrator of the General Services Administration anyway. What are your thoughts as to whether this leaves a serious gap in the ratification procedure?

Answer. This does leave a serious gap in the ratification procedure. Article V gives Congress exclusive control over the mode of ratification of an amendment regardless of the method by which it was proposed. Consequently, a constitutional convention could not choose the mode of ratification nor could any other body but Congress do so. To fill this gap, I recommend adding the following paragraph to Section 12 of S. 1710:

"(c) Except as otherwise prescribed by concurrent resolution of the Congress, any proposed amendment to the Constitution shall become valid when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of the submission thereof to the States, or within such other period of time as may be prescribed by such proposed amendment."

In my answer to Question 11, I have already given my reason for preferring ratification by state conventions whenever this alternative method of amending the Constitution is used. Otherwise, the state legislatures have complete control over the initial and final stages of the process, which accords them excessive influence over changes in the basic framework of our political system.

29. Question. Section 13 of S. 1710 omits a provision included in S. 3 which states that Congress shall decide questions "concerning State ratification or rejection" of proposed amendments. This power to determine the validity of a State ratification or rejection is one that Congress has traditionally exercised. In the alternative, what other institution could make that determination or would be better qualified?

Answer. Both authority and reason support the proposition that no other institution is better qualified than Congress to decide questions concerning state ratification or rejection of proposed amendments. In Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), which centrally concerns ratification issues, the Court said, ". . . the question of the efficacy of ratifications by state legislatures in the light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal, should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments, with the ultimate authority in the Congress in the exercise of its control over the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment." In Coleman, the Court refused to decide how long a child labor amendment remained open to ratification in the absence of a time limitation by the Congress. The Court deferred to Congress on this question on the grounds that it involved an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social, and economic, which could not be properly weighed by the courts. The Court stated that such questions "can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment."

Also, observable facts confirm that no other institution is better qualified by composition and organization to make such determinations. The Congress comprises members from all parts of the country who are sensitively attuned to conditions in their districts. Their accessibility and collegial decision-making ensure a maximum of responsiveness to these dynamic circumstances.

[The New York Times, Feb. 16, 1979]

PROPOSED CONVENTION ON BALANCING BUDGET

(By Adam Clymer)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15.—Twenty-seven state legislatures have called on Congress to summon a constitutional convention to draft a constitutional amendment requiring the Federal budget to be balanced except in emergencies. If seven more states join them, Congress may be obliged to call the first such convention since 1787.

While the discussions in most state legislatures have been perfunctory, the subject is getting increasing attention as the total nears the 34 that would make the necessary two-thirds of the states, and three lines of debate are emerging, as follows:

¶Whether a requirement for a regularly balanced budget is a good idea in itself.

¶Whether such a requirement should be in the Constitution.

¶Whether a constitutional convention is the best place to write such an amendment, and, even if it may be, whether a convention might not run wild and try to change the fundamental elements of the Constitution.

Congressional Democrats generally answer "no" to the three questions implicit in the lines of debate. President Carter says he favors a balanced budget, opposes constitutional conventions and urges that the idea of an amendment be approached "very gingerly, very carefully."

Republicans here almost universally oppose a convention, argue for balanced budgets as a goal but split about whether an amendment would be appropriate. Many prefer an amendment that would limit only Federal spending, which is more easily controlled than tax revenue. In the remaining states, however, support for the convention effort generally comes from Republican legislators.

THE BACKGROUND

The Federal convention of 1787 fixed on two methods for amending the Constitution. On 32 occasions Congress has used one route and proposed amendments to the states. Five were not ratified by the necessary three-fourths of the legislatures, and one, the equal rights amendment, is still pending.

The other course, a convention called by Congress on the request of the states, has never been used. In two cases, however, the legislatures came within one state of the needed two-thirds.

Early in this century that pressure contributed to Congressional proposal of the amendment requiring the direct election of senators. Then, in the late 1960's, Congress held fast against an effort to undo the Supreme Court's reapportionment decision.

While attacks on deficit spending have been a political commonplace for many years, the current effort began seriously in 1975 when State Senator James Clark of Maryland, pushed a convention call through his Legislature and began talking up the idea with other state lawmakers. He also enlisted the backing of the National Taxpayers Union, a small organization best known until now for attacks on foolish-sounding Federal grants and on double-dipping by military pensioners on the Federal payroll.

The convention campaign gathered steam in the last couple of years. It has been helped along by rampant inflation, which 58 percent of the public in the latest New York Times/CBS News Poll think could be curbed by cuts in Federal spending. Since most states are required to have blanced budgets (though usually by accounting methods very different from Federal practices), the idea has until recently met little opposition.

Recently, most of the states that approved a convention call have offered Congress a way out—writing an amendment itself—as they sought to reassure those who argued that a convention might go haywire.

THE SUPPORTERS' CASE

James D. Davidson, chairman of the National Taxpayers Union, contends that deficits spur inflation and devalue the currency. He argues that emergency clauses could cope with the needs of war and depression. Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. of California, the most prominent political supporter of the drive, goes further seeing a balanced budget as a philosophical symbol for "the kind of discipline this country needs."

Mr. Davidson maintains that without a constitutional injunction members of Congress will be unable to withstand the temptation to spend more than they are willing to tax to pay for.

While most of the supporters say they are using the convention call only as a "club" to get Congress's attention, Mr. Davidson says he has no fear that it would run wild, feeling that Congress and the courts would enforce the calls from most of the states that make it clear this is the only subject they want considered. In any case, he says, the necessary 38 states would not ratify wild amendments from a convention. And he argues that a caliber of delegate comparable to those who met in Philadelphia in 1787 would be chosen for a new convention.

THE OPPONENTS' CASE

Critics such as Senators Edmund S. Muskie of Maine and John C. Culver of Iowa, both Democrats, insist that, while balanced budgets are a worthy ideal, any binding requirements would be too inflexible and would make it hard for Congress to react quickly and head off a depression when an economic downturn began.

They contend that the states that are demanding a balanced budget are hypocritical, getting $30 billion in Federal aid. They warn, with arguments that are beginning to be heard in state capitals, that revenue sharing and other grants would be cut first.

Some foes maintain that deficits have little effect on inflation anyway and that economic theory should not be embedded in the Constitution, because it would be stuck there even if the theory proved wrong. Others say that this sort of detail does not belong in a statement of great principles.

But the most effective argument the critics have is the fear of a runaway convention. Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana, chairman of the Senate's Constitutional Amendments Subcommittee, says he thinks Congress could limit a convention, but he is not sure. While legal scholars are found on both sides of the issue, opponents point out that the original convention went beyond its mandate and say they do not want to run the risk of turmoil and uncertainty that efforts to rewrite the basic law of free press, free speech or abortion would raise.

THE OUTLOOK

It now appears more likely than not that sometime this year the necessary 34th state will call for a convention, even though Congress has not received, or cannot find, some of the earlier resolutions. That confusion has led some Congressmen to contend that as few as 14 states have passed resolutions, but there is no reason to doubt that additional copies will be forwarded to Capitol Hill. This problem is probably a reflection of the fact that Congress has never set up precise procedures for dealing with such resolutions. In fact, only the Senate has ever considered legislation to regulate an actual convention. It passed such measures twice but the House took no action.

Despite the mandatory language of the Constitution that Congress "shall call a convention" once two-thirds of the states ask for one, the fact that most of the resolutions give Congress the alternative of proposing its own amendment will blunt, for a time, any requirement for an immediate convention call.

When and if the 34th state signs up Congress is likely to get seriously at work on a budget-balancing amendment of its own, with as much flexibility as it can manage, and on a revival of legislation to govern convention procedures. But the issue will not go away, and even the amendment's severest critics are aware of its strong public support, recorded by 73 percent of those in the Times/CBS News Poll.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., November 21, 1979.

HON. BIRCH BAYH,
Chairman, Subcommittee on the Constitution, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Enclosed is a copy of an independent research paper entitled "Resurrecting a Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act" which I wrote last spring in connection with my studies at Catholic University School of Law where I am presently a fourth year, evening division student.

Copies of the paper have also been furnished to the Senate sponsors and cosponsors of constitutional convention procedures legislation in the 96th Congress—S. 3, S. 520, and S. 1710. I would appreciate your making the paper and this letter of transmittal a part of the November 29 hearing record on this legislation.

The paper analyzes the development of the Article V convention provision and the modern dilemma facing the Congress—the absence of statutory convention procedures, recent applications for a constitutional convention to consider a balanced budget amendment, and unanswered questions regarding the convention alternative.

Included are a detailed analysis of the legislative history of the Ervin bill which twice passed the Senate as well as a sectional analysis of that legislation.

My firm conclusion is that a procedures bill should be enacted by the Congress. Among my recommendations for amendments to the Ervin legislation are:

A requirement that legislatures state clearly in each application its effective date;

A Congressionally-prescribed short form for applications to aid in determining their validity;

Full applicability of the provisions of the Act to applications submitted prior to enactment of the bill;

A periodic determination and count of valid applications pending before the Congress;

Convention proposal of appropriate amendments by simple majority vote, except that in any case the number be a percentatge of delegates voting;

Clarification of Congressional intent regarding rescissions of ratifications of proposed amendments before the states at the time of enactment of the bill;

Limited judicial review of Congressional determinations provided in the bill, under a standard of "clearly erroneous."

Thank you for your attention.

Sincerely,

GORDON M. THOMAS,
Legislative Assistant.

RESURRECTING A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES ACT

(By Gordon M. Thomas,[1] Columbus School of Law, The Catholc University of America, Washington, D.C.)

Article V of the Constitution of the United States provides two alternative means by which the Constitution can be amended. In pertinent part, Article V reads as follows:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . .

To date, all proposed amendments submitted to the states for ratification have been proposed directly by Congress; the constitutional convention method has never been utilized.

BACKGROUND AND HISTORY OF THE CONVENTION PROVISION

Out of a general sense of dissatisfaction with the manner in which the national government was functioning under the Articles of Confederation,[2] Congress called the Philadelphia Convention of 1787 into session for the purpose of proposing revisions, subject to the approval of Congress and the states.[3] Instead, the convention proposed an entirely new Constitution which was accepted by Congress and ratified by the requisite number of states.[4]

The convention provision in Article V, in its earliest form, was the product of a compromise between Virginia delegates, who wished the national legislature to have no part whatsoever in any amendment procedure,[5] and a broader cross section of delegates generally who thought it unwise and improper to exclude Congress completely.[6]

The Committee on Detail and Committee on Style and Revision reported draft language which, when temporarily accepted by the delegates over the course of extended debate on an amendment article, became the forerunner of the current Article V convention provision.[7] This initial text contained no provision for direct proposal of an amendment by the national legislature, nor did it include a requirement that the states ratify any action taken by a convention.

---

[1] The author of this directed research project is employed as Legislative Assistant to Representative L. H. Fountain of North Carolina, chief sponsor of a constitutional convention procedures bill in the 96th Congress, H.R. 1664. The research for the writing of this paper began several weeks prior to Representative Fountain's introduction of H.R. 1664 and was conducted independently of the author's employment duties. Views expressed herein are entirely those of the author and should not necessarily be attributed to Representative Fountain.

[2] In particular, Article XIII, which provided for amendment of the Articles of Confederation, did not permit a national consensus short of unanimity on the part of state legislatures to respond to changing circumstances. Article XIII prohibited any alteration "unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State" (emphasis supplied). Note that Article XIII made no provision for the calling of a convention when initiated by the states.

[3] See, e.g., Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation, S. Doc. No. 82, 92d Cong., 2d Sess. XL (1973).

[4] Id. For establishment of the Constitution between states ratifying it, Article VII required ratification by conventions in nine states.

[5] 1 M. Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, 22 (rev. ed. 1937). The Virginia Plan called for amendment "whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto."

[6] Id. at 202–03. The Committee of the Whole, consisting of delegates from all the colonies, rejected language excluding the national legislature.

[7] See generally C. Brickfield, Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention, House Judiciary Committee, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (Comm. Print 1957).

At the urging of Alexander Hamilton, who believed "the State legislatures will not apply for alternations but with a view to increase their own powers", and of James Madison, who offered substitute language providing for alternative modes of amendment, the convention adopted a proposal permitting Congress itself to initiate an amendment in addition to the convention method previously reported by the Committee on Detail and Committee on Style and Revision and approved by the delegates.[8] The final version contained the requirement embodied in Article V that three-fourths of the states ratify any amendment proposed under either alternative in order for it to become part of the Constitution.[9]

Writing in The Federalist Papers, Madison and Hamilton provide additional legislative history of the Article V convention provision.[10] In particular, Madison detailed the opportunity possessed by the states, in effect, to introduce amendments, an opportunity which was intended to be on a par with that of Congress:

"That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the General and the State Governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other.[11]

Little supplemental historical authority exists to explain in further detail what the Founding Fathers had in mind when they wrote the convention provision into Article V. Since the convention route has not been invoked under the current Constitution, there are no modern precedents, legislative or judicial, to use in determining a host of vexing problems and issues associated with the specter of a federal constitutional convention. Despite the lack of additional legislative history, the basic intent of the provision is clear: the convention method of proposing amendments is an alternative which cannot be ignored.

THE MODERN DILEMMA FACING THE CONGRESS

A. No statutory convention procedures

Since 1967, as a result of the absence of statutory implementation of the Article V convention alternative, the United States Senate has made significant strides toward enactment of such a bill.[12] The House of Representatives has thus far refused to act on Senate-passed legislation, and the House Judiciary Committee has not held a legislative hearing directly on the issue.[13]

Proponents of procedures legislation argue that Congress has general power under the "necessary and proper" clause [14] to enact a bill. Former Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. of North Carolina, the earliest and most noted advocate of a procedures act, has said:

"I have no doubt that the Congress has the power to legislate about the process of amendment by convention. The Congress is made the agency for calling the convention, and it is hard to see why the Congress should have been involved in this alternative method of proposal at all unless it was expected to

---

[8] Id. at 5.

[9] For a more complete account of the deliberations of the convention on these points, see Brickfield, supra note 6, at 4–6. See also ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, Amendment of the Constitution by the Convention Method Under Article V 11–14 (1974) (hereinafter cited as ABA Study).

[10] The Federalist No. 43 (J. Madison), at 278–79 (Mentor ed. 1961) and The Federalist No. 85 (A. Hamilton), at 526 (Mentor ed. 1961).

[11] The Federalist No. 43, supra note 9.

[12] See discussion infra of Congressional attempts to establish statutory procedures and guidelines.

[13] Representative Emanuel Celler, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee when the Senate first passed a procedures bill, believed "that the present state of uncertainty, while undesirable, is preferable to the active encouragement of a flood of new amendments that might result from setting up the new machinery." N.Y. Times, Oct. 20, 1971, reprinted in 117 Cong. Rec. 45184 (1971). Yet, years earlier Chairman Celler had called the issue "a long-neglected but vital problem" and wrote, "(u)nfortunately there is no statutory authority to guide this committee or the Congress in classifying applications or in counting them, nor . . . for the calling of a convention." C. Brickfield, Problems Relating to a Federal Constructional Convention, House Committee on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. Foreword (Comm. Print 1957). The issue has been touched upon peripherally in other House committee hearings. See, e.g., Amending the Constitution Relative to Taxes on Income, Inheritances, and Gifts: Hearings Before Subcommittee No. 3 of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. (1958).

[14] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

determine such questions as when sufficient appropriate applications had been received and to provide for the membership and procedures of the convention and for review and ratification of its proposals . . . (Congress) has the residual power to legislate on matters that require uniform settlement.[15]

The Supreme Court, in Dillon v. Gloss,[16] said:

"As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal with subsidiary matters of detail as the public interests and changing conditions may require; and Article V is no exception to the rule.[17]

Taking a contrary view, Professor Charles Black of Yale Law School believes:

"Article V allows only a general, no-holds barred convention. Anything which ties the hands of the delegates . . . is not the kind of deliberative body the founding fathers envisioned.[18]

The weight of scholarly authority,[19] and the unanimous passage of a procedures bill by the Senate on two occasions,[20] without serious question during the legislative debate as to the bill's constitutionality, indicate that Congress has power to implement by statute the convention alternative of Article V, subject to a standard of reasonableness.[21]

B. Proposals regarding a constitutional amendment to require a balanced Federal budget

Renewed interest in the constitutional convention issue has surfaced in recent months as the result of a nationwide campaign [22] to write into the Constitution an amendment requiring a balanced federal budget for each fiscal year except in time of war or national emergency as declared by Congress.[23]

As part of the drive to require a balanced federal budget, approximately 29 state legislatures,[24] five short of the 34 (two-thirds) necessary under Article V, have passed resolutions of application to the Congress to call a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposring a balanced budget amendment.[25] There is difficulty in arriving at a binding count of valid convention applications before Congress since there are no established procedures for the receipt, notation, tabulation, and central storage of such applications.

The Library of Congress, through its own efforts as well as through the use of data compiled by a private source, has counted up to 29 applications for a balanced budget convention. Not all of the 29 have been received by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate and officially noted in the Congressional Record, or have been located in the files of the Senate and House Judiciary Committees. Some applications are conditional and therefore of questionable validity in that they call on Congress first to propose an amendment directly, and, failing that, then to call a convention.[26]

Several states which have passed, but perhaps erroneosuly submitted, applications to the Congress, or have failed altogether to submit them, have made

---

[15] Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 875, 879, 880 (1968) (hereinafter cited as Ervin article).

[16] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[17] Id. at 376.

[18] Margolick, "Constitutional Convention?", The National Law Journal, Mar. 5, 1979, at 1, col. 2 (paraphrasing Professor Black). See also Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 Yale L.J. 189 (1972).

[19] See, e.g., Federal Constitutional Convention: Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary, 90th Congress, 1st Session (1967) (hereinafter cited as Senate Hearings).

[20] The Senate passed S. 215 of the 92d Congress by a vote of 84–0, 117 Congressional Record 36804 (1971), and S. 1272 of the 93d Congress by voice vote, 119 Congressional Record 22731 (1973).

[21] See Senate Hearings, supra note 18, at 34–38 (statement of Theodore C. Sorensen). See also, 117 Congressional Record 36766 (1971) (statement of Sen. Bayh).

[22] The campaign has been spearheaded by the National Taxpayers Union, a Washington lobbying organization, and California Governor Jerry Brown.

[23] Dozens of resolutions calling for Congress to propose such an amendment directly have been introduced in the 96th Congress. The Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution opened hearings on the issue on Mar. 12, 1979. 125 Congressional Record D234 (daily ed. Mar. 12, 1979). See, e.g., S.J. Res. 5, S.J. Res. 6, S.J. Res. 18, and S.J. Res. 38, 96th Cong, 1st Sess (1979). The House Judiciary Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law began hearings on similar House resolutions on Mar. 27, 1979. 125 Congressional Record D340 (daily ed. Mar. 27, 1979).

[24] See infra note 25. The number of valid applications before the Congress is open to question.

[25] D. Huckabee, "Constitutional Convention Applications: Addressing the Controversy of Counting State Applications Relating to a Deficit Spending Amendment." The Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, Government Division 7–11 (rev. print Mar. 12, 1979).

[26] Id.

copies available to individual members of Congress for publication in the Congressional Record, or have recently sent newly certified copies to Congress for official notation in the Congresional Record.[27]

C. Unanswered questions

Assuming that Congress has power to regulate convention procedures by statute,[28] and that Congress may pass upon the validity of submitted applications, several questions arise in connection with the calling and conducting of a convention. Among the more important and difficult are whether a convention call by Congress when valid applications are received from two-thirds of the state legislatures is mandatory.[29] whether a convention can be limited to one or more subjects as specified in the applications (or whether it is free to propose anything up to and including a general revision of the Constitution),[30] how amendments may be proposed by a convention,[31] and what role, if any, Congress has in approving proposed amendments and transmitting them to the states.

THE ERVIN LEGISLATION: AN ATTEMPT TO LEGISLATE ANSWERS

A. Legislative history

In response to Supreme Court decisions in the early 1960s requiring reapportionment of state legislatures,[32] several states applied to Congress for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment reversing those decisions. By 1967, 32 states, two short of two-thirds, had submitted applications on this subject. In response, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. introduced legislation for the first time to provide procedures governing such a convention.[33]

Senator Ervin's Judiciary Subcommittee on Separation of Powers held two days of hearings on the bill in 1967.[34] But it was not until 1971 that the legislation,[35] modified as the result of the 1967 hearings and public discussion, was reported to the Senate by the full Judiciary Committee.[36]

The Ervin legislation was substantially amended in one respect on the Senate floor in 1971. The bill as reported provided that a convention could propose amendments by a simple majority vote of the delegates.[37] The Senate adopted an amendment by Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana requiring a two-thirds majority vote.[38] The bill then passed the Senate unanimously,[39] but was not considered by the House.[40] The bill, in identical form, was introduced in and passed the Senate unanimously, without debate, in 1973,[41] again without subsequent consideration by the House.

---

[27] See, e.g., 125 Congressional Record S1304–13 (daily ed. Feb. 8, 1979) (remarks of Sen. H. Byrd), 125 Congressional Record H808–11 (daily ed. Feb. 21, 1979) (remarks of Rep. Volkmer). Whether these published compilations constitute valid receipt by Congress is an open question. See also sundry House memorials and Senate petitions officially noted and published in 125 Congressional Record, 96th Congress (indexed in Congressional Record Index under headings "Speaker of the House" and "Vice President").

[28] See supra note 20.

[29] See, The Federalist No. 85, supra note 9, at 526. Hamilton wrote: "By the fifth article . . . the Congress will be obliged (emphasis in the original) . . . to call a convention. . . . The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress 'shall (emphasis in the original) call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."
Contra, Corwin and Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 185 (1951). Related unresolved questions include whether a call is simply a ministerial act and whether Congress can be judicially compelled to call a convention. Senator Ervin believed the courts cannot order Congressional action because of the separation of powers doctrine and because the matter may be labeled a political question. He drafted his bill, see infra note 32, to reflect a Congressional "duty" to call a convention at the proper time in furtherance of a "clear obligation" to support the Constitution as reflected in the Congressional oath of office. Ervin article, supra note 14, at 886.

[30] The thesis of Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), is that Congress has sole discretion on questions concerning amendment procedure. See also, remarks of Sen. Ervin, supra note 14. Contra see Black, supra note 17.

[31] See infra note 37, regarding floor debate on whether amendments should be proposed by two-thirds or by a simple majority of convention delegates.

[32] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

[33] S. 2307, 90th Congress, 1st Session (1967). The bill was reintroduced two years later, S. 623, 91st Congress, 1st Session (1969).

[34] Senate Hearings, supra note 18.

[35] S. 215, 92d Congress, 1st Session (1971) (hereinafter cited as Ervin bill).

[36] S. Rep. No. 336, 92d Congress, 1st Session (1971) (hereinafter cited as 1971 report).

[37] Ervin bill, supra note 34, § 10(a).

[38] 117 Cong. Rec. 36770 (1971). The vote was 45–39.

[39] See, supra note 19.

[41] S. 1272, 93d Congress, 1st Session (1973) and S. Rep. No. 293, 93d Congress, 1st Session (1973) (substantively identical to 1971 report, supra note 35).

[40] See, supra note 12.

In speaking in favor of his amendment in 1971, Senator Bayh said:

"(T)he two-thirds vote requirement has served as one of the most effective protectors of the Constitution against the incursion of poorly thought out, hastily drafted, and ephemeral amendments." [42]

Replying on behalf of retaining the majority vote language, Senator Ervin said:

"The Founding Fathers . . . put in one protection against hasty action and that was that it took at least two-thirds of the States to cause Congress to call a constitutional convention. Then they put another stringent safeguard against any hasty action by providing that it took three-quarters of the States to ratify any of the amendments submitted by the constitutional convention before it could be a part of the Constitution." [43]

Senator Ervin argued that the Constitution is silent on the question of convention voting and continued:

"It is a fundamental principle that Congress cannot add anything to the Constitution by one of its acts . . . (W)hen power is delegated to a body, and the numbers of the members of that body who are to exercise that power are not designated, that body acts through a majority vote of its members . . . (The Bayh amendment) is an effort to add something to the Constitution that is not in the Constitution . . . If Congress can say that it takes two-thirds of the delegates to submit an amendment, the Congress can say it can take 99 percent, and, therefore, Congress could nullify article V." [44]

In support of Senator Ervin's position, Senator Lawton Chiles of Florida said: ". . . there is a well established parliamentary procedure and principle of law that majority vote shall be used unless a document such as our Constitution provides otherwise. (An) example is when the House of Representatives brings impeachment proceedings against an individual by a majority vote. However, the Senate, according to the Constitution, must determine the guilt or innocence by a two-thirds vote . . . If our forefathers were allowed to write our Constitution by majority votes, so should subsequent conventions, if called, be allowed to propose amendments by majority vote." [45]

B. Sectional analysis

Section 1 provides the short title.[46]

Section 2 provides that a state legislature's application shall state the nature [47] of the amendment(s) to be proposed. The Act shall apply only to applications received after its enactment.

Section 3 provides that a state legislature [48] shall use its usual statutory enactment procedures for applications, but that gubernatorial approval of the application is not needed.[49] Congress alone shall have power to determine all adoption-related questions and its decisions will be binding on the courts.[50]

Section 4 states technical requirements regarding transmittal of applications to Congress, their content, and official reports of their receipt in each House.

Section 5 provides that applications are effective for seven years unless rescinded sooner in the same manner in which adopted (unless two-thirds of the states have submitted valid applications, in which case no rescissions can be [42] 117 Cong. Rec. 36762 (1971).

---

[43] Id. at 36765.

[44] Id. at 36766. Senator Bayh replied that a 99 percent requirement would be unreasonable. Id.

[45] Id. at 36770.

[46] 1971 report, supra note 35, at 1, 2. The intent of the bill is to establish procedures for conventions considering amendment(s) in a specific area or areas, not for a convention called for the general revision of the Constitution, which the committee believes is a separate issue.

[47] Ervin article, supra note 14, at 884. This provision allows the states "to identify the problem or problems" for a convention to consider, yet prevents the states from "defin(ing) the subject so narrowly as to deprive the convention of all deliberative freedom . . . The convention would be confined to that subject, but it would be free to consider the propriety of proposing any amendment and the form the amendment should take." This would prevent Congress from "submit(ting) to a convention a given text of an amendment, demanding an up or down vote on it alone." See also, 1971 report, supra note 35, at 10, 11.

[48] A legislature is "the representative body which (makes) the laws of the people." Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 227 (1919).

[49] The legislatures are performing essentially a federal function not subject to a governor's veto. Ervin article, supra note 14, at 888, 889. See also, 1971 report, supra note 35, at 14.

[50] See infra note 65, regarding the American Civil Liberties Union's 1971 position on judicial review.

made). Congress shall determine all questions relating to rescission and its decisions will be binding on the courts.[51]

Section 6 describes Congressional record keeping and reporting requirements. When two-thirds of the states have submitted applications on the same subject, each House shall determine whether the applications are valid. If a sufficient number are valid,[52] each House shall agree to a concurrent resolution calling a convention, setting the time and place of its meeting which must be within one year of the resolution, and setting the nature of amendment(s) which may be considered.

Section 7 sets the number of delegates from each state as the number of Senators and Representatives to which it is entitled.[53] Delegates are to be elected,[54] one from each Congressional district, and two at-large from each state. Governors shall fill vacancies by appointment. Delegates shall enjoy the same constitutional immunities as members of Congress and shall receive compensation for services and expenses.

Section 8 sets procedures for convening the convention (by the Vice President), and provides for the delegates' oath of office committing them "to refrain from proposing or casting (a) vote in favor of any proposed amendment . . . relating to any subject which is not named or described in the concurrent resolution" calling the convention.

Section 9 dictates procedures at the convention: each delegate shall have one vote, a daily verbatim record of proceedings shall be published, and the convention may meet for no longer than one year from the date of its first meeting unless Congress extends its life.

Section 10 provides that amendments may be proposed by a two-thirds vote of the total number of convention delegates,[55] and that in no event may a convention propose any amendment(s) ultra vires. Congress shall decide all proposal-related questions and its decisions will be binding on the courts.[56]

Section 11 sets post-convention procedures: Congress shall receive any proposed amendments and determine the time and manner of ratification by the states. Congress may disapprove the submission of a proposed amendment to the states if it "relates to or includes a subject" not contained in the resolution calling the convention or if convention procedures "were not in substantial conformity" with the Act.[57]

Section 12 routinely repeats the ratification process detailed in Article V and provides that ratification must occur, if at all, within seven years unless Congress sets a different time limit.

Section 13 permits a state to rescind an earlier ratification at any time until three-fourths of the states have ratified a proposed amendment.[58] States may ratify after having first rejected a proposed amendment. Questions relating to ratification or rejection shall be determined by Congress and its decisions will be binding on the courts.[59]

Section 14 stipulates that an amendment shall be proclaimed as part of the Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the states.

Section 15 sets the effective date of a new amendment as that specified therein, or, if none is specified, the date of ratification by the last state necessary to constitute three-fourths.

---

[51] Id.

[52] Congress may weigh only the technical sufficiency and the validity of the applications, and may not address the wisdom and the necessity of considering proposed amendments on a given subject. Ervin article, supra note 14, at 886.

[53] This formula gives less populated states a higher, disproportionate share of the total voting power. States with the largest populations would have a greater proportionate share of the total vote if the number of delegates were the same as the number of members in the House of Representatives only. See, ABA Study, supra note 8, at 34–37 for a discussion of the issue as it pertains to the constitutional doctrine of one person, one vote.

[54] The original 1967 Ervin bill, supra note 32, allowed delegates to be elected or appointed, as provided in each State.

[55] See discussion of Senator Bayh's amendment supra.

[56] See infra note 64.

[57] Ervin article, supra note 14, at 894. Congress may refuse to submit an amendment to the States on account of procedural irregularities at the convention, but may not refuse to submit one on account of substantive reasons which go to the merits of the particular subject matter.

[58] See discussion infra regarding the need to amend this section in light of proposed amendments currently before the state legislatures.

[59] See infra note 64.

Senator Ervin retired from the Senate at the close of the 93rd Congress. His bill in basic form has been reintroduced in each subsequent Congress, including the present Congress, the 96th.[60] No further action on the bill directly has been taken in either the Senate or the House. All convention procedures bills introduced since Senator Ervin's retirement have been either identical to his legislation or altered only slightly, save for some continuing debate, reflected in the bills, as to the number of convention delegates needed to propose an amendment (simple majority or two-thirds).

Representative Don Edwards of California, chairman of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, is reluctant to hold hearings on convention procedures bills referred to it. He "fears that passage of a procedures bill would encourage the push for a constitutional convention" and has said "Anything that would encourage this sort of utilization of Article V is unwise." [61]

Similarly, Senator Bayh's Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution has scheduled no hearings on procedures proposals.[62]

RECOMMENDATIONS

Section 2 of the Ervin bill should be amended to require legislatures to state clearly in each application the effective date thereof. Potential problems arise when a state submits a conditional application; for example, petitioning Congress to call a convention only if Congress itself first fails to propose an amendment directly.[63] Applications should therefore include the date on which any contingency ceases and the petition for a convention vests.

Section 2 should also be amended by prescribing a short form for applications, to be officially accepted by Congress, as a way of reducing the chances of serious questions arising as to the validity of applications. The form should include such essential elements as a general description of the subject matter to be considered by a convention, but without specifying the text of a proposed amendment, and the effective date of the application. Congress could at the same time freely permit the state legislatures to include additional information, such as a statement of findings, in resolutions beyond the basic form requirements.

In addition, Section 2 should be amended so that the Act will apply with full force to applications submitted to Congress prior to its enactment.

Section 4 of the bill should be amended to include a procedure for periodic determination of the number of valid applications before Congress. Congressional policy should be to keep a running tabulation to prevent delayed determinations of validity based on the merits of any particular issue possibly subject to a convention call. The periodic determinations should include a requirement of timely statements on the floor of each House, by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, as to the number of valid applications then before Congress in each subject area. The American Bar Association has proposed draft language providing that an application will be valid unless both Houses of Congress, by concurrent resolution, determine it to be invalid, either in whole or in part, within sixty days of its receipt.[64]

Section 10(a) of the Senate-passed Ervin bill should be amended in two respects. First, only a simple majority vote of convention delegates should be [60] For the 94th and 95th Congresses, see S. 1815, 94th Congress, 1st Session (1975); S. 1880, 95th Congress, 1st Session (1977); H.R. 7008, 95th Congress, 1st Session (1977); H.R. 8560, 95th Congress, 1st Session (1977); H.R. 10134, 95th Congress, 1st Session (1977); H.R. 10836, 95th Congress, 2d Session (1978); H.R. 11600, 95th Congress, 2d Session (1978). For the current 96th Congress, see S. 3, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979); S. 520, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979); H.R. 84, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979); H.R. 500, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979); H.R. 1664, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979); H.R. 1964, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979); H.R. 2274, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979); H.R. 2587, 96th Congress, 1st Session (1979). On Mar. 1, 1979, Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina, sponsor of S. 520, attempted through unanimous consent to bring the bill before the Senate for immediate consideration, but Senator Bayh, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution, to which convention procedures legislation is referred, objected. 125 Congressional Record S. 1920–21 (daily ed. Mar. 1, 1979). At the request of Senator Helms and by unanimous consent, S. 520 has since been ordered placed onto the Senate calendar. 125 Congressional Record S. 4138 (daily ed. Apr. 9, 1979).

---

[61] Hucker, "Constitutional Convention Poses Questions," Congressional Quarterly, Feb. 17, 1979, 273, 275.

[62] Id.

[63] See, Huckabee, supra note 24.

[64] ABA Study, supra note 8, at 49.

required to propose amendments. The constitutional arguments of Senator Ervin and Senator Chiles are persuasive. It ought to be conclusively presumed that a simple majority vote prevails unless the Constitution provides otherwise. In addition, as Senator Ervin said during floor debate on the question, two adequate safeguards against hasty actions are already explicitly provided in the Constitution (two-thirds of the state legislatures must apply for a convention and three-fourths of the states must ratify a proposed amendment before it becomes part of the Constitution). Second, the number of votes necessary to propose an amendment should in any case be a percentage of delegates voting instead of the total number of delegates to the convention. Congress conducts business entirely on the basis of a percentage of members voting—enactment of legislation, override of Presidential vetoes, expulsion of members, impeachment and conviction, and direct proposal of constitutional amendments under Article V. A constitutional convention should not be made subject to a higher, more difficult standard.

Section 13(a), regarding rescission of ratifications, should be amended to make clear the Congressional intent on rescission of any proposed amendments before the states at the time of the enactment of the bill. This is particularly important in light of the continuing debate over the validity of rescissions of state ratifications of the Equal Rights Amendment.

A new Section 16 should be added authorizing limited judicial review of Congressional determinations and findings provided for elsewhere in the bill. The American Bar Association has drafted language providing that Congressional determinations and findings "shall be binding and final unless clearly erroneous." [65] The "clearly erroneous" standard of review provides a judicial check against arbitrary Congressional actions, yet forcefully acknowledges the primary political role of Congress in determining questions concerning the amendment process. In this regard, the American Civil Liberties Union has persuasively argued:

"Questions arising under Article V are constitutional in character and have extremely important consequences for the body politic . . . While Congress should make the initial determination on questions arising under Article V, the final decision on all constitutional questions should rest in the courts of the United States." [66]

Various sections of the Ervin legislation which provide for binding determination by Congress of questions arising under the Act should be appropriately amended to reflect the addition of a section authorizing limited judicial review.

In order to track convention applications more easily, the Senate and House should amend their respective rules to provide a special section in the Congressional Record entitled "Constitutional Convention Applications", in which all applications would be printed in their entirety, with a similar heading in the Congressional Record Index.[67]

CONCLUSION

Congress should immediately begin the process of enacting a constitutional convention procedures bill, using as a firm basis the comprehensive Ervin legisaltion twice passed by the Senate. As the ABA has said with regard to further delay:

"If we fail to deal now with the uncertainties of the convention method, we could be courting a constitutional crisis of grave proportions. We would be running the enormous risk that procedures for a national constitutional convention would have to be forged in time of divisive controversy and confusion when there would be a high premium on obstructive and result-oriented tactics.

"It is far more prudent, we believe, to confront the problem openly and to supply safeguards and general rules in advance." [68]

Should the number of applications for a balanced budget convention soon approach the magic number of 34, it is probable that Congress would itself pro-

---

[65] Id. at 57.

[66] Letter from Hope Eastman, Acting Director, American Civil Liberties Union, to Senator Birch Bayh, Oct. 8, 1971, reprinted in 117 Congressional Record 36763 (1971).

[67] For a detailed examination of current Senate and House practices on memorials and petitions, which do not provide for separate classification of constitutional convention applications, See, Stasny, "State Applications for a Convention to Amend the Federal Constitution," reprinted in 123 Congressional Record S 18494 at 18495 (daily ed. Nov. 2, 1977).

[68] ABA Study, supra note 8, at 8.

pose some sort of amendment addressing the issue in order to avoid being forced into calling a convention over which it arguably could exercise no substance control. There is precedent for this idea: Congress proposed an amendment providing for direct election of Senators, which later became the Seventeenth Amendment, when the state legislatures were only one application short of two-thirds.[69] The Library of Congress has written: ". . . the political realities no doubt are that if there is an authentic national movement underlying a petitioning by two-thirds of the States there will be a response by Congress." [70]

Whether the response by the 96th Congress will be to enact a procedures bill, to propose directly a balanced budget amendment, to mandate a balanced budget by state, or to do nothing at all remains to be seen. Should Congress be faced with the duty of calling a convention, it is to be hoped that Congress will act without basing procedural decisions on the merits of the issue at hand. To do otherwise would be to abrogate the intent of the Founding Fathers.

The Senate Judiciary Committee in 1971 stated the need for procedures legislation as being: ". . . to avoid what might well be an unseemly and chaotic imbroglio if the question of procedure were to arise simultaneously with the presentation of a substantive issue by two-thirds of the State legislatures. Should article V be invoked in the absence of this legislation, it is not improbable that our country will be faced with a constitutional crisis the dimensions of which have rarely been matched in our history." [71]

The 96th Congress would do well to remember that admonition.

REWRITING THE CONSTITUTION: LIFE, LIBERTY, AND A BALANCED BUDGET

(By Ben Martin)

Who do you like for president of the next constitutional convention—Sam Ervin or Archibald Cox? Take your time deciding, but do not take too long; the drive for a convention to require a balanced budget is bearing in on Washington. Officials there are hurrying to avoid it, but the thirty-fourth state could call for a convention within months. Then Congress would have to decide what to do about it, and the stakes could not be higher.

The call for a balanced budget has been raised to draw official Washington's attention finally to taxes, inflation, and a rising sense that government is out of control. It is a summary complaint against the growth of government, reflecting a basic insight that getting and spending, along with regulation, are the heart of public policy. It steps over piecemeal issues, and the demand for constitutional amendment underscores the seriousness of the complaint.[1]

The states have petitioned for a balanced budget, but limiting government spending is more nearly the matter. "Balanced budget" is a slogan that makes sense in individuals' terms, but on the federal level even higher taxes to balance government spending is the last thing advocates want. Another scheme—perhaps more sensible—would tie annual spending to increases in the gross national product.

Both ideas are enormously popular. In July, 1978, a Gallup survey found 81 percent polled favoring an amendment requiring a balanced budget, though the figure slipped to 70 percent in an AP/NBC poll last February. And a CBS News/New York Times poll last November found 76 percent favoring a cut in spending over a tax cut. Yet people are realistic: 70 percent doubted politicians will work to balance the budget.

Americans still display overwhelming support for the Constitution. At the same time, there is widespread disaffection and a sense of distance from government. The Harris poll found alienation from politics has doubled in a decade. Most believe the American condition is worse now than in the past,

---

[69] 1971 report, supra note 35, at 6.
[70] Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, supra note 2, at 858.
[71] 1971 report, supra note 35, at 2.
[1] Article V. "The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

and they also feel things will not improve. For the first time, there is personal pessimism as well; a maority now feel that their personal situations will deteriorate in the future, along with the country as a whole. And they pin the blame on Washington. Fewer have confidence in the central government than in state and local governments, and confidence levels are lower overall for governmental than for private institutions—except for organized labor, which is distrusted as much as the federal government.

The states have applied to Congress hundreds of times before, for a wide range of amendments, but this time Washington is worried. With the steady centralization of power and the emergence of a national press, the vectors of cultural and political innovation seemed clear: elite to mass, Washington to hinterland, figurative center to periphery. But now, out of nowhere—out of state legislatures, of all places—comes this vulgar threat to the American mandarinate.

What passes for leadership of the movement comes from something called the National Taxpayers Union, although a Maryland state senator, James Clark, has also been pushing the idea with other state legislators since 1974.

Since the Supreme Court has held that no individual taxpayer has standing to sue Congress over spending from the general treasury, the drive to limit spending constitutionally amounts to a grand, political class-action suit by taxpayers. The convention mode is the closest thing there is in the Constitution to the techniques of popular initiative and referendum, reflecting popular distrust of political establishments.

State legislators calling for a balanced budget are seen in Washington as traitors to the official class, siding with the voters against their big brothers at the national level and making them look bad. Accordingly, the first response in the capital was to threaten to shut off the federal money spigot to the states and localities: you want less spending, goodbye revenue sharing. This has had a sobering effect; state governors are already complaining about punitive blackmail from Washington.

Liberal Democrats generally oppose, in increasing order of ferocity: requiring a balanced budget; doing it by constitutional amendment; and doing that in another constitutional convention. Republicans in Washington also oppose a convention, but favor a balanced budget and are moving toward the method of amendment. The House Republican Policy Committee endorsed both a constitutionally required balanced budget and a limit on federal spending last spring, but party leaders in both chambers oppose another convention.

Jerry Brown of California is trying to ride the west wind by supporting all three, while Jimmy Carter of Washington opposes them. Brown's embrace of Proposition 13 last year assured his reelection as governor, but his support for a constitutional convention has hurt his chances for the Presidential nomination, at least in the party of government subsidy. He has little support among the union leaders, Democratic regulars, and political activists who are more liberal than the rank-and-file but who dominate the party's organization. They have little love for Carter and may pine for Kennedy, but Brown's endorsement of a balanced-budget amendment is considered heresy and may have disqualified him even as stalking horse for Kennedy.

The national press has treated the taxpayers' revolt from the beginning as an outlandish oddity—more dangerously reactionary than stock-car racing, but about as bizarre. It has received only grudging recognition as a genuinely popular trend and still is not designated as a fully respectable movement. Episodic coverage of the drive for another constitutional convention gave way early this year to a rash of press stories pronouncing it "sputtering" and tying it to Jerry Brown, whom the revisionists were then transforming from a serious candidate into a guru on safari. By siding with the taxpaying majority, Brown forfeited his greatest political asset—the willingness of the press to be used—and guaranteed coverage of his shallowness and naked ambition.

President Carter has avoided that mistake, which should aid his renomination but could jeopardize his reelection. He opposes legally requiring a balanced budget, on the advice of Charles Schultze, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers. who says it would prevent the government from fighting recessions and would be impossible to administer. This reflects the countercyclical economic notion on which fiscal policy supposedly has been set for nearly twenty years, in which deficits during recession years are, in theory, offset by surpluses in boom years to produce steady growth without accumulating deficits. The trouble is that the surpluses in the good years have not been tried. The last small surplus was in 1969, and inflation remains chronic, which allows government the luxury of ever-increasing revenues without the messiness of a tax increase.

Spending is politically profitable; taxing is not. Inflation conveniently pushes taxpayers into higher brackets, even when purchasing power declines, and tax revenues increase automatically. Spending can then rise, illusory "tax cuts" can be made noisily every few years, and government can grow.

In the past twenty-five years, the proportion of the income of the average American family taken in taxes has doubled. Federal, state, and local taxes now take more than a third of the net national product. Where does it all go? Neo-Keynesian theory helps justify government spending to stimulate demand, but it says nothing about who the payers and payees ought to be. Liberal Democratic social theory and constituency interests provide the answer: they should be different people. In the 1970s, for the first time in our history, the primary business of the central government became the transfer of income among individuals. Those in the upper half of adjusted gross incomes (above $8,931 in 1975) paid ninety-three percent of all the personal income taxes collected by the Internal Revenue Service, while purposeful transfer programs accounted for more than half of all the spending. This has created a growing class of permanent government dependents who see their subsidies as entitlements and who, together with public bureaucrats, provide vital support for the Democratic party.

The calls for a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget are an attempt to check the growth of the share of the national income taken by government. Some think an amendment that limits spending would accomplish that more directly, since taxes could be raised to balance any budget. The National Tax Limitation Committee, led by Milton Friedman, has proposed an amendment to Congress that would limit federal spending hikes to increases in the GNP, with a downward adjustment for inflation that would give politicians an incentive for reducing inflation rather than increasing it, as at present.

In practice, both ideas, balancing budgets and limiting spending, might tend to have the same effects. Taxpayers' complaints would slow the rise in taxes—and therefore spending—a bit if balanced budgets were required; and inflation-swollen taxes would quickly rise enough to balance the budget if spending were limited by law. Both amendments contain escape clauses that would free spending in case of national emergency, but neo-Keynesian economists—and President Carter—still claim they are insufficiently flexible to fight recessions.

Of course, inflexibility is the whole point of these spending limitations. Like locked liquor cabinets, they are intended to prevent larceny and intemperance in those we mistrust. Washington is a conglomerate of subgovernments—coteries of Congressmen and their staffs, bureaucrats, and lobbyists—concerned with different policy areas. Each of these iron triangles serves itself and its constituents in the short term, and the logrolling among them produces total spending and policy outcomes of unexpected proportions. The sluice points monitored by party leadership, the Congressional Budget Committees, and the Office of Management and Budget are unable to check the great flow of policy and spending. The proposed amendments to control the budget, are appropriately, determinedly constitutional, to govern profligate impulses when self-discipline is absent and resolution inadequate.

Democrats in Congress want to give resolution another try. The defeat of many liberal Democrats last November and the threat of the constitutional convention have been instructive. Suddenly, many are for a balanced budget—but not by constitutional amendment. And few are willing to risk another convention. Democrats have lost five of the six special elections for House seats since Carter's election; however, most members can rely on their anonymity and the advantages of office they have bought themselves to assure reelection.

The most worried are those deficit spenders in the Senate who feasted on the spoils of Watergate in 1974, but who now must face a less distracted electorate: Gary Hart of Colorado, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, John Durkin of New Hampshire, John Culver, George McGovern, Frank Church, Birch Bayh. They are getting their campaigns started earlier than usual, putting distance between themselves and Carter, and hoping the voters overlook the unbalanced budget in favor of all the water projects they've lugged into their states.

But fiscal 1981 is the year the Congressional Budget Committees are planning a balanced budget, for the first time in more than a decade, though only after another $23-billion deficit in fiscal 1980, the fruit of Carter's "austerity." They may make it, too, because inflation is pushing tax receipts so high so fast that the 1981 budget could be balanced with even enough left over for a tax cut of some $15 billion.

That would meet Carter's campaign promise of 1976, but Congressional leaders are also hoping the promise of a balanced budget in just a couple of years will reduce pressure on state legislatures for another constitutional convention. In 1980, it would remain only that—a promise—but that is probably the best the Democrats can do.

President Carter has called the proposal for a second convention "extremely dangerous," citing fears that it might throw out the Bill of Rights and undermine civil liberties, a curious reaction from a candidate who only wanted to make the government as good as the American people. But opponents believe that the American people would not be represented at another convention; it would be dominated by special interests.

If another convention were called, Congress would try to restrict its deliberations to the budget amendment, although most legal scholars doubt the validity of such an attempt. Prof. Charles Black of Yale Law School feels the framers intended the Congressional method for piecemeal amendment and the convention mode only when so many were dissatisfied with their government that a general revision was necessary. All the state applications for a balanced-budget amendment have limited their calls specifically to that subject, and some have called for a convention only if Congress fails to initiate such an amendment; but, once gathered, the delegates could argue convincingly that they were entitled to set their own agenda, and such a run-away assembly is the stunning possibility that mesmerizes everyone. At the furthest edge of plausibility, the delegates could propose drastic changes for the Constitution and also try to change the ratification procedure, as the first convention in Philadelphia did in 1787.

Whatever amendments another convention produced, the Congress might claim the right to refuse to submit them to the states. But whatever that outcome, three-fourths of the states must still ratify them to become part of the Constitution, and it is hard to imagine any attempts to avoid that last requirement. This provision, which no one has suggested changing, should assuage any reasonable fears about a wide-open convention, for any amendment that thirty-eight states approved could not be all bad. Nor is ratification likely to be causual for any amendment from now on, after the cautionary tale of the ERA.

We should admit that the first Constitution is moribound. Except for a few institutions—the dominant federal structure is not one of them—the original Constitution is largely irrelevant to contemporary public affairs. It set a framework for government on principles widely shared by Americans in the eighteenth century, still held by the majority today, but long abandoned by our governors.

From the Mayflower Compact through the Articles of Confederation, Americans relied upon written fundamental laws to establish, but just as importantly to limit, government. The Constitution was written to correct the inadequacies of the Articles primarily in defense and foreign affairs, for which the new central government was allowed to finance itself. The commerce and currency clauses were intended to prevent state regulation and paper money. The Bill of Rights was intended as a further check on the central government, although it has become a license for central control.

Federalism is obliterated now, of course. State and local governments have become franchisees of Washington, dependent upon revenue carrots and submissive to the stick that inevitably followed. There are few domains left now for which federal action is unprecedented. Central government expansion has been driven through every opening in the first Constitution. The antifederalists were right.

The Constitution's careful separation of powers has been wrecked by the growth of Presidential initiative and Congressional delegation to the bureaucracy. The least accountable arms of central government, bureaucracy and the courts, govern most freely. What began as a Constitution of states' and private rights has been turned into a cornucopia of powers.

Building a collective state in this century has required demolition of the classical liberal values of the Constitution. Redistribution and regulation have required progressive assaults on property, and an antibourgeois animus has driven the architects of our new constitutional order. The new premises of public policy have turned taxpayers' money into "public funding" or "federal spending." Senator Kennedy has criticized the "blank check for all the spending programs contained in the Internal Revenue Code—the tax expenditure programs." Even the money the government lets you keep should not be regarded as "yours," rather as a boon from Washington. Senator McGovern described Californians voting for Proposition 13 as "degrading hedonists."

Today's rebellion is aonther middle-class reassertion of the legitimacy of the inherited order, as was the original Revolution. Tax rebels today would agree with the revolutionary aim of John Adams: "I say again that resistance to innovation and the unlimited claims of Parliament, and not any new form of government, was the object of the Revolution."

Most of the values underlying that Revolution and the Constitution were found in the thought of John Locke, who distinguished between occasional violations of natural law inevitable under any form of government and chronic violations constituting a "long train of abuses, prevarications, and artifices" marking degeneration into tyranny, against which rebellion became a right, even a duty. Liberty was conceived as freedom from alien dictation, freedom from government, and American conditions seemed so neatly to confirm Locke's views that they became the bedrock of American political thought.

Americans generally expect and accept social change, but primarily outside politics and not as a sweeping purpose of government. They generally support the Lockean emphasis on private property as crucial to individual liberty, and they value achievement still. It is no wonder what mounting redistribution and regulation have evoked today Jefferson's charge against King George III, that "he has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harass our People, and eat out their substance."

Washington is mobilizing to avoid another constitutional convention. The Congress has been alternately soothing the states with promises of a balanced budget by 1981 and threatening them with cuts in revenue sharing. Senator Bayh's Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution has been holding hearings on an amendment, and others are on in the House.

President Carter has set up a squad of staff members from the White House and the Office of Management and Budget to pressure governors and legislative leaders in key "battlefront" states not to call for a convention. It is cooperating with a group called the Citizens for the Constitution, brought together by Lt. Gov. Thomas P. O'Neill III of Massachusetts to lobby against a convention, backed in turn by labor unions, civil-rights groups, and public-interest groups.

Congress might try to get by with some general resolution for fiscal responsibility, hoping that will stem the tide. Or it might propose a balanced-budget amendment itself, hoping that thirty-eight states will not ratify it after they realize that balancing is not the same as controlling spending. Nearly the most dangerous move, from liberal Democrats' perspective, would be a Congressional amendment to tie annual spending to increases in the GNP. This makes more sense than a balanced-budget requirement and comes closest to satisfying tax rebels.

Democrats in Congress have resisted efforts to set ground rules of a convention by law. Such a law would set the time, place, delegate-selection, and voting procedures and try to set the issue to be considered.

Delegates would probably be elected in House districts, with seats at large from each state. If the thirty-fourth state applied quickly enough and Congress moved soon enough, Washington politicians might prefer delegate selection at the same time as the 1980 elections, so they could get double duty from their campaign funds and organization. That timing would probably help offset the damage to Democrats if the elections of delegates were on a separate ballot, formally nonpartisan, and decided by the issue.

In any case, the advantages of Washington incumbents in such elections would be so great that Congress might be forced to set the size of the convention at, say, twice that of the Electoral College, instead of just one from each district and two from each state. This would still be an assembly of just under 1,100 and would make it easier for Ralph Nader, César Chavez, and William Buckley to join the crowd.

Contemporary liberals warn that reactionaries—meaning classic liberals who still like the values of the first Constitution—would dominate a new convention. But it is just as likely that leftist groups already strong enough to have entrenched themselves in Washington would be able to take over a convention as well. Unions, especially, as well as the new class of well-educated professional and managerial symbol-specialists who took over the Democratic party in 1972, should do quite well with their organizational and polemical talents. Even if they dominated the convention and enshrined in the Constitution the new politics they have imposed in this century, we would gain a lot just in having the current philosophy of American public affairs set out explicitly. Another convention, with all its posibilities, would force a great shaking-out of American politics. Its drama would cut through the layers of mass apathy and focus popular attention on the fundamental political questions. It would force Americans to consider the kind of people we have become, and the society and government we prefer. It would allow a genuinely New Foundation, if desired.

The proximate issue, controlling government spending, is not some fiscal technicality; it reflects a growing desperation among the governed. The political appeal of the New Deal model—our current constitutional order—has lain in its promise to each voter to take from and control other people for his benefit. But as leveling and legislation have proceeded, a growing majority of Americans have realized that they are now those other people, more often targets of state action than beneficiaries; yet the machinery of regulation and redistribution seems impervious to individual aspiration.

Another convention would force Americans to recall the values of the first Constitution and consider how we have changed as a nation. It would allow a recalculation of the costs of dependence upon government and the benefits of individual responsibility and voluntary public spirit. Another convention could offer perhaps a last chance to make sure we have the government we deserve.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, May 9, 1979]

SHOULD THE BUDGET BE BALANCED BY A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION?

YES

(By James Dale Davidson)

Only once since 1960 has the federal budget been balanced. Through good years and bad, the deficit has tended to increase, so that today—in the fifth year of a recovery—the President plans a deficit of $29 billion. It will likely be larger.

As the deficits have increased, so has the rate of inflation. The consumer price index has more than doubled since 1967. At current rates it will double again by the early 1980s. Costs for many necessities have been rising even faster.

This outcome is due to the fact that incurring inflationary deficits is in the self-interest of congressmen. It improves their chances of reelection. Deficits enable them to make the benefits of increased spending immediately evident to special constituencies, while disguising the costs (which are defused over large numbers of the rest of society).

This is true in either of the two ways in which deficits can be financed.

• To the extent that the excessive spending is financed by the sale of bonds to the banking system, the costs will be borne by the average consumer in the supermarket and at the gas pump. If even 20 percent of the public is confused by the resulting inflation and cannot identify the source of their hurt, this involves a political advantage over the levying of taxes.

In other words, deficits achieve a successful deception of the people. As a result of this deecption many of the political pressures emerging from the excessive spending are not directed toward politicians in Washington but toward businesses and labor unions. A clamor arises for "control" of higher prices nad wage settlements which are apparently responsible for the declining living standards of the average person.

• When deficits are financed through genuine borrowing from the public, those who will bear the costs are the future generations who must pay taxes to redeem the bonds. This too reduces the political costs of the spending. By passing the bills on to our children, their children, and others who are not yet born, members of Congress evade the responsibility for their spending decisions.

In other areas of life we recognize that it is necessary to take account of the self-interest of individuals in order to obtain behavior which points toward the public interest. In fact, we have built the most productive society in all history by harnessing the profit motive in private enterprise. That productivity is now being destroyed, however, because we have not extended the same insights about human nature to the operations of government.

Just as we could not expect the nation to be well shod if shoemakers obtained a higher income for producing ill-fitting and uncomfortable shoes, so we should not be surprised that we are victimized by inflation when we make it within the self-interest of politicans to contribute to inflation. If we wish to stop inflation, we must change the circumstances in which the decisions to inflate are taken.

A balanced budget amendment would do that. It would require the politicians to be accountable; to own up explicity and honestly to the full costs of their spending.

That is something which no political body in history has ever wanted to do. Once politicians shake free from fiscal discipline it is only by a kind of miracle that they are ever induced to voluntarily restrain themselves again. The record of many countries proves this. Thankfully, our constitutional fathers foresaw that a day might come when the Congress would fail the people. They gave us the means through Article V to go around the Congress to propose constitutional amendments by the convention process at times when the Congress itself was the cause of a defect in our system.

Today, 30 states of a needed 34 have already officially petitioned the Congress to either pass a balanced budget amendment or convene a limited constitutional convention to consider that and no other subject. As this movement to halt inflationary deficit spending nears success, the Big Spenders have raised false alarms about the dangers of popular government. They say that the people cannot be trusted to select delegates to a convention and that the state legislatures cannot be trusted to refrain from ratifying absurd proposals.

Furthermore, critics of a convention conveniently ignore the fact that the Congress itself is effectively an unlimited convention which could propose any amendment it chose at any time. Through almost two hundred years no steps have been taken to repeal the Bill of Rights or do any of the other unholy things which are alleged to be likely from a limited convention. Upon close consideration, therefore, the charges against a convention would not persuade a reasonable citizen.

The experience of many countries proves that inflation, once allowed to run out of control, is destructive of freed institutions. Inflation turns expectations upside-down. It impoverishes the elderly, makes fools of those who save, and turns every contract into a fraud, eventually creating conditions which no person of goodwill could desire.

That is why we must heed the advice of responsible people of all parties and convene a limited constitutional convention. Such a convention, far less subject than is the Congress to day-to-day political pressures, could be expected to do a better job of what the Congress has as yet refused to do: introduce an outside restraint to prohibit individual congressmen from pursuing their self-sprung tendency to obtain political profits in the present by mortgaging our future.

Mr. Davidson is the chairman of the National Taxpayers Union.

No

(By John Culver)

Let me state right at the outset that I strongly favor moving toward a balanced budget as part of our fight against inflation. Doing so will set an example to the country that its leaders are serious about putting their own house in order. It will help to identify and root out waste, mismanagement, and fraud. It will reduce the burden we place on future generations to pay for our current needs.

But achieving a balanced budget will not persuade OPEC nations to roll back the price of oil which they have raised sixfold since 1973. It will not prevent labor and management from playing leapfrog with wages and prices. It won't improve our lagging productivity or add anything positive to our balance of payments. It won't call a halt to consumer deficit financing—which, incidentally, is of a far greater magnitude and growing much faster than the government's. And until there are answers to those intractable questions it is unrealistic to expect any sizable inroads into inflation, which by every index of public opinion is the number one problem facing the American people.

In addition to its obvious economic consequences and the fear and insecurity which it breeds, inflation poses another insidious danger. It stimulated the all-too-human desire to blame convenient villains and demand easy answers for difficult and complex problems. In this context it is not difficult to understand the movement to require a balanced budget by constitutional amendment. It encourages the notion that a single deft and decisive stroke will sweep away inflation. However comforting that vision may be, it in no way corresponds to the economic or political realities.

Our Constitution is a design of representative government and a charter of personal liberty. Only twice in the nation's history have we demeaned it as a vehicle for social or economic experiments. Both of those instances—slavery and prohibition—were tragic failures. Whatever the merits of a balanced budget, indelibly revising the supreme law of the land is the wrong way to go about it.

One proposed amendment states categorically that expenditures in any given year may not exceed revenues but gives no guidance as to how this balance will be achieved. It could actually be done more easily by raising taxes than by cutting spending. And if spending were reduced there is no guarantee that the least useful programs would be eliminated. This is especially the case since more than 75 percent of the budget is relatively "uncontrollable"—spending obligated by previous defense contracts, for example, or medicaid payments.

In addition, such an amendment might leave the nation straitjacketed in the event of a threat to our national security or an economic emergency. Most economists fear that an abrupt balancing of the budget may push us into a recession. In such a case, each rise of 1 percent in unemployment would shrink tax revenues by $15 billion and boost outlays (for unemployment compensation and the like) by $3 to $5 billion, necessitating, by terms of the amendment, another round of higher taxes and reduced spending, deepening the recession and renewing the downward spiral. Where—or if—it would bottom out, no one knows.

Some proposals try to preempt the foregoing scenario by establishing a "state of emergency" escape hatch. Designing one that permits corrective action without making it so large that any excuse could justify a deficit, however, has proved an elusive goal.

Finally, other proposed amendments attempt to enforce complex economic formulas. These are almost guaranteed to wreck havoc on a Constitution which has endured war, depression, wrenching social change, and spectacular technological achievement in great measure because it limits itself to timeless principles expressed in simple, flexible language. Perhaps the best known of the "formula" amendments—Dr. Milton Friedman's—is longer than the Bill of Rights. It employs imprecise technical terms such as off-budget outlays, gross national product, and inflation on whose definition economists often disagree and statistics for which vary widely.

The last method suggested to achieve a balanced budget—a constitutional convention—would set us on a voyage into uncharted waters and unpredictable procedural chaos. Not since 1787 have we tried such a course and no established procedures exist with regard to agenda, funding, delegates or voting. Nor do we know for sure whether the convention would be confined to consideration of the balanced budget issue alone. In the wake of Vietnam, Watergate, and political assassination, at a time when special interests and single-issue groups abound, now is not the time to risk the divisiveness of constitutional revision on a national scale.

Using currently available tools, President Carter (with the aid of Congress) has trimmed away more than half of the deficit he inherited from the previous administration. The latest projections from the Office of Management and Budget predict a surplus in FY 1981. Constructive proposals such as sunset legislation with periodic review of spending programs and automatic termination of obsolete ones will help us make more progress. Pursuit of these responsible courses of action and disciplined consideration of all individual taxing and spending questions rather than a quick constitutional fix are the way to responsibly attack inflation and excess spending.

Senator Culver, Democrat, represents the State of Iowa in the U.S. Senate.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JAMES N. STASNY ON PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES ACT

The testimony I submit today is that of a private citizen who has studied the subject of a federal constitutional convention for sixteen years. The views expressed are entirely my own based, as nearly as possible, on an objective analysis of the problems in the process through which the several States apply for a convention and on an assessment of the merits and defects of the bills submitted to govern the proceedings of a constitutional convention.

INTRODUCTION

Oliver Wendell Holmes, one of America's most respected jurists once observed, "About seventy-five years ago I learned I was not God. And so, when the people of the various states want to do something and I can't find anything in the Constitution expressly forbidding them to do it, I say, whether I like it or not: Damn it, let 'em do it."

In the face of the recent efforts to summon a convention to add a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, there are many who do not share Justice Holmes' casual confidence in the ability of the American people to do it well. Because the convention method of amendment stands on the constitutional frontier of unanswered questions, many fear the convention process almost as an alien force. Consequently, even while the tide runs high for a convention, there is an equally strong push to thwart the convention procedure, either by stopping it altogether or by tightly circumscribing its authority. The convention bills that twice passed the Senate in the early 1970's would have made any convention a weak, second-citizen to the congressionally initiated procedure for amending the Constitution. Under these bills, Congress would have overwhelming control of a convention.

