[54] There is some authority, however, for the proposition that state constitutional conventions are subject to restrictions contained in the call for the convention. The theory is that the legislature's call is a law and the delegates are elected under the terms of that law. See Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 51 (1874). But see Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 49, 53 (1858) (dictum). For debate on both sides of this question, see 1 DEBATES OF THE CONVENTION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA 1872–73, at 52–61 (1873).

(The Harvard Law Review, June 1972)

PROPOSED LEGISLATION ON THE CONVENTION METHOD OF AMENDING THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

Article V of the United States Constitution provides that

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that . . . no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

To date only Congress has proposed amendments to the Constitution. The convention method of proposing amendments has never been used because two-thirds of the states have never applied for a convention to propose amendments dealing with the same general subject matter.

However, in March, 1967, Congress found that it had received applications from thirty-two states requesting a convention to propose an amendment which would overrule the Supreme Court's reapportionment decisions[1] and permit at least one house of a state legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population.[2] Although this campaign never succeeded in acquiring the requisite thirty-four applications, the incident did demonstrate that no guidelines exist which delineate the procedures to be followed by the states, Congress, and the convention in performing their roles in the alternative amendment process. Moreover, the near success of this campaign may not have been a singular occurrence. During the past few decades sizeable numbers of applications for conventions dealing with given subjects have been received by Congress,[3] and recent

---

[1] The Supreme Court had held in a series of cases that the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment requires that each house of a state legislature be apportioned by population. See, e.g., Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly, 377 U.S. 713 (1964); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

[2] N.Y. Times, Mar. 18, 1967, at 1, col. 6; see Dirksen, The Supreme Court and the People, 66 MICH. L. REV. 837 (1968).

[3] Since 1965, 15 states have applied for a convention to propose an amendment dealing with federal-state revenue sharing. 117 CONG. REC. S16,519 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971). From 1953 to 1965, 13 states applied for a revision of article V which would abolish the constitutional convention and allow states to propose and ratify dissatisfaction with various Supreme Court decisions may lead the state legislatures to mount another convention campaign in the near future.[4] Such a move by the states could give rise to actions causing serious disputes over important constitutional questions. For example, Congress might refuse to call a convention on the pretext that applications were not sufficiently contemporaneous to evidence a current consensus about the need for a convention, or that the applications did not evidence total agreement concerning the scope of the convention or the subject matter to be considered by it. Or the convention, once convened, might proceed beyond the purposes for which it was called and propose fundamental changes in the structure of the federal government. In order to minimize the potential for such contentious actions, Senator Sam Ervin introduced a bill[5] in 1967 to prescribe procedures for the convention method of amending the Constitution. In October, 1971 the bill passed the Senate.[6] It has been sent to the House and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.[7]

This Note explores the responses made by the Ervin Bill to the difficult problems posed by the convention method of amending the Constitution. After synopsizing the major provisions of the bill, the Note briefly discusses the desirability of legislation governing the alternative amendment process and the constitutional power of Congress to enact such legislation. The Note then considers several of the more important provisions of the Ervin Bill and recommends changes in some of these provisions.

---

amendments without any form of federal control. Id.; see Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 957 (1963). Between 1939 and 1960, 28 states applied for a convention to propose amendments limiting the federal taxing power. 117 CONG. REC. S16,519 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

[4] Within the past year, amendments purporting to overturn Supreme Court decisions in at least two areas have been introduced in Congress. One amendment would have made nondenominational prayers in public schools constitutional; it was rejected by the House. N.Y. Times, Nov. 9, 1971, at 1, col. 5. Three amendments have been introduced to eliminate busing to achieve racial integration. S.J. Res. Nos. 164, 165, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971); H.J. Res. No. 620, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971). Whether these amendments, failing proposal by Congress, could muster the support of thirty-four states is uncertain, but it is interesting to note that lobbyists from thirty-two states have been active in supporting antibusing legislation. N.Y. Times, Oct. 27, 1971, at 9, col. 1.

[5] S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967). The bill, with minor changes, was reintroduced in subsequent Congresses as S. 623, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969), and S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971) [hereinafter cited as Ervin Bill].

[6] 117 CONG. REC. S16,569 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

[7] See 117 CONG. REC. H9859 (daily ed. Oct. 20, 1971).

I. An Overview of the Ervin Bill

A. Limitations on the Scope of the Bill

The Ervin Bill was not intended to cover all article V conventions called to propose amendments, but only those limited as to subject matter by the state applications. Thus, when the bill requires that state applications specify the subject matter of amendments to be proposed, and that the convention be limited to this subject matter, it does not represent a judgment by Congress that article V requires a convention to be so limited. Indeed, it would be inconsistent with the language of article V if the states were not permitted to request an open convention or a convention with the express purpose of generally revising the Constitution.[8] The Senate Judiciary Committee limited the scope of the Ervin Bill merely because it felt state requests for general constitutional revision would be unlikely, at least in the near future, and because the calling of such a broad convention might require different procedures.[9]

B. Procedures Prescribed by the Bill

The Ervin Bill covers all stages of the convention amendment process — the requirements for state applications, the calling of the convention by Congress, the membership and procedure of the convention, the proposal of amendments by the convention, and the ratification of proposed amendments by the states. The bill provides that a state legislature should make application by submitting to Congress a resolution requesting a convention to propose an amendment of a specified "nature."[10] In adopting this resolution, a state legislature is to follow its normal procedures for passing a statute, except that the governor's approval is not required.[11] The application is to remain effective for seven years following submission to Congress,[12] during which time it may be rescinded by the state legislature in the same manner in which it was made.[13]

---

[8] See Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 67 (1967) (remarks of Professor Bickel) [hereinafter cited as Hearings]; Bonfield, Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems, 39 Notre Dame Lawyer 659, 675 (1964); Kauper, The Alternative Amending Process: Some Observations, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 903, 912–13 (1968).

[9] S. Rep. No. 336, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1971) [hereinafter cited as Senate Report]. The Committee did not suggest what procedures might be followed if states applied for an open convention.

[10] Ervin Bill § 2.

[11] Id. § 3(a).

[12] Id. § 5(a).

[13] Id. § 5(b).

When Congress receives applications from two-thirds of the states dealing with the same "subject," each house is obligated to pass a resolution calling a convention, designating a place and time, and setting forth the nature of the amendment or amendments, as defined by the state applications, to be considered.[14] Each state is to send as many delegates to the convention as it has Senators and Representatives in Congress,[15] and each delegate is to be entitled to one vote on any question before the convention.[16] Amendments are to be proposed by a two-thirds vote of the total number of delegates.[17]

Provided Congress judges a proposed amendment to be of the same "nature" as that suggested by the states which made application, and provided Congress finds the procedures followed by the convention to be in "substantial conformity" with the Ervin Bill, Congress is to submit the proposed amendment for ratification and to specify whether the ratification is to be performed by state legislatures or conventions.[18] The state legislatures are to formulate rules of procedure for ratification, whether ratification is performed by the legislature or by a convention.[19] When three-fourths of the states have ratified without subsequent rescission, a proposed amendment is to become part of the Constitution.[20]

The Ervin Bill further provides that congressional determinations of the sufficiency of state applications, rescissions, or ratifications, or the validity of the amendments proposed by a convention, are not to be subject to judicial review.[21]

II. The Desirability of Legislation Governing the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution

The most significant advantage of legislation defining the procedures to be followed by Congress, the convention, and the states, and placing limitations on their respective powers, is that it would allow the states to make the amendment process conform to their intentions. For example, by specifying the steps which

[14] Id. § 6(a).

[15] Id. § 7(a).

[16] Id. § 9(a).

[17] Id. § 10(a).

[18] Id. § 11(b)(1). If Congress fails to act on the proposed amendment within "the first period of ninety days of continuous session," id., the proposed amendment is to be automatically submitted to the states for ratification by state legislatures. Id. § 12(c).

[19] Id. § 12(b). A ratification may be rescinded in the same manner as performed, so long as three-fourths of the states have not yet ratified. Id. § 13(a).

[20] Id. § 14.

[21] Id. §§ 3(b), 5(c), 10(b), 13(c).

states must follow to require Congress to call a convention, legislation would help ensure that a convention would be called when a consensus existed among two-thirds of the states as to the need for a convention. Given explicit procedures, states would be less likely to diffuse their efforts in ignorance of the necessary actions to be taken. At the same time, by providing that applications may be rescinded and by imposing a time limit on the viability of applications, legislation would help ensure that a convention would not be called when a current consensus did not exist. In addition, by limiting the scope of the convention to the subject matter defined in the state applications, legislation such as the Ervin Bill could prevent a consensus among the states concerning the need for a particular constitutional amendment from leading to a convention which would propose far-reaching constitutional change beyond the contemplation or desires of the states.

Of course, legislation governing the calling of a constitutional convention would not bind future Congresses.[22] Future congressmen could not be foreclosed from effectively overruling the prior legislation by determining for themselves the sufficiency of applications, the scope of the convention to be called, and the validity of amendments proposed at the convention.[23]

But the legislation will nonetheless serve some purpose, since a future Congress is not likely to ignore existing legislation governing the amendment process.[24] Where a substantial segment of the nation's population favored a constitutional convention, [22] See Black, Latest Move in the "Convention" Game, 113 CONG. REC. 33,674 (1967); Federal Bar Council, Bulletin of Reports Concerning Legislation: Proposed Federal Constitutional Convention Amendment Act, 117 CONG. REC. S16, 528–29 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

[23] Professor Black has argued that laws dictating congressional action on grave questions of policy and constitutional interpretation ought to be independently weighed by each Congress before a course of action is chosen. See Letter from Professor Charles L. Black, Jr. to The Honorable Emmanuel Celler, Chairman, House Committee on the Judiciary, Feb. 28, 1972, at 2–4, on file at the Harvard Law Review [hereinafter cited as Black Letter]. He contends that such decisions on "prudential questions" should not be made at present because future conditions are not known, id. at 5–6, and because issues concerning constitutional conventions are not now receiving national attention and therefore profiting from public debate. Id. at 5. The last argument, however, overlooks the influence of the scholars who have participated in hearings on the Ervin Bill, including Professors Bickel, Mendelson, Kurland, and McCloskey, and who have submitted opinions to the Senate Subcommittee, including Professor Freund and Professor Black himself. In addition, it may be argued that the more detached consideration of the Ervin Bill today is preferable to a struggle to agree on procedures in the heat of a national debate concerning the merits of a particular amendment sought by the states.

[24] See Kauper, supra note 8, at 906; Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875, 886 (1968).

the fulfillment of existing statutory requirements defined by a previous Congress would make it politically difficult for Congress to justify a refusal to call a convention. And if a future Congress considered certain provisions of the legislation ill-advised or contrary to the dictates of article V, and decided to modify the provisions, preexisting guidelines would nevertheless serve to channel much of the conduct of Congress, the states, and the convention. Legislation would thus help avoid the chaos and substantial delay which might result if Congress had to make, on an ad hoc basis following receipt of thirty-four applications, all decisions concerning the sufficiency of applications, the convening of the convention, and the procedures to be followed by it.[25]

III. Congressional Power to Prescribe Procedures Regulating the Convention Amendment Process

A. The Source of Congressional Power

Article V of the Constitution imposes on Congress the express duty to call a convention on the application of two-thirds of the state legislatures. Since the article does not specify the form of the applications, the procedures which the states must follow, or the terms on which the convention is to be assembled or operated — questions which must be decided before a convention can be called — it can reasonably be inferred that Congress must regulate these "housekeeping matters."[26] Further justification for this conclusion can be found in the "necessary and proper" clause of the Constitution,[27] which allows Congress to select the means necessary to perform its duties.[28]

Two Supreme Court decisions also support the conclusion that Congress has the power to legislate in this area. In Dillon v. Gloss[29] the Court ruled that Congress has the authority to set a definite period of time for ratification of a proposed amendment as an incident to its power to designate the mode of ratification.[30]

---

[25] See Senate Report 2.

[26] See Hearings 238 (memorandum of Professor McCloskey); Kauper, supra note 8, at 906–07; Bonfield, supra note 8, at 675. Professor Bickel has asked who but Congress could settle the "housekeeping matters" involved in calling a constitutional convention. Hearings 61. The thirty-four states which applied for a convention could not be expected to formulate procedures for it, and the convention could not bring itself into existence. Id.

[27] U.S. Const. art 1, § 8.

[28] McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819); see Hearings 238 (memorandum of Professor McCloskey); Black, supra note 3, at 964.

[29] 256 U.S. 368, 375–76 (1921).

[30] See U.S. Const. art V.

And in Coleman v. Miller[31] the Court refused to fix a period of time after which ratification of a proposed amendment would be invalid, holding that such determinations were to be made by Congress. If "housekeeping matters" related to the ratification process are within the authority of Congress by virtue of Congress' power to choose the mode of ratification, then the authority to regulate procedural matters related to calling a convention should follow from Congress' duty to call such a convention.

B. Limitations on Congressional Power

Although Congress appears to have the constitutional power to prescribe procedures for the alternative amendment process, there are limitations on this power. The convention method of proposing amendments was provided as an alternative to the proposal of amendments by Congress in order to ensure that the states could correct congressional abuses of power or propose amendments which Congress refused to propose.[32] It would defeat the purpose of the alternative amendment process if Congress could impose restraints under the rubric of procedure which effectively blocked access of the states to the process, or which allowed Congress selectively to obstruct amendments when it disagreed with their substance.

Therefore, the power of Congress to regulate the alternative amendment process should be limited to those "housekeeping matters" which are necessary aspects of the implementation of Congress' duty to call a convention or its power to choose the mode of ratification of proposed amendments. Further, in the exercise of even these limited powers, Congress must not impose restrictions inconsistent with the requirements of article V. These limitations on the role performed by Congress in the alternative amendment process should be an important factor in evaluating the desirability and constitutionality of specific provisions of the Ervin Bill.

---

[31] 307 U.S. 433 (1939). The Court held the time limit on ratification was a political question. Id. at 454; see pp. 1635–36 infra.

[32] See generally Kauper, supra note 8, at 904–05 & n.2; Kurland, Article V and the Amending Process, in AN AMERICAN PRIMER 130–31 (D. Boorstin ed. 1966). Madison's first draft of article V, providing that Congress was to propose amendments either on its own initiative or on petition by two-thirds of the states, was objected to by Colonel Mason of Virginia on the ground that the states would have no means of correcting abuses of power by Congress. See 1 THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 202–03 (H. Farrand ed. 1911). The result of this objection was the draft of the present article, which was accepted with relatively little discussion. See 2 id. at 629–31.

IV. Questions Raised by Specific Provisions of the Ervin Bill

A. How Long Should Applications Submitted to Congress Remain Valid?

Section 5(a) of the Ervin Bill, as it passed the Senate, provides that "an application . . . shall remain effective for seven calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress." The figure of seven years was presumably taken from the traditional time limit on ratification of proposed amendments[33] and from the reasoning of the Supreme Court in Dillon v. Gloss,[34] which upheld Congress' power to fix a deadline of seven years for ratification. In Dillon the Court reasoned that since article V treats the proposal and ratification of an amendment as "succeeding steps in a single endeavor," these steps were not intended to be separated by any great length of time, and that since ratification was intended to represent the "expression of the approbation of the people . . . , [the] fair implication [is] that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous . . . to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period . . . ."[35] The Court concluded that seven years satisfied this test.[36]

Although Dillon strongly supports the constitutionality of the seven-year time limit as applied to ratification, the Senate Judiciary Committee may well have erred in adopting this time limit for the application stage of the process. Contrary to the Committee's assumption,[37] the practical difficulties of securing the views of state legislatures with respect to ratification of a proposed amendment may well be greater than the difficulty of securing their views concerning the desirability of a constitutional convention.[38] At the ratification stage a proposed amendment has been formulated and the state must consider its particular provisions and ramifications before deciding whether it should become a constitutional amendment. But to apply for a con-

[33] See Senate Report 11; 117 Cong. Rec. S16,525 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971) (remarks of Senator Hruska). A recent example is the 26th amendment extending the franchise to persons over 18 years of age. See id.