I do not believe a convention should be held. At a time when the international situation is precarious and world economic uncertainties cast shadows over the strength of all currencies, a convention would divert our domestic attentions from pressing problems while focusing global attention on what would certainly appear to allies and adversaries alike as a fundamental challenge to the American system of government. Nevertheless, even against so grave a background, if it is the combined judgment of the States that a convention should be held, it must be fair, open, and provide every deliberative opportunity for the delegates to freely decide what, if any, amendments should be submitted for ratification by the States. Whatever problems the summoning of a convention might cause for us abroad, they would be compounded many times over at home if our own people felt the convention was a closed, heavily restricted assembly.

I. Congress and the application process

A 1952 staff report of the House Judiciary Committee called the application process "the stepchild of constitutional law." In articles appearing in the Congressional Record of March 22, 1979, September 25, 1978 and November 2, 1977 I detailed some of the problems associated with the application process. What follows is a summary review of the principal issues involved.

A. Senate Practices on Memorials and Petitions

Rule VII of the Standing Rules of the Senate controls the manner in which the Senate deals with memorials and petitions.

Reception of memorials and petitions makes up part of the Morning Business. While memorials and petitions are technically laid before the full Senate by the presiding officer, he makes no formal announcement of their receipt. They are presented by bringing them to the Clerk's desk, or by delivering them to the Secretary of the Senate. With the approval of the presiding officer, they are entered in the Journal and the Congressional Record and appropriately referred.

The presentation of memorials and petitions follows the reading of the Senate Journal, the presentation of reports and communications from the heads of departments and such bills, joints resolutions and other messages from the House of Representatives as may remain on the table undisposed of from previous day's sessions. Their reception proceeds the reports of standing and select committees.

Memorials from state legislatures are printed in full in the Senate section of the Congressional Record and a memorial may not be received unless signed. In the Senate, the practice is to list memorials from state legislatures under the heading "Petitions".

Until the start of the 95th Congress, the Senate had no orderly means of catalouging memorials submitted by the States. But, on December 16, 1976 in a memo from the Secretary of the Senate, a new system of control numbers for petitions and memorials was announced to take effect January 4, 1977.

According to the memorandum, petitions and memorials were to be combined into one category and assigned numbers preceded by the initials "POM". Under the new system petitions and memorials go first to the office of the President of the Senate who dates them. They are next sent to the Parliamentarian who assigns the control number and makes the appropriate committee referral. The Official Reporter then inserts them into the Congressional Record and the Bill Clerk sees to it that the appropriate committee physically receives the memorial or petition. This provision appears to be in contravention of Rule VII, paragraph (6) which directs that memorials are to be kept in the files of the Secretary of the Senate.

The December 16, 1976 memo also specifies that the Journal Clerk is to receive a list of the "petitions placed before the Senate and printed in the Record each day."

B. House Practices on Memorials and Petitions

Under the Rules of the House of Representatives, Memorials are treated under Rule XXII, paragraph (4), and Petitions are treated under Rule XXII, paragraph (1). They are listed separately and numbered sequentially in the House portion of the Congressional Record following the introduction of bills and resolutions at the conclusion of the day's proceedings. It is the practice to have memorials brought to the attention of the House by the Speaker.

Resolutions of state legislatures and/or primary assemblies of the people are received as memorials. They are filed with the Clerk of the House but the office of the Clerk advises they do not, in fact, retain them. Rather, they are transferred to the Speaker who refers them (through the Parliamentarian) to the appropriate committee where they are filed.

Rule XXII, paragraph (4) of the House Rules specifies that memorials and their titles shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the Congressional Record of the next day. In practice, however, the process is reversed. According to the House Journal Clerk's Office, staff members clip memorials printed in the Record and subsequently enter them on the Journal.

The office of the Bill Clerk actually prepares the briefs of the memorials that appear in the Record. The Bill Clerk receives the memorials from the Parliamentarian's office and assigns them the number which appears in the Record. He sees to it that the memorial is physically delivered to the committee to which it has been referred.

C. The convention applications: Anomalies in the Congress and the State legislatures

Of the thirty-two applications for a convention received by the Congress between 1974 and 1977, I located the texts of all but one (California 1974). Of the remaining thirty-one, sixteen were directed by the respective state legislatures to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives and the President of the United States Senate. Eleven applications were directed to the attention of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of he House. Of the remaining four applications, three were addressed to the Congress without specifying an officer of either House and one was addressed only to the members of the state's congressional delegation.

Of the sixteen applications directed to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, eleven were noted in the Congressional Record by both Houses. Four of the remaining five applications were printed in full by the Senate. One was printed only by the House.

Of the eleven applications addressed to both the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, all but one were noted in the Record by both the House and Senate. This suggests that when applications are directed to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, they are more likely to be properly received by both Houses of Congress than when they are sent to the presiding officer of each House.

Nevertheless, the principal convention bills introduced in the Congress since 1953, specify that applications for a convention be addressed to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House. This provision was included in both S. 215 which passed the Senate 84 to 0 on October 19, 1971 and in S. 1272 which passed the Senate without debate on July 9, 1973.

The provision directing memorials to the Speaker and the President of the Senate also appears to be at variance with established practice in the House of Representatives. Rule XXII of the House directs that memorials be delivered to the Clerk, a procedure dating from 1842. Rule VII, paragraph 2 of the Standing Rules of the Senate similarly notes that Senators having memorials may deliver then to the Secretary of the Senate.

In sum, established procedures in the House and Senate give to the Clerk and the Secretary the responsibility for the technical processing of the memorials. Moreover, the record shows that between 1974 and the end of 1977, the Clerk and the Secretary have been shown to be more reliable in handling the state memorials than the Speaker and the Vice-President. The clear inference is that future legislation providing guidelines for a constitutional convention should direct that memorials be sent to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House.

The question also arises as to whether memorials for a convention, in order to be valid, need to be recorded by both Houses in either the Journal or the Congressional Record. This is another of the myriad unresolved questions attending the convention process. Nevertheless, the legislative proposals on this subject offered in Congress over the years providing as they do for reference of applications to both houses, imply that the validity of an application would at least be suspect if not officially received and noted by both Houses of Congress.

D. Recommendation

There is needless uncertainty surrounding the terms "petition" and "memorial". Memorials from the State legislatures are, at best, political statements which have small impact and no binding effect on the Congress. However, the Article V applications for a convention are constitutionally authorized instruments which, in the aggregate, impose a specific duty on the Congress. There, at least, ought to be a separate means of tracking and counting the memorials from the states which request a convention. A reasonable procedure would be for the Congress to establish a third functional category in the classification scheme for petitions and memorials. That category would be termed simply "applications", just as it appears in Article V, and the only documents listed under it would be requests received from the State legislatures to call a constitutional convention. It would be a mechanical term of art established through the office of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House and would appear separately along with memorials and petitions in the Congressional Record. It would have the advantage of giving a separate identity to those State requests authorized by Article V. It would be useful in tracking the requests in the Congressional Record and be of material value should a subsequent Congress decide to make a fortright judgment on the question of whether, as the Constitution appears to make clear, these requests impose a mandatory, unavoidable obligation on the Congress to act.

II. The State applications

The applications from the States since 1974 attempt to impose a variety of conditions under which the applications would either remain valid or become void. One application for a convention indicated such a gathering need not be held if Congress submitted an amendment to the States within 60 days of the time the necessary number of applications to force a convention had been received. Applications from Massachusetts and Kansas claim to be self-voiding if Congress should submit an amendment first. A Colorado application would become "null void and rescinded" if a convention dealt with an amendment outside the subject area of its application. A Nebraska application expressly conditioned the continuing validity of the application on (1) Congress' establishing clear procedures for a convention including a limitation on the subject matter, (2) provisions that if a convention departs from the subject matter the convention be dissolved, and (3) that selection of delegates to a convention be determined by the state legislatures.

It is unlikely that these conditions which the states add to their applications would have any real effect on congressional action. There is, however, one common characteristic to at least 16 of the state applications that can have a decided impact on whether a convention is to be held. Those 16 state applications do not make the convention route the primary choice for obtaining an amendment. The first choice in each of these cases is to have Congress approve and submit an amendment. That raises a fundamental question of whether any of these 16 applications can be considered legitimate requests for a constitutional convention.

There can be no doubt that many state legislatures perceive the application process as a tactical maneuver to prod Congress into action. The legislatures, themselves gatherings of political animals, want to show to the voters that they are taking steps to hold down government spending. The means to that end has become in too many instances a process of either focusing the blame on Congress or abdicating the responsibility to a convention. The State legislatures must realize that they cannot have it both ways, political security and economic adventure. The States, at the minimum should be expected to make basic choices for themselves. They must either "memorialize" the Congress to devise and submit an amendment for ratification, or; they should apply for a convention to draft and submit an amendment. Nothing exposes the political motives of state legislatures like a so-called application for a convention which says "but-only-if-Congress-doesn't-act-first." These should not be considered valid applications. That, in itself, would force state legislatures to render more considered judgments on just what it is they want done and how they want to do it.

III. The Constitutional Convention procedures bills

A. Votes required to propose amendments

When Senator Ervin introduced S.2307 in August of 1967, it provided at Section 10 that the convention may propose amendemnts by a majority of the total votes cast on a question. Four years later, when the Senate passed S.215, a modified version of S.2307, the voting requirement had been changed to two-thirds of the total number of delegates. The new super-majority was added as an amendment by Senator Bayh and approved by the Senate 45 to 39.

In the life of parliamentary assemblies, the voting requirements are pivotal. There are oceans of difference between permitting approval of a question by a majority of those recorded on a given issue and requiring two-thirds of the total membership to approve. The Bayh amendment represents an exceptionally severe restriction on the ability of a convention to propose an amendment. That, at any rate, was the view of Senator Ervin, author of the bill. In opposing the Bayh amendment, Senator Ervin noted, "It undertakes to say that the people cannot amend their own Constitution . . . It would handicap the people of the States in procuring amendments by the convention process."

There is other opposition to the Bayh proposal. A 1971 study of the American Law Division of the Library of Congress noted that any procedural requirements for passage and ratification of an amendment in addition to those specified in Article V are formalities and are not strictly binding. In support of that view, a Harvard Law Review study notes Article V does not expressly require a super-majority vote for the proposal of amendments by a convention even though it does require a two-thirds vote for the proposal of amendments by Congress The study further states that a "two-thirds requirement predetermined by Congress would appear to be unconstitutional."

Moreover, the 1974 American Bar Association study of the convention method of amendment states, "We view as unwise and of questionable validity any attempt by Congress to regulate the internal proceedings of a convention. In particular, we believe that Congress should not impose a vote requirement on an Article V convention."

It might be noted further that the first standing rule of procedure adopted by the Constitutional Convention on May 28, 1787 shows the convention decided voting requirements for itself. The rule states, "A House to do business shall consist of the Deputies of not less than seven States; and all questions shall be decided by the greater number of these which shall be fully represented; but a less number than seven may adjourn from day to day."

Senator Bayh, during the 1971 debate on his two-thirds voting amendment said, "I can say without fear of contradiction that never in the history of this Republic has a constitutional amendment been referred to the States for ratification without concurrence of two-thirds of the Members, not of one body, but of two bodies, the House and Senate."

History does not support Senator Bayh's contention.

On December 6, 1803 during debate in the House of Representatives on approval of the Twelfth Amendment, the two-thirds question was raised a number of times. Both Representative Griswold and Representative Dennis noted that when the Senate, four days earlier, approved the amendment, they did not do so with the approval of two-thirds of the entire membership. Mr. Griswold noted, "By certificate, obtained from the Secretary of that body, it appears that the resolution was passed by the votes of twenty-two members in favor of it; twenty-two voting in the affirmative and ten in the negative. It is known to every gentleman that the Senate consists of thirty-four members, and that it consequently requires twenty-three to constitute two-thirds of its members."

During the same House debate on the Twelfth Amendment, there was also discussion of the means by which the Congress had approved the Bill of Rights for submission to the States. Mr. Rodney spoke to the action taken by the Senate, saying, "The Journal expressly says they were adopted by two-thirds of the Senators present concurring * * * We * * * find that in September, 1789, it is declared on the Journal of the Senate that amendments passed, and which are now part of the Constitution, were ratified by two-thirds of the members present."

Both Hinds' Precedents and Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives specifically state in bold type that the vote required for passage of a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution is two-thirds of those voting, a quorum being present, and not two-thirds of the entire membership. To support that precedent, illustrations are provided of House actions on two separate proposals on the amendment allowing for direct election of U.S. Senators. An excerpt from Cannon's Precedents shows how the two-thirds question was finally resolved:

"On May 13, 1912, the House was considering the Senate amendments to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

"A motion by Mr. William W. Rucker, of Missouri, that the House concur in the Senate amendment being put, and the yeas and nays being ordered, the years were 238, nay 39, answering present 5, not voting, 110."

"Mr. Thomas U. Sisson, of Mississippi, submitted that the constitutional requirement had not been complied with and the motion had not been agreed to. He cited Article V of the Constitution providing that two-thirds of the two Houses might submit amendments to the Constitution and took the position that under this provision more than 260 votes would be required for affirmative action, whereas only 238 had noted in the affirmative.

"The Speaker said:

"Two-thirds of the House means two-thirds of a quorum.

"It has been uniformly held, so far as the Chair knows, that two-thirds of the House means two-thirds of those voting, a quorum being present.

"When the phrase or collocation of words, 'the House of Representatives,' is used, it means a quorum of the House. If it can do one thing with a bare quorum (it) can do anything; and what precedents there are both of the Supreme Court and the Speaker—because Mr. Speaker Reed rendered an opinion—held that in a situation like this 'two-thirds' meant two-thirds of those voting, provided it was a quorum."

Further comment is found in the Supreme Court's ruling on the National Prohibition Cases. Speaking for the Court, Justice Van Devanter wrote, "Two-thirds note in each house which is required in proposing an amendment is a vote of two-thirds of the members present—assuming the presence of a quorum—and not a vote of two-thirds of the entire membership . . ."

Justice Van Devanter based his statement on the case of Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. State of Kansas decided by the Court on January 7, 1919. Chief Justice White gave the opinion of the Court and his argument focused in large part on the action of the Congress in proposing the Bill of Rights. After citing passages from the Senate Journal indicating that two-thirds of a quorum rather than two-thirds of the elected membership proposed the amendments, the Chief Justice made this observation:

"When it is considered that the chairman of the committee in charge of the amendments for the House was Mr. Madison and that both branches of Congress contained many members who had participated in the deliberations of the convention or in the proceedings which led to the ratification of the Constitution, and that the whole subject was necessarily vividly present in the minds of those who dealt with it, the convincing effect of the action cannot be overstated."

"But that is not all, for the Journal of the Senate contains further evidence that the character of the two-thirds vote exacted by the Constitution (that is, two-thirds of a quorum) could not have been overlooked, since that Journal shows that at the very time the amendments just referred to were under consideration there were also pending other proposed amendments, dealing with the treaty and lawmaking power. Those concerning the treaty-making power provided that a two-thirds vote of all the members (instead of that proportion of a quorum) should be necessary to ratify a treaty dealing with enumerated subjects, and exacted even a large proportionate vote of all the members in order to ratify a treaty dealing with other mentioned subjects; and those dealing with the law-making power required that a two-thirds (instead of a majority) vote of a quorum should be necessary to pass a law concerning specified subjects.

"The construction which was thus given to the Constitution in dealing with a matter of such vast importance, and which was necessarily sanctioned by the people, has governed as to every amendment to the Constitution submitted from that day to this."

When matched against these precedents, the Bayh amendment represents an extravagant imposition on the ability of a convention to reach a decision on proposing an amendment. The two-thirds provision is not included in S. 3, the current convention guideline bill before the 96th Congress, and should be rejected if it is offered again as an amendment.

B. Time limits

Although S. 3 states that a convention must convene within one year of the time Congress approves a concurrent resolution calling it into being and that the convention would meet for no longer than one year unless otherwise extended, there is no specified time in which Congress would be required to take action on the concurrent resolution itself. To avoid any needless delays, a time limit of 30–60 days should be set on the passage of the concurrent resolution.

C. One issue convention

The bills under consideration would limit a convention to discussion of the amendment specified in the applications. On June 7, 1979 Senator Helms offered an amendment to a bill reauthorizing the Civil Rights Commission that would prevent any convention from proposing an amendment or amendments aside from what was stated in their application.

For reasons which I detailed at some length at page S. 4780 of the April 1, 1976 (Daily Edition) of the Congressional Record, that would be a mistake.

People generally described as having conservative political affiliations have generated the drive for a balanced budget amendment via the convention route. People within that same broad group have had a prominent hand in promoting a convention drive on the question of abortion. If a convention were called for the purpose of devising a balanced budget amendment, what would become of those who feel so deeply that an abortion amendment should be proposed as well? Will those who contend so fiercely for a one issue convention be suddenly inclined to bend the rules and make it a two issue convention? If that came to pass, then what do both groups of supporters say to those who have a third or a fourth issue to consider?

The success of any convention will rest largely on whether the public perceives it as a legitimate expression of self-government in action. If a convention ends in the splinters of disenchantment among people who discover that even this assembly has no room for their views, to what will they turn? What will be left? The answer is that there will be nothing left within the constitutionally prescribed procedures for redress of their grievances. In those circumstances, compounded perhaps by growing social unrest, is the risk of the possible undoing of two-centuries of faith in the right of the people to try and achieve through law what they believe to be fair and worthwhile.

Beyond that, a one issue convention could be viewed as only an extension of the ratification process. Once a convention is summoned, the likelihood that an amendment will be produced is quite high. Such a convention limited to one issue would not really debate the "yes" or the "no" of an amendment; that there will be an amendment of some sort will have been already decided by the call. The delegates would become glorified wordsmiths deciding questions of syntax. So a one-issue, limited convention is really no convention at all. It is simply an intermediate gathering of editors, the middle step between the time the states have decided a convention should be held, and the time the states finally decide either in their capitals or at ratification conventions whether the wording of the amendment should be approved.

CONCLUSION

A convention would, to my mind, be a mistake. There is simply too much to do in this Country that we cannot afford to distract ourselves with extravagant enterprises such as this. But if the wisdom of the States says a convention must be held, it would be a still greater mistake to lock its doors to free deliberation. The bills now before the Congress are responsible to the extent they lay out a groundwork in advance for a convention. To the extent that they confine a convention to one issue, they are unreasonably restrictive and should be changed to reflect a more firm confidence in the ability of a convention to make its own choices and for the states to pass judgment on what the convention produces. While there are good reasons for not holding a convention, there is no reason to fear that a convention may consider other amendments. As Rufus King said during the Convention of 1787, "We have power to propose anything, but to conclude nothing."

The Federalist

43

James Madison

January 23, 1788

To the People of the State of New York

THE fourth class comprises the following miscellaneous powers.

1. A power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for a limited time, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right, to their respective writings and discoveries."

The utility of this power will scarcely be questioned. The copy right of authors has been solemnly adjudged in Great Britain to be a right at common law. The right to useful inventions, seems with equal reason to belong to the inventors. The public good fully coincides in both cases, with the claims of individuals. The States cannot separately make effectual provision for either of the cases, and most of them have anticipated the decision of this point, by laws passed at the instance of Congress.

2. "To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the States, in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards and other needful buildings."

The indispensible necessity of compleat authority at the seat of Government carries its own evidence with it. It is a power exercised by every Legislature of the Union, I might say of the world, by virtue of its general supremacy. Without it, not only the public authority might be insulted and its proceedings be interrupted, with impunity; but a dependence of the members of the general Government, on the State comprehending the seat of the Government for protection in the exercise of their duty, might bring on the national councils an imputation of awe or influence, equally dishonorable to the Government, and dissatisfactory to the other members of the confederacy. This consideration has the more weight as the gradual accumulation of public improvements at the stationary residence of the Government, would be both too great a public pledge to be left in the hands of a single State; and would create so many obstacles to a removal of the Government, as still further to abridge its necessary independence. The extent of this federal district is sufficiently circumscribed to satisfy every jealousy of an opposite nature. And as it is to be appropriated to this use with the consent of the State ceding it; as the State will no doubt provide in the compact for the rights, and the consent of the citizens inhabiting it; as the inhabitants will find sufficient inducements of interest to become willing parties to the cession; as they will have had their voice in the election of the Government which is to exercise authority over them; as a municipal Legislature for local purposes, derived from their own suffrages, will of course be allowed them; and as the authority of the Legislature of the State, and of the inhabitants of the ceded part of it, to concur in the cession, will be derived from the whole people of the State, in their adoption of the Constitution, every imaginable objection seems to be obviated.

The necessity of a like authority over forts, magazines

&c. established by the general Government is not less evident. The public money expended on such places, and the public property deposited in them, require that they should be exempt from the authority of the particular State. Nor would it be proper for the places on which the security of the entire Union may depend, to be in any degree dependent on a particular member of it. All objections and scruples are here also obviated by requiring the concurrence of the States concerned, in every such establishment.

3. "To declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted."

As treason may be committed against the United States, the authority of the United States ought to be enabled to punish it. But as new-fangled and artificial treasons, have been the great engines, by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free Governments, have usually wrecked their alternate malignity on each other, the Convention have with great judgment opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger, by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it, and restraining the Congress, even in punishing it, from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author.

4. "To admit new States into the Union; but no new State, shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

In the articles of confederation no provision is found on this important subject. Canada was to be admitted of right on her joining in the measures of the United States; and the other colonies, by which were evidently meant, the other British colonies, at the discretion of nine States. The eventual establishment of new States, seems to have been overlooked by the compilers of that instrument. We have seen the inconvenience of this omission, and the assumption of power into which Congress have been led by it. With great propriety therefore has the new system supplied the defect. The general precaution that no new States shall be formed without the concurrence of the federal authority and that of the States concerned, is consonant to the principles which ought to govern such transactions. The particular precaution against the erection of new States, by the partition of a State without its consent, quiets the jealousy of the larger States; as that of the smaller is quieted by a like precaution against a junction of States without their consent.

5. "To dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with a proviso that nothing in the Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

This is a power of very great importance, and required by considerations similar to those which shew the propriety of the former. The proviso annexed is proper in itself, and was probably rendered absolutely necessary, by jealousies and questions concerning the Western territory, sufficiently known to the public.

6. "To guarantee to every state in the Union a Republican form of Government; to protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature; or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

In a confederacy founded on republican principles, and composed of republican members, the superintending government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations.

The more intimate the nature of such a Union may be, the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other; and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into, should be substantially maintained. But a right implies a remedy; and where else could the remedy be deposited, than where it is deposited by the Constitution? Governments of dissimilar principles and forms have been found less adapted to a federal coalition of any sort, than those of a kindred nature. "As the confederate republic of Germany," says Montesquieu, "consists of free cities and petty states subject to different Princes, experience shews us that it is more imperfect than that of Holland and Switzerland." "Greece was undone" he adds, "as soon as the King of Macedon obtained a seat among the Amphyctions." In the latter case, no doubt, the disproportionate force, as well as the monarchical form of the new confederate, had its share of influence on the events. It may possibly be asked what need there could be of such a precaution, and whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the state governments, without the concurrence of the states themselves. These questions admit of ready answers. If the interposition of the general government should not be needed, the provision for such an event will be a harmless superfluity only in the Constitution. But who can say what experiments may be produced by the caprice of particular states, by the ambition of enterprizing leaders, or by the intrigues and influence of foreign powers? To the second question it may be answered, that if the general government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no farther than to a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a pre-existing government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long therefore as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the states may chuse to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so, and to claim the federal guaranty for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is, that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican Constitutions; a restriction which it is presumed will hardly be considered as a grievance.

A protection against invasion is due from every society to the parts composing it. The latitude of the expression here used, seems to secure each state not only against foreign hostility, but against ambitious or vindictive enterprizes of its more powerful neighbours. The history both of antient and modern confederacies, proves that the weaker members of the Union ought not to be insensible to the policy of this article.

Protection against domestic violence is added with equal propriety. It has been remarked* that even among the Swiss Cantons, which properly speaking are not under one government, provision is made for this object; and the history of that league informs us, that mutual aid is frequently claimed and afforded; and as well by the most democratic, as the other Cantons. A recent and well known event among ourselves, has warned us to be prepared for emergencies of a like nature.†

At first view it might seem not to square with the republican theory, to suppose either that a majority have not the right, or that a minority will have the force to subvert a government; and consequently that the fœderal interposition can never be required but when it would be improper. But theoretic reasoning in this, as in most other cases, must be qualified by the lessons of practice. Why may not illicit combinations for purposes of violence be formed as well by a majority of a State, especially a small State, as by a majority of a county or a district of the same State; and if the authority of the State ought in the latter case to protect the local magistracy, ought not the fœderal authority in the former to support the State authority? Besides, there are certain parts of the State Constitutions which are so interwoven with the Fœderal Constitution, that a violent blow cannot be given to the one without communicating the wound to the other. Insurrections in a State will rarely induce a fœderal interposition, unless the number concerned in them, bear some proportion to the friends of government. It will be much better that the violence in such cases should be repressed by the Superintending power, than that the majority should be left to maintain their cause by a bloody and obstinate contest. The existence of a right to interpose will generally prevent the necessity of exerting it.

---

* In Essay 19. (Editor)

† Madison was referring to Shays' Rebellion. (Editor)

Is it true that force and right are necessarily on the same side in republican governments? May not the minor party possess such a superiority of pecuniary resources, of military talents and experience, or of secret succours from foreign powers, as will render it superior also in an appeal to the sword? May not a more compact and advantageous position turn the scale on the same side against a superior number so situated as to be less capable of a prompt and collected exertion of its strength? Nothing can be more chimerical than to imagine that in a trial of actual force, victory may be calculated by the rules which prevail in a census of the inhabitants, or which determine the event of an election! May it not happen in fine that the minority of CITIZENS may become a majority of PERSONS, by the accession of alien residents, of a casual concourse of adventurers, or of those whom the Constitution of the State has not admitted to the rights of suffrage? I take no notice of an unhappy species of population abounding in some of the States, who during the calm of regular government are sunk below the level of men; but who in the tempestuous scenes of civil violence may emerge into the human character, and give a superiority of strength to any party with which they may associate themselves.

In cases where it may be doubtful on which side justice lies, what better umpires could be desired by two violent factions, flying to arms and tearing a State to pieces, than the representatives of confederate States not heated by the local flame? To the impartiality of Judges they would unite the affection of friends. Happy would it be if such a remedy for its infirmities, could be enjoyed by all free governments; if a project equally effectual could be established for the universal peace of mankind.

Should it be asked what is to be the redress for an insurrection pervading all the States, and comprizing a superiority of the entire force, though not a constitutional right; the answer must be, that such a case, as it would be without the compass of human remedies, so it is fortunately not within the compass of human probability; and that it is a sufficient recommendation of the Fœderal Constitution, that it diminishes the risk of a calamity, for which no possible constitution can provide a cure.

Among the advantages of a confederate republic enumerated by Montesquieu, an important one is, "that should a popular insurrection happen in one of the States, the others are able to quell it. Should abuses creep into one part, they are reformed by those that remain sound."

7. "To consider all debts contracted and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this Constitution, as being no less valid against the United States under this Constitution, than under the Confederation."

This can only be considered as a declaratory proposition; and may have been inserted, among other reasons, for the satisfaction of the foreign creditors of the United States, who cannot be strangers to the pretended doctrine that a change in the political form of civil society, has the magical effect of dissolving its moral obligations.

Among the lesser criticisms which have been exercised on the Constitution, it has been remarked that the validity of engagements ought to have been asserted in favour of the United States, as well as against them; and in the spirit which usually characterizes little critics, the omission has been transformed and magnified into a plot against the national rights. The authors of this discovery may be told, what few others need be informed of, that as engagements are in their nature reciprocal, an assertion of their validity on one side necessarily involves a validity on the other side; and that as the article is merely declaratory, the establishment of the principle in one case is sufficient for every case. They may be further told that every Constitution must limit its precautions to dangers that are not altogether imaginary; and that no real danger can exist that the government would DARE, with or even without this Constitutional declaration before it, to remit the debts justly due to the public, on the pretext here condemned.

8. "To provide for amendments to be ratified by three-fourths of the States, under two exceptions only."

That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other. The exception in favour of the equality of suffrage in the Senate was probably meant as a palladium to the residuary sovereignty of the States, implied and secured by that principle of representation in one branch of the Legislature; and was probably insisted on by the States particularly attached to that equality. The other exception must have been admitted on the same considerations which produced the privilege defended by it.

9. "The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States ratifying the same."

This article speaks for itself. The express authority of the people alone could give due validity to the Constitution. To have required the unanimous ratification of the thirteen States, would have subjected the essential interests of the whole to the caprice or corruption of a single member. It would have marked a want of foresight in the Convention, which our own experience would have rendered inexcusable.

Two questions of a very delicate nature present themselves on this occasion. 1. On what principle the confederation, which stands in the solemn form of a compact among the States, can be superceded without the unanimous consent of the parties to it? 2. What relation is to subsist between the nine or more States ratifying the Constitution, and the remaining few who do not become parties to it.

The first question is answered at once by recurring to the absolute necessity of the case; to the great principle of self-preservation; to the transcendent law of nature and of nature's God, which declares that the safety and happiness of society are the objects at which all political institutions aim, and to which all such institutions must be sacrificed. PERHAPS also an answer may be found without searching beyond the principles of the compact itself. It has been heretofore noted among the defects of the Confederation, that in many of the States, it had received no higher sanction than a mere legislative ratification.* The principle of reciprocality seems to require, that its obligation on the other States should be reduced to the same standard. A compact between independent sovereigns, founded on ordinary acts of legislative authority, can pretend to no higher validity than a league or treaty between the parties. It is an established doctrine on the subject of treaties, that all the articles are mutually conditions of each other; that a breach of any one article is a breach of the whole treaty; and that a breach committed by either of the parties absolves the others; and authorises them, if they please, to pronounce the treaty violated and void. Should it unhappily be necessary to appeal to these delicate truths for a justification for dispensing with the consent of particular States to a dissolution of the federal pact, will not the complaining parties find it a difficult task to answer the MULTIPLIED and IMPORTANT infractions with which they may be confronted? The time has been when it was incumbent on us all to veil the ideas which this paragraph exhibits. The scene is now changed, and with it, the part which the same motives dictate.

The second question is not less delicate; and the flattering prospect of its being merely hypothetical, forbids an over-curious discussion of it. It is one of those cases which must be left to provide for itself. In general it may be observed, that although no political relation can subsist between the assenting and dissenting States, yet the moral relations will remain uncancelled. The claims of justice, both on one side and on the other, will be in force, and must be fulfilled; the rights of humanity must in all cases be duly and mutually respected; whilst considerations of a common interest, and above all the remembrance of the endearing scenes which are past, and the anticipation of a speedy triumph over the obstacles to re-union, will, it is hoped, not urge in vain MODERATION on one side, and PRUDENCE on the other.

* See Essay 22. (Editor)

PUBLIUS

44

James Madison

January 25, 1788

To the People of the State of New York

A Fifth class of provisions in favor of the fœderal authority, consists of the following restrictions on the authority of the several States:

1. "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility."

The prohibition against treaties, alliances and confederations, makes a part of the existing articles of Union; and for reasons which need no explanation, is copied into the new Constitution. The prohibition of letters of marque is another part of the old system, but is somewhat extended in the new. According to the former, letters of marque could be granted by the States after a declaration of war. According to the latter, these licences must be obtained as well during war as previous to its declaration, from the government of the United States. This alteration is fully justified by the advantage of uniformity in all points which relate to foreign powers; and of immediate responsibility to the nation in all those, for whose conduct the nation itself is to be responsible.

The right of coining money, which is here taken from the States, was left in their hands by the confederation as a concurrent right with that of Congress, under an exception in favor of the exclusive right of Congress to regulate the alloy and value. In this instance also the new provision is an improvement on the old. Whilst the alloy and value depended on the general authority, a right of coinage in the particular States could have no other effect than to multiply expensive mints, and diversify the forms and weights of the circulating pieces. The latter inconveniency defeats one purpose for which the power was originally submitted to the fœderal head. And as far as the former might prevent an inconvenient remittance of gold and silver to the central mint for recoinage, the end can be as well attained, by local mints established under the general authority.

The extension of the prohibition to bills of credit must give pleasure to every citizen in proportion to his love of justice, and his knowledge of the true springs of public prosperity. The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilent effects of paper money, on the necessary confidence between man and man; on the necessary confidence in the public councils; on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of Republican Government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States chargeable with this unadvised meas-

59-609 O - 80 - 32

The Federalist

85

Alexander Hamilton

May 28, 1788

ACCORDING to the formal division of the subject of these papers, announced in my first number, there would appear still to remain for discussion; two points, "the analogy of the proposed government to your own state constitution," and "the additional security, which its adoption will afford to republican government, to liberty and to property." But these heads have been so fully anticipated and exhausted in the progress of the work, that it would now scarcely be possible to do any thing more than repeat, in a more dilated form, what has been heretofore said; which the advanced stage of the question, and the time already spent upon it conspire to forbid.

It is remarkable, that the resemblance of the plan of the convention to the act which organizes the government of this state holds, not less with regard to many of the supposed defects, than to the real excellencies of the former. Among the pretended defects, are the re-eligibility of the executive, the want of a council, the omission of a formal bill of rights, the omission of a provision respecting the liberty of the press: These and several others, which have been noted in the course of our inquiries, are as much chargeable on the existing constitution of this state, as on the one proposed for the Union. And a man must have slender pretensions to consistency, who can rail at the latter for imperfections which he finds no difficulty in excusing in the former. Nor indeed can there be a better proof of the insincerity and affectation of some of the zealous adversaries of the plan of the convention among us, who profess to be the devoted admirers of the government under which they live, than the fury with which they have attacked that plan, for matters in regard to which our own constitution is equally, or perhaps more vulnerable.

The additional securities to republican government, to liberty and to property, to be derived from the adoption of the plan under consideration, consist chiefly in the restraints which the preservation of the union will impose on local factions and insurrections, and on the ambition of powerful individuals in single states, who might acquire credit and influence enough, from leaders and favorites, to become the despots of the people; in the diminution of the opportunities to foreign intrigue, which the dissolution of the confederacy would invite and facilitate; in the prevention of extensive military establishments, which could not fail to grow out of wars between the states in a disunited situation; in the express guarantee of a republican form of government to each; in the absolute and universal exclusion of titles of nobility; and in the precautions against the repetition of those practices on the part of the state governments, which have undermined the foundations of property and credit, have planted mutual distrust in the breasts of all classes of citizens, and have occasioned an almost universal prostration of morals.

Thus have I, my fellow citizens, executed the task I had assigned to myself; with what success, your conduct must determine. I trust at least you will admit, that I have not failed in the assurance I gave you respecting the spirit with which my endeavours should be conducted. I have addressed myself purely to your judgments, and have studiously avoided those asperities which are too apt to disgrace political disputants of all parties, and which have been not a little provoked by the language and conduct of the opponents of the constitution. The charge of a conspiracy against the liberties of the people, which has been indiscriminately brought against the advocates of the plan, has something in it too wanton and too malignant not to excite the indignation of every man who feels in his own bosom a refutation of the calumny. The perpetual charges which have been rung upon the wealthy, the well-born and the great, have been such as to inspire the disgust of all sensible men. And the unwarrantable concealments and misrepresentations which have been in various ways practiced to keep the truth from the public eye, have been of a nature to demand the reprobation of all honest men. It is not impossible that these circumstances may have occasionally betrayed me into intemperances of expression which I did not intend: It is certain that I have frequently felt a struggle between sensibility and moderation, and if the former has in some instances prevailed, it must be my excuse that it has been neither often nor much.

Let us now pause and ask ourselves whether, in the course of these papers, the proposed constitution has not been satisfactorily vindicated from the aspersions thrown upon it, and whether it has not been shewn to be worthy of the public approbation, and necessary to the public safety and prosperity. Every man is bound to answer these questions to himself, according to the best of his conscience and understanding, and to act agreeably to the genuine and sober dictates of his judgment. This is a duty, from which nothing can give him a dispensation. 'Tis one that he is called upon, nay, constrained by all the obligations that form the bands of society, to discharge sincerely and honestly. No partial motive, no particular interest, no pride of opinion, no temporary passion or prejudice, will justify to himself, to his country or to his posterity, an improper election of the part he is to act. Let him beware of an obstinate adherence to party. Let him reflect that the object upon which he is to decide is not a particular interest of the community, but the very existence of the nation. And let him remember that a majority of America has already given its sanction to the plan, which he is to approve or reject.

I shall not dissemble, that I feel an intire confidence in the arguments, which recommend the proposed system to your adoption; and that I am unable to discern any real force in those by which it has been opposed. I am persuaded, that it is the best which our political situation, habits and opinions will admit, and superior to any the revolution has produced.

Concessions on the part of the friends of the plan, that it has not a claim to absolute perfection, have afforded matter of no small triumph to its enemies. Why, say they, should we adopt an imperfect thing? Why not amend it, and make it perfect before it is irrevocably established? This may be plausible enough, but it is only plausible. In the first place I remark, that the extent of these concessions has been greatly exaggerated. They have been stated as amounting to an admission, that the plan is radically defective; and that, without material alterations, the rights and the interests of the community cannot be safely confided to it. This, as far as I have understood the meaning of those who make the concessions, is an intire perversion of their sense. No advocate of the measure can be found who will not declare as his sentiment, that the system, though it may not be perfect in every part, is upon the whole a good one, is the best that the present views and circumstances of the country will permit, and is such an one as promises every species of security which a reasonable people can desire.

I answer in the next place, that I should esteem it the extreme of imprudence to prolong the precarious state of our national affairs, and to expose the union to the jeopardy of successive experiments, in the chimerical pursuit of a perfect plan. I never expect to see a perfect work from imperfect man. The result of the deliberations of all collective bodies must necessarily be a compound as well of the errors and prejudices, as of the good sense and wisdom of the individuals of whom they are composed. The compacts which are to embrace thirteen distinct states, in a common bond of amity and union, must as necessarily be a compromise of as many dissimilar interests and inclinations. How can perfection spring from such materials?

The reasons assigned in an excellent little pamphlet lately published in this city* are unanswerable to shew the utter improbability of assembling a new convention, under circumstances in any degree so favourable to a happy issue, as those in which the late convention met, deliberated and concluded. I will not repeat the arguments there used, as I presume the production itself has had an extensive circulation. It is certainly well worthy the perusal of every friend to his country. There is however one point of light in which the subject of amendments still remains to be considered; and in which it has not yet been exhibited to public view. I cannot resolve to conclude, without first taking a survey of it in this aspect.

It appears to me susceptible of absolute demonstration, that it will be far more easy to obtain subsequent than previous amendments to the constitution. The moment an alteration is made in the present plan, it becomes, to the purpose of adoption, a new one, and must undergo a new decision of each state. To its complete establishment

* Intitled "An Address to the people of the state of New-York." (Publius) Written by John Jay, the pamphlet was first published in April, 1788. (Editor) throughout the union, it will therefore require the concurrence of thirteen states. If, on the contrary, the constitution proposed should once be ratified by all the states as it stands, alterations in it may at any time be effected by nine states. Here then the chances are as thirteen to nine* in favour of subsequent amendments, rather than of the original adoption of an intire system.

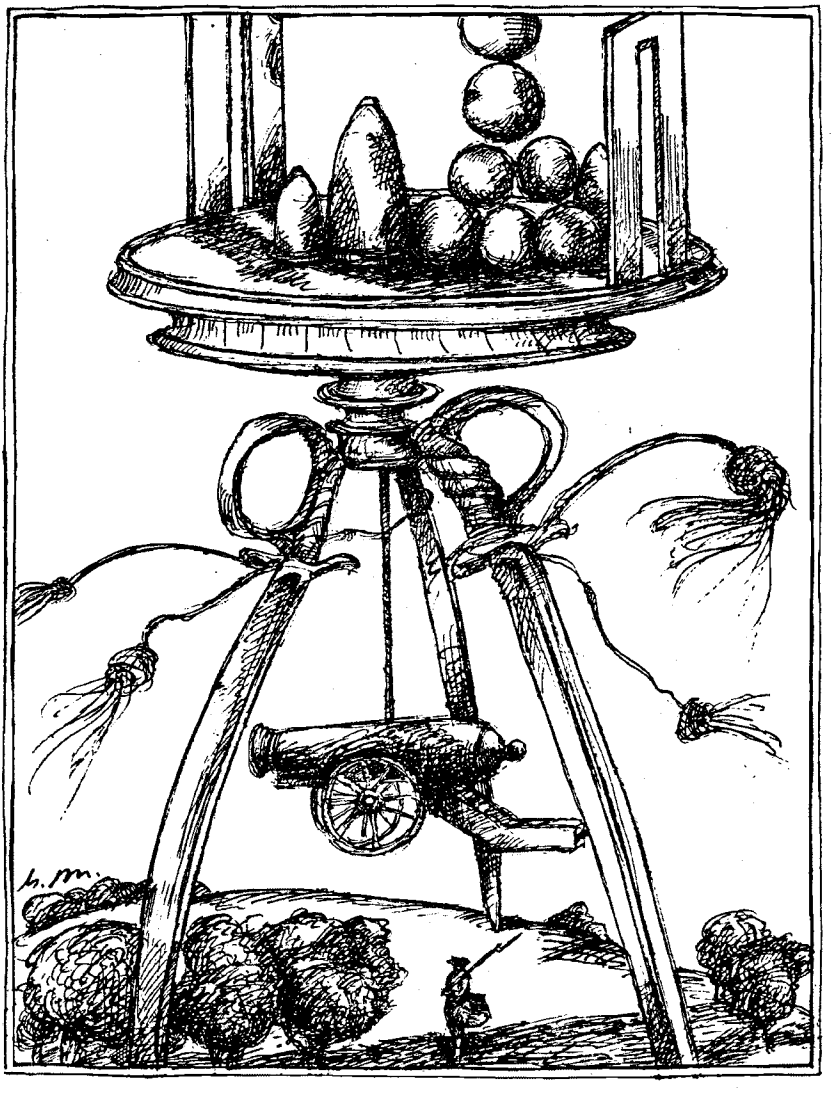
This is not all. Every constitution for the United States must inevitably consist of a great variety of particulars, in which thirteen independent states are to be accommodated in their interests or opinions of interest. We may of course expect to see, in any body of men charged with its original formation, very different combinations of the parts upon different points. Many of those who form the majority on one question may become the minority on a second, and an association dissimilar to either may constitute the majority on a third. Hence the necessity of moulding and arranging all the particulars which are to compose the whole in such a manner as to satisfy all the parties to the compact; and hence also an immense multiplication of difficulties and casualties in obtaining the collective assent to a final act. The degree of that multiplication must evidently be in a ratio to the number of particulars and the number of parties.

But every amendment to the constitution, if once established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise, in relation to any other point, no giving nor taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently whenever nine or rather ten states, were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment

---

* It may rather be said TEN, for though two-thirds may set on foot the measure, three-fourths must ratify. (Publius)



"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States" must infallibly take place. There can therefore be no comparison between the facility of effecting an amendment, and that of establishing in the first instance a complete constitution.

CONSTITUTION 4-3

In opposition to the probability of subsequent amendments it has been urged, that the persons delegated to the administration of the national government, will always be disinclined to yield up any portion of the authority of which they were once possessed. For my own part I acknowledge a thorough conviction that any amendments which may, upon mature consideration, be thought useful, will be applicable to the organization of the government, not to the mass of its powers; and on this account alone, I think there is no weight in the observation just stated. I also think there is little weight in it on another account. The intrinsic difficulty of governing THIRTEEN STATES at any rate, independent of calculations upon an ordinary degree of public spirit and integrity, will, in my opinion, constantly impose on the national rulers the necessity of a spirit of accommodation to the reasonable expectations of their constituents. But there is yet a further consideration, which proves beyond the possibility of doubt, that the observation is futile. It is this, that the national rulers, whenever nine states concur, will have no option upon the subject. By the fifth article of the plan the congress will be obliged, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, (which at present amounts to nine) to call a convention for proposing amendments, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof." The words of this article are peremptory. The congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence all the declamation about their disinclination to a change, vanishes in air. Nor however difficult it may be supposed to unite two-thirds or three-fourths of the state legislatures, in amendments which may affect local interests, can there be any room to apprehend any such difficulty in a union on points which are merely relative to the general liberty or security of the people. We may safely rely on the disposition of the state legislatures to erect barriers against the encroachments of the national authority.

If the foregoing argument is a fallacy, certain it is that I am myself deceived by it; for it is, in my conception, one of those rare instances in which a political truth can be brought to the test of mathematical demonstration. Those who see the matter in the same light with me, however zealous they may be for amendments, must agree in the propriety of a previous adoption, as the most direct road to their own object.

The zeal for attempts to amend, prior to the establishment of the constitution, must abate in every man, who, is ready to accede to the truth of the following observations of a writer, equally solid and ingenious: "To balance a large state or society (says he) whether monarchial or republican, on general laws, is a work of so great difficulty, that no human genius, however comprehensive, is able by the mere dint of reason and reflection, to effect it. The judgments of many must unite in the work: EXPERIENCE must guide their labour: TIME must bring it to perfection: And the FEELING of inconveniences must correct the mistakes which they inevitably fall into, in their first trials and experiments."* These judicious reflections contain a lesson of moderation to all the sincere lovers of the union, and ought to put them upon their guard against hazarding anarchy, civil war, a perpetual alienation of the states from each other, and perhaps the military despotism of a victorious demagogue, in the pursuit of what they are not likely to obtain, but from TIME and EXPERIENCE. It may be in me a defect of political fortitude, but I acknowledge, that I cannot entertain an equal tranquillity with those who affect to treat the dangers of a longer continuance in our present situation as imaginary. A NATION without a NATIONAL GOVERNMENT is, in my view, an awful spectacle. The establishment of a constitution, in time of profound peace, by the voluntary consent of a whole people, is a PRODIGY, to the completion of which I look forward with trembling anxiety. I can reconcile it to no rules of prudence to let go the hold we now have, in so arduous an enterprise, upon seven out of the thirteen states; and after having passed over so considerable a part of the ground to recommence the course. I dread the more the consequences of new attempts, because I KNOW that POWERFUL INDIVIDUALS, in this and in other states, are enemies to a general national government, in every possible shape.

* Hume's Essays, vol. I, page 128.—The rise of arts and sciences. (Publius)

PUBLIUS

PREPARED STATEMENT OF LAURENCE H. TRIBE, PROFESSOR OF LAW, HARVARD UNIVERSITY

THINKING ABOUT A NEW CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Chief Justice John Marshall succinctly summarized his justly celebrated approach to constitutional interpretation when he insisted that we "never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding." McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 407 (1819). No less vital as we explore the topic of constitutional alteration is that we never forget that it is a constitution we are amending.

If that aphorism seems opaque, I would propose this overriding criterion for evaluating suggested mechanisms of change pursuant to Article V of the Constitution: The processes we endorse and employ to amend the Constitution must be structured to serve the great purpose of permitting necessary change in our fundamental law, and thereby avoiding constitutional ossification and paralysis, without plunging the Nation into procedural and institutional controversies so profound or protracted that confusion and confrontation, rather than clarity and at least substantial consensus, become the consequences of each attempt to embody new principles in the Constitution's text.

Given that criterion, there seems to me no escape from the conclusion that prudence counsels avoiding, until it has been considerably clarified, the never-used and hence much-controverted Article V device whereby Congress is to "Call a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States." In present circumstances, given the alternative route of amendment by congressional submission of a proposal to the States, I am convinced that holding an Article V Constitutional Convention, even after enacting legislation designed to put various procedural questions to rest, would be a needless and perilous undertaking—one likely to generate uncertainty where confidence is indispensable, one likely to invite division where unity is critical, one likely to thwart rather than vindicate the will of the American people and damage rather than mend the Constitution.

Particularly in a period of recovery from a decade ruptured by war, political assassination, near-impeachment, and economic upheaval, and particularly in a time when such recovery has already been interrupted by new domestic and international crises, it is vital that the means we choose for amending the Constitution be generally understood and, above all, widely accepted as legitimate. An Article V Convention, however, would today provoke controversy and debate unparalleled in recent constitutional history. For the device is shrouded in legal mysteries of the most fundamental sort, mysteries yielding to no ready mechanism of resolution.

This objection to calling an Article V Convention is based not on misgivings at the prospect of unchecked democracy, nor on any vague apprehension about unsealing a Pandora's box, nor on a reflexive preference for the familiar over the unknown. Inherent in the Article V Convention device is the focused danger of three distinct confrontations of nightmarish dimension—confrontations between Congress and the Convention, between Congress and the Supreme Court, and between the Supreme Court and the States. However democratic an Article V Convention might be in theory, such a convention would inevitably pose enormous risks of constitutional dislocation—risks that are unacceptable while recourse may be had to an alternative amendment process (the congressional initiative) that can accomplish the same goals without running such serious risks.

1. HOLDING A CONVENTION WOULD RISK CONFRONTATION BETWEEN CONGRESS AND THE CONVENTION

The primary threat posed by an Article V Convention is that of a confrontation between Congress and such a Convention. Upon Congress devolves the duty of calling a Convention on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, and approving and transmitting to the states for ratification the text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention. The discretion with which Congress may discharge this duty is pregnant with danger even under the most salutary conditions.

Specifically, consider the incidental yet critical disagreements that could arise as Congress endeavored in good faith to discharge its duties under the convention clause. With no purpose whatsoever of avoiding its duties, Congress might nevertheless decide procedural questions arguably within its discretion in a manner that frustrated the desire of the states to call and conduct a convention—by treating some applications as invalid, or by withholding appropriations until the Convention adopted certain internal reforms, or by refusing to treat certain amendments as within the Convention's scope.

As a result of any of these decisions, the Nation might well by subjected to the spectacle of a struggle between Congress and a Convention it refused to recognize—a struggle that would extend from the Convention's own claim of legitimacy to disputes over the legitimacy of proposed amendments. Such a struggle would undoubtedly be judicial as well as political, and thus draw the Supreme Court into the fray. Considering the seriousness with which Congress and the Convention would take each other's challenge in light of the monumental stakes—constitutional power—it is unlikely that either side would surrender before the contest had deeply bruised the Nation. Such a contest between Congress and the Convention, which could flare from a single procedural dispute in the balance of which hung the Convention's fate, the Nation could ill afford.

2. HOLDING A CONVENTION WOULD RISK CONFRONTATION BETWEEN CONGRESS AND THE SUPREME COURT

In the event of a dispute between Congress and the Convention over the congressional role in permitting the Convention to proceed, the Supreme Court would almost certainly be asked to serve as referee. Because the Court might well feel obliged to protect the interests of the states in the amendment process, it cannot be assumed that the Court would automatically decline to become involved on the ground that the dispute raised a non-justiciable political question, even if Congress sought to delegate resolution of such a dispute to itself, as in § 3(b) of the Helms proposal, S. 3, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., or to the States, as in § 3(b) of the Hatch proposal, S. 1710, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. In any event, depending upon the political strength of the parties to the dispute, a decision to abstain would amount to a judgment for one side or the other. Like an official judgment on the merits, such a practical resolution of the controversy would leave the Court an enemy either of Congress or of the Convention and the states that brought it into being.

Even in the absence of such a dispute over the Convention's initiation and completion, the Court could become embroiled in a confrontation with Congress over the limits of congressional power under Article V. For example, S. 3, the bill introduced by Senator Helms, entitled the "Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act," provides in § 7(a):

"A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. In each State two delegates shall be elected at large and one delegate shall be elected from each congressional district in the manner provided by law."

One may readily guess that, were Congress to adopt such a provision in the exercise of its Article V powers, the Supreme Court would be asked to decide whether the one-person, one-vote rule applies to the election of delegates to a national constitutional convention. See "ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, Amendment of the Constitution by the Convention Method Under Article V" 34 (1974) (concluding that the rule is applicable). Similarly, a rule prescribed by Congress providing that "a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a vote of the majority of the total number of delegates to the Convention," S. 3, § 10(a), might well be challenged as an unconstitutional attempt by Congress to regulate the internal procedures of an Article V Convention. See "ABA Study Committee" at 19–20 (characterizing such an attempt as unwise and of questionable validity).

Whether the Court, once called upon to vindicate the one-person, one-vote principle or the autonomy of a convention, would invalidate an act of Congress passed pursuant to its Article V powers is no doubt an open question. But the stress that a decision either way would place upon our system is another unwelcome possibility inherent in the Article V Convention device. Like the risk of confrontation between Congress and the states that have called a Convention, the possibility of conflict between Congress and the Supreme Court is, of course, not peculiar to the Article V Convention device. But this device, which carries the potential for such grave clashes of power, should be utilized only if no alternative process is at hand.

3. HOLDING A CONVENTION WOULD RISK CONFRONTATION BETWEEN THE SUPREME COURT AND THE STATES

A decision upholding against challenge by one or more states an action taken by Congress under Article V—pursuant to § 15(a) of the Hatch proposal, S. 1710, for example—would, needless to say, be poorly received by the states involved. Truly disastrous, however, would be any result of a confrontation between the Supreme Court and the states over the validity of an amendment proposed by their Convention. Yet the convention process could, quite imaginably, give rise to judicial challenges that would cast the states into just such a conflict with the Supreme Court—despite congressional attempts to exclude such disputes from the Court's purview.

It is true that such conflicts are theoretically possible even when the more familiar amendment route—the congressional initiative—is followed. But in that context it has been settled for over half a century that Congress exercises exclusive control over the mode of an amendment's proposal and ratification, and thus has the last word on such matters as attempted rescission and the timeliness of ratification. See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939); Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921). When the familiar route is taken, therefore, the established preeminence of Congress milltates against divisiveness arising from a conflict involving the states—although even along this familiar route passions may sometimes run high, as the recent debates over extension and rescission in the case of the Equal Rights Amendment demonstrated. But when the alternative course of an Article V Convention is chosen, soothing assertions of congressional supremacy, and noble efforts to legislate such supremacy, see, e.g., S. 3, § 3(b), are bound to be undercut by reminders that the Convention device was, after all, meant to evade control by Congress. And, once such battle lines are drawn where the authority of Congress is not widely recognized, the ensuing debate is sure to be vehement.

4. MANY CRITICAL QUESTIONS THREATENING SUCH CONFRONTATIONS LACK AUTHORITATIVE ANSWERS

Although a few questions about the Article V Convention device do indeed have clear answers, many critical questions are completely open. These are questions that could well trigger one or more of the confrontations sketched above. As to each of these questions, one can find a smattering of expert opinion and some occasional speculation. But for none of them may any authoritative answer be offered. To make the point forcefully, one need only present a catalogue of basic matters on which genuine answers simply do not exist—matters as to many of which protracted dispute can surely be expected:

A. The Application Phase

(1) By what vote in each house of a state legislature must application to Congress be made? Simple majority? Two-thirds?

(2) May a state governor veto an application to Congress?

(3) When, if ever, does a state's application lapse?

(4) May a state insist in its application that Congress limit the Convention's mandate to a specific amendment?

(5) Must a state's application propose a specific amendment, or may a state apply to revise the Constitution generally? Must a state apply for a general Convention?[1]

[1] The preponderant view among constitutional scholars has been that Article V contemplates only a Constitutional Convention of unlimited, or at least of extremely broad, scope. See, e.g., Black, "Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman," 82 Yale L. J. 189 (1972); Tribe, "Issues Raised by Requesting Congress to Call a Constitutional Convention to Propose a Balanced Budget Amendment," 10 Pac. L. J. 627 n.* (1979); Dellinger, "The Recurring Question of the 'Limited' Constitutional Convention," 88 Yale L. J. 1623 (1979). But see, e.g., Van Alstyne, "The Limited Constitutional Convention—The Recurring Answer," 1979 Duke L. J. 985; Van Alstyne, "Does Article V Restrict the States to Calling Unlimited Conventions Only?—A Letter to a Colleague," 1978 Duke L. J. 1295. The Framers' very choice of the Convention alternative for proposing amendments, and the refusal of the Framers to create a mechanism for amendments to be proposed directly by two-thirds of the state legislatures, suggests the Framers' recognition of a need to have all amendments emerge from a broadly deliberative body, whether Congress or a Convention, and not from a single-issue machine. Insofar as the pending legislative measures presuppose the contrary, see S. 3, §§ 2, 6(a), 10(b), 11(b)(1); S. 1710, §§ 2(a), 6(a), 10, 11(b)(1), they may well be unconstitutional. But whether or not one agrees with this view, it is plain at the very least that the matter is a controvertible one, and that no statute could eliminate the controversy.

(6) Is a defective application to be deemed null and void, or may it be rehabilitated by a decision to ignore whatever aspects render it invalid?

(7) By what criteria are applications proposing related but slightly different subjects or amendments to be aggregated or set apart?

(8) May a state rescind its application? If so, within what period and by what vote?

(9) What role, if any, could a statewide referendum have in mandating or forbidding an application or a rescission?

May Congress authoritatively answer any or all of the these questions? May the States? Could such answers apply retroactively to applications already made? What role, if any, would the courts play in answering such questions? Even these questions—about who has the power to decide—must be described as unanswerable.

B. The Selection and Function of Delegates

(1) Who would be eligible to serve as a delegate? May any category of persons be excluded, as in S. 1710, § 7(a)?

(2) Must delegates be specially elected? Could Congress simply appoint its own members?

(3) Are the states to be equally represented, as they were in the 1787 Convention, or must the one-person, one-vote rule apply, as it does in elections for all legislative bodies except the United States Senate? If either question should be answered in the affirmative, the Helms and Hatch bills would both be void. See S. 3, § 7(a); S. 1710, § 7(a).

(4) Would delegates be committed to cast a vote one way or the other on a proposed amendment? Could they be forbidden to propose certain amendments?

(5) Would delegates at a Convention enjoy immunity parallel to that of members of Congress?

(6) Are delegates to be paid? If so, by whom?

(7) Could delegates be recalled? Could the Convention expel delegates? On what grounds?

Which of these questions, if any, may Congress authoritatively answer? How much supervision may Congress exercise over the selection and function of delegates? What supervisory role would the courts play?

C. The Convention Process

(1) May Congress prescribe any rules for the Convention or limit its amending powers in any way? Are there any limits on the sorts of rules Congress might seek to impose?

(2) How is the Convention to be funded? Could the power to withhold appropriations be used by Congress to control the Convention?

(3) May the Convention remain in session indefinitely? May it agree to reconvene as the need arises? May it choose not to propose the amendments for the purpose of which it was convened?

Again unknowable are the respective roles of Congress, the States, and the courts in resolving these matters.

D. Ratification of Proposed Amendments

(1) To what degree may Congress—under its Article V power to propose a "Mode of Ratification," or ancillary to its Article V power to "call a Convention," or pursuant to its Article I power under the Necessary and Proper Clause—either refuse to submit to the states a proposed amendment for ratification or decide to submit such an amendment under a severe time limit? What if Congress and the Convention disagree on these matters?

(2) May Congress permit or prohibit rescission of a state's ratification vote? May the Convention? What if Congress and the Convention disagree?

Unknowable once again are the respective roles of Congress, the States, and the courts in providing a definitive resolution in the event of disagreement.

5. THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES AND IMPLEMENTATION ACTS CANNOT AVOID THESE DIFFICULTIES

However much one might applaud the energy and intelligence that have gone into the currently pending attempts to resolve legislatively at least some of the many questions plaguing the Article V Convention route, see, e.g., S. 3, 96th Cong., 1st Sess.; S. 1710, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., the irreducible fact is that no Act of Congress could possibly lay to rest the most fundamental of those questions: what authority, if any, may Congress constitutionally exercise in laying down rules to govern an Article V Convention and in channeling controversies over such rules to various dispute-resolution forums? Needless to say, the reach of such congressional authority cannot be settled by Congress itself: "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177–78 (1803). At a minimum, therefore, the federal judiciary, including the Supreme Court, will have to resolve the inevitable disputes over which branch and level of government may be entrusted to decide each of the many questions left open by Article V as that Article was written by the Framers.

The only possible way to circumvent the problematic prospect of such judicial resolution is to avoid use of the Convention device altogether until its reach has been authoritatively clarified in the only manner that could yield definitive answers without embroiling the federal judiciary in the quest: through an amendment to Article V itself, one proposed by two thirds of both Houses of Congress and ratified by three fourths of the state legislatures or by conventions in three fourths of the states, as one or the other mode of ratification is specified by Congress.

Consideration of the various forms such an amendment to Article V might take could profitably begin now, but a congressional choice among the available options should probably await a time in which that choice can be separated to a substantial degree from the divisive and necessarily distracting context of the various substantive proposals—balanced budget, ERA, right-to-life—now being debated in the several states.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN,
Champaign, Ill., September 27, 1979.

Senator BIRCH BAYH,
U.S. Senate, Committee on the Judiciary,
Subcommittee on the Constitution, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAYH: Thank you for your letters of August 8, 1979 and September 11, 1979. In response to your inquiries concerning constitutional conventions under Article V, I have reviewed the material you have sent me and other pertinent legal literature.

In the first place I do not doubt the power of Congress to enact legislation to implement the Article V constitutional convention process. Congress has the power, under Article V, to call a convention when two-thirds of the state legislatures so apply. Under Article 1, section 8, clause 18, Congress has the power to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers [i.e., those enumerated in Art. I, § 8] and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof." (emphasis added). The Article V power is one of the other powers vested in the Congress, the legislative department of the government. Moreover, Congress is the only body to enact the implementing legislation. The Convention itself cannot do it, since it does not exist unless Congress issues the call. Nor can any state or combination of states do it, for the same reason: there is no convention unless Congress issues the call.

Congress might decide to make a judgment concerning the applications for the call on an ad hoc basis. Or, in order to give fair warning to the states and to avoid charges that a particular Congress is acting in bad faith, creating unnecessary obstacles, and not fulfulling what many view as its nondiscretionary duty to call a convention [1] Congress might decide to create implementing legislation now. I would prefer this course in order to avoid any constitutional crisis that might otherwise occur later. Congress should debate and provide for the procedures before two thirds of the states have acted.

Whether or not Congress creates implementing legislation, Congress must decide how to treat a particular application. Related to that question is whether the states can limit the convention to a particular subject. I am of the view that Congress can issue a limited call.

---

[1] See, e.g., Hamilton, Federalist Paper No. 85: Congress, when two-thirds of the states concur, "will have no option upon the subject * * *. The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing is left to the discretion of that body."

The most natural reading of the history behind Article V supports the view that the framers wished to assure the people that even if the central government were unresponsive to defects in the Constitution, the people have another option: the people, through their state legislatures, can begin the process of amendment. This check on the central government—what Hamilton in Federalist Paper No. 85 called "the national rulers"—is not effective if people have only the option of an all or nothing approach. The convention method was supposed to be an equal means of amending the Constitution.

The language of Article V supports this reading of the history. Both methods of proposing amendments, by Congress or by the Convention, are dealt with together. It is true that Article V provides that the convention may "propose Amendments" (emphasis added), but the use of plural does not mean either that the amendments must not relate to the same subject or that the convention must propose more than one. Article V also provides that Congress may propose "Amendments" (emphasis added), yet Congress can propose only one, as it usually does, or more than one, as it did when it proposed the Bill of Rights.

There is nothing in the nature of things that provides that Conventions cannot be limited. Some states provide that amendments proposed by its conventions can be limited beforehand to certain areas.[2] And we know that some states also provide that special sessions of the legislature may be limited to one topic.[3]

Prior practice also supports the conclusion that a convention can be limited, for the states have always acted as if the convention call can be limited to a specific area. Thus, when Congress was reluctant to propose an amendment providing for the direct election of the U.S. Senators, more than 30 states applied to Congress for a convention limited to that subject. The states thought they had such a power, and Congress certainly acted as if they did, for the previously reluctant Congress felt sufficiently cajoled to moot the issue by proposing, in 1912, the Seventh Amendment, which was quickly ratified in 1913.

Congress must judge the applications it receives. Perhaps a state is applying for a convention that is open-ended. Such an application should not be added to another application calling for a convention limited to a specific issue. If one state calls for a convention on a specific issue, then Congress should only add that application to one calling for a similar limitation.

I do not think that the applications must be identically worded, but in substance should be identical. As Professor Van Alstyne has argued, the applications should be "of a given subject of sufficient common description that further insistence for more perfect agreement among the applications would clearly be unreasonable. . . ."[4]

It is important to realize that the states apply for a convention, but it is only Congress that limits the call, and it is only the Convention which proposes, if it wishes, one or more amendments Thus for example, a state cannot submit a valid application that is limited to a convention which in fact will propose a given amendment. The convention need not propose any, and, if it does, it a fortiori cannot be bound in advance of its existence to propose a particularly worded amendment.

It is sometimes argued that Congress cannot limit a convention because a convention can always be a runaway convention: the convention, it is thought might simply refuse to be bound to a certain subject. Such a view is not a fair reading of Article V. If two-thirds of the states submit valid applications that in substance all call for a convention to deal with a particular problem—e.g., whether to have the direct election of U.S. Senators or whether to limit the federal taxing

---

[2] Pennsylvania, provides that the constitution may be amended by a convention called by law to propose changes. In 1967 the electorate approved the calling of a constitutional convention to prepare for submission to the electorate proposals for limited revision. Pursuant to Act. No. 2 § 7 of March 15, 1967 the "constitutional convention shall have the power to make recommendations to the electorate on the following subjects only. . . ." This system allows the people to call a convention limited to the areas that they are concerned with. They do not have to submit themselves to the possibility of the convention passing amendments on totally unrelated subjects. Still, the electorate could refuse to ratify the unrelated amendments but it is much more efficient to simply limit the convention from the start.

[3] Special sessions of the legislature called by the governor consistently provide for limited session. E.g., Art. IV § 5(b) of the Illinois Constitution provides that the governor must state the purpose of the special session in his proclamation and that only business encompassed by such a purpose may be transacted. And the Michigan constitution states that no bill may be passed on any subject not expressly covered in the governor s proclamation. Art. IV § 28.

[4] Van Alstyne, Does Article V Restrict the States to Calling Unlimited Conventions Only? 1978 Duke L. J. 1295, 1305 (1978).

and spending powers—then Congress should issue such a limited call If the convention lawlessly ignores the restrictions on its existence, Congress may not properly treat the amendments as validly proposed. Such amendments should not be sent to the states to secure the required three-fourths ratification and any legislation implementing Article V should specifically so provide.

Authority for this proposition is found not only in sound policy and logic but also in the language of Article V. It provides that once the convention proposes one or more amendments, three-fourths of the several states must ratify. How must they ratify? Either by their legislatures or by convention in the states. And who is to decide which method is to be used? Congress must propose one or the other form of ratification according to Article V. Thus, if Congress proposes neither, the amendment cannot be sent to the states for ratification. The states cannot ratify an amendment if Congress refuses to offer that amendment to the states and provide for a mode of ratification.

In deciding whether to accept an application as valid, Congress should only consider those applications which are reasonably contemporaneous with each other. By custom Congress has usually given the states seven years to ratify an amendment. I think that seven years is too long a time as applied to the application for the convention. A shorter time, three, four, or five years, is much more appropriate. While Congress may allow the states seven or more years to ratify an amendment, that is because three-fourths of the states must ratify. But it only takes two-thirds of the states to submit applications requiring a call. It obviously should not take as long for this smaller number to get their votes together. Also, if the states use the convention route and submit applications for a call, the states do not have to pass identical language, just reasonably similar language. If the Congressional route is chosen, the states must ratify identical language. It takes a longer time to ratify identical language than to submit reasonably similar applications. For both of these reasons then, the seven or more years time period is appropriate as to the question of ratification, but a shorter time period should govern the applications in order to assure a reasonably contemporaneous consensus.

Just as I believe Congress may choose to allow a state to rescind its ratification before the three-fourths mark is reached,[5] I believe that Congress may allow a state to rescind its application any time before Congress actually issues the call.

I hope these preliminary thoughts will be helpful. If I can be of further assistance please let me know.

Sincerely,

RONALD D. ROTUNDA,
Professor of Law.

---

[5] See e.g., Rotunda, Can the ERA Be Saved, 64 A.B.A.J., 1507, 1509 (1978).

(From the Center Magazine, March 1980)

Why Risk a Constitutional Convention?

(by C. Herman Pritchett)

Article V of the Constitution provides two methods for amending that document. First, Congress may propose amendments by a two-thirds vote of each House, which must then be ratified by three-fourths of the states, either by the state legislatures or conventions, as Congress may direct. All twenty-six amendments to the Constitution have been proposed in this way, and all except one have been ratified by state legislatures. Conventions were mandated by Congress for ratification of the Twenty-first Amendment, because of a belief that gerrymandered, rural-dominated state legislatures did not accurately reflect public attitudes toward Prohibition.

Second, the legislatures of two-thirds of the states may make application to Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments. From 1789 to 1974, at least 356 applications were filed with Congress for the calling of a convention, but in fact none has ever been held. Consequently, a discussion of the operation and possible consequences of a convention necessarily requires a certain amount of speculation and prediction.

C. Herman Pritchett is a Professor Emeritus of Political Science at the University of California at Santa Barbara.

Today's interest in the convention method of amendment arises from the effort to secure an amendment to require balancing the federal budget, by the convention route if necessary. At the present writing, apparently some twenty-eight or twenty-nine state legislatures have approved applications to call a convention for this purpose. Attention was previously centered on the convention device in 1966 when, after the Senate had defeated a proposed amendment to overturn the Supreme Court's one-person, one-vote decision, Senator Everett Dirksen undertook to secure the same result by convention applications from two-thirds of the states. His campaign fell short by only one state, thirty-three of the necessary thirty-four legislatures responding.

It appears that in only one case have the necessary number of states ever filed applications for a convention. In the early part of this century some thirty-one states, meeting the two-thirds requirement at that time, submitted petitions for an amendment to provide for direct election of senators. Congress failed to heed this call for a convention, but eventually proposed the amendment itself.

A study by Barbara Prager and Gregory Milmoe in 1975 for the American Bar Association revealed that actually seventy-five applications for direct election of senators had been filed at various times, the largest number ever received by Congress on one issue. They noted fifty-four petitions on apportionment, forty-two on federal tax limitation or repeal of the Sixteenth Amendment, thirty for the outlawing of polygamy, twenty-one for revenue sharing, and nineteen for revision of Article V. Applications in this last category were stimulated by the Council of State Governments, which in 1962 inaugurated a campaign for three so-called "states' rights" amendments.

The Drafting of Article V

Discussions at the Constitutional Convention in 1787 throw some light on the thinking of the framers concerning the amendment process. They took for granted that the states should have the right to set the amending machinery in motion. In fact, it was the role of Congress that was in dispute at the time. The original draft of the Virginia Plan (Resolution XIII) read:

"Provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whenever it shall seem necessary; and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto." (Farrand, I, 22)

In Committee of the Whole on June 11, George Mason approved:

"It would be improper to require the consent of the Natl. Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse, may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendment." (Farrand, I, 203)

The Committee on Detail, reporting on August 6, revised the language of Resolution XIII, but retained the state monopoly on the amending process:

"On the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose." (Farrand, II, 188, 557)

But on September 10, Elbridge Gerry moved to reconsider this provision, with the support of Alexander Hamilton and James Madison. Hamilton said that the plan, giving the states a monopoly of the amending process, was "not adequate."

"The State legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers — The National Legislature will be the first to perceive and will be most sensible to the necessity of amendments. . . ." (Farrand, II, 558)

Madison joined in the attack, raising prophetic questions about the role and operation of an amending convention. He "remarked on the vagueness of the terms, 'call a Convention for the purpose,' as sufficient reason for reconsidering the article. How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?" (Farrand, II, 558). He then proposed the dual amendment plan which, with some modifications in wording and the addition of two provisos, became Article V. In No. 43 of The Federalist, Madison looked at the language on amendments and found it good:

"It guards equally against that extreme facility, which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty, which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It, moreover, equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience of one side, or on the other."

Experience with Congressional Monopoly

Madison's favorable appraisal of Article V has been generally supported by subsequent experience. The amending process has proved to be neither too easy nor too hard, given a real consensus. Excluding the first ten amendments, which must be regarded as really part of the original Constitution, amendments have been adopted at the rate of less than one per decade. Following the Civil War amendments, there was a period of more than forty years during which the Constitution appeared unamendable. This was an era of agrarian discontent, industrial unrest, and growing interest in political and economic reforms. The conservatism of the Supreme Court — symbolized by its invalidation of the income tax in 1895 — made constitutional amendment seem a necessary step toward achieving liberal legislative goals.

Under these circumstances, there was much talk about the necessity of easing the amendment process. In 1913, however, the long liberal campaign for the income tax and direct election of senators succeeded with adoption of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Amendments respectively. Adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment in 1919 revealed the possibility of a small but dedicated pressure group exploiting the amending machinery successfully. The women's suffrage amendment (Nineteenth Amendment) came in 1920. With six amendments added to the Constitution between 1913 and 1933, the amending process no longer seemed so formidable. Moreover, the liberalization of the Supreme Court's views by President Franklin D. Roosevelt's appointees substantially eliminated liberal interest in further amendments.

After the nineteen-thirties, pressure for amendments came principally from conservative political quarters. The increase in executive power and congressional expenditures, the federal government's acceptance of new welfare functions domestically and new responsibilities internationally, the reduced role of the states, and liberal tendencies on the Supreme Court stimulated conservative recourse to the amendment process. During the nineteen-fifties, the Bricker Amendment to limit the federal government's power to enter into international agreements and a proposal to place a ceiling on federal income taxation were conservative measures that failed of adoption. In the nineteen-sixties, efforts to override the Supreme Court's decisions on one-person, one-vote and Bible reading in the public schools were defeated. The nineteen-seventies saw an organized effort to reverse the Court's abortion decision. Thus far, the only amendment secured by conservative forces was the Twenty-second, limiting the President to two terms. In contrast, the four amendments adopted since 1961 have had a generally liberal character; three of the four extended the franchise. However, the probable defeat of the Equal Rights and District of Columbia Amendments suggests that the era of liberal amendments may be over and that the temper of the country more favorable for conservative amendments.

Problems with Amendment by Convention

There can be no question that over the years the great weight of informed opinion in the United States has opposed the use of Article V conventions. Much opposition, of course, is ad hoc, engendered by dislike of the purpose of the particular amendments proposed. But there are more principled objections to amendment by convention.

First, there are the practical types of queries that occurred to Madison in 1787, when he asked: "How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?" No convention has been held since 1787, and after two hundred years that experience has little relevance. Many questions can be raised concerning the organization and powers of a constitutional convention. Here are some of them:

☐ How is the validity of applications from the states to be determined?

☐ How specific must the state legislatures be in asking for amendments?

☐ Must all the applications be in identical language?

☐ Within what time period must the required number of applications be received?

☐ Can Congress refuse to call a convention on demand of two-thirds of the states, and if it does, can it be compelled to act by the courts?

☐ Who are the delegates, and how are they to be chosen?

☐ Can the convention act by simple majority vote, or will a two-thirds majority be required, as in Congress, for proposing an amendment?

☐ How is the convention to be financed, and where does it meet?

☐ May the convention propose more than one amendment?

☐ Is there a time limit on the proceedings, or can the convention act as a continuing body?

☐ Can controversies between Congress and the convention over its powers be decided by the courts?

An even more serious case against the Article V convention invokes the specter of "Pandora's box." A parade of horribles — which some contend are imaginary and others insist are very real — has featured arguments against a convention. The possibility of a "runaway" convention is supported by the experience of the 1787 Convention, which had been authorized by Congress to meet for the "sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation." The Convention promptly ignored these instructions and proceeded to draft an entirely new Constitution based on a fundamentally different principle of union. Could not this happen again? Could not a convention claim to be a truer representative of the popular will than Congress, superior in authority, and justified in defying any restrictions placed upon it by Congress? Could it not proceed to redraft the Constitution, repeal provisions of the Bill of Rights, reverse unpopular Supreme Court decisions, and generally remake the constitutional system in its own image?

Convention proponents dismiss such concerns as hypothetical hobgoblins. They contend that in the unlikely event of a runaway convention, three-fourths of the states would never ratify its proposals.

The dangers can be overdrawn, but the contents of Pandora's box have been frightening, not only to liberals worried about the Bill of Rights, but also to some conservatives favorable to the budget-balancing principle. Senator Barry Goldwater wants a budget-balancing amendment, but not by the convention route. In the Senate on February 26, 1979, he said he was "totally opposed" to a convention. It might run wild, he warned, adding, "We may wind up with a Constitution so far different from that we have lived under for two hundred years that the Republic might not be able to continue." Though Howard Jarvis later succumbed to pressure to support a convention, his initial reaction was strongly and characteristically against opening up the Constitution to "weirdos" who might write their own "screwball" version of the document.

Preventing a Runaway Convention

It does seem altogether possible, given the current political temper of the country, that a convention called to draft a budget-balancing amendment might go further afield. Is there any way to guard against this possibility?

Former Attorney General Griffin Bell has said that he "absolutely" believes that Congress can set limits on what kind of amendments a convention can propose. The same position has been taken by former Senator Sam Ervin, by Senator Jesse Helms, and generally by those favoring the convention approach. Legislation for the purpose of exercising such control has been before Congress since 1967. At that time it appeared that Senator Everett Dirksen might succeed in securing the required applications from thirty-four state legislatures for a convention to repeal the Supreme Court's legislative apportionment decision. Senator Ervin, who supported Dirksen's effort, recognized the widespread fears of an uncontrolled convention and sought to allay them by drafting a Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act. (S. 2307, 90th Cong.) The Senate failed to take action when the Dirksen threat faded. But in 1971 another convention proposal surfaced, as some nine state legislatures petitioned for a convention to propose a revenue-sharing amendment. This time Ervin's bill, after some amendments to make it more acceptable to liberal senators, passed the Senate by a vote of eighty-four to nothing on October 19, 1971 (S. 215, 92d Cong.), but the House took no action.

In 1977, an almost identical bill was proposed, sponsored in the Senate by Helms, Goldwater (in spite of his opposition to conventions), and Senator Richard Schweiker, and in the House by Henry J. Hyde, Republican from Illinois. (S. 1880, H.R. 7008, 95th Cong.) The sponsors were advocates of a constitutional amendment outlawing abortion, and again the purpose was to quiet various objections that had been lodged against the convention device. The bills had not, by March, 1979, emerged from the Judiciary Committees of either house.

These bills have been drafted on the assumption that Congress does in fact have power to control and specify the powers and procedures of an Article V convention. If that is true, then the Ervin-Helms bills, if adopted, would dispose of many of the concerns about runaway conventions. The principal provisions of the bills are:

☐ State legislatures can call for a convention for the purpose of proposing "one or more" amendments to the Constitution.

☐ Legislative adoption of resolutions calling for a convention are to follow the regular state legislative rules of procedure, except that the governor's approval is not required.

☐ Applications for a convention are to remain effective for seven calendar years, but rescission would be possible up to the time that two-thirds of the state legislatures had presented valid applications.

☐ When applications from two-thirds of the state legislatures have been received, the two Houses of Congress must by concurrent resolution designate the time and place of the meeting and "set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called." The convention must meet within one year.

☐ Each state is to have as many delegates as it is entitled to senators and representatives in Congress. Two delegates are to be elected at large and one from each congressional district "in the manner provided by law." Vacancies are to be filled by the governor. Delegates are to have the same immunities as members of Congress, and the concurrent resolution shall provide for their compensation and all other expenses of the convention.

☐ The convention is to be convened by the Vice-President of the United States, and would then proceed to elect permanent officers.

☐ Each delegate is to have one vote. In Ervin's original bill, the vote was by states as in the 1787 Convention, each state having one vote.

☐ Amendments are to be proposed by "a majority of the total number of delegates to the convention." This is the only substantial point on which the 1971 Ervin and the 1977 Helms drafts differ. While the Ervin bill originally provided for majority vote, it was amended on the floor of the Senate to require a two-thirds majority. The Helms bill goes back to a simple majority.

☐ Three provisions undertake specifically to guarantee against runaway conventions. Section 8(a) requires each delegate to take an oath "to refrain from proposing or casting his vote in favor of any proposed amendment . . . relating to any subject which is not named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called."

Then Section 10(b) provides that "no convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention." Finally, Section 11(b)(1) permits Congress to disapprove the submission of any proposed amendment to the states if "such proposed amendment relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution . . . by which the convention was called," or because the procedures followed by the convention were not in conformity with the act.

☐ As required by the Constitution, ratification is by vote of three-fourths of the states. Congress retains its Article V right to direct whether ratification shall be by state convention or state legislative action. State legislatures shall adopt their own "rules of procedure" in voting on ratification, which must be completed within seven years of submission of the amendment to the states. A state may rescind its ratification prior to ratification by three-fourths of the states.

☐ To avoid the possibility of judicial review of any issues raised by the convening of a convention or the exercise of powers by that body, the bills provide that any questions concerning the adoption of state resolutions calling for a convention shall be determined by Congress, "and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including state and federal courts." (Section 3(b)) Likewise, questions whether proposed amendments are of a nature differing from that stated in the concurrent resolution "shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States and its decisions shall be binding on all others, including state and federal courts." (Section 10(b))

The intention of the Ervin-Helms bills is to settle in advance questions as to the organization and powers of an Article V convention, and to guarantee against a runaway body. When the Ervin bill was before the Senate in 1971, it won praise from different quarters of the political spectrum. The New Republic said: "Ervin's bill is sound insurance against a runaway rewrite job by latter-day founding fathers. Congress should adopt it." The columnist James J. Kilpatrick wrote: "This is a wise and prudent bill."

For whatever a measure of this sort may prove to be worth, it can do no harm. The only significant point in controversy would seem to be whether action of a convention should be by simple or two-thirds majorities. Even the most adamant opponents of constitutional amendment by convention might well regard such legislation as insurance against a future disaster.

But Will It Work?

The premise that Congress can control a convention and prevent any wayward tendencies assumes that Congress has the will to enforce limits such as those imposed by the Ervin bill. But is that necessarily so? Suppose that a convention, called to write a budget-balancing amendment, goes on to draft amendments providing criminal punishment for abortions, forbidding busing to remedy de jure or de facto racial segregation, authorizing Bible reading in public schools, or abolishing the exclusionary rule in the federal courts — all purposes that a congressional majority might approve. In this situation, Congress might have no interest in enforcing the Ervin statutory limits. The oaths which the bill requires of convention members are probably not legally enforceable, and the legislation makes all congressional decisions pertaining to disputes with the conventions final and not subject to appeal to the courts. In any case, ever since 1939 the Supreme Court has taken the position that the amending process is, in its entirety, a political issue in which the courts will not intervene.

Even if Congress had the desire and the courage to lasso a runaway convention, what would be the effect? Suppose a convention, called to act on budget-balancing, also proposed an abortion amendment, which Congress then refused to submit to the states because it was unauthorized by the concurrent resolution. The abortion amendment would be killed, but at what cost? Paul J. Mishkin, who proposes this scenario (Newsweek, March 5, 1979), suggests that supporters of the abortion amendment would see the congressional action as a subterfuge, "a betrayal of trust by their opponents, Congress, and 'the system.' " He concludes that "the convention route will inevitably precipitate issues that will strain the network of trust on which a free democratic society depends."

Laurence H. Tribe, the Harvard law professor and author of the book American Constitutional Law, also stresses the dangers of a confrontation between Congress and a convention, whether "by treating some applications as invalid, or by withholding appropriations until the convention adopted certain internal reforms, or by refusing to treat certain amendments as within the convention's scope. As a result of any of these decisions, the nation might well be subjected to the spectacle of a struggle between Congress and a convention it refused to recognize — a struggle that would extend from the convention's own claim of legitimacy to disputes over the legitimacy of proposed amendments."

Already there is disagreement over how many valid applications have been filed with Congress for the budget-balancing convention, though Senator Birch Bayh says that, considering the climate of the country, "I for one am not going to look at the crosses on the t's and the dots on the i's."

Tribe also sees the possibility of the Supreme Court's involvement in disputes between Congress and the convention or the states. Some of the requirements of the Ervin bill might be challenged as unconstitutional interference with the internal procedures of an Article V convention. According to Tribe, even if the Court declined to intervene on the ground that the issues were political and nonjusticiable, "a decision to abstain would amount to a judgment for one side or the other . . . and leave the Court an enemy either of Congress or of the convention and the states that brought it into being."

Election of Delegates

One of the most frightening aspects of a constitutional convention, which has been little discussed, concerns the election of delegates and the character of the election campaigns. The Ervin bill says simply that the delegates shall be elected "in the manner provided by state law." Conceivably states might set up some special method for nonpartisan election of delegates. But much more probably the regular election laws would be used with nominations by party primaries or petitions, and general election contests between two major party candidates and perhaps others from minor parties.

The possibilities of the nation tearing itself apart in such election free-for-all contests are mind-boggling. A normal partisan election campaign is structured to some extent by party loyalties and allegiances, incumbencies, and voting patterns, the issues often being subordinated to candidates' personalities. But in an election for delegates to a constitutional convention, with no incumbents, and with issues paramount, the pressure of interest groups on candidates would be crushing. Every big or little pressure group would want commitments from candidates, and they in turn would seek votes by embracing as many causes as possible. It is inconceivable that candidates would campaign simply on the degree of their commitment to a balanced budget, or that they would be permitted to avoid discussing other issues. It is inconceivable that they would not be asked to take stands on abortion, gun control, busing, regulation of religious cults, exemption of religious schools from state educational regulations, coddling of criminals, or any other currently controversial public issue. Positions taken on these extraneous problems might well determine which delegates were elected; and delegates who had won election on these issues would be expected to carry them onto the convention floor, making it unlikely that the convention could be confined to its assigned subject.

The Folly of a Budget-Balancing Amendment

There is too much chance that a constitutional convention would be, in Justice Potter Stewart's vivid phrase, "a loose cannon." Calling a convention for budget balancing or any other purpose is playing Russian roulette with the Constitution. If an amendment requiring budget balancing is desirable and wise public policy, it should be drafted and proposed by Congress in the manner by which the previous twenty-six amendments have been added to the Constitution.

But should budget balancing be in the Constitution at all? This is not the place, nor am I the one to discuss the economic arguments for and against budget balancing. But as a political scientist and a former student of public administration, I can raise questions about the practical implementation of a public policy; and I suggest that a budget-balancing amendment would be unenforceable. There is no possibility of framing an amendment that would be able to control expenditures in the real world of national finance.

Budgets are forecasts. Even if they are in hypothetical balance at the beginning of a fiscal year, they can be thrown out of balance by unanticipated developments — a defense emergency, a depression (a one-per-cent rise in unemployment costs twenty billion dollars), a natural calamity, an oil embargo. There are no feasible sanctions to enforce budget balancing. A deficit cannot be made up out of the President's salary. Presumably the amendment would direct Congress to raise taxes or reduce expenditures when a deficit threatened, but the members of the Ways and Means and Appropriations Committees cannot be mandamused or put in jail.

The fact is that the drafters of a budget-balancing constitutional amendment would face an impossible task and find themselves on the horns of an inescapable dilemma. Either the amendment will require a balanced budget with no ifs, ands, buts, or escape clauses, in which case it will be as futile as King Canute and as unenforceable as the Eighteenth Amendment. Or it will be supplied with enough escape clauses so that it becomes nothing but a moral preachment to Congress.

Even if it were possible to draft a practical budget-balancing amendment, its inclusion would be a violation of the spirit and purpose of the American Constitution. Fiscal policy has no place in the fundamental law of the Republic. State legislators and others who are familiar with state constitutions, some of which run to almost one hundred thousand words, are incredibly detailed, and are amended at every election, may not see an issue here. But the strength of the Constitution and the foundation for much of its mystique has been that it was limited to fundamentals — government structure, governmental powers and their limitations, and individual rights. Loading the Constitution with policy preferences cheapens the document and freezes policies where alternatives should remain available.

As Tribe points out, "Slavery is the only economic arrangement our Constitution has ever specifically endorsed, and Prohibition the only social policy it has ever expressly sought to implement." Madison said that the purpose of amendments should be to correct the "discovered faults" and "errors" in the Constitution. The only two amendments that did not have this purpose were the Eighteenth and the Twenty-first.

The Hidden Case for the Convention

It is well to recognize that reasoned arguments against a convention will not necessarily relate to the motivation of many convention advocates. Many proponents admit, more or less frankly, that they do not really expect or even want a constitutional convention. For them, the campaign is simply a way to force Congress to pay attention to the problem of budget deficits and to draft its own constitutional amendment. It is a ploy, a two-by-four to hit the congressional mule over the nose. This is not true of Governor Jerry Brown of California, however. His strategy appears to go well beyond this limited purpose, or even 1980. James Reston, following an interview with Brown, reported that "his call for a constitutional convention to compel a balanced budget is only one means of changing the political dialogue," and is somehow connected with the exploration of outer space in the twenty-first century.

59-609 O - 80 - 34

Again, there are those who back a convention as a way of expressing their distrust for Congress and, indeed, their alienation from the entire political system. For many, budget balancing has become a code word to express resentment against the spenders, the bureaucrats, the government regulators, the welfare cheats. They are fed up and they aren't going to take it any more. Any stick to beat a dog.

The American Constitution is, in a sense, the victim of its own success. Veneration of the Constitution has resulted in an "amendment mania." Constitutional amendments are attractive to reformers and propagandists of all persuasions who want to give their cause status and glamour and place it beyond the reach of legislative challenge or later change of national mind.

A constitutional amendment is sought by the budget balancers because they want to invoke the prestige and the finality of constitutional language. But the surest way to drain the Constitution of its prestige and its finality is to make it a hostage in quarrels over explosive social issues. Peter McGrath's warning in a New Republic article in 1976 is eloquent and timely:

"Illegitimacy is the one thing that a constitution can never risk for it is the main — perhaps the only — agent of legitimacy for substantive policy decisions. This is why it is unwise for us to force our Constitution too far into the bitter controversies of the moment, such as those over busing and abortion. Each time we do so, we demystify it a little, which even in this secular age is not necessarily a good thing. The Constitution is an organism, and when you kick it, it kicks back, as Richard Nixon found out to his sorrow and surprise. But like any living thing, it can be worn down, burdened with work it was never made for." □

PART 2—BAR ASSOCIATION AND LAW REVIEW ARTICLES

The Alabama Lawyer

OFFICIAL ORGAN STATE BAR OF ALABAMA

July 1952

Contents

Volume Thirteen — Number Three

Editor:
JUDGE WALTER B. JONES
P. O. Box 708,
Montgomery 1, Alabama

A Study in the Invalidity of Memorialization Rescission Resolutions

FRANK E. PACKARD[1]
Chicago

TWENTY-EIGHT state legislatures have passed resolutions memorializing the United States Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States limiting federal income tax rates at twenty-five per cent in peacetime. Similar action by four more state General Assemblies is necessary in order to have two-thirds of the states, or thirty-two states, as required by Article V of the Constitution before the Congress has to call the convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution imposing a twenty-five per cent ceiling on federal income tax rates in peacetime. Of the twenty-eight state legislatures which adopted the foregoing resolutions those of Alabama,[2] Illinois,[3] Kentucky[4] and Wisconsin[5] rescinded their passage of such resolutions. The resolutions of rescission subsequently adopted by the legislatures of these four states are null and void and are of no legal effect whatsoever. This can be proved conclusively by keeping in mind the federal amendatory process provided for in Article V as follows: "The congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the congress. . . ."[6] (emphasis

---

[1] Senior Partner in the Chicago Law Firm of Packard and Evans; member of the Bar of the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois and of the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States.

[2] Ala. Acts 1945, p. 155.

[3] Ill. Laws 1945, p. 1797.

[4] Ky. Acts 1946, p. 720.

[5] Wis. Laws 1944-45, pp. 1126, 1127.

[6] U. S. Const., Art. V.

mine) — and by comparing memorialization by states with proposal by the Congress and comparing the right of a state to withdraw a memorialization with the right of the Congress to withdraw a proposal. Such a right does not exist in either case according to Professor Lester Bernhardt Orfield, who in his text book The Amending of the Federal Constitution states as follows: "Suppose Congress should attempt to withdraw an amendment after it had been proposed. This question was directly raised in 1864 when Senator Anthony proposed to repeal the joint resolution submitting the Corwin amendment. . . . The practice has been to regard such a withdrawal as ineffectual. The theory apparently is that each affirmative step in the passage of an amendment is irrevocable . . . confusion would be introduced if Congress were permitted to retract its action."[7] This view is shared by Professor Francis M. Burdick, who in his text book The Law of the American Constitution states that: "It seems safe to assert that Congress, having once submitted a proposed constitutional amendment to the States, cannot thereafter withdraw it from their consideration . . ."[8] Professor Orfield continues as follows: "In such a case the analogy of a state legislature's attempting to withdraw its ratification of an amendment would seem apposite."

Additional proof that a state legislature does not have the legal right to rescind a memorialization resolution may be adduced by comparing the right of a state to withdraw a memorialization and the right of the Congress to withdraw a proposal on the one hand with the right of a state to withdraw a ratification of a proposed amendment to the Constitution on the other hand for as the Supreme Court of the United States declared in 1921 in the case of Dillon v. Gloss: ". . . proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts, but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor . . ."[9] In the case of this additional comparison the answer is the same as a state cannot withdraw a ratification. Judge John Alexander Jameson in his text book A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions — Their History, Powers and Modes of Proceeding states that: "The language of the constitution is, that amendments proposed by congress, in the mode prescribed, 'shall be valid to all intents and

---

[7] Orfield, Professor Lester Bernhardt, The Amending of the Federal Constitution, The University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1942, p. 52.

[8] Burdick, Professor Francis M., The Law of the American Constitution — Its Origin and Development, G. P. Putnam's Sons, N. Y., 1922, p. 39.

[9] 256 U. S. 368, 374, 375, 65 L. Ed. 994, 997, 41 S. Ct. 510, 512 (1921).

purposes, as part of this constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several states,' etc. By this language is conferred upon the states, by the national constitution, a special power; it is not a power belonging to them originally by virtue of rights reserved or otherwise. When exercised, as contemplated by by the constitution, by ratifying, it ceases to be a power, and any attempt to exercise it again must be a nullity. . . . When ratified by the legislature of a state, it will be final as to such state. . . . When ratified all power is expended."[10] Professor Walter F. Dodd, writing in the Yale Law Journal, states that: ". . . the view is incontrovertible, that a state, once having ratified, may not withdraw that ratification . . . to construe the Constitution otherwise, would be to permit great confusion in that no state in ratifying could know what the status of the amendment was if at the same time other states were permitted to withdraw. Of course, confusion would occur also in that it would be difficult to know when three-fourths of the states had ratified. . . . The function of ratification seems to be one which, when once done, is fully completed, and leaves no power whatever in the hands of the state legislature."[11]

The Court of Appeals of Kentucky held in 1937 in the case of Wise v. Chandler that: "It is the prevailing . . . view of writers on the question that a resolution of ratification of an amendment to the Federal Constitution, whether adopted by the Legislature or a convention, is irrevocable. This conclusion seems inescapable as to the action of a convention called for the purpose of acting upon an amendment. When it has acted and adjourned, its power is exhausted. Since the 'powers and disabilities' of the two classes of representative assemblies mentioned in Article V are 'precisely the same,' when a Legislature, sitting, not as a lawmaking body, but as such an assembly, has acted upon a proposal for an amendment, it likewise has exhausted its powers in this connection."[12] The Supreme Court of Kansas in the same year ruled in the case of Coleman v. Miller that: "It is generally agreed by lawyers, statesmen and publicists who have debated this question that a . . . ratification once given cannot be withdrawn . . . from historical precedents, it is . . . true that where a state has once ratified an amend-

---

[10] Jameson, Judge John Alexander, A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions – Their History, Powers and Modes of Proceeding, Callaghan and Co., Chicago, 1887, secs. 579, 581.

[11] Dodd, Professor Walter F., "Amending the Federal Constitution," 30 Yale L. J. 321, 346 (1921).

[12] 270 Ky. 1, 8, 9, 108 S. W. 2d 1024, 1028 (1937).

ment it has no power thereafter to withdraw such ratification. To hold otherwise would make article 5 of the federal constitution read that the amendment should be valid 'when ratified by three fourths of the states, each adhering to its vote until three fourths of all the legislatures shall have voted to ratify.' . . . when a proposed amendment has once been ratified the power to act on the proposed amendment ceases to exist."[13]

When a state adopts a resolution memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution that state is engaging in a "federal function" which places such activity within the exclusive domain of federal jurisdiction and completely removes same from the pale of state province and beyond the power of state withdrawal. The truth of this is mainfest since the function of a state legislature in memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment is derived wholly from the Constitution the same as is either the function of the Congress in proposing an amendment or the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment and since the latter two functions have been judicially identified as "federal functions" totally without state realm. The Supreme Court of Kansas declared in 1937 in the Coleman v. Miller case that: "It is settled beyond controversy that the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States, like the function of congress in proposing an amendment, is a federal function derived from the federal constitution; and it transcends any limitation sought to be imposed by the people of a state. (Emphasis mine.) The power to legislate in the enactment of the laws of a state is derived from the people of the state, but the power to ratify a proposed amendment to the federal constitution has its source in that instrument. The act of ratification by the state derives its auhority from the federal constitution, to which the state and its people alike have assented. . . . If the legislature, in ratifying a proposed amendment, is performing a federal function, it would seem to follow that ratification is not an act of legislation in the proper sense of that term. It has been so held."[14]

---

[13] 146 Kan. 390, 400, 403, 71 P. 2d 518, 524, 526 (1937).

[14] 146 Kan. 390, 392, 393, 71 P. 2d 518, 520 (1937).

FEBRUARY 1959 • Volume 45 • Number 2

American Bar Association JOURNAL

Constitutional Law:

The States and the Amending Process

by Frank E. Packard • of the Illinois Bar (Chicago)

Amendments to the Federal Constitution may be proposed either by two thirds of both houses of Congress or by a convention called by Congress at the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the states. The second method of proposing constitutional amendments has never been used. However, Mr. Packard points out that thirty-three states have adopted resolutions calling upon Congress to call a convention to propose an amendment to limit the power of the Federal Government as to income taxes. Although seven of the thirty-three have since tried to rescind their resolutions, Mr. Packard believes that these attempted rescissions are of no effect, and he argues that a writ of mandamus will lie to compel the Congress to issue the call for a convention.

On March 2, 1957, the Legislature of Idaho passed a resolution memorializing the United States Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States limiting federal income tax rates. On March 30, 1957, the Tennessee General Assembly followed suit. This meets the requirement of Article V of the Constitution that if two thirds of the states, or thirty-three in number, petition Congress to call the convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution, then Congress "shall" do so. The thirty-three states which have enacted such memorializations are: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Of the thirty-three state legislatures which adopted the foregoing resolutions, those of Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Rhode Island and Wisconsin have attempted to rescind their resolutions. This raises the first thorny point: Are the resolutions of rescission adopted by the legislatures of these seven states of any legal effect whatsoever?

Some light on this question may be thrown by examining the federal amendatory process provided for in Article V. It is described in the Constitution as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of the ratification may be proposed by the Congress[1]. . . [Italics added].

Obviously, an amendment which arises through memorialization by states is equated with an amendment which arises through proposal by the Congress. Similarly, the right of a state to withdraw a memorialization must be equated with the right of the Congress to withdraw a constitutional proposal. Such a right does not exist in either case according to Professor Lester Bernhardt Orfield. Professor Orfield states as follows:

> Suppose Congress should attempt to withdraw an amendment after it had been proposed. This question was directly raised in 1864 when Senator Anthony proposed to repeal the joint resolution submitting the Corwin Amendment . . . The practice has been to regard such a withdrawal as ineffectual. The theory apparently is that each affirmative step in the passage of an amendment is irrevocable . . . Confusion would be introduced if Congress were permitted to retract its action.[2]

This view is shared by Professor Francis M. Burdick, who points out:

> It seems safe to assert that Congress, having once submitted a proposed constitutional amendment to the States,

1. U. S. Constitution, Article V.
2. Orfield, Lester Bernhardt, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION (University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1942, page 82.

cannot thereafter withdraw it from their consideration . . .[3]

Professor Orfield continues as follows:

> In such a case the analogy of a state legislature's attempting to withdraw its ratification of an amendment would seem apposite.

A perfect analogy exists in the 1951 decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that West Virginia could not withdraw from the Ohio River Valley Water Sanitation Compact. The Constitution provides that: "No State shall, without the Consent of Congress . . . enter into any Agreement or Compact with another state."[4] Thus, once a compact entered into between two or more states is approved by the Congress, the compact becomes a federal and multi-state matter entirely removed from the contingency of unilateral action on the part of one state.

In 1939, the same year that the income tax rate limitation movement began, the legislature of West Virginia ratified that state's adherence to the compact.[5] Eight states entered into the compact—New York, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Virginia. The following year the compact received the necessary approval of the Congress.[6]

In 1950, the Court of Appeals of West Virginia, in the case of State ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, held that the ratification of the compact by its legislature was unconstitutional and that, as a result thereof, West Virginia was not a member of the compact.[7]

The following year in the case of State of West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Frankfurter held that:

> A compact is more than a supple device for dealing with interests confined within a region. That it is also a means of safeguarding the national interest is well illustrated in the Compact now under review . . . We are free to examine determinations of law by State courts in the limited field where a compact brings in issue the rights of other States and the United States . . . its [West Virginia's] legislature may not be free, at any time, to withdraw the power delegated.[8]

Mr. Justice Jackson concurring, declared that:

> She [West Virginia] now attempts to read herself out of this interstate Compact . . . she may not . . . release herself from an interstate obligation. The legal consequences which flow from the formal participation in a compact consented to by Congress is a federal question before this Court . . . West Virginia should be estopped from repudiating her act . . . she is bound by the Compact.[9]

Additional proof that a state legislature does not have the legal right to rescind a memorialization resolution may be adduced by examining the right of a state to withdraw a ratification of a proposed amendment to the Constitution. Judge John Alexander Jameson indicates that:

> The language of the Constitution is, that amendments proposed by Congress, in the mode prescribed, "shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several states, etc." By this language is conferred upon the States, by the National Constitution, a special power; it is not a power belonging to them originally by virtue of rights reserved or otherwise. When exercised, as contemplated by the Constitution, by ratifying, it ceases to be a power, and any attempt to exercise it again must be a nullity . . . When ratified by the legislature of a state, it will be final as to such state . . . When ratified all power is expended.[10]

Professor Walter F. Dodd adds:

> . . . the view is incontrovertible, that a state, once having ratified, may not withdraw that ratification . . . to construe the Constitution otherwise, would be to permit great confusion in that no state in ratifying could know what the status of the amendment was if at the same time other states were permitted to withdraw . . . The function of ratification seems to be one which, when done, is fully completed, and leaves no power whatever in the hands of the state legislature.[11]

The Court of Appeals of Kentucky held in 1937:

> It is the prevailing . . . view of writers on the question that a resolution of ratification of an amendment to the Federal Constitution, whether adopted by the Legislature or a convention, is irrevocable. This conclusion seems inescapable as to the action of a convention called for the purpose of acting upon an amendment. When it has acted and adjourned, its power is exhausted. Since the "powers and disabilities" of the two classes of representative assemblies mentioned in Article V are "precisely the same" when a legislature, sitting not as a lawmaking body, but as such an assembly, has acted upon a proposal for an amendment, it likewise has exhausted its power in this connection.[12]

The Supreme Court of Kansas in the same year ruled in the case of Coleman v. Miller that:

> It is generally agreed by lawyers, statesmen and publicists who have debated this question that a . . . ratification once given cannot be withdrawn . . . from historical precedents, it is . . . true that where a state has once ratified an amendment it has no power thereafter to withdraw such ratification. To hold otherwise would make Article V of the Federal Constitution read that the amendment should be valid "when ratified by three fourths of the States, each adhering to its vote until three fourths of all the legislatures shall have voted to ratify. . . . when a proposed amendment has once been ratified the power to act on the proposed amendment ceases to exist.[13]

The historical precedents here are more than ample. Some references to a few may be helpful.

Some Precedents . . . Two Earlier Amendments

New Jersey and Ohio[14] were among the states which ratified the proposed Fourteenth Amendment.[15] Subsequently, New Jersey and Ohio[16] took action to rescind their respective ratifications. However, after passage of ratifications by the necessary three fourths of the states, the Congress passed a resolution[17] listing the ratifying states and

---

3. Burdick, Francis M., THE LAW OF THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION—ITS ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, 1922) page 39.
4. U. S. Constitution, Article 1, §10, clause 3.
5. W. Va. Acts 1939, c. 38.
6. 54 U. S. Stat. at L. 752.
7. 134 W. Va. 272 (1950).
8. 341 U. S. 22, 27, 28, 30; 71 S. Ct. 557, 560-562 (1951).
9. 341 U. S. 22, 35, 36; 71 S. Ct. 557, 564 (1951).
10. Jameson, Judge John Alexander. A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS—THEIR HISTORY, POWERS AND MODE OF PROCEEDING (Callaghan and Co., Chicago, 1887) §§579, 581.
11. Dodd, Walter F. Amending the Federal Constitution. 30 YALE L. J. 321, 346 (1921).
12. Wise v. Chandler, 270 Ky. 1, 8, 9, 108 S. W. 2d 1024, 1028 (1937).
13. 146 Kan. 390, 400, 403, 71 P. 2d 518, 524, 526 (1937).
14. Ohio Laws 1867, pages 320, 321.
15. 14 U. S. Stat. at L. 358.
16. 65 Ohio Laws 280.
17. 15 U. S. Stat. at L. 709, 710.

included New Jersey and Ohio. The Congress transmitted such resolutions to the Department of State. Secretary of State William H. Seward, in pursuance of such a resolution and acting under statutory duty, issued his certificate[18] declaring the Fourteenth Amendment an integral part of the Constitution. In his certification, Secretary Seward also listed the ratifying states and included New Jersey and Ohio.

New York was among the states that ratified the proposed Fifteenth Amendment. Subsequently, New York took action to rescind her ratification. However, after passage of ratifications by the requisite three fourths of the states, Secretary of State Hamilton Fish, acting under statutory duty, issued his certification[19] declaring the Fifteenth Amendment an integral part of the Constitution. In his certification, Secretary of State Fish listed the ratifying states and included New York.

All of the foregoing would seem to indicate clearly that when a state adopts a resolution memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution, that state is engaging in a "federal function". That function places such activity within the exclusive domain of federal jurisdiction and completely removes it from the state province and beyond the power of state withdrawal. The truth of this is manifest. The function of a state legislature in memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment is derived wholly from the Constitution, just as is the function of the Congress in proposing an amendment or the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment. The latter two functions have been judically identified as "federal functions" totally without the realm of the states.

The Supreme Court of Kansas declared in 1937 in the Coleman v. Miller case that:

> It is settled beyond controversy that the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, like the function of Congress in proposing an amendment, is a federal function derived from the federal Constitution; and it transcends any limitation sought to be imposed by the people of a state [italics added]. The power to legislate in the enactment of the laws of a state is derived from the people of the state, but the power to ratify a proposed amendment to the federal constitution has its source in that instrument. The act of ratification by the state derives its authority from the federal Constitution, to which the state and its people alike have assented . . . If the legislature, in ratifying a proposed amendment, is performing a federal function, it would seem to follow that ratification is not an act of legislation in the proper sense of that term. It has been so held.[20]

All of which would indicate that the attempts of the seven states to rescind their resolutions calling on Congress for a convention to propose an income tax limitation amendment are null and void.

A subsidiary problem arises with respect to two of the thirty-three states which have memorializations to Congress in connection with a limit on federal income tax rates. The governors of two of these states—Pennsylvania[21] in 1943 and Montana[22] in 1951—vetoed the resolutions. Do such vetoes have any force? In that connection, the following testimony at a panel hearing of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report of the Congress on January 31, 1952, may be of interest:

Alfred G. Buehler of the University of Pennsylvania declared that:

> Pennsylvania is one of the states that passed the resolution, and Senator Martin, who was then Governor, vetoed the resolution . . . I think our Attorney General has given out the opinion unofficially that the veto would have no legal effect.[23]

The governor of a state has no power to veto either a state legislative resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the United States Constitution or a state legislative resolution memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment. The precedent for this principle lies in the rule that the President of the United States has no power to veto a resolution of the Congress proposing an amendment to the Constitution.

Moffett Studio

Frank E. Packard is now Executive Vice President of the Western Tax Council, Inc. A member of the North Dakota Bar, he served as Attorney General of North Dakota in 1918-1920. He was General and Tax Attorney of Standard Oil Company of Indiana from 1921 to 1946. He is a veteran of the Spanish-American War.

This rule that the President's veto does not extend to congressional proposals of amendments but only to legislative acts was first laid down in 1798 by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia. In that case, the validity of the Eleventh Amendment was attacked on the ground that the resolution proposing it in 1794 had not been submitted to the President for his approval. Delivering the opinion of the Court, Mr. Justice Chase stated that:

> The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation. He has nothing to do with the proposition, or adoption, of amendments to the Constitution.[24]

In 1887, Judge Alexander Jameson stated that the decision in Hollingsworth v. Virginia:

18. 15 U. S. Stat. at L. 708, 709.
19. 16 U. S. Stat. at L. 1131, 1132.
20. 144 Kan. 390, 392, 393, 71 P. 2d 518, 520 (1937).
21. Pa. Acts, June 7, 1943 (H.R. 50). Vetoed: Cong. Rec., Volume 89, page 5220.
22. Mont. Acts, Feb., 1951 (H. J. Res. 4). Vetoed: Cong. Rec., Daily, March 16, 1951, page 2613.
23. Hearings, January, 1952, Economic Report of of the President, Joint Committee on the Economic Report, parts 344-347.
24. 3 Dall. 378, 382, 1 L. ed. 644, 646 (1798).

. . . coincides with that entertained by the Senate, when the amendment of 1803, respecting the mode of electing President and Vice-President of the United States was under consideration. From the journals of that body, it appears that the question was distinctly raised on a motion that the amendment should be submitted to the President for his approval. The following is the entry on that subject:

"On motion that the Committee on Enrolled Bills be directed to present to the President of the United States, for his approbation, the resolution which has been passed by both Houses of Congress, proposing to the consideration of the State legislatures an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the mode of electing President and Vice-President thereof, it was passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23."

In 1865, the amendment proposed by Congress, relative to slavery, having by inadvertence been presented to the President of the United States for his approval by a subordinate officer of the Senate, Senator Trumbull of Illinois, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of that body, introduced the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the extinction of slavery therein, having been inadvertently presented to the President for his approval, it is hereby declared that such an approval was unnecessary to give effect to the action of Congress in proposing said amendment, inconsistent with the former practice in reference to all amendments to the Constitution heretofore adopted, and being inadvertently done, should not constitute a precedent for the future; and the Secretary is hereby instructed not to communicate the notice of the approval of said amendment by the President to the House of Representatives" . . . Mr. Trumbull's resolution was agreed to without a division.[25]

In 1921, Walter F. Dodd summed up the prevailing opinion:

> An issue which presents itself with respect to state ratification is that as to whether the governor has any veto power over the state legislative action in this regard. It has already been suggested that the President of the United States has no power to disapprove the action of Congress in proposing constitutional amendments to the states, and this view is taken because the proposal of constitutional amendments is not regarded as a regular function of legislation, the Constitution prescribing it as a different process to be exercised in a different manner. The same view applies with respect to the governor's power of vetoing the state legislative ratification of a federal amendment. The state legislature here is not acting as a state legislative body under the terms of the state constitution, but is, in the clear view expressed by the Supreme Court, acting as an agent of the national government in the performance of a function specified by the Constitution of the United States. The Governor has, by the terms of the federal Constitution, no share in this function.
>
> The governor of New Hampshire vetoed the resolution of the legislature of that state ratifying the Twelfth Amendment, but as the vote of the state was not needed to make up the three-fourths vote required for the ratification of the amendment, no issue seems to have been made about the matter. When the legislature of the State of Kentucky rejected the Thirteenth Amendment, the resolution was presented to the governor of that state. The governor, although disagreeing with the legislative action, merely transmitted the action of the general assembly to the federal authorities.
>
> When the income tax amendment was pending, Mr. Hughes, who was then governor of New York, sent a message to the legislature of that state recommending that the amendment be not approved, but nothing in the circumstances indicated any view upon his part that he had any negative power over such action as might be taken by the legislature. In the State of Arkansas, the legislative action ratifying the income tax amendment was submitted to the governor and was vetoed by him. The action of the legislature was, however, transmitted to the Secretary of State of the United States, and Arkansas was properly counted as one of the states ratifying that amendment.[26]

In 1951, Edward S. Corwin added the last word:

> . . . it has been established by practice, with the implied approval of the Supreme Court, that legislative resolutions ratifying proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution are not subject to gubernatorial veto. In Leser v. Garnett (258 U.S. 130, 137, 32 S. Ct. 217, 66 L. Ed. 505 1922), it appeared that the governor of Tennessee had not certified the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment to the Secretary of State. The Supreme Court held, nevertheless, that the Amendment had been validly ratified, saying "As the legislatures of Tennessee and of West Virginia had power to adopt the resolutions of ratification, official notice to the secretary, duly authenticated, that they had done so, was conclusive upon him . . ."[27]

The principle that the governor of a state has no power to veto a state legislative resolution pertaining to the federal amendatory process is further attested to by decisions of the courts of last resort of the States of Arkansas[28], Colorado[29], Louisiana[30], Maryland[31], Michigan[32], Nebraska[33], North Dakota[34], Pennsylvania[35] and Washington[36]. All of which should invalidate any claim that the governors' vetoes in Pennsylvania and Montana have any force in the matter of the resolutions we are discussing.

The Proposed Convention . . . Mandatory or Discretionary

When thirty-three state legislatures have passed resolutions memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing constitutional amendments (as required by Article V), is it mandatory or discretionary with the Congress to call a convention? Some have raised this point, but the authorities are in agreement that under such circumstances it is mandatory upon the Congress to call a convention.

Professor Henry Rottschaefer stated that amendments

> . . . may be proposed by Congress on its own initiative whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, or by a convention called for that purpose which Congress is

(Continued on page 196)

25. Jameson, Judge John Alexander, A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS; THEIR HISTORY, POWERS, AND MODES OF PROCEEDING (Callaghan and Co., Chicago, 1887), pages 589, 596, 592.

26. Dodd, Walter F., Amending the Federal Constitution, 30 YALE LAW J. 321, 345, 346 (1921).

27. Corwin, Edward S., The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAWYER 185, 207 (1951).

28. Mitchell v. Hopper, 153 Ark. 515, 241 S.W. 10 (1922).

29. People ex rel. Stewart v. Ramer, 62 Col. 128, 160, 1032 (1916).

30. State ex rel. Morris v. Mason, 43 La. Ann. 590, 9 So. 776 (1891); State v. American Sugar Refining Co., 127 La. 407, 53 So. 742 (1915).

31. Warfield v. Vondiner, 101 Md. 78, 60 A. 538 (1908).

32. Murphy Chair Co. v. Attorney General, 148 Mich. 565, 112 N.W. 127 (1907).

33. In re Senate File No. 31, 25 Neb. 864, 41 N.W. 981 (1889).

34. State v. Dahl, 6 N. Dak. 81, 58 N.W. 438 (1896).

35. Commonwealth ex rel. Attorney General v. Griest, 196 Pa. St. 396, 46 A. 505 (1900).

36. State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 107 Wash. 187, 181, 929 (1919).

Constitutional Law

(Continued from page 164)

> required to call on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States.[37]

Professor Westel Woodbury Willoughby wrote as follows:

> It would appear that the act thus required of Congress is a purely ministerial one in substance, if not in form, and the obligation to perform it is stated in imperative form by the Constitution.[38]

In the words of Article V "The Congress . . . on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention proposing Amendments." As long ago as 1816 it was held by Mr. Justice Story in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee[39] that the word "shall" imports the imperative and the mandatory.

What if Congress refuses to call a constitutional convention to draft the desired amendment or refuses to draft it itself? The hand of the Congress can be forced in the matter. Under the foregoing circumstances an action at law of mandamus in the District Court of the United States would lie against every member of the Congress. For precedents there are the cases of State v. Town Council of South Kingston and Virginia v. West Virginia.

In the former, the Supreme Court of Rhode Island issued a writ of mandamus against a municipal quasi-legislative body and in the latter the Supreme Court of the United States held that it had the power to issue a writ of mandamus against the West Virginia legislature. In the former case the Supreme Court of Rhode Island stated that:

> . . . the question is whether the case alleged is a proper one for the issue of a writ of mandamus. One office of mandamus is to enforce obedience to statute law. In general, it lies to compel all officers to perform ministerial duties, as well as to compel subordinate courts to perform judicial duties; but not to compel the exercise of discretion in any particular way. It is not contended that the duty of the town council in this matter is other than ministerial. Mandamus is peculiarly the proper remedy when other specific remedies are wanting. The remedy which a legislature can provide is to make a law applicable to the case. When the law is made, it is for the court to enforce it, or to punish for disobedience of it. In either function it must construe the statute, i.e. declare what it means. In the present case, if the law already made imposes a present duty, no further legislation would make it more imperative. Any legislative act designed as a remedy must impose ministerial duties upon individuals. The court must again be resorted to, to compel such individuals to perform those duties. So that in the last analysis this remedy by mandamus is the only specific and efficient one, and if it is not afforded there are no other means which can give to the electors the opportunity to exercise such rights as the law gives them.[40]

In the latter case the Supreme Court of the United States declared that:

> The remedy sought, as we have at the outset seen, is an order in the nature of mandamus commanding the levy by the legislature of West Virginia of a tax to pay the judgment. Insofar as the duty to award that remedy is disputed merely because authority to enforce a judgment against a State may not affect state power, the contention is adversely disposed of by what we have said.[41]

Walter K. Tuller, in reviewing the evidence, concluded:

> Every officer, of whatever branch, is sworn to support and obey the Constitution, and it is the natural presumption, fully justified by our history, that none will refuse to obey its mandates as interpreted by that body whose function and duty it is to do so.
>
> The form of remedy for compelling Congress to act would seem clearly to be a writ of mandamus. It is believed that such a proceeding may be instituted by any citizen. Every citizen of the country has a direct interest that the Constitution shall be obeyed, and that interest is none the less real and entitled to recognition and protection by the courts that it is not capable of financial computation. Indeed, the very fact that he has no other remedy serves rather, under the established principles governing its issuance, to emphasize his right to this writ. Since the Constitution does not confer original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court to issue writs of mandamus (see Marbury v. Madison), it would be necessary to commence the action in the courts of the District of Columbia. It has been settled since the decision of Kendall v. United States, that those courts have jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandamus as an original proceeding. From the decision there an appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.[42]

Could a Convention Write a New Constitution?

A question which arises at this point has proved troublesome to a few: If Congress calls a constitutional convention, may that convention not reopen the entire Constitution for revision? In other words, can a convention called by the Congress under the terms of Article V, undertake to promulgate an entirely new Constitution for the United States?

Professor Orfield declares that:

> Perhaps the most important question concerning a convention is as to the extent of its powers. Could it propose a wholly new constitution? Article V says that Congress "shall call a convention for proposing amendments." If this rule were interpreted literally, it might be argued that the convention could not propose an entirely new constitution in the form of a single document superseding the existing Constitution.[43]

William A. Platz states that:

> But if the convention were to have such power [to propose a new Constitution], would not Article V so state, without leaving the matter to inference?[44]

A related question naturally suggests itself: Can a convention which goes beyond the scope of its powers (as, for example, attempting to usurp legislative functions), be restrained by legal process? The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania declared in 1874 in Wells v. Bain that:

---

37. Rottschaefer, Henry, HANDBOOK OF AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (West Publishing Co. St. Paul, Minnesota, 1939), page 388.
38. Willoughby, Westel Woodbury, THE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF THE UNITED STATES (Baker, Voorhis and Co., New York, 1929), page 597.
39. 14 U. S. 304, 4 L. ed. 97, 103 (1816).
40. 27 A. 509, 602, 22 L.R.A. 85, 87, 88 (1893).
41. 246 U. S. 565, 663, 664 (1918).
42. Tuller, Walter K., A Convention To Amend the Constitution—Why Needed—How It May Be Obtained, 11 NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW 389, 392, 393 (1911).
43. Orfield, Lester Bernhardt, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION (Callaghan and Co., Chicago, 1942), page 44.
44. Platz, William A., Article Five of the Federal Constitution, 3 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 17, 46 (1934).

> The convention is not a co-ordinate branch of the government. It exercises no governmental power, but is a body raised by law, in aid of the popular desire to discuss and propose amendments, which have no governing force so long as they remain propositions. While it acts within the scope of its delegated powers, it is not amenable for its acts, but when it assumes to delegate, to repeal and displace existing institutions before they are displaced by the adoption of its propositions, it acts without authority, and the citizens injured thereby are entitled, under the declaration of rights, to an open court to redress at our hands.[46]

The Supreme Court of Michigan stated in 1908 in Carton v. Secretary of State that:

> Should the convention attempt to exercise authority not conferred upon it, its action can be restrained the same as can any other body acting illegally.[46]

"A convention has no inherent rights",[47] in the words of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Therefore, the inherent safety in a convention! The fact that the authority of delegates to a convention is not set forth in Article V is no cause for alarm. The Supreme Court of New Hampshire declared in 1889 in Opinion of the Justices that: "... the authority of the delegates is not set forth. They are not endowed with the entire sovereignty of the state."[48]

Yet another problem, one of especial significance, poses itself: Does the subject matter contained in the memorialization resolution represent to a convention only the power of suggestion, or does such subject matter constitute the only topic for proposed amendments which the convention may consider and act upon by adopting or rejecting? The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts declared in 1833 in Opinion of the Justices that:

> If, however, the people should, by the terms of their vote, decide to call a convention of delegates to consider the expediency of altering the constitution in some particular part thereof, we are of opinion that such delegates would derive their whole authority and commission from such vote; and, upon the general principles governing the delegation of power and authority, they would have no right, under such vote, to act upon and propose amendments in other parts of the Constitution not so specified.[49]

The Court of Appeals of South Carolina (now the Supreme Court of South Carolina) stated in 1834 in The State ex rel. M'Cready v. Hunt that:

> If . . . the people, electing delegates in their primary capacity, had, by a majority of their ballots, specified a particular measure to be considered and decided in the convention, will it be pretended that the convention would have possessed authority for any other purpose?[50]

The authorities are in agreement and support the foregoing judicial opinions to the effect that the subject matter contained in the memorialization resolutions constitutes the only topics for proposed amendments which the convention may take under consideration and act upon accordingly. Professor Thomas M. Cooley declares that:

> The constitutional convention is the representative of sovereignty only in a very qualified sense, and for the specific purpose, and with the restricted authority to put in proper form the questions of amendment upon which the people are to pass.[51]

Professor Henry Campbell Black added:

> A constitutional convention has no authority to enact legislation of a general sort, and if the convention is called for the purpose of amending the Constitution in a specified part, the delegates have no power to act upon and propose amendments in other parts of the Constitution.[52]

Another legal question of momentous importance which we might discuss here is this: Must the Congress convene a convention to consider and draft the suggested amendment or can the Congress itself consider and draft the proposed amendment? Even after thirty-three state legislatures have adopted resolutions memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of considering a suggested amendment, the Congress could still consider and draft the proposed amendment itself. Or, to state the matter in another fashion, the Congress would not have to convene a convention if it considered the suggested amendment itself, provided that the Congress considered the proposed amendment within a reasonable time from the date of the thirty-third memorialization resolution. By the word "consider" in referring to the Congress considering the suggested amendment, the author means passing or rejecting.

Under the Constitution, there are two types of action recommended to the Congress in the matter of drafting an amendment: firstly, federal consideration by Congress (i.e., drafting, passing and submitting the proposed amendment for ratification), and secondly, federal consideration by a convention. The former is the end or goal sought while the latter is the means sought in order to realize the end. The end represents the intention while the means merely represents an instrument by which the end may be accomplished.

Federal consideration of the proposed amendment is possible by either a convention or the Congress. Since the carrying out of the intention is the dominant or primary objective sought, as long as the Congress can effectuate intention, the Congress clearly has the legal right to act in the matter. Do we have any legal landmarks on this point?

Wayne B. Wheeler has observed, writing in the Illinois Law Review:

> In 1901, a number of state legislatures petitioned Congress to call a convention as provided in Article V to consider an amendment for the popular election of senators. Other states followed, until in 1909 when the last such resolution was passed, 26 states had formally made this petition.[53]

---

45. Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 57 (1874).
46. Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 346, 347, 115 N.W. 429, 432, 433 (1908).
47. Wood's Appeal, 75 Pa. 59, 69, 73 (1874).
48. Opinion of the Justices, 76 N.H. 612, 613, 85 A. 76, 782 (1889).
49. Opinion of the Justices, 60 Mass. 573, 575 (1833).
50. The State ex rel. M'Cready v. Hunt, Court of Appeals of South Carolina, 2 S.C.L. 291, 338 (1834).
51. Cooley, Thomas M., A Treatise On Constitutional Limitations (Little, Brown and Co., Boston, 1927), page 88.
52. Black, Henry Campbell, Handbook of American Constitutional Law (West Publishing Co., St. Paul, 1927), page 45.
53. Wheeler, Wayne B., Is a Constitution Convention Impending? 21 Ill. L. Rev. 782, 786, 788 (April 1, 1927).

And as William Logan Martin has pointed out, writing in the AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION JOURNAL:

> . . . the second or convention method, which has never been used to finality, but only to press Congress into action as in the single case of the Seventeenth Amendment.[54]

Thirty-three states have passed resolutions memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment limiting federal income tax rates. This makes seven more states than passed resolutions memorializing the Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment providing for the direct election of United States Senators. If twenty-six states were enough to induce the Congress to take the initiative in the matter and propose the amendment providing for the popular election of United States Senators without the Congress waiting for action by two thirds of the states, then certainly the thirty-three states which have acted in regard to the imposition of a ceiling on federal income tax rates should be, and doubtless are, enough to cause the Congress to assume jurisdiction in the province and propose the amendment without referring it to a convention.