[34] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[35] Id. at 374–75. See J. Jameson, A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions — Their History, Powers, and Modes of Proceeding § 585 (4th ed. 1887).

[36] 256 U.S. at 376.

[37] See Hearings 237 (memorandum of Professor Kurland, Chief Legal Adviser to the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers); 117 Cong. Rec. S16,525 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971) (remarks of Senator Hruska).

[38] See Letter from Professor Freund to Senator Hart, 117 Cong. Rec. S16,528 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971) (application and ratification stages are not "logically or practically equivalent").

vention, a state need only express a desire for constitutional change on a given subject.

Nor does Dillon stand for the proposition that a seven-year period will best ensure a contemporaneous consensus. Dillon merely accepted seven years as a "reasonable" period to evidence a consensus; the decision does not necessarily mean that seven years is the best time for this purpose. Indeed, the Court may have accepted seven years simply to avoid having to choose a time limit after which the proposed amendment would no longer be viable.[39]

In order to be most certain of the existence of a contemporaneous consensus as to the need for a constitutional convention, the time limit on applications should be as short as is practicably possible.[40] Since some state legislatures meet only once every two years,[41] some commentators have urged a two-year time limit on applications.[42] This period of time is too restrictive, because some legislatures may not want to crowd further a tight agenda with debate on a convention application when a recently begun convention campaign appears futile. However, a period of four years, in which advocates of a constitutional convention

[39] See Clark, The Supreme Court and the Amending Process, 39 VA. L. REV. 621, 629 (1953). Eighteen years after Dillon the Court was asked to set a time limit on the viability of a proposed amendment. The Court refused on the ground that this was a nonjusticiable political question. Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939); see pp. 1635–36 infra.

[40] L. ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 41–43 (1942); Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process, 66 MICH. L. REV. 949, 963–64 (1968); Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAWYER 185, 195–96 (1951). A good example of the disappearance of a consensus within a short period of time is the interest of states in the reapportionment issue. Now that state legislatures have been reapportioned, many legislatures whose applications are still in the hands of Congress have probably lost interest in an amendment on the issue. See 113 CONG. REC. 10,101, 10,105 (1967) (remarks of Senators R. Kennedy and Tydings); Bonfield, supra, at 962.

The fact that legislatures are able to rescind their applications, see Ervin Bill § 5(b), does not necessarily mean that a failure to do so after several years indicates that a state is still interested in a convention. See Ervin, supra note 24, at 890–91. A state legislature may have had more pressing business before it, and it may have felt that 34 states were unlikely to request a convention on a subject, making rescission unnecessary.

[41] See Hearings 23 (remarks of Senator Proxmire); id at 38–39 (remarks of Mr. Sorensen).

[42] See Hearings 37–39 (remarks of Mr. Sorensen); cf. Bonfield, supra note 40, at 963 (two and one-half years). One justification given for a two-year time limit is that Congress has only two years in which to initiate and pass proposed amendments. See Hearings 37 (remarks of Mr. Sorensen). However, in practice, actions taken by Congress are often initiated by bills and resolutions introduced in previous Congresses. Witness, for example, the history of the Ervin Bill itself. See note 5 supra.

would have a full chance to mount a campaign, and in which all states would have a second opportunity to evaluate the desirability of a constitutional convention, should be a sufficient amount of time.[43] Congress would have the constitutional power to impose a four year time limit, because such a limit would not obstruct access of the states to the alternative amendment process, and because it is necessary, as a practical matter, for Congress to set a time limit to determine whether the requisite consensus exists for a convention.[44]

B. Can the President Be Excluded from the Amendment Process?

Article I, section 7 states that "[e]very Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary" must be submitted to the President for his approval, and if vetoed by him, must be passed by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate. Yet the Ervin Bill does not provide for presidential approval of congressional action in calling a convention or in submitting proposed amendments for ratification. The Committee on the Judiciary concluded that article I, section 7 did not apply to congressional actions in the amendment process because the function performed by Congress in this process does not require making legislative judgments but rather merely providing the machinery by which the desires of the states can be effectuated.[45]

The position taken by the Committee has been criticized [46] as contrary to a literal reading of article 1, section 7, which requires presidential approval of any congressional action having the force of law.[47] The calling of a convention, it is argued, would have

---

[43] See Hearings 9, 23 (remarks of Senator Proxmire); Ervin, supra note 24, at 891. A further consideration which supports a shorter time limit on the validity of applications is that if a campaign to secure applications from two-thirds of the states is moving slowly, states whose applications were submitted early in the campaign could "renew" them to keep them alive. It may be more likely that states interested in a convention would renew stale applications, given a short time limit on their validity, than it is that states which lost interest would take the time to rescind applications still considered valid by Congress if a long time limit were adopted. See note 40 supra.

[44] See pp. 1617–18 supra.

[45] SENATE REPORT 12–13.

[46] See Hearings 23–24 (remarks of Senators Tydings and Proxmire); Bonfield, supra note 40, at 986; Black Letter 18–19.

[47] "Having the force of law" has been interpreted as excluding only intermediate votes of the houses of Congress, resolutions expressing opinions, resolutions governing internal congressional appropriations or operations, or resolutions delegating powers to the President. LIBRARY OF CONGRESS LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA: ANALYSIS AND the force of law as much as legislation creating any other body,[48] and the number of nonmechanical judgments made by Congress before calling a convention — such as when and where it should be held and what procedures it should follow — are properly subject to the presidential veto power.[49]

However, this reasoning ignores the unique, nonlegislative function which Congress performs in the amendment process. This function is limited to the regulation of only those matters necessary to the implementation of article V requirements. As noted above,[50] Congress may not make any judgments on the substance of amendments sought by the states.

In this context the President has no meaningful role to perform. The President, like Congress, would not be free to interfere with the amendment process if constitutional requirements had been met, regardless of his views on the constitutional changes sought by the states. The only important contribution to the process which the President might provide [51] would be to ensure that Congress had acted consistently with article V. But the need for review of these constitutional questions by another political branch is doubtful, since the courts, the government branch primarily responsible for constitutional interpretation and protection,[52] will not give effect to amendments which have not satisfied the requirements of article V.[53] The only significant advantage of a presidential veto on constitutional grounds, if it were exercised in good faith, would be to save the trouble and expense of a constitutional convention whose efforts would be wasted if the Supreme Court subsequently ruled invalid the amendments which it passed.[54] However, this advantage would be outweighed by the undesirability of putting the President in a position to block the alternative amendment process — a process whose purpose is to free the states from dependence on the INTERPRETATION, S. Doc. No. 39, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 135–36, quoted in SENATE REPORT 12–13.

---

[48] See Black Letter 18.

[49] See Bonfield, supra note 40, at 986.

[50] See pp. 1617–18 supra.

[51] The President might have reasons for objecting to a trivial matter, such as who is to preside until the convention elects a presiding officer, a function given to the Vice President by section 8(a) of the Ervin Bill. However, the President's interest in raising such a picayune objection is outweighed by the undesirability of allowing him to obstruct the amendment process.

[52] See Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 17–19 (1958); Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177–78 (1803).

[53] See pp. 1643–44 infra.

[54] The Court would presumably refuse to rule on the constitutionality of congressional action until an amendment had gone into effect, because of the lack of a "case or controversy" before this point in time. See note 150 infra.

federal government in the area of constitutional change. The President could probably find some constitutional pretext for blocking any amendment with whose substance he disagreed, and Congress might not be able to muster the two-thirds vote necessary to override his veto.[55]

It would not be inconsistent with the original purpose of the presidential veto to exclude the President from the amendment process. The veto power was intended to allow the executive branch to defend itself against the annihilation of its powers by Congress and to guard against legislation contrary to the nation's interests.[56] Since neither Congress nor the President can constitutionally exercise any substantive control over amendments sought by the states, the President's veto could not legitimately protect the nation against the calling of a convention or the submission for ratification of a proposed amendment which the President deemed contrary to the nation's interests. Nor could the veto be used to safeguard the powers of the executive branch. The only threat to the executive branch from congressional action in the alternative amendment process would arise from the substance of amendments proposed, over which the President can exercise no control.

An early decision by the Supreme Court would support the exclusion of the President from the amendment process. In Hollingsworth v. Virginia [57] the Court stated in an unreasoned opinion that the President "has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the constitution," [58] and held that the President did not have to approve amendments proposed by Congress.[59] The case is deemed inapplicable to the convention

---

[55] Cf. SENATE REPORT 13 (a presidential veto would make the alternative amendment process impossible). A question arises whether the President should even sign the Ervin Bill if it is passed into law. Although the bill merely governs a process in which the President would have no say, the most important reason for excluding the President from the process is that he should not be in a position to interfere with the desires of the states in a particular convention campaign. If the Ervin Bill is passed well in advance of its application to particular convention campaigns, the President's disapproval of parts of the bill will not interfere with the access of the states to the amending process. In this case, it is worthwhile for the President to air his constitutional objections so that the most satisfactory solutions can be formulated in the bill for problems raised by the convention amendment process.

[56] See THE FEDERALIST No. 73, at 494–95 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton).

[57] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

[58] Id. at 380 note (a).

[59] Since Hollingsworth, the President's approval has never been deemed necessary for the proposal of amendments by Congress, and when the President has signed proposed amendments, Congress has subsequently passed resolutions denying the need for his signature. See L. ORFIELD, supra note 40, at 50 n.30; Hearings amendment process by some commentators and legislators [60] who urge that the probable ground for the decision was the uselessness of requiring presidential approval when the amendment had already been proposed by a supermajority of Congress sufficient to override a presidential veto. In the convention amendment process only a simple majority is required, by the terms of the Ervin Bill,[61] to call a convention or to submit proposed amendments for ratification.

However, the ground for decision in Hollingsworth may well have been that the President was simply not intended to have any role in the amendment process. Evidence for this conclusion is found in the arguments of the litigants. The Attorney General, arguing in support of the amendment, did not attempt to justify the failure to obtain presidential approval on the ground that a two-thirds vote and already been required to propose the amendment. On the contrary, he merely argued that the proposal of amendments was much different from Congress' ordinary legislative business, and therefore did not fall within the policy of article I, section 7.[62] Moreover, a narrow ground of decision that a veto would be futile would not have met the argument of opposing counsel that a presidential veto, with reasons,[63] could change the minds of many congressmen.[64]

C. Representation at the Convention

Section 7(a) of the Ervin Bill provides that the convention is to be "composed of as many delegates from each state as the state is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress," with each state electing two delegates at large and one from each congressional district. The result of this scheme is that the people of less populated states will have proportionately greater representation at the convention than the people of more populated states, despite the fact that the voters of the less populated states already carry more weight at the application and ratification stages.

The present apportionment scheme seems to have arisen as a compromise between the plan of the original Ervin Bill and

---

235 (memorandum of Professor Kurland), quoting A. MCLAUGHLIN, A CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES 635 (1935).

[60] See Hearings 65 (remarks of Professor Bickel); id. at 23–24 (remarks of Senators Tydings and Proxmire); Black, supra note 3, at 965.

[61] See Ervin Bill §§ 6(a), 11(b)(1).

[62] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) at 380.

[63] When the President vetoes a resolution, he must give his reasons. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 7.

[64] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) at 378–79.

strictly proportional representation.[65] The original bill allowed each state only as many delegates as the state had Representatives in Congress,[66] but it negated the value of this equal population representation by providing for voting at the convention by state bloc, with each state afforded an equal voice.[67] Severe criticism of this plan [68] caused the bill to be changed to provide for voting by individual delegate. But at the same time the scheme of equal representation was somewhat distorted in favor of the inhabitants of less populous states.

The justification for weighting the convention in favor of less populous states may be found in the considerations which presumably caused Senator Ervin originally to provide for voting by state bloc at the convention: (1) each state had an equal voice in the original constitutional convention,[69] and (2) the provision for voting by state at the application and ratification stages evinces an intention on the part of the framers to permit constitutional change through compact among the several states,[70] rather than through a supermajority consensus of the nation's people as a whole. However, the original convention can be distinguished as a unique meeting of thirteen quasi-sovereigns not yet combined in a federal union. And the fact that the states are given an equal voice at the application and ratification stages does not compel adherence to the same principle at all stages of the amendment process. There is nothing in the language of article V to indicate that convention delegates were intended to be the agents of their states or state governments.[71]

---

[65] See Black, Latest Move in the "Convention" Game, 113 CONG. REC. 33,675 (1967). The Senate Report on the Ervin Bill gives no justification for the plan. It might be argued that since the convention, in proposing amendments, parallels the function of Congress in the amendment process, its composition as provided in the present Ervin Bill might be justified as "mirroring" that of Congress. The convention, like Congress, would have 100 members elected at large in their respective states and 435 members elected from congressional districts. However, when Congress proposes constitutional amendments, it does so through the independent vote of two separate houses, one of which represents the people on a one man-one vote basis. If the convention were to reflect the makeup of both houses of Congress combined, there would be no independent check by an equal representative body in the amendment process. See New York Bar Ass'n Comm. on Federal Legislation, Proposed Procedures for Federal Constitutional Conventions (S. 215), at 20 (printer's copy Mar. 27, 1972).

[66] S. 2307, § 7(a), 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967).

[67] Id. § 9(a).

[68] See, e.g., Hearings 15–19 (remarks of Senator Proxmire); id. at 32 (remarks of Professor Bickel).

[69] See id. at 15–16 (remarks of Senator Hruska).

[70] Id. at 33 (remarks of Senator Hruska).

[71] Cf. id. at 32 (remarks of Professor Bickel); id. at 49 (remarks of Professor Mendelson) (nothing in the language of article V compels voting by state bloc at the convention).

Even if the framers did assume, based on their own experience, that a constitutional convention would give the states an equal voice, the meaning of article V should not be forever fixed by this assumption. The Constitution should be interpreted, consistent with its express language, in the way in which it can best function in accordance with its underlying principles, even if changed conditions require an interpretation inconsistent with possible specific assumptions of its framers.[72] The framers may have anticipated that the alternative amendment avenue would allow the states to modify the terms of their federation if the constitutional scheme proved imperfect after a short test.[73] In such a case, it would have been appropriate for states to have an equal voice in the proceedings. Today, however, the states are tightly bound in a strong federal union.[74] The people of the entire nation, and not the states as entities, are seen as the ultimate sovereigns of the nation.[75] The alternative amending process is more meaningfully justified today as the exercise by the American people of their power to change the terms on which they are governed than as the reconsideration by the states of the terms on which they compacted to unite themselves. Therefore, article V can justifiably be interpreted as permitting, if not compelling,[76] proportionate representation at the convention on a population basis.

---

[72] Cf. L. HAND, THE BILL OF RIGHTS 14–15 (1958) (justifying the Supreme Court's reading into the Constitution the authority to review the constitutionality of congressional legislation in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)). The notion that the Constitution is a static document which must be interpreted according to the exact or probable intent of its framers has not always been adhered to by the Supreme Court. See, e.g., Brown v. Board of Educ., 347 U.S. 483, 489–90 (1954). The "intent" of the framers should be read to include not only the actual or presumed intent based on conditions existing when the provision was drafted but also an intent that the Constitution be made to work in accordance with its underlying purposes, even if changed conditions necessitate an application which the framers could not have imagined. Cf. L. HAND, supra, at 23–25. Indeed, to rigidly limit a constitutional provision to the discernible intent of the framers may well contradict the fundamental nature of a written constitution, which is more than an ephemeral enactment designed to solve a specific problem. See id. at 14–15; Bickel, The Original Understanding and the Segregation Decision, 69 HARV. L. REV. 1, 58–59, 64–65 (1955); tenBroek, Use by the United States Supreme Court of Extrinsic Aids in Constitutional Construction, 26 CALIF. L. REV. 664, 680 (1938). In interpreting article V, a broad scope of judicial construction is especially appropriate because of the paucity of indicia of specific intent and because of the change in our nation from a loose federation of recently sovereign states to a tightly bound and interdependent federal union.