Because the income tax limitation movement has reached the point where apparently an impressive number of states have taken action in the matter, proposed congressional legislation has been introduced. As outlined by Robert B. Dresser, writing in the AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION JOURNAL:

> . . . there is the First Reed-Dirksen amendment introduced by Representative Chauncey W. Reed and Senator Dirksen in the House and Senate in the fall of 1951. This amendment deprived Congress of the power to impose death and gift taxes at any time, and limited the power of Congress to impose income taxes to a maximum rate of 25 per cent, with power, however, by a vote of three fourths of the members of each House, to raise the rate to 40 per cent each year, even in peacetime, and with further power by a like vote to suspend the limitation on income taxes completely during a major war.[55]

On February 25, 1952, at Chicago, the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association endorsed the Reed-Dirksen Amendment. Mr. Dresser concludes his outline as follows:

> . . . there is the Second Reed-Dirksen Amendment introduced by Messrs. Reed and Dirksen in January, 1953, in substitution for their first amendment. This amendment limits income taxes to a maximum rate of 25 per cent but permits Congress by a vote of three fourths of the members of each House, to exceed that rate without limit. When the top rate exceeds 2 per cent, however, it can be no more than 15 percentage points above the bottom rate. For example, if the bottom rate were 15 per cent the top rate could not exceed 30 per cent. If the bottom rate were 20 per cent the top rate could not exceed 35 per cent. If the top rate does not exceed 25 per cent, however, there is no restriction at all on the bottom rate. It could for example, be one per cent or one half of one per cent.

On April 27, 1954, and again on April 24, 1956, the Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on the Reed-Dirksen Amendment. Of the witnesses who testified at the hearing, about three fourths went on record as in favor of the Reed-Dirksen Amendment. Upon the convening of the 85th Congress in 1957, the second version of the Reed-Dirksen Amendment was re-introduced in the Congress. The time has come for the Congress to defer to the expressed wishes of a two thirds majority of all of the forty-nine states and propose the amendment.

54. Martin, William Logan, The Amending Power, 40 A.B.A.J. 707 (September, 1954).
55. Dresser, Robert B., The Reed-Dirksen Amendment, 40 A.B.A.J. 35 (January, 1954).

Alexander Hamilton

(Continued from page 157)

discusses and exhausts the question of relations between nations and the constitutionality of treaties, and reconciles the treaty power with the legislative power under the Constitution. It is ironic that these writings were not even referred to during the recent Senate debate on the treaty power.

In a letter to Rufus King, then Minister to Great Britain, Hamilton wrote:

> The object of the legislative power is to prescribe a rule of action for our own Nation, which includes foreigners among us.
>
> The object of the treaty power is to prescribe a rule of action between two nations, binding on both.
>
> These objects are essentially different, and in a constitutional sense, cannot interfere.
>
> This construction reconciles the two powers and assigns them distinguishable spheres of action.
>
> [Thus,] whatever is a proper subject of a compact between nation and nation, may be embraced in a treaty between the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the correspondent organ of a foreign state.

Alexander Hamilton's last great literary service to President Washington and the United States was Washington's Farewell Address, in describing which I would join Vice President John A. Krout of Columbia University who says that if any paper deserved to be called "co-authored" this was it—co-authored by George Washington and Alexander Hamilton.

One cannot briefly describe all of Alexander Hamilton's contributions to the United States. To become familiar with them requires a good deal of reading-time. To understand them requires actual study, which means re-reading until the whole of it comes into balance, proportion and clear focus.

I hope I have touched upon enough to justify my assertion that Alexander Hamilton was "the Architect of American Union"; and that his understanding of the structure he built will serve us mightily today if we but recur to his own work, passing over what so many others—friends and foes—have said about him.

Before coming down to specific contemporary problems for which Alexander Hamilton has clear solutions, may I bring on two supporting witnesses. The first is the late Professor Ansel Daniel Morse, of Amherst, who wrote:

> Any just estimate of Hamilton's work must take into the account what he did for the education of the public. His usual method of seeking support was through appeals to the reason of thoughtful and patriotic citizens. In this his success was phenomenal. Friends and foes testified that in the qualities which enable a writer to convince, Hamilton was without a rival. In what he wrote there was rarely a trace of the partisan, never of the demagogue. Much of his work was done while questions relating to the Constitution engaged the attention of the public. For the treatment of such themes he had a singular aptitude. The extent of his writings is as remarkable as their solidarity. He wrote, often at considerable length, on every important public question which arose during the Federalist period. The result was a collection of writings which embody the best political thought of the time. Indeed, considering both range and quality, it is scarcely venturesome to say that Hamilton's works exceed in value those of any other American Statesman.

The second witness is Chief Judge Ambrose Spencer of the State of New York, who had this to say:

> Alexander Hamilton was the greatest man this country ever produced. I knew him well. I was in situations often to observe and study him. I saw him at the bar and at home. He argued cases before me while I sat as judge on the bench. Webster has done the same. In power of reasoning Hamilton was the equal of Webster; and more than this can be said of no man. In creative power Hamilton was infinitely Webster's superior... It was he, more than any other man, who thought out the Constitution of the United States and the details of the government of the Union; and, out of the chaos that existed after the Revolution, raised a fabric every part of which is instinct with his thought. I can truly say that hundreds of politicians and statesmen of the day get both the web and the woof of their thoughts from Hamilton's brains. He, more than any other man, did the thinking of the time.

I agree with Judge Spencer that Alexander Hamilton did the thinking of the time. But I would add that Alexander Hamilton has done much of the fundamental thinking for our own time. As a leader, as youthful as he was, Hamilton saw clearly what his followers and supporters saw only dimly.

In fiscal policy the detail of every Hamilton proposal was grounded in honor and integrity. For these are the bases of credit—public or private—in any political system.

In foreign policy the missionary complex was as alien to Alexander Hamilton as the Devil is to Holy Water. To him the long-term interests of the nation were paramount to every other consideration. With him international prestige was based on national strength, honor, integrity and fair dealing. Anything else was illusory, and therefore dangerous.

To Alexander Hamilton the treaty power of the United States is limited to proper objects of treaty—things over which the United States lacks complete jurisdiction and can only gain such jurisdiction by agreement with the other nation or nations concerned. By that token, objects over which we have complete jurisdiction are outside the limits of the treaty power.

Alexander Hamilton was ever clear on the principle that public officials were bound by the Constitution. Of public officials and their powers he stated:

> ...if they exceed them it is a treasonable usurpation upon the power and majesty of the people, and by the same rule that they may take away from a single individual the rights he claims under the Constitution, they may erect themselves into perpetual dictators.

Of courts, including the Supreme Court, Hamilton wrote: They "... must declare the sense of the law; and if they should be disposed to exercise WILL instead of JUDGEMENT, the consequence would equally be the substitution of their pleasure to that of the legislative body."

To Hamilton the exercise of will by a court was outside the scope of judicial power and an invasion of the field of legislative power. To him judges were bound, by their oaths to uphold the Constitution, to exercise judgment only, on the intent of the Constitution and the laws pursuant thereto, in deciding cases at the Bar.

Recalling the case in ancient Macedonia where the condemned man appealed from Philip drunk to Philip sober, we must give consideration to situations in which appeals can be taken from the will of a court to its judgment. The historic rules for judgments by judges are clear enough.

To Alexander Hamilton, will was the prerogative of the legislator. But judgment was the sworn duty of the judges. It follows that the exercise of will by a high court results in a spurious edict pretending to be law but not law at all, and not binding on any other judge mindful of his own oath to the Constitution and not to the higher court.

Alexander Hamilton well knew that law long antedated the Constitution. He knew well that law was the eternal sense of justice of the community; that law is because law was, unwritten and unfolding as man moved slowly toward civilization. He knew all too well that spurious edicts of kings, courts and parliaments were struck down when the law was restored.

But Hamilton knew even better that constitutions, once adopted by the people, were fixed permanently, were unalterable by government, or by any branch of government, Legislative, Executive, or Judicial; and were alterable only by the people in the manner they had ordained for the making of such changes.

I suggest that Alexander Hamilton is as alive today as he was when he was laying and clarifying the foundations of the Government of the United States. Many among us are unhappy—some, even bitter—about the direction of the drift in American public affairs. I must confess that I, too, am uneasy in the great constitutional crisis in which we are enmeshed.

Nevertheless, I am confident that if we recur to the hard and clear thinking of Alexander Hamilton, and spurn the sentimentality of nonsensical phrases that abort "Liberty and The Republic", this nation will live forever.

[From the American Bar Association Journal, July 1960]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: THE STATES AND THE AMENDING PROCESS—A REPLY

(By Bernard Fensterwald, Jr., of the Massachusetts and District of Columbia Bars)

This article is in answer to an earlier one appearing in the February, 1959, issue of the Journal. The earlier article declared that Congress was duty-bound to call a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution limiting the Federal Government's power to collect income taxes. This contention rested upon the author's calculation that the legislatures of thirty-three states—two thirds of the forty-nine—had submitted resolutions calling for such a convention. Mr. Fensterwald examines the problem and answers the contentions put forth in the 1959 article.

In the February, 1959, issue of this Journal there was an article calling for a constitutional convention to draft an amendment to limit federal income taxes. The author was Frank E. Packard, who is Executive Vice President of the Western Tax Council and a veteran of the Spanish-American War.

The first paragraph of his article was as follows:

"On March 2, 1957, the Legislature of Idaho passed a resolution memorializing the United States Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States limiting federal income tax rates. On March 30, 1957, the Tennessee General Assembly followed suit. This meets the requirement of Article V of the Constitution that if two thirds of the states, or thirty-three in number, petition Congress to call the convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution, then Congress "shall" do so. The thirty-three states which have enacted such memorializations are: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming."

In the balance of the article, Mr. Packard raised and ostensibly resolved some doubts as to the validity of the applications of several states, including those of seven states which have "attempted" to rescind their actions. He clearly implies that the Congress is shirking a binding duty to call a special constitutional convention to consider an amendment to limit federal income taxes. Mr. Packard goes on to say that "if Congress refuses to call a constitutional convention . . . [it] can be forced in the matter . . . [and] an action at law of mandamus in the District Court of the United States would lie against every member of the Congress".

If Mr. Packard is correct, his charge against the Congress is a most serious one. This article is an attempt to assess the validity of his position.

Let it be made clear at the outset that no effort will be made to delve into the many complex economic and political questions raised by proposals to limit the federal taxing power. We are concerned here solely with the legal and, more particularly, the constitutional aspects of the charge of dereliction of duty leveled at the Congress by Mr. Packard.

TWO METHODS OF AMENDMENT

Article V of the Constitution provides two distinct methods for proposing amendments to the states: (1) "The Congress, whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments"; or (2) "[the Congress] on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments".

Method No. 1 is the only one that has been used: the Constitution has been amended twenty-two times in our one hundred and seventy years, and each time it has been the Congress which has proposed the amendment to the states, three fourths of which have ratified.

Method No. 2 has never been used. However, this lack of use does not affect its availability. If two thirds of the states validly apply for its use, the Congress shall call a convention; conversely, until two thirds validly apply, Congress has no right or power to call such a convention.

Although Mr. Packard implies throughout his article that Congress has little or no discretion in assessing the adequacy or validity of the applications, it seems patently obvious that it is the Congress itself which must pass upon this question. Otherwise it cannot carry out its constitutional responsibility.

Are there a sufficient number of valid applications on file with Congress to confer on that body both the duty and the right to call a convention to limit federal income taxes? As a 1952 congressional report correctly observes, "In view of the serious nature of the amending process and the difficulties inherent in convention proceedings, the question of determining when Congress must call a Federal convention at the behest of the States is of more than academic interest."[1] Therefore, let us see whether or not the two thirds requirement has in this case actually been met.[2]

TEN LITTLE INDIANS

Agatha Christie once wrote a very popular book ("And Then There Were None") and play ("Ten Little Indians"), both of which were based on an old nursery rhyme. Every time there was a murder in the story, another little Indian statue would disappear. Eventually there were none left.

Upon examination, the thirty-three state applications are very much like the little Indians—they keep on disappearing. Not all of them vanish, but a sizable number do.

For example, South Dakota's application relates to procedures for amending the Constitution itself rather than to an amendment with respect to federal income taxes.[3]

And then there were thirty-two . . .

Maryland's memorial was adopted by the state's House of Delegates but not by its Senate, and therefore was not an application from the "legislature" as required by the Constitution.[4]

And then there were thirty-one . . .

Identical resolutions relating to limitations of the federal taxing power were passed by the two houses of the Texas state legislature, but neither house concurred in the resolution of the other, and no application was ever filed with Congress.[5]

And then there were thirty . . .

The resolutions of two states (Nevada and Montana) and the most recent resolution of a third state (Massachusetts, which also filed an application in 1941 and a rescission thereof in 1952) called upon Congress itself to propose an amendment to the Constitution which would place a limitation on its taxing powers, but made no request for Congress to call a constitutional convention.[6] The absence of any mention of such a convention in the three later resolutions can be considered prima facie evidence that the states in question did not intend their resolutions to be regarded as applications for a constitutional convention, and Congress is of course under no legal compulsion to treat them as such. Indeed, it is most doubtful that Congress has the legal right to count these as valid applications if and when it must determine whether or not two thirds of the state legislatures have applied for the calling of a convention on a particular subject.

And then there were twenty-seven, or at best twenty-eight . . .

---

[1] U.S. House of Representatives, Committee on the Judiciary. Staff Report: Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates. Washington: GPO, 1952, page 1.

[2] The whole question has been rendered technically moot by Hawaii's recent accession to the Union, with thirty-three states no longer constituting the necessary two-thirds before Congress must act; it now takes thirty-four. However, if Mr. Packard's contention regarding the thirty-three memorials is correct, the question remains on the horizon and cannot be so easily dismissed.

[3] Brickfield, Cyril F. Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention, Washington: GPO. 1957, page 87. (Printed for the House Committee on the Judiciary.)

[4] U.S. House of Representatives, op. cit., page 5; see also 84 Congressional Record 3320 (1939).

[5] U.S. House of Representatives, op. cit., page 6.

[6] Ibid., page 66; Nevada, 98 Congressional Record 8395 (1952); Montana, 97 Congressional Record 2537 (1951); Massachusetts, 98 Congressional Record 1793 (1952).

These are the only "applications" which might well be found to be invalid ab initio. There are a number of others which might well be deemed defective by Congress and which might reduce the number of valid applications to approximately one third of the state legislatures, rather than the required two thirds. In the remainder of this article I shall not attempt to predict the exact number of "little Indians" that might be left after congressional scrutiny; I shall confine my remarks to several general problems which bear on the validity of the applications.

CAN STATES CHANGE THEIR MINDS?

Mr. Packard discusses at some length whether states, once they have made application to Congress for a convention, can later change their minds and rescind their applications. He lists seven states which have adopted and forwarded to Congress resolutions to rescind their original application. He refers to Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Rhode Island and Wisconsin. A complete list would include five more states: Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Nebraska and New Jersey.[7] It is not surprising that Mr. Packard expresses the view that such resolutions to rescind are "null and void".

He begins his argument by stating:

"Obviously, an amendment which arises through memorialization by states is equated with an amendment which arises through proposal by Congress. Similarly, the right of a state to withdraw memorialization must be equated with the right of Congress to withdraw a constitutional proposal." [Italics added.]

The first sentence is reasonable, but the use of the verb "must" in the second sentence not only seems to imply that Congress is powerless to pass upon the validity of resolutions to rescind, but also that the proposition is beyond question. Among those whom he quotes is ostensible support of his view is Professor Francis M. Burdick, who says, "It seems safe to assert that Congress, having once submitted a proposed constitutional amendment to the States, cannot thereafter withdraw it from their consideration." [Italics added.] Mr. Packard goes on to cite an impressive number of court decisions to the effect that interstate compacts or constitutional amendments, "when ratified by the legislature of a state . . . will be final as to such a state." He was unable to cite a single decision bearing on the finality of applications for a constitutional convention.

Mr. Packard's contention that "the right of a state to withdraw a memorialization must be equated with the right of Congress to withdraw a constitutional proposal" is open to some doubt. Obviously, memorials by states do not in themselves produce agreement on a proposed amendment to the Constitution; such memorials are—in constitutional terms—applications by state legislatures to Congress, requesting the latter to "call a convention for proposing amendments". It is the convention which proposes "an amendment" to the states for ratification.

In drafting, adopting and submitting a proposed constitutional amendment to the states for ratification, a constitutional convention would be performing an act analogous to that of Congress in proposing a constitutional amendment to the states. However, it is difficult to see how the analogy can be extended to include applications by states to Congress. It is more difficult to conclude, as Mr. Packard does, that, "The right of a state to withdraw a memorialization must be equated with the right of the Congress to withdraw a constitutional proposal." [Italics added.]

Nor are Supreme Court decisions denying the right of states to change their minds after their legislatures have already ratified interstate compacts or constitutional amendments relevant to the case in point. (Mr. Packard cites, inter ali, State of West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22 (1951), and attempts by New Jersey and Ohio to rescind their ratifications of the Fourteenth Amendment.) Ratification is the final act by which sovereign bodies confirm a legal or political agreement arrived at by their agents; a state application to Congress to call a convention is of an entirely different nature.

On the other hand, the Supreme Court stated in Coleman v. Miller that, "The question of the efficacy of ratifications by state legislatures, in the light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal, should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments, with the ultimate authority in the Congress in the exercise of its control over the promulgation of the adoption of the amendments." [8] If an attempt to rescind on so important and final a matter as the ratification of proposed constitutional amendments is "a political question" for Congress to decide, then it does not seem extravagant to suggest that the validity of attempts to rescind applications for a convention would likewise be deemed a political question subject to the verdict of Congress.

---

[7] Louisiana, 100 Congressional Record 9420 (1954); Maine, 99 Congressional Record, 4311 (1953); Massachusetts, 98 Congressional Record 4641 (1952); Nebraska, 99 Congressional Record 6163 (1953); New Jersey, 100 Congressional Record 11943 (1954).

It is true that Congress might wish to stipulate a cut-off date for rescissions. For example, it might say that no rescission will be considered valid after either House, upon application of two thirds of the states, has adopted a resolution to call a constitutional convention. This circumstance of course does not apply in the present case, where Congress itself has not carried out any act in the amending process beyond recording receipt of the applications. If Congress chose to accept rescission resolutions as valid, Mr. Packard's thirty-three applications would be still further reduced—to sixteen.

CONTEMPORANEOUSNESS AND HOMOGENEITY OF APPLICATIONS

There are additional problems which arise with respect to the contemporaneousness and homogeneity of those applications which were valid in the first instance. In this regard, Corwin and Ramsey state the following sensible view:

"To be obligatory upon Congress, the applications of the states should be reasonably contemporaneous with one another, for only then would they be persuasive of a real consensus of opinion throughout the nation for holding a convention, and by the same token, they ought to be expressive of similar views respecting the nature of the amendments to be sought." [9]

The applications listed by Mr. Packard could not be called "reasonably contemporaneous" with any degree of confidence. The first application—that of Wyoming—was made twenty years ago, and eleven of the remainder, excluding those which have been renewed, were made fifteen or more years ago.

In Dillon v. Glass, the United States Supreme Court upheld the right of Congress to fix a reasonable time for ratification of a proposed amendment, and concluded that the seven years prescribed by Congress for adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment was reasonable.[10] The implications and scope of the Dillon v. Glass decision were further expanded by the Supreme Court in Coleman v. Miller, which also involved a proposed constitutional amendment. Here the Court stated:

". . . the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as in this case it does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social, and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment." [11]

In Coleman v. Miller, the Supreme Court recognized that changing political, social and economic conditions might affect the desirability of constitutional amendments proposed in response to the felt needs of a particular day, and that it was for Congress, rather than the courts, to establish time limits for ratification of proposed amendments on the basis of these "political" considerations.

Although state applications to Congress repersent an earlier stage in the amending process, changing conditions naturally have an equal effect on the

[8] 307 U.S. 433, 450 (1939).

[9] Edward S. Corwin. The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 185, 195–196 (1951). Note also the following statement by the Supreme Court with respect to contemporaneousness of ratifications:

"We do not find anything in the Article [V] which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the States may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective. We do find that which strongly suggests the contrary" Dillon v. Glass 256 U.S. 368, 374.

[10] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[11] 307 U.S. 433, 453, 454.

desirability of constitutional amendments envisaged at that stage. It does not seem extravagant to suggest that the courts would probably also consider it within the province of Congress to fix reasonable time limits within which earlier stages of the amending process must be carried out, including the filing of applications by two thirds of the states. The twenty-year spread covering Mr. Packard's initially valid applications does nothing to strengthen his contention that Congress is now obliged to call a constitutional convention. After all, the demands on the Federal Government, especially demands of national defense, were considerably different before World War II, when the first application was made. The fact that a dozen states have rescinded or—to use Mr. Packard's language—attemped to rescind their applications has a bearing on this point.

Then there is the problem of homogeneity. Although the applications which were valid in the first instance would all seek to limit the federal taxing power, there is considerable variation with respect to the stipulations proposed in each application. This in itself would not appear to present any great difficulty. As the remarks of Corwin and Ramsey might suggest, it can hardly be expected that two thirds of the states will arrive at an exact consensus in the wording of a proposed amendment in their applications to Congress for the holding of a convention. That is obviously the work of the convention.

However, five of the states have submitted applications which contain specific and identical reservations bearing upon their own validity. The applications in question are those of Nebraska, New Mexico, and the most recent applications of Michigan, New Hampshire and Maine. By their own terms these applications are effective only if "two thirds of the States make application for a convention to propose an identical amendment to the Constitution for ratification with a limitation that such amendment be the only matter before it, that such convenion would have power only to propose the specified amendment and would be limited to such proposal and would not have power to vary the text thereof nor would it have power to propose other amendments on the same or different propositions." [12] Must Congress accept these applications as being among those which are legally compelling if the stipulations set forth in them are not met? The matter is certainly open to doubt. The earlier, less restrictive applications of the latter three states were filed in 1941, 1943 and 1944, respectively, and as has been previously pointed out, their validity is not entirely certain.

A WRIT OF MANDAMUS?

In sum, a considerable number of the memorials listed by Mr. Packard either had no initial validity as relevant and proper applications, were filed fifteen or more years ago, or have been rescinded. Only about half of them are of the kind which would constitutionally oblige Congress—if there were enough of them—to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment.

Mr. Packard, in asserting that two thirds of the states have filed valid applications for a constitutional convention, concluded that if Congress refused to fulfill its constitutional obligations, a writ of mandamus forcing Congress to act could be issued by the courts. However, in the case of Mississippi v. Johnson, in which the Supreme Court was asked to enjoin the President from enforcing the Reconstruction Acts, the Court declared:

"The Congress is the legislative branch of the Government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department; through the acts of both, when performed, are in proper cases, subject to its cognizance." [13]

Under the doctrine of the separation of powers, the courts have refrained from issuing injunctions or writs of mandamus against the President, and they are not likely to serve a writ of mandamus on the Congress of the United States or its members. As we have seen, however, Mr. Packard's legal case is something less than iron-clad. And, as it turns out, he does not seriously propose to take it to the courts.

After attempting at great length to prove that it is mandatory for Congress to call a convention under present circumstances, and after rising the spectre of forcing Congress to act through a writ of mandamus, Mr. Packard states that, [12] Nebraska, 95 Congressional Record 7893–94 (1949); New Mexico, 98 Congressional Record 947–48 (1952); Michigan, 95 Congressional Record 5628–29 (1949); New Hampshire, 97 Congressional Record 10716–17 (1951); and Maine, 97 Congressional Record 6034 (1951).

---

[13] 4 Wall. 475 (71 U.S. 475), 500 (1866).

"Congress would not have to convene a convention if it considered the suggested amendment itself." He further maintains that, "Since the carrying out of the intention is the dominant or primary objective sought, as long as the Congress can effectuate intention, the Congress clearly has the legal right to act in the matter." And he concludes his article by saying that, "The time has come for Congress to defer to the expressed wishes of a two-thirds majority of all of the forty-nine states and propose the amendment."

Whose expressed wishes? Those of the states which have passed resolutions to rescind? That of Wyoming twenty years ago?

The leap which Mr. Packard takes from his earlier position, that Congress must now call a constitutional convention, to his later one, that Congress might just as well avoid all the fuss of constitutional conventions and writs of mandamus by carrying out the "expressed wishes" of two thirds of the states, makes more sense politically than it does legally. Has he not, in effect, constructed a legal paper tiger aimed at convincing Congress that it should propose a constitutional amendment to the states?

In asserting that "the carrying out of the intention is the dominant or primary objective sought", Mr. Packard refutes his earlier argument that state resolutions to rescind their applications are "null and void" despite the reversal of "intention" or "expressed wishes" thereby indicated. By thus departing from the legal aspects of the case, Mr. Packard would appear to be hoist with his own political petard.

CONCLUSION

There is no legal bar whatever to prevent the Congress from proposing to the states an amendment which would limit federal income tax rates. However, before employing the "second route" of a constitutional convention for this purpose, there must be valid applications from two thirds of the states. As of today, this requirement has not been met, and the Congress would be acting outside the scope of its constitutional authority if it succumbed to the cry that such a convention be called.

[From the American Bar Association Journal, vol. 45, November 1959]

PETITIONING CONGRESS FOR A CONVENTION: CANNOT A STATE CHANGE ITS MIND?

(By Frank W. Grinnell of the Massachusetts Bar (Boston)[1])

In the February issue of the Journal, an article by Frank E. Packard, of Chicago, stated that thirty-three states (two thirds of the forty-nine states existing at the time) had passed resolutions calling upon Congress to call a convention to propose a constitutional amendment limiting the federal power to tax incomes. In his list of thirty-three states, Mr. Packard included seven that had later withdrawn their resolutions, on the theory that a state may not rescind such a resolution once passed. Mr. Grinnell disagrees on this question of constitutional law. He sets forth his view of the problem in this article.

One of our most balanced American historians—the late Andrew C. McLaughlin—in his lectures on "American Constitutionalism" said, "The hope for successful popular government—and its justification—is based on the willingness of people to think."

That is an impressive way of reminding us of the remark Edmund Burke in 1774 in his famous address to the Electors of Bristol (his constituents): "Government and legislation are matters of reason and judgment and not of inclination."

Mr. Packard's interesting article on the amending process in the February JOURNAL is summarized on page 161 on the following headnote:

"Amendments to the Federal Constitution may be proposed either by two thirds of both houses of Congress or by a convention called by Congress at the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the states. The second method of proposing constitutional amendments has never been used. However, Mr. Packard points out that thirty-three states have adopted resolutions calling upon Congress to call a convention to propose an amendment to limit the power of the Federal Government as to income taxes. Although seven of the thirty-three have since tried to rescind their resolutions, Mr. Packard believes that these attempted rescissions are of no effect, and he argues that a writ of mandamus will lie to compel the Congress to issue the call for a convention."

[1] Frank W. Grinnell was admitted to the Massachusetts Bar in 1898. He is the secretary of the Massachusetts Bar Association and editor-in-chief of the Massachusetts Law Quarterly. He has been a member of the American Bar Association since 1907.

While the article deserves to be read, that brief statement seems sufficient for the need of further discussion.

After quoting a variety of opinions of well-known authors and some state judges, he concludes:

"All of which would indicate that the attempts of the seven states to rescind their resolution calling on Congress for a convention to propose an income tax limitation amendment are null and void."

He and those whom he quotes reach this conclusion by relying on the action of Congress refusing to recognize the revocations by Ohio and New Jersey of their previous votes ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment. That amendment was adopted under peculiar circumstances during the reconstruction days after the Civil War, and the practice under those peculiar political conditions can hardly be accepted as a final settlement of this far-reaching question. The history of the Civil War amendments as told by Professor Burgess' volume on "Reconstruction and the Constitution" is worth reading in this connection.

What sound reason is there for saying that ratification by a state legislature is irrevocable if a succeeding legislature votes to revoke before the requisite number of states have ratified? Certainly it seems peculiar if a state can change its mind in favor of, it cannot also change its mind against, ratification. Is not the notion that a state can change its mind in only one direction a most stultifying doctrine to apply in these days to the representatives of the people of the United States? How do the people differ from an individual in this respect? No one knows what amendments may be submitted in the future as the result of political excitement; and, if the entire national structure is to be submitted to the hasty political action of state legislatures without any opportunity for reconsideration, the country may wake up and find itself in a most serious situation some day.

Turning now to the wording of Article V that "on application of two thirds of the several states" the Conggress "shall call a convention for proposing amendments". Mr. Packard quotes Professor Willoughby (on page 196) as suggesting that "it would appear that the act thus required of Congress is a purely ministerial one in substance if not in form" and states that Mr. Justice Story in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee said "that the word 'shall' imports the imperative and the mandatory". Mr. Packard also suggests, with some citations, that a District Court of the United States could, and would, issue a writ of mandamus to the Congress of the United States to compel the Congress to call a convention. These suggestions call for very close analysis and some consideration of the nature and structure of the Government of the United States and the relations of its branches.

In the first place, Martin v. Hunter's Lessee had no relation to the problem. In the second place, the word "shall" has very flexible meanings as indicated in a discussion of "shades of shall" illustrated by the appearance, in one section of a Massachusetts statute, of nine "shalls" with different meanings—"directory", "mandatory", etc. In the third place, Mr. Packard poses what may be called an enormous question for the Bar, the Bench and the American people generally.

We are considering three questions—first the practicable meaning of the word "shall" in Article V; second, under the constitutional relations of Congress and the Judicial Department can a district court created and subject to repeal by the Congress issue mandamus to the Congress? third, if so, in case of appeal to the Supreme Court under the "appellate jurisdiction—with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make", could and would that court sustain the issuance of such a writ? Marbury v. Madison does not answer or even discuss these related questions.

Mr. Packard says (page 196) "The hand of the Congress can be forced in the matter." But how? No one but the Congress can "call" a convention. The courts are not authorized to do it, but to issue a writ would be an attempt by the court to do what Congress alone is authorized to do. It seems necessarily to follow that the word "shall" in Article V is a directory, and not an impossible mandatory word. If a district court should venture to issue such a writ, the Congress could immediately abolish the court which issued it. Who could apply for such a writ? An individual, a state legislature, or a group of state legislatures? Who would be the necessarily interested parties involved in addition to every member of Congress? Certainly every citizen of every one of the United States including Alaska and Hawaii, including babies. How could they be represented? By their state legislatures, which might be changed in the midst of the litigation? Is it conceivable that any court should, would or could, precipitate such a situation between two of the independent co-ordinate departments of the government of the nation?

Returning again to the thirty-three states alleged to have asked for a convention of which seven have revoked their request, Mr. Packard lists Massachusetts. Just what did Massachusetts do? I know nothing of the contents of the alleged resolutions of other state legislatures, but this is what happened in Massachusetts:

In 1941, two years after the collection of resolves, like a collection of signatures, began in Wyoming, the Massachusetts legislature adopted a resolution requesting Congress "that it call a convention—for the purpose of proposing an amendment to said Constitution as follows." Then followed a specific form of amendment. Note that the convention was to be called not to consider but "propose".

In February, 1952, the Massachusetts legislature adopted another and quite different resolution, somewhat curiously phrased, as follows:

"Whereas, A limiting of the power of the federal government to impose taxes on the people would automatically curtail government spending; and

"Whereas, If we withhold our money, our officials cannot carry us into socialism or communism; and

"Whereas, A limiting of spending by our government would enable our elected officials to resist requests from those who exert great pressure for bigger handouts; and

"Whereas, Most of our states and municipalities are subjected to limitations in their ability to tax, to the end that they are sound while the federal government is almost bankrupt; and

"Whereas, We have ceilings on everything but taxes; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts memorializes the Congress of the United States to amend the Constitution of the United States to the end that all taxes levied and collected in any one year shall not exceed a certain and reasonable percentage of the national income for the nearest preceding calendar year for which figures are available, with a special provision to provide moneys for military emergencies; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith by the state secretary to the President of the United States, to the presiding officer of each branch of Congress, and to the members thereof from this commonwealth."

Note that this resolution did not ask for a convention, but expressly asked the Congress "to amend the Constitution", which it cannot do.

Mr. Packard refers to the Fourteenth Amendment incident as a "precedent" (on page 162), but he does not tell the whole story. Secretary Seward himself expressed a doubt whether the action of the legislatures of Ohio and New Jersey in revoking a previous ratification before the requisite number of states had ratified might not be effectual in withdrawing the consent of those states. This appears in his announcement of July 20, 1868, which is quoted in Volume II of Watson's book on the Constitution, pages 1314–15, as follows:

"Whereas, no law expressly or by conclusive implication authorizes the Secretary of State to determine and decide doubtful questions as to the authenticity of the organization of state legislatures, or as to the power of any state legislature to recall a previous act or resolution of ratification of any amendment proposed to the Constitution, and

"Whereas, it further appears that the Legislatures of two of the States, to wit, Ohio and New Jersey, have since passed resolutions respectively withdrawing the consent of each of said States to the aforesaid amendment; and whereas it is deemed a matter of doubt and uncertainty whether such resolutions are not irregular, invalid, and therefore ineffectual for withdrawing the consent of the said two States, or either of them to the aforesaid amendments.

"Now, therefore, be it known that I . . . do hereby certify that if the resolutions of the Legislatures of Ohio and New Jersey ratifying the aforesaid amendment are to be deemed as remaining of full force and effect, notwithstanding the subsequent resolutions of the Legislatures of those States which purport to withdraw the consent of said States from such ratification, then the aforesaid amendment has been ratified in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, and so has become valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

On the following day, however, Congress passed a concurrent resolution:

"That the following States, including Ohio and New Jersey, having ratified the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States; therefore, be it resolved that said fourteenth article is hereby declared to be a part of the Constitution of the United States, and it shall be duly promulgated as such by the Secretary of State."

Secretary Seward then issued another proclamation certifying that:

"The said amendment has become valid to all intents and purposes to the amendments of the Constitution."

The only "precedent", therefore, appears to be a political one adopted during great political excitement in the face of doubt publicly expressed by so able a lawyer as William H. Seward.

Mr. Packard's reference (on page 162), as "a perfect analogy, to the case of West Virginia v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22, relating to the attempt to withdraw from an interstate compact after the compact was completed, seems to me to have nothing to do with the question he raises. At all events, whether the dogmatic resolution without reasoning by a headstrong majority of Congress in a period of vindicative politics will stand as "a precedent" if it comes before the Court as to any future amendment or not, it is a far cry to apply it as a precedent to a mere resolution by a state legislature asking the Congress to do something. Bunches of such state resolutions are passed almost every year about something. So far as I have observed few of them are seriously considered. Mr. Packard lists Massachusetts among the states that have asked Congress to call a convention, but the Massachusetts legislature changed its mind. And why should it?

Of course, I agree with Mr. Packard that a legislature in dealing with federal amendments is not legislating on state matters. They are performing federal functions with which the state governors have nothing to do. But the legislators are acting in a profoundly serious representative capacity for all the citizens of their state and their "posterity" when they act in any way concerning the Federal Constitution. They have no unrestrained powers or functions to commit their people without deliberate thinking. All of us change our minds constantly about something or other before final action if we are wise enough to do so. Surely the representatives of all of us have not only the power, but the constitutional duty, to do so if they realize before it is too late that they have made a mistake while representing us. It is our right and their duty as a matter of common sense because we may have to pay the price if they do not. While I appreciate their sincerity and earnestness, I respectfully submit that Mr. Packard and all persons whose opinions he cites are profoundly wrong on this question as a matter of common sense.

[From the American Bar Association Journal, vol. 49, December 1963]

The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments

(By Fred P. Graham, Former Chief Counsel of the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments*)

Drawing on the history of the article providing for amendment of the United States Constitution and the proposals that have been submitted by states for constitutional conventions, Mr. Graham concludes that the states have a vital role in the amending process in prodding Congress to act in areas involving the prerogatives of Congress itself. Too often, however, the states have allowed themselves to be used in campaigns for radical amendments that do not have popular support and to which Congress has responded by ignoring the states' requests for a convention.

During the first eight months of 1963, the legislature of eighteen states submitted to Congress thirty-eight applications calling for a constitutional convention to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States.[1] This was almost four times as many applications as were submitted to Congress in the first century of the Constitution, and by far the largest number to be adopted in any one year. Most of the applications called for the proposal of one or more of the three so-called states' rights amendments recommended to the states by the Council of State Governments. Critics of the three proposals charged that they were "radical in the extreme" [2] and that their adoption would result in basic changes in the federal system of government. The controversy developed into a cause célèbre in the press; many citizens became aware for the first time that the Constitution does provide a system whereby amendments can be suggested by the states.

*Educated at Yale University (B.A. 1953) and Vanderbilt (LL.B. 1959), Fred P. Graham also holds a diploma in law from Oxford, earned while on a Fulbright fellowship in 1960. A member of the Tennessee Bar, he is now confidential assistant to the Secretary of Labor.

The author wishes to express his gratitude to William H. Barr for his able assistance in the preparation of this article.

Unfortunately, the public controversy centered around the three proposals themselves and virtually ignored the question whether such extreme amendments could, as a practical matter, be added to the Constitution through the efforts of state legislatures. The very fact that opponents of the proposals viewed them with such alarm created the impression that they might somehow be forced into the Constitution by the pressure of state legislative efforts, without the approval of Congress and the general public. These widespread misinformed beliefs have blurred the public understanding of the actual powers of the states in proposing constitutional amendments.[3] Since there appears to be a trend toward greater use of this constitutional device by the state legislatures, it is worthwhile to examine the true role of the states in the amending process.

ARTICLE V: AN INEFFECTIVE COMPROMISE

When the delegates to the Constitutional Convention met in Philadelphia in 1787, two considerations were uppermost in their minds—the states would have to transfer more of their sovereign power to the central government and the new constitution would have to be made easier to amend than were the Articles of the Confederation. Under the Articles of Confederation, only the Congress could propose amendments, and the unanimous approval of the states was required for ratification. This requirement proved too strict, and none of the proposed amendments was ever ratified. It was only logical that the delegates should attempt a compromise under which Congress would share with the states its power to propose amendments, and the states would surrender some of their power to veto amendments.[4]

At first the convention considered giving the states the sole power to propose amendments, but the delegates later rejected this system as inconsistent with a constitution which was intended "to be paramount to the state constitutions".[5] The convention then adopted a resolution by Madison, which clearly vested in Congress the dominant role in the amending process: [6]

"The Legislature of the United States whenever two-thirds deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the legislatures of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the United States."

Several of the delegates were uneasy about a constitutional arrangement that placed the central government in a position of superiority over the states and at the same time gave the central government a veto over the amending process. Mason argued that this system would be "exceptional and dangerous" because "no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the

---

[1] A list of the state applications is printed as an appendix to this article.

[2] Letter from Professor Charles L. Black, Jr., to Arthur J. Freund, Jan. 7, 1963, in 109 Congressional Record 8263–65 (1963).

[3] Former President Dwight D. Eisenhower stated in a speech on May 26, 1963, that the people could amend the Constitution "through their state legislatures and without regard to the Federal Government . . .", Washington Post, May 27, 1963. Newspaper comments on the "states rights' amendments" controversy are collected at 109 Congressional Record 8267–71, 9649–51, 10663–64, 11331–33, 12137–38 (1963).

[4] See generally, Schelps, The Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution, 26 Notre Dame Law. 46 (1950); Martig, Amending the Constitution Article Five: The Keystone of the Arch, 35 Mich. L. Rev. 1253, 1267–69 (1937); Note, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 1067 (1957).

[5] 2 Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 557–59 (5th ed. 1937). In contrast, the Constitution of the Confederate States of America did give the states the exclusive power to propose amendments. Commander Documents of American History 384 (6th of 1958).

[6] Id. at 559.

government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case." [7] A further compromise was then proposed to require Congress, upon the application of two thirds of the states, to call a constitutional convention to propose the amendments, rather than merely to propose the amendments itself.

Madison made it clear that this modification would be an ineffective compromise, because Congress would be no more bound to call a convention upon the applications of two thirds of the states than it would be to propose the amendments itself. He also suggested that the uncertainties surrounding an unprecedented constitutional convention might inhibit its use, but his very fact tended to render the constitutional convention a more harmless sop to Mason and his followers, and it was incorporated into the final version of Article V.

As a result, Article V gives Congress exclusive control over the amending machinery, while empowering the states to act only to trigger the process. The grammatical construction of the article, however, creates the superficial impression that the state legislatures have equal power to propose amendments:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Institution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided . . . that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate."

The practical result has been to deprive the states of any effective role in proposing constitutional amendments. All twenty-three of the present amendments, plus the proposed twenty-fourth, were proposed by Congress because proponents of amendments always found it more expedient to work directly through Congress, rather than to attempt the clumsy and uncertain method of a constitutional convention called by the states.

However, it does not follow that states are precluded from any practical role in the proposing of amendments. An analysis of the 244 state applications that have been submitted to Congress reveals that, although most amounted to little more than a political gesture and a waste of time, some of them did contribute directly to the eventual adoption of an amendment. From this study it appears that in certain peculiar circumstances the states may play a significant role in the constitutional amending process.

I. PROPOSALS NOT HAVING BROAD NATIONAL SUPPORT

A large percentage of the state applications Congress has received called for amendments which had very little national support and which would have had no chance of approval by two thirds of both houses of Congress. Many concerned sectional issues that were too narrow to obtain national support—such as tidelands oil, the Townsend plan, taxation of nonresident income, and reversal of the school desegregation decision—and amounted to little more than state legislators blowing off political steam. In recent years, however, frustrated proponents of radical proposals which do not have wide popular and congressional support have attempted serious campaigns calculated to amend the Constitution by means of state action. These efforts ignore the fact that the state application alternative for proposing amendments was designed to function only when a proposal enjoys broad national support. These radical proposals have appeared initially to make progress, in terms of numbers of state applications, but none of them has ever been taken seriously because they obviously lack the necessary support to hurdle Congress, a constitutional convention and ratification.

The experience of the income tax limitation proposals illustrates the frustrations that face these measures under Article V. Since 1939 there has been an organized effort to call a constitutional convention to limit federal tax rates on incomes, gifts and inheritances.[8] Twenty-nine states have adopted applications

---

[7] Id. at 629.

[8] A succession of congressional hearings and staff studies have examined the development of this campaign. Staff of House Committee on the Judiciary, 87th Congress, 1st Sess., State Applications Asking Congress To Call a Federal Constitutional Convention (Committee Print 1961); S. Doc. No. 5, 87th Congress, 2d Sess. (1961); Hearings Before Subcommittee No. 3 of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 85th Congress 1st Sess (1958); Hearing Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on S. J. Res. 23, — Congress, 2d Sess. (1954); Staffs of the House Joint Committee on the Economic Report of the Select Committee on Small Business, — Congress, 2d Sess. (1952).

calling for a limitation (usually 25 per cent) and five have proposed total abolition of the taxes. Thus, when the legislature of Colorado adopted an application last April calling for a convention to limit the income tax and to eliminate gift and inheritance taxes, it represented the thirty-fourth application for a convention to deal with federal taxation, thereby apparently complying with the two-thirds requirement of Article V. Congress simply ignored the matter.[9]

But if Congress had bothered to defend its refusal to consider a constitutional convention, it would have found ample grounds to challenge the validity of many of the applications.[10] Twelve of the applications had been rescinded by the legislatures. One had been vetoed by the governor. Six were so defective in form or content that they appeared invalid on their face. Many were adopted so long ago that they could not be considered a valid expression of the present desires of the respective legislatures. Several were so different in wording that they might not logically be counted together. Thus, the mere adoption of a thirty-fourth application on tax limitation did not represent the broad popular mandate contemplated by Article V, and Congress was not criticized for failing to call a constitutional convention.

The important lesson for others who would attempt to force through radical amendments by state action is that Congress has the sole power to determine when a constitutional convention has been validly called for, how the convention should be selected and operated,[11] and by what means any proposed amendment would be ratified. Since the courts have made it clear that they will not intervene in these decisions,[12] Congress can ignore or block an amendment campaign unless the proposal is so popular that the voters would be aroused to retaliate at the polls.

The result is that Article V is misleading, to the extent that it appears to offer the state legislatures legal leverage in the amending process, divorced from any political considerations. In practice, a state application under Article V has no more effect than a simple memorial petition to Congress—both are judged by the political force behind them. If the state legislatures fail to appreciate this reality, they may tarnish their own prestige by allowing themselves to be drawn into highly publicized campaigns to obtain applications which do not have popular support and which are certain to be ignored by Congress.

II. APPLICATIONS ATTEMPTING TO LIMIT A CONVENTION

In the winter of 1963 a group of political conservatives, under the leadership of former Representative Ed Gossett of Texas and Former Senator Edwin C. Johnson of Colorado, launched an ingenious campaign to reform the presidential election system by means of state applications under Article V.

For many years, there has been a widespread belief in Congress that the electoral college system should be changed, but no proposed amendment has obtained the necessary two-thirds vote because of a split between Congressmen from large, urban states and those representing smaller, rural states.[13] Four basic reform plans have been considered: (1) direct popular election; (2) retention of the unit method of casting each state's electoral votes, but elimination of the office of elector; (3) division of each state's electoral votes among the candidates in the same proportion as the popular votes in the state; and (4) [9] Indeed, it would have been difficult for Congress to find all of the applications, if it had desired to check their validity. The applications are filed in the United States Archives, together with the memorial petitions, and no tally is kept of the number of applications received on the various proposed amendments.

---

[10] A running debate has been conducted in the legal periodicals on the validity of these applications. See Packard, The States and the Amending Process, 45 A.B.A.J. 161 (1959); Fensterwald, The States and the Amending Process—A Reply, 46 A.B.A.J. 717 (1960); Grinnell, Petitioning Congress for a Convention: Cannot a State Change Its Mind?, 45 A.B.A.J. 1164 (1959); Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending? 21 Va. L. Rev. 792 (1927).

[11] See Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 Yale L. J. 957. 964–66 (1963).

[12] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939); United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931); Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1866).

[13] See Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the Nomination and Election of President and Vice President, 87th Congress, 1st Sess., pts. 1–4 (1961) and 88th Congress, 1st Sess. (1963); Staff of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 87th Congress, 1st Sess., The Electoral College (Committee Print 1961); Kefauver, The Electoral College: Old Reforms Take on a New Look, 27 Law and Contemp. Prob. 188 (1962).

election of each state's electors from districts similar to the congressional constituencies. Congressmen from the big-city states generally favor the first two, while rural and conservative Congressmen favor the latter two.

The present state legislative campaign is calculated to call a constitutional convention that could consider only the latter two plans. The resolution, which was adopted by six states [14] this year, reads:

"Resolved, That application is hereby made to Congress under Article V of the Constitution of the United States for the calling of a convention to propose an article or amendment to the Constitution providing for a fair and just division of the electoral votes within the states in the election of the President and Vice President . . ." [italics added].

Since the two liberal plans do not contemplate a division of each state's electoral votes, neither is within the terms of the applications.

If twenty-six more legislatures approve similar limited electoral college applications, the nation will be faced with a series of unprecedented political and legal decisions.

Initially, Congress would have to decide whether to call the convention at all, and if so, whether to attempt to limit it to the alternatives contemplated by the applications. The convention would be called by means of a concurrent resolution in Congress, which requires only a majority vote. Since the proportional and district plans have received majority votes in the Senate in the recent past,[15] but were not proposed for lack of the necessary two thirds in both houses, it is conceivable that a majority in Congress would support a resolution to limit the constitutional convention to consideration of these plans.[16] If Congress called the convention, but failed to limit it to plans "providing for a fair and just division of electoral votes within the states", the courts would probably decline to intervene on the grounds that the controversy is political and outside the judicial sphere.[17]

From a practical as well as a legal standpoint, Congress would put itself in an awkward position if it called a constitutional convention to consider reforming the antiquated electoral college and tried to limit the convention in the solutions that it could consider. Most legal scholars agree that once a legislative body calls a constitutional convention into being, the convention is free to take any action within the purview of the constitutional provision that authorized its creation.[18] There are, of course, no federal cases in point, but the state courts have usually declined to intervene when a constitutional convention allegedly exceeded limitations set by the legislature, except when the convention exceeded its function of proposing amendments and attempted to legislate.[19] Thus, if the constitutional convention should conclude that the best interests of the nation would be served by, for instance, electing the President by direct popular vote, it could propose an amendment to that effect in good conscience and with impunity from judicial interference, despite any attempt by Congress to restrict it to other alternatives.

It appears that the states cannot, as a practical matter, use their powers under Article V to limit the types of proposals that may be referred for ratification. But in their efforts to do so, they may serve as the necessary force to prod Congress to break the current deadlock on electoral college reform and to propose its own solution. Since a simple majority in Congress and in the constitutional convention could approve a proposed amendment, Congress would be under heavy pressure to propose an amendment of its own, before matters slipped beyond its control. In this manner, the states would be serving a valuable function as a catalyst in the amending process.

---

[14] Colorado, Kansas, Montana, Texas, Utah and Wisconsin. Arkansas and South Dakota adopted applications that seek to restrict the constitutional convention to consideration of only the district system.

[15] Sixty-five to 27 in 1950, and 48 to 37 in 1956. The proposals have had less support in the House.

[16] However, President Kennedy bitterly opposed any substantial change in the present system as a senator, and his Administration has consistently followed the same policy.

[17] On the basis of the cases cited in footnote 12, supra.

[18] Dodd, The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions 72–93 (1910); Orfield, Amending the Federal Constitution 45–48 (1942); Contra, Jameson, Constitutional Conventions §§ 382–89 (4th ed. 1887).

[19] Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 115 N. W. 429 (1908); Franz v. Autry, 180 Okla. 561, 91 Pac. 193 (1907); Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 61 (1858) (dictum); Loomis v. Jackson, 6 W. Va. 613 (1873) (dictum). Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39 (1874).

III. APPLICATIONS FOR AMENDMENTS AFFECTING CONGRESS

The states' role in the amending process has been negligible because Congress has usually been responsive to the public's political desires, and there has been little need to resort to the uncertain state legislative route to circumvent an "oppressive" Congress. When Congress is divided and unable to act, or if it is slow to act, the state legislatures can act as a prod.[20] However, there is one area in which Congress may not always act promptly to carry out amendatory changes; here state legislatures may serve a crucial purpose in forcing Congress to act. These situations arise when a proposed amendment would affect the prerogatives of Congress itself.

This situation arose at the turn of the century when public opinion favored direct election of senators, but Congress failed to propose an amendment. State legislatures began to submit applications for a constitutional convention to consider a direct-election amendment and for constitutional reform in general. It was obvious to Congress that any representative constitutional convention would approve a direct-election proposal, and there were fears that the convention, under the general mandate, might commit other constitutional mischief. So, in 1908, when twenty-three legislatures had adopted applications, Congress proposed its own direct-election amendment.[21]

Here the states were able to play a significant role in the amending process, because the applications were concurrent in time, valid in form and enjoyed sufficient public support to be approved by a convention. Since congressional opposition was obviously self-serving, no Congressman could have afforded to oppose the convention, once the required number of applications were received. So Congress was forced to act, despite the fact that the amendment was contrary to the personal interests of many of the senators. It is in such situations, where Congress may fail to propose amendments because they would detract from congressional prerogatives, that the states may find future opportunities for meaningful participation in the amending process.

In recent years Congress has been subject to increasing criticism for an alleged failure to keep pace with modern legislative needs by reforming its own methods and procedures. Critics have accused it of refusing to make changes that are obvious to most outsiders, because the changes would detract from the prerogatives of Congress or its entrenched leadership.[22] Some of the suggested reforms would require constitutional amendments, and, while their desirability is certainly questionable, they are unique among congressional reform proposals in that they can be considered and proposed through state legislative applications, by an entity other than Congress. The most recent of these was former President Eisenhower's suggestion that the nation might benefit from a limitation on the number of terms that a Congressman could serve. Another is the perennial proposal that terms of representatives be increased to four years.[23]

The most popular of these amendments has been the proposal that the President be given the power to veto specific items in appropriation bills.[24] Because this would allow the President to veto certain pork-barrel items, while allowing other appropriations to become law, the idea has been opposed vigorously in Congress, particularly by those senior Congressmen who are in a position to procure large amounts of pork for their constituencies. But the public has become increasingly uneasy about unnecessary spending and the recent phenomenon of peacetime defense budgets swollen by questionable pork-barrel items,[25] and such [20] As in 1931, when four states applied for the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, and in the early 1940's, when five applied for a limitation of presidential tenure.

---

[21] Before the Seventeenth Amendment was ratified on Feb. 3, 1919, Congress had received applications from thirty-two states, constituting the required two thirds.

[22] See Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Standing Rules of the Senate of the Committee on Rules and Administration, 88th Congress, 1st Sess. (1963), Exhibit 8, for a comprehensive bibliography of the books and articles on congressional reorganization.

[23] To meet the senatorial complaint that this would encourage representatives to run for Senate seats in their off years, some proposals would also increase Senate terms to eight years. Cf. S. J. Res. 62, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., 109 Congressional Record 4253–54 (1963).

[24] Item veto amendments have been introduced in nearly every Congress since 1876. Thirty-two state constitutions now give their governors this power. See Hearings Before Subcommittee No. 1 of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 75th Congress, 3d Sess., Ser. 15 (1938); Hearings Before Subcommittee No. 3 of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 85th Congress, 1st Sess., Ser. 13 (1957); Hearing Before a Subcommittee on the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 83d Congress, 2d Sess. (1954).

[25] See, e.g., the speeches of Senator George S. McGovern, 109 Congressional Record 12198–602 (1963) and United States Chamber of Commerce President Edwin P. Neilan, "Our Own Public Scandal—Vote Buying and Selling", 109 Congressional Record 13824 (1963).

an amendment might have an excellent chance to be approved by a constitutional convention.

The progress of the states' rights amendments and the Gossett-Johnson electoral college proposal has demonstrated that proponents of an amendment can obtain an impressive number of state legislative applications in a short period of time, if they conduct a co-ordinated lobbying campaign through a national organization. A campaign for an item-veto amendment might be conducted by an existing organization traditionally opposed to pork-barrel excesses, such as the United States Chamber of Commerce or the League of Women Voters, or by an ad hoc group of interested persons.

In any event, the supporters of such a measure would have the satisfaction of knowing that, by using the state legislature method of proposing the amendment, the proposal would not be judged solely by the Congress that it seeks to restrict. If an amendment affecting Congress should develop wide popular support, the states could serve a vital role in the amending process by allowing the political will of the people to be expressed without a suggestion of a conflict of interest within the proposing body.

APPENDIX

STATE APPLICATIONS TO CONGRESS CALLING FOR CONVENTIONS TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS (1787–1963)

Year	Amendment to be proposed	State	Source of reference
1788	General	Virginia	Annals of Congress 248.
1789	General	New York	H.R. Jour. (1789) 29, 30.
1790	Revision of Constitution	Rhode Island	H.R. Jour. 148, 1st and 2d Congress.
1832	General	Georgia	23 S. Jour. 65.
1833	Against protective tariff	Alabama	23 S. Jour. 194.
1861	General	Illinois	Laws of Illinois (1861).
		Indiana	S. Jour. 420, 421, 36th Congress, 2d session.
		Kentucky	S. Jour. 189, 190, 36th Congress, 2d session.
		Ohio	58 Laws of Ohio (1861) 181.
		Virginia	S. Jour. 149.
1893	Direct election of Senators	Nebraska	See note 1.
1895		Wyoming	See note 1.
1899	General	Texas	33 C.R. 219, 280.
1901	Direct election of President and Senators.	Idaho	35 C.R. 306; 45 C.R. 7114.
1901	Direct election of Senators	Arkansas	45 C.R. 7113.
		Michigan	35 C.R. 117, 293; 45 C.R. 7116.
		Minnesota	34 C.R. 2560, 2615, 2680, 2796; 45 C.R. 7116.
		Missouri	See note 1.
		Montana	35 C.R. 208.
		Nebraska	35 C.R. 1779.
		Nevada	35 C.R. 112.
		North Carolina	See note 1.
		Oregon	35 C.R. 112, 117.
		Pennsylvania	34 C.R. 2245, 2289, 2493; 45 C.R. 7118.
		South Dakota	34 C.R. 2440, 2493, 2558.
		Tennessee	35 C.R. 2344, 2338, 2382, 2707.
		Texas	45 C.R. 7119
1901	General	Washington	See note 1.
1901	General, including direct election of Senators.	Colorado	35 C.R. 112; 45 C.R. 7113.
		Kansas	See note 1.
		Oregon	34 C.R. 2290, 2354.
1902	Direct election of Senators	Kentucky	45 C.R. 7115.
1903	Direct election of Senators	Arkansas	See note 1.
		California	See note 1.
		Idaho	See note 1.
		Missouri	See note 1.
		Montana	39 C.R. 2447, 2509, 2598.
		Nebraska	45 C.R. 7116.
		Nevada	37 C.R. 24.
		North Dakota	See note 2.
		Oregon	36 C.R. 2597; 45 C.R. 7118.
		Oregon	45 C.R. 7118.
		Tennessee	See note 1.
		Utah	45 C.R. 7119.
		Wisconsin	37 C.R. 276.
1903	General, including direct election of Senators.	Illinois	45 C.R. 7114.
		Washington	45 C.R. 7119; 46 C.R. 3035.
1904	General, including direct election of Senators.	Iowa	38 C.R. 4959.

APPENDIX—Continued

STATE APPLICATIONS TO CONGRESS CALLING FOR CONVENTIONS TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS (1787–1963)—Continued

Year	Amendment to be proposed	State	Source of reference
1905	Direct election of Senators	Missouri	40 C.R. 137.
		Montana	39 C.R. 2447.
		Nevada	See note 1.
		Tennessee	45 C.R. 7119.
1905	General, including direct election of Senators.	Kansas	39 C.R. 3466.
1906	Prohibition of polygamy	Iowa	See note 1.
		New York	40 C.R. 4551.
1907	Direct election of Senators	Illinois	42 C.R. 184, 359.
		Montana	45 C.R. 7116.
		Nevada	42 C.R. 163, 895.
		New Jersey	42 C.R. 164; 45 C.R. 7117.
		Oregon	41 C.R. 2928, 3599.
		South Dakota	41 C.R. 2492, 2497, 2621; 45 C.R. 7118.
		Wisconsin	42 C.R. 165.
1907	General	Missouri	45 C.R. 7116.
1907	General, including direct election of Senators.	Indiana	45 C.R. 7114.
		Iowa	42 C.R. 204, 895; 45 C.R. 7114.
		Kansas	41 C.R. 2925, 2929, 3005, 3072.
1907	General, including direct election of Senators	Louisiana	42 C.R. 5606; 45 C.R. 7115.
		Nebraska	See note 1.
		Nevada	42 C.R. 163, 895.
		North Carolina	45 C.R. 7117.
1907	Prohibition of polygamy	Delaware	41 C.R. 3011, 3591.
		Maine	See note 1.
		North Dakota	41 C.R. 4633, 4672.
		Pennsylvania	See note 1.
		West Virginia	See note 1.
1908	Direct election of Senators	Montana	42 C.R. 225, 712.
		Ohio	H.J. Res.
		Wisconsin	45 C.R. 7119, 7120.
1908	General, including direct election of Senators.	Oklahoma	42 C.R. 894; 45 C.R. 7117.
1908	Prohibition of polygamy	Maryland	See note 1.
1909	Direct election of Senators	Illinois	See note 1.
		Kansas	45 C.R. 7114.
		Oregon	43 C.R. 2065, 2071, 2075, 2115, 2116.
		South Dakota	43 C.R. 2667, 2670.
1909	General, including direct election of Senators.	Iowa	44 C.R. 1620; 45 C.R. 7114.
1909	Prohibition of polygamy	California	See note 1.
		Minnesota	See note 1.
		South Dakota	43 C.R. 2667, 2670.
		Washington	44 C.R. 0, 127; 46 C.R. 651.
1910	Prohibition of polygamy	Washington	46 C.R. 651.
1911	Control of trusts	Illinois	47 C.R. 1298.
1911	Direct election of Senators	Arkansas	See note 1.
		California	47 C.R. 2000.
		Maine	46 C.R. 4280, 4339.
		Minnesota	See note 1.
		Ohio	46 C.R. 2413; 47 C.R. 660, 661.
		Texas	See note 1.
1911	General	Wisconsin	47 C.R. 1842, 1860, 1873, 1875, 1948, 2000, 2188 3087.
1911	General, including direct election of Senators.	Montana	46 C.R. 2411.
1911	Prohibition of polygamy	Montana	47 C.R. 98.
		Nebraska	47 C.R. 99.
		New Hampshire	See note 1.
		Ohio	47 C.R. 85, 114, 148, 660.
		Oklahoma	See note 1.
		Tennessee	47 C.R. 187.
		Texas	See note 1.
1912	Prohibition of polygamy	Vermont	49 C.R. 1433, 2464.
1913	Constitutionality of State enactments.	Missouri	50 C.R. 1796.
1913	Prohibition of polygamy	Illinois	50 C.R. 120, 121.
		Michigan	50 C.R. 2290.
		Oregon	49 C.R. 2463.
		Pennsylvania	See note 1.
		Wisconsin	50 C.R. 42, 117.
1914	Prohibition of polygamy	Maryland	See note 1.
1915	Prohibition of polygamy	Connecticut	See note 1.
		South Carolina	53 C.R. 2442.
1916	Prohibition of polygamy	Louisiana	See note 1.

APPENDIX—Continued

STATE APPLICATIONS TO CONGRESS CALLING FOR CONVENTIONS TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS (1787–1963)—Continued

Year	Amendment to be proposed	State	Source of reference
1920	Popular ratification of amendments	Louisiana	60 C.R. 31.
1925	Repeal 18th amendment	Nevada	67 C.R. 456.
1927	Taxation of Federal and State securities.	Idaho	69 C.R. 455.
1929	General	Wisconsin	71 C.R. 2590.
1931	Repeal 18th amendment	Massachusetts	75 C.R. 45.
		New York	75 C.R. 48.
		Wisconsin	75 C.R. 57.
1932	Repeal 18th amendment	New Jersey	75 C.R. 3299.
1935	Federal regulation of wages and hours of labor.	California	79 C.R. 10814.
1935	Taxation of Federal and State securities.	California	79 C.R. 10814.
1939	Limitation of Federal taxing power.	Maryland	84 C.R. 3320.
		Wyoming	84 C.R. 1973.
1939	Townsend Plan	Oregon	84 C.R. 985.
1940	Limitation of Federal taxing power. [Rescinded same year, see note 2]	Mississippi	80 C.R. 6025.
		Rhode Island	80 C.R. 3407.
1941	Limitation of Federal taxing power. [Rescinded 1945, see note 2.]	Iowa	87 C.R. 3172.
		Maine	87 C.R. 3370.
	[Rescinded 1952; 98 C.R. 4641.]	Massachusetts	87 C.R. 3812.
		Michigan	87 C.R. 8904.
1943	Limitation of Federal taxing power. [Rescinded 1945; see note 2.]	Alabama	89 C.R. 7523.
	[Rescinded 1945; 91 C.R. 11209.]	Arkansas	98 C.R. 742.
		Delaware	89 C.R. 4017.
	[Rescinded 1945; 98 C.R. 752.]	Illinois	98 C.R. 742.
		Indiana	98 C.R. 1056.
		New Hampshire	89 C.R. 3761.
		Pennsylvania	89 C.R. 8220.
	[Rescinded 1945; see note 2.]	Wisconsin	89 C.R. 7524.
1943	Limitation of Presidential tenure	Illinois	89 C.R. 2516.
		Iowa	89 C.R. 2728.
		Michigan	89 C.R. 2944.
		Wisconsin	89 C.R. 7524.
1943	Prohibition of conditions in grants-in-aid.	Pennsylvania	89 C.R. 8220.
1943	World federal government	Florida	89 C.R. 5690.
1944	Limitation of Federal taxing power. [Rescinded 1946; 97 C.R. 11195.] [Rescinded 1954; 100 C.R. 11943.]	Kentucky	90 C.R. 4040.
		New Jersey	90 C.R. 6141.
1945	Treatymaking	Florida	91 C.R. 4955.
1945	World federal government	Florida	Florida Journal.
1947	Limitation of Presidential tenure	Montana	See note 1.
1949	Limitation of Federal taxing power. [Rescinded 1953; 99 C.R. 6163.]	Michigan	95 C.R. 5628.
		Nebraska	95 C.R. 7893.
1949	Tidelands problem	Texas	101 C.R. 2840.
1949	World federal government	California	95 C.R. 4568.
		Connecticut	95 C.R. 7689.
		Florida	97 C.R. 7000.
		Maine	95 C.R. 4348.
		New Jersey	95 C.R. 4571.
		North Carolina	95 C.R. 6587.
1950	Limitation of Federal taxing power. [Rescinded 1954; 100 C.R. 9420.]	Louisiana	99 C.R. 320.
1951	Limitation of Federal taxing power.	Florida	97 C.R. 5155.
		Iowa	97 C.R. 3939.
		Kansas	97 C.R. 2936.
	[Rescinded 1953; 99 C.R. 4311]	Maine	97 C.R. 6033.
		New Hampshire	97 C.R. 10716.
		New Mexico	98 C.R. 947.
		Utah	98 C.R. 947.
1952	Distribution of proceeds of Federal taxes on gasoline.	California	98 C.R. 4003–4004.
1952	Repeal of 16th amendment	Georgia	98 C.R. 1057.
		Virginia	98 C.R. 1496.
1952	Treatymaking	Georgia	98 C.R. 1057.
1953	Revision of Article V	Illinois	99 C.R. 9864, 10052, 10623.
		South Dakota	99 C.R. 9180, 9181.
1955	Limitation of Federal taxing power.	Oklahoma	101 C.R. 9941.
1955	Revision of Article V	South Dakota	101 C.R. 2840, 2861, 2862.
		Texas	101 C.R. 2840.
1955	State control of public education	Georgia	101 C.R. 1532, 2086, 2274.
1956	Revision of Article V	Michigan	102 C.R. 7240, 7241, 7304.
1957	Balancing the budget	Indiana	103 C.R. 6474.