[73] See Black Letter 11.

[74] See Hearings 65 (remarks of Professor Bickel); Black, supra note 3, at 964–65.

[75] See Bonfield, supra note 40, at 991.

[76] A very strong argument can at least be made that the original Ervin Bill

Since the amendment process ought to provide all citizens with an equal voice to the extent consistent with the express words of the Constitution, the one man-one vote rule currently applied to the House of Representatives [77] and to state legislatures [78] ought to be applied to the convention. The fact that the nation's population is not proportionately represented at either the application or ratification stages of the amendment process makes it especially important that a consensus in favor of constitutional change at the convention reflect a similar consensus among the entire population. Thus, section 7(a) of the Ervin Bill should be changed to provide that one convention delegate be elected from each congressional district. Further, the clause in section 7(a) which now provides for election of delegates "in the manner provided by state law," should be changed to "in the manner provided by state law for the election of Representatives to Congress." [79] The purpose of this latter change would be to guarantee the application of the one man-one vote requirement to the election of delegates, since the states are constitutionally bound to apply the rule to the election of Representatives to Congress.[80]

D. To What Extent Can the Powers of the Convention Be Limited, and Who Has the Authority to Limit Them?

Following the realization in 1967 that Congress was close to being compelled to call a constitutional convention, commentators provision for voting by state bloc at the convention, with each state given an equal voice, was unconstitutional. Given today's population variances, this plan might have made it possible for less than a majority of the American people to bring about constitutional change, if only the inhabitants of thirty-eight of the more thinly populated states supported a particular amendment. See Hearings 19 (remarks of Senator Proxmire). This would be inconsistent with the entire constitutional scheme, for it would make constitutional amendment easier than ordinary legislation, which requires a majority vote of the House of Representatives representing the people on a one man-one vote basis. If a constitution is to be justified, constitutional amendment must be more difficult than passing legislation; otherwise, constitutional limitations on the legislative power would be meaningless. Cf. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 176 (1803).

[77] See Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1 (1964).

[78] See Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

[79] Of course, even if the Ervin Bill provided for one delegate from each of the nation's congressional districts, this would not be a strict application of the one man-one vote rule, for a few of the most thinly populated states would be entitled to one delegate representing less population than each of the delegates from the more populous states. See Dixon, Article V: The Comatose Article of Our Living Constitution?, 66 MICH. L. REV. 931, 945 (1968). However, the small variance in representation which would result from the provision would be preferable to the increased total number of delegates which would be necessary to achieve accurate equal representation. See id.

[80] Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1 (1964).

and legislators expressed the fear that the convention, once convened, would go beyond the subject matter defined by the applicant states and propose amendments significantly altering the structure of the federal government or abolishing the Bill of Rights.[81] In apparent response to such fears, the Ervin Bill provides that applications, to be aggregated toward the two-thirds requirement, must deal with the same "subject," [82] that the congressional resolution calling the convention must define this subject for the convention,[83] and that the convention may only propose amendments of the same "nature" as that stated in the resolution.[84] These provisions give rise to questions whether and to what extent the convention can constitutionally be limited as to subject matter, and whether the bill's provisions would empower Congress to impose excessive limitations. A further question which arises is whether Congress should be the institution to enforce those limitations which can be imposed on the convention.

1. Can a Convention Be Limited as to Subject Matter, and If So, to What Extent? — As noted above,[85] the Ervin Bill does not represent an attempt by Congress to preclude states from applying for an open convention. Rather, the bill attempts to provide a means by which the states may restrict the convention when they agree on the need for only limited constitutional change.

Although it would be contrary to article V if Congress attempted to limit the scope of a convention when the states had applied for an open convention,[86] it would seem to be consistent with, if not compelled by, the article for Congress to limit the convention in accordance with the express desires of the applicant

---

[81] See 113 CONG. REC. 10,102–03, 10,108–09, 10,112 (1967) (remarks of Senators Tydings, Proxmire, Javits, and Dirksen); Sorensen, The Quiet Campaign to Rewrite the Constitution, SATURDAY REVIEW, July 15, 1967, at 18.

[82] Ervin Bill § 6(a). Whether applications seeking a convention for different reasons should be counted together toward the requisite two-thirds of the states is not at issue in this discussion, since it is undisputed that they should not be. The Senate Judiciary Committee noted that "two centuries of practice" support the conclusion that a convention should not be called unless the application of two-thirds of the state legislatures deal with the same subject matter. SENATE REPORT 9. Indeed, if article V requires a consensus among two-thirds of the states as to the desirability of a constitutional convention, cf. p. 1620, an important part of this consensus would necessarily be similar views respecting the subject matter of the amendments desired. See Corwin & Ramsey, supra note 40, at 195–96. But see L. ORFIELD, supra note 40, at 42.

[83] Ervin Bill § 6(a).

[84] Id. § 10(b).

[85] See p. 1614 supra.

[86] It would clearly be consistent with article V for the states to request an open convention to revise generally the Constitution. See p. 1614 & note 8 supra.

states. If article V requires that a convention be called by Congress only when a consensus exists among two-thirds of the states with regard to the extent and subject matter of desired constitutional change,[87] then the convention should not be free to go beyond this consensus and address problems which did not prompt the state applications.[88]

Even the specific intent of the framers lends support to the conclusion that the convention need not be unlimited in scope.[89] Madison conceived of the amendment process as the amendment of specific "errors," [90] and Hamilton viewed article V as requiring that whenever the requisite number of states are "united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place." [91] Moreover, to interpret article V as not permitting a limited convention would impair the function of the alternative amendment process. States would be less likely to take advantage of the convention method of amendment if they believed a convention, once convened, would be free to propose drastic changes in the present constitutional scheme.[92]

Nevertheless, article V should be read to require that the

---

[87] See note 82 supra.

[88] See STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82ND CONG., 2D SESS., REPORT ON FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 15–16 (Comm. Print 1952); Bonfield, supra note 8, at 677. The only justification for requiring an unlimited constitutional convention would be the theoretical argument that such a convention is, by its nature, a sovereign body unrestricted by the Constitution which it was called to amend. See 46 CONG. REC. 2769 (1911) (remarks of Senator Heyburn); cf. Kauper, supra note 8, at 912 (language of article V can support the argument that the convention is free to propose whatever amendments it wants); Black Letter 11–13 (fact that most pre-twentieth century convention applications called for unlimited conventions evidences framers' intent to provide for conventions unlimited in scope). However, a convention called pursuant to article V is surely subject to the express limitation imposed by the article that an amendment may not be proposed to change the representation of states in the Senate. U.S. CONST. art. V. Since the article empowers the states to contract toward the convening of a constitutional convention, the convention should also be subject to limitations imposed by the agreement among the states. See BRICKFIELD, PROBLEMS RELATING TO A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 18 (Staff Report for the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess.) (Comm. Print. 1957); cf. Hearings 128 (American Enterprise Institute, Special Analysis) (convention should not have "primacy over other branches of government having equally responsible functions" in the amendment process). If a convention were not subject to limitations imposed by article V or by state legislatures exercising powers delegated by the article, it could not claim its legitimacy from the existing Constitution, but effectively would be a revolutionary convention. See J. JAMESON, supra note 35, at 10–11 (distinguishing a "constitutional convention" from a "revolutionary convention").

[89] See SENATE REPORT 8; Hearings 45 (remarks of Professor Mendelson). But see Black Letter 8.

[90] THE FEDERALIST No. 43, at 296 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) (J. Madison).

[91] THE FEDERALIST No. 85, at 592 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton).

[92] See Kauper, supra note 8, at 912.

convention be given some leeway in formulating the best solution to the states' grievance. Article V provides that the states are to submit "applications" for a convention and that the convention is to "propose amendments." It would be inconsistent with this language if states submitted texts of proposed amendments and asked the convention simply to vote them up or down.[93] A constitutional convention is required by article V to propose amendments because of the importance of having a deliberative body, national in scope and imbued with a sense of responsibility to the nation as a whole, deal with fundamental problems of national concern.[94] In order for the convention to perform this important function, it must have the freedom to decide whether the grievance expressed by the applicant states is best corrected by means of constitutional amendment, and if so, in what manner the amendment should approach the problem.[95]

2. Does the Ervin Bill Empower Congress to Impose Excessive Limitations on the Convention? — Section 6(a) of the Ervin Bill requires Congress to define the "subject" of a convention in the concurrent resolution by which the convention is called, while section 10(b) limits the convention to proposing amendments of the "nature" specified by Congress. Section 11(b) provides Con-

---

[93] See Hearings 61–62, 65, 68, 75, 77–89, 231 (remarks of Professor Bickel); Black, supra note 3, at 962–63. But see Hearings 52 (remarks of Professor Mendelson); Ervin, supra note 24, at 881–83.

[94] See Black, supra note 3, at 962–63; Bonfield, supra note 8, at 662–63. It is not certain, of course, that a large group of delegates representing local interests would suddenly become concerned about national long-term goals and fundamental constitutional principles at the expense of these local interests. However, a group which meets at the national level and recognizes its important role of changing the nation's fundamental law is at least likely to feel some responsibility to the nation as a whole. The extensive publicity the delegates would receive would add to this sense of responsibility.

[95] The campaign to secure an amendment to combat reapportionment of state legislatures provides an example of different approaches which might be used by a convention to attack a given problem. Twenty-nine of the applications for a convention sought an amendment authorizing at least one house of a bicameral state legislature to be malapportioned. Three applications suggested that the power of the federal courts to deal with apportionment be abrogated. Of the 29 states seeking a more direct approach to the problem, some wanted both houses of a bicameral legislature to be malapportioned, some wanted only one, and some went so far as to say that all local government was to be free to apportion itself as it saw fit. See Bonfield, supra note 40, at 970–72.

The fact that a convention must have some freedom in formulating a proposed amendment does not mean that a convention cannot be limited to deliberation on a given subject matter. It is possible to deal with only one grievance expressed by the states while still being free to approach the problem from whatever direction seems appropriate. See Hearings 61–62 (remarks of Professor Bickel) (Subcommittee urged to find a "middle ground" between unlimited revision of the Constitution and mere endorsement of an amendment proposed by the states).

gress with a sanction to enforce 10(b), allowing it to disapprove any proposed amendment which "relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution."

These provisions may be unconstitutional insofar as they permit Congress to impose excessive limitations on the convention and to block disfavored amendments. As noted above, a convention called to propose amendments to remedy particular grievances must be free to formulate the best solutions to these grievances. If, for example, a convention had been called to propose an amendment overruling the Supreme Court's reapportionment decisions,[96] the convention might have preferred an amendment which would limit the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to rule on the apportionment of state legislatures rather than one which would directly authorize state legislative apportionment on a nonpopulation basis.[97] Pursuant to article V, the convention must be free to propose an amendment taking either of these approaches. Yet the terms of the Ervin Bill would seemingly permit Congress to block an amendment taking the former approach on the ground that it "related to" or "included" the subject of federal court jurisdiction as well as that of legislative apportionment.

Not only might the bill enable Congress in this way to exercise excessive control over the scope of a convention, it might also permit the states, by their applications, to define too narrowly the subject matter of a convention. Applicant states might define a particular approach to be taken by an amendment or even submit a text of a proposed amendment. If Congress determined that the narrowly drawn approach was the "subject" of such applications, it might, in accordance with the expressed desires of the states, limit unconstitutionally the scope of the convention.[98] Or if state applications were too specific simply because of confusion about how accurately the "nature" of an amendment must be defined, Congress could misconstrue the states' actual intent and call a convention with a purpose narrower than would be consistent with both article V and the states' intent.

In order to prevent state and congressional attempts to limit excessively the scope of a convention and to eliminate the misreading of applicant states' intentions by Congress, several changes should be made in the language of the Ervin Bill. All stages of the process should focus on the grievance which motivated state legislatures to apply for a convention rather than on the nature of the amendments to be proposed. State applications should be required to specify only the problem or problems which are believed to be best remedied by constitutional amendment,[99] and Congress should merely restate the problem in the concurrent resolution by which it calls the convention. In order to protect the freedom of the convention to deal with this problem as it sees fit, the convention should be empowered to propose any amendment whose principal purpose is to remedy the grievance or grievances expressed by the states, regardless of whether the amendment "relates to" some other "subject."

[96] See p. 1612 & note 1 supra.

[97] See note 95 supra.

[98] Alternatively, Congress might reject the applications for failure to request an amendment-proposing convention consistent with the meaning of article V. See Bonfield, supra note 40, at 954–55.

3. Who Should Enforce the Limitations on the Scope of the Convention? — The Ervin Bill has designated Congress as the institution to decide whether proposed amendments go beyond the subject matter defined in state applications and to disapprove the proposed amendments if they do not satisfy this test.[100] Although this designation seems logical since Congress performs the function of generally administering the alternative amendment process, it may be contrary to article V because it provides Congress with powers which might be abused to block disfavored amendments, even if the bill is amended to incorporate the "primary purpose" test.

As previously noted,[101] Congress must not be in a position to obstruct the alternative amendment process — a process intended to bypass an obdurate Congress [102] — unless it is necessary, as a practical matter, to the implementation of Congress' duty to call a convention or of Congress' power to choose the mode of ratification. The enforcement by Congress of subject-matter limitations on the convention is not one of the "housekeeping matters" which must be performed in order to bring the convention into existence. The convention, once called, can use its own judgment to define limitations imposed by the applicant states, subject to a check by the states at the ratification stage or by courts when asked to interpret a new amendment as a rule of law in a case before them.[103] Nor can Congress justify its authority as incident to its power to choose the mode of ratification. Determining whether to submit a proposed amendment for ratification is unrelated to choosing the mode of ratification or the procedures, such as time limitations,[104] to be followed in ratification.

Thus, although the Ervin Bill should continue to limit the

---

[99] Of course, state applications could include as a mere suggestion or illustration a specific text or approach of a desired amendment.

[100] Ervin Bill § 11(b)(1).

[101] See pp. 1618–19 supra.

[102] See p. 1618 & note 32 supra.

[103] See pp. 1642–43 infra.

[104] See Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S .368 (1921).

subject matter which could be considered by a convention called pursuant to the bill, it should leave the enforcement of these limitations to the convention itself, subject to check only by the ratification process and by the courts.

E. Should Amendments Be Proposed by Vote of a Simple Majority or a Two-Thirds Majority of the Delegates to the Convention?

Immediately prior to the passage of the Ervin Bill, section 10(a) was amended by a vote on the Senate floor to require a two-thirds vote of the convention delegates to propose amendments.[105] Advocates of the two-thirds requirement noted that article V did not specify the convention voting requirement and argued that it should not be easier for a convention to propose amendments than it is for Congress.[106] It was further argued that the requirement of applications from two-thirds of the states did not provide an adequate check on the process, because the question of whether a convention is needed to propose amendments is far different from the question of whether a particular amendment should be proposed.[107]

However, no argument satisfactorily dealt with the fact that article V expressly required a supermajority consensus for convention applications, ratifications, and the proposal of amendments by Congress, but does not require a supermajority vote for the proposal of amendments by a convention.[108] Even more significantly, advocates of a two-thirds requirement ignored Congress' narrow role in the alternative amendment process. As noted above,[109] any requirement imposed by Congress which is not necessary for Congress to bring a convention into existence or to choose the mode of ratification is outside Congress' constitutional authority. Since a convention, once underway, could itself decide what vote should be required to propose amendments, the two-thirds requirement predetermined by Congress would appear to be unconstitutional.

---

[105] 117 CONG. REC. S16,531 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

[106] See Hearings 37 (remarks of Mr. Sorensen); id. at 239 (memorandum of Professor McCloskey); 117 CONG. REC. S16,526 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971) (remarks of Senator Bayh); Bonfield, supra note 8, at 676. Professor Mendelson has stated that if a two-thirds vote is required in Congress, where one house is checking another, "it seems incredible" that Congress could not require a two-thirds majority for proposal of amendments by a convention. Hearings 47.