APPENDIX—Continued

STATE APPLICATIONS TO CONGRESS CALLING FOR CONVENTIONS TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS (1787–1963)—Continued

Year	Amendment to be proposed	State	Source of reference
1957	Limitation of Federal taxing power	Indiana	103 C.R. 6474.
1957	Oil and mineral rights	Texas	103 C.R. 8265.
1957	Preservation of states' rights	Texas	103 C.R. 35.
1957	Reapportionment	Indiana	103 C.R. 6473.
1957	Revision of Article V	Idaho	103 C.R. 4831.
		Indiana	103 C.R. 6471.
1957	Selection of Federal judges	Alabama	103 C.R. 10863.
1957	Supreme Court decisions	Florida	103 C.R. 12787.
1957	Treadymaking	Indiana	103 C.R. 6472.
1958	State taxation power over income of nonresidents.	Connecticut	104 C.R. 8058, 8085.
1959	Constitutionality of 14th amendment.	Arkansas	105 C.R. 4398.
1959	Federal preemption	Alabama	105 C.R. 3220.
1959	Repeal 16th amendment	Wyoming	105 C.R. 3085.
1959	State control of public education	Georgia	105 C.R. 2793.
1960	Repeal 16th amendment	Louisiana	106 C.R. 14401.
		Nevada	106 C.R. 10749.
1960	State control of public education	Virginia	106 C.R. 5516.
1960	Supreme Court decisions	Louisiana	106 C.R. 12310, 14315.
1961	Repeal 16th amendment	Texas	107 C.R. 10737, 1089, 11197.
1961	Supreme Court decisions	Arkansas	107 C.R. 2154.
		Georgia	107 C.R. 4715.
1962	Repeal 16th amendment	South Carolina	108 C.R. 4653.
1963	Apportionment of State legislatures.	Arkansas	109 C.R. 2630.
		Idaho	109 C.R. 2157, 2160.
		Kansas	109 C.R. 2631.
		Missouri	109 C.R. 5524, 5527.
		Montana	109 C.R. 3659.
		Nevada	109 C.R. 9856.
		Oklahoma	109 C.R. 1534.
		South Carolina	109 C.R. 9856.
		South Dakota	109 C.R. 3840.
		Texas	109 C.R. 11202.
		Washington	109 C.R. 5527.
		Wyoming	109 C.R. 4517.
1963	Court of the Union	Alabama	109 C.R. 4946.
		Arkansas	109 C.R. 2630.
		Florida	109 C.R. 1954.
		South Carolina	109 C.R. 9856.
		Wyoming	109 C.R. 4517.
1963	Electoral College	Arkansas	109 C.R. 2630.
		Colorado	109 C.R. 6301.
		Kansas	109 C.R. 6875.
		Montana	109 C.R. 4221.
		South Dakota	109 C.R. 3787.
		Texas	109 C.R. 11202.
		Utah	109 C.R. 5601, 6082.
		Wisconsin	109 C.R. 14002.
1963	Limitation of Federal taxing power	Colorado	109 C.R. 6668.
1963	National debt limit	Idaho	109 C.R. 3787.
1963	Revision of Article V	Arkansas	109 C.R. 2630.
		Florida	109 C.R. 1954.
		Idaho	109 C.R. 3112.
		Illinois	109 C.R. 3590, 4519.
		Kansas	109 C.R. 2630, 2631.
		Missouri	109 C.R. 5524, 5527.
		Oklahoma	109 C.R. 1534.
		South Carolina	109 C.R. 9856.
		South Dakota	109 C.R. 13840.
		Texas	109 C.R. 11202.
		Wyoming	109 C.R. 4517.

Note 1: Listed in the following documents but not recorded in the Congressional Record: Federal Constitutional Convention, S. Doc. 78, 71st Congress 2d session (1930); William Russell Pullen, "The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution" (an unpublished dissertation), University of North Carolina, 1951; Staff Report of House Judiciary Committee, Problems Relating to State Application for a Convention To Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates (Committee print 1952); Staff of House Committee on the Judiciary, 87th Congress, 1st session, State Application Asking Congress To Call a Federal Constitutional Convention (Committee print 1961).

Note 2: Listed in Hearings on S. J. Res. 23 Before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 83d Congress, 2d session (1954).

[From the Chicago Bar Record, December 1968]

Con Con at the Crossroads; Convention of the Parties or of the People?*

(By Peter A. Tomei)

> ". . . a constitutional convention is the most fundamental political institution we have, and it is precisely for this reason that the people—all of the people—should play a more significant role in its procedures and deliberations than they do in any other process of government. . . . the business of constitution-making is too important (and too highly political) to be left only to politicians." (Article, page 2)

"There is an honorable place for the clash of party and interest, but the place is not here," urged the late Senator Robert F. Kennedy in his address to the opening session of the 1967 New York Constitutional Convention.[1] But his warning came too late, for the clash of party had already been ensured by the partisan selection of convention delegates, a majority of whom were members of Senator Kennedy's own party, and the clash of interest naturally and inevitably followed. The result was a disaster.

Now, in the wake of the November 5th election, in which Con Con received one of the largest pluralities ever recorded for any candidate or any issue in Illinois history,[2] the people may properly ask whether Illinois will heed the warning of Senator Kennedy and, indeed, of many of its own political leaders,[3] or whether it will follow New York down the road to constitutional folly and rejection. Among the questions which will confront the General Assembly when it meets in 1969 to implement the November 5th call to a constitutional convention, none will be so critical as that concerning the procedure for delegate selection.

Should the General Assembly reject the non-partisan approach to delegate selection, it can be safely predicted that the prospects for genuine constitutional

---

*Except where otherwise noted, data for the article is based on the following principal sources:

New York: Kaden, "The People: No! Some Observations on the 1967 New York Constitutional Convention," 5 Harvard Journal on Legislation 343 (1968); Ostwald, "How Not to Hold a State Con-Con," Wall Street Journal, Sept. 25, 1967, at 18, col. 3.

Michigan: Sturm, Constitution-Making in Michigan, 1961–62 (Ann Arbor 1963).

Maryland: Note, "State Constitutional Change: The Constitutional Convention," 54 U. Va. Rev. 995 (1968); Kerrison, "Gray Day in Maryland," The Reporter, June 13, 1968; "Maryland Says 'No'," The Economist, June 1, 1968, at 29.

Illinois: Tomei, "How Not to Hold a Constitutional Convention: A Critical Look at the 1920 Illinois Constitutional Convention," 49 Chicago Bar Record 179 (1968); "Report of the Committee on Constitutional Revision on a Constitutional Convention for Illinois," Appendix C, 48 Chicago Bar Record 56, 70 (1967); Davis, "Defects and Causes of Defeat of the Proposed Constitution of 1922," 26 Chicago Bar Record 276 (1945).

General: Adrian, "Trends in State Constitutions," 5 Harvard Journal on Legislation 311 (1968); Bebout, "State Constitutions and Constitutional Revision, 1965–1967," 17 Book of the States, 1968–1969 3 (Chicago 1968); Graves, "State Constitutions and Constitutional Revision, 1963–1965," 16 Book of the States, 1966–67 3 (Chicago 1966); Graves, "State Constitutions and Constitutional Revision, 1961–1963," 15 Book of the States, 1964–1965 3 (Chicago 1964); U.S. League of Women Voters, Inventory of Work on Constitutional Revision (D.C. 1966).

[1] New York Times, Apr. 5, 1967, at 32, col. 7.

[2] According to official records of the Secretary of State, Con Con received 2,979,977 votes in favor and 1,135,440 votes against, or a plurality of 1,844,537 votes, out of a total vote cast in the Nov. 5, 1968 general election of 4,705,852. This represents a constitutional majority of 63.3 percent and a majority of those actually voting on the proposition of 72.4 percent. The percentage of persons not voting on the constitutional proposition was the lowest in Blue Ballot history, 12.5 percent.

The figures for Cook County are 1,695,838 votes in favor and 415,293 votes against, out of a total vote of 2,376,211. Percentage-wise, this is a constitutional majority of 71.4 percent and a majority of those voting on the proposition of 80.3 percent.

The figures for Downstate are 1,284,139 votes in favor and 720,147 votes against, out of a total vote of 2,329,641. Percentage-wise, this is a constitutional majority of 55.1 percent and a majority of those voting on the proposition of 64.1 percent.

[3] Republican Governor-elect Richard B. Ogilvie announced his support for non-partisan delegate elections on Nov. 26, 1968, and a non-partisan election bill, H. B. No. 1 cosponsored by House Speaker Ralph T. Smith (R. Alton) and Representative Harold A. Katz (D. Glencoe), was prefiled on Dec. 2, 1968. In July 1968, a non-partisan delegate election bill (H. B. No. 2769), which many thought was premature, received a favorable but insufficient vote, crossing party lines, of 72 to 64. Journal of the House of Representatives, 75th General Assembly, July 22, 1968, at 16–17. Non-partisan delegate elections were endorsed by the Chicago Tribune on Nov. 13, 1968, and by the State AFL–CIO on Nov. 14, 1968.

improvement and for voter approval of any proposed changes will be minimal, and that the value of Con Con as a meaningful political experience for all the people of this state will be doubtful.

I do not for one moment question the value of political parties in our system of government, and, indeed, I have worked actively for the candidates of my own party for regular political office at all levels. Nor do I in any sense mean to suggest that a constitutional convention is a non-political proceeding. On the contrary, a constitutional convention is the most fundamental political institution we have, and it is precisely for this reason that the people—all of the people—should play a more significant role in its procedures and deliberations than they do in any other process of government. To paraphrase an old saying, the business of constitution-making is too important (and too highly political) to be left only to politicians.

A constitutional convention is the institution through which the people exercise the ultimate power of government—the power to renew and repair the basic structure and machinery of the government under which they live. By contrast, since their inception, political parties have historically represented "a divergence of thought in government policy," [4] and have contended for the pre-eminence of their conflicting ideas of governmental policy within the arena established by the structure and machinery of government, to which the parties, whatever their policy difference, all bear common allegiance. The purpose and function of a constitutional convention transcends, therefore, the normal concerns of partisan policies.

THE LEGISLATIVE OPTIONS

The Constitution provides that "the General Assembly shall [now] provide for a convention, to consist of double the number of members of the Senate, to be elected in the same manner, at the same places, and in the same districts." [5] While there seems to be little question in people's minds that this mandate requires the election of two delegates from each of the 58 senate districts, as currently apportioned on a "one man-one vote" basis,[6] there have been some doubts expressed, particularly in legislative quarters, as to whether the phrase "in the same manner" might require not only elections but also nominations for delegates to be made in the same manner as for state senators, i.e., through party primaries.

In part, this hesitancy may be attributable to an understandable reluctance to part with old and familiar ways. Moreover, in the case of some legislators, there may be an equally understandable reluctance to encourage political competition in their own legislative districts. However, while constitutional conventions have traditionally been breeding grounds for new political leadership, the Michigan Convention experience of 1961–62 strongly suggests that there is a greater tendency to encourage political ambitions when convention delegates are selected on a partisan, as opposed to a non-partisan, basis.[7]

With respect to the legal question, a recent study has concluded that the General Assembly does indeed have the power to adopt legislation for the non-partisan selection of convention delegates, specifically insofar as such legislation eliminates party primary nominations and provides for delegate elections without party designations.[8] The principal findings of the study may be summarized as follows:

1. The Illinois Constitution itself requires only that convention delegates be directly elected by the people, that is, by qualified electors voting at free elections by means of secret ballot.

2. The party primary nominating process, unknown at the time the present Constitution was adopted, is not a demonstrable constitutional prerequisite to the elections required by the Constitution.

3. The general laws pertaining to the election of state senators cannot in any event be literally applied to the election of convention delegates, because these

---

[4] People ex rel. Lindstrand v. Emmerson, 333 Ill. 606, 614 (1929).

[5] Ill. Const. art. XIV, § 1.

[6] As senate districts are currently apportioned, the City of Chicago will have 42 delegates, Suburban Cook County 18 Delegates, and the Downstate Counties 56 delegates. People ex rel. Engle v. Kerner, 32 Ill. 212, opinion supplemented, 33 Ill. 2d 11 (1965), appeal dismissed, 384 U.S. 30 (1966).

[7] See Sturm, Constitution-Making in Michigan, 1961–1962 (Ann Arbor 1963), supra, at 114–17.

[8] Report of the Chica o Bar Association Committee on Court Revision on the Manner of Electing Delegates to a Constitutional Convention (April 17, 1968).

laws are wholly silent on the mechanics of electing two persons from the same district.

4. An unpublished and apparently contrary opinion by the Illinois Attorney General in 1919 appears to have been influenced both by its particular historical setting and by a series of Supreme Court cases which were subsequently overruled.[9]

5. In the only judicial decision dealing squarely with the issue, under a constitutional provision virtually identical to the one in Illinois, the Supreme Court of a sister state has held that delegates to a constitutional convention can be elected on a non-partisan basis, without party primaries or party designations, and with modified nominating petition requirements, pursuant to legislation which in these important respects differs from the general laws in effect for the nomination and election of state legislators.[10]

Any question as to the foregoing conclusion can be judicially determined at an early date, once legislation has been adopted by the General Assembly. The immediate problem, then, is to get some legislation on the books. This requires that the General Assembly select from among the options which are apparently available, the one which, in its judgment, seems wisest and best.

While several variants have been employed in the past for the election of delegates to state constitutional conventions, they all can be viewed most simply in terms of the three basic alternatives which they present:

1. Partisan selection, including party primaries, as used for the conventions held in New York in 1967, Michigan in 1961–62, and Illinois in 1920–22.[11]

2. Bi-partisan selection, in which each of the two major political parties is assured of an equal number of delegates, as used for the conventions held in New Jersey in 1966 and 1947, Connecticut in 1965, and Missouri in 1943.[12]

3. Non-partisan selection, in which candidates run without party designation, as used for the conventions held in Maryland in 1967-68, Alaska in 1955-56, and Hawaii in 1950.[13]

The histories of conventions in states which have adopted the partisan approach to delegate selection give strong evidence that this method, more than any other, presents the greatest obstacles to constitutional reform.

PARTISAN CONVENTIONS AND THE PROSPECTS FOR GENUINE CONSTITUTIONAL IMPROVEMENT

Elimination of "legislative detail" and concentration on "basic principles" or "fundamental law" are generally conceded to be desirable constitutional objectives. Yet, the experience of partisan conventions, i.e., those in which one political party or the other has gained control through the partisan selection of delegates, is that the partisan atmosphere encourages rather than discourages the incorporation of a vast amount of ordinary legislation into what should be the state's basic charter. This is amply demonstrated by the documents framed by the partisan conventions of New York, Michigan and Illinois.

Measured simply in terms of length, the rejected Illinois Constitution of 1922 contained one-third again as many separate sections as did the then-existing 21,000-word 1870 Constitution (233 sections as opposed to 186 sections in the 1870 document). The Michigan Constitution which was adopted in 1963 contains over 23,000 words, or 1,000 words more than its predecessor, while

---

[9] People ex rel. Lindstrand v. Emmerson, supra, note 4.

[10] Baker v. Moorhead, 174 N. W. 430 (Nebr. 1919).

[11] Partisan elections without primaries were held for the convention held in Rhode Island in 1964–67, Tennessee in 1965, and New Hampshire in 1964. Candidates receiving the highest number of votes in their districts were apparently declared the winners, with no run-off elections being held.

[12] The bi-partisan assurance was the result of a constitutional provision in Missouri, statutory enactments in Connecticut and New Jersey in 1966, and the parties' agreement in New Jersey in 1947. The enabling legislation for the Pennsylvania Convention of 1967–68 guaranteed minority representation by limiting each party to two nominees per three-member district. There do not appear to have been party primaries for any of the foregoing five conventions. Candidates receiving the highest number of votes in their districts were apparently declared the winners, with no run-off elections being held.

[13] In Maryland, candidates got on the ballot simply by paying a filing fee and filing an affidavit of candidacy. In Alaska and Hawaii, nominating petitions as well as filing fees were required. Only in Hawaii were there provisions for run-off elections to ensure that delegates be elected by majority vote. In Maryland and Alaska, candidates receiving simply the greatest number of votes in their districts were declared elected. Other non-partisan conventions held in the current century include those in Rhode Island in 1944, 1951, 1955, and 1958, Nebraska in 1919–20, Massachusetts in 1917–19, and Ohio in 1912.

the rejected New York Constitution of 1967 was still half as long as the 47,000-word constitution it was designed to replace. By contrast, the Constitution proposed by the 1967–68 Maryland Convention, which was widely hailed as one of the most advanced state constitutions ever written, would have reduced the existing Constitution from 35,000 to 14,000 words. By way of further contrast, the Federal Constitution, which has endured since 1787, is only some 6,000 words in length.

Substantively, the significance of incorporating legislative detail into state constitutions can perhaps be illustrated best by the very factors which give rise to the phenomenon. The first is that which occurs when a party, which is in a minority in terms of its ability to control state government, elects a majority of the convention delegates, as happened in both the Michigan and New York Conventions.[14] In both instances, the new convention majorities demonstrated an almost irresistible urge to enact their favorite legislative programs, long frustrated in the state legislature, into the state's "basic" and not easily amendable law.

The second factor arises from the political parties' particular sensitivity, and therefore susceptibility, to the pressures of special interest groups. While clearly a constitutional convention should be a forum in which all interests are adequately represented—political, social, economic and geographic—the purpose for this representation is not to afford a beachhead for the enactment of special legislative programs, but rather to provide an opportunity for everyone to take part in structuring the government which ultimately must respond in some fashion to the competing demands of all such interests. Party delegates, who more than nonparty delegates must act in accordance with the wishes of their party leaders and of the special interest groups on whose favor their party depends, are necessarily more responsive to special interest pressures for constitutional codification of what is normally thought to be more appropriate for ordinary legislation. As one commentator has observed of Michigan's new Constitution: "Responsibility for the statutory content belongs both to party delegations and to interparty special interest blocs and alliances." [15]

A final factor which works in favor of incorporation of legislative detail into constitutional charters stems from the public confusion between constitution-making and governmental policy which almost inevitably results when constitutional conventions are under party control. For just one example, few political leaders would take serious issue, at least privately, with the notion that a modern Revenue Article should be sufficiently flexible to permit the state legislature, subject to appropriate constitutional limitations and guidelines, to adopt some form of income taxation if the need for such taxation is proven and an equitable formula for its application is feasible. However, the actual levy of an income tax, whatever its form, necessarily presupposes the resolution of a host of interrelated and highly complex factual considerations and predictions (what rates will produce what returns? what other taxes can be safely reduced or eliminated? what allocations should be made to replace local sources of revenue that have been eliminated? and so forth), all of which will vary as the factual circumstances change, and all of which are problems within the peculiar competence of a state legislature, not a constitutional convention.

Yet, if a partisan convention were to propose a flexible or even a moderately flexible Revenue Article, however, sensible from a constitutional standpoint and however far removed in fact from an actual income tax levy, there would almost inevitably be embarrassing charges that the proposing party or parties had already adopted the income tax as part of its or their immediate legislative policy—which may not at all be true, and which may indeed run counter to prior party commitments. Faced with such charges, a partisan convention may well retreat to the expedient of adopting a highly restrictive and inflexible Revenue Article, locking the state for the indefinite future into a revenue system that might be as inequitable and wasteful as is the present one. What some day might be defended as a sensible and politically feasible governmental policy, may be prohibited by what is then viewed as an "outmoded and antiquated" constitutional provision which the political leaders, to their regret, were forced to adopt in the political passions of the hour.

[14] In both Michigan and New York the legislature was divided between a Republican Senate and a Democratic House. In New York, which had a Republican governor, the Democrats and Liberals achieved a 101 to 84 majority over the Republicans for the 1967 Convention. In Michigan, which had a Democratic governor, the Republicans achieved a landslide 99 to 45 majority for the 1961–62 Convention, the Democrats losing 21 delegate seats in districts where they had members in the state legislature.

[15] Sturm, supra, at 281, note 7.

In sum, partisan conventions, with their penchant for enlarging legislative policy into constitutional sanctity, would seem to offer only minimal prospects for genuine constitutional improvement and, in the long run, would seem to offer fewer advantages than disadvantages to the very parties to whom they may, at first blush, be so attractive.

PARTISAN CONVENTIONS AND THE PROSPECTS FOR VOTER APPROVAL

The foregoing discussion logically suggests the other major defect of partisan conventions. If one party has gained control of a convention and stamped its political or legislative preferences on the convention's product, the "losing" party and its supporters can hardly be expected to support what previously has been viewed as anathema. In a strong two-party state such as Illinois, this is likely to be the coup de grace for any constitutional change.

The proposed Illinois Constitution of 1922, which was adopted by a convention in which Republicans held a nearly six to one majority, and which contained apportionment provisions highly favorable to Downstate Republican interests, was condemned by the Cook County Democratic organization and other leading Democrats, and never had a chance. In Cook County alone, which turned out more voters than the rest of the state combined, the new Constitution was rejected by a vote of nearly 20 to one. Statewide, the Constitution was turned down by a vote of over four to one.[16]

The proposed New York Constitution of 1967 did not fare much better. Opposition cutting across party lines centered principally on the proposed repeal of the so-called Blaine Amendment, which prohibits state aid to parochial schools, but it was the Democrats who defeated a proposal for a separate ratification vote on this controversial proposal. Democratic leaders generally supported the work of their Convention, which included such favorite Democratic legislative programs as state assumption of public welfare obligations, while Republican leaders led by Mayor Lindsay of New York, and with the notable exception of Governor Rockefeller who gave nominal support to the new Constitution, were strongly opposed. At the election on November 7, 1968 the proposed Constitution was rejected by a vote of nearly three to one.[17]

The Michigan experience is hardly reassuring. The new Constitution, which had been adopted on virtually straight party-line votes by the 1961–62 Convention, at which Republicans held a two to one majority, was strenuously opposed by the Democratic Party led by former Governor Swainson, by the State AFL–CIO, the NAACP and the other Democratic-leaning groups. It survived by a razor-thin majority of 50.2 percent of the 1.6 million persons who voted at the April 1, 1963 election. That it passed at all is generally attributed to the fortuitous election to the governorship, in the interval between the Convention's adjournment and the April referendum, of the Convention's popular Republican vice-president, George Romney.[18]

Given the equally divided partisan loyalties of the present Illinois electorate,[19] and the presences of a persistent voting block generally thought to be between 10 percent and 20 percent which will automatically vote "no" on any constitutional proposition—good, bad or indifferent—it seems eminently clear that the prospects for voter approval of any constitutional changes emanating from the coming convention will be grim indeed, if those changes are the product of a convention dominated by either party. Years of effort devoted to constitutional reform by numerous organizations and individuals will have been almost totally wasted.

One other factor, more intangible in nature, is worthy of mention. Despite a great deal of early talk about constitutions being essentially bi-partisan or non-[16] The vote State-wide was 185,298 in favor and 921,398 against the new Illinois Constitution at the Dec. 12, 1922 election.

---

[17] As reported in the New York Times, the final vote was 1,309,197 in favor and 3,364,630 against the 1967 New York Constitution. Nov. 8, 1967, at 1, col. 8.

[18] Sturm, supra, at 285 note 7. After an official recount the final vote stood at 810,860 in favor and 803,436 against the new Michigan Constitution. Graves, 15 Book of the States, 1964–1965, supra, at 5.

[19] Based on the latest unofficial tallies for the November 5th election, it appears that Illinois voters have given Republican Governor-elect Richard B. Ogilvie a majority of 51.3 percent and Democratic Lieutenant Governor-elect Paul Simon a majority of 51.2 percent. See Chicago Sun-Times, Nov. 16, 1968, at 16, and Nov. 27, 1968, at 5.

partisan in nature, all three of the foregoing conventions soon gave way to intermediate partisan bickering and endless debates, decisions which were made at secret party caucuses rather than in public debate, and voting by individual delegates that appeared to be motivated more by political ambition and self-interest than by considerations of public interest.

The referenda votes in New York, Michigan and Illinois suggest that ultimately the success of any constitutional convention depends not only on the wisdom of the proposals it has made, but also, just as importantly, on public confidence in the manner in which the convention has addressed the problems with which it was faced. A substantial segment of the population, regardless of normal party preference, if it senses that partisanship has overtaken statesmanship in the serious business of drafting constitutional provisions for the structure and machinery of state government.[20]

THE BI-PARTISAN ALTERNATIVE AND THE ROLE OF THE PEOPLE

Measured purely in terms of success at the polls, recent bi-partisan conventions have fared considerably better than partisan conventions held during the same period. The proposals of all four bi-partisan conventions noted above were in fact approved by the voters, although, significantly, the two most recent ones were limited to questions of reapportionment wherein the conventions were obliged to follow the Supreme Court's "one man—one vote" mandate, while the 1947 New Jersey Convention specifically excluded consideration of the controversial issue of reapportionment.[21] While the potential for partisan bickering, decisions made in secret at party caucuses, and voting motivated by political ambition and self-interest would not seem to be greatly lessened simply because a convention is bipartisan rather than partisan, on the basis of the record to date, it may be concluded that the bi-partisan approach to delegate selection, often coupled with convention rules which require substantially more than a simple majority before proposals can be submitted to the voters,[22] offers substantially brighter prospects for voter approval of constitutional changes than does the wholly partisan approach.

In terms of resistance to special interest pressures and elimination of "legislative detail," the evidence offered by bipartisan conventions is mixed. The 1947 New Jersey Constitution is relatively brief, with approximately 16,000 words, while the 1943 Missouri Constitution is inordinately long, with 40,000 words. In assessing the prospects for genuine constitutional improvement, however, mere use of an arithmetical yardstick of the number of words employed may not be very helpful.

Because parties tend of necessity to think in short-run terms—the next election, the coming legislative battle, the capture of public support—they can reasonably be expected, when operating in enforced bi-partisan conditions, to avoid to the greatest degree possible anything which smacks of controversy and, instead, to adopt an extremely conservative approach to the process of constitutional reform. This attitude has perhaps been best expressed by some present Illinois legislators who have already indicated that in their view the primary purpose of the forthcoming convention is simply to rewrite the Amendments Article so that, hereafter, legislatively-initiated constitutional amendments can more easily be ratified by the voters. In essence, the coming constitutional convention is viewed simply as an extra session of the General Assembly.

When one weighs this attitude against the widely held belief that our 100-year-old Constitution is generally obsolete, against the indisputable mandate for change evidenced by the overwhelming vote for Con Con on November 5th, and against the over-all legislative record on constitutional reform for the past [20] In addition to the three partisan conventions discussed in the text, the proposals of the 1964–67 Rhode Island and 1965 Tennessee Conventions were rejected by the voters of those states, and the proposals of the 1964 New Hampshire Convention were approved only in part.

---

[21] The Pennsylvania Convention of 1967–68 was also limited to consideration of only four constitutional articles. Its proposals, which were greatly influenced by the work of a statewide citizens organization and the state bar association, were approved by the voters in the April 1968 primaries.

[22] Under the Illinois Constitution, it does not appear that the General Assembly has any authority to bind the convention to a particular set of convention rules. On the contrary, it appears that the convention has inherent authority to adopt its own rules of procedure, and that it can authorize submission of proposals to the voters by a simple two-thirds or any other majority it deems advisable.

several years,[23] one may reasonably ask whether the bi-partisan approach to Con Con offers any real prospect for substantial constitutional change, let alone substantial improvement, even if the voters were to approve such changes as might be proposed.

Perhaps the most serious defect in the bi-partisan approach to delegate selection, however, lies in the fact that participation in the constitutional convention, which properly speaking should be representative of the broadest spectrum of political interests, would necessarily be restricted to the relatively new individuals who are closely linked with the formal organizations of the two major political parties. The plain fact is that the largest "party" in the State of Illinois is neither the Democratic nor the Republican Party, but the great mass of independent voters who on election day generally, but not always, cast their ballots for candidates who have been put forward by one or the other of the two more organized political parties.

One need only compare the number of voters who registered and voted in two party primaries held on June 11, 1968, with the number of voters who voted in the general election held on November 5, 1968. There were nearly three times as many voters who voted in the general election as voted in the party primaries, or, stated another way, there are nearly twice as many voters who do not care to state a party preference as there are who do—for both parties combined![24] If the minimum requirement for party endorsement as a convention delegate in an election guaranteeing bi-partisan representation were simply that the candidate had voted in the party's primary, the people's range of selection for delegates (except for those few additional independents who conceivably might get their names on the ballot) would, as a practical matter, be reduced by at least two-thirds of the theoretically available choices.

Even as a party adherent, I cannot subscribe to that theory of "limited leadership" which says that only members of the Democratic or Republican Parties are capable of providing leadership for a consitutional convention. The evidence offered by the non-partisan Maryland Convention is, in fact, the other way. If delegate selection for the coming convention is conducted on either a partisan or bi-partisan basis, it is likely that many outstanding citizens, who are not closely linked with either of the two major political parties, will be discouraged from running at all. Among them may be some who have worked so long and hard to bring this convention about.

It is undeniable that strong endorsements of Con Con by the two principal gubernatorial candidates, by the Democratic and Republican party chairmen of Cook County, and by other state and local party leaders and candidates played a substantial role in passage of the November 5th referendum. But it is also undeniable that Con Con would have never received the overwhelming vote it did without the year-long efforts of the Illinois Committee for Constitutional Convention, which was supported by 70 leading business, professional, labor, agricultural, educational and civic organizations throughout the state and by over 25 local citizens committees both Downstate and in Cook County,[25] and without the splendid media coverage and editorial support which Con Con received from newspapers, radio and television. Civic-minded people contributed their time, their money and their organizational effort—right down to the precinct level—to bring the dramatic opportunities afforded by a constitutional convention before all the people of this state.

---

[23] Flamm, "The Adverse Prospect—The Case Against Con Con," 49 Chicago Bar Record 326 (1968).

[24] According to official records of the Secretary of State, there were 833,498 Democrats and 739,675 Republicans registered for the June 11, 1968 primaries, or a total of 1,573,173 persons who declared their party affiliation with one or the other of the two major political parties. By contrast, there were 2,307,295 votes cast for the Republican gubernatorial candidate, 2,179,501 for the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, and 19,175 for the Socialist-Labor candidate. Or a total of 4,505,971 votes for the highest state office in the Nov. 5, 1968 general election.

[25] In Cook County, local citizens committees were active in New Trier Township, Evanston Township, Chicago's North Side, the Third Senatorial District Western Suburbs, Palos-Orland-Worth Townships, and South Suburban Cook County. Downstate, in addition to local citizens committees in Lake and DuPage Counties, there were county-wide committees in the following counties: McHenry, Kane, Will, DeKalb, Winnebago, Stephenson, Whiteside, Rock Island, Knox, Warren, McDonough, Peoria, McLean, Champaign, Madison, and St. Clair. Con Con received substantial majorities in all of the foregoing counties except the last three, and in Adams County it barely lost with 49.9 percent of the total vote cast.

In addition to the foregoing, a Student Committee for a State Constitutional Convention, comprised of college students, functioned widely and effectively in the Chicago area.

In sum, the overwhelming "grass roots" response which Con Con received on November 5th both cut across and went far beyond the normal partisan divisions which exist in this state. The General Assembly must now ask itself whether a bi-partisan convention, limited to delegates representing only two of the major political forces in this State, and likely to respond in only a limited fashion to currents of change which have overtaken our state in the last 100 years, will provide an adequate response to people's mandate of November 5th.

"NON-PARTISAN" POLITICS—SOMETHING NEW FOR ILLINOIS

Non-partisan constitutional conventions are not a new phenomenon. At least three were held during the reform era of the second decade of the present century: Nebraska in 1919–20, Massachusetts in 1917–19, and Ohio in 1912. All three proposed substantial constitutional changes which the voters approved. More recently, the non-partisan conventions of Rhode Island in 1944, 1951, 1955 and 1958, and of Alaska and Hawaii, have met with similar success, although the experience of the latter two is somewhat atypical because of the absence in those states of long-established political systems and traditions comparable to those in other states in the 20th century. Against this record of success at the polls, however, stands the glaring exception of the Maryland Convention of 1967–68.

It is generally conceded that the Maryland delegates, who were elected in a single non-partisan election, were both able and conscientious. The parties undoubtedly had their preferences, but elimination of party labels from the ballot had the predictable effect of encouraging voter selection on the basis of merit, rather than simple party affiliation. While for the most part the delegates were known as civic and professional leaders, nearly half of them had prior experience in public office. Interestingly, none of those who emerged as natural leaders during the Convention was actively engaged in party politics.

Although the opinion is frequently expressed that "party responsibility" is a valuable, if not indispensable, pre-requisite to efficient decision-making, the Maryland Convention operated as or more efficiently than the partisan and bi-partisan conventions held recently in other states. The Maryland delegates were generally resistant to the external pressures of special interest groups, but in the end, the reform document which they produced was supported by the leadership of both major political parties, by business and organized labor, and by the civic leadership of the state.

In view of this support of the massed leadership of the state, the results of the referendum on the proposed new Constitution held on May 14, 1968 were as surprising as they are instructive. Contrary to expectations that the Constitution would win approval without trouble, it was rejected by 56 percent of the 650,000 people who turned out to vote, nearly half of the state's 1.4 million registered voters.

Post-election analysis attributes two of the causes of defeat to the Convention's decision to submit its entire work to the people in a single package, and to the failure of the Constitution's proponents to mount the kind of intensive," grass roots" campaign that is always vital to the success of any constitutional referendum. The Constitution's most vocal opponents consisted mainly of two loosely organized, but nonetheless effective alliances: county officials in rural areas whose positions, secure under the 1867 Constitution, were not mentioned in the new one; and a group of Baltimore surburbanites who feared the potential development of some form of metropolitan government which, they thought, would necessarily result in higher taxes and possibly racial integration of their schools. The Maryland Convention's proposals would undoubtedly have fared better if these two opposition groups been divided by means of separate submissions and if there had been a better organized campaign for voter approval after the Convention's adjournment.

A third factor in the defeat was that both the Maryland Convention and the referendum on its proposals were held at a time of grave social unrest and civil disorder.[20] The Convention, while including the best of the state's civic leadership, did not enlist the direct participation of those people, black or white, who were most directly affected by this social crisis. A document labeled as reform, produced by those standing largely outside the swirl of social crisis, could only have increased the wariness of an already uneasy electorate.

[20] Illinois experienced a similar period of unrest during its Convention of 1862, held during the Civil War. The proposals of this Convention were also rejected by the voters. See "Report of the Committee on Constitutional Revision," Appendix C, supra, at 70–71.

On the whole, the Maryland experience is both encouraging and instructive. First, it demonstrates the workability of the non-partisan selection process for convention delegates. The Maryland Convention cannot be faulted in terms of either the quality of the delegates who were elected, or of the document which they produced under the full scrutiny of the news media and the public. In short, minimization of partisan and special interest pressures at a constitutional convention pays off in constitution-making as opposed to legislating. Second, the first two factors contributing to defeat of the Maryland Constitution are clearly correctable, the one by separate submissions of the more controversial proposals, and the other by an intensive post-convention campaign to increase voter understanding.

The third factor contributing to defeat of the Maryland Constitution, social crisis, is a fact of contemporary society which we cannot escape. A constitutional convention cannot itself solve all the social ills of our times. But the Maryland experience suggests, at a minimum, that if a new charter for government is to meet the people's approval, the convention which frames it should properly include the representatives of all the people whose approval is being sought.

In the end, constitution-making is not simply an exercise in legal draftsmanship. Nor can it be viewed solely in terms of the classical approach of bringing greater efficiency and economy to the operation of state government. Ultimately, the process of renewal and repair of the basic structure and machinery of government is aimed at nothing less than increasing the ability of government to respond more adequately to the tough, expensive and terribly human problems of our society. In this process, where people must strive to find common ground, there is no room for the narrower "clash of party and interest."

Con Con, then, offers both a tremendous challenge and an exciting opportunity to the people of this state. By opening the delegate selection process to all the people, and allowing full expression to be given to all the contending forces of our society, we may do much to end the mutual hostility, suspicion and divisiveness which we, as a people, cannot long endure. With patience, understanding, intelligence, and human decency toward one another, we the people of Illinois, acting within the framework of the law, can and will establish a new tone, and chart new directions, for the government under which we live.

(From the Chicago Bar Record, December, 1968)

Can Public Officials Be Delegates to the Constitutional Convention?

By WILBUR S. LEGG

WITH the approval on November 5, 1968, of a constitutional convention for Illinois, attention has turned to the composition of the convention. One of the questions now presented is whether any public official, and particularly a member of the General Assembly, can have seat in the convention.[1]

Article XIV, Section 1 of the Illinois Constitution provides that the qualification of delegates to a constitutional convention "shall be the same as that of members of the Senate."[2] In addition to requirements of citizenship, age and residence,[3] and certain disqualifications,[4] Article IV of the Constitution provides as follows in Section 3:

> "No judge or clerk of any court, Secretary of State, Attorney General, State's Attorney, recorder, sheriff, or collector of public revenue, member of either House of Congress, or person holding any lucrative office under the United States or this State, or any foreign government, shall have a seat in the General Assembly; Provided, that appointments in the militia, and the offices of notary public and justice of the peace, shall not be considered lucrative. Nor shall any person holding any office of honor or profit under any foreign government, or under the government of the United States, (except postmasters whose annual compensation does not exceed the sum of three hundred dollars) hold any office of honor or profit under the authority of this State."

This article is derived from a subcommittee report prepared for the CBA Committee on Constitutional Revision by the author with Robert Roos, Jr., William Singer, Chester Kamin and Peter Tomei, who contributed to the work underlying its preparation; Arnold Flamm has contributed valuable criticism.

CONCLUSIONS

The conclusions of this article are that:

1. A senator-elect to the Illinois General Assembly cannot hold any lucrative office in the Illinois, United States or any foreign government when he takes his seat in the Senate;

2. This lack of any lucrative office is a qualification of his right to take his seat in the Senate;

3. Article XIV, Section 1 requires a delegate to have the same qualifications as a senator;

4. A qualification of a delegate's right to take his seat in the convention is that he hold no lucrative office in the Illinois, United States or any foreign government at the time he takes his seat;

5. A seat in either the House or the Senate of the Illinois General Assembly is a lucrative office, as is any compensated office in the Illinois, United States or any foreign government;

6. A delegate-elect cannot hold a seat in the House or the Senate of the Illinois General Assembly or any other compensated office in the Illinois, United States, or any foreign government, when he takes his seat as a convention delegate;

7. The common law rule is that an office holder's acceptance of a second office incompatible with his first office automatically vacates his first office unless holding the first office specifically makes the holder ineligible for election or appointment to the second office;

8. A member of the Illinois House or Senate, or a holder of any compensated office in the Illinois, United States or any foreign government, who takes a seat in the Illinois Constitutional Convention thereby ipso facto vacates his seat in the House or Senate or his other office;

9. If a legal dispute arises, a circuit court has jurisdiction in mandamus action to determine that a vacancy exists in the General Assembly, and to order certification of the vacancy by the proper officer to the Governor to be filled in accordance with Article IV, Section 2 of the Illinois Constitution of 1870;

10. If a seat on the Illinois Constitutional Convention were itself an office, Article V, Section 5 of the Constitution of 1870 would make the governor, lieutenant governor, auditor, secretary of state, superintendent of public instruction and attorney general ineligible to take a delegate's seat at any time during the term of their office even if they resigned prior to the end of that term. The available authority is in conflict on whether a seat in the convention is a state office.[5] Since it is unlikely that these state officers would wish to vacate their offices to take seats as delegates, this question is not discussed at any length in this paper.

From the foregoing it can be seen that these conclusions are based, not on the general common law prohibition against one person's holding two offices simultaneously, but rather on the qualifications of a senator under Article IV, Sections 3 and 4, which Article XIV, Section 1 makes also the qualifications of a delegate.

Qualifications of a Senator and Delegate

Article XIV, Section 1 requires delegates to have the qualifications of a state senator. The qualifications of a senator are found in Article IV, under three sections (§§ 3, 4, 5) grouped together under the heading "Eligibility And Oath." Section 3 enumerates a number of characteristics which determine whether a state senator or state representative may have a seat in the General Assembly.[6] Section 4 lists certain characteristics which bar a person from having a seat in the General Assembly.[7] Among the characteristics required in Section 3 are age, residence and citizenship requirements followed by the language quoted above to the effect that any person holding lucrative office in the government of Illinois, the United States or any foreign country shall not have a seat in the General Assembly. This grouping of required characteristics evolved quite deliberately in the Convention of 1869-70, and it appears evident from the grouping that all the required senatorial characteristics were "qualifications" of senators which were incorporated into Article XIV, Section 1 as the qualifications of delegates.

The Constitution of 1848 contained no qualifications for delegates. The legislature, however, required in the enabling act for the Convention of 1869-1870 that the delegates take an oath to qualify as members of the Convention. The legislature's authority to require such an oath was questioned in the Convention on the ground that the legislature could not require what the Constitution of 1848 had not required, and the Convention was embroiled for nearly four days at the opening of its session on this point.[8] Thereafter the sense of the Convention appeared to be to specify in the new constitution both qualifications and an oath for members.

Mr. Sedgwick early proposed as a resolution for the consideration of the Committee on the Legislative Department that "no judge of any court of law or equity, Secretary of State, Attorney General, county attorney, recorder, clerk of any court of record, sheriff or collector of the public revenue, member of either House of Congress, or person holding any lucrative office under the United States or this State, or any foreign government, shall have a seat in the General Assembly, or in any Convention called for the purpose of revising, altering or amending the Constitution of the State; Provided . . ."[9] (Underlining added.) Except for the underlined portion, this language was copied, with minor changes not pertinent here, from Article III, Section 29 of the Constitution of 1848. The underlined portion extended its application to delegates to a convention.

Thereafter, the Committee on Amendments submitted a majority report and two minority reports regarding the Amendments Article to the Constitution.[10] The majority report and the Haines-Springer minority report each provided for delegates in the same number and having the same qualifications as members of the House of Representatives. The Archer-Brown minority report deliberately adhered to the policy of the Constitution of 1848 by omitting any qualification for delegates. The Haines-Springer minority report was adopted by the Convention.[11] Later, because it was felt that the number of representatives would be so large as to make unwieldy a convention of similar number, the number of delegates was changed to twice the number of senators, and the qualifications to those of senators.[12]

Finally the Committee on Revisions and Adjustments incorporated into Article IV, Section 3 the prohibition of Article III, Section 29 of the Constitution of 1848, as well as the citizenship, residence and age requirements.[13] A further section providing that certain convictions or failure to account for or pay over public moneys made a person ineligible to the General Assembly, was inserted as Section 4 immediately following. Section 5 prescribing the oath of office for members of the General Assembly followed. The three sections were grouped together under the heading "Eligibility and Oath." Thus the characteristics required of a senator were accumulated in two consecutive sections for easy reference, and they were made "qualifications" for the office in the sense of conditions precedent to holding office. The prohibition of Article III, Section 29 of the Constitution of 1848 was thereby extended to delegates by the "qualification" language already included by the convention in the Amendments Article.[14]

Specific Prohibitions and Exceptions Applicable to Convention Delegates

Article IV, Section 3 lists judges, clerks of any court, the secretary of state, the attorney general, state's attorneys, recorder, sheriffs, collectors of public revenue, and members of either House of Congress as being specifically excluded from simultaneously holding a seat in the General Assembly. One case and a number of opinions of the Attorney General from time to time have ruled that a member of the General Assembly could not simultaneously hold his seat in the General Assembly and the offices of municipal court clerk, member of a county board of supervisors, and mayor.[15] It follows that a delegate to the convention could not at the same time hold any of these offices while he is a delegate.

In the last sentence of Article IV, Section 3, simultaneous holding of offices of "honor or profit" under a foreign or the United States government and under the Illinois government is prohibited. An office of "profit" would appear to be the same as a "lucrative" office within the meaning of the preceding sentence, since it has been held that a "lucrative" office is one "to which there is attached a compensation for services rendered."[16] It thus would appear that a number of cases and opinions holding offices of profit to be incompatible under the last sentence should also be applied to determine that these offices are "lucrative" offices incompatible with being a delegate to the convention. Such offices have included the offices of mayor, village trustee, town collector, town clerk, postmaster, assistant postmaster, city attorney, police magistrate, and commissioned officer in the U. S. Army.[17]

The Illinois Supreme Court has recently held that certain "relatively minor ministerial positions" could be held simultaneously by members of the General Assembly, because these positions were not of the kind enumerated in Article IV, Section 3 prior to its reference to "lucrative office," but rather were either honorary or more in the nature of an "employment" than an "office." People v. Capuzi, 20 Ill. 2d 486 (1960). At issue in the Capuzi case were the posts of president of a village whose affairs were managed by a village manager, deputy county coroner, deputy clerk and deputy bailiff of a municipal court.[18] Similarly, appointments in the militia (as distinguished from the U. S. Army) are specifically excepted from the prohibition, 1928 Rep. Atty-Gen. 98; 1916 Rep. Atty-Gen. 285, and a member of a party's state central committee is not barred because the state central committee is a party, as distinguished from a public, office, 1916 Rep. Atty-Gen. 933. Notaries public and justices of peace are specifically exempted from the prohibition by Article IV, Section 3. Thus a delegate could hold any of these or similar positions while sitting as a delegate.

Incompatibility of Seats in the General Assembly and the Convention

Since a holder of "any lucrative office" may not have a seat as a senator, and hence under Article XIV, Section 1 may not have a seat as a delegate to a convention, the controlling question here is whether a member of the General Assembly holds "lucrative office."

The definition of "lucrative office" should begin with the definition of "office" in Article V, Section 24 of the Constitution, since the Constitution does not distinguish usage of the word in its various articles.[19] This Section distinguishes "office" from "employment" as follows:

> "An office is a public position created by the constitution or law, continuing during the pleasure of the appointing power, or for a fixed time, with a successor elected or appointed. An employment is an agency, for a temporary purpose, which ceases when that purpose is accomplished."

The following section, Article V, Section 25, prescribes an oath of office for "All civil officers, except members of the General Assembly and such inferior officers as may be by law exempted . . ." A different oath for members of the General Assembly was prescribed in Article IV, Section 5. The specific exception of members of the General Assembly in Article V, Section 25 would have been unnecessary if the drafters had not regarded members of the General Assembly as "civil officers."

That they did regard members of the General Assembly as "officers" is clear from their debates on the oaths required in Article IV, Section 5 and in Article V, Section 25. In opposing the special oath for the Legislature ultimately included in Article IV, Section 5, Mr. Tincher argued:

> "If the oath is a panacea for all the ills of life, I am certainly for it; and if it is a good oath, it is certainly good for everybody. If it is good for members of the Legislature, it is good for the judiciary and the executive; and if my esteemed friend from Cook [Mr. Medill] regards this of importance, why not amend it, let it apply then to the executive, legislative and all State and county offices, and have all officers bound by the same oath?"[20]

When the oath ultimately included in Article V, Section 25 was first proposed, it was to be required of "members of the General Assembly," and all officers, executive and judicial, except such as might be exempted by law. Mr. Allen's motion to delete the words "General Assembly" was adopted after he argued that such action was necessary "to preserve the form of oath prescribed by the legislative article to the members of the General Assembly. I have no objection to the section as it applies to other officers of the state, but to members of the General Assembly that oath is peculiarly appropriate." (Emphasis supplied.)[21] The view of the delegates has been confirmed in cases from other states in which courts have ruled on whether a member of the legislature holds a public office.[22]

The attributes of civil office under Article V, Section 24 were stated at greater length in McKinley v. City of Chicago, 291 Ill. App. 571 (1st Dist. 1937) rev'd on other grounds, 369 Ill. 268 (1938), an action by two associate judges for their salaries during the time from the election at which they were apparently defeated to the date their challenge of the election was upheld. In discussing whether they were "employees" or "officers" within the meaning of Article V, Section 24, the court said:

> "From a consideration of all the authorities it is, we think, apparent that whether the name office or employment is used, the relationship of those who render service in public positions under the laws and constitution of this State are of two classes fundamentally different in their nature. In the first class the relationship exists through a title derived from the people in whom sovereignty resides. In the second class, the right is through the pleasure of some subordinate department official or agency. In the first class the occupant holds title for a fixed and definite time declared by law, while in the second the occupant serves for an uncertain, indefinite and undetermined period. In the first class the duties to be performed by reason of the relationship are independent in their nature, partaking of the nature of that sovereignty from which the right is derived, while in the second class the duties are subordinate in their nature and within the discretion of a superior agency or officer . . ." 291 Ill. App. at 593.

Membership in the General Assembly has all of the attributes of office enumerated by the court: title derived from the people who elect the members, a term of office declared by law, independent duties. Similarly, the rationale of the Supreme Court (People v. Capuzi, 20 Ill. 2d 486 (1960)), in holding that an honorary village president, a deputy county coroner, and deputy bailiffs and deputy clerks of a municipal court were not constitutional officers, because they held only relatively minor ministerial positions at the pleasure of some other official, would imply that a seat in the General Assembly was a "lucrative office." State senators and State representatives clearly do not hold either minor or ministerial positions at the pleasure of other officials. Thus it would appear that they hold "office" within the meaning of Article V, Section 24.

Since they are compensated according to the manner provided in Article IV, Section 21, they also hold lucrative office. Moreover, a member of the General Assembly could not by waiving his salary fixed by law thereby become a holder of an office which was not "lucrative."[23]

In 1918, the contention was advanced that the phrase "any lucrative office" could not include seats in the General Assembly.[24] This contention was based on the proposition that "any lucrative office" in Article IV, Section 3 must mean "any lucrative office except a seat in the General Assembly," because a contrary construction would bar persons elected to the General Assembly from taking their seats even though they held no other lucrative office under the State of Illinois or the United States or a foreign government. Thus, it was urged that the pertinent language should be read as follows:

> "No person holding any lucrative office under this State, except a seat in the General Assembly, shall have a seat in the General Assembly."

In the alternative it was urged that a seat in the General Assembly is not an "office," a position heretofore discussed. Both these arguments go too far, however, for if "any lucrative office" does not include a seat in the General Assembly, one would reach the absurd result that there is no prohibition in the Constitution against one person's holding seats in both the Senate and House of Representatives simultaneously. This prohibition appears to have been so clearly understood, however, that no one has ever challenged it in Illinois by attempting to hold seats in both the Senate and the House.[25]

The better view then appears to be that a seat in the General Assembly is a "lucrative office" within the meaning of Article IV, Section 3, and that when the qualifications of Article IV, Section 3 are applied to convention delegates in accordance with the requirement of Article XIV, Section 1, a person who holds a seat in the General Assembly cannot continue to hold that seat and "have a seat" in the convention at the same time.

Effect of Incompatibility of Two Offices

The question remains whether a holder of one of the enumerated offices or of a "lucrative office" is ineligible for election to the office of convention delegate, or whether the prohibition is simply against the holding of two offices at the same time.

Mechem states the distinction as follows:

> "It is frequently declared that persons holding one office shall be ineligible to election to another, either generally or of a certain kind. These provisions being held to incapacitate the incumbent of the first office to election to the second, it follows that any attempted election to the second is void and that if, by color of it, he attempts to hold the second office he will be removed from it. It is thus the second office which is vacated instead of the first . . .
>
> "Where, however, it is the holding of two offices at the same time which is forbidden by the constitution or the statutes, a statutory incompatibility is created, similar in its effect to that of the common law, and, as in the case of the latter, it is well settled, operates ipso facto to vacate the first.
>
> "No judicial determination is therefore necessary to declare the vacancy of the first, but the moment he accepts the new office the old one becomes vacant."
>
> Mechem, Public Offices and Officers, §§428-429 (3rd ed. 1890).

No Illinois judicial opinions have dealt with the question whether an incumbent of one of the enumerated offices or of a "lucrative office" is ineligible to run for the General Assembly. In only one case has there been a challenge to the eligibility of an incumbent of a federal office of "honor or profit" to hold an office of "honor or profit" under the State, under the last sentence of Article IV, Section 3, and there the court declined to rule on the issue.[26]

On the other hand, there have been a number of cases dealing with the reverse situations. In one case, a State senator who was elected Clerk of the Municipal Court of Chicago was held to have vacated automatically his Senate seat upon his acceptance of the latter office.[27] In other cases, incumbents of offices of "honor or profit" under the State who accepted federal offices of "honor or profit" have been held to have vacated ipso facto their prior offices.[28] While not squarely in point, the sense of these holdings is that Article IV, Section 3 is a prohibition against the holding of two offices at one time, rather than a bar to eligibility.

Mechem supports the foregoing conclusion. Mechem's example of a provision which requires only vacation of the first office upon qualification for another incompatible office is almost identical to Article IV, Section 3:

> "Where the Constitution provides that no person holding any lucrative office under the State, shall be a member of the general assembly, one who accepts an election to the assembly while holding the office of circuit judge vacates the latter office . . ." Mechem, Public Offices and Officers, § 431 (3rd ed. 1890).

From the foregoing it is reasonable to conclude that persons holding the enumerated offices or "any lucrative office" under Article IV, Section 3 are not ineligible for the office of convention delegate, unless made so by another provision of the Constitution, but that, if they were to be elected and accept the position of delegate, they would automatically vacate their prior offices.

Discussing provisions which bar eligibility, Mechem states:

> "Thus, as in the Constitution of California, it is sometimes declared that 'No person holding any lucrative office under the United States or any other power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this State;' or, as in Indiana 'that no person elected to any judicial office shall, during the term for which he was elected, be eligible to any office of trust or profit under the state, other than a judicial one' . . ." Mechem, Public Offices and Officers § 76 (3rd ed. 1890).

The similar provision in Article V, Section 5 of the Illinois Constitution makes the governor, lieutenant governor, auditor, secretary of state, superintendent of public instruction, and attorney-general ineligible to other state office during the period for which they have been elected.

Enforcement of Sanction Against Office Holder who Takes Delegate's Seat

Although the sanction for taking a position incompatible with an office already held is automatic vacation of the former office, it may be necessary to enforce the sanction. Where the violation is clear, an action of mandamus to compel the appropriate official to institute action to fill the vacancy has been held appropriate.[29] Where the violation is not clear, a quo warranto proceeding to challenge title to the first office has been deemed appropriate.[30] Without one or the other of such proceedings, it is questionable whether compensation for the first office might be withheld by administrative determination only.[31]

In view of the provisions of Article IV, Section 9 of the Constitution, conferring on the houses of the General Assembly the right to be "the judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its members . . .", it might be argued that the issue of whether a member of the General Assembly vacated his seat is properly within the jurisdiction of the legislative branch to determine. However, in People ex rel. Myers v. Haas, 145 Ill. App. 283 (1st Dist. 1908), the court held that the issue was squarely within its competence. Distinguishing between qualifications and automatic vacation the court stated:

> "Counsel for the defendant in error advance the argument that the courts of the state may not try the title and qualifications of a senator to his seat in the senate.
>
> "Undoubtedly it is true, and we dare not gainsay it because the constitution so provides, that in the General Assembly each house shall 'be the judges of the election returns, and qualifications of its members.' Far be it from us to undertake to adjudicate in respect to the election, the election returns or the qualifications of Mr. Galpin as a state senator. For the purpose of the present inquiry we may, however, determine, and not only that but it is our duty under the law, to determine whether or not Mr. Galpin has voluntarily resigned the office of state senator of the second district." Id. at 288.

The court held that Senator Galpin had vacated his seat in the senate by his election to the office of Municipal court clerk. In so doing it relied on People ex. rel. Fuller v. Hilliard, 29 Ill. 413 (1862). In this case the Illinois Supreme Court ordered a county clerk to certify the election of Melville Fuller (later Chief Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court) to the Illinois House of Representatives in 1862, despite the contention that only the House could judge the election of its members.

Hilliard went much further than Haas, because the court was requiring an act which directly bore on determination of an election to the House. Such determinations are within the competence of the House under Article IV, Section 9, as the court recognized in Hilliard.[32]

To Summarize Again:

1. All of the "qualifications" required of State senators under Article IV, Sections 3 and 4 are also required of delegates to a constitutional convention under Article XIV, Section 1.

2. While there is no judicial precedent squarely in point, the legal authorities which do exist suggest that persons holding the offices enumerated in Article IV, Section 3 or "any lucrative office" are not "disqualified" or barred from eligibility to a seat in the Senate and, thus, that they are not "disqualified" or barred from eligibility to a seat in a constitutional convention under Article XIV, Section 1.

3. On the other hand, the legal authorities strongly support the conclusion that, if persons holding the offices enumerated in Article IV, Section 3 or "any lucrative office" are elected as convention delegates, they would, upon acceptance of their seats, automatically vacate their former offices under the provisions of Article XIV, Section 1 as that section incorporates Article IV, Section 3. Any other interpretation would render the cited provisions apparently meaningless.

4. Either a mandamus action to compel action to fill the vacancy or a quo warranto proceeding to challenge title to the former office may be brought to enforce the sanction of automatic vacation.

5. A "lucrative office" is a public position created by the constitution or by law, continuing during the pleasure of the appointing power or for a fixed period of time with a successor elected or appointed, to which compensation is attached by law regardless of whether that compensation is accepted or waived. The term "lucrative office," however, does not include "relatively minor ministerial positions" held at the pleasure of another official.

6. A member of the General Assembly holds "lucrative office," even though he might waive his legislative salary, and thus, while not ineligible for election as a convention delegate, would, upon acceptance of a convention seat, vacate his seat in the General Assembly under the provisions of Article XIV, Section 1 as that section incorporates the provisions of Article IV, Section 3.

FOOTNOTES

1. For convenience, delegates to the convention will be called "delegates" in this article, and

"members" will refer only to members of the General Assembly.

2. Ill. Const., art. XIV, § 1.

3. State senators must be United States citizens, must have attained the age of 25, and must have been residents for 5 years of the State and for the 2 years next preceding the election of the district from which they are elected. Ill. Const., art. IV, § 3.

4. Persons convicted of bribery, perjury or other infamous crimes, and collectors or holders of public monies who have not made an accounting as required by law, are ineligible for the General Assembly or any office of profit or trust in the State. Ill. Const., art. IV, § 4.

5. Five cases decided on this point have divided in their holdings, two holding that the delegates were officers, (Fyfe v. Mosher, 112 N.W. 725 (Mich., 1907); Kederick v. Heintzleman, 132 F. Supp. 582 (D. Alaska, 1955)), and three holding that they did not hold an office created by state law or the constitution (State v. Rogers, 70 So. 863 (La., 1916); State v. Doyle, 70 So. 322 (La., 1915); Board of Commissioners v. Attorney-General, 229 A. 2d 388, dissent, 230 A. 2d 61 (Md., 1967)). In each case the circumstances and constitutional provisions involved differed in material respects from the Illinois Constitution of 1870 and from the present call of a convention strictly in accordance with Article XIV, Section 1 of that constitution. Although in the Convention of 1869-70 former Justice Skinner had argued that delegates were not officers required to take an oath because their position had no continuing nature as attested by the failure to provide any means of filling vacancies in the convention (Debates and Proceedings of the Illinois Constitutional Convention, 1869-70, 31-32 (Springfield 1870)), the convention silenced such argument for the future by providing in Article XIV, Section 1, specifically for both a delegate's oath and the filling of vacancies in the convention. The principal difficulty in finding delegates to be officers lies in the definition of "office" as distinct from "employment" in Article V, Section 24 of the 1870 Constitution. The delegate's position meets three of the four characteristics of office prescribed in this section, but does not continue for a fixed time or during the pleasure of the appointing power. This section has been construed in McKinley v. City of Chicago, 291 Ill. App. 571, 593 (1st Dist., 1937), rev'd on other grounds, 369 Ill. 268 (1938), in which the court emphasized the following as characteristics of office: (1) derivation of title to the position directly from the people as distinguished from a subordinate government official or agency; (2) the independent nature of the duties of an office; and (3) tenure for a period declared by law. Again the delegate's position resembles an office more nearly than an employment in deriving title directly from the people and in having independent duties, but it has no fixed term since the convention may sit for as long as it finds it necessary to complete its work.

6. "§ 3. No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, or a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-one years. No person shall be a Senator or a Representative who shall not be a citizen of the United States, and who shall not have been for five years a resident of this State, and for two years next preceding his election a resident within the territory forming the district from which he is elected. No judge or clerk of any court, Secretary of State, Attorney General, State's Attorney, recorder, sheriff, or collector of public revenue, member of either House of Congress, or person holding any lucrative office under the United States or this State, or any foreign government, shall have a seat in the General Assembly: Provided, that appointments in the militia, and the offices of notary public and justice of the peace, shall not be considered lucrative. Nor shall any person holding any office of honor or profit under any foreign government, or under the government of the United States, (except postmasters whose annual compensation does not exceed the sum of three hundred dollars) hold any office of honor or profit under the authority of this State."

7. "§ 4. No person who has been, or hereafter shall be convicted of bribery, perjury or other infamous crime, nor any person who has been or may be a collector or holder of public moneys, who shall not have accounted for and paid over, according to law, all such moneys due from him, shall be eligible to the General Assembly, or to any office of profit or trust in this State."

8. Debates and Proceedings of the Illinois Constitutional Convention, 1869-70, 7-49 (Springfield 1870), hereinafter called the 1869-70 Debates.