[107] See Letter from Professor Freund to Senator Bayh, 117 CONG. REC. S16,526 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

[108] See 117 CONG. REC. S16,524–25 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971) (remarks of Senator Hruska).

[109] See pp. 1618–19 supra.

To be sure, Congress must specify an initial voting requirement by which a convention would decide how it should operate, and it might be contended that a two-thirds voting requirement for this purpose is reasonable. However, if Congress required a two-thirds vote subject to change by a convention, a minority of slightly more than one-third of the delegates could block any change in the two-thirds requirement, thereby compelling its application to the proposal of amendments. Since Congress could easily provide for initial voting by simple majority at the convention subject to modification by a vote requiring a stronger consensus for the proposal of amendments, this congressional obstruction is not necessary as a practical matter and is therefore beyond Congress' constitutional authority to implement the alternative amendment process.

F. Will Judicial Review of Congressional Action Be Possible?

The Ervin Bill provides that determinations made by Congress regarding the procedural sufficiency of state applications, rescissions, and ratifications shall be "binding on all others, including State and Federal courts." [110] The bill similarly precludes judicial review of congressional determinations of whether amendments proposed by a convention are of the same "nature" as those specified in the resolution calling the convention.[111] These provisions seem an attempt to bar judicial review not only of determinations made within the bounds of Congress' constitutional authority — determinations which the Court, of course, would not review anyway — but also of congressional determinations which exceed the limits of this authority.

The Senate Judiciary Committee did not articulate its reasons for Congress' authority for barring judicial review. Nor was the question discussed in any detail during hearings on the bill. Participants in the hearings seemed to assume that the courts would refuse to review any questions decided by Congress in the amendment process on the ground that they were nonjusticiable political questions.[112]

Whether this assumption of nonjusticiability is correct is the first of three questions raised by the Ervin Bill's attempts to preclude judicial review. The second is whether, if amendment-related issues are in fact justiciable, the Ervin Bill will still effectively bar judicial review on the basis of Congress' control over [110] Ervin Bill §§ 3(b), 5(c), 13(c).

---

[111] Id. § 10(b). Questions arising from the amendment process are to be submitted first to the Committees on the Judiciary. See SENATE REPORT 14.

[112] See Hearings 107 (Library of Congress Legislative Reference Service, Procedures for Amending the United States Constitution).

the jurisdiction of the federal courts and the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The final question is whether, even if the issues are justiciable and Congress did not effectively preclude review, judicial review will nonetheless fail in some instances because there is no defendant against whom the courts could grant relief.

1. The Justiciability of Issues Related to the Amendment Process. — The Supreme Court has applied the "political question" doctrine to a broad range of cases in holding actions of the legislative or executive branch of government conclusive on the courts.[113] When the Court deems a political question to be involved in a case, it does not merely give the political branches broad discretion; it rules the issue entirely nonjusticiable.

It has been argued that any determination of Congress related to the amending process constitutes such a political question.[114] The Supreme Court decision in Coleman v. Miller [115] is often cited in support of this argument. In Coleman the Court refused to rule on whether a state could ratify a child labor amendment fifteen years after its proposal by Congress. The Court deferred to Congress on this question, reasoning that the political, social, and economic factors which prompted the amendment should determine whether the proposed amendment was still viable,[116] and therefore susceptible to ratification, and that these factors could not properly be weighed by the courts.[117] Four Justices criticized the narrowness of the holding [118] and stated that the amending process "itself is 'political' in its entirety, from sub-

---

[113] See, e.g., Chicago & S. Air Lines v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103 (1948) (question whether President followed statutory standards in reviewing CAB grant of application to engage in overseas air transportation); Ex parte Peru, 318 U.S. 578 (1943) (question whether foreign vessel is immune from suit because owned by a foreign sovereign, when the State Department has so certified); Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649 (1892) (question whether an enrolled Act of Congress conforms to the bill as passed by both houses). See generally Scharpf, Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Analysis, 75 YALE L.J. 517 (1966).

[114] See BRICKFIELD, supra note 88, at 27; L. ORFIELD, supra note 40, at 41; Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1068 (1957).

[115] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[116] The amendment in Coleman had been proposed by Congress to overrule Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918), which held unconstitutional federal statutes regulating child labor. Substantial changes in economic and social conditions after proposal could have made such federal protection of children no longer necessary and placed in doubt the continued viability of state ratifications performed when the protection was badly needed.

[117] 307 U.S. at 451–56.

[118] Seven Justices, including the four who desired a broader decision, joined in the "Opinion of the Court." Two Justices dissented.

mission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control, or interference at any point." [119]

However, prior to Coleman the Supreme Court had reached the merits in deciding several issues related to the amending process. For example, in Dillon v. Gloss [120] the Court ruled that seven years was a "reasonable" time limit for Congress to place on ratification of an amendment. And in Leser v. Garnett,[121] the Court held that state legislatures, in ratifying proposed amendments, could not be bound by procedural requirements imposed by their state constitutions.[122] Since Coleman did not overrule these cases,[123] and since the Court based its holding on the particular relevance of the economic and social issues involved, Coleman does not stand for the proposition that absolute nonjusticiability attaches to all questions related to the amendment process. Indeed, the political, social, and economic factors which the Court felt ill-equipped to consider in Coleman will not control most issues in the alternative amendment process. Since the purpose of the alternative method of amendment is to allow citizens to bypass an obdurate Congress in bringing about constitutional change,[124] Congress is not free to weigh political, economic, and social factors before calling a convention or submitting proposed amendments for ratification. Moreover, many of the issues which might arise from the process — such as how narrowly Congress can limit the convention as to subject matter — will involve constitutional interpretation, and are thus issues which belong presumptively in a court of justice.[125] [119] 307 U.S. at 459 (Black, J., concurring).

---

[120] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[121] 258 U.S. 130 (1922).

[122] The Court ruled that state constitutional provisions purporting to invalidate certain state legislative ratifications of the nineteenth amendment were of no effect because the legislatures were performing a "federal function" in ratifying an amendment to the federal Constitution. If the Court had desired to reach the same result by ruling questions relating to the amendment process "political questions," it would have ruled that Congress, by accepting the ratifications of the states, had determined that they were valid and that the Court would not inquire into that determination.

The appellees in Leser did argue that the issue was nonjusticiable. See Brief for Appellees at 40–45. See also Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae at 4–9. But the Court's opinion did not mention the "political question" issue.

[123] The Court distinguished Dillon on the ground that the Dillon Court had not been asked to choose its own time limit on ratification but simply to approve or disapprove the deadline imposed by Congress. Id. at 452–53. The Court therefore did not accept Justice Black's argument that the Dillon Court's inquiry into the merits of the seven year period should be disapproved. Id. at 459 (concurring opinion).

[124] See p. 1618 & note 32 supra.

[125] See Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18 (1958).

Furthermore, Coleman may be read narrowly by the Supreme Court today because of recent developments of the political question doctrine. In Baker v. Carr [126] the Court, in ruling that the issue of state legislative apportionment is not a political question, mapped out a more active role for the federal courts in the treatment of alleged political questions. Baker established the following criteria for identifying a nonjusticiable political question: [127]

> [A] textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

The Court stated that "[u]nless one of these formulations is inextricable from the case at bar, there should be no dismissal for nonjusticiability . . . ." [128]

Application of relevant [129] Baker v. Carr criteria to issues arising from the alternative amendment process demonstrates that those issues would not be nonjusticiable political questions. Judicial review of amendment-related issues would not be excluded on the basis of a "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment" of the issues to Congress.[130] The mere fact that the Constitution gives Congress the duty to call a convention and the power to choose the mode of ratification should not be considered a textual commitment of unlimited discretionary power over the entire amendment process.

To be sure, the duty imposed on Congress by article V implies certain powers incident to fulfilling that duty.[131] However, the Constitution commits numerous powers to the political branches without committing absolute and unreviewable discretion in the

---

[126] 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[127] Id. at 217.

[128] Id.

[129] At least one of the Baker v. Carr criteria does not seem at all relevant to review of congressional decisions in the alternative amendment process. There could be no "impossibility of deciding [a question] without an initial policy determination" of a political branch where the courts would be reviewing the constitutionality only of determinations already made by Congress.

[130] Justice Black failed to convince the Court in Coleman that article V did textually commit these issues to Congress. 307 U.S. at 458–59 (Black, J., concurring).

[131] See pp. 1617–18 supra.

exercise of those powers. Generally, political questions arise not simply because issues are "committed" to the political branches, but because some other Baker criterion is present, such as a "lack of judicially manageable standards" or the "potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements." [132] That the constitutional grant of a power to Congress, standing alone, will not make its exercise unreviewable is amply demonstrated by the fact that the Court has traditionally reviewed the exercise of powers, such as Congress' power to regulate commerce, which are far more explicitly committed to Congress than powers merely implied from the article V duty to call a convention.[133] In this normal judicial review, the Court ensures that the limits of the power granted are not exceeded and that other constitutional provisions are not infringed.

Indeed, in Powell v. McCormack [134] the Court indicated that an issue is not necessarily a political question even when a constitutional provision seems explicitly to commit the determination of its meaning to Congress. The Court in Powell did not demur in the face of the constitutional provision that each house of Congress "shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members." [135] Rather, the Court itself determined that the qualifications which Congress had the power to judge did not extend to those upon which Congressman-elect Adam Clayton Powell was excluded from the House.[136] Thus, in the alternative amendment process, if Congress acted beyond the powers given it by article V, as interpreted by the Court, the Court could apply the reasoning of Powell to justify a finding

---

[132] See Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962). The "textual commitment" of a power has most often been found with regard to the foreign relations powers of the political branches. See id. at 211–212; Scharpf, supra note 113, at 541.

[133] See Scharpf, supra note 113, at 540. For example, article 1, § 8 of the Constitution provides that "Congress shall have Power . . . [t]o regulate Commerce . . . among the several States . . . ." But the Court will nevertheless inquire whether congressional action has exceeded the bounds of the power granted by the Constitution. See, e.g., United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941); Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918).

[134] 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

[135] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 5.

[136] 395 U.S. at 547–48. The House had excluded Congressman-elect Powell and had refused to pay his salary on grounds of misconduct and deceit regarding the use of committee funds. The Court interpreted "qualifications" in article 1, § 5 to mean only the age, citizenship, and residency requirements imposed on Congressmen by article 1, § 2, and not their prior behavior.

It might well be questioned whether the Court, despite the language of Powell, would have felt itself limited by even article 1, § 5 if there had been a congressional determination that the Congressman-elect was only twenty years old, and hence not eligible to be a Representative. U.S. CONST. art. 1, § 2.

that a question decided by Congress was not textually committed to it.

Nor is there a lack of judicially manageable standards for resolving constitutional issues arising from the amendment process. The Court in Coleman rested its finding of nonjusticiability on a lack of judicially manageable standards to evaluate historical developments.[137] But, unlike the issue in Coleman, many of the questions which the Ervin Bill commits to Congress will not involve appraisals of economic and social developments. For example, determining whether state applications deal with the same subject, or whether a proposed amendment is of the "nature" defined by the concurrent resolution calling the convention, would involve only facial comparisons of documents without consideration of the underlying social conditions which motivated their adoption.[138]

Nor would "unquestioning adherence to political decisions already made" justify the refusal to review the contemporaneous actions of Congress in the amending process.[139] Reliance on a new amendment would be minimal, because litigation brought to test it would move quickly through the courts.[140]

A pronouncement by the Supreme Court that Congress had overstepped its constitutional bounds in refusing, for example, to call a convention when article V requirements had been met could well embarrass Congress and evidence some "lack of repect" of the Court for Congress. However, the "embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements" parameter of the Baker test

---

[137] See 307 U.S. at 451–56; p. 1635 supra.

[138] It is conceivable that the Court might even find standards for reviewing the time limit placed on state applications. Although the Coleman Court would not set a deadline on ratification of a particular amendment, a Court reviewing the lifespan set by statute for all applications, regardless of subject matter, would only have to consider the constitutional requirement of a reasonably contemporaneous consensus, see p. 1620 supra, and could determine reasonableness by the duration and frequency of state legislative sessions. See pp. 1620–21 supra.

[139] This particular Baker test would, however, provide the grounds on which the Court would refuse to review the procedural sufficiency of longstanding amendments to the Constitution, such as the Reconstruction amendments. Cf. Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1, 7 (1849) (if Court were to recognize one government within a state over another, laws passsed by the one would be nullities, taxes wrongfully collected, salaries illegally paid, public accounts improperly settled, judgments and sentences null and void, and state officers trespassers).

[140] The recent case of New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), was resolved by the Supreme Court within eighteen days of the beginning of the controversy. See The Supreme Court, 1970 Term, 85 HARV. L. REV. 3, 200 (1971). A constitutional amendment would probably have even more far-reaching and immediately felt implications, meriting equally expeditious judicial review.

has been applied almost exclusively to avoid embarrassment of the Government in the area of foreign relations.[141] For example, when a question such as the duration of a war is at issue, the Court has felt the American position best defined by the political departments.[142] In other areas, despite the language of Baker, the Court has risked causing embarrassment and showing "lack of respect" to the President and Congress by ruling unconstitutional a number of actions to which those branches had committed their prestige. For example, in declaring unlawful President Truman's seizure of the steel mills during the Korean crisis,[143] and in overruling President Roosevelt's New Deal legislation,[144] the Court frustrated the goals of the political branches instead of declining jurisdiction on the grounds that it faced a political question.

Even more significant, perhaps, is the Court's treatment of the possibility of embarrassing Congress in the post-Baker case of Powell v. McCormack.[145] In rejecting the "political question" defense, the Court disposed quickly of the claim that the potentiality of embarrassing confrontation between coordinate branches made the question nonjusticiable. Determining that adjudication would require only "an interpretation of the Constitution," the Court stated that it could not abdicate this responsibility: [146]

---

[141] See Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 211–14 (1962); Scharpf, supra note 113, at 573–77.

[142] See Scharpf, supra note 113, at 575.

[143] Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952).

[144] E.g., Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238 (1936); A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495 (1935).

[145] 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

[146] Id. at 549.

One further factor, unique to the constitutional amendment process and not considered in Baker, could arguably make it proper for the Court to decline adjudication of amendment-related issues. Just as the Court provides a check on the constitutionality of congressional actions, the amendment process is the only means by which the people can "overrule" the Court's decisions to ensure that the basic values the Court reflects do not deviate excessively from those of the people. See Scharpf, supra note 113, at 588–89. The Court should therefore be careful not to interpret article V to preserve its own decisions. As Professor Scharpf argues:

> [T]he amendment process is . . . one instance in which the Court cannot assume responsibility for saying what the law is without undermining . . . the legitimacy of its power to say so. . . . [J]udicial review in a democracy remains defensible only to the extent that the Court itself will be defenseless against the processes through which the community may assert and enforce its own considered understanding of its basic code.

Id. at 589.

However, Congress, too, would probably be unsympathetic to the constitutional change sought; the use of the convention process would indicate that Congress had been unwilling to propose the constitutional change at issue.

Given the potential partiality of both Congress and the Court, the Court should

> Our system of government requires that federal courts on occasion interpret the Constitution in a manner at variance with the construction given the document by another branch. The alleged conflict that such an adjudication may cause cannot justify the courts' avoiding their constitutional responsibility.

2. Will the Ervin Bill Bar Judicial Review? — The fact that most constitutional issues arising from the alternative amendment process will not be considered nonjusticiable political questions raises the issue whether the Ervin Bill itself will compel the courts to decline consideration of controversies falling within its terms. Congress has considerable power over the jurisdiction of lower federal courts,[147] the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court,[148] and the jurisdiction of state courts when federal questions are involved.[149] But because of the ways in which controversies will arise, the provisions of the Ervin Bill barring review will not preclude judicial consideration of justiciable constitutional issues.