9. Id. at 76.

10. Id. at 1309-1310.

11. Id. at 1312.

12. Id. at 1591.

13. Id. at 1778.

14. It has been suggested that the qualifications incorporated from Article IV, Sections 3 and 4, into Article XIV, Section 1, were restricted to the age, residence and citizenship requirements for state senators. In Sections 3 and 4, however, there is no distinction between these characteristics and the remaining ones specified in those sections which would warrant such a limited view of the qualifications of a state senator. Furthermore, it has been held that the disqualifying characteristics of Article IV, Section 4, have been held to be qualifications of which the members of the General Assembly are the judge under Article IV, Section 9. Reif v. Barrett, 355 Ill. 104, 125-129 (1934). It would appear that characteristics which are qualifications under Article IV, Section 9, must also be qualifications under Article XIV, Section 1, since nothing in the constitution or the debates indicates any difference in the usage of the word "qualifications" in the two sections. See also Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116, 128-129 (1966), in which the Georgia constitution's dual office prohibition was listed as a qualification for a seat in the Georgia assembly.

15. People ex rel. Myers v. Haas, 145 Ill. App. 283 (1st Dist. 1908) (municipal court clerk); 1921-22 Rep. Atty-Gen. 83 (member of county board of supervisors); 1917-18 Rep. Atty-Gen. 755 (circuit court judge); 1914 Rep. Atty-Gen. 1175, 1177 (mayor, member of county board of supervisors).

16. Book v. State Office Building Commission, 149 N.E. 2d 273, 289 (Ind. 1958). An office to which compensation is attached by law does not cease being "lucrative" because the holder thereof waives his salary. Howard County Metropolitan Commission v. Westphal, 193 A.2d 56, 60 (Md. 1963). Cf. Hetrick v. County Commissioners of Anne Arundel County, 159 A.2d 642, 645 (Md. 1960); Commonwealth ex rel. McCreary v. Major, 22 A.2d 686, 690 (Pa. 1941). However, any office for which compensation is not fixed by constitution, statute, or ordinance would not be a "lucrative office" and thus would not fall within the prohibition of Article IV, Section 3.

17. People ex rel. Cromer v. Village of Maywood, 381 Ill. 337, cert. den., 318 U.S. 783 (1943) (police magistrate and captain in U.S. Army); Fekste v. City of East St. Louis, 315 Ill. 58 (1924) (city attorney and captain in U.S. Army); People ex rel. Johnson v. Blake, 144 Ill. App. 246 (2d Dist. 1924) (village trustee and postmaster receiving salary of over $300 annually); Packingham v. Harper, 66 Ill. App. 96 (2d Dist. 1896) (town collector and postmaster); 1917-18 Rep. Atty-Gen. 757, 800, 811 (lieutenant-governor or state's attorney and any commission in U.S. Army); 1915 Rep. Atty-Gen. 785, 786, 788, 791 (congressman and state's attorney; postmaster and town clerk); 1914 Rep. Atty-Gen. 1161 (mayor and assistant postmaster; county judge and postmaster). In the Village of Maywood case, the court stated:

> "The offices of captain in the United States Army and of police magistrate of the village of Maywood are both positions of profit and honor." 381 Ill. at 342.

At that time an army captain was paid $240 per month and the police magistrate $200 per month.

18. The posts of president of a village whose affairs were managed by a village manager, deputy coroner of Cook County, deputy bailiff and deputy clerk of the Municipal Court of Chicago were distinguished by the Court in Capuzi from a judge or clerk of any court, secretary of state, attorney-general, state's attorney, recorder, sheriff, collector of public revenue, and congressman which are enumerated in Article IV, Section 3. Cf. Saxby v. Sonnemann, 318 Ill. 600 (1925), in which the court held that a member of the General Assembly could not simultaneously be a Deputy Attorney-General to enforce the prohibition era's Search and Seizure Act without violating the separation of powers requirements in Article III, but did not consider Article IV, Section 3.

19. But cf. People v. Capuzi, 20 Ill. 2d 486 (1960), where the court stated, in an argument not necessary to its conclusion, that the doctrine of eiusdem generis applied to delimit the scope of the term "any lucrative office" to the kinds of offices previously enumerated in Article IV, Section 3. In distinguishing the relatively minor ministerial offices there involved from "any lucrative office," the court expressly relied on characteristics of "office" under Article V, Section 24 which earlier had been articulated in McKinley v. City of Chicago, 291 Ill. App. 571 (1st Dist. 1937), rev'd on other grounds, 369 Ill. 268 (1938).

20. 1869-70 Debates at 958.

21. Id. at 1387.

22. Board of Supervisors v. Attorney-General, 229 A.2d 388; dissent, 230 A.2d 61 (Md. 1967); In re Opinion of the Justices, 21 A.2d 267 (R.I. 1941); Pitts v. Chilton County, 173 So. 94 (Ala. App. 1937), cert. den., 173 So. 95 (Ala. 1937).

23. See Howard County Metropolitan Commission v. Westphal, 193 A.2d 56, 60 (Md. 1963). Cf. Hetrick v. County Commissioners of Anne Arundel County, 159 A.2d 642, 645 (Md. 1960); Commonwealth ex rel. McCreary v. Major, 22 A.2d 686, 690 (Pa. 1941).

24. See Legislative Reference Bureau, Constitutional Convention in Illinois, p. 57 (Springfield: 1918).

25. The qualification in the third sentence of Article IV, Section 3 literally says that no person holding a lucrative office under the United States, a foreign government, or this State at the time he is to take his seat in the General Assembly shall have the seat. Thus a person could hold lucrative office up to the time he was to take his seat and still take his seat if his prior office terminated immediately prior to his taking his seat. By implication also, a person who has a seat in the General Assembly and acquires another lucrative office must give up his seat in the General Assembly, because he then can no longer "have" it. It appears doubtful that the members of the Convention of 1869-70 had any subtle intention beyond covering these two basic situations, particularly in view of the history of this sentence set forth earlier. In other words, a member could hold one seat in the House or Senate but no other lucrative office. Attempts to distill a further implication from the sentence that a seat in the General Assembly is not a "lucrative office" within the meaning of Article IV, Section 3, appear to be in direct conflict with the frequent assertions of a contrary opinion by the delegates to the 1869-70 Convention.

These conceptual difficulties of the Legislative Reference Bureau in 1918 apparently did not dissuade the Attorney-General in 1919 from issuing his opinion that members of the General Assembly could not simultaneously be delegates to the constitutional convention and members of the General Assembly. Opinion of the Attorney-General, March 1, 1919 (unpublished, but referred to in Smith Hurd Ill. Stats. Ann., Const., Art. XIV, §1, annotation).

It is not possible to tell whether the unpublished Attorney-General's Opinion in 1919, holding that members of the General Assembly could not simultaneously serve as convention delegates was premised on the conclusion that General Assemblymen hold "lucrative office" so as to invoke the qualification provision of Article XIV, Section 1, or on the conclusion that convention delegates hold "lucrative office" so as to invoke the dual prohibition of Article IV, Section 3.

26. People ex rel. Johnson v. Blake, 144 Ill. App. 246 (2d Dist. 1908), where a village postmaster was elected village president. The case was decided on affidavits, and the court reversed a judgment for the defendant-office holder because of a conflict in the affidavits as to whether the defendant came within the $300 annual compensation exemption specified in the Constitution.

27. People ex rel. Myers v. Haas, 145 Ill. App. 283 (1st Dist. 1908).

28. People ex rel. Cromer v. Village of Maywood, 381 Ill. 337 (1942), cert. den., 218 U.S. 783 (1943) (police magistrate who accepted commission as an officer in U.S. Army); Fekete v. City of East St. Louis, 315 Ill. 58 (1924) (city attorney who accepted commission as an officer in U.S. Army); Dickson v. People ex rel. Brown, 17 Ill. 191 (1855) (director of State institute for deaf and dumb who was appointed U.S. Marshal); Packingham v. Harper, 66 Ill. App. 96 (2d Dist. 1896) (town collector who was appointed U.S. postmaster).

29. People ex rel. Cromer v. Village of Maywood, 381 Ill. 337 (1942), cert. den., 318 U.S. 783 (1943) (police magistrate who accepted commission as an officer in the U.S. Army); People ex rel. Myers v. Haas, 145 Ill. App. 283 (1st Dist. 1908) (State senator who was elected Municipal Court Clerk).

30. People v. Capuzi, 20 Ill. 2d 486 (1960) (honorary village president and minor ministerial officials who were elected to the General Assembly); People ex rel. White v. Butler, 393 Ill. 395 (1946) (county judge who was inducted into the U.S. Army as a private); People ex rel. Johnson v. Blake, 144 Ill. App. 246 (2d Dist. 1908) (postmaster who was elected village president).

31. Compare People ex rel. White v. Butler, 393 Ill. 395 (1946) (withholding of compensation improper, but award of writ of mandamus reversed because the form of action was improper), with Fekete v. City of East St. Louis, 315 Ill. 58 (1924) (withholding of compenssation held proper: judgment for defendant in action of assumpsit affirmed).

32. In a number of cases, courts have declined to pass on whether a person was duly elected to the legislature because of the customary constitutional provision that each house of the legislature shall be the judge of the election and qualifications of its members. Annotation, 107 A.L.R. 205, at 209-219. In one of the early cases (People ex rel. Drake v. Mahaney, 3 Mich. 481, 492-3 (1865)), Judge Cooley enunciated the rule of judicial abstinence as necessary to protect the integrity of the legislature against attack after the legislature had adjourned. Reif v. Barrett, 355 Ill. 104, 126-129 (1934) presents a similar ruling by the Illinois Supreme Court.

The Haas case, however, presents the question, not of the propriety of the election or original qualification to take a seat in the legislature, but of the occurrence of a vacancy by operation of law after a legislator has taken a position incompatible with retention of his seat in the legislature. In this situation, the Delaware Supreme Court has refused to adjudicate an attempt to compel the legislature to declare the seat vacant and order an election to fill the vacancy. State v. Corley, 172 Atl. 415, 420 (1934). Corley was followed in In re Opinion Of the Justices, 47 So. 2d 586 (Ala. 1950), which was decided under constitutional provisions substantially different from those of both Delaware and Illinois. The Illinois Constitution, unlike the Delaware Constitution, does not invest the General Assembly with the power to determine when it has vacancies and to order elections. The only constitutional provision on the subject is Article IV, Section 2, which empowers the Governor to call elections to fill legislative vacancies. Thus, Corley would not be inconsistent with Haas.

In State v. Gilmore, 20 Kan. 551 (1878), however, the court refused to hear a suit to declare a legislative seat vacant because the member had been publicly intoxicated in violation of law. Relying only on the customary constitutional language as to determination of a legislator's election and qualifications, the court held that this exclusive power continued in the legislature throughout the session and extended to a determination whether a vacancy existed. The court relied on Judge Cooley's reasoning in Mahaney that such exclusive jurisdiction in the legislature was necessary to protect its integrity. This position appears untenable when the constitution empowers the governor rather than the legislature to fill vacancies, thereby showing an intention to distribute the power to act when vacancies occur among other branches of the government.

In State v. Shumate, 113 S.W.2d 381 (1938) the court, in the face of a powerful dissent, stated that it would not review the Tennessee House of Representatives' actual determination that a member had not vacated his seat even though he admitted that he had taken office as a judge and the court's majority stated that it would have declared the prior office vacant in any other situation. Here the Constitution did empower the Governor to order elections to fill vacancies in the General Assembly, and this case would appear, at least where the legislature has acted arbitrarily, to be contrary to Haas.

On the other hand in State ex rel. Leland v. Mason, 56 N.E. 468 (Ohio, 1900) the Ohio Supreme Court determined that a member of the Ohio house of representatives who had after his election to the house accepted a federal judgeship had vacated his seat in the Ohio legislature and was entitled to no further pay. The representative contended that the court was without jurisdiction to make this determination, because the house of representatives had not done so itself. The court replied:

> "We cannot assent to this proposition. The sections cited are to be construed with Section 4 of the same article which provides that 'no person holding office under the authority of the United States . . . shall be eligible to, or have a seat in, the general assembly.' It is the duty of the court to give force to this mandate of the constitution, and, though the general assembly does not act, the court cannot evade the duty."

See also State ex rel. McMillan v. Sadler, 58 Pac. 284, 289 (Nev., 1899) in which the court upheld the election of a new state senator to fill a vacancy created by the acceptance of the office of federal paymaster by the prior incumbent. In this case the legislature had taken no action and the election to fill the vacancy had been ordered by the governor. Cf. State ex rel. Gettles v. Gillen, 148 N.E. 86, 88 (Ohio, 1925).

Thus in the absence of a decision by the legislature, the weight of authority under constitutional provisions like those in the Illinois Constitution appears to support the decision in Haas.

(From Chicago-Kent Law Review, September 1952)

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions

Progress in the matter of memorializing the United States Congress to call a convention for the purpose of considering and proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States limiting federal income tax rates has reached the point where twenty-eight states have now adopted resolutions on the issue. Similar action by four more state legislatures will be necessary in order that there may be an unquestionable demand[1] by thirty-two states, or a number sufficient to meet the requirements of Article V of the Constitution, to put Congress in a position where it would be obliged to act.

The accelerated speed of the movement, developing in the past few years since the matter was first broached by the legislature of the State of Wyoming, seems to have caused some concern on the part of those presently in power in a few state legislatures for they would appear to be attempting to halt the rate of progress by securing the adoption of resolutions intended to rescind the favorable action taken by their states at an earlier date. Four of the twenty-eight state legislatures which had previously memorialized Congress calling for the submission of the amendment in question, to-wit: Alabama,[2] Illinois,[3] Kentucky,[4] and Wisconsin,[5] have since adopted resolutions purporting to rescind their earlier memorialization. The question has thereby been raised as to whether such rescission resolutions are null and void and of no legal effect. It is believed that such is the case for the reasons hereinafter set forth.

It is essential to keep in mind the amendatory process described in Article V of the federal constitution. That article contemplates that the Congress (a) shall, when two-thirds of both houses deem it necessary, "propose amendments" to the constitution; or (b), "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states," shall call a convention for proposing amendments. The article further recites that the amendments, "in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes . . . when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof."[6]

[1] See Packard, "Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program," 30 Chicago-Kent Law Review 128 (1952), particularly pp. 137-40, on the point of whether or not the necessary quorum has already been achieved.

[2] Ala. Acts 1945, p. 155.

[3] Ill. Laws 1945, p. 1797.

[4] Ky. Acts 1946, p. 720.

[5] Wis. Laws 1944-5, pp. 1126-7.

[6] Italics added. Article V contemplates that the mode of ratification shall be determined by Congress.

In view of the constitutional expression that either of these methods is to possess equal effect with the other it should be possible to compare the state memorialization method with the congressional method and thereby reach the result that what is true of the one is equally true of the other. If that comparison is proper, and no reason appears why it is not so, then it follows that what would be true of a congressional attempt to withdraw a proposed amendment which it had once submitted would likewise be true of the attempt by a state to rescind an action it had taken looking toward the same end.

Except as Congress may limit the time within which ratification may be given to one of its proposals, it is clear that Congress is without the power to withdraw a proposed amendment which it has once submitted. Professor Orfield is authority for the proposition that an attempt by Congress to withdraw a proposed amendment, after it had secured the necessary vote of two-thirds of both houses, would be a nullity. In his book on the subject of amending the federal constitution, he noted that the "question was directly raised in 1864 when Senator Anthony proposed to repeal the joint resolution submitting the Corwin amendment," and he declared the practice to be "to regard such a withdrawal as ineffectual," on the theory that each affirmative step taken in the passage of an amendment is irrevocable. If such were not the case, he wrote, "confusion would be introduced if Congress were permitted to retract its action."[7] Much the same view has been shared by Professor Burdick. In his textbook on the American Constitution, he wrote: "It seems safe to assert that Congress, having once submitted a proposed constitutional amendment to the States, cannot thereafter withdraw it from their consideration."[8]

Considering the demonstrated equality between the two methods of procuring a constitutional amendment, it is not illogical to apply the same reasoning to state action intended to rescind an application made by a state legislature for the calling of a convention to consider and propose amendments. As Professor Orfield has said, "the analogy of a state legislature's attempting to withdraw its ratification of an amendment would seem apposite."[9]

Additional proof may be found in the comparison which exists between a purported congressional withdrawal of a proposal on the one hand and a state attempt to withdraw its ratification of a proposed amendment on the other. The United States Supreme Court itself once pointed out that "proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts, but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor."[10] In that endeavor, state governments do not act on the basis of their sovereign status but under a special power conferred by the national constitution. As Judge Jameson wrote, the power to amend the constitution is not a power belonging to the states "originally by virtue of rights reserved or otherwise." As a consequence, "when exercised, as contemplated by the constitution, by ratifying, it ceases to be a power, and any attempt to exercise it again must be a nullity . . . [Once] ratified, all power is expended."[11]

[7] Orfield, The Amending of the Federal Constitution (University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1942), p. 52.

[8] Burdick, The Law of the American Constitution: Its Origin and Development (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, 1922), p. 39.

[9] Orfield, op. cit., p. 52.

That view also has the support of the eminent Professor Dodd. He has stated that the view "is incontrovertible, that a state, once having ratified, may not withdraw that ratification . . . to construe the Constitution otherwise, would be to permit great confusion in that no state in ratifying could know what the status of the amendment was if at the same time other states were permitted to withdraw. Of course, confusion would occur also in that it would be difficult to know when three-fourths of the states had ratified . . . The function of ratification seems to be one which, when once done, is fully completed and leaves no power whatever in the hands of the state legislature."[12]

The highest courts of two of the American states have achieved the same conclusion. In Wise v. Chandler,[13] the Court of Appeals of Kentucky said: "It is the prevailing view of writers on the question that a resolution of ratification of an amendment to the Federal Constitution, whether adopted by the Legislature or a convention, is irrevocable. This conclusion seems inescapable as to the action of a convention called for the purpose of acting upon an amendment. When it has acted and adjourned, its power is exhausted. Since the 'powers and disabilities' of the two classes of representative assemblies mentioned in Article V are 'precisely the same', when a Legislature, sitting, not as a lawmaking body, but as such an assembly, has acted upon a proposal for an amendment, it likewise has exhausted its power in this connection."[14] The Supreme Court of Kansas, about the same time and through the medium of the case of Coleman v. Miller,[15] declared: "It is generally agreed by lawyers, statesmen and publicists who have debated this question that a . . . ratifi-

[10] See Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U. S. 368 at 374, 41 S. Ct. 510 at 512, 65 L. Ed. 994 at 997 (1921).

[11] Jameson, A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions: Their History, Powers and Modes of Proceeding (Callaghan & Company, Chicago, 1887), §§ 579 and 581.

[12] Dodd, "Amending the Federal Constitution," 30 Yale L. J. 321 (1921), particularly p. 346.

[13] 270 Ky. 1, 108 S. W. (2d) 1024 (1937).

[14] 270 Ky. 1 at 8-9, 108 S. W. (2d) 1024 at 1028.

[15] 146 Kans. 390, 71 P. (2d) 518 (1937).

cation once given cannot be withdrawn . . . [From] historical precedents, it is . . . true that where a state has once ratified an amendment it has no power thereafter to withdraw such ratification. To hold otherwise would make article 5 of the federal constitution read that the amendment should be valid 'when ratified by three fourths of the states, each adhering to its vote until three fourths of all the legislatures shall have voted to ratify.'. . . [When] a proposed amendment has once been ratified the power to act on the proposed amendment ceases to exist."[16]

What room is there, then, for supposing that a different view should be applied to the matter of retracting a state resolution calling upon Congress for a convention to consider a proposed amendment? When a state adopts an original resolution memorializing Congress to that end, it is not exercising a sovereign power exclusively its own, nor merely legislating simply on behalf of its own people, but is engaging in a "federal" function. That fact places such activity within the exclusive domain of federal jurisdiction and completely removes the same from the pale of the state province and beyond the power of state withdrawal. The truth of this is manifest since the function of a state legislature, in memorializing Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment, is derived wholly from the federal constitution. It is no different, in source, than the function of Congress in proposing an amendment, or the function of a state legislature voting to ratify the same. Since the latter functions have been judicially identified as "federal functions" totally without state realm,[17] the conclusion would appear inescapable that the purported rescinding resolutions are of no effect whatever. It is submitted, therefore, that Congress should act, at the latest, when four more state legislatures vote in favor of a constitutional convention to consider the proposed income tax rate limitation amendment.

F. E. PACKARD

[16] 146 Kans. 390 at 400-3, 71 P. (2d) 518 at 524-6.

[17] In Coleman v. Miller, 146 Kans. 390 at 392-3, 71 P. (2d) 518 at 520 (1937), the Supreme Court of Kansas said: "It is settled beyond controversy that the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States, like the function of congress in proposing an amendment, is a federal function derived from the federal constitution; and it transcends any limitation sought to be imposed by the people of a state. The power to legislate in the enactment of the laws of a state is derived from the people of the state, but the power to ratify a proposed amendment to the federal constitution has its source in that instrument. The act of ratification by the state derives its authority from the federal constitution, to which the state and its people alike have assented. . . . If the legislature, in ratifying a proposed amendment, is performing a federal function, it would seem to follow that ratification is not an act of legislation in the proper sense of that term. It has been so held."

Journal of Public Law

VOLUME 20

1971

EMORY UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL

ATLANTA, GEORGIA 30322

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS AND STATE LEGISLATORS

Doyle W. Buckwalter†

I. INTRODUCTION

RECENT EFFORTS TO AMEND THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION, i.e., apportionment, a rewriting of article V, and legislation to implement the amending clause, have directed considerable public attention to the possibility of a constitutional convention. The recent spate of congressional and academic discussions have revealed several basic issues in this controversy, many of which have surprised public officials. With the death of Senator Everett Dirksen in 1969, and the apparent insufficient number of state petitions for a convention, the impetus for an immediate convention has dramatically diminished. Yet, the fate of congressional bills to operationalize the convention portion of article V remains indeterminate. Such legislation, in essence, would establish explicit procedures for state and federal government involvement in establishing constitutional conventions.[1] There has been little attempt to ascertain state legislative attitudes and to integrate additional data on state legislative processes on the subject of constitutional conventions. Consequently, this paper shall: (1) consider a brief history of article V, and (2) discuss four basic questions of the convention controversy and how these are perceived by state legislators throughout the United States.

II. EARLY PRECEDENTS AND DEBATES

As the Constitutional Convention of 1787 convened to consider basic plans for revising the Articles of Confederation, there were several alternative approaches to the question of future alteration of the Articles. It became ostensibly clear that a major focal point of discussion would be the inoperative amending process. Charles Pinckney, in his "plan for a Federal Constitution," urged on May 29, 1787, the following amendment procedure:

> If two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States apply for the same, the Legislature of the United States shall call a convention for the > purpose of amending the Constitution; or, should Congress, with the consent of two-thirds of each House, propose to the States amendments to the same, the agreement of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States shall be sufficient to make the said amendments parts of the Constitution.[2]

†B.A., M.A., Brigham Young University; Ph.D., University of Michigan. Assistant Professor of Political Science, Brigham Young University.

[1]Senate bills, S. 12307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967), and S. 623, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969), were the principal procedural legislative measures.

Pinckney expressed deep concern that unless alteration of the unanimous consent clause of the Articles was imminent, the nation would inevitably continue in its "depressed situation."[3]

The Virginia Plan, suggested by Edmund Randolph, contained in its Resolution XIII the reference to amendments:

> [P]rovision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary; and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto.[4]

Charles Pinkey "doubted the propriety or necessity for the last clause," and Elbridge Gerry claimed that "[t]he prospect of such a revision would also give intermediate stability to the Government."[5] It was Mason who strongly advocated not requiring the assent of the national government. He asserted it was:

> better to provide for them in an easy, regular and constitutional way, than to trust to chance and violence. It would be improper to require the consent of the National Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their assent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse, may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendment.[6]

There was unanimous acceptance of Randolph's proposal with the exception of the last restricting clause.

Subsequently, Alexander Hamilton presented his plan which called for adoption of the following amendment procedure:

> This constitution may receive such alterations and amendents as may be proposed by the Legislature of the United States, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of both Houses, and ratified by the Legislature of, or by Conventions of deputies chosen by the people in two-thirds of the States composing the Union.[7]

---

[2] 1 J. MADISON, JOURNAL OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION 72 (E. Scott ed. 1898).
[3] 1 THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION 120 (M. Farrand ed. 1911).
[4] 1 J. MADISON, supra note 2, at 63.
[5] Id. at 110.
[6] Id. at 149.
[7] 1 THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION, supra note 3, at 149.

From July 26 to August 6, the Detail Committee considered the amending provision and subsequently reported the following:

> [O]n the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for the Purpose.[8]

On September 10, Elbridge Gerry urged reconsideration of the amending provision as he vehemently objected to the two-thirds requirement because it might subvert the Union. The reconsideration motion, though not unanimous, was given support from Madison. He prophetically declared that "there was extreme vagueness of the terms, 'calling a convention' . . . ."[9] He further inquired: "How was a convention to be formed, by what rule decided what is the force of its acts?"[10] Wilson's laborious attempt to retain the provision "of three-fourths of the states" was successful. Madison eventually proposed a slightly modified version which appeared most palatable. It read:

> The Congress of the U.S. whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as parts thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification be proposed by the Congress.[11]

Only two short amendments were added to Madison's proposal—no amendments affecting specific items in article I before 1808, and the right of state suffrage in the Senate.[12]

Randolph and Gerry, among others, refused to sign the Constitution on grounds that the role of the Congress was objectable, and moreover, that frequent changes were extremely undesirable. Conversely, Patrick Henry accused the framers of the Constitution with attempting to make it virtually impossible for amending because the three-fourths ratification process was inordinately demanding. Madison summarized the thoughts of those supporting the amending procedures:

---

[8] Id. at 159.

[9] 2 J. MADISON, supra note 2, at 693.

[10] Id.

[11] 2 THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION, supra note 3, at 629.

[12] See J. MADISON, THE DEBATES IN THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787 WHICH FRAMED THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 573 (G. Hunt & J. Scott eds. 1920), for an explanation of the two amendments.

> That use alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite, therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility, which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty, which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It, moreover, equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendment of errors, and they may be pointed out by the experience on one side, or on the other.[13]

Ratification by the states did involve numerous deliberate discussions of the amending clause, yet the arguments were repetitious of those at the Convention. Since that time, states have utilized article V many times in requesting a congressional call for a constitutional convention.

Between 1789 and 1889, only ten petitions for a constitutional convention were registered with Congress. New York and Virginia submitted petitions, simultaneously with their Constitutional ratifications.[14] Congress rendered the convention process unnecessary, in these particular cases, by opting for the first amending procedure. In 1833, South Carolina, Alabama, and Georgia memorialized Congress to call a convention. South Carolina petitioned to secure a clarification of federal and state powers, while Georgia desired a thorough consideration of the personal freedoms of Indians.[15] Alabama sought a convention to summarily consider all amendment proposals presently before Congress.[16] Prior to the outbreak of the Civil War, Kentucky,[17] Indiana,[18] Virginia,[19] Illinois,[20] and Ohio[21] petitioned for a constitutional convention in a desperate attempt to prevent the dissolvement of the nation. This was to be accomplished in the petitions by having greater specificity written in the Constitution. The convention, in the latter case, would have been officially assigned the responsibility of preparing an authoritative interpretation of the Constitution.

---

[13]THE FEDERALIST No. 43, at 286-87 (Modern Library ed. 1937) (J. Madison).

[14]H.R. JOUR. 32, 34 (1789).

[15]S. JOUR. 65-66, 83 (1833).

[16]H. AMES, PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION DURING THE FIRST CENTURY OF ITS HISTORY, H.R. Doc. No. 353, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 2, 282, 345, apps. 625, 625a, 625b (1897).

[17]S. JOUR. 189-90 (1861).

[18]Id. at 420-21.

[19]Id. at 149.

[20][1861] Ill. Laws 281.

[21]58 Ohio Laws 181 (1861).

Subsequent to 1893, the utilization of the application process was much more prevalent. Commencing with Nebraska, some thirty-one states petitioned Congress concerning the direct election of Senators. Since the beginning of the twentieth century, Americans have witnessed a significant variety of suggested convention topics.

TABLE I

State applications to Congress for constitutional conventions, listed by subject matter.[22]

1. Direct election of Senators:

Ark. (1901, 1903, 1911); Cal. (1903, 1911), Colo. (1901); Idaho (1901, 1903); Ill. (1903, 1907, 1909); Ind. (1907); Iowa (1904, 1907, 1909); Kan. (1901, 1905, 1907, 1909); Ky. (1902); La. (1907); Me. (1911); Mich. (1901); Minn. (1901, 1911); Mo. (1901, 1903, 1905); Mont. (1901, 1903, 1905, 1907, 1908, 1911); Neb. (1893, 1901, 1903, 1907); Nev. (1901, 1903, 1905, 1907); N.J. (1907); N.C. (1901, 1907); N.D. (1903); Ohio (1908, 1911); Okla. (1908); Ore. (1901, 1903, 1907, 1909); Penn. (1901); S.D. (1901, 1907, 1909); Tenn. (1901, 1903, 1905); Tex. (1901, 1911); Utah (1903); Wash. (1903); Wis. (1903, 1907, 1908); Wyo. (1895).

2. Limitation of federal taxing power:

Ala. (1943); Ark. (1943); Del. (1943); Fla. (1951); Ga. (1952); Ill. (1943); Ind. (1943, 1957); Iowa (1941, 1951); Kan. (1951); Ky. (1944); La. (1950); Me. (1941, 1951); Mass. (1941); Mich. (1941, 1949); Miss. (1940); Neb. (1949); N.H. (1943, 1951); N.J. (1944); N.M. (1951); Okla. (1955); Penn. (1943); R.I. (1940); Utah (1951); Va. (1952); Wis. (1943); Wyo. (1939).

3. Prohibition of polygamy:

Calif. (1909); Conn. (1915); Del. (1907); Ill. (1913); Iowa (1906); La. (1916); Me. (1907); Md. (1908, 1914); Mich. (1913); Minn. (1909); Mont. (1911); Neb. (1911); N.H. (1911); N.Y. (1906); N.D. (1907); Ohio (1911); Okla. (1911); Ore. (1913); Penn. (1907, 1913); S.C. (1915); S.D. (1909); Tenn. (1911); Tex. (1911); Vt. (1912); Wash. (1909, 1910); W.Va. (1907); Wis. (1913).

4. General revision of the Constitution:

Colo. (1901); Ga. (1832); Ill. (1861, 1903); Ind. (1861); La. (1907); Mo. (1907); Mont. (1911); Neb. (1907); Nev. (1907); N.Y. (1789); N.C. (1907); Ohio (1861); Okla. (1908); Ore. (1901); Tex. (1899); Va. (1788, 1861); Wash. (1901, 1903); Wis. (1911, 1929); Iowa (1907, 1909); Kan. (1901, 1905, 1907); Ky. (1861).

5. World federal government:

Cal. (1949); Conn. (1949); Fla. (1943, 1945, 1949); Me. (1949); N.J. (1949); N.C. (1949).

[22]This is an updated version of C. BRICKFIELD, PROBLEMS RELATING TO FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. 89-91 (Comm. Print 1957).

39-609 O - 80 - 38

6. Repeal of eighteenth amendment:

Mass. (1931); Nev. (1925); N.J. (1932); N.Y. (1931); Wis. (1931).

7. Limitation of presidential tenure:

Ill. (1943); Iowa (1943); Mich. (1943); Mont. (1947); Wis. (1943).

8. Treaty making of President:

Fla. (1945); Ga. (1952); Ind. (1957).

9. Taxation of federal and state securities:

Cal. (1935); Idaho (1927).

10. Against protective tariff:

Ala. (1833).

11. Federal Regulation of wages and hours of labor:

Cal. (1935).

12. Federal tax on gasoline:

Cal. (1952).

13. Tidelands control:

Tex. (1949).

14. Control of trusts:

Ill. (1911).

15. Prohibition of grants-in-aid:

Penn. (1943).

16. Popular ratification of amendment:

La. (1920).

17. Constitutionality of State enactments:

Mo. (1913).

18. Townsend plan:

Ore. (1939).

19. Revision of article V:

Ark. (1963); Fla. (1963); Idaho (1957, 1963); Ill. (1953, 1963); Ind. (1957); Kan. (1963);[23] Mich. (1956); Mo. (1963); Okla. (1963); S.C. (1963); S.D. (1953, 1955, 1963); Tex. (1955, 1963); Wyo. (1963); Va. (1965).

20. Reapportionment:

Ind. (1957); Ark. (1963); Idaho (1963); Kan. (1963); Mo. (1963); Mont. (1963); Nev. (1963); S.C. (1963); Tex. (1963); Wash. (1963); Wyo. (1963); Va. (1964); Ala. (1965); Ariz. (1965); Ark. (1965); Colo. (1965); Fla. (1965); Ga. (1965); Idaho (1965); Ill. (1965);[24] Kan. (1965);[25] Ky. (1965); La. (1965); Md. (1965); Minn. (1965); Miss. (1965); Mo. (1965); Mont. (1965); Neb. (1965); N.H. (1965); N.C. (1965); N.D. (1965); Okla. (1965);[26] S.C. (1965); S.D. (1965); Tex. (1965); Va. (1965); Utah (1965);[27] Ala. (1966); N.M. (1966); Tenn. (1966); Colo. (1967); Ill. (1967); Ind. (1967); Nev. (1967); N.D. (1967); Iowa (1969).

21. Balancing the budget:

Ind. (1957); Wyo. (1961).

22. State control of schools:

Ga. (1955, 1959, 1965); La. (1965); Miss. (1965).

23. Examination of the fourteenth amendment ratification:

Ark. (1959).

24. Repeal of sixteenth amendment:

Nev. (1960); S.C. (1962).

25. Establish a Court of the Union:

Ala. (1963); Ark. (1963); Fla. (1963); S.C. (1963); Wyo. (1963).

---

[23]Rescinded in 1970.

[24]House rescinded in 1969.

[25]Rescinded in 1970.

[26]Declared null and void by State Attorney General because no executive signature.

[27]Declared null and void by federal court, 1969.

26. Presidential elections:

Ark. (1963); Colo. (1963); Kan. (1963);[24] Mont. (1963); S.D. (1963); Tex. (1963); Utah (1963); Wis. (1963); Okla. (1965); Ill. (1967); Neb. (1965).

27. Limiting and retiring the national debt.

Idaho (1963).

28. Pay pensions to certain people:

Mass. (1964).

29. Reading the Bible in schools:

Mass. (1964).

30. Prayer in schools:

Mass. (1964).

31. Sharing income tax (revenue sharing):

Ill. (1965); Ohio (1965); Ala. (1967); Tex. (1967); Fla. (1969); N.H. (1969).

32. Control of the Communist Party in the United States:

Miss. (1965).

33. Taxation:

Colo. (1963).

34. Prohibit race segregation in public schools:

Miss. (1970).

III. Current Action and Attitudes on Constitutional Conventions

As of January 1970, thirty-two states had petitioned Congress to summons a constitutional convention to consider the subject of state legislative apportionment.[25] Though this amount was two less than the requisite number, the possibility of such an occurrence presented, for some people, an unpredictable and tremendous onslaught on the constitutional foundation of this nation. Because article V stipulates state petitions and involvement, it would seem desirable to have a survey of the state legislators' views surrounding the possibility of a constitutional convention. A survey of the 1969-70 state legislatures and processes revealed some interesting information on four basic questions regarding the constitutional convention.[26] A brief examination of each question will be followed by survey results.

Must the Language of Amendments Proposed in State Petitions be Identical?

Readily noticeable in the apportionment case are three major categories

---

[24]Rescinded in 1970.

[25]On July 8, 1969, the lower house of the legislature withdrew its support of its original 1965 joint resolution. On August 13, 1969, the Oklahoma Attorney-General ruled its concurrent resolution petition as not binding, as the Governor's approval was refused. The Utah resolution was declared null and void by a federal court because of the malapportionment issue. Consequently, the action in these three states leaves only twenty-nine petitions on file with Congress.

[26]Twenty-one per cent (1,589) of the 7,568 legislators responded to the questionnaire. Consequently, the reported results are not technically randomized nor conclusive and should only be considered reflective in nature.

of apportionment petitions: (1) abolishing of federal judicial review of state legislative apportionment; (2) requesting a convention to reverse the decision of Reynolds v. Sims;[31] and (3) establishing criteria other than mere population for apportionment determination. Constitutional writers would fundamentally disagree whether the amount of similarity is sufficient. Lester B. Orfield claimed that the "ground of the application would be immaterial, and that a demand by two-thirds of the states would conclusively show a widespread desire for constitutional changes."[32] The House Committee on the Judiciary of 1952 questioned the wisdom and practicality of requiring identical petitions:

> Conversely, there appears no valid reason to suppose that the language of the amendments requested in State applications must be identical with one another in wording. It should be enough that the suggested amendments be of the same general subject matter in order to be included in a congressional count of applications for a constitutional convention, bearing in mind, of course, that any or all of the states may at any time request a general convention should strong sentiment for such proceedings prevail.[33]

Contrariwise, Charles L. Black urged the necessity for exact form because:

> [i]t moreover is illegitimate to infer, from a state's having asked for a "convention" to vote a textually-given amendment up or down, that it desires some other sort of convention. It is not for Congress to guess whether a state which asks for the one kind of "convention" wants the other as a second choice. Altogether different political considerations might govern.[34]

The state legislative survey revealed that slightly over 57 per cent of the 1,589 respondents considered identical language as not requisite for calling a constitutional convention. Justifications for this position included "political considerations," "substantive natures of topics rather than procedural," "expedience," and "state individuality." Many legislators maintained that a clearinghouse operation might insure similarity in state petitions, but unforeseen problems could result from the uniformity in legislative devices utilized for petitioning Congress. The legislative measures utilized by the states differ widely and lead to considerable difficulty in

---

[31]377 U.S. 533 (1964).

[32]L. ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 42 (1942).

[33]STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82D CONG., 2D SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS ON FEDERAL TAX RATES 11-12 (Comm. Print 1952).

[34]Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 956, 963-64 (1963).

determining the exact intent and legality of the legislative action. Three principal methods are generally employed in the states: joint resolution, concurrent resolution, and memorials. Norman J. Small, Legislative Attorney, American Law Division of the Congressional Legislative Reference Service, indicated the difference between memorials and petitions:

> The former are merely exhortations to the Congress to exercise its power to originate, approve, and submit for ratification a specific proposal as an amendment to the Constitution. As an exhortation, such memorials are deemed to give rise to no more than a moral obligation on the part of Congress to respond affirmatively thereto when tendered by a substantial number or even by as many as two-thirds, of the States.[35]

Small equates "petitions" with "applications," but does admit that even the "petitions" (resolutions, etc.) may be legally questionable because they had not been tested in the courts. Some of the states require 51 per cent majority, while others demand no less than 65 per cent approval. Table II indicates the various devices utilized by the state legislatures as determined by our survey. There is state consensus that combined action of both legislative houses is necessarily required. This assumption is substantiated by a study by the Staff of the House Committee on the Judiciary in 1952, which contended that identical, but separate, resolutions would not constitute a legislative measure.[36]

As Table II indicates, the governor's approval of petitions is required in at least fourteen states, depending on whether the states utilize joint or concurrent resolutions. Article V indicates that the "legislature" constitutes the petitioning body, yet this fails to delineate whether this has reference to the legislative process, or the specific representative lawmaking body. According to the United States Supreme Court, the connotation of the "legislature" depends upon the particular function engaged in.[37] For example, we note that in article I, § 4 of the Constitution, the state electoral process has explicit reference to the total lawmaking process, i.e., legislative and executive. Since in 1920, the Supreme Court ruled in Hawke v. Smith[38] that "ratification by a State of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word,"[39] it would appear that the Governor need not be directly involved. With regards to convention [35]N. Small, Procedures for Amending the United States Constitution, 1965 (Library of Congress Legislative Reference Service.).

---

[36]STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, supra note 33, at 6.

[37]Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 366 (1932).

[38]253 U.S. 221 (1920).

[39]Id. at 229.

petitions, the state legislature would not be functioning in a routine legislative capacity, but as an agency of the national government. However, in 1969, the Oklahoma Attorney General explicitly contradicted this view:

> The resolution . . . was not signed by the Governor, it did not become the law of this state. It is the opinion of the Attorney General that a concurrent resolution passed by a session of the Oklahoma Legislature which does not meet the criteria of becoming law, is merely an expression of opinion of that particular body and has no binding effect on a subsequent session of the Legislature.[48]

TABLE II

DEVICE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

State	Bill	J. Resol.	Con. Resol.	Memorial	Governor's Approval
Alabama		x			yes
Alaska		x			yes, not to veto
Arizona			x		yes
Arkansas		x	x		no, yes
California		x			no
Colorado				x Joint	yes, not adhered
Connecticut		x			no
Delaware		x			yes
Florida			x may rescind		no
Georgia		x			no
Hawaii		x			no
Idaho		x			no
Illinois		x			no
Indiana			x		no
Iowa			x		no
Kansas			x		no
Kentucky			x		no
Louisiana			x		no

[48] 69 OP. ATT'Y GEN. 200 (1969), in 115 CONG. REC. 23,780 (1969).

Maine		x			no
Maryland		x			yes
Massachusetts		x			no
Michigan			x		no
Minnesota		x			yes
Mississippi			x		no
Missouri			x		no
Montana		x			no
Nebraska				x	no
Nevada		x			no
New Hampshire		x			no
New Jersey		x	x		yes, no
New Mexico		x		x Joint	no
New York			x		no
North Carolina		x			x
North Dakota			x		x
Ohio		x			no
Oklahoma			x		no
Oregon				x Joint	no
Pennsylvania		x can rescind	x		no, no
Rhode Island	x	x			yes, yes
South Carolina			x		no
South Dakota			x		x
Tennessee		x can rescind			yes
Texas			x		yes
Utah		x	x		no, yes
Vermont				x	no
Virginia		x			no
Washington		x		x Joint	no
West Virginia			x		no
Wisconsin		x			no
Wyoming				x	yes

How Long Should a State Petition Requesting a Constitutional Convention Remain Valid?

Article V is silent on this perplexing subject, though many would agree with the Supreme Court on the constitutional ratification procedures and attempt to utilize this as an analogy comparable to the state legislative petition process:

> [T]he first inference or implication from article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal [which Congress is free to fix] . . . . As ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do.[41]

The term "sufficiently contemporaneous" becomes the pivotal criterion on which the controversy rests. Arthur Bonfield indicates that rather than relying on such criteria as changing social, economic, and political events, the fundamental criterion should be the legislative period in which all states have had the opportunity to meet in one full regular session.[42] This approach appears to have a distinct advantage because it challenges those recommending a convention on a particular subject to provide convincing evidence from other current legislatures on the consensus of calling a convention. In theory, then, the duration factor of two years would represent a current poll of legislators' attitudes. The data from our legislative survey, particularly of the thirty-two states which urged a constitutional convention on reapportionment, gives some insight on the problem of "sufficiently contemporaneous." In 1963, petitions from the following states were received: Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Washington, and Wyoming. The following year, Virginia requested the Congress to call a convention. The 1965-66 legislative period witnessed a flurry of petitions: Alabama, Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Utah.[43] The Ninetieth Congress in 1967 received similar

---

[41]Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 375 (1921).

[42]Bonfield, Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems, 39 NOTRE DAME LAW. 659 (1964).

[43]The Legislative Reference Service reported that there is no record of the petition S.R. 14, submitted by Georgia. The petitions from New Hampshire and Utah, though appearing in the Congressional Record, were not forwarded to the Judiciary Committee in House or Senate.

petitions from Illinois, Indiana, North Dakota, and Colorado.[44] Senate Bill 2307 of the Ninetieth Congress called for a six-year petition duration, though some Congressmen and committee witnesses urged periods from two to seven years. It became conspicuously clear that unless the six-year prerequisite was adopted, the eleven petitions of 1963 would be declared void by the end of 1969. Senator Dirksen's determined efforts to gather sufficient consensus on initiating floor consideration were cut short by his illness and eventual death in September 1969. Had Dirksen been successful in securing favorable Congressional action, the implications may have been rather astounding. For example, our survey found the total number of legislators voting on the petitions in states where it was accepted amounted to 5,259. Nevertheless, in 1969, when Congress may have rendered a decision allowing a constitutional convention, 57 per cent of those original legislators voting on the petitions were no longer in the state legislatures. This significant change in personnel leaves the issue of "sufficiently contemporaneous" even more poignant. A discussion of the partisanship of the state legislatures makes the change of personnel more complicated. Assuming that an issue might be purely partisan, would the petition remain consistently representative of the current legislative attitude? Between 1963 and 1969, we observed that subsequent to the petition acceptance, there were thirteen party control turnovers, two ties, and eight nonpartisan elections. There is substantial evidence that petitions, purely partisan in nature, might be rejected and not reflect the contemporary attitude.

The legislative survey disclosed conflicting data as well as constructive suggestions for alleviating the entire question of petition duration. Nearly 80 per cent of the respondents recommended a four-year duration period or the completion of the second session. This procedure would allow a double check on whether the legislature, in the first instance, acted presumptously. Congress would be responsible for transmitting copies of the petition to all states and requesting immediate consideration. Simultaneously, as state legislators supported this conclusion, 85 per cent of them favored retaining state control of the petition by power of rescission. There was substantial fear that a specific legislative body might act contrary to the public good, necessitating a reconsideration of the petition. Yet, if the four-year duration factor existed, then the rescission power would be valid for only one attempt.

May Congress Refuse to Call a Constitutional Convention?

Edmund Randolph introduced the original resolution providing for constitutional revision.

---

[44] Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., 116-17 (1967). Colorado maintains that S. J. Memorial No. 5 was forwarded to Congress, though no record can be found.

> /Resolved/ that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto.[45]

Colonel Mason contended that "[i]t would be improper to require the consent of the National Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account."[46] Up until the last two weeks of the Convention, the primary discussion concerned the sole responsibility of the state legislatures to propose amendments. Gouvenor Morris and Elbridge Gerry moved to amend the articles to have a mandatory convention when the requisite number of states had requested. Madison strongly supported the view of mandatory congressional action.[47] One week before the convention concluded, Hamilton and Gerry successfully urged reconsideration of the amendment article because of the failure to include congressional prerogative to propose amendments. Consequently, Madison's proposal to allow both Congress and the state legislatures to make proposals was adopted. Yet, on the last day of the Convention, a compromise was enacted which allowed for both congressional and state proposals, but stipulated a convention process for the latter.

Undoubtedly the most compelling evidence of congressional obligation to summon a convention came to light immediately after the Constitutional Convention. In the Federalist Papers Hamilton claimed that:

> [b]y the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obliged "on application of the legislatures of two thirds of the states . . . to call a Convention for proposing amendments . . . ." The words of this article are pre-emptory. The Congress "shall call a Convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body.[48]

At the initial Congress, Madison implored his colleagues to consider the subject of amendments, specifically, the amendments which would contain the Bill of Rights.[49] The following day, May 5, 1789, a member of Congress displayed a state legislative petition for a convention. Madison claimed that thorough discussion of the petition would be inappropriate until the requisite number of petitions had been received and "then it is out of the power of

---

[45] 1 THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION, supra note 3, at 194.

[46] Id. at 203.

[47] 2 Id. at 629-30.

[48] THE FEDERAIST NO. 85, at 546 (Wright ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton).

[49] 1 ANNALS OF CONG. 247 (1834). See an excellent discussion of the amendment process in Forkosch, Who are the "People" in the Preamble to the Constitution, 19 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 644 (1967).

Congress to decline complying, the words of the Constitution being express and positive relative to the agency Congress may have in case of applications of this nature . . . ."[59] Consequently, the petition was placed in the archives until others would arrive.

Regardless of whether one concurs with the foregoing, a fundamental question remains: What recourse do the states have in the event Congress fails to Act? Some argue that Congress performs in a ministerial role in calling for a convention, thus the Supreme Court would have authority to issue some form of mandamus requiring it to act.[61] Unless Congress could be forced to comply, the intent of the framers would be thwarted. Cyril F. Brickfield and Arthur E. Bonfield claim, on the contrary, that the courts would not enter the controversy because of the "doctrine of the separation of powers" which prohibits injurious intrusion of one branch on another.[62] The concept of "coordinate branch respect" was not violated by the Baker v. Carr[63] nor the Westberry v. Sanders[64] cases. For example, Bonfield asserts that > judicial review on the merits of state legislative apportionment or the drawing of congressional districts by the states only involves federal judicial superintendence of state action or inaction; but judicial review of Congress' failure to call an article V convention directly involves the federal courts in an effort to force its co-equal branch of the Government to perform a duty exclusively entrusted to it by the Constitution.[65]

How do current legislators react to the power of Congress to call a national constitutional convention? Seventy-four per cent of the 1,589 respondents favored the mandatory clause requiring Congress to initiate a convention call. The basic rationale suggested was the prohibiting of Congress of becoming completely dominant in the amending process. Allowing Congress to debate the need as indicated by the petitions would unnecessarily complicate the task of retaining the sufficient number of [59]1 ANNALS OF CONG. 249 (1834). Five months earlier, a letter from Madison indicated that "if two-thirds of the States apply for one, Congress cannot refuse to call it . . . ." Letter from James Madison to Mr. Eve, Jan. 2, 1789, in 5 A DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION 141 (1905).

---

[61]Cuvillier, Shall We Revise the Constitution, 77 FORUM 323 (1927); Packard, Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process, 45 A.B.A.J. 161 (1959); Packard, Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program, 30 CHI-KENT L. REV. 128 (1952); Tuller, A Convention to Amend the Constitution, 193 N. AM. REV. 379, 379-81 (1911).

[62]C. BRICKFIELD, supra note 22, at 27; Bonfield, supra note 42, at 672-73.

[63]369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[64]376 U.S. 1 (1964).

[65]Bonfield, supra note 42, at 673.

petitions. The "contemporaneousness" of the petitions would be brought into question. A typical legislator response was, "the 'shall' in article V stipulates precisely that—Congress must act, and unless it does, the States are relegated to complete subservience in the amending process."

Can State Legislative Petitions Control the Subject Matter Considered by the Constitutional Convention?

Basically, the question is whether the convention ought to be viewed as a premier assembly of the people possessing "conventional sovereignty," or whether the states can stipulate the subject area or areas of discussion. Article V permits the following: "The Congress, whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments . . . ."[56] Professor Charles Black maintains that:

> [t]he process of "proposal" by Congress contained in the first alternative of Article V, obviously includes the process of plenary deliberation upon the whole problem to which the amendment is to address itself. It entails choice among the whole range of alternatives as to substance and wording. It is "proposal" in the most fully substantial sense, where the proposer controls and works out the content and form of the proposition. It is very doubtful whether the same word two lines later, in the description of the second alternative, ought to be taken to denote a mechanical take-it or leave-it process."[57]

Arthur E. Bonfield supports this position by claiming that the constitutional convention would necessarily have the ability to propose amendments as solutions to the basic subject area. He categorically rejects the recent resolutions suggested by the Council of State Governments and adopted by several states because:

> the resolutions in issue (the resolutions calling Congress to establish a convention for specific reasons) really call for a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove in a mechanical way the text of specific amendments that have already been "proposed" elsewhere. In this sense, the proponents of these resolutions seek to make the "Convention" part of the ratifying process, rather than part of the deliberative process for "proposing" constitutional amendment.[58]

---

[56]U.S. CONST. art. V. (emphasis added).
[57]Black, supra note 34, at 962.
[58]Bonfield, supra note 42, at 662-63.

Allowing the convention to select the most acceptable format of amendment to be voted on by the legislatures or conventions in the various states, would give the constitutional convention a propitious opportunity to conduct deliberations on the proposal.

Our survey data appeared to support contrary positions. A substantial 77 per cent claimed the state applications would control the particular subjects discussed at the convention. Congress would only summon the convention for a particular time and location and would make but one limitation on the convention—a perfunctory statement of what subject the state legislators wanted considered. A total of 1,334 legislators (84 per cent) supported the single amendment convention, which suggests they viewed the convention as a ratifying rather than a deliberative body. There was a general fear expressed (83 per cent) that a premier assembly, possessing inherent power to determine subjects of discussion and the power to recommend amendments, would prove detrimental to the constitutional framework. One might assume, as a result of the variety of convention subjects recommended in the survey, that the legislators would prefer having issue clarification before submitting them to a constitutional convention.

IV. Present Demands for a Constitutional Convention

Legislators in the 1969-70 survey had neither reached a general consensus on the need for a convention, nor the topics which might be considered. In addition to the 557 requests for an immediate constitutional convention on apportionment, there were an additional 499 requests for other issue considerations. The following limited list gives some indication of subjects which were specifically recommended by our respondents.

TABLE III

SUBJECTS FOR STATE PETITIONS

1. State rights
2. Changing electoral college
3. Busing students
4. National debt
5. Eavesdropping
6. Income tax limit
7. Outlawing communists
8. Judicial reform
9. Bill of Rights
10. Judges' retirement
11. Prayer in school
12. Right to bear arms
13. Apportionment
14. Fifth amendment
15. Voting age
16. Curbing the Supreme Court powers
17. Military spending
18. Welfare
19. Law and order
20. Education and local control
21. Presidential powers
22. Item veto for president
23. Rights of white race
24. Federal grants
25. Executive department power
26. General constitutional review

Though the foregoing list is inconclusive and represents a minute proportion of potential state legislative respondents, the data does render an indication of potential convention subjects.

It is not inconceivable that such topics as "electoral college revision' might evoke sufficient support that the nation would be confronted with chaotic imbroglio. One state legislator, with fifteen years experience, expressed the following sentiment regarding the ease with which the requisite number of petitions might be secured:

> It is possible that with pressure from such groups as the Council of State Governments, plus a well planned drive to have each state introduce and consider a particular petition, that within four years there would be more than ample requests for a convention.

Though there may be sufficient number of legislators who advocate numerous changes, the intensity and intention of those supporters may be questioned. One legislator, reflecting the apparent fear of an open constitutional convention, made this statement:

> I have talked with many of my colleagues who were also frightened that a convention may completely undo the fundamental principles of our constitution. Many of them voted to have Congress call a convention, not because they wanted one necessarily, but because they wanted Congress to know how the legislators felt. From now on we will not petition for a convention, but simply urge the Congress to propose an amendment about a specific subject. This way, we know that there will be only one amendment, which we here in the states can accept or reject.

This statement does have some empirical support. Nearly three-fourths of all petitions seek constitutional revision, but not for the convention process.

Our survey responses reveal a wide range of attitudes, many of them expressing distrust of the convention, while others anticipate some significant results from the convening of a national constitutional convention:

> I think that each state should take two consecutive sessions and consider major areas and then transmit their actions to the Congress.

> I believe that we need to have a public referendum, requiring at least two thirds of those voting in the last election, before the state legislature considers the possibility of adopting a constitutional petition.

I see no real threat in conducting a constitutional convention, because all of its proposals have to be accepted by the States.

My colleagues, representing one of the largest states, feel that there ought to be a continuous constitutional convention. Each section of the constitution would receive a thorough hearing throughout the country during one year's time, after which any new amendment proposals would be voted on in convention and dispatched to the state legislatures for their consideration.

It would be possible for the Congress to actually solve many of the problem areas which are bothering the state legislatures. A convention might open Pandora's box.

V. Conclusion

Many people have argued that the convention process of amending the Constitution is an anomaly in the law. Nevertheless, state legislatures continue to petition Congress for establishment of conventions. Fifteen state legislatures had resolutions pending which called for a convention on the eighteen-year-old vote issue. The Ninety-second Congress recently adopted, and the states ratified, an amendment directed to this subject. With the pre-emptive action by Congress, the unused originating power of the state legislature remains to be tested. Pertinent legislation, giving clarification of the state petition and convention processes, has been explored in the Senate; yet, no decision has been concluded.

Any projections on the future direction of and the number of state petitions must certainly consider three basic factors: the intensity of the issue resulting in reaction by the state legislatures; the extent of organized pressure group activity throughout the country; and, the attitude of Congress toward the issue. Speculations on potential areas giving rise to numerous state petitions might include presidential powers and judicial review, though nearly all issues appearing in Table III could be ameliorated by legislative processes or by the first amendment procedure.

The four basic questions discussed in the preceeding pages deserve a final note. It would appear that a federal law requiring an identical form of petition and process is essential to eliminate the present state legislative application confusion. States have failed to initiate procedures achieving uniformity in petitions and processes and the outlook for any action seems negligible. The question of petition duration appears to be self-liquidating as more states adopt the philosophy of requiring two successive legislatures to give tacit or implied sanction to a petition. Because of the increasing tendency of Congress to give greater credence to public attitudes in the past five years, it appears that Congress would only in an unusual circumstance refuse to call a constitutional convention. An initial congressional response would most likely be in the form of an amendment for ratification by the states. Should the Congress establish a constitutional convention, state legislatures would undoubtedly conduct the proceedings as if the convention were merely a ratifying body rather than a deliberative structure. This attitude, plus the lack of federal laws governing the total petition and convention process, appears to leave the entire initiative of the indeterminate second amendment procedure in the realm of state control. Though the apportionment issue aroused public attention to the amendment question, it will require an additional highly volatile issue to provide the catalytic action necessary for resolution of the constitutional convention problem.

University of Florida Law Review

VOLUME XXVI FALL 1973 NUMBER 1

A LIMITED FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

ROBERT M. RHODES*

Article V of the United States Constitution provides that constitutional amendments may be initated in two ways – by two-thirds of both houses of Congress or by a convention called by Congress at the request of two-thirds of the state legislatures.[1] The second initiation option was provided to afford states an opportunity to bypass congressional refusal to originate amendments of significant state and national concern.[2] Although the architects of the Constitution evidently viewed the two methods as equivalent alternatives, initiation through state legislative application has never been accomplished; each of the twenty-six ratified amendments has been proposed by Congress.[3] As a result of this historical preference, little precedent exists relating to state initiation of amendments.[4]

---

*A.B., 1964, J.D. 1968, University of California (Berkeley); M.P.A. 1973, Harvard University; Executive Assistant to the Speaker of the Florida House of Representatives, 1970-1972.

1. The full text of article V reads: "The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate."

2. "The founders included the convention alternative in the amending article to enable the states to initiate constitutional reform in the event the national legislature refused to do so." Ervin, Proposed Legislation To Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875, 885 (1968).

3. Between 1788 and October 1971 the states submitted a total of 304 applications for a constitutional convention. The following subjects have received the support of at least ten states: reapportionment (33), 1957-1969; direct election of Senators (31), 1893-1911; limitation of federal taking power (28), 1939-1960; prohibition of polygamy (27), 1906-1916; general constitutional revision (22), 1788-1929; and return portion of federal taxes to states (15), 1965-1971. 117 CONG. REC. 16,519 (1971). Subsequent to this report by Senator Ervin, four additional states submitted revenue sharing applications. See note 6 infra.

4. Responding to the lack of clarity concerning article V convention procedures, Senator Ervin introduced S. 2307 in the 90th Cong., 1st Sess. Ervin, supra note 2, at 875. See Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967) [hereinafter cited as 1967 Hearings]. The bill was revised and reintroduced in the 91st Cong., 1st Sess. as S. 623. The Subcommittee reported

The paucity of understanding concerning the unused article V convention procedure became apparent when national organizations representing state legislators joined forces in 1970 to prod congressional action on federal revenue sharing.[5] Pursuant to article V, a united effort was commenced to secure applications from thirty-four states requesting Congress to convene a constitutional convention dealing solely with revenue sharing. Thirteen states had enacted a model application,[6] or a similar version, by the time revenue sharing was passed into law.[7]

The most perplexing of the several questions raised by the revenue sharing convention campaign was whether a convention created by state application may be limited to a single subject or whether such a convention must open the entire Constitution to revision. The authority of the states and Congress to impose limitations on an article V convention is not evident through a literal construction of the article's language.[8] Moreover, the Supreme Court has been noticeably silent regarding questions raised by the amendment process.[9] The convention route has been useful in the past,[10] however, and it is

---

S. 623 to the full Committee on June 19, 1960, but no action was taken by the Judiciary Committee. The legislation was reintroduced in the 92d Congress on Jan. 26, 1971, as S. 215 [hereinafter cited as Ervin Bill]. On April 27, 1971, the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers reported the measure to the full Committee on the Judiciary. On July 31, 1971, the Committee reported S. 215 to the Senate with an accompanying report, S. REP. No. 92-336, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971) [hereinafter cited as 1971 REPORT]. S. 215 passed the Senate on Oct. 19, 1971, 117 CONG. REC. 16,569 (1971). However, it received no action by the House Judiciary Committee during the 92d Congress. The bill has been reintroduced in the 93d Congress as S. 1272, sponsored by Senators Ervin and Brock.

5. These organizations were the National Legislative Conference, the National Society of State Legislators, and the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders.

6. States that applied to Congress for a convention on revenue sharing during this campaign were: Arizona, Delaware, Florida, Iowa, Massachusetts, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, and West Virginia. Louisiana passed the model application with slight variations.

7. The State and Local Fiscal Assistance Act of 1972, Pub. L. No. 92-512, was enacted by the House on October 12, 1972, and by the Senate on Oct. 13, 1972.

8. Article V states that Congress shall call "a Convention for proposing Amendments." If these words are literally construed, it might be argued that a convention could not create an entirely new instrument to supersede the present Constitution, since its work would be confined to proposing amendments. Nevertheless, the convention could propose the equivalent of a new Constitution by a series of separate amendments. See C. BRICKFIELD, PROBLEMS RELATING TO A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. (Comm. Print 1957) [hereinafter cited as BRICKFIELD, 1957]. But cf. Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 83 YALE L.J. 196 (1972): "It is my contention that Article V, properly construed, refers, in the phrase 'a Convention for proposing Amendments,' to a convention for proposing such amendments as to that convention seem suitable for being proposed."

9. It has been suggested that many of the significant questions raised by article V will not be resolvable by the courts. See L. ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 7-36 (1942); Dowling, Clarifying the Amending Process, 1 WASH. & LEE L. REV. 215 (1940); Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067 (1957). In Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), the Supreme Court held that the effectiveness of a state's ratification of a proposed amendment, which it had previously rejected, and the period of time within which a state could validly ratify a proposed amend-clear from the revenue sharing campaign that the limitation issue must be clarified before legislatures will confidently employ their constitutional prerogative to initiate amendments.[11]

This article will examine the limitation issue, initially analyzing the legislative history of article V. Additionally, the practical effects of the framers' decision to provide both the national and state legislatures an opportunity to initiate federal constitutional change will be examined.

History of the Amendment Process at the 1787 Constitutional Convention

The Virginia Plan, consisting of fifteen resolutions, was presented to the convention delegates by Edmund Randolph on May 29. Resolution thirteen dealt directly with amendments:[12]

> 13. Resolved that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of the Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto.

Randolph's resolution was considered by the Commitee of the Whole on June 5 in a discussion focusing on the proposition "that provision ought to be made for [hereafter] amending the system now to be established, without requiring ment were non-justiciable political questions within the exclusive determination of Congress. Strong dicta in a concurring opinion by Justice Black suggests that all questions arising in the amendment process may be non-justiciable: "Undivided control of [the amending] process has been given by the article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is 'political' in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point." Id. at 459 (concurring opinion). However, there is evidence from several cases that some of the questions arising in the amendment process can be settled by the judiciary. Compare Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922); Dillen v. Glass, 250 U.S. 368 (1921); National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920); Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920). See also Trombatta v. Florida, 353 F. Supp. 575 (M.D. Fla. 1973), wherein the court held article 10, §1 of the Florida constitution unconstitutional under article V of the United States Constitution. The Florida article provided that the state legislature could not take action on any proposed amendment to the United States Constitution unless a majority of the members thereof were elected after the proposed federal amendment is submitted for state ratification.

---

10. "The campaign for direct election of Senators was stymied for decades by the understandable reluctance of the Senate to propose an amendment that jeopardized the tenure of many of its members. Frustrated by the Senate, the reform movement shifted to the States, and a series of petitions seeking to invoke the convention process were submitted to Congress. Rather than risk its fate at the hands of a convention, the Senate then relented and approved the proposed amendment, which was speedily ratified." 1971 Report, supra note 4, at 6.

11. Regarding the introduction of S. 215, Senator Ervin has commented: "Most important, there is no law on the books that would confine a convention to a specific amendment. If we are to avoid the possibility of a runaway convention and a constitutional crisis, I believe it is imperative that orderly procedures be established for the conduct of a constitutional convention." 117 Cong. Rec. 16,510 (1971).

12. 1 M. Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, at 22 (1911) [hereinafter cited as Records].

the assent of the National Legislature."[13] Although Pinckney "doubted the propriety or necessity of it,"[14] Gerry favored the resolution and expressed the view that: "The novelty and difficulty of the experiment requires periodical revision. The prospect of such a revision would also give intermediate stability to the Government." Gerry further noted that "nothing had yet happened in the States where this provision existed to prove its impropriety."[15] Nevertheless, further consideration of the proposition was postponed.[16]

On June 11 Randolph's resolution was again considered by the Convention. Madison reports that "several members did not see the necessity of the [Resolution] at all, nor the propriety of making the comment of the National Legislature unnecessary."[17] Colonel Mason, however, urged the adoption of such a provision:[18]

> The plan now to be formed will certainly be defective, as the Confederation has been found on trial to be. Amendments therefore will be necessary and it will be better to provide for them, in an easy, regular and Constitutional way than to trust to chance and violence. It would be improper to require the consent of the National Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account.

The Committee of the Whole failed to accept the last portion of Mason's argument, but supported the proposition "that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of the Union, whensoever it seems necessary."[19]

Late in July the policy conclusions reached during the early sessions were submitted to a drafting committee known as the "Committee of Detail."[20]

---

13. Id. at 121.

14. Id. at 121-22.

15. Id. Provisions for amending the colonial constitutions were incorporated into the charters of eight colonies. See S. FISHER, THE EVOLUTION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 178-80 (1910). In Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina use of the amendment process was reserved to the legislature. In Georgia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Vermont amendments were to be made by conventions. Both of these methods were joined in article V. See BRICKFIELD, 1957, supra note 8, at 2.

16. Seven states voted to postpone consideration; three voted to debate the amendment process immediately. RECORDS, supra note 12, at 202.

17. Id. at 202-03.

18. Id. Article XIII of the Articles of Confederation authorized amendment only upon the assent of Congress and the legislatures of all the states. 1 DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS ON THE ADOPTION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION AS RECOMMENDED AT THE GENERAL CONVENTION AT PHILADELPHIA IN 1787, at 84 (J. Elliot ed., reissue 1907) [hereinafter cited as DEBATES].

19. RECORDS, supra note 12, at 203.

20. 2 M. FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, 97 (1911) [hereinafter cited as 2 RECORDS]. John Rutledge of South Carolina was designated chairman and Edmund Randolph, James Wilson, Oliver Ellsworth, and Nathaniel Gorham were elected to the Committee.

Article XIX of the Committee draft presented to the Convention on August 6 and adopted without amendment on August 30,[21] provided:[22]

> On application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the states in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose.

Careful consideration should be given the language of this article. Although some controversy existed concerning Congress' role in the amendment process,[23] the development of a specific amendment procedure was left to the Committee of Detail. Article XIX embodied a compromise between those delegates favoring state initiation of amendments, unfettered by the National Legislature, and those members wishing to preserve some national role in the amendment process. Hence, the draft enabled the states to apply for "an amendment" to the Constitution, and mandated Congress to assemble a convention "for that purpose." Of significance is the clause "for that purpose," which directly modifies "Convention." If two-thirds of the states apply for an amendment, article XIX clearly mandates that a convention called by Congress pursuant to such applications must be limited to the purpose or general subject matter contained in the state applications. Moreover, by employing the specific language "an amendment," the draftsmen of the Constitution demonstrated a clear intention to enable state legislatures to request a convention for consideration of limited constitutional change. Such intent was not modified by subsequent Convention action.

On September 10 Gerry moved to reconsider the Convention's adoption of article XIX. Since the Constitution was to be paramount to state constitutions Gerry was concerned with the possibility that "two thirds of the States may obtain a Convention, a majority of which can bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the state constitutions altogether."[24] Hamilton seconded Gerry's motion, but with a different view in mind. "It had been wished by many and was much to have been desired," Hamilton observed, "that an easier mode for introducing amendments had been provided by the articles of confederation."[25] Hence, Hamilton contended:[26]

---

21. Id. at 188 (emphasis added).

22. When the Convention took up article XIX on August 30, Gouverneur Morris suggested "that the Legislatures should be left at liberty to call a Convention, whenever they please." However, no delegate support was forthcoming for this concept and the article was adopted in the form proposed by the Committee on Detail. Id. at 468.

23. RECORDS, supra note 12, at 22, 121.

24. 2 RECORDS, supra note 20, at 557-58.

25. Id. See also RECORDS, supra note 12, at 121.

26. 2 RECORDS, supra note 20, at 557-58 (emphasis added). Madison joined the argument and attacked the "vagueness of the terms" previously adopted by the Convention. "How was a Convention to be formed? By what rule decide? What would be the force of its act?" queried Madison. Id. Substantive responses to these questions are provided in the Ervin Bill, supra note 4.

> It was equally desirable now that an easy mode should be established for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new system. The mode proposed was not adequate. The State Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers — the National Legislature will be the first to perceive and will be the most sensible to the necessity of amendments, and ought also to be empowered, whenever two thirds of each branch should concur, to call a Convention. . . .

Gerry's motion to reconsider carried[27] and, following several proposed amendments relating to granting the National Legislature initiating power,[28] Madison, seconded by Hamilton, proposed a substitute for the entire articles:[29]

> The Legislature of the United States whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the United States.

The Madison-Hamilton compromise was adopted by the Convention, 9-1.[30]

Significantly, the Madison-Hamilton proposal did not attempt to limit or restrict in any manner the power of state legislatures to initiate particular amendments. Legislatures clearly were granted such authority under the originally adopted article XIX. Hamilton was concerned only with granting the National Legislature amendment parity with the state legislatures so as to preserve the federal-state balance of power; hence, his argument that the National Legislature "ought also to be empowered . . . to call a convention."[31] Scrutiny of convention debate and the legislative antecedents of article V thus

---

27. The vote was 9-1. Only New Jersey voted to retain the language adopted on August 30. 2 RECORDS, supra note 20, at 557-58.

28. Sherman, seconded by Gerry, moved to add to the article the words: "[O]r the Legislature may propose amendments to the several States for their approbation but no amendments shall be binding until consented to by the several States." Wilson offered a motion to make consent of two-thirds of the states sufficient, which was rejected 5-6. A later motion to permit three-fourths of the states to make an amendment effective was adopted without dissent. Id.

29. Id. at 559.

30. Id. The single "no" vote was Delaware. See Kurland, Article V and the Amending Process, in D. BOORSTIN, AN AMERICAN PRIMER 130 (1966): "The nature of the political compromises that resulted from the 1787 Convention was reason for those present not to tolerate a ready method of undoing what they had done. Article V, like most of the important provisions of the Constitution, must be attributed more to the prevailing spirit of compromise that dominated the Convention than to dedication to principle." See also HOUSE COMM. ON JUDICIARY, PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATION FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE A CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATION ON TAX RATES, 82d Cong., 2d Sess. 4 (1952) [hereinafter cited as 1952 REPORT].

31. 2 RECORDS, supra note 20, at 557-58.

reveals that Madison and Hamilton viewed the two modes of initiating amendments as equivalent alternatives and that they envisioned a process whereby both the state and National Legislatures would be able to apply to Congress for specific constitutional amendments.[32]

On September 15 the Convention considered the report of the Committee on Style, which had been appointed "to revise and place the several parts" approved by the Convention "under their proper heads."[33] The Committee integrated former article XIX, as amended, into a new article V. Initially, Gouverneur Morris moved to amend article V so as to require a convention on application of two-thirds of the states.[34] The previously adopted language of the Madison-Hamilton proposal would have required the states to petition Congress, which would presumably propose and develop specific amendments. Morris' proposal would enable two-thirds of the states to require Congress to call a convention to propose amendments. Madison "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the states as to call a convention on the like application."[35] Nevertheless, he raised no objection to the Morris motion, which was adopted unanimously.[36]

Finally, and significantly, two further acts of the delegates merit consideration. Sherman moved to amend article V in a manner so as "to leave future conventions to act like the present Convention, according to circumstances."[37] Additionally, Randolph moved "that amendments to the plan might be offered by the State Conventions, which should be submitted to and finally decided on by another general Convention."[38] Both of these proposals were rejected by the 1787 Convention. Opposing the motions, Pinckney reflected the general feeling of the delegates: "The Deputies to a second Convention coming together under the discordant impressions of their Constituents, will never agree. Conventions are serious things, and ought not be repeated . . . ."[39] All states rejected the Sherman and Randolph proposals, thus evincing a definite desire not to open the Constitution to general revision in the future. Such action by the delegates reflects their concern that general conventions are indeed "serious things, and ought not to be repeated" whenever a particular amendment is desired. Hence, they insured that the Constitution, through article V, provided

---

32. The Senate Judiciary Committee has concluded that the framers "refrained from any evaluation or differentiation of the two procedures for amendment incorporated into Article V; they tended to view the convention merely as an alternative safeguard available to the States whenever Congress ceased to be responsive to popular will and persisted in a refusal to originate and submit constitutional amendments for ratification." 1971 RECORDS, supra note 4, at 4.

33. 2 RECORDS, supra note 20, at 554.

34. Id. at 629.

35. Id. (emphasis added).

36. Id.

37. Id.

38. Id. at 631. Randolph and Mason were concerned that: "This Constitution had been formed without the knowledge or idea of the people. A second Convention will know more of the sense of the people, and be able to provide a system more consonant to it." Id. at 631-32.

39. Id.

both Congress and the states with a constitutional mechanism to correct particular and specific constitutional infirmities. Such action effectively obviated the need for frequent general conventions, which might vitiate the fruits of the delegates' labor during the summer of 1787.

A General Convention — Argument and Rebuttal

Dual Purpose Argument

Opponents of a limited federal constitutional convention[40] have suggested that by providing two different processes for originating amendments, the framers of article V contemplated different responses to different problems. It is therefore contended that, since one process clearly contemplates congressional initiation of particular amendments, the alternative process may be used by the states only to initiate a call for a general constitutional convention.[41]

Certainly the final language of article V lacks clarity on this point.[42] No specific power is explicitly granted the legislatures to initiate individual amendments; however, it is suggested that the states may petition Congress to convene a limited federal constitutional convention.[43] Initially, three points should be noted. First, if the framers intended that the legislatures should be able to request only a general convention, would they not have explicitly provided for such authority, instead of leaving it to inference?[44] Second, the dual purpose argument presumes the framers intended that the convention called

---

40. See, e.g., Black, supra note 8, at 201: "Nothing 'desirable or practical' is to be served by the alternative route, except a possible need . . . . to take care of a general dissatisfaction with the national government, or a breakdown thereof." See also Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 Ill. L. Rev. 782, 795 (1927). But cf., Child, Revolutionary Amendments to the Constitution, 10 Constitutional Rev. 27 (1926), quoted in Brickfield, 1957, supra note 8, at 19: "Conventions must be limited to specific subject matter and under no circumstances could it be given general revisionary powers . . . ."

41. Convention must be general in scope and a state application calling for a specific amendment can have no binding or legal effect on a convention. Wheeler, supra note 40, at 795.

42. See note 8 supra.

43. Ervin Bill, supra note 4, §2, authorizes state legislatures to request the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more amendments to the Constitution. Questions concerning the adoption of a state resolution are to be determined solely by Congress (§3(b)). State applications remain in effect seven years (§5(a)). This approach is consistent with a 1957 draft prepared by Dr. Brickfield for the House Committee on the Judiciary, which authorizes state legislatures to request either a general convention or a convention to propose specific amendments. Brickfield, 1957, supra note 8, at 27-28.

44. State constitutions have explicitly reserved to the voters the power to convene a general constitutional convention to consider a revision of the entire constitution. E.g., Fla. Const. art. XI, §4(a). Prior constitutions of this state enabled the legislature to call a convention to propose amendments or to propose an entirely new constitution. Fla. Const. art. XIV, §§1-3 (1838, 1861, 1865). See also Alas. Const. art. XIII, §4: "Constitutional Conventions shall have plenary power to amend or revise the constitution, subject only to ratification by the people. No call for a constitutional convention shall limit these powers of the convention." But cf. Nev. Const. art. 16, §2; N.Y. Const. art. 19, §1; Tenn. Const. art. 16, §3.

by the states could conceivably have no relationship to the subject that originally motivated the applications.[45] Finally, if the states may initiate a call for only a general convention, must it follow that Congress may only propose individual amendments and be precluded from proposing a general convention? Such an unreasonable conclusion must necessarily be drawn from the premise offered by the dual purpose argument, which, as will be shown, is totally unsupported by convention action and debate, as well as the framers' intent supplied in The Federalist Papers.

The history of the 1787 Convention provides helpful insight as to the legislative compromise that ultimately became article V. As previously noted, the framers were concerned with developing a reasonable procedure for amending the Constitution, which at the same time would be responsive to popular will and would secure a stable governmental foundation. Meeting only four years after the end of the Revolutionary War, the delegates were understandably sensitive to the possibility that rights and powers delegated in the Constitution might need to be withdrawn or rearranged in light of the exigencies of future years. Experience under the Articles of Confederation had revealed the undesirability of binding the new government to an amendatory process requiring consent of every state.[46] Hence, the original Virginia Plan recognized the necessity for, in Colonel Mason's words, "an easy, regular, and Constitutional" amendatory process.[47] The proposal of the Committee on Detail adopted by the Convention on August 30, explicitly empowered the state legislatures to apply to Congress for "an amendment" to the Constitution. The Madison-Hamilton substitute, which provided the basic article V framework, skillfully meshed the philosophies of states rights supporters and staunch centralists by providing dual initiation procedures. The compromise met the objections raised by both camps: (1) that the national government would be loathe to correct its own failings and that such abuses could only be constitutionally remedied by state initiative; and (2) that improprieties in the states and deficiencies in national power would most likely be corrected only through initiative taken by the National Legislature. Hence, the Madison-Hamilton substitute was not an attempt to limit in any manner the power of state legislatures to initiate particular amendments. The substitute merely sought to grant the National Legislature initiation parity with state legislatures. The two amendment processes, therefore, must be viewed as equal alternatives.[48] The reports of the Convention do not rebut this conclusion and provide no indication that the framers intended for state legislatures to concern themselves only with total constitutional revision, while Congress alone would initiate specific 45: See text accompanying notes 50-53 infra for a more intensive consideration.

---

46. See text accompanying note 18 supra. Charles Pinckney of South Carolina expressed the general dissatisfaction with the unanimous consent requirement for amendments by stating: "It is to this unanimous consent the depressed situation of the union is undoubtedly owing." 3 M. FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 601 (1911).

47. RECORDS, supra note 12, at 202-03.

48. HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 86TH CONG., 1ST SESS., STATE APPLICATIONS ASKING CONGRESS TO CALL A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 7 (Comm. Print 1959) [hereinafter cited as STATE APPLICATIONS (1959)].

amendments. In addition, the Convention's September 15 vote to reject proposals that would have required general national convention consideration of proposed amendments further reveals the delegates' reasonable intention that a general convention "ought not to be repeated" whenever a particular amendment is desired.

This interpretation is further supported by reference to article V in The Federalist Papers. In Federalist, No. 43, Madison explained:[49]

> That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the General and the state Governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other.

Consistent with the Convention debate, Madison's commentary clearly draws no distinction between the prerogatives of the state and national governments to originate "an amendment of errors," as revealed through experience with the Constitution over a period of time.[50]

Moreover, Hamilton, in the 85th Federalist, convincingly supported the authority of state legislatures, as well as the Congress, to originate specific amendments:[51]

> Every amendment to the Constitution, if once established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise, in relation to any other point—no giving or taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently, whenever nine, or rather ten states, were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place.

Hamilton specifically emphasized the desirability of isolating support for each amendment as a safeguard against logrolling through a general revision of the Constitution. Careful attention, therefore, must be given the language "single proposition," "singly," and "particular amendment." Again, any dis-

---

49. As quoted in 1971 REPORT, supra note 4, at 8 (emphasis added).

50. Judge Story, commenting on the framers' intent as to the amendment process has observed: "It was obvious, too, that the means of amendment might avert, the most serious perils to which confederated republics are liable and by which all have hitherto been shipwrecked. . . . They knew the price and jealousy of state power in confederacies; and they wished to disarm them of their potency, by providing a safe means to break the force . . . which would, from time to time . . . be aimed at the Constitution. They believed that the power of amendment was . . . the safety-valve to let off all temporary effervescences and excitements; and the real effective instrument to control and adjust the movements of the machinery when out of order or in danger of self-destruction." 2 J. STORY, COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 599 (1891).

51. As quoted in 1971 REPORT, supra note 4, at 8 (emphasis added).

tinction between "single" amendments originating with the states and those derived from Congress is noticeably absent.

In addition, as a practical matter, tying state applications exclusively to a call for a wide-open convention would effectively destroy the legislatures' power to propose amendments.[52] Given the sole option of petitioning Congress for a general convention, it is unrealistic to expect states to exercise article V powers.[53] Thus barring massive national discontent with the existing constitutional framework, the power of state legislatures to originate the "amendment of errors" contemplated by Madison would effectively be vitiated if every state petition for a specific amendment were interpreted as a request for a general convention.

Finally, Congress has long recognized the prerogative of states to petition for a single purpose convention or for a general convention. Congress has treated as substantively separate, rather than cumulative, the over 300 state requests for a convention.[54] To treat these diverse requests for limited reformation as requests for general revision would be illogical and contrary to the stated desires of the petitioning states. For example, article V would be reduced to an absurdity if Congress were forced to call a general convention upon the application of ten states seeking to outlaw busing, seven states desiring to modify the income tax, eleven states wanting revenue sharing, and six states supporting a reversal of federal reapportionment policy. If cumulative treatment had been intended, a general convention is clearly long overdue. Fortunately, Congress has concluded that a convention shall be assembled only when the petitions dealing with a particular subject are received from two-thirds of the states.

1787 Convention Precedent Argument

Arguably, since the original 1787 Convention was not limited to the specific subject areas that were ostensibly the reasons for convocation, precedent for wide-open article V conventions does exist. However, any possible precedential value is weakened by the fact that the 1787 Convention was called to amend the Articles of Confederation, which lacked reasonable and effective provisions for amendment,[55] whereas the Constitution does not suffer from such infirmity.

Additionally, although the 1787 Convention's actions were clearly ultra vires and beyond the scope of the Convention call, Congress ratified the Con-

---

52. BRICKFIELD, 1957, supra note 8, at 20: "The convention method . . . would be reduced to an unworkable absurdity both from the standpoint of the states having a voice in the convention process and from the magnitude of the operation and its ultimate effect on our government, if only general conventions were permissible under Article V."

53. Kauper, The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations, 66 MICH. L. REV. 912 (1968).

54. See 117 CONG. REC. 16,519 (1971) (remarks of Senator Ervin); STATE APPLICATIONS (1959), supra note 48, at 7.

55. The Federal Constitutional Convention called by the Congress of the Confederation under the Articles was "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation." Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, H.R. Doc. No. 398, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. 46 (1927).

vention's action and transmitted the proposals to the states. At no time did the Convention seek to bypass or overrule the Congress.[56] There is, therefore, precedent for submitting the work product of the Convention to congressional scrutiny before transmittal to the states, allowing Congress to disapprove convention proposals that vary from the general subject matter outlined in the convention call.[57] In addition, if a convention today proposed amendments on subjects other than those specified in the call, those proposals and any implementing legislation enacted pursuant thereto could arguably be deemed unconstitutional under article V. Hence, the Constitution provides a possible limitation on a runaway convention through the courts and a definite limitation through the ratification process that were not formally available under the Articles of Confederation.

Constitutional Sovereignty Argument

An additional stance espoused by general convention proponents suggests that a constitutional convention is a "premier assembly" of the people, charged by the people with the duty of framing, amending, or revising a constitution. For such purposes the convention is vested with the total sovereign power of the citizens and is therefore supreme to all other branches of government.[58] From this premise, it is argued that neither Congress nor the states may limit the scope of the convention's deliberations.[59] This argument initially implies

---

56. J. Beck, The Constitution of the United States: Yesterday, Today — and Tomorrow? 173 (1924), quoted in Brickfield, 1957, supra note 8, at 17. Jameson has drawn a useful distinction between "revolutionary" and "constitutional" conventions. Revolutionary conventions consist of bodies that in time of crisis assume or are provisionally delegated the functions of government. Hence, they either supplant or supplement the existing government. In contrast, constitutional conventions are creatures of the government's fundamental law and therefore "ancillary and subservient and not hostile and paramount" to the existing government. J. Jameson, Constitutional Conventions 6, 10 (4th ed. 1867). A convention convened pursuant to article V clearly would be of the constitutional type and subservient to the strictures and limitations placed upon it in the convocation call. See also Dennis v. United States, 183 F.2d 201 (2d Cir. 1950), aff'd, 341 U.S. 404 (1951), wherein Judge Learned Hand rejected the theory that a convention once convened may disregard directions and article V procedures and adopt extra legal means to establish a new Constitution. The Supreme Court, in affirming, observed that the Constitution can only be changed by peaceful and orderly means. United States v. Dennis, 341 U.S. 494, 501 (1951).

57. Ervin Bill, supra note 4, §10(b), provides that questions concerning the scope of the convention's work are to be determined solely by Congress. Section 11(b)(1) enables Congress to disapprove a proposed amendment on the ground that it pertains to a subject different from that described in the resolution calling the convention. Pursuant to such action, the ultra vires proposal would not be transmitted to the states for ratification. But cf. Note, Amending the Constitution, 85 Harv. L. Rev. 1631 (1972), for a critique of this enforcement mechanism.

58. Brickfield, 1957, supra note 8, at 16; 46 Cong. Rec. 2769 (1911) (remarks of Senator Heyburn). "A constitutional convention even if elected under a congressional mandate that it could deal with only one subject, could run away. After all, it would be a duly created constitutional convention, and it could propose any amendments which it decided it wished to propose, subject to ratification." 113 Cong. Rec. 10,108 (1967) (remarks of Senator Javits).

59. See Livermore v. Waite, 103 Cal. 113, 36 P. 424, 426 (1894); Koehler & Lange v. Hill, that the people cannot, or prefer not to, delegate to a convention a portion of their sovereign power, as opposed to surrendering total sovereignty.[60] No grounds for such an unreasonable conclusion are suggested by the proponents of the sovereignty argument. Moreover, such a contention ignores the fact that a convention is not sui generis – it cannot exist by itself, but must be convened by Congress pursuant to article V.[61] The convention, therefore, exercises no governmental power beyond that granted by congressional call.[62] Further, the product of the convention would not have the force of law until ratified by the requisite number of states, pursuant to article V. A constitutional convention that exceeds the bounds of existing constitutional and statutory provisions must be considered extra-legal and its acts would not alter existing provisions.[63]

Congressional Responsibility To Call a Convention

Given that state legislatures may initiate a call for a limited convention pursuant to article V, the question naturally arises whether Congress must call a convention upon receipt of the requisite number of state applications. A number of commentators have viewed Congress' responsibility in calling a convention as obligatory.[64] For example, Senator Ervin has commented:[65]

> Article V states that Congress "shall" call a convention upon the applications of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. I have absolutely no doubt that the article is peremptory and that the duty is mandatory, leaving no discretion to the Congress to review the wisdom of the state applications. . . . To concede to the Congress any discretion to consider the wisdom and necessity of a particular convention call would in effect destroy the role of the states.

Support for this position is gleaned from Hamilton in Federalist, No. 85:[66]

---

60 Iowa 543, 14 N.W. 738, 751 (1883); Sproule v. Fredericks, 69 Miss. 898, 11 So. 472 (1892); McMullen v. Hodge, 5 Tex. 34, 73, 77 (1849); Loomis v. Jackson, 6 W. Va. 613, 708 (1873).

60. Cf. the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's declaration in Wood's Appeal, 75 Pa. 59, 70 (1874): "The right of the people is absolute in the language of the bill of rights, 'to alter, reform, or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper.' This right being theirs, they may impart so much or so little of it as they deem expedient."

61. See discussion in note 56 supra.

62. See Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 949, 993 (1968); Brickfield, 1957, supra note 8, at 16; Note, The Constitutional Convention, Its Nature and Powers and the Amending Process, 1916 Utah L. Rev. 403, 404.

63. See discussions of Jameson's revolutionary-constitutional convention distinction, note 56 supra. See also discussion of Ervin Bill §11(b)(1), supra note 57.

64. 1952 Report, supra note 30, at 15; Bonfield, supra note 62, at 977; Brickfield, 1957, supra note 8, at 19. For a discussion of a possible ninth amendment remedy if Congress refuses to call a convention upon proper state application, see Ritz, The Original Purpose and Present Utility of the Ninth Amendment, 25 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 17 (1968).

65. Ervin, Proposed Legislation To Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 875, 885 (1968).

66. 1971 Report, supra note 4, at 12 (emphasis added).

> By the fifth article of the plan the Congress will be obliged, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states [which at present amounts to nine] to call a convention for proposing amendments, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof." The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to discretion.

Thus, under constitutional mandate, Congress must assemble a convention when the required two-thirds of the states have submitted petitions.

A Limited Convention

Although little controversy exists regarding Congress' duty to call a convention when article V requirements are satisfied, there is substantial argument concerning congressional authority to restrict the deliberations of a federal constitutional convention.[67] Although without clear legal or historical precedent, it appears that, since Congress must call the convention and since no specifics concerning the nature of the conventions' proceedings are constitutionally provided, Congress is vested with implied power under the necessary and proper clause[68] to establish policy concerning such procedural matters as the time and place of the meeting, the number of delegates, the manner and date of delegate elections, the nature of representation at the convention, as well as voting and adoption procedures.[69] Moreover, given the breadth of the necessary and proper executing authority, it is further suggested that Congress may define and limit the substantive parameters of the convention's work.[70] Such congressional limitation would directly implement the federal constitutional prerogative of the states under article V, and would further enable Congress to execute its article V responsibilities. Congressional restriction would therefore adequately meet the Supreme Court's test in McCulloch v. Maryland that "any means which tended directly to the execution of the constitutional powers of the government, [are] in themselves constitutional."[71]

---

67. See notes 8, 41, 52, 58, 59 supra.

68. U.S. Const. art. I, §8.

69. L. Orfield, The Amending of the Federal Constitution 43-44 (1939); 1952 Report, supra note 30, at 15; Note, 70 Harv. L. Rev., supra note 9, at 1067, 1075-76.

70. See Brickfield, 1957, supra note 8, at 16, 19. "[N]one but the legislature can either prescribe or indicate the purposes for which it [the convention] is to assemble. Accordingly, as we shall see, our legislatures nearly always expressly declare, with more or less precision, those purposes, whether to make a general revision of the Constitution, or to consider specific subjects, accompanying that declaration sometimes with a prohibition to consider other subjects." J. Jameson, supra note 56, at 364.

71. McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 419 (1819). "But we think the sound construction of the constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional." Id. at 421.

Thus, Congress may restrict convention consideration to a single subject, a limited number of subjects, or a total revision of the Constitution.[72] This conclusion requires only that the convention's will must be exercised within the framework set by the act or resolution calling the convention,[73] and does not restrict the convention's freedom to exercise its will and develop specific substantive responses to issues presented.

A more difficult question arises regarding the power of state legislatures to restrict the work of the convention through state application. Although neither the states nor Congress may limit an article V convention to the specific terms of a proposed amendment, the history of article V suggests that Congress has a constitutional duty under article V to reflect the will of the state legislative applications in its convention call. An article V convention should therefore be restricted through the call to proposing amendments dealing with the general subject matter contained in state applications.[74]

---

72. Congress' role in the article V convention process is similar to the role state legislatures play in convening state constitutional conventions. Although the people exercise ultimate control over a state convention, as a practical matter, the legislature plays an effective and controlling role in convening the convention. Specifically, the powers of state conventions may be effectively limited by the terms of the legislative act calling it into existence, if the approval for such limitation is obtained from the people at an election for that purpose. See Bradford v. Shine, 13 Fla. 393, 7 Am. Rep. 239 (1871); Gaines v. O'Connell, 305 Ky. 397, 408, 204 S.W.2d 425, 431 (1947); State v. American Sugar Refining Co., 137 La. 407, 415, 68 So. 742, 745 (1915); Opinion of the Justices, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 573, 575 (1853); State ex rel. Wineman v. Dahl, 6 N.D. 81, 85-86, 68 N.W. 418, 420 (1896); Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 48, 15 Am. Rep. 563, 572-73 (1874); Woods' Appeal, 75 Pa. 59, 69-70 (1874); In re The Constitutional Convention, 55 R.I. 56, 98-99, 178 A. 433, 452-53 (1935); State ex rel. McCready v. Hunt, 9 S.C. (2 Hill) 1, 222-23 (1854); Cummings v. Beeler, 189 Tenn. 151, 171-78, 223 S.W.2d 913, 921-24 (1949); Staples v. Griemer, 183 Va. 613, 622-23, 33 S.E.2d 49, 54-55, 158 A.L.R. 495, 515 (1945). See also 1 T. COOLEY, TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS 84-85 (8th ed. 1927). Sturm reports that during the 31 year period, 1938-1968, there were 23 referenda in 16 states on the question of unlimited conventions and 10 in five states on a limited convention. Referenda on limited convention calls resulted in a higher percentage of public approval than those dealing with unlimited authorizations. Sturm concludes that the limited convention has grown greatly in popularity and the authority of such assemblies has been successfully limited to stated subjects. A. STURM, THIRTY YEARS OF STATE CONSTITUTION MAKING: 1938-1968, 64-67 (1970). See also A. Sturm, State Constitutions, in 19 THE BOOK OF THE STATES: 1972-73, at 10 (1972).

73. STATE APPLICATIONS (1959), supra note 48, at 3-4: "There is little argument concerning the power of the convention to develop specific responses to the problems presented to it. The process of proposing amendments clearly requires convention consideration of a number of possible alternative solutions to a problem before a specific proposal is developed. Hence, development of the specific wording of a proposed amendment should be left to the convention. But cf. Amending the Constitution To Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 36 STATE GOV'T 10 (1963).

74. Ervin Bill, supra note 4, §6(a), provides that if both Houses of Congress determine that the requisite number of states have applied for a convention on the same subject, Congress must convene a convention on that subject. Section 8 restricts the convention's work to the subject or subjects named in the congressional resolution convening the convention. As a further safeguard, delegates would be required to subscribe to an oath to refrain from proposing or voting in favor of any proposed amendment not named in the convention resolution. But cf. Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Con-

This contention, however, has not received universal support. The suggestion has been made that the nature of the right conferred upon state legislatures in requesting Congress to call a convention is nothing more than the right of petition.[75] Moreover, it has been insisted that, since Congress must call the convention and specify the details relative to such convocation, only the National Legislature, in its discretion, may define the convention's agenda.[76] Hence, the assertion that:[77]

> State legislatures . . . have no authority to limit an instrumentality set up under the federal constitution. . . . The right of the legislatures is confined to applying for a convention and any statement of purposes in their petition would be irrelevant as to the scope of powers of the convention.

These arguments lack appreciation of the framers' intent in providing the convention alternative. The drafters included the convention method in the amending article to enable states to initiate constitutional reform if the National Legislature refused to do so.[78] The first version of article V endorsed by the 1787 Convention explicitly provided that a constitutional convention shall be limited by Congress to the subject matter contained in state applications.[79] Subsequent Convention action did not modify such policy. This view is supported by debates in the state ratifying conventions revealing that proponents of the proposed Constitution clearly contemplated that the work of a convention would cohere to state wishes.[80] Moreover, in view of the trend in the states to request only a limited convention, the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives has concluded:[81]

> [T]here would seem to be no logical reason whatsoever for overlooking the language contained in the petitions of the states and forcing a genvention, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1076 (1957) (the convention is morally obligated to restrict its debates to the subject matter set out in the state applications. Nevertheless, Congress may not properly limit the scope of the convention's deliberations through the call).

---

75. Wheeler, supra note 40, at 795.

76. 1952 REPORT, supra note 30, at 15.

77. L. ORFIELD, supra note 69, at 45.

78. "Sir, the most powerful obstacle to the members of Congress betraying the interest of their constituents is the state legislatures themselves, who will be standing bodies of observation, possessing the confidence of the people, jealous of federal encroachments, and armed with every power to check the first essays at treachery." Remarks of Alexander Hamilton, New York State Ratifying Convention, as quoted in 2 DEBATES, supra note 18, at 261.

79. See text accompanying notes 18-23, supra.

80. See remarks of Mr. Adams (Mass.) and Mr. Stillman (Mass.), 2 DEBATES, supra note 18, at 136, 173-74. A similar view is reflected in the editorial by a contemporary advocate of the Constitution, James Sullivan of Massachusetts: "The 5th Article also provides that the states may propose any alterations which they see fit, and that Congress shall take measures for having them carried into effect." Cassius XI, The Massachusetts Gazette, No. 894, Dec. 25, 1787, quoted in P. FORD, ESSAYS ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 45 (1892).

81. 1952 REPORT, supra note 30, at 11-12. In 1931, New York State applied for a convention to repeal the 18th amendment "and no other Article of the Constitution," 75 CONG. REC. 48 (1931).

eral convention upon those states requesting nothing more than a single amendment to the Constitution. A contrary determination would oftentimes be at variance with the very wishes of those States submitting applications to the Congress as well as constitute a very narrow and restrictive interpretation of Article V itself.

Additionally, since article V requires Congress to call a convention only when a consensus exists among two-thirds of the states with regard to the subject of a proposed change, the convention should not be allowed to ignore such a consensus and address problems not contemplated by state applications. Madison, in The Federalist, No. 43, recognized article V as a means to enable the general and state governments to originate "the amendment of errors pointed out by experience."[82] That both the National Legislature and the states may initiate useful alterations suggested by their unique perspectives and experiences is evident. If Congress does not incorporate the consensual desires of the states into the convention call, the experiences of the states would effectively be ignored.

Moreover, Madison expressed concern in this same tract with "that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable."[83] If the general subject matter of the convention were not limited by Congress to the problem agreed upon by at least thirty-four states, the Constitution would indeed "be rendered too mutable." Constitutional change should not be considered by a convention until two-thirds of the states conclude that such change is desirable. If thirty-four states request a convention on a particular subject, and Congress refuses to limit the convention to such subject, the National Legislature would be empowered to convene a convention totally disassociated from the state consensus that served as the constitutional prerequisite for its creation and legitimate action.[84]

Finally, since it would require only a majority vote of Congress to adopt a convention resolution,[85] the National Legislature, if allowed to ignore the will of the states in defining the convention's work, would be able to bypass the article V requirement that two-thirds of both Houses must support a congressionally initiated amendment. Such a process would dilute the two-thirds mandate by subjecting the Constitution to change at the will of only a congressional majority, and would clearly render the Constitution more mutable than intended under the procedures envisioned by the framers.

---

82. As quoted in 1971 REPORT, supra note 4, at 8.

83. Id.

84. See Bonfield, supra note 62, at 992-98.

85. "The voice of the majority decides; for the lex majoris partis is the law of all councils, elections, etc., where not otherwise expressly provided." L. Deschler, JEFFERSON'S MANUAL AND RULES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, H.R. Doc. No. 439, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 252 (1971). Since article V simply provides that Congress shall call a convention, only a majority vote of the Congress is required to convene such a convention. The Ervin Bill, supra note 4, §6(a), provides Congress shall convene a convention by concurrent resolution of both Houses. Since such a resolution is not legislative in nature, it is not sent to the President for approval. L. DESCHLER, supra at 186.

Conclusion

The foregoing analysis reveals that state legislatures may petition Congress to convene a constitutional convention for proposing amendments dealing with a particular subject, several subjects, or general constitutional revision. Congress, by virtue of its necessary and proper clause powers, may define and restrict the work of an article V convention through the convention call. Finally, consistent with the reasonable intent of the framers, Congress is obliged to limit the scope of a convention to the general subject matter or problem at which the state applications are directed. Concomitantly, Congress should not recognize the validity of proposals developed by a convention that exceed congressional strictures reflected in the convention call.

59-609 O - 80 - 40

Harvard Journal of Legislation 127 (1973)

NOTE

LIMITED FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS: IMPLICATIONS OF THE STATE EXPERIENCE

Introduction

Article V of the United States Constitution offers two distinct procedures for constitutional amendment: initiation by two-thirds of each House of Congress and ratification by three-fourths of the states, or a convention called on petition of two-thirds of the states and ratification of its proposals by three-fourths of the states.[1] No constitutional amendment has ever successfully traveled the convention route. Indeed, there has not been a federal constitutional convention since 1787.[2] The convention clause is hardly a "dead letter," however, for there have been numerous efforts to call an article V convention.[3] As recently as 1967, unrest attributable to the Supreme Court's "one man-one vote" decisions of the early 1960's[4] had affected state legislatures to the extent that arguably 32 states — only two short of the required 34 — had petitioned Congress for a constitutional convention.[5]

---

1 The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several states, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . . .

U.S. CONST. art. V.

2 There have been federally called state conventions, however. See text at notes 73-85 infra.

3 See Prager & Milmoe, Table of State Applications for an Article V Convention, in ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, Report of American Bar Association Constitutional Convention Study Committee app. B [hereinafter cited as ABA Report]. The table records over 300 convention applications from state legislatures.

4 Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly, 377 U.S. 713 (1964); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962). Lucas, invalidating an apportionment plan which had been approved and instituting one defeated in a statewide popular referendum, generated particular discontent.

5 See Graham, Efforts to Amend the Constitution on Districts Gain, N.Y. Times, Mar. 18, 1967, at 1, col. 6. For a general background on the effort and its rationale, see Dirksen, The Supreme Court and the People, 66 MICH. L. REV. 837 (1968).

One consequence of this activity was the introduction into Congress of legislation to establish procedures for the calling and holding of a national constitutional convention. The bill, authored by Senator Sam Ervin (D.-N.C.), passed the Senate 84 to 0 in 1971, but died in the House.[6] It was reintroduced in the 93d Congress, and the Senate passed it again in July 1973.[7] The Ervin Bill stimulated renewed interest in constitutional conventions. The American Bar Association soon became involved; in July 1971 it created a Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee to "evaluate the ramifications of the constitutional convention method of initiating amendments."[8]

The Special Committee had much to study, for the vagueness of the Article V convention clause has given constitutional scholars ample opportunity to debate the form, powers, and procedures of a federal convention. In the vacuum created by lack of firm federal precedent, convoluted exegesis and painstaking dissection of the "legislative history" of article V (i.e., The Federalist, and the various Notes on the convention of 1787[9]) have flourished.[10] Madison's objection to the convention mechanism, voiced in 1787, has proven to be prophetic: "difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum, etc., which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided."[11]

Of the many disputes which have arisen in the contemplation of a national convention, none has been so hotly debated as whether or not such a convention can be "limited." Can the petitioning states, or Congress, or both, legitimately restrict the matters to be considered by an article V convention? The question

---

6 117 CONG. REC. 36,808-06 (1971). See also S. REP. NO. 336, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971); 117 CONG. REC. 35,764, 35,988, 36,442, 36,753, 46,642 (1971); Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967).

7 The bill was reintroduced in the Senate as S. 1272, 119 CONG. REC. S5017-19 (daily ed. Mar. 19, 1973); favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee, id. at S12,462 (daily ed. June 29, 1973); and passed by the Senate, id. at S12,728 (daily ed. July 9, 1973).

8 ABA Report, supra note 3, at 2.

9 The Notes are collected in THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787 (M. Farrand ed. 1911) [hereinafter cited as FARRAND].

10 See, e.g., ABA Report, supra note 3, at 13-16; Kauper, The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations, 66 MICH. L. REV. 903 (1968).

11 2 FARRAND, supra note 9, at 630.

clearly is fundamental, for it goes to the very basis of the convention's powers and its relationship to the other organs of government.

On one side in the dispute stand those who would proclaim a convention "the personification of the sovereign people assembled for the discharge of the solemn duty of framing their fundamental law."[12] "The character and extent of a constitution that may be framed by that body is freed from any limitations other than those contained in the Constitution of the United States."[13] In the view of these opponents of limited conventions, a convention ought to be free to consider and propose whatever amendments it desires.

On the other side stand those who would permit the states, Congress, or both to limit the convention, either by forbidding it to discuss specified matters (thereby leaving the convention free to deal with all other subjects at its discretion), or listing those topics which the convention may take up and precluding the consideration of all others. Delegates to a convention, in this view, "are but agents of the people, and are restricted to the exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the law which authorizes their selection and assemblage."[14]

That the issue is at once divisive and critical is demonstrated by the peculiar fact that the Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee unanimously agreed that a national convention could be properly limited "to the subject matter on which the legislatures of two-thirds of the states request a convention,"[15] whereupon the Council of the ABA's Section on Individual Rights and Responsibilities (SIRR) "voted, without dissent, to reject and oppose the basic recommendations"[16] of the Special

---

12 Walker, Myth and Reality in State Constitutional Development, in MAJOR PROBLEMS IN STATE CONSTITUTIONAL REVISION 15 (W. Graves ed. 1960) (denominated a "myth").

13 Livermore v. Waite, 102 Cal. 113, 117, 36 P. 424, 426 (1894) (dicta).

14 Quinlan v. Houston & T.C. Ry., 89 Tex. 356, 376, 34 S.W. 738, 744 (1896).

15 ABA Report, supra note 5, at 11.

16 Letter from Professor Jefferson B. Fordham to the Honorable Judge C. Clyde Atkins, Aug. 17, 1973. The Special Committee's Report was approved unanimously by the ABA House of Delegates at the latter's convention during the summer of 1973, an event attributable more to the absence of its enemies than the depth of its support. In rejecting the Special Committee's Report, the SIRR was disowning its Committee. At least one member of the SIRR — who is also on its Committee on National Constitutional Conventions — has commented that the "fundamental weakness" of the Special Committee's report was "its infirmly supported position that the legislatures applying for the call of a convention could limit convention jurisdiction to one or more specific subjects."[17] Though there never has been an article V convention, this Note suggests that the controversy surrounding limitation of such a body may be resolved, or at least focused, through examination of the state experience with limited conventions.

Conventions have been the preferred instrument for thoroughgoing revision of state constitutions since the Delaware, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts gatherings of the late 1770's. To date there have been approximately 225 state constitutional conventions:[18] New Hampshire has convened the most (15 — until 1964 the New Hampshire constitution could be amended in no other way), while 11 states have convened only one. Four-fifths of the states provide for such conventions in their constitutions, and in the remainder conventions have been held, often with judicial approval.[19] If, as has been claimed, the constitutional convention is one of the original and significant American contributions to democratic political theory,[20] it is the state experience which gives substance to that assertion. It is in the crucible of state legislatures, courts, and ballot boxes that the theoretical bases of the institution have been hammered out, and its relation to the more ordinary governmental bodies established.

---

own child, inasmuch as the Special Committee was set up at the behest of SIRR's Council in 1971. See ABA Report, supra note 5, at 1.

17 Letter from Professor Jefferson B. Fordham to the Honorable Judge C. Clyde Atkins, Aug. 17, 1973.

18 Sturm, State Constitutions and Constitutional Revision, 1970-1971, in COUNCIL OF STATE GOVERNMENTS, THE BOOK OF THE STATES, 1972-73, at 10 (1972).

19 See A. STURM, THIRTY YEARS OF STATE CONSTITUTION-MAKING; 1938-68, app. C, 132-37 (tabular presentation of each state's provisions for constitutional conventions); Sturm, State Constitutions and Constitutional Revision, 1970-1971, in COUNCIL OF STATE GOVERNMENTS, THE BOOK OF THE STATES, 1972-73, at 24 [this table is hereinafter cited as Procedures for Calling Constitutional Conventions]; Note, State Constitutional Conventions: Limitations on Their Powers, 55 IOWA L. REV. 244, 247 (1969) [hereinafter cited as Iowa Note].

20 R. HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS: THEIR NATURE, POWERS AND LIMITATIONS 1-3 (1917) [hereinafter cited as HOAR]; J. WHEELER, THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION: A MANUAL ON ITS PLANNING, ORGANIZATION AND OPERATION xi (1961).

This Note argues that the theoretical framework developed to support the prevailing view that state conventions may be limited is persuasive, that the similarities and differences between the state and federal levels make the case for limited article V conventions still more persuasive, and that the state experience sheds light on potential problems of limited article V conventions. The Note concludes that a limited federal convention is appropriate and that denying the states the opportunity to call a limited convention would be inappropriate under article V.

I. Limitability: The State Experience

"The customary manner of calling constitutional conventions in the United States is by resolution of the legislature followed by a submission of the question to the electorate,"[21] though there have been exceptions.[22] The customary scenario proceeds somewhat as follows: the legislature passes a resolution initiating the convention; this is submitted to the electorate for approval; after approval the legislature passes an enabling act to provide for a budget, temporary officers, and the election of delegates; the delegates are elected; the convention meets; and the final product is submitted to the electorate for approval. The details of the process vary by state — in particular, 12 states have constitutional provisions which require that the question of calling a convention be submitted to the electorate periodically, thus bypassing the legislature at the initial stage of the procedure — but the basic structure is surprisingly uniform throughout the nation.[23]

---

21 Annot., Power of State Legislature to Limit the Powers of a State Constitutional Convention, 158 A.L.R. 512 (1945).

22 Most of these occurred before the present century. Examples include the first state conventions of the late 18th century, which were "revolutionary" in origin as well as outlook; the congressionally instigated conventions preliminary to statehood, discussed in part II(A) infra; and the Reconstruction conventions held after the Civil War. Modern exceptions include conventions in those states in which the state constitution provides that the convention question shall be submitted to the people periodically, and those conventions called by popular initiative in states allowing such procedures. See Procedures for Calling Constitutional Conventions, supra note 19.

23 See Procedures for Calling Constitutional Conventions, supra note 19. This is not to suggest that the details of the process of amending a constitution through a constitutional convention always are handled smoothly or without legal questions. See generally, e.g., Dodd, State Constitutional Conventions and State Legislative

As noted above,[24] conventions historically have been used primarily for major revisions of state constitutions. Indeed, in the absence of explicit provisions in its enabling act or in the legislative resolution submitting the convention question to the electorate, a convention is presumed to be *un*limited and to possess plenary powers to propose revision and amendments as it sees fit.[25]

Little mention is made of limited conventions in the 39 state constitutions which explicitly provide for constitutional conventions. At least one state constitution (Alaska's) forbids limited conventions;[26] and the Alabama constitution of 1901, framed by a convention which itself exceeded limitations placed upon it, affirms the unlimited authority of future conventions.[27] Tennessee's constitution, on the other hand, explicitly grants the legislature and electorate the right to convene limited conventions.[28] And several early state constitutions appear to have envisioned limited conventions.[29]

In a number of the states whose constitutions require that the question of calling a convention be submitted periodically to the electorate (e.g., Michigan, Missouri, and New York), the convention article lays out convention procedures in a manner that suggests limitations are precluded. New York's constitution specifies the form in which the question is to be presented for a popular vote: "Shall there be a convention to revise the constitution and amend the same?"[30] This might eliminate the possibility of a limited convention, at least under the analysis below; but a limited convention has been upheld in Virginia under a virtually identical provision.[31] In any event, many states over the past two Power, 2 VAND. L. REV. 27 (1948); Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 247-52, 254-59; Note, Constitutional Revision by a Restricted Convention, 35 MINN. L. REV. 282, 287-88, 292-93 (1951) [hereinafter cited as Minnesota Note]; Annot., 158 A.L.R. 512 (1945). For a discussion of potential issues in the article V amendment process, see ABA Report, supra note 3, at 33-42. The scope of this Note is restricted to limitability, enforcement of limitations, and legislative refusal to call a convention.

24 See text preceding note 18 supra.

25 W. DODD, THE REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS 76-77 (1910) [hereinafter cited as DODD].

26 ALASKA CONST. art. 13, § 4.

27 ALA. CONST. art. 18, § 286.

28 TENN. CONST. amend. 1.

29 ABA Report, supra note 3, at 18-20.

30 N.Y. CONST. art. 19, § 2.

31 Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 625, 33 S.E.2d 49, 52, 158 A.L.R. 495 (1945) (per centuries have successfully convened limited conventions,[32] although efforts to limit a convention have occasionally failed.[33]

A. Forms of Limitation

A convention may be limited in a number of ways. Explicit limiting directives may, in the first instance, be either procedural (i.e., dealing with such matters as recordkeeping, printing of convention records, etc.) or substantive (going to the subject matter which a convention may discuss and on which it may propose amendments). Procedural limitations have usually been invalidated.[34] A convention "has full control of all its proceedings."[35] Indeed, some have said that a convention may properly ignore efforts at outside control of its internal procedures.[36] This Note deals almost exclusively with substantive limitations; but the distinction should be kept in mind, for at least two cases often cited in support of unlimited constitutional conventions in fact hold only that such matters as choice of printer, date of submission of the convention product, etc. are beyond legislative control.[37] curiam). See J. WHEELER, SALIENT ISSUES OF CONSTITUTIONAL REVISION 52 (1961); A. STURM, supra note 19, at 67.

---

32 Approximately 35, or nearly 15 percent, of all state constitutional conventions have been substantively limited. And the proportion of limited conventions has been higher since World War II. For details on many of the pre-1940 conventions, see HOAR, supra note 20, at 105-28; J. JAMESON, A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS; THEIR HISTORY, POWERS AND MODES OF PROCEEDING §§ 382-82(c) (4th ed. 1887) [hereinafter cited as JAMESON]. On the post-1940 conventions, see A. STURM, supra note 19, at 56-60, 113.

33 Examples of limited conventions which overrode limitations are those in Georgia (1789), Minnesota (1857), Pennsylvania (1872), Alabama (1901), Virginia (1901), and Michigan (1908). See HOAR, supra note 20, at 111-15.

34 See, e.g., Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 259-60; Minnesota Note, supra note 23, at 290; Annot., 158 A.L.R. 512, 522-23 (1945). The ABA Special Committee concluded that an article V convention should not be subject to procedural limitation. ABA Report, supra note 3, at 22-23.

35 Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 61, 66 (1858).

36 The leading cases, although their holdings do not directly support the point, are Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 340, 115 N.W. 429, 430 (1908), and Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 61, 66 (1858). See HOAR, supra note 20, at 117-18, 175, 177; JAMESON, supra note 32, §§ 453-56; Dodd, supra note 23, at 51.

37 Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 115 N.W. 429 (1908); Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 61 (1858). The Delaware and Hawaii Constitutions explicitly grant this power to conventions. DEL. CONST. art. XVI, § 2; HAWAII CONST. art. XV, § 2. There may be some difficulty in drawing the line between such "housekeeping" matters as the legislature may regulate in its enabling act and the internal procedure of the convention, which only the convention may regulate. The former are

Substantive limitations take many forms. A convention may be prohibited from amending one or more portions of the state constitution, but otherwise left free to alter as it wishes.[38] Alternatively, a convention resolution or enabling act may specify certain subjects to be considered and prohibit discussion of any others — as has every limited convention since 1945, except New Jersey's in 1947. New Jersey's experience since World War II illustrates the difference: its 1947 convention was permitted to make changes in any area except the apportionment of the state legislature, while its 1966 convention was prohibited from considering any issue except legislative apportionment.[39]

Variations abound. A convention may be required to consider some matters and left free to deal with others as it wishes.[40] Perhaps the most complex and bizarre set of limitations was imposed upon the North Carolina convention of 1835. It was required to author amendments on four topics, permitted to treat 16 more, and prohibited from acting upon anything else.[41] Most recent limited conventions have been restricted to proposing amendments on one or a few subjects. There are no theoretical differences between the various forms of limited conventions, however, and accordingly this Note will make no distinctions among them.

B. Sources of Limitation

It is an axiom of modern democratic theory that the legitimacy and authority of a government depend upon the consent of the governed. In America "the people, in their collective and national capacity, established the present constitution . . . acting as soverapparently such details as are required to start up and house the convention; the latter concerns the convention's course and rules after it has come into being.

---

38 Examples include North Carolina's convention of 1875, Law of Mar. 19, 1875, ch. CCXXII § 4, [1875] N.C. Laws 505; and Louisiana's conventions of 1898, Act. No. 52, § 3(a)(b), [1896] La. Acts 85; 1913, Act No. 1, §§ 1(3)(a)-(c), [1913] La. Acts 2d Extra Sess. 3; and 1921, Act. No. 180, § 1(4), [1920] La. Acts 292.

39 Law of Feb. 17, 1947, ch. 8, § 2, [1947] N.J. Laws 24; Law of May 10, 1965, ch. 43, § 2, [1965] N.J. Laws 101.

40 One example is Alabama's convention of 1875, which was required to provide for a public school system. Law No. 24, § 9, [1875] Ala. Laws 112. Another is Connecticut's court-ordered convention of 1965, required to consider only legislative apportionment. See Butterworth v. Dempsey, 237 F. Supp. 302 (D. Conn. 1965) (per curiam). It was not restricted in any other way and ultimately rewrote the entire state constitution.

41 JAMESON, supra note 32, § 382(a).

eigns of the whole country."[42] It follows, from the very definition of sovereignty, that changes in the fundamental law (the constitution) can be made only by the electorate or those to whom the electorate has delegated its powers to amend. The legitimacy of a constitutional convention, therefore, rests on the delegation by the electorate of authority to propose amendments.[43] Delegates to a convention "derived their power and authority from the people in their sovereign capacity."[44] Nearly unanimous agreement on the foregoing propositions has not led to agreement on which, if any, of the numerous potential sources of limitations — constitutional, executive, judicial, legislative, and popular — comport with those propositions.

At the state level, the Constitution and laws of the United States clearly limit state constitutional conventions through the supremacy clause.[45] Arguably, those provisions of a constitution governing the amendment process itself are binding upon any constitutional convention called pursuant to that process.[46] The role of the executive is less clear.[47]

---

42 Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 440, 462 (1793) (Jay, C.J.). The position has received consistent support from the Supreme Court, political philosophers such as Jameson and Woodrow Wilson, and popular interpretation of the democratic state. It has also been criticized as a philosophical, rather than legal, conclusion. See L. ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 141-48, 141 n.26 (1942). For an excellent analysis of the evolution of popular support for the idea in early America, see G. WOOD, THE CREATION OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC, 1776-1787, ch. 9 (1969).

43 "A convention has delegated, and not inherent, rights." Ex parte Birmingham & Atl. Ry., 145 Ala. 514, 521, 42 So. 118, 125 (1905). See also, e.g., Chenault v. Carter, 332 S.W.2d 623 (Ky. 1960); State v. American Sugar Ref. Co., 137 La. 407, 68 So. 742 (1915); Opinion of the Justices, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 573, 574-75 (1835); Erwin v. Nolan, 280 Mo. 401, 217 S.W. 837 (1920); Frantz v. Autry, 18 Okla. 561, 91 P. 193 (1907); In re Opinion to the Governor, 55 R.I. 56, 178 A. 433 (1935); State ex rel. M'Cready v. Hunt, 20 S.C.L. 1, 222-23 (1834); Quinlan v. Houston & T.C. Ry., 89 Tex. 356, 34 S.W. 738 (1896); Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 33 S.E.2d 49, 158 A.L.R. (1945); Loomis v. Jackson, 6 W. Va. 613 (1873).

44 Frantz v. Autry, 18 Okla. 561, 589, 91 P. 193, 202 (1907).

45 See DODD, supra note 25, at 92. But the ability of Congress to explicitly limit a state constitutional convention, even as a condition for admission to the Union, is much less clear. See Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 262-63; part II(A) infra.

46 See, e.g., provisions cited notes 26-28, 30 supra. See generally Dodd, supra note 23; Annot., Power of State Legislature to Limit the Powers of a State Constitutional Convention, 158 A.L.R. 512 (1945).

47 At the state level, see Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 268. At the federal level, see ABA Report, supra note 5, at 28-33. But see Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 YALE L.J. 189, 206-10 (1972).

The judiciary obviously is not an independent source of limitations on constitu-

The debate on limitability has focused upon the roles of the legislature and the electorate. At least three distinct positions have emerged: that the legislature alone may limit a convention; that the electorate (directly or by ratification of a legislative resolution) may impose limitations; and that the convention is sovereign and inherently "illimitable."

C. The Debate over Limitability: Legislature and Electorate

In the first major treatise on the subject, Jameson concluded that constitutional conventions ought to be subject to such limitation as state legislatures saw fit to impose (except for internal convention procedures).[48] Jameson's position elicited some support,[49] and a great deal of vitriolic opposition.[50]

Much of what is reputed to be opposition to limited conventions as a whole has been expressed as opposition to legislatively limited conventions, as if legislative limitations were the only kind possible. For example, one case asserted that > the legislature is prohibited from any control over the method of revising the Constitution. The convention is an independent and sovereign body whose sole power and duty are to prepare and submit to the people a revision of the Constitution . . . . It is elected by the people, answerable to the people, and its work must be submitted to the people through their electors for approval or disapproval.[51]

One judge "had no difficulty" in concluding that "a constitutional convention lawfully convened does not derive its powers from the legislature, but from the people . . . that the powers of the consti-tional conventions. However, the ability and willingness of courts to enforce limitations is necessary if limitability is to have meaning in the event of a convention which purports to exceed limitations imposed by the people. See part III infra.

---

48 JAMESON, supra note 32. Jameson's reasoning was influenced by the controversies surrounding the Illinois Conventions of 1862 and 1869. His work was largely a polemic in support of the legislature's position during those troubled gatherings.

49 A particularly glowing reference may be found in Ex parte Birmingham & Atl. Ry., 145 Ala. 514, 519, 42 So. 118, 119 (1905).

50 See, e.g., Sproule v. Fredericks, 69 Miss. 898, 11 So. 472 (1892); Frantz v. Autry, 18 Okla. 561, 91 P. 193 (1907). Both HOAR, supra note 20, at 58-79, 105-20, and DODD, supra note 25, at 72-93, make major assaults on Jamesosn's thesis. After being abandoned for most of the 20th century, it has apparently been revived, at least implicitly, in the Ervin Bill. See part III(C) infra.

51 Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 340-41, 115 N.W. 429, 430 (1908) (Grant, C. J.).

tutional convention are in the nature of sovereign powers . . . that the legislature can neither limit or [sic] restrict them in the exercise of these powers . . . ."[52] "In the area of constitutional drafting," concludes one commentator, "the convention must be completely free of legislative restrictions since its authority derives from the sovereignty of the people."[53]

This opposition to limited conventions, rooted in the metaphysics of sovereignty, does have some support. A number of state courts have favored the position, though generally in dicta handed down over 60 years ago.[54] The Federal Convention of 1787 and early state and colonial conventions are frequently cited to support the point that a convention may not be limited,[55] but such citation reflects failure to distinguish between "revolutionary" conventions (extra-constitutional in nature and resulting from the manifestation of power sufficient to change the form of government) and "constitutional" conventions (called under the aegis of an existing legislature and constitution).[56]

---

52 Loomis v. Jackson, 6 W. Va. 613, 708 (1873) (obiter dicta).

53 Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 266.

54 See, e.g., Livermore v. Waite, 102 Cal. 113, 36 P. 424 (1894) (dictum); Koehler v. Hill, 60 Iowa 543, 14 N.W. 738 (1883); Miller v. Johnson, 92 Ky. 589, 18 S.W. 522 (1892); Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 531 (1865); Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 115 N.W. 429 (1908); Sproule v. Fredericks, 69 Miss. 898, 11 So. 472 (1892); Lawson v. Jeffries, 47 Miss. 686 (1873); Frantz v. Autry, 18 Okla. 561, 91 P. 193 (1907); Taylor v. Commonwealth, 101 Va. 829, 44 S.E. 754 (1903); Loomis v. Jackson, 6 W. Va. 613 (1873). The only recent case to so hold is Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 229 A.2d 388 (1967). The issue in that case was whether the legislature was bound by an act, approved by the electorate, which mandated a constitutional convention within two years; and the court held that the legislature was so bound: "[H]aving submitted the question to the people in proper legal fashion, it bound itself to the mandate expressed by them." 246 Md. at 445, 229 A.2d at 403 (quoting the unpublished decision below). The court thus, in effect, enforced a "limitation" because it was approved by the people, which weakens the case as authority for the position that conventions are sovereign. The opinion was phrased, as are all, in the language of the people's sovereignty and their sole right to delegate that sovereignty.

55 Thus Note, The Legal Effect Under American Decisions of an Alleged Irregularity in the Adoption of a Constitution or Constitutional Amendment, 10 ST. LOUIS L. REV. 279, 295 (1925) [hereinafter cited as St. Louis Note], cites Kamper v. Hawkins, 1 Va. Cas. 20 (1793), in which several opinions stress the revolutionary nature of colonial conventions.

56 See Erwin v. Nolan, 280 Mo. 401, 217 S.W. 837 (1920); State ex rel. Kvaalen v. Graybill, 496 P.2d 1127 (Mont. 1972); Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 33 S.E.2d 49, 158 A.L.R. 495 (1945); HOAR, supra note 20, at 15-16, 34-39; JAMESON, supra note 32, at 10-11; Hendricks, Some Legal Aspects of Constitutional Conventions, 2 TEXAS L. REV. 195, 195-96 (1924); Braxton, Powers of Conventions, 7 VA. L. REG. 79 (1901); Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 245-46; Minnesota Note, supra note 23, at 285-86.

Limited conventions also have been opposed on more practical grounds. Professor Graves has advanced the theory that the limited convention is a tool of various interest groups seeking to block substantive reform:

> To those who do not want general revision and who do not really believe in the democratic process anyway, it provides a made-to-order means of avoiding the opening up of the whole array of constitutional problems for general discussion. . . . More than that, it makes readily available a tool by which powerful special interest groups may, with a high degree of certainty, protect whatever type of sacred cow in which they happen to be interested.[57]

Some who favor limited conventions suggest that those ostensibly opposed only to limited conventions in fact look with disfavor upon the convention mechanism generally. These opponents argue against limited conventions, the theory claims, because they know many people fear that an unlimited convention might become a "runaway" and tamper with basic constitutional guarantees.[58] If a limited convention can be blocked, these strategists count on public sentiment against unlimited conventions to complete the plan and assure that no convention will be called.[59]

Many proponents of limited conventions, in contrast to advocates of Jameson's position of legislative supremacy over conventions and in contrast to opponents of all limited conventions, maintain that > where the legislature, in the performance of its representative function, asks the electors if they desire a convention to

---

57 Graves, Current Trends in State Constitutional Revision, 40 NEB. L. REV. 560, 570 (1961). See also Bebout, Recent Constitution Writing, 35 TEXAS L. REV. 1071, 1074-75 (1957).

58 With reference to "runaways," see Sorenson, The Quiet Campaign to Rewrite the Constitution, SATURDAY REVIEW, July 15, 1967, at 17; 113 CONG. REC. 10,102-03, 10,108-09, 10,112 (1967) (remarks of Senators Tydings, Proxmire, Javits, and Dirksen); N.Y. Times, Mar. 18, 1967, at 1, col. 6.