Controversies related to the amendment process could arise in two ways. First, Congress could take affirmative action, such as calling a convention, submitting a proposal for ratification, or declaring an amendment properly ratified, when constitutional requirements allegedly had not been met. A dispute over the validity of the amendment, once promulgated,[150] would enter the have the final say in interpreting article V. The Court's usual function of applying principles of law to the issues before it would hopefully make its interpretation of the Constitution more impartial, or at least more widely respected, than similar interpretations by Congress, whose usual role involves the making of political judgments rather than the application of legal analysis. See Bickel, Foreword: The Passive Virtues, The Supreme Court, 1960 Term, 75 HARV. L. REV. 40, 74 (1961); McCloskey, Foreword: The Reapportionment Case, The Supreme Court, 1961 Term, 76 HARV. L. REV. 54, 67 (1962).

---

[147] The constitutional authority of Congress to "ordain and establish" the lower federal courts, see U.S. CONST. art. III, § 1, has long been held to include the power to define the jurisdiction of these courts and to withhold from them jurisdiction over enumerated controversies. See, e.g., Lockerty v. Phillips, 319 U.S. 182 (1943); Lauf v. E.G. Shinner & Co., 303 U.S. 323, 330 (1938); Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 441 (1850).

[148] The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is subject to "such Exceptions . . . as the Congress shall make." U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2; see Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506, 514 (1868). But see Hart, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 HARV. L. REV. 1362, 1365 (1953) ("the exceptions [to the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction] must not be such as will destroy the essential role of the Supreme Court in the constitutional plan") [hereinafter cited as Hart].

[149] See Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503, 511–12 (1944); The "Moses Taylor," 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 411 (1867); Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304, 348–50 (1816).

[150] No party is likely to be permitted to challenge the constitutionality of congressional action until the 38th state has ratified. Before this time the possibility federal courts under their federal-question jurisdiction.[151] For example, if the amendment purportedly created a criminal or civil cause of action, suits brought under the amendment would be federal questions, and the invalidity of the amendment would be asserted as a defense. If, on the other hand, the amendment purported to abolish a federal cause of action, the plaintiff, suing under the federal rights which existed before the amendment, would assert the invalidity of the amendment after the amendment had been raised as a defense. For example, if the amendment provided that the fourteenth amendment guarantees no one a right to attend racially integrated schools, and if the amendment resulted in a return to segregated schools, a black plaintiff could allege a violation of his federal rights as defined by the equal protection clause and Brown v. Board of Education,[152] thereby raising a federal question. Before the suit could be dismissed, the court would have to determine whether the amendment was indeed valid and had overruled the Brown doctrine.

Once a controversy was within the general jurisdiction of a federal court, it would determine the validity of the amendment involved. Since a court cannot be made to apply a rule of law which it finds to be unconstitutional,[153] congressional attempts to exclude judicial review of an amendment's validity would be to no avail.[154] The court would examine the constitutionality of that an amendment would not become part of the Constituion would presumably prevent a party from showing any actual or imminent injury, and therefore the requisite "case or controversy" would not exist. See U.S. CONST. art. III, § 1.

---

[151] 28 U.S.C. § 1331 (1970). It might be argued that an invalid amendment could not give rise to a federal question and that a defendant sued by a plaintiff claiming a right under an invalid amendment would properly assert as a defense the court's lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter, FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(1), rather than the plaintiff's failure to state a claim on which relief could be granted. FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(6). But federal-question jurisdiction is present when the outcome of a controversy depends on the validity of a federal law, C. WRIGHT, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF FEDERAL COURTS 57 (2d ed. 1970), and would surely also be present when the outcome depended on the validity of a constitutional amendment.

[152] 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

[153] See Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, 463–68 (1944) (Rutledge, J., dissenting) (Congress cannot confer jurisdiction and direct that it be exercised in a manner inconsistent with constitutional requirements); United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128, 147–48 (1872) (Congress, when granting the Supreme Court jurisdiction over a category of cases, cannot prescribe the application of an unconstitutional rule of law by forbidding the Court to give effect to presidential pardons); Hart 1373, 1378–79, 1387–96. But see Duncan v. The "Francis Wright," 105 U.S. 381 (1882) (the authority to limit jurisdiction carries with it the authority to exclude review of particular issues).

[154] See Lipke v. Lederer, 259 U.S. 557 (1922) (Court exercising federal question jurisdiction enjoined summary collection of tax held to be a penalty, in spite of statutory prohibition of injunctions against federal taxes); Wong Wing v.

congressional determinations in the amendment process and refuse to enforce the amendment, either as the original source of the federal right on which the action was based or as a defense to an otherwise valid federal action, if constitutional requirements had not been met.[155]

The second and probably more likely situation from which amendment-related controversies would arise would be an allegedly unconstitutional refusal by Congress to proceed at some stage of the amendment process, even though constitutional requirements had been met by the states. In such a case, the party most likely to be aggrieved and to have standing to sue would be one of the states whose legislature had initiated the process.[156] The controversy would be one to which a state is a party and therefore within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court,[157] which Congress cannot limit.[158] Again, congressional attempts to bar review of congressional determinations would be unavailing because the Court surely cannot be prevented from vin-

---

United States, 163 U.S. 228 (1896) (Court exercising habeas corpus jurisdiction invalidated "nonreviewable" summary proceedings and severe punishment for Chinese thought to be in the country unlawfully); Hart 1387–88.

[155] If the court treated an allegation of an amendment's invalidity as a defense to the court's jurisdiction, see note 151 supra, it still would have to determine the issue of validity in evaluating its jurisdiction, see C. WRIGHT, supra note 151, at 52–53, and at that point would refuse to give effect to an unconstitutional amendment.

[156] Since the state legislature is the entity whose right to initiate the process of amending the Constitution is guaranteed by article V, there is little question that a sufficiently fundamental state interest exists to give the state standing to sue when Congress refuses to proceed with the amendment process. A state's rights under article V are certainly as fundamental as those state proprietary rights which have been sufficient to confer standing. See, e.g., Alabama v. Arizona, 291 U.S. 286 (1934); Kentucky v. Indiana, 281 U.S. 163 (1930).

[157] U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2. The Supreme Court can decline to exercise its original jurisdiction when another forum is available, when issues are tied to questions of local law, or when complicated factual questions are presented with which the Court is not equipped to deal. See Ohio v. Wyandotte Chem. Corp., 401 U.S. 493 (1971); Note, The Original Jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court, 11 STAN. L. REV. 665, 694–700 (1959). However, it is unlikely that the Court would decline to rule on the questions of constitutional interpretation which are likely to predominate in disputes arising from the amending process. Moreover, the framers provided for Supreme Court original jurisdiction over controversies in which a state is a party in part to provide a prestigious forum for issues involving adjustments within the federal structure, and for litigants who are sovereigns in their own right. See THE FEDERALIST No. 81, at 548 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton); Note, supra, at 665. It would be inconsistent with this intention for the Court to decline jurisdiction over questions related to the important process of amending the federal Constitution.

[158] Congress has the power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction, but not to its original jurisdiction. U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2.

dicating, in suits properly before it, constitutional rights which have been violated.

Of course, relief in cases where Congress has unconstitutionally forestalled the alternative amendment process would probably be limited to declaratory judgments. The Supreme Court, in order to preserve comity between the separate branches of the federal government, would be unlikely to order Congress to call a convention or to submit a proposed amendment for ratification.[159] But declaratory relief may force Congress to act. If, as is likely, Congress' only justification for refusing to proceed in carrying out the alternative amendment process was that constitutional requirements had not been met, a declaration by the Supreme Court that constitutional requirements had been met would eliminate this justification. And since two-thirds of the state legislatures, presumably representing a large segment of the population, would have expressed a desire for constitutional change, political exigencies would probably compel congressional action once its constitutional reasons for inaction had been undercut.

3. When a State Brings an Action Against Congress, Who Can Be Named as a Defendant? — If a state were to bring an action after Congress had failed to call a convention or to submit a proposed amendment for ratification, it might have some difficulty finding a defendant against whom the Court would afford even declaratory relief.

The logical defendants would be a few members of each House of Congress, perhaps including the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate, as representatives of the class of persons serving in Congress.[160] However, the speech and debate clause [161] of the Constitution is likely to be raised as a defense in abatement by members of Congress named as defendants.

The clause provides that "for any Speech or Debate in either House, . . . [Senators and Representatives] shall not be questioned in any other place." This protection originated in the seventeenth century efforts of the English Parliament to prevent

---

[159] See Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1867). In Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969), the Court granted only declaratory relief, stating that Powell had been unconstitutionally excluded by Congress and his pay unlawfully withheld. Id. at 550. However, the Court left open the possibility that the lower court, on remand, might compel the Sergeant at Arms, by writ of mandamus, to give Powell his back pay. Id. Such mandamus would have indirectly forced Congress to act, since the Sergeant at Arms could not reasonably be expected to pay Powell without a congressional appropriation.

[160] See Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 493 (1969).

[161] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 6.

intimidation by the king and a judiciary in concert with the king.[162] The clause still serves to preserve the independence and integrity of legislators by allowing them to exercise their own judgment in representing their constituents without fear of having to defend themselves in court.[163]

However, a strong argument can be made that the clause would not extend to protect congressional activity involved in administering the alternative amendment process. To be sure, the speech and debate clause protects not only words spoken in Congress but also all legitimate legislative activity, including voting, investigations, and written reports,[164] even if the activity is undertaken for an "unworthy purpose."[165] But the protection of the clause is limited to "legitimate legislative activity." In four major Supreme Court cases applying the clause, the Court first assured itself that the actions protected were indeed legitimate legislative activity.[166] Arguably, the role performed by Congress in the alternative amendment process is not legislative at all. Congress is required to perform administrative acts to implement a convention; it is not permitted to exercise legislative judgment about the merits of the constitutional change sought by the states. The purpose of the speech and debate clause — preservation of Congress' freedom to carry out its policies without fear of harassment — is inapplicable where Congress is not free to make policy determinations.

However, if the Court did not accept this narrow reading of "legitimate legislative activity," and if it applied the speech and debate clause to protect members of Congress, the plaintiff-states would have to look elsewhere for defendants against whom declaratory judgments could be secured. Though this search might be difficult in some cases, it would probably not be futile. When the courts have applied the speech and debate clause to bar relief against legislators, they have generally vindicated the constitutional rights of plaintiffs in other ways. In Powell and two earlier

---

[162] See United States v. Johnson, 383 U.S. 169, 178, 181–82 (1966).

[163] See Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 503 (1969); United States v. Johnson, 383 U.S. 169, 179–80 (1966); Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367, 373–75 (1951).

[164] Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168 (1881).

[165] Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367, 377 (1951).

[166] Dombrowski v. Eastland, 387 U.S. 82, 84–85 (1967); United States v. Johnson, 383 U.S. 169, 177 (1966); Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367, 376 (1951); Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 204 (1881). In Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969), the Court found that adequate relief could be afforded against the House employees named as defendants, id. at 504–06; it therefore expressly refused to decide the question of whether Congress' unconstitutional exclusion of Powell was outside the scope of legitimate legislative activity. Id. at 501–02.

cases, relief was afforded against employees of Congress.[167] Powell obtained a declaratory judgment that the Clerk of the House had unlawfully threatened to refuse to perform the services due him, that the Sergeant at Arms had unlawfully refused to pay his salary, and that the Doorkeeper had unlawfully threatened to deny him admission to the House chamber. The Court in Powell expressly left open the question whether an action might be maintained against members of Congress "where no agents participated in the challenged action and no other remedy was available." [168]

This statement in Powell may be an indication that the Court will find a defendant whenever constitutional rights are being violated. Indeed, the use of congressional employees as defendants represents only a means of placing a nominal defendant before the Court in order to circumvent the language of the speech and debate clause. In Kilbourn v. Thompson,[169] for example, the Court held actionable a claim against the House Sergeant at Arms who had arrested the plaintiff pursuant to an unconstitutional order of Congress, though it is difficult to conceive of the Sergeant at Arms defying Congress by refusing to carry out at least a colorably constitutional order.

In the case of suits brought by states alleging unconstitutional inaction on the part of Congress in the amendment process, it may be more difficult to name a congressional employee as a defendant. Unlike Kilbourn and Powell, where congressional employees performed an act or failed to perform a duty on specific order by Congress, congressional inaction in the amendment process would make it difficult to find participation by a congressional employee in the infringement of constitutional rights. To declare that a congressional employee had acted unconstitutionally in failing to call a convention, where Congress had not [167] Dombrowski v. Eastland, 387 U.S. 82 (1967) (suit for conspiracy to seize records in violation of fourth amendment held actionable against chief counsel of Senate subcommittee); Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168 (1881) (suit for false imprisonment held actionable against the House Sergeant at Arms).

The two cases where the Court did apply the speech and debate clause to protect legislators without simultaneously finding legislative employees to serve as defendants can be distinguished. In United States v. Johnson, 383 U.S. 169 (1966), the speech and debate clause prevented a Congressman's speech from being used against him in a criminal trial; therefore the application of the clause did not result in a denial of a remedy to a plaintiff in a civil action. In Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367 (1951), the plaintiff failed to obtain relief against California state legislators for violations of his first amendment rights by prosecution for his refusing to testify before a legislative committee. However, the plaintiff failed to name any legislative employees as defendants. If he had done so, he might have obtained at least declaratory relief.

[168] 395 U.S. at 506 n.26.

[169] 103 U.S. 168 (1881).

authorized him to act or given him any guidelines, is even more absurd than to declare that the Sergeant at Arms in Powell had unlawfully withheld salary where guidelines for payment existed but where Congress had refused to appropriate the money.

However, since congressional employees are only nominal defendants, and since only declaratory relief would be afforded, it would not be unreasonable to name as defendants congressional employees who could not have called a convention without authorization and guidelines from Congress. Thus the Administrator of General Services, who is to send proposed amendments to the states for ratification unless Congress disapproves them,[170] might be named as a defendant when Congress' disapproval of the proposed amendment is alleged to be unconstitutional. If Congress refused to call a convention, the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate could be named as defendants, since they have the obligation to maintain a record of applications received on each subject[171] and presumably to transmit to the states the concurrent resolution calling the convention.[172]

If the Court refused to consider the inaction of these congressional employees to be sufficiently responsible for the violation of the plaintiff-states' right to a constitutional convention, the Court would have the alternative of following its suggestion in Powell that absent an agent of Congress against whom relief could be secured, the speech and debate clause might not protect members of Congress. Or, to repeat, the Court might deem the nonlegislative function of Congress in the amendment process to be outside the scope of the clause's protection. It would certainly be odd if the states could not vindicate their constitutional right to have access to the amendment process merely because a defendant could not be found for purposes of awarding declaratory relief.

4. Conclusions Regarding Judicial Review. — Few of the constitutional issues arising out of the alternative amendment process are likely to be treated as nonjusticiable political questions by the Supreme Court. And the Court will not decline to rule on these matters on the ground that Congress has expressly excluded judicial review. Further, in cases where a state is suing due to congressional inaction, the Court will probably find some party against whom declaratory relief can be afforded.

Thus, the constitutionality of congressional action or inaction will probably be reviewed by the Supreme Court, the provisions

---

[170] Ervin Bill § 11(c).

[171] Id. § 6(a).

[172] The Ervin Bill does not name the person responsible for this action. See id. § 6(a).

of the Ervin Bill notwithstanding. And if the Court should decline to review a given determination of Congress, it will do so not because the Ervin Bill bars review, but because the issue is either a political question, falling within a class of issues governed by Coleman v. Miller, or is within the constitutional limits of Congress' discretion.

Since the provisions of the Ervin Bill purporting to bar review serve no purpose, and since they could potentially exacerbate the embarrassment caused Congress by the Court's review, it would be advisable to strike them from the bill.

59-609 O - 80 - 45

(University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform, Fall 1973)

ARTICLE V: CHANGING DIMENSIONS IN CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

Francis H. Heller*

To anyone raised under the Constitution of the United States, that document's declaration that it is "the supreme law of the land"[1] may appear as a commonplace assertion. In some other nations the constitution is not viewed as law, but is seen as a primarily political document.[2] In fact, some foreign constitutions are formally proclaimed to be "political constitutions."[3] The writers of the American Constitution were well aware that they were engaged in fashioning an arrangement for the exercise of political functions and the peaceful adjustment of political conflict.[4] And, however much validity there continues to be to de Tocqueville's famous dictum that in America every issue of policy is translated into constitutional terms and debated as a legal issue,[5] it is also a historical fact that, by long-standing precedent of the Supreme Court, some issues arising under the Constitution are candidly designated "political questions,"[6] while others are often avoided by the selective application of judicially developed rules of caution.[7]

A constitution, viewed as a political document, is a framework

---

* Roy A. Roberts Professor of Law and Political Science, University of Kansas School of Law. M.A., 1941, J.D., 1941, Ph.D., 1948, University of Virginia.

[1] U.S. CONST. art. VI.

[2] C. FRIEDRICH, CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT AND DEMOCRACY, ch. 9 (4th ed. 1968).

[3] See, e.g., POLITICAL CONST. OF COLUMBIA, Preamble (1886). See also CONSTITUTIONS OF THE COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD (A. Blaustein & G. Flantz eds. 1971), a comprehensive loose-leaf collection of current constitutional texts.

[4] THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, passim (rev. ed. M. Farrand 1937); Roche, The Founding Fathers: A Reform Caucus in Action, 55 AM. POL. SCI. REV. 799, 815 (1961), also in J. ROCHE, SHADOW AND SUBSTANCE 91-126 (1964).

[5] 1 A. DE TOCQUEVILLE, DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA 284 (H. Reeve transl. 1898). Note also Corwin's observation that "[m]any other countries have . . . constitutions, but 'the constitutional lawyer' is a unique product of our system. . . ." E. CORWIN, THE TWILIGHT OF THE SUPREME COURT xxii (1934).

[6] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 210-27 (1962); Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849). Scharpf, Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Analysis, 75 YALE L.J. 517 (1966).

[7] Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 346-48 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). A. BICKEL, THE LEAST DANGEROUS BRANCH 119-27 (1962); Corwin, Judicial Review in Action, 74 U. PA. L. REV. 639, 642-51 (1926).

for the exercise of power in the polity. Legal rules, by contrast, purport to determine the broad range of societal relationships.[8] When a constitution is treated as just another form of law, there results an ambiguity of thought that tends to overshadow significant functional differences.

What is properly a subject for inclusion in a constitution? Even the most superficial perusal of the Index Digest of State Constitutions[9] reveals a bewildering array of topics, from Advertising to Zoning, which one would find difficult to characterize as directly related to the exercise of governmental powers. Many of these topics have come to be included as constitutional provisions because the process of constitutional change in the respective states made it relatively easy to clothe what would otherwise be statutory matters with the aura of constitutional dignity. Some state constitutions are clearly too easy to amend;[10] elsewhere, the process is so resistant to change that recourse has been sought in the federal courts.[11]

How easy (or how difficult) should it be to amend a constitution? John Locke, in the fashion of his time, proclaimed that the "fundamental laws" he had drafted for the government of Carolina should "be and remain the sacred and unalterable form and rule of government . . . forever."[12] William Penn, by contrast, had observed in the preface to his Frame of Government of Pennsylvania that he did not "find a model in the world, that time, place, and some singular emergences have not necessarily altered" and then proceeded to provide a method of amendment by a qualified majority.[13] But Penn acknowledged differences even within a frame of government. The Charter of Privileges which he approved in 1701 declares that > because the Happiness of Mankind depends so much upon the Enjoying of Liberty of their Consciences . . . I do hereby solemnly declare, promise and grant, for me, my Heirs and Assigns, That the first Article of this Charter relating to

---

[8] See generally H. HART, THE CONCEPT OF LAW (1961) and J. STONE, THE PROVINCE AND FUNCTION OF LAW (1946).

[9] INDEX DIGEST OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS (2d ed. R. Edwards 1959).

[10] Prior to 1971, California had amended its constitution 375 times; South Carolina, 398 times; Louisiana, 496 times; and Georgia, 691 times. 19 BOOK OF THE STATES 1972–73, at 21 (1972).

[11] See Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[12] 1 Z. CHAFEE, DOCUMENTS ON FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHTS 146, 153 (paperback ed. 1963); Cahn, An American Contribution, in SUPREME COURT AND SUPREME LAW 1, 6 (E. Cahn ed. 1954).

[13] 2 THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS, COLONIAL CHARTERS, AND OTHER ORGANIC LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES 1518–20 (2d ed. B. Poore 1878), quoted by Cahn, supra note 12, at 9–10.

> Liberty of Conscience, and every Part and Clause therein, according to the true Intent and Meaning thereof, shall be kept and remain, without an Alteration, inviolably for ever.[14]

Liberty of conscience was to be permanently enshrined because it was essential to "the happiness of mankind." Natural law principles were widely accepted in the decades preceding the American Declaration of Independence.[15] Since the principles were considered to be immutable (and "inalienable"), the written constitution which embodied them—or to the extent that it embodied them—also acquired the character of immutability.[16] Thus the language of the Articles of Confederation ("and Perpetual Union") was entirely in keeping with the spirit of the times in its assumptions that nothing in the Articles would need change, and that certainly nothing should be changed except by unanimous consent of all the member states.[17]

A number of the framers apparently maintained the view that there was no need to provide machinery for constitutional change. The Virginia Plan had called for the inclusion of an amendment provision in the new instrument of governance, but, when the matter came up in the Committee of the Whole, a majority voted to postpone its consideration.[18] When the matter was brought up again, "several members," so James Madison recorded, "did not see the necessity of the resolution at all."[19] But George Mason, supported by Edmund Randolph, reminded the delegates that they were in Philadelphia precisely because the Articles of Confederation had been found wanting and it stood to reason that the new document would also have defects. "Amendments, therefore, will be necessary; and it will be better to provide for them in an easy, regular and constitutional way than to trust to chance and violence."[20] The argument must have been persuasive: there were no negative votes as the proposition to provide for orderly amend-

---

[14] 1 Z. CHAFEE, supra note 12, at 166.

[15] R. POUND, THE FORMATIVE PERIOD OF AMERICAN LAW, ch. 1 (1938); Cohen, A Critical Sketch of Legal Philosophy in America, in 2 LAW: A CENTURY OF PROGRESS 266, 269–80 (A. Reppy ed. 1937).

[16] Cahn, supra note 12, at 8.

[17] NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS SERVICE, GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION, THE FORMATION OF THE UNION 37 (1970).

[18] A. PRESCOTT, DRAFTING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 685–86 (1941). This is a most convenient rearrangement by topics of Madison's notes. The most comprehensive documentation of the proceedings of the Philadelphia Convention is THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787 (rev. ed. M. Farrand 1937); Scheips, The Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution, 26 NOTRE DAME LAWYER 46 (1950).

[19] A. PRESCOTT, supra note 18, at 685.

[20] Id. at 686.

ment was approved, first in the Committee of the Whole and then by the Convention.[21]

The debate that followed the report of the Committee on Detail is significant because, if one believes Madison's notes, the Convention never returned to the issue of immutability versus flexibility. The focus was entirely on the role the states should play in future changes of the Constitution. The proviso accepting equal representation in the Senate was added to quiet the fears of the small states, as was the alternative method for proposing amendments by the states through a convention.[22] The late Professor Edmond Cahn speculated that > the statesmen of 1787 would be astonished to learn that at this remote date the Constitution remains in force at all. . . . Could we consult them today, I think the framers would inquire why we have not exercised the power of amendment more frequently and more extensively.[23]

Indeed, one recent author has described the formal amendment process as "comatose."[24] One would assume that the adjective is used in a very loose sense; the definition of "coma" is "a state of deep unconsciousness caused by disease, injury, or poison."[25] While one may validly assert that article V has not been overworked, it is arguable whether this relative inaction can be attributed to factors so deleterious as to be compared to "disease, injury, or poison."

How inactive the amending process has been, can perhaps easiest be shown in tabular form.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS
BY DECADE
1790–PRESENT

Ten Year Period	Number of Amendments
1790-1800	11
1800-1810	1
1810-1820	—
1820-1830	—
1830-1840	—
1840-1850	—
1850-1860	—
1860-1870	3

[21] Id.
[22] Id. at 688–91.
[23] Cahn, supra note 12, at 10–11; Bates, Foreword to L. ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION at vii-viii (1942).
[24] Dixon, Article V: The Comatose Article of our Living Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 931 (1968).
[25] THE NEW MERRIAM-WEBSTER POCKET DICTIONARY 97 (1971).

Ten Year Period	Number of Amendments
1870-1880	–
1880-1890	–
1890-1900	–
1900-1910	–
1910-1920	3
1920-1930	–
1930-1940	1
1940-1950	1
1950-1960	1
1960-1970	3
1970-	1

If one accepts the propositions that the first ten amendments are really part of the initial constitution-writing effort and amendments eleven and twelve correct technical deficiencies of the original document,[26] then this tabular presentation suggests not that the amendment process is dormant (perhaps a better word than comatose), but that it appears to have shown more life in the last twenty-five years than at any other time in the nation's history.

It must also be asked whether this numerical showing reflects qualitative significance. Have the really important changes been accomplished by the article V amendment process or have they come about by judicial review? It would be idle to argue the point: the landmark decisions of the Supreme Court have done more to adapt the nation to change than has any amendment.[27]

Is there, then, something in the amending process that saps it of its potential vitality? Why have we not used it more extensively in the past? As a corollary, why, in recent decades, has there been so much interest in the convention method of constitutional amendment?

If one compares the amending process in the United States with provisions for constitutional change in other countries having a federal system of government,[28] it is evident that the process in the United States is more complex and potentially more time-consuming than it is elsewhere. Indeed, ours is the only constitution to involve the legislative bodies of the states constituting the Union in this process.[29] In some otherwise ostensibly federal [26] Dixon, supra note 24, at 931-32.

[27] A SUTHERLAND, CONSTITUTIONALISM IN AMERICA 203 (1965); Kauper, The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations, 66 MICH. L. REV. 903, 917 (1968).

[28] McWhinney, Amendment of the Constitution, in STUDIES IN FEDERALISM 790-815 (1954). See also W. LIVINGSTON, FEDERALISM AND CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE (1956).

[29] McWhinney, supra note 28, at 792.

constitutions (Austria, New Zealand, the Soviet Union, West Germany), there is no provision involving the component units in the amending process.[30]

This comparison, however, also reveals that formal arrangements that are very similar in kind may produce entirely different results. Australia and Switzerland employ amending procedures that are quite similar. The federal legislature proposes an amendment which is then submitted to popular referendum; to become a part of the constitution, the amendment must be approved by a majority of all those voting, and also by a majority of those voting in a majority of states (cantons in Switzerland).[31] In a comparable fifty-year period (1901–51), Australian voters approved only four out of twenty-four submitted proposals, while the Swiss record was twenty-six adopted out of thirty-one submitted.[32] Similarly, the Mexican Constitution's amending provisions are almost identical to those of the United States; yet, the politcal dominance of one party has produced results in Mexico that are starkly different from those in this country.[33]

What this detour into comparative government demonstrates is that results cannot be related to form. If the formal amending process has been used relatively infrequently in the United States, the reason cannot be found in the nature of the process.

Nevertheless, the advocates urging the adoption of the American Constitution used the availability of an amending process as an effective argument in the fight for ratification:

> [W]hat a virtue [the framers] . . . made of it! It became one of the standard arguments in the campaign for ratification, a big gun which was reserved for use after every other debating weapon had failed to repel the opposition, then wheeled systematically into place, loaded with the ammunition of ostensible reasonableness, and discharged point-blank in the adversary's face—to his discomfort at least, often to his devastation. Does this or that provision in the draft seem unwise? Does the gentleman persist in his objection? Very well, since

---

[30] W. LIVINGSTON, supra note 28, at 301. In the Federal Republic of Germany, however, the upper house (Bundesrat) consists of officials of the Länder (state) governments, so that state views are reflected in that portion of the federal legislative machinery.

[31] AUSTRALIA CONST. ch. 8, § 128 (1901); SWITZERLAND CONST. arts. 118–23 (1874, amended 1891).

[32] W. LIVINGSTON, supra note 28, at 118, 185–87. The figures for Switzerland do not include proposals submitted by popular initiative. There were thirty-six such proposals, of which six were adopted. In addition, seven propositions advanced as counter-proposals to initiative proposals received the requisite number of votes. Altogether, therefore, the Swiss Constitution was amended thirty-nine times in fifty years—or, roughly ten times as often as the Australian Constitution.

[33] W. LIVINGSTON, supra note 28, at 303. See also R. SCOTT, MEXICAN GOVERNMENT IN TRANSITION ch. 3 (1959).

> the times do not admit of delay, let us proceed to ratify in haste, then we can go about amending at leisure.[34]

And amend they did—no less than a dozen times in the first fifteen years. Alexander Hamilton[35] and his allies appeared to be sound prognosticators. Then, for sixty-two years, nothing.

Was there no change for sixty-two years? Obviously, anyone familiar with the history of the Constitution knows the answer. It is embodied in McCulloch v. Maryland,[36] Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward,[37] Cohens v. Virginia,[38] Gibbons v. Ogden,[39] to name but a few, none thinkable without Marbury v. Madison.[40]

There is a brief passage in Marbury v. Madison that deserves to be brought into this discussion. Here are Chief Justice Marshall's words:

> That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis, on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it to be frequently repeated.[41]

Certainly, the great Chief Justice did not accept Thomas Jefferson's oft-quoted proposition that every generation needed to establish its own claim to the fruits of liberty.[42] Marshall's language clearly implies that there should be a renewal of the constituent act—just not too frequently. But, if one accepts Marshall's dictum, how often would be too frequently?

There are numerous scholars who believe that the Civil War wrought a transformation of American political life of major significance, in that, for all practical purposes, it converted a confederacy into a true union.[43] Under this view, the Civil War

---

[34] Cahn, supra note 12, at 11.

[35] THE FEDERALIST No. 85, at 607 (H. Dawson ed. 1863).

[36] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819) (prohibiting the states from taxing the Bank of the United States).

[37] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 518 (1819) (barring the states from impairing contractual obligations by amending legislatively granted corporate charters).

[38] 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821) (sustaining the Court's appellate jurisdiction to review state criminal proceedings).

[39] 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1 (1824) (upholding the plenary power of the federal government to regulate interstate commerce).

[40] 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803).

[41] Id. at 176 (emphasis added).

[42] "The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots & tyrants. It is it's [sic] natural manure." Letter from Thomas Jefferson to W.S. Smith, November 13, 1787, in 4 THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON 465, 467 (P. Ford ed. 1894).

[43] E.g., A. KELLY & W. HARBISON, THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION: ITS ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT 407 (4th ed. 1970).

amendments to the Constitution were the formal manifestation of this change. Thus, to borrow Marshall's phrase, the second "great exertion" came roughly seventy years after the first one.

Another seventy years later, the nation again faced the question of whether the Constitution was adequate to the needs of the day.[44] The crisis involved the Court's failure to sustain measures designed to allow government regulation of private economic relationships. A first attempt to change the Constitution by the process of formal amendment failed to produce timely results.[45] The constitutional crisis of 1937[46] did not produce the violence of the crisis of 1861, but one may well say that, constitutionally, it was a "great exertion" indeed. The resolution, however, came by judicial fiat rather than constitutional amendment.[47]

But suppose the "switch in time"[48] had not occurred? One cannot speculate on either the time required or the bloodshed engendered, but it stands to reason that the changes now reposing in the pages of 301 U.S. (and later volumes) would have come about constitutionally. Amendments twenty-two to twenty-six might have dealt with social security, labor relations, minimum wages, and agricultural adjustment.