59 For obvious reasons the position is not espoused publicly. The closest thing to public admission of the goal is probably in Black, Amending the Constitution; A Letter to a Congressman, 82 YALE L.J. 189 (1972), where opposition to a limited convention and opposition to article V conventions in general is intermingled. See Note, Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1612, 1628-29 & n.88 (1972) [hereinafter cited as Harvard Note].

> amend or revise a certain part of the Constitution but not the whole Constitution, an affirmative vote of the people on such a question would have the binding effect of the people themselves limiting the scope of the convention to the very portion of the Constitution suggested to them by the legislature. The wishes of the people are supreme.[60]

In distinguishing themselves from both Jameson and the opponents of all limited conventions, these advocates of conventions limited by the sovereign electorate draw > a clear distinction between the lack of power of the legislature to control the convention, and the power of the people to control it. This distinction is the real answer to the question whether the convention is bound by the convention act. If the convention act be the creature of the people, the convention is bound.[61]

That the convention act can be "the creature of the people" is explained as follows:

> If, at the time the question of calling the convention is submitted to them, the people are informed of the scope of the convention and the manner in which it is to conduct its deliberations . . . then a convention called in this manner will be limited as therein set forth and the convention will then be bound to confine itself within the stated limits of the act of the assembly. The reason for this is that it is the people, under such circumstances, who prescribe the conditions in the legislative act by approving the call for the convention in accordance with the provisions of such act. The legislature merely proposes the conditions. It is the vote of the people for the convention that ratifies them and makes them binding upon the delegates.[62]

Perhaps the point most in contention between opponents and proponents of limited conventions is the weight to be accorded electoral approval of a limited convention resolution proffered by the legislature. Opponents claim that the choice given the electorate when told to accept a limited convention as proposed by the legislature (in the initiating resolution) or have no convention at all is an illusory one. It is said that true popular control in such a situation does not exist, since real power remains in the hands of the legislature — a claim which raises all of the arguments advanced with great force against Jameson's position of legislative supremacy.[63] Only the people can change the fundamental law — the constitution — of which the legislature is a creation, not a master. Proponents counter with "the fact that there would be no convention unless the people voted affirmatively, that an affirmative vote would result in holding exactly the sort of convention in every detail provided in the act, and that the people are presumed to know the terms of the act under which they vote."[64]

60 Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 627, 33 S.E.2d 49, 158 A.L.R. 495 (1945).
61 HOAR, supra note 20, at 120-21.
62 In re Opinion to the Governor, 55 R.I. 56, 99, 178 A. 433, 452 (1935).

The favored solution to this problem is a two-step popular vote on the convention question: first, on the convention in general; and second, on the proposed limitations.[65] Under such a system, the people can convene an unlimited convention if they so choose. In its absence, the only popular check is said to be the clumsy and ineffectual mechanism of electing legislators who will offer the electorate the kind of convention it desires.[66] In any case the legislature should be prohibited from making further changes after the electorate has approved a given set of proposed limitations.[67]

At least from the perspective of classic democratic theory, there is no question but that, as between those who would permit limited conventions approved by the electorate and opponents of all limited conventions, the former have the better of the argument. If, as all agree, the power of constitutional amendment rests ultimately with the sovereign people, then no authority can exist which may rightfully limit the people's discretion in delegat-

---

63 See Dodd, supra note 25, at 74-76; Gooch, The Recent Limited Constitutional Convention in Virginia, 31 Va. L. Rev. 708, 717 (1945); Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 264; Minnesota Note, supra note 23, at 286-87.

64 Hoar, supra note 20, at 71. In some state legislatures (i.e., Georgia, Maine, and Mississippi), no popular referendum is required and the legislature can convene a convention on its own motion. Presumably in such states limited conventions would not be appropriate under the theoretical model developed here. Other states permit popular calling of a convention by initiative, without need for legislative action (in Florida, this is the only way to call a convention). In those, the problem is moot. See Procedures for Calling Constitutional Conventions, supra note 19.

65 See Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 264 & n.170.

66 See Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. St. 39, 47 (1874); Staples v. Gilmer, 185 Va. 615, 85 S.E.2d 49, 158 A.L.R. 495 (1945).

67 Hoar, supra note 20, at 98-99.

ing that power. Such an authority would be above the people, and if sovereignty means anything it is that no power may restrict the sovereign without his consent. Against this doctrinally compelled conclusion, the opponents of limited conventions can raise only the practical objection, discussed above, that electoral power over legislative restrictions is illusory.[68]

The outcome in practice is clear. The position upholding limited conventions when the electorate has approved the limitations has gained nearly universal acceptance in state courts and legislatures. With one arguable exception,[69] no state court in over 60 years has reached any conclusion other than that "a convention is not bound by legislative restrictions which apply to the work of such organ, but that the mandate of the people, either in calling the convention or in approving the convention act, is controlling."[70]

The one arguable question in this area is how late in the convention process the legislature can impose limitations which may be validated by electoral approval. At least two state courts have upheld legislative limitations imposed after electoral approval of the initiating resolution, on the theory that by the act of electing convention delegates the electorate implicitly ratifies any limita-

---

68 Whatever its validity at the state level, this objection is of no import whatsoever to an article V convention. See text at note 101 infra.

69 Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 229 A.2d 388 (1967) (discussed in note 54 supra).

70 A. STURM, METHODS OF STATE CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM 102 (1954). See generally Opinion of the Justices, ___ Del. ___, 264 A.2d 342 (1970); Bradford v. Shine, 13 Fla. 393 (1871) (dictum); Chenault v. Carter, 332 S.W.2d 623 (Ky. 1960); Gaines v. O'Connell, 305 Ky. 397, 204 S.W.2d 425 (1947); Hayne v. Assessor, 143 La. 697, 79 So. 280 (1918); Foley v. Democratic Parish Comm., 138 La. 220, 70 So. 104 (1915); State v. American Sugar Ref. Co., 137 La. 407, 68 So. 742 (1915); Louisiana Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Madere, 124 La. 635, 50 So. 609 (1909); Loring v. Young, 239 Mass. 349, 132 N.E. 65 (1921); Opinion of the Justices, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 573 (1853); Erwin v. Nolan, 280 Mo. 401, 217 S.W. 837 (1920); State ex rel. Kvaalen v. Graybill, 496 P.2d 1127 (Mont. 1972); Wood's Appeal, 75 Pa. 59 (1874); Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39 (1874); In re Opinion to the Governor, 55 R.I. 56, 178 A. 433 (1935); State ex rel. M'Cready v. Hunt, 20 S.C.L. 1 (1834); Illustration Design Group, Inc. v. McCanless, 224 Tenn. 284, 454 S.W.2d 115 (1970); Cummings v. Beeler, 189 Tenn. 151, 223 S.W.2d 913 (1949); Quinlan v. Houston & T.C. Ry., 89 Tex. 356, 34 S.W. 738 (1896); Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 33 S.E.2d 49, 158 A.L.R. 495 (1945); Nespereira c. Alcalde del Distrito Central, Sent. No. 72, 12 Mayo 1931, 29 GAC. OF. (22 Mayo 1931) 9285 (Cuban Supreme Court decision discussed in Ireland, Constitutional Amendments —Power of Conventions, 6 TULANE L. REV. 75 (1931)). See also HOAR, supra note 20, at 21, 120-21.

tions contained in the convention enabling act providing for the elections.[71] The better rule is that only those limitations contained in the initiating resolution — and thus explicitly before the people when they authorize the convention — are binding.[72]

II. The Theory of a Limited Federal Convention

A. Reasons to Examine the State Experience

Looking to the state experience in considering the permissible nature of an article V constitutional convention is justified because there is no directly relevant federal experience, while there is a rich state experience upon which to draw.

The federal experience, after the convention of 1787, consists wholly of federally called state conventions. Commencing with the act providing for the admission of Ohio,[73] Congress has often provided for the calling of a convention and the drafting of a state constitution as part of the process of admission to statehood. Since the act admitting Louisiana,[74] Congress has been in the habit of mandating certain provisions and prohibiting others in state constitutions-to-be. Thus the Louisiana act required that the state's constitution, among other things, guarantee trial by jury and "contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty."[75] The act providing for the admission of Utah[76] included substantive limitations in at least four areas, one of which requires that in the state constitution "polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited."[77] Virtually all of the admitting acts after 1811, up to and including Hawaii's in 1959, contain such limitations, as well as detailed instructions on how the convention is to be called, the election and apportionment of delegates, etc.[78]

---

71 Ex parte Birmingham & Atl. Ry., 145 Ala. 514, 42 So. 118 (1905); Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39 (1874); Annot., 158 A.L.R. 512, 518-20 (1945).

72 See, e.g., Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 115 N.W. 429 (1908). See also Hoar, supra note 20, at 98-99.

73 Act of Apr. 30, 1802, ch. 40, 1 Stat. 173.

74 Act of Feb. 20, 1811, ch. 21, 2 Stat. 641.

75 Id. § 3, 2 Stat. 642.

76 Act of July 16, 1894, ch. 138, 28 Stat. 107.

77 Id. § 3, 2 Stat. 108.

78 See, e.g., the admitting and/or enabling acts for Missouri, Act of Mar. 6, 1820, ch. 22, 3 Stat. 545; Indiana, Act of Apr. 19, 1816, ch. 57, 3 Stat. 289; Mississippi,

59-609 O - 80 - 41

Two factors undercut the utility of these conventions as precedents for an article V convention. First, "The instances of successful restraint of territorial conventions by Congress are not in point, for Congress is an outside sovereign, not at all comparable to the legislature of the territory itself."[79] Congress power to govern and admit the Territories[80] is not subject to the problems which attend the attempted exercise of power by one body over another when both are at least arguably of equal stature and authority.

Second, Congress (paradoxically) has very little real discretion over the kinds of restrictions which it can validly impose on prospective state constitutions. In 1845 the Supreme Court held that once Congress had admitted a state, it was forbidden to inquire into whether a condition of religious liberty which was part of the state's enabling act had been violated.[81] Later the Court went further yet and held that Congress could impose no restrictions upon the admission of a state which had not been imposed upon other states of the Union.[82] Congressional commands in areas of federal authority (e.g., public lands) were to be obeyed, but those on subjects which (after statehood) would be within the sole province of the state to decide (e.g., the location of the state capital) were held void and of no effect.[83] The question still arises occasionally,[84] but there are clearly grave difficulties in using congressional control of territorial conventions as a precedent for article V conventions, if only because of the unique complexity of the former.[85]

Act of Mar. 1, 1817, ch. 23, 3 Stat. 348; Illinois, Act of Apr. 18, 1818, ch. 67, 3 Stat. 428; Alabama, Act of Mar. 2, 1819, ch. 47, 3 Stat. 489; Texas, J. Res. of Mar. 1, 1845, No. 8, 5 Stat. 797; Wisconsin, Act of Mar. 3, 1847, ch. 53, 9 Stat. 178; Nevada, Act of Mar. 21, 1864, ch. 36, 13 Stat. 30; Colorado, Act of Mar. 3, 1875, ch. 139, 18 Stat. 474; Nebraska, Act of Apr. 19, 1864, ch. 59, 13 Stat. 47; North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, & Washington, Act of Feb. 22, 1889, ch. 180, 25 Stat. 676; and Arizona & New Mexico, Act of June 20, 1910, ch. 310, 36 Stat. 557.

79 HOAR, supra note 20, at 111.

80 U.S. CONST. art. IV, § 3.

81 Permoli v. First Municipality, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 589 (1845). The condition is quoted in text at note 75 supra.

82 Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559 (1911).

83 Id.

84 See, e.g., Island Airlines, Inc. v. CAB, 363 F.2d 120 (9th Cir. 1966).

85 See generally Plowman v. Thornton, 52 Ala. 559 (1875); Bradford v. Shine, 13 Fla. 393 (1871); Frantz v. Autry, 18 Okla. 561, 91 P. 195 (1907); Quinlan v. Houston

The states have held many constitutional conventions without congressional stimulus, while we still await the first article V convention. More important, the gross structures of the state and federal governments are remarkably similar. All provide for three branches of government: an executive, a bicameral legislature (except Nebraska), and an independent judiciary. Above all branches is set a written constitution.

As Justice Brandeis declared, "It is one of the happy incidents of the federal system that a single courageous State may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory; and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country."[86] Justice Brandeis was defending a state statute from attack, but the metaphor is a sword as well as a shield. For, as he observed elsewhere in his opinion, "advances have been due to experimentation. . . . There must be power in the States and the Nation to remould, through experimentation, our . . . institutions to meet changing social and economic needs."[87]

The import of Brandeis' words is clear; the federal government can learn from the states, even as the states can profit from its example. Such "cross-fertilization" is a fruit of the federal system. That it has taken place on a large scale throughout our history is testimony to the structural similarities between the governments, which are extensive enough to allow entire institutions to be lifted from one level and used on another. Emancipation, women's suffrage, prohibition, minimum wage and workmen's compensation laws, public housing, the enfranchisement of 18-year-olds, and the direct election of Senators were all state "experiments" subsequently adopted at the national level, many by incorporation into the Constitution itself. Reflection of the state convention experience of two centuries, modified as required by the differences between state and federal situations, in the theoretical underpinnings and practical development of an article V

& T.C. Ry., 89 Tex. 356, 34 S.W. 738 (1896); Wickersham, New States and Constitutions, 21 YALE L.J. 1, 9-15 (1911); Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 262-63. The cases, except Frantz v. Autry, deal with Reconstruction conventions called and restricted by congressional acts or Presidential proclamations.

86 New State Ice Co. v. Liebman, 285 U.S. 262, 311 (1932).

87 Id. at 310-11.

convention would be no more than continuation of a long line of precedent.

B. Comparison of State and Federal Convention Processes

State and article V conventions can be compared on structural and functional bases. The parallels and contrasts between them in these respects illuminate the extent to which the theoretical foundation of limited state conventions can be utilized in analyzing the propriety of a limited federal convention. The model below demonstrates striking structural similarities (and one important difference) between the convention process at the state and federal levels.[88]

STAGE	STATE MECHANISM	FEDERAL MECHANISM
Initiation	Legislature	Informal[89]
Authorization	Popular vote	⅔ of states
Calling[90]	Legislature (& electorate)	Congress (& states or electorate)

88 It is important to note that the state procedure used in the model is not the only, nor the universal, method for conducting state constitutional conventions. It is the usual way to do so. Differences, notably at the initiation stage, do exist. See notes 22 and 64 supra. Clearly, the function or purpose of a state convention may be altered if the legislature is to be intentionally circumvented or ignored at the initiation stage.

At the ratification stage, Delaware alone provides for legislative proclamation of constitutional convention products without popular ratification. DEL. CONST. art. XVI, § 1. Occasionally other states will forego a popular vote for special reasons, as did Virginia in 1945. Ch. 1, § 1(B) [1944/45] Va. Acts Ex. Sess. 4.

It might be argued that an article V convention is more closely analogous to a state convention called by popular initiative than to a legislatively initiated convention, but the latter form dominates the state experience, so in this Note the term "state convention" generally means a legislatively initiated convention unless otherwise specified explicitly or by context. If the legislature does not fully control legislatively initiated conventions, it clearly should not fully control popularly initiated conventions, and if the legislature may be limited by popular vote on a legislatively submitted proposition, it clearly may be limited by direct popular initiative. Thus, the distinction between popular (or state) and legislative (or congressional) initiation of conventions does not diminish the value of comparing legislatively initiated state conventions with state initiated article V conventions.

89 The usual mechanism here has been a "groundswell" led by a prominent national leader or body, e.g., the efforts of Senator Dirksen (R.-Ill.) in the mid-sixties to secure a convention to override the Supreme Court's "one man-one vote" decisions. See N.Y. Times, Mar. 18, 1967, at 1, col. 6. The Council of State Governments was active in the early 1960's in attempting to secure a convention to consider three amendments which it proposed. See ABA Report, supra note 3, at 5 & n.7.

90 The Calling consists of the legislative act funding the convention, setting up

Proposal of amendments	Convention	Convention
Ratification	Popular vote	¾ of states

The model discloses a number of obvious structural parallels (the stages into which the process is easily divided, legislative role in the calling, the convention itself) and contrasts (the method of initiation, participation by the electorate versus participation by the state governments) between the state and federal procedures. Functionally, both share the same ultimate end — the change of fundamental law.

More subtly, perhaps, the states play the same roles at the same stages of a federal constitutional convention as are played by the electorate in state conventions. In each case, the group in question is responsible for both the authorization and ratification stages. Viewing the convention as the sovereign's means of directly altering the fundamental law, the provision for dual review is especially reasonable. Touching base twice with the source of amending authority emphasizes the convention's accountability and ensures that its work will meet with the approval of the body from which it receives all of its powers.

Extending the structural analogy would seem to imply that the states, seen from the perspective provided by the convention process, are sovereign in the United States, as is the electorate in the states.[91] Yet it is modern constitutional dogma that the question of state sovereignty was resolved in the negative by the Civil War, if not before. Invoking dogma, however, cannot settle the matter. First, the convention clause is not a 20th century product, but dates from 1787, when "the states were in a position of at least nominal sovereignty, and were considering whether to unite."[92] Second, a number of commentators, reasoning that the power to change the fundamental law is the essence of sovereignty, have in fact defined the sovereign in America as the equivalent delegate selection procedures, naming temporary officers, etc. The stage also includes the election of delegates — hence the parenthetical additions.

---

91 Recall that the clear thrust of state experience is that only popularly approved limitations are binding. See part I(C) supra, especially text at notes 69-72 supra.

92 Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 957, 964 (1963).

of the amending body. Insofar as the convention clause may be said to give the (united) states power both necessary and sufficient to amend the Constitution, some have proclaimed the states united as sovereign in the United States.[93] That view was disputed by Orfield, who would have included the Congress as well, as it must call a convention even when the states have petitioned for one, and it may choose the mode of ratification. Orfield does not, however, dispute the assertion that the "amending body" is the legal sovereign.[94]

In short, the sovereign is whoever has the last word. The Convention of 1787, after a great deal of discussion, decided that the states, and not Congress, would have the last word with respect to amendments. Indeed, "early discussions and proposals centered on the question of excluding Congress from a significant role in the amendment process."[95] The chief advocate of this position was Mason, a strong anti-Federalist who sought and achieved provision for independent state initiation of the amendment process because of his belief that it was needed as a check on potential congressional abuses.[96]

> What finally emerged from the convention was what may be described as the compromise set forth in article V, whereby a power of initiative was to reside in both Congress and the states pursuant to the two alternative methods, with the final authority of ratification under both methods in the states. . . . It is evident from the discussion at the time that the alternative method recognizing state initiative was considered an important safety valve to guard against abuses of federal

---

93 See, e.g., 1 J. AUSTIN, JURISPRUDENCE 268 (4th ed. 1879); J. HURD, THE THEORY OF OUR NATIONAL EXISTENCE 159-40, 374 (1881).

94 L. ORFIELD, AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 153-67 (1942).

95 Kauper, The Alternative Amendment Process; Some Observations, 66 MICH. L. REV. 903, 905 (1968). The Virginia Plan contained provision for the amendment of the prospective Constitution without congressional consent. 1 FARRAND, supra note 9, at 22.

96 See 1 FARRAND, supra note 9, at 202-03 (Mason's speech of June 11, 1787); 2 id. at 629 n.8 (Mason's marginal notes on article V); 2 id. at 629-30 (final debate on the convention clause). On Mason's anti-Federalism, see MITCHELL, A BIOGRAPHY OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 37-38 (1964). It is noteworthy that all three of the delegates who refused to sign the Constitution in 1787 were among those who had striven mightily for the convention clause as it ultimately was adopted. Id. at 118-19.

> power which would not be corrected if the power to initiate amendments was vested solely in Congress.[97]

If the basis of the convention clause was fear of congressional tyranny and a desire to assure that the states could override it, then it should come as no surprise that article V casts the states in the role of final authority. The convention clause was not a unique provision, for the Constitution originally gave the states ultimate authority with respect to both selection of Senators and election of the President, as well as amendment of the organic law.[98]

C. Limitability at the Federal Level

Once it is seen that the states are meant to be the final authority in article V convention matters just as the electorate is the final authority in state conventions,[99] the further parallel is suggested that just as the electorate may delegate less than all of its authority and thereby limit state conventions,[100] so may the states delegate less than all of their authority in order to limit an article V convention. No reason appears why delegation should be possible on the state but not on the federal level. Indeed, the opposite is the case, for there are two factors providing stronger support for such delegation, and hence for limited constitutional conventions, on the federal than on the state level.

First, the purely structural difference between the federal and state convention initiation procedures (the initiation of a federal convention is informal, while initiation of a state convention is most often a task for the legislature) removes a principal objection to limited state conventions — that the sovereignty of the electorate in authorizing a limited convention is a legal fiction because the electorate becomes a mere pawn of the state legislature by being reduced to accepting the convention limits defined by the

---

97 Kauper, supra note 95, at 905.

98 Much authority in the federal system is still exercised by the states. See generally Wechsler, The Political Safeguards of Federalism: The Role of the States in the Composition and Selection of the National Government, 54 COLUM. L. REV. 543 (1954).

99 See part II(B) supra.

100 See part I(C) supra, especially text at notes 69-72 supra.

legislature or doing without a convention.[101] An article V convention could not be criticized on such grounds. Each state petitions individually for a convention. There is no ratification of the act of another body, so the states have full and untrammeled authority to specify those limitations they individually desire and to establish those upon which they can agree. The price paid for this high degree of control is the chaos of the informal initiation process. We have never had an article V convention, perhaps largely because it is so difficult to get two-thirds of the states to agree at any one time on any one set of limitations. Provided that the states alone can establish limitations, and that Congress must honor those limitations, adding none of its own, the power to limit an article V convention would in fact be lodged in the amending authority, and the objection that the procedures for limiting a state convention do not square with the theory would be of no force at the federal level.

A second factor lending stronger support to limitability at the federal than at the state level arises from the significant functional difference underlying the structural dissimilarity between the methods of initiation of state and article V conventions. Functionally, a state convention may be a vestigial organ, a means of effecting thoroughgoing revision of the fundamental law, or a device for achieving rapid adoption of amendments.[102] But, with rare exceptions, it cannot be a device for overruling or sidestepping the legislature, because the legislature is normally the initiator of the convention proceedings.[103] By contrast, the clear purpose of the article V convention mechanism is to provide "an alternative to the proposal of amendments by Congress in order to ensure that the states [can] correct congressional abuses of power or propose amendments which Congress refuse[s] to propose."[104]

---

101 See part I(C) supra.

102 As far as thoroughgoing revision is concerned, see Keith, Recent Constitutional Conventions in the Older States, in MAJOR PROBLEMS IN STATE CONSTITUTIONAL REVISION 58 (W. Graves ed. 1960). With reference to rapid adoption, see Graves, State Constitutional Law: A Twenty-Five Year Summary, 8 WM. & MARY L. REV. 1, 8-9 (1966).

103 It should be remembered that alternative means of initiation exist. See Procedures for Calling Constitutional Conventions, supra note 19; note 88 supra.

104 Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1618 (citing Kauper, supra note 95, at 904-05 & n.2). See 1 FARRAND, supra note 9, at 202-03; 2 id. at 629-31.

This difference in function can only strengthen the argument for the power of the states to limit a federal convention convened at their behest. If a federal convention is to be a device for circumventing Congress, it would be uncontrollable in the absence of state controls. The role of the convention as the states' special tool is inconsistent with the position that the states cannot in some way define its work and agenda. To deny the states the power to limit a federal convention is to argue that the framers intended that the states be compelled to risk the entire structure of government whenever they sought to make a minor constitutional adjustment over the objections of Congress.[105]

The foregoing analysis suggests that the justification for limited state conventions applies with at least equal, and perhaps greater, force to federal conventions, both because a principal objection to limited state conventions does not apply to article V conventions, and because the different function of an article V convention provides a justification for limitability not found at the state level. To oppose a limited article V convention denies the right of the final authorities on the amendment of the Constitution — the states — to delegate less than all of their power to suggest amendments.[106]

III. Potential Problems of Limited Article V Conventions

Clearly the state experience is useful insofar as it provides theoretical insights into the possibility of a limited convention at the federal level. Beyond that narrow purpose, state precedents may prove helpful in considering the various problems which might confront a limited article V convention. In particular, the 105 See ABA Report, supra note 3, at 18-19; Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1629 & n.92.

---

106 The attempt to deny such a power of partial delegation has been made. A number of the state decisions cited above, indicating that nothing can restrain a convention save the United States Constitution, would seem to imply that no mandate of the sovereign people can block the convention, which is itself sovereign. See, e.g., Livermore v. Waite, 102 Cal. 113, 35 P. 424 (1894). But that view has not prevailed at the state level, see part I(C) supra; and the argument is particularly inadequate at the federal level, where all of the powers held by the government are nothing more than the partial delegation of the people's and states' own sovereignty. U.S. Const. art. X.

questions of enforcing valid limitations and coping with a congressional refusal to call an article V convention after petition by two-thirds of the states may be answered by an examination of how the states have confronted similar problems. In the same vein, the Ervin Bill's provisions concerning judicial review and congressional supervision of convention procedures may be profitably reexamined in the light of state experience.

A. Enforcement of Limitations

One can imagine a number of ways in which attempts by a convention to exceed valid limitations might be thwarted. Most obviously, the electorate (at the state level) or the states (at the federal level) can refuse to ratify the work of such a convention. However, that solution may be unsatisfactory for at least two reasons. Desired amendments might be lost if the convention's work were submitted as a whole with no opportunity for the ratifying body to choose from the lot those amendments it wished to adopt. Alternatively, the "runaway" amendment(s) might be ratified, thereby nullifying valid limitations properly imposed. While in theory the latter possibility ought not be repugnant — on the grounds that approval by the amending authority is in reality the only basis for judging an amendment, and that such approval, if forthcoming, can atone for all manner of past procedural irregularities — it would be a clear departure from anticipated procedures, upon which many will have relied, and a blow to the integrity of the amendment process.

Jameson proposed enforcement of limitations on state conventions by requiring delegates, prior to the opening of the convention, to take an oath to comply with the restrictions and limitations in the enabling act. Exceeding the limitations would violate the oath, subjecting violators to criminal penalties.[107] As Jameson himself admitted, however, conventions have on occasion refused to take, or taken and then ignored, such oaths, with no consequence but the elimination of the limitations the oath was to secure. The Ervin Bill would adopt this approach at the federal level, requiring an oath of prospective delegates that they will limit their considerations to the subjects specified in the convention call.[108]

---

107 JAMESON, supra note 32, § 381.

The courts are probably more effective for enforcing (and testing) convention limitations than is dependence on the executive to bring criminal charges for violation of an oath. Courts have taken jurisdiction over controversies concerning the propriety of the practices and procedures employed in amending constitutions at both the state[109] and federal[110] levels. State courts, however, have been loath to interfere with the work of constitutional conventions. Conventions are seen as the voice of the electorate (i.e., the sovereign), and thus less amenable to judicial scrutiny than other amendment procedures.[111] Consequently, courts have held that, even if a convention has exceeded proper limitations, general acceptance of its work "obtained either by acquiescence in a revision promulgated by a convention without submission, or by a formal vote of approval at the time of submission"[112] will legitimate the changes, shielding them from attack.[113] "The change made by the people in their political institutions, by the adoption of the proposed Constitution . . . forbids an inquiry into the merits of this case. The question is no longer judicial. . . ."[114] Acquiescence has, at the extreme, been used to preclude judicial review of state constitutions which, in defiance of the general law and their own enabling acts, were promulgated by conventions without being submitted to the electorate for ratification.[115]

The foregoing doctrine is by no means universally adhered to. Many jurisdictions refuse to recognize it, treating the work of a convention like that of any other amending process. Courts have 108 S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. § 8(a) (1973).

---

109 See Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 266-68; Minnesota Note, supra note 23, at 294-97; St. Louis Note, supra note 55.

110 See ABA Report, supra note 3, at 24 n.44; Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1636.

111 See sources cited note 109 supra.

112 Minnesota Note, supra note 23, at 295.

113 Wood's Appeal, 75 Pa. St. 59 (1874); Miller v. Johnson, 92 Ky. 589, 18 S.W. 522 (1892); Taylor v. Commonwealth, 101 Va. 829, 44 S.E. 754 (1903) (dictum).

114 Wood's Appeal, 75 Pa. St. 59, 68-69 (1874).

115 See Miller v. Johnson, 92 Ky. 589, 18 S.W. 522 (1892); Taylor v. Commonwealth, 101 Va. 829, 44 S.E. 754 (1903).

struck down ordinances passed by conventions with authority only to propose constitutional change and have even declared null and void sections of state constitutions passed by limited conventions without authority to consider the subject of the invalidated article.[116]

In any event, review is never certain. Courts may refuse to interfere with a convention before its work is completed and can be reviewed as a product rather than a mere proposal (the "ripeness" problem). Alternatively, ratification increases the pressures on a court to accept amendments, now imprinted with the seal of sovereign approval. Often courts wash their hands of the entire affair, branding it a political question.[117] Limitations seemingly are best enforced either immediately after the convention adjourns[118] or just after electoral approval, but before the challenged provisions have become part of the fabric of government.[119] Thus state precedent regarding constitutional conventions and both state and federal precedent regarding other modes of amendment suggest that courts might be willing, at least in some circumstances, to halt "runaway" amendments.

---

116 See, e.g., Hayne v. Assessor, 145 La. 697, 79 So. 280 (1918); Foley v. Democratic Parish Comm., 138 La. 220, 70 So. 104 (1915); State v. American Sugar Ref. Co., 137 La. 407, 68 So. 742 (1915); Louisiana Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Madere, 124 La. 695, 50 So. 609 (1909). See also Ex parte Birmingham & Atl. Ry., 145 Ala. 514, 42 So. 118 (1905) (invalidated ordinances); HOAR, supra note 20, at 160 (also invalidated ordinances).

117 See generally DODD, supra note 25, at 93-103; HOAR, supra note 20, at 149-64; White, Amendment and Revision of State Constitutions, 100 U. PA. L. REV. 1132, 1149 (1952); Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 266-68; St. Louis Note, supra note 55, at 280-84. As to the political question issue at the federal level, see Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1634-41.

118 Possible methods of obtaining review include refusal of government officers to take some action with respect to the amendments (e.g., refuse to submit them to a ratification vote in order to force backers of the amendments to bring a writ of mandamus or declaratory judgment action) and a suit by private parties to enjoin submission (perhaps parties with a special interest at stake to confer standing). See Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1641-44; Minnesota Note, supra note 23, at 296-97. Review might not be available prior to ratification because the possibility that the proposals would not be ratified means that no case or controversy exists. See Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1641 n.150.

119 How long is too long to wait? The answer probably depends upon the degree to which substantial expectations have arisen due to the changes and the degree to which actions have been taken based upon such expectations. See, e.g., Annot., 158 A.L.R. 512, 515 (1945).

B. Refusal to Call a Convention

A perhaps more likely problem is that Congress would refuse to call a convention, even after petition by two-thirds of the states. The problem is relatively rare at the state level, because the legislature generally initiates the convention process, making the passage of enabling legislation a foregone conclusion.[120] A federal convention, however, would be called not in furtherance of congressional desires but rather to circumvent congressional refusal to approve a desired amendment or amendments.[121]

The language of article V is mandatory; if two-thirds of the states petition for a convention, the Congress "shall" convene one. Virtually all authorities, including Senator Ervin,[122] recognize the mandatory nature of Congress duty under the convention clause. Hamilton (himself a foe of state initiation of amendments) wrote in The Federalist that "[t]he words of this article are preemptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence, all the declamation about their disinclination to a change, vanishes in air."[123]

Nevertheless, the problem is a real one. At the federal level, efforts to block a convention might well be made in Congress. The absence of procedures in the Constitution by which to determine when and how to implement the article V convention machinery suggests a role for Congress in convention implementation.[124] At least one Senator refused to see himself as bound to vote to call a convention despite identical petitions from 34 states, asserting that Congress should not accept a petition to overrule the Supreme Court's apportionment decisions from a malapportioned state 120 In those states in which the convention process may be initiated by the electorate, legislative approval could not be taken for granted. Indeed, the problem was foreseen in some such states, in which the constitutions contain detailed provisions for calling the convention into existence. See Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 252.

---

121 See, e.g., Dirksen, supra note 5. The effort to convene a federal convention to consider the apportionment problem was begun only after Congress refused to pass the "Dirksen Amendment."

122 See Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875, 885-86 (1968).

123 THE FEDERALIST, No. 85, at 403 (Hallowell, Masters, Smith & Co. ed. 1852) (A. Hamilton).

124 See part III(C) infra.

legislature[125] and further that "Congress clearly has the authority to rule out petitions on the ground that circumstances which led to their submission have materially changed."[126] At the state level, legislatures have occasionally refused to pass enabling legislation, even in the face of a popular mandate for a convention.[127] And a number of state courts have refused, notwithstanding constitutional language similar to article V, to issue writs of mandamus to state legislatures which balked at calling conventions authorized by the electorate.[128] In Wells v. Bain the court did not see the people's authorization as compelling: "It was not even a mandate, further than the moral force contained in an expressed desire of the people."[129]

The early authorities evidently viewed the legislative prerogatives in this politically charged area as unchallengeable,[130] but Jameson (rather uncharacteristically) affirmed the rights of a convention to provide for its own financial support and meeting place should the legislature refuse either out of pique or politics.[131] Recent cases have indicated that the legislature, in calling a convention after the electorate's affirmative vote on the convention resolution, is performing a mere ministerial act, and that failure to call the convention is grounds for a writ of mandamus.[132] The same reasoning would appear to apply to congressional refusal to call an article V convention.[133]

---

125 113 CONG. REC. 10,101 (1967) (remarks of Senator Tydings).

126 Id. at 10,102.

127 Examples include New Hampshire in 1860 and 1864; New York for eight years after popular approval in 1886; Iowa in 1920; California in 1934, 1945, and 1946; and Maryland in 1950.

128 See, e.g., Fergus v. Marks, 321 Ill. 510, 512, 152 N.E. 557, 560 (1926). See also HOAR, supra note 20, at 118-19.

129 Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 50 (1874).

130 See generally DODD, supra note 25, at 53-57; HOAR, supra note 20, at 116-18; Iowa Note, supra note 19, at 252-53.

131 HOAR, supra note 20, at 117-18, 177-78; JAMESON, supra note 32, §§ 453-56.

132 Chenault v. Carter, 352 S.W.2d 623, 626 (Ky. 1960); Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 445, 229 A.2d 588, 603 (1967).

133 The problem is complicated by the unique historical interrelationships among the three branches of the federal government. This may well mean that the courts would only declare Congress constitutional duty and refuse directly to order Congress to act. See Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969); Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1641-44. But see Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process, 66 MICH. L. REV. 949, 978-85 (no mandamus to compel Congress to call a convention — the article predates Powell).

C. The Ervin Bill, the Role of an Article V Convention, and the State Experience

The Ervin Bill grants Congress sole authority to judge state petitions and to specify the limitations (through perusal of the state petitions) binding upon the convention.[134] Given the absence of implementing provisions in article V, a role for Congress here is probably both necessary and desirable.[135] However, making Congress the sole arbiter, as the Ervin Bill does by barring judicial review,[136] would be neither. Congress might avoid blunt refusal to call a convention under the guise of finding the state petitions inadequate or dictate its own limits under the guise of interpreting state-created limits.

More seriously, the Ervin Bill permits Congress to refuse to submit amendments to the states for ratification if, in its judgment, they exceed in scope the limits placed on the convention which authored them.[137] Though congressional supervision of the convention process before the convention can be justified, such a role after the convention has completed its work is unwarranted. Congress may play a part in interpreting state petitions, but there is no reason why the states themselves or the courts cannot police the convention itself. Congressional participation at this stage opens the door to congressional abuses in the guise of enforcing previously established limitations.

Judicial resolution of the question of congressional power over article V conventions ordinarily would be expected, but the Ervin Bill purports to prohibit judicial review.[138] If it becomes law, constructive use of state precedent may be precluded in determining what power Congress has to determine the judicial role in article V conventions. However, one doubts that judicial review may be excluded. It may be particularly noteworthy that the issue is not merely one of general congressional power to regulate the jurisdiction of the federal courts, but also a question of the extent of 134 S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. § 6 (1973). See Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1630-32.

135 See generally ABA Report, supra note 3, at 20-22; Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1615-18.

136 S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. §§ 3(b), 5(c), 10(b), 13(c) (1973).

137 Id. § 11(b)(1).

138 Id. §§ 3(b), 5(c), 10(b), 13(c) (1973).

congressional discretion under a constitutional provision explicitly mandating particular congressional action.[139]

The very purpose of the article V convention clause was to provide a means for circumventing Congress. Therefore it seems desirable to restrict the opportunities for congressional meddling, and hence to minimize congressional discretion, as much as possible. Conceding the necessity for a congressional role in determining whether the conditions invoking its duty to call a convention have been satisfied, in defining the limitations contained in the state petitions, and in calling a convention, still the courts must be able to review the congressional determinations if the purpose of the convention clause is to be effectuated.

The need for a congressional role in enforcing convention limitations, as by power to refuse to submit convention proposals for ratification, is much less clear and the need for judicial review of such determinations thus the more clear. Indeed, both the inherent conflict of interest between Congress and an article V convention[140] and analogy to the state experience with legislative limitations imposed after electoral authorization[141] suggest that only the states may limit an article V convention and that the contemplated congressional role in enforcing limitations is singularly inappropriate, perhaps even unconstitutional.[142] While a few state courts have upheld such legislative limitations on the theory that in voting for convention delegates the people implicitly con-

---

139 The issue is beyond the scope of this Note. On judicial review, see generally ABA Report, supra note 3, at 23-27; Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1634-48.

140 See text at note 104 supra. Conflict between Congress and the convention could be more apparent than real in some circumstances. It may fairly be assumed that no serious attempt to call an article V convention would be made unless attempts to have Congress initiate amendments had already failed. But a two-thirds vote of both Houses is required to propose amendments, while presumably only a majority vote would be required in the exercise of its functions in the article V convention process. Thus, if a simple majority of those voting, but less than two-thirds of the entire Congress, favored an amendment on the subject in question, Congress might not be inclined to impede the convention process. However, minimizing the role of Congress as suggested herein is still appropriate because this situation likely would not always exist and the alternatives — enforcement as discussed in part III(A) supra and judicial review of congressional action — are equally appropriate even when this situation does exist.

141 See text at notes 71-72 supra.

142 See Harvard Note, note 59 supra, at 1630-33. But see ABA Report, note 3 supra, at 8, 21, 67-69.

done the legislature's actions,[143] the position is not only an unsound minority one, but also clearly inapplicable to a federal convention.[144]

The provision of the Ervin Bill substituting the judgment of Congress for that of the federal courts as final arbiter of convention disputes should be deleted.[145] The provision making Congress an enforcer of convention limitations might well be deleted.[146] If the Ervin Bill is passed without such changes, judicial decisions restricting the scope of congressional discretion in this matter would accord best with both the theory of the article V convention and the state experience.

Conclusion

The theoretical foundations of constitutional conventions at the state level clearly permit limited constitutional conventions, and this conclusion is supported by both experience and judicial opinion. Federal article V conventions and state conventions operate on much the same principles and with similar procedures. Moreover, what differences there are make the argument for limited constitutional conventions more compelling at the federal level. Thus, article V should be interpreted to allow limited constitutional conventions. The limitations to be imposed would be those, and only those, found in the petitions of at least 34 states.

If limited article V conventions do occur, the state experience in enforcing limitations on limited conventions and dealing with legislative refusal to call electorally mandated conventions may

---

143 See note 71 supra.

144 The presumption that in voting for delegates the people implicitly ratify the enabling act is derived from the earlier presumption that the people, in approving the legislature's convention resolution, have approved all the limitations contained therein. See text at notes 68-70 supra. A federal convention would have no legislative resolution and hence no need for the first presumption. There would thus be no basis for the questionable reasoning involved in asserting that electing delegates necessarily implies embracing the entire convention act, especially when to do so would impose new and previously unrequested restrictions.

145 S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. §§ 3(b), 5(c), 10(b), 13(c) (1973). See Harvard Note, supra note 59, at 1632-33. See generally the excellent discussion of this problem in ABA Report, supra note 3, at 23-28; and the suggested new section of S. 1272, id. at 75-76.

146 S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. § 11(b)(1) (1973).

be useful in predicting and dealing with problems at the federal level. Those provisions of the Ervin Bill dealing with congressional power over article V conventions seem inconsistent with the rationale underlying article V conventions and should be modified before the bill becomes law.

*Henry D. Levine

---

*Member of the Class of 1975 at Harvard Law School. The author expresses his appreciation to Mr. John Feerick of the ABA Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee for his support and guidance of the basic research for this Note, undertaken while the author was a research assistant to the Special Committee.

(Harvard Law Review 1957)

PROPOSING AMENDMENTS TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION BY CONVENTION. — Article V of the Constitution provides two methods of proposing amendments.[1] Congress itself may propose amendments, or amendments may be proposed by a convention called by Congress

[166] See, e.g., Dep'ts of State & Defense, supra note 4, at 12; OFFICE OF THE STAFF JUDGE ADVOCATE, U.S. ARMY, HQ. USAREUR COMMUNICATIONS ZONE, BASIC GUARANTEES IN CRIMINAL ACTIONS IN FRANCE UNDER THE STATUS OF FORCES AGREEMENT (undated).

[167] Interview with Office of the Judge Advocate General, Army, Nov. 1956; see S. REP. No. 2558, 84th Cong., 2d Sess. 3 (1956). In that case an American serviceman was not permitted to confront a witness against him. Although the conviction was allowed to stand, the French government apologized and remitted the fine. HOUSE COMMITTEE HEARINGS pt. 1, at 257–58.

[168] Interview with Office of the Judge Advocate General, Army, Nov. 1956; see SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS 23. For example, several cases of non-confrontation were not reported. Id. at 58.

[169] See id. at 23.

[170] See HOUSE COMMITTEE HEARINGS pt. 1, at 299; SNEE & PYE, op. cit. supra note 51, at 66–70.

[171] See id. at 67.

[172] See id. at 27–31. An accused is generally informed by military officials before trial of his rights under the treaty. See id. at 25–26.

[173] See id. at 29–30. Although the Department of Defense admits that it is unable to have a legally trained observer at each trial, HOUSE COMMITTEE HEARINGS pt. 1, at 335, the Judge Advocate General's Office of the Army says an observer is present at all trials. Interview with Office of the Judge Advocate General, Army, Nov. 1956.

[1] The text of article V is as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three upon the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the states. Although applications requesting conventions have been filed from time to time,[2] such a convention has never been called. However, in the near future Congress may have to take this action, since twenty-six states have requested that a convention be called to consider an amendment to limit the federal taxing power.[3] This Note will discuss the problems which arise when the states attempt to secure the proposal of amendments by the convention method.[4] A number of questions concern the validity of the applications themselves. Once the required number of valid applications has been received, additional problems are raised because article V neither indicates how the convention is to be organized nor defines the scope of the convention's deliberations. Finally, and most important, the Constitution nowhere deals with the roles of Congress, the judiciary, and the states in resolving any of the above problems.

The Role of the Courts. — For several reasons it is unlikely that the courts will play a significant role in resolving the problems raised by the convention method of proposing amendments. It is doubtful that an individual would have standing to contest a congressional determination that the prerequisites for an article V convention have or have not been met; until a proposed amendment has been ratified by three fourths of the states it cannot affect the individual's legally protected interests.[5] If Congress should determine that the prerequisites of a convention have not been met, it might be argued that a state would have standing to contest this determination on the theory that a constitutional right to use the convention method for the proposal of amendments has been denied.[6] However, even if standing were found, a judicial decision that the congressional determination was erroneous would be without effect, since it would seem improper for the court either to order action by a coequal branch of the Government[7] or to assume for itself the power to call the convention.

Moreover, in view of the Supreme Court's decision in Coleman v. Miller,[8] it would seem that the problems raised by the convention method of proposing amendments would be "political" questions and hence not justiciable. In Coleman the legislature of Kansas had voted to ratify the child-labor amendment, which it had rejected twelve fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . . .

---

[2] The most recent compilation of all applications filed is S. Doc. No. 78, 71st Cong., 2d Sess. (1930). See also Martig, Amending the Constitution — Article Five: The Keystone of the Arch, 35 MICH. L. REV. 1253, 1267–69 (1937).

[3] See House Committee on the Judiciary, Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention To Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., following p. 18 (Staff Report 1952); 99 CONG. REC. 320–21, A1991–92 (1953).

[4] Some of these problems were foreseen by the framers of the Constitution. See 2 FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION 558 (1911).

[5] Cf. McChord v. Louisville & N.R.R., 183 U.S. 483 (1902).

[6] Cf. Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416 (1920).

[7] See Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475, 500 (1866) (dictum).

[8] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

years earlier. The state senate had been equally divided on the second ratification resolution and the Lieutenant Governor had cast the deciding vote. The plaintiffs, a group of senators and representatives, contested the validity of the resolution on the grounds that the Lieutenant Governor could not resolve the equal division, that a state cannot ratify an amendment it has once rejected, and that the proposed amendment could no longer be ratified because an unreasonable period of time had elapsed since its proposal by Congress. The Kansas Supreme Court denied mandamus to compel the Secretary of the Senate to erase his endorsement on the resolution.[9] In affirming the state court, the Supreme Court held that at least some of the petitioners had standing to sue [10] but that the effect of a prior rejection of a proposed amendment as well as the effect of the passage of time on the validity of the proposed amendment were political questions to be decided by Congress. The Court was equally divided on the issue whether the participation of the Lieutenant Governor raised a political question. In deciding that the effect of Kansas' rejection of the proposed amendment was a political question to be resolved only by Congress, the Court relied on the fact that the questions whether states which had rejected the fourteenth amendment could later ratify it and whether states which had ratified that amendment could withdraw their ratification had been decided by Congress rather than the courts. In holding the effect of the passage of time upon a proposed amendment to be a political question, the Court observed that even though the Congress had the power to fix a reasonable time for ratification of an amendment [11] it did not follow that when Congress failed to exercise that power the Court must decide what constitutes a reasonable time. To do so, reasoned the Court, would involve an appraisal of a great variety of relevant political, social, and economic conditions, consideration of which would not be an appropriate judicial function. Mr. Justice Black, joined by Justices Roberts, Frankfurter, and Douglas, in a concurring opinion stated that "Undivided control of . . . [the amending] process has been given by . . . Article [V] exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is 'political' in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point." [12]

On the same day, the Supreme Court dismissed a writ of certiorari in Chandler v. Wise, [13] in which an injunction had been sought to re-

[9] Coleman v. Miller, 146 Kan. 390, 71 P.2d 518 (1937), aff'd, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[10] Petitioners included all the senators who had voted against ratification, one senator who had voted for ratification, and three members of the state House of Representatives. The Court held that at least the senators who had voted against ratification had standing.

[11] See Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[12] 307 U.S. at 459 (concurring opinion). In a separate concurring opinion Justice Frankfurter, joined by Justices Roberts, Black, and Douglas, stated that the petitioners lacked standing to sue. Id. at 460. Justices Butler and McReynolds dissented on the ground that too long a period had elapsed for the proposed amendment still to be valid. Id. at 470.

[13] 307 U.S. 474 (1939).

quire the Governor of Kentucky to notify the Secretary of State of the United States that a resolution of the state legislature purporting to ratify the child-labor amendment was void.[14] The respondents had argued that the attempted ratification by the Kentucky legislature was ineffective because of the legislature's prior rejection of the proposed amendment. In addition, the respondents contended that an unreasonable length of time had passed between the submission of the proposed amendment to the states and the attempted ratification by Kentucky. The Supreme Court, in a brief opinion, held that since the Governor had already forwarded the certified copy of the resolution there was no longer a controversy susceptible of judicial determination.[15] Justices Black and Douglas stated in a concurring opinion that they did not believe "state or federal courts have any jurisdiction to interfere with the amending process."[16] Although the Court did not explain why it was of the opinion that no justiciable controversy existed, it would appear that since the copies of the state resolution had already been sent to Congress the Court thought the question of the validity of the ratification was a "political" question for Congress to decide.

In Coleman v. Miller the Supreme Court failed to distinguish or to overrule earlier decisions[17] in which it had resolved controversies arising under article V. Because of this fact some writers have taken the view that the Court has characterized as political only the particular questions involved in Coleman and that other questions arising from the amending process might still be justiciable.[18] It would seem, however, that the rationale of Coleman v. Miller was not that narrow. The Court pointed out that in defining the scope of political questions the dominant considerations are "the appropriateness under our system of government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments and also the lack of satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination . . . ."[19] Since under these standards the questions raised in proposing amendments by convention appear to be political, it seems that the answers to these questions must come from Congress rather than from the judiciary.[20]

The Role of Congress in Calling an Article V Convention. — In [14] Respondents had obtained a restraining order in the state court, but the Governor had forwarded certified copies of the resolution before he had been served with the order. Respondents then filed an amended complaint.

[15] Justices Butler and McReynolds dissented, id. at 478, for the reasons stated in their dissent in Coleman, see note 12, supra.

[16] 307 U.S. at 478 (concurring opinion).

[17] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931); Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922); Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920); Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920); Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

[18] See ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 18–22 (1942); 53 HARV. L. REV. 134 (1939).

[19] 307 U.S. at 454–55.

[20] See Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW. 185, 186 (1951). Problems arising from the amendment of state constitutions have been held justiciable in state courts. See, e.g., Ellingham v. Dye, 178 Ind. 336, 99 N.E. 1 (1912); McConaughy v. Secretary of State, 106 Minn. 392, 119 N.W. 408 (1909). But see Miles v. Bradford, 22 Md. 170 (1864).

providing for the proposal of amendments by a convention the framers intended to furnish a method by which an amendment desired by the states could become part of the Constitution even though Congress did not approve of the language and substance of the amendment.[21] Therefore, when the conditions specified have been met, article V imposes upon Congress the duty of calling a convention.[22] But Congress must of necessity decide whether the conditions exist which give rise to this duty,[23] and, to the extent that this power to decide is subject to abuse, the intention of the framers may be frustrated. Because the courts are unwilling to intervene in the amending process, improper interference with the right of the states to propose amendments by convention can be avoided only by the self-restraint of Congress and the force of public opinion.[24]

In determining what conditions give rise to the congressional duty to call a constitutional convention it must be assumed the framers intended that changes in the fundamental law would be adopted only after careful and complete discussion and deliberation. Therefore it may also be assumed that each step in the amending process was intended by the framers as a method of determining through meaningful

[21] The original resolution, introduced by Edmund Randolph, was as follows: "[Resolved] that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto." See 1 FARRAND, op. cit. supra note 4, at 22. When this proposal was presented to the convention, some members did not see the need for the resolution. 1 id. at 202. Colonel Mason replied, "It would be improper to require the consent of the Natl. Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account." See 1 id. at 203. When final debate on article V began, the convention had before it a draft which provided that "the Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may by proposed by Congress . . . ." See 2 id. at 629. Madison wrote, "Col: Mason thought the plan of amending the Constitution exceptional & dangerous. As the proposing of amendments is in both modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second, ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case." See ibid. Mr. Gouverneur Morris and Mr. Gerry moved to amend the article to require a convention on application of two thirds of the states. Ibid. "Mr. Madison did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application. He saw no objection however against providing for a Convention for the purpose of amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum, &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided." 2 id. at 629–30. See also 4 ELLIOTT, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS ON THE ADOPTION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 177–78 (1901); THE FEDERALIST No. 85, at 573 (Modern Library ed. 1937) (Hamilton).

[22] 1 WILLOUGHBY, THE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF THE UNITED STATES § 331 (2d ed. 1929); Packard, Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program, 30 CHI.-KENT L. REV. 128, 133–34 (1952). Contra, Platz, Article Five of the Federal Constitution, 3 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 17, 44 (1934).

[23] See Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 ILL. L. REV. 781, 790 (1927).

[24] See ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 18, at 41; cf. Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549, 556 (1946).

debate whether significant agreement exists among the states on the desirability of particular changes in the fundamental law. The Supreme Court in Dillon v. Gloss[25] indicated its approval of this assumption by suggesting that in order to be "effective," ratification of an amendment proposed by Congress "must be sufficiently contemporaneous in [three fourths of the] . . . states to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period . . . ."[26] Ratification by the states at widely separated times is likely to provide neither meaningful debate nor significant agreement, since conditions may have changed to such an extent that the question debated by the legislatures cannot be said to have been the same, and the formal concurrence between their conclusions cannot be said to have significance as an expression of the "will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period." It would seem that meaningful debate and significant agreement, defined as agreement which results from the contemporaneous consideration by the states of the same question, should also be required at the proposal stage of the amending process. Thus, the duty of Congress to call a convention for the proposal of amendments should arise only when contemporaneous debates in two thirds of the states have produced agreement that change is desirable in the whole or some particular aspect of the Constitution.

The clearest example of a lack of meaningful debate and significant agreement would be presented if Congress were faced with applications from two thirds of the states each proposing that a different constitutional change be considered by an article V convention.[27] Although it might be argued that such a situation demonstrates a desire for extensive constitutional reform and that a convention should therefore be called by Congress,[28] the better view would seem to be that a number of applications, each dealing with a different aspect of the Constitution, does not represent a general dissatisfaction with the Constitution as a whole.[29] Calling a convention for the purpose of considering a general revision of the Constitution is an act of such importance that it should not be done unless the requisite number of states have made clear their desire for a convention of this scope. The convention method of amending the Constitution should produce meaningful debate and significant agreement at three stages — application, convention, and ratification. If a convention were called on the basis of diverse applications, the requirement of meaningful debate and significant agreement at the application stage would not be satisfied.

Similarly, this requirement is not satisfied if because of changes in

---

[25] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[26] Id. at 375.

[27] The significant agreement required is merely that the suggested changes each deal with the same subject matter and not that the changes suggested in that subject matter coincide. Thus there is significant agreement between all the applications which attempt to limit the federal taxing power. See House Committee on the Judiciary, supra note 3, following p. 18.

[28] See ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 18, at 42.

[29] See House Committee on the Judiciary, supra note 3, at 11–12; Corwin & Ramsey, supra note 20, at 195–96.

economic and social conditions the questions debated by the state legislatures were in fact different. For example, several applications which manifested a desire to reduce greatly the federal taxing power under the sixteenth amendment were filed before the entry of the United States into World War II.[30] Since that time the revenue needs of the nation and the purposes for which revenue is spent have changed radically. The prewar debates by the legislatures of those states cannot, therefore, be regarded as meaningful debates on the question whether such a change is desirable under present conditions, nor can the results of those debates, despite a formal concurrence with postwar applications, be viewed as part of a significant agreement.[31] In this situation, it would seem that Congress should reject the prewar applications. The extent to which changed economic and social conditions should be regarded as affecting the validity of an application will vary according to the character of the amendment which the application seeks to have considered by a convention. For example, it is unlikely that a change in economic and social conditions would affect the validity of an application directed toward amendment of article V.[32] Congress should be cautious in determining that any application has been invalidated by economic and social changes, since it may be presumed that those who propose an amendment to the Constitution realize that fundamental law should be capable of withstanding such changes. The power to determine whether changed circumstances have invalidated applications for an article V convention could, of course, be abused by Congress. But if meaningful debate and significant agreement are to be assured at the application stage of the amending process, Congress must be given discretion to decide whether the legislatures of two thirds of the states have decided the same question. Moreover, the states whose applications are thus invalidated can reconsider the question in light of present circumstances and file valid applications.

The validity of an application may also be affected by the fact that an amendment concerning the same subject has since been proposed by Congress and ratified by three fourths of the states. Since ratification indicates some measure of general approval of the congressional solution, and since it is not a difficult matter for dissatisfied states[33] to submit a second application, it would not seem unreasonable for Congress to regard as invalid all applications filed prior to the ratifi-

---

[30] Iowa (87 CONG. REC. 3172 (1941)); Maine (87 id. at 3370–71 (1941)); Massachusetts (87 id. at 3812–13 (1941)); Michigan (87 id. at 8904 (1941)); Mississippi (86 id. at 6025 (1940)); Rhode Island (86 id. at 3407 (1940)); Wyoming (84 id. at 1973 (1939)).

[31] In fact, four of these states have attempted to rescind their applications: Iowa (91 id. at 2383–84 (1945)); Maine (99 id. at 4311 (1953)); Massachusetts (98 id. at 4641 (1952)); Rhode Island (95 id. at 8286 (1949)).

[32] South Dakota has applied for a convention to consider such an amendment. 99 id. at 9180–81 (1953).

[33] These may include both states which did not ratify the amendment and states which ratified only because they felt that the congressional solution was better than none at all.

cation.[34] A related problem would arise if applications dealing with a particular subject were followed by legislation which dealt with the same subject. In that situation it would seem that since the states had desired an amendment rather than legislation the prior applications should be considered valid.

Congress may also encounter the problem of whether a state can rescind an application.[35] One writer has argued that under article V only forward steps can be taken[36] — that is, a state cannot withdraw a ratification,[37] Congress cannot withdraw an amendment it has submitted to the states,[38] and a state cannot withdraw an application for a convention. Although this view would facilitate amendment of the Constitution, it would seem improper in that it bases the legitimacy of an amendment upon a mechanical process of addition rather than upon the existence of a significant agreement not only at each stage of the amending process but also between the proposing body and the ratifying states. If Congress withdrew an amendment which it has proposed, ratification of that amendment by the states could not be significant agreement since at no time would two thirds of both houses of Congress and three fourths of the states have agreed on the change. Similarly, significant agreement among the states cannot be said to exist if some states withdrew their ratifications before three fourths of the states had approved an amendment. Thus, it would seem proper for Congress, in determining whether two thirds of the states have applied for a convention, to disregard applications which have been rescinded.[39]

An additional problem is the effect to be given a governor's veto of an application by a state legislature for a constitutional convention.[40] The solution to this problem turns on whether the term "legislature" in the application provision of article V means the legislative process of the state as determined by the state constitution or the representative lawmaking body only. What the term "legislature" means in a [34] Thus applications which requested a convention to limit the President's tenure of office to two terms, e.g., Michigan (89 id. at 2944 (1943)), are invalidated by the twenty-second amendment. Similarly, an application filed before that amendment was ratified would be invalidated although it was directed toward a shorter or longer limitation.

---

[35] Some states have purportedly rescinded their applications for a convention to limit federal taxing power. See House Committee on the Judiciary, supra note 3, following p. 18; 101 CONG. REC. 99 (1955); 100 id. at 9420 (1954); 99 id. at 4311, 6163 (1953).

[36] Packard, Rescinding Memorialisation Resolutions, 30 CHI.-KENT L. REV. 339 (1952).

[37] The only historical precedent of a refusal by Congress to allow a state to withdraw a ratification occurred when several states attempted to withdraw ratifications of Civil War amendments. See 15 STAT. 706–07, 709–10 (1868); Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 448–49 (1939). It would seem, however, that the political circumstances surrounding these amendments cast doubt on the value of this precedent.

[38] Although a withdrawal of an amendment has been proposed, see CONG. GLOBE, 38th Cong., 1st Sess. 522 (1864), Congress has never decided whether it has the power to take such action.

[39] See House Committee on the Judiciary, supra note 3, at 13–14.

[40] At least one such veto has been reported. Pa. Laws 1943, at 922.

particular clause of the Constitution depends upon the type of activity that the "legislature" is called upon to perform.[41] For example, it has been held that when the state legislature prescribes the time, place, and manner of holding elections pursuant to section 4 of article I it is enacting legislation, and the term "legislature" therefore embraces the entire legislative process of the state government as determined by its constitution, including the executive veto.[42] On the other hand, the term "legislatures" in the ratification section of article V was interpreted by the Supreme Court in Hawke v. Smith[43] to mean the representative lawmaking body only, since "ratification by a State of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word."[44] The Court therefore held that a state constitutional provision which provided for a referendum on the action of the general assembly in ratifying any proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution was in conflict with article V. If the term "legislature" is interpreted to mean the representative lawmaking body in the ratification section of article V, there is no apparent reason for giving a different meaning to that term in the application section and Congress should disregard an executive veto.

Finally, several states have passed resolutions which call upon Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution but which make no request for a convention.[45] It would seem proper for Congress to decide that such a resolution is not an "application" for a convention within the meaning of article V since the resolution requests the judgment of Congress rather than the judgment of a convention on the question whether the suggested constitutional change is desirable.[46]

The Article V Convention. — Article V does not expressly prescribe the organization of a convention, the mode of its operations, or the scope of its deliberations. It would seem that Congress, under its power to call a convention, has implied power to decide some of these questions.[47] Under this implied power, Congress could properly designate a time and place for the convention. In addition, it can be argued that Congress has implied power to decide whether the delegates to the convention are to vote by states or by population.[48] Although the framers may have contemplated representation by states,[49] nothing [41] Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355 (1932).

---

[42] Ibid.

[43] 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

[44] Id. at 229. Contra, State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 107 Wash. 167, 181 Pac. 920 (1919). An approach similar to that of Hawke v. Smith has been taken by state courts with regard to state constitutional amendments. See, e.g., Mitchell v. Hopper, 153 Ark. 515, 241 S.W. 10 (1922); Larkin v. Gronna, 69 N.D. 234, 285 N.W. 59 (1939).

[45] Massachusetts (98 CONG. REC. 1793 (1952)); Montana (97 id. at 2537 (1951)); Nevada (98 id. at 8395 (1952)).

[46] On the other hand, it may be argued that Congress should either count the request as an application for an article V convention or accede to the request that it propose the amendment.

[47] See ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 18, at 47; cf. Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 373 (1921).

[48] See ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 18, at 47; Wheeler, supra note 23, at 798.

[49] The article V provision for a separate ratification stage was adopted after in article V would seem to require that method of representation as a constitutional matter. It would be difficult for the convention or the states to resolve this issue, since before a vote could be taken on the system of representation the states would have to decide the very issue which they were to decide. Therefore, it would seem proper for Congress to determine which of a number of alternative methods of representation should be adopted. Congress might follow the precedent of the Constitutional Convention and provide equal votes for the states. Or it might determine that representation at the convention stage should be by population, since each state is given equal power at the ratification stage.[50]

It would seem proper for each state to determine the procedure for the election of its delegates and the qualifications of the electors, since matters of this kind have traditionally been left to the states.[51] The convention should choose its own officers, adopt its own rules of procedure, and pass on the qualifications of its members.[52]

Since the framers intended the convention method to be as free as possible from congressional interference,[53] Congress, in calling a convention, cannot properly attempt to limit the scope of its deliberations.[54] However, the convention should consider itself obligated to restrict its debates to the subject matter set out in the applications. A constitutional change should not be debated in the convention unless two thirds of the states after meaningful debate have reached a significant agreement that change in a particular part of the Constitution is desirable.

Conclusion. — The convention method of proposing amendments to the Constitution poses many problems as yet unanswered. In view of the reluctance of the courts to interfere in the amending process, the task of resolving the many problems involved, will fall upon Congress. However, it is possible that Congress may attempt to avoid these problems by proposing the desired amendment itself. This action would seem proper only if all the applications agree in detail on the amendment to be proposed and the amendment proposed by Congress does not differ from that proposed by the states. However, it would be improper for Congress to propose an amendment in order to substitute its judgment for that of the states, since such action would be contrary to the intention of the framers of the Constitution.

it was pointed out in the debates that if the convention were given the power both to propose and to adopt amendments, a majority of the states could bind the whole Union. 2 FARRAND, op. cit. supra note 4, at 557–59.

[50] A possible compromise is a bicameral convention, with representation patterned after that in Congress.

[51] See U.S. CONST. art. I, §§ 2, 4; id. amend. XVII.

[52] See ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 18, at 47.

[53] See note 21 supra.