Thus, in 1937, the Court saved the nation from the full force of a "great exertion" of constitutional reform. But the incremental nature of judicial review rarely has the impact, symbolic or otherwise, of an actual constitutional enactment. In addition, in the decades since the turn of the century, the almost unqualified veneration of the Constitution that was so characteristic of the late nineteenth century[49] had given way to an increasing realization of the role of judicial temperament, initiative and judgment.[50]

Typical of this shift was the change in the personal perspective of Charles Evans Hughes.

> Charles Evans Hughes, who in earlier years had been made to writhe by misuse of his statement torn out of context that

---

[44] E. CORWIN, THE TWILIGHT OF THE SUPREME COURT (1934); J. SMITH, STUDIES IN THE ADEQUACY OF THE CONSTITUTION (1939).

[46] The Child Labor Amendment had been proposed by Congress in 1924 (43 Stat. 670), but failed to receive the necessary number of ratifications. See also Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[46] See J. ALSOP & T. CATLEDGE, THE 168 DAYS (1938); L. BAKER, BACK TO BACK: THE DUEL BETWEEN F.D.R. AND THE SUPREME COURT (1967).

[47] E. CORWIN, CONSTITUTIONAL REVOLUTION, LTD. 64–79, 95–115 (1941).

[48] The phrase is Joseph Alsop's. J. ALSOP & T. CATLEDGE, supra note 46, at 135.

[49] "The divine right of kings never ran a more prosperous course than did [the] unquestioned prerogative of the Constitution to receive universal homage." W. WILSON, CONGRESSIONAL GOVERNMENT 4 (1885).

[50] E. ROSTOW, THE SOVEREIGN PREROGATIVE 23–44 (1962); W. RUMBLE, AMERICAN LEGAL REALISM 214 passim (1968); Miller, Some Pervasive Myths about the United States Supreme Court, 10 ST. LOUIS U.L.J. 153 (1965).

> "the Constitution is what the judges say it is," was more careful in his phrasing in a book published in 1928, but he did say there that since the Supreme Court's appellate power was determined by Congress, a body representing the people, it was the will of the people that sustained and made effective the extraordinary power of the Court. He seemed to be saying, indeed, that although Congress and the people were governed by decisions of the Court in matters of constitutional interpretation, the will of the people in the long run determined what the Court said about the content of the Constitution. The spread of such sentiments and the promotion of more realistic understanding of the Constitution and of the Court which defined its meaning may have incidentally jeopardized the hitherto prevailing reverence for the Constitution and for the Court as its interpreter.[51]

The nineteenth century witnessed limited use of the formal constitutional amendment process because (1) the Constitution was held in high reverence, and (2) much of what needed changing was accomplished by Court interpretation. On the other hand, the twentieth century sees increased recourse to the formal amending procedure because (1) realist perspectives have stripped the Constitution of its aura of superiority, and (2) Court interpretations either have failed to meet societal needs (as in the thirties), or have served to create new or to aggravate existing social tensions.

Moving Congress to the point where two-thirds of the members of each of the two houses[52] will agree to propose an amendment is, however, a task of no mean dimensions. The alternative article V amendment process, getting thirty-four state legislatures to agree to petition Congress to call a constitutional convention, might appear to involve even greater difficulties, but experience suggests otherwise. State legislatures rather notoriously spend little time on amendments which they are called upon to ratify,[53] and studies of interest group activities indicate that resistance to pressure and influence is considerably less pronounced at the state level than it is at the national level.[54] The convention process of article V thus loomed increasingly attractive.

---

[51] Swisher & Nelson, In Convention Assembled, 13 VILL. L. REV. 711, 715-16 (1968) (footnotes omitted).

[52] This does not mean that two-thirds of the total membership must vote approval. The amendments of 1789 were submitted by two-thirds of the members present. The Supreme Court specifically sustained this practice in The National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350, 386 (1920). See L. ORFIELD, supra note 23, at 49-50; Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAWYER 185, 190-91 (1951).

[53] See D. MORGAN, CONGRESS AND THE CONSTITUTION 243-45 (1966) for two illustrations.

[54] H. ZEIGLER, INTEREST GROUPS IN AMERICAN SOCIETY ch. II (1964).

The language of article V[55] leaves a number of questions unanswered. A literal interpretation would lead to the conclusion that whenever the number of applications received from the states equaled two-thirds of the number of states then in the Union, the condition of article V has been met and a convention should be called. Conceivably, this situation may have occurred at some time in the nineteenth century; a reliable count of state resolutions requesting a convention is not available.[56] The first concerted effort to produce constitutional change through the article V convention-amendment process occurred between 1901 and 1909, when twenty-six states asked for an amendment to bring about the popular election of United States Senators.[57] Simultaneously, momentum gained for an amendment to make polygamy a federal offense. Between 1906 and 1911, twelve states petitioned Congress to call a convention to consider the proposed anti-polygamy amendment. Eight of these states had also joined in the campaign for the popular election of Senators.[58] Since, at the time, the critical number of states needed was thirty-one, the unduplicated number of petitioning states was short by one, and the question of sufficiency, despite disparity of subject, did not arise.

Almost as soon as the eighteenth amendment had become a part of the Constitution, agitation began at the state level to seek its repeal by the convention method.[59] Wayne B. Wheeler, the General Counsel of the Anti-Saloon League of America, argued that Congress had rejected the "mandatory" construction of article V, a construction which maintained that once two-thirds of the states had asked for a convention, the role of Congress in calling the convention was purely ministerial. Wheeler took the position that there had been a sufficient number of state petitions during a period in which no less than seven Congresses had been sitting. Congress had been given seven opportunities to act and

---

[55] Article V of the Constitution reads in part:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress. . . .

U.S. CONST. art V.

[56] L. ORFIELD, supra note 23, at 42. Senator Ervin counted 304 applications between the years 1789 and 1971, but conceded that an accurate count was not possible. 117 CONG. REC. 36754 (1971).

[57] L. ORFIELD, supra note 23, at 43; Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 ILL. L. REV. 782, 786–87 (1927).

[58] Wheeler, supra note 57, at 787–88.

[59] Id. at 782, 788–89.

had failed to do so. The conclusion Wheeler drew from this congressional inaction was that there was no way to activate the convention method without Congress wanting to do so.[60]

The theory that congressional calling of a convention was a ministerial function appeared to be supported by the weight of authority at the time. W.W. Willoughby's magisterial treatise noted that "the act thus required of Congress . . . is stated in imperative form by the Constitution."[61] A later writer asserts unequivocally that "all writers on the subject are in agreement on the point that, when a sufficient demand is made, it is mandatory upon Congress to call a convention."[62]

Wheeler, in his concern for the preservation of the eighteenth amendment, was primarily interested in demonstrating why, in spite of the imperative language of the Constitution, Congress should not act. Frank Packard, a strong partisan of the proposed constitutional limitation of the income tax rate, was concerned with how Congress could be made to act. Noting that state courts had issued writs of mandamus against legislative bodies[63] and that the Supreme Court had mandamused the legislature of West Virginia,[64] Packard concluded that mandamus would be available to compel Congress to call a convention. Somewhat naively, he added that

> [w]hether the writ would be obeyed, or whether the claim might be advanced that one department of the federal government is powerless to assert its authority over another and co-ordinate branch of the same government, are questions which could not be answered at this time and may, for that matter, never arise.[65]

In view of the fact that Coleman v. Miller[66] had been decided thirteen years earlier, Packard's position is difficult to justify. In Coleman, four justices had urged that the amending process

---

[60] Id. at 790, 802.

[61] 1 W. WILLOUGHBY, THE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF THE UNITED STATES 597 (1929). Willoughby cited Justice Story's opinion in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304, 328–33 (1816), as authority for the proposition that when the word "shall" is used in the Constitution, a mandatory duty is imposed. Curiously enough, Willoughby ignored Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66 (1861), which held that "it shall be the duty" was not a mandate or imperative, but only imposed a moral obligation.

[62] Packard, Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program, 30 CHI.-KENT L. REV. 128, 134 (1952).

[63] Id. at 135, citing State v. Town Council, 18 R.I. 258, 27 A. 599 (1893).

[64] Id. at 135, citing Virginia v. West Virginia, 246 U.S. 565 (1918). See also Heller, The Supreme Court: Its Role in the Balance of the Federal System, 6 J. PUB. L. 319, 326–27 (1957).

[65] Packard, supra note 62, at 137 (emphasis added). In the same vein is Dirksen, The Supreme Court and the People, 66 MICH. L. REV. 837, 871 (1968).

[66] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

should not be "subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point."[67] Three other members of the Court (including Chief Justice Hughes) agreed that the key issue of "the efficacy of ratification by state legislatures, in the light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal" should be treated as a "political question," but they were not prepared to negate all judicial competence to review the amending process.[68] By shying away from the all-inclusive position taken by the concurring justices, Justices Hughes, Stone, and Reed avoided the necessity of overturning the precedent of Dillon v. Gloss,[69] in which the Court had entertained—and affirmatively answered—the question of Congress' authority to set a seven-year limit on the time allowed to states to ratify a proposed amendment.

Lester Orfield summarized the state of the law after Coleman:

> If the Supreme Court is not ready to apply the doctrine of political questions to all phases of the amending process, as four members of the Court wish, it will apply it to some phases of the amending process and what such phases are remains largely uncertain.[70]

Coleman v. Miller was decided thirty-four years ago. There has been no decision[71] of the Supreme Court interpreting article V in the years since, although five amendments have been added to the Constitution (and a sixth one has been proposed by Congress and is currently awaiting ratification by the requisite number of states). The uncertainties bequeathed by Coleman are still with us.

Indeed, given the lapse of time, it could be argued that Coleman itself is of doubtful value as a precedent. Of the justices who participated in Coleman, only one—Justice Douglas—is still on the Court. Justice Douglas was one of the four justices who would have favored a complete "hands-off" position, contending that all questions arising from the amending process belonged in the category of "political questions."

In Baker v. Carr,[72] Justice Brennan, writing for a six-member majority of the Court, quoted Coleman's language that > [I]n determining whether a question falls within [the political question] category, the appropriateness under our system of [67] Id. at 459 (concurring opinion).

[68] Id. at 450.
[69] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
[70] L. ORFIELD, supra note 23, at 36 (emphasis added).
[71] Chandler v. Wise, 307 U.S. 474 (1939), while appearing in the reports after Coleman v. Miller, was decided on the same day.
[72] 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

> government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments and also the lack of satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination are dominant considerations.[73]

In the subsequent discussion of representative cases, Justice Brennan carefully described the Coleman holding in the limited terminology of Chief Justice Hughes.[74] Justice Douglas' concurring opinion explicitly avoided the discussion of the doctrine of political questions,[75] while Justice Frankfurter, in dissent, quoted the last part of the same sentence by Hughes that Brennan had used.[76]

Chester Antieau, in his treatise on constitutional law, asserts that "whether amendments to the Federal Constitution have been properly ratified is a political question."[77] In light of the carefully limited description of the Coleman holding in the Baker opinion, it would appear that Orfield[78] was more accurate in stressing the remaining areas of uncertainty.

Past decisions, to be sure, have answered a number of questions relating to the amending process.[79] The Court has ruled that the content of an amendment to the Constitution cannot be challenged and that an explicit finding of necessity is not required.[80] Early in the nation's history presidential approval of a proposal adopted by Congress was held not required by the language of article V.[81] In Dillon v. Gloss,[82] the Court suggested that proposals, which had been pending so long as to be out-of-date, might have lost their force and held that, by reasonable extension, Congress could provide for a time limit for ratification.

The Court has further held that Congress has complete freedom of choice between the two modes of ratification provided by article V;[83] that if Congress elects ratification by legislatures, the states may not substitute a popular referendum or make legislative ratification subject to voter approval by referendum;[84] and that an amendment becomes an operative part of the Constitution on the

---

[73] Id. at 210.
[74] Id. at 214.
[75] Id. at 242–43 (Douglas, J., concurring).
[76] Id. at 283 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).
[77] 2 C. ANTIEAU, MODERN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 672 (1969), citing Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
[78] See note 68 and accompanying text supra.
[79] L. ORFIELD, supra note 23, at 8–126. See also Corwin & Ramsey, supra note 52.
[80] National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920).
[81] Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).
[82] 256 U.S. 368 (1921). All amendments proposed since that time have carried a seven-year time limitation within which ratification must occur.
[83] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).
[84] Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922); Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

day on which a sufficient number of states have in fact ratified it, rather than on the date of the proclamation of ratification by the Secretary of State.[85]

But a number of questions remain unanswered. Without pretending to be exhaustive, these questions may be listed as follows:

> 1. May Congress on its own initiative call a convention to amend or revise the Constitution?
> 2. If a convention is called, whether in response to state petitions or not, is Congress at liberty to determine its composition and procedures?
> 3. If a convention is called, may Congress limit it to a specific proposal or topic?
> 4. If Congress has transmitted a proposed amendment to the states and the ratification process has not been completed, may Congress withdraw the proposal?
> 5. If a state has acted to ratify a proposed amendment, may it recall that action in favor of rejection?
> 6. If a state acts on ratification, must its action be in accord with its own legislative procedures or may Congress prescribe procedures for this purpose?[86]

The call for "a new Constitution" is heard with some regularity, usually from academic quarters.[87] These proposals rarely have aroused much response. Yet the time may come when political forces consider the time ripe for such a move. A restrictive interpretation of article V might suggest that Congress must await receipt of petitions from thirty-four states before it can call a convention. The better view seems to be that of Corwin and Ramsey:

> [I]f we assume that the machinery which is prescribed in Article V for amending the Constitution is a particular organization of the inherent power of the people of the United States to determine their political institutions, then it would seem that Congress' obligation to call a convention upon the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States was not thought to exhaust its power in this respect, but was [85] Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 376 (1921). The role of the Secretary of State in the amending process derives from an Act of Congress, Act of April 20, 1818, ch. 80, § 4, 3 Stat. 439. It was transferred to the Administrator of General Services by 1 U.S.C. § 106b (1970) (originally enacted as Act of Oct. 31, 1951, Pub. L. No. 248, § 106b, 65 Stat. 710).

[86] This list draws on Corwin & Ramsey, supra note 52, and Gilliam, Constitutional Conventions: Precedents, Problems, and Proposals, 16 ST. LOUIS U.L.J. 46 (1971).

[87] E.g., BALDWIN, REFRAMING THE CONSTITUTION (1972); W. ELLIOTT, THE NEED FOR CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM (1935); W. MACDONALD, A NEW CONSTITUTION FOR A NEW AMERICA (1921); R. TUGWELL, A MODEL FOR A NEW CONSTITUTION FOR A UNITED REPUBLIC OF AMERICA (1970).

> intended merely to specify a contingency in which it would be under the moral necessity of exercising it.[88]

If a convention embodies "the inherent power of the people of the United States," may its powers be restricted? John Jameson, whose treatise long served as the principal authority on constitutional conventions, maintained that a convention could be restricted to a limited mandate.[89] Dodd and Hoar, writing two generations later, took the view that a convention was bound by the existing constitution but could not be limited by the legislature.[90] The case against limitation was perhaps most clearly stated by Gooch:

> [N]o legal limitation can exist upon the legally defined method of amending a constitution. The proposition is well recognized by serious students of jurisprudence. Denial of the proposition involves a contradiction in terms. In civilized states that are subject to law, the highest law is the constitution. Legal power to amend the constitution is the highest form of authority to make law. For any legal limitation on this power to exist, the limitation would have to be contained in and defined by a higher form of law. But since the Constitution is the highest form of law, this is an impossibility.[91]

Conceptually, this position would seem unassailable. In practice, however, the weight of decisions has been the other way.[92] The decisions are, however, those of state courts dealing with state conventions in the light of state constitutions. The works of Jameson, Dodd, and Hoar likewise all deal with conventions at the state level. It is at least arguable that, because of the federal aspects involved, a national convention differs sufficiently from state conventions that state decisions need not necessarily control. Therefore, generalizations based on state decisions are not necessarily applicable.

Senator Sam Ervin, who is the author of legislation intended to implement the convention method,[93] has stated that the argument

---

[88] Corwin & Ramsey, supra note 52, at 196.

[89] J. JAMESON, A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS; THEIR HISTORY, POWER, AND MODES OF PROCEEDINGS (4th ed. 1887).

[90] W. DODD, THE REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS 73, 77-80 (1910); R. HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 91 (1917).

[91] Gooch, The Recent Limited Constitutional Convention in Virginia, 31 VA. L. REV. 708, 724 (1945), citing W. WILLOUGHBY, THE FUNDAMENTAL CONCEPTS OF PUBLIC LAW 103-04 (1924).

[92] See e.g., Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 338, 32 S.E.2d 129 (1944); Frantz v. Autry, 18 Okla. 561, 91 P. 193 (1907).

[93] S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971); S. 623, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969); S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967). These bills, virtually identical in content, would provide procedures for calling a constitutional convention under article V. Sections two through against a limited convention "can be wrenched from Article V—but only through a mechanical and literal reading of the words of the Article, totally removed from the context of their promulgation and history."[94] The Senator's reading of the historical record persuaded him that the framers "did not appear to anticipate the need for a general revision of the Constitution" and that they expected a "specific amendment or amendments rather than general revision."[95]

It is possible to quarrel with this reading of the record. Far more compelling is the practical argument advanced by the Senator:

> If the subject matter of amendments were to be left entirely to the convention, it would be hard to expect the states to call a convention in the absence of a general discontent with the existing constitutional system.[96]

Paul Kauper made the same point with perhaps even greater poignancy:

> [T]he usefulness of the alternative amendment procedure as a means of dealing with a specific grievance on the part of the states will be defeated if the states are told that it can be invoked only at the price of subjecting the nation to all the problems, expense, and risks involved in having a wide open constitutional convention.[97]

Thus the limiting language of the Ervin bill,[98] while it is not compelled by legal logic, is clearly more in keeping with practical considerations and political feasibility.

The Ervin bill supplies an equally realistic solution to the question of whether a state may recall its ratifying action:

> SEC. 13 (a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment by the same processes by which it five define procedures to be used by the states in making application to Congress for the calling of a constitutional convention. Sections six through ten establish procedures for congressional calling of a convention and regulate the convention's organization and conduct. Section eleven provides that congressional approval of any amendment agreed upon by the convention must occur within ninety days; sections twelve and thirteen deal with the ratification process.

---

[94] Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875, 881 (1968).

[95] Id. at 882.

[96] Id. at 883.

[97] Kauper, supra note 27, at 912.

[98] The bill originally introduced by Senator Ervin read:

> No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a general nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the conventions.

S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. § 10(b) (1967). See also Ervin, supra note 94, at 900.

ratified the proposed amendment, except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendment by three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.[99]

Section 13(b) confirms prior practice and the specific ruling in Coleman v. Miller.[100] Section 13(a), on the other hand, breaks new ground but addresses itself to a problem which, subsequent to the drafting and introduction of the Ervin bill, appeared as a concrete issue.[101] Again it would appear that the solution is founded less in consideration of the legal constraints than in the perspective of the practicalities of the political process.

If the action of a state legislature on a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States were viewed as an ordinary legislative act, rescission of the amendment would be permissible, essentially as if it were the repeal of a statute. But the established view is that ratification is not a legislative function. When Congress proposes an amendment, its power to do so derives from article V; and when a state legislature acts on the proposal, it does so by virtue of, and in accordance with, article V.[102] The legislature acts in a constituent capacity, not a legislative one. It could be asserted that constitution-making, as distinguished from law-making, is an event of unique impression and that the states are called upon to engage in this function but once for each proposal. The logic of this reasoning would, of course, require rejection of the present rule that ratification following rejection is a valid exercise of the state's role under article V.

Even without considering the practical aspects, this "one-chance-only" approach stands on weak foundations. Conceptually, one could argue that a constituent act is an exertion of the will of the people at one time. However, article V precludes this by dividing the constituent act into two phases, one of which (the proposal) has to precede the other (the ratification).[103] Once this separation is made, and given further the lack of coincidence in time of state legislative sessions, it seems difficult to maintain that the second phase of the constituent act cannot take place at

[99] S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. § 13 (1971). See also Ervin, supra note 94, at 902.

[100] 307 U.S. at 433. See note 66 and accompanying text supra.

[101] In the spring of 1973, resolutions were introduced in the legislatures of several states seeking rescission of a previous ratification action of the Equal Rights Amendment. Nebraska's legislature acted to rescind. N.Y. Times, Mar. 16, 1973, § 1, at 1, col. 4; N.Y. Times, Mar. 17, 1973, § 1, at 13, col. 3.

[102] Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 229 (1920); Opinion of the Justices, 118 Me. 544, 546–47, 107 A. 673, 674 (1919). See also L. ORFIELD, supra note 23, at 62–63.

[103] See note 55 supra.

any time within the period allowed by Congress. Within that period, can the constituent will be required (or expected) to remain constant? The answer would seem to be that, if the constituent will is sovereign, one can hardly forbid it to change.

Permeating the Ervin bill is the assumption, derived from the concurring opinion in Coleman, that the amending process is political and properly the exclusive province of Congress. Earlier it was suggested that Coleman v. Miller might not be as strong a precedent today as it seemed even two decades ago.[104] The Ervin bill would make this question entirely academic, for it proposes to withdraw the amending process from judicial review altogether.[105] As Paul Kauper observed, > whether Congress can insulate the questions as thoroughly from judicial review as is proposed in the Ervin bill is not clear, although as a practical matter it may be supposed that the courts will accord Congress a wise discretion both in interpreting the article V language and in administering the legislation designed to implement it.[106]

Since these words were written, the personnel of the Supreme Court has undergone major change, with the newer members displaying a marked tendency to defer to Congress.[107] The Ervin bill's foreclosure of judicial review probably runs less risk of judicial nullification today than it did five years ago.

Meanwhile, activity on the amendment front continues unabated. Applications for a convention to amend the Constitution appear to have become the preferred mode of response by those who dislike a given ruling by the Court.[108] It must be expected that, sooner or later, there will be a congruence of applications compelling a congressional call for a convention. Hopefully, the Ervin bill (or an equivalent) will have prepared for the event.

Once a convention has taken place and the feasibility of this process has been demonstrated, it can be anticipated that the device will be employed with increasing frequency. Formal amendment will then assume new importance in the constitutional scheme and in the political life of the nation. Presumably, a

---

[104] See note 71 and accompanying text supra.

[105] S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. §§ 3(b), 5(c), 10(b), 15(c) (1967).

[106] Kauper, supra note 27, at 908.

[107] Kauper, A Look at the Burger Court and a Look Back at the Warren Court, 17 LAW QUADRANGLE NOTES (Univ. of Mich.) 6, 11 passim (1973).

[108] In response to Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) and Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973), twelve State legislatures petitioned Congress, within five months of the decisions, for a convention to amend the Constitution by providing a definition of "person" to include a fetus at any state of development after the moment of conception. POPULATION CRISIS, July-Aug., 1973, at 1.

concomitant consequence would be a decline in the importance of informal amendment—and hence in the role of the Supreme Court.

Whether this is or is not desirable is an issue of great dimensions. Involved are such basic propositions as the ability of democratic government to be responsive to the public's needs and wants, and the perennial question of the balance among the three branches of a government based on a separation of powers. These are issues that are quite clearly political to the highest degree. Thus the essence of the American constitutional scheme is, as in other nations, revealed as preeminently political. The change foreseen by the concurring justices in Coleman[109] may in fact be imminent and appropriate.

[109] See note 67 and accompanying text supra.

(The Minnesota Law Review, May 1967)

1053

The Alternative Amending Clause in Article V: Reflections and Suggestions

Morris D. Forkosch*

I. INTRODUCTION

Current efforts to amend the Constitution to reverse or modify Baker v. Carr[1] and allow state legislatures to apportion themselves on standards other than the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" standard necessitate a review of the Constitution's amending provisions.[2] Article V of the Constitution provides two methods for proposing constitutional amendments. First, amendments may be proposed by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. Second, "on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, [Congress] shall call a convention for proposing amendments." Since 1787, the Constitution has been amended twenty-five times. In each case, the amendments were proposed by Congress pursuant to the first alternative.[3] As a result, the appropriate powers and procedures relating to the first alternative are clearly understood.[4]

Given Congress' apparent unwillingness to take the initiative concerning a reapportionment amendment,[5] the question becomes whether Congress will be forced to call a Constitutional Convention under the second alternative. Since the Baker decision in 1962, at least thirty-two state legislatures have sent forty-seven separate communications to Congress urging the proposal of a reapportionment amendment.[6] Many of these communications

---

* Professor of Law, Brooklyn Law School.

1. 369 U.S. 186 (1962). See also Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964); Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368 (1963).

2. Perhaps the "Dirksen amendment" best typifies these current efforts. On January 6, 1965, Senator Dirksen and a number of other Republicans proposed that the Constitution be amended "to preserve to the people of each State power to determine the composition of its legislature and the apportionment of the membership thereof." S. J. Res. 2, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. (1965). See also 111 CONG. REC. 166, 235 (daily ed. Jan. 6, 1965) (remarks of Senators Dirksen and Douglas).

3. Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 373-74 (1921). See also Christian Science Monitor, April 3, 1967, p. 9.

4. See, e.g., Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939) (adoption and ratification); Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921) (proposal procedures); Keogh v. Neely, 50 F.2d 685, cert. denied, 284 U.S. 583 (1931) (methods).

5. The Dirksen proposal was sent to the Senate Judiciary Committee where it died.

6. Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, requested Congress to call for a Constitutional Convention,[7] while others asked Congress to take the initiative as they have with previous amendments.[8] Some states requested both procedures,[9] resulting in uncertainty as to which should control. Even though the requests have not been uniform in substance or form, application by two-thirds or more states would appear to impose a mandatory obligation on Congress to call a Convention under the second alternative. This Article will consider the heretofore unused alternative in article V, the problems involved in its operation, and its proper role in the amending process.

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE AMENDING CLAUSE

In general, the scheme of the Constitution's amending procedure is not very complex. Article V provides that amendments may be proposed either by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress or by a Convention called at the request of two-thirds of the states. The method of ratification of the proposed amendments is determined by Congress; ratification may be by three-fourths of the state legislatures or by three-fourths of state conventions.

The President has no power or place in the amending process,[10] and, except to the extent construction of the law is required, neither has the judiciary.[11] The states, with respect to their role in the amending process, may resist any federal interference,[12] except that Congress necessarily dominates before a call is issued and in the designation of the ratification method.[13]

Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, and Wyoming. Christian Science Monitor, April 3, 1967, p. 9. In addition, California and Rhode Island have expressed some dissatisfaction with the Baker result so that, in effect, the required two-thirds of the state legislatures have expressed some form of dissatisfaction with the existing state of the law. However, dissatisfaction must be translated into a constitutional form, which is the question here examined.

7. Alabama, California, Florida, Louisiana, Nevada, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, and Utah.

8. See, e.g., Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

9. See, e.g., Alabama, Florida, and North Dakota.

10. Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798). Neither has the Vice-President, even though he is the President of the Senate. See also Pierce Butler in the United States Senate on November 23, 1803, 3 FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 400 (1911) [hereinafter cited FARRAND, RECORDS].

11. Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

12. The major question implicit here, and throughout this paper, is the extent to which federal law will control the freedom of the states to act under article V.

13. See U.S. CONST. art. V; Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

Hence, while the federal government may be somewhat bypassed[14] through state application and ratification, the states are always indispensable in the amending process.

III. THE STATE LEGISLATURE'S ROLE

A. The Nature and Composition of an Applying Legislature

The Supreme Court, in Leser v. Garnett,[15] held that amendment ratification by the state legislature is "a Federal function derived from the Federal Constitution" and "transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of the state."[16] However, it is generally recognized that the state legislature's composition is the state's own affair, except where a constitutional right may be involved.[17] For example, this view does not

14. This bypassing involves the substantive content of a proposed amendment. Of course, procedures with respect to the call, etc., are initially within the federal jurisdiction. In the political theory of 1787, this procedure would make a nonresponsive federal body subject to the will of the people, although both of the bodies involved are representatives of the same people and should therefore reflect their desires. However, the federal-state type of governmental division, with its states' rights coloration and the fear of a sprawling gargantua, may conceivably also be found here, e.g., congressmen are federal, not local, officers. See Preston v. Edmondson, 263 F. Supp. 370, 372-73 (N.D. Okla. 1967). At the same time, state legislators are local officers. Since ratification is always a local function, and the local bodies are given a means of proposing amendments equal to the federal power, does this indicate a desired ultimate supremacy on the local level?

15. 258 U.S. 130 (1922). Leser involved the nineteenth amendment's extension of the vote to women. Two of several objections were: (1) the character of the amendment required a state's affirmative consent (Maryland's legislature had refused to ratify it), which the Court rejected; and (2) several of the state constitutions had specific provisions which rendered inoperative the ratifications by their legislatures, i.e., they were without power to do so. The argument involved the states' bill of rights which allegedly forbade the legislatures "to impair [the people's] right of self-government," and also Tennessee's provision forbidding the legislature to ratify any federal amendment proposed subsequent to their election. Justice Brandeis disposed of this summarily by stating that the Tennessee (and West Virginia) legislatures "had power to adopt the resolutions of ratification" (in effect refusing to go into a fact question that in West Virginia a first vote had rejected the proposal, and the second vote of ratification was unlawful under the state law), and that their "official notice to the Secretary [of State], duly authenticated, that they had done so was conclusive upon him, and, being certified to by his proclamation, is conclusive upon the courts." Id. at 137. Cf. Forkosch, Constitutional Law 60-61 (1963).

16. 258 U.S. at 137.

17. E.g., Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962); Bond v. Floyd, 251 F. Supp. 333 (N.D. Ga.), rev'd, 87 S.Ct. 339 (1966) (criticism of government protected by first amendment and not grounds for refusing to seat duly elected representative).

authorize or justify federal intrusion into the bicameral or unicameral[18] nature of the applying legislature. A single-bodied legislature is just as effective for purposes of ratification and, pari passu, application for a Constitutional Convention, as is a double body.

However, in light of Baker v. Carr[19] and the cases following it, the question might arise whether a particular state legislature, at the time of its application, is a duly elected and valid body for purposes of the second alternative. It is submitted that this issue, subject to the exceptions herein noted, is peculiarly one of state law. Recognizing that a state legislature may now be under a legal obligation to reapportion, it does not follow that the legislature may not act until reapportionment is effectuated, or that if it does act all statutes, resolutions, and "applications" are subject to a later declaration of infirmity.

When the judicial determination of unconstitutional apportionment is subsequent to the questioned legislative action, the formalistic and logical ab initio argument[20] is either completely erroneous[21] or must be substantially qualified.[22] A reductio ad absurdum argument is possible if ratification and not application is examined. Since the twenty-third amendment was

---

18. Presently, Nebraska has a unicameral legislature. NEB. CONST. art. III, § 1.

19. 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

20. See, e.g., Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886), where it was held that "an unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed."

21. See, e.g., 39 OPS. ATT'Y GEN. 22 (1937), advising the President that the Supreme Court's 1937 overruling of a 1923 decision meant that the congressional statute originally declared unconstitutional is now a valid act because the "statute continues to remain on the statute books" notwithstanding the 1923 declaration of unconstitutionality and may therefore now "be administered in accordance with its terms."

22. In Chicot County Drainage Dist. v. Baxter State Bank, 308 U.S. 371, 374 (1940), the court stated:

> The actual existence of a statute, prior to such a determination [of unconstitutionality], is an operative fact and may have consequences which cannot justly be ignored. The past cannot always be erased by a new judicial declaration. The effect of the subsequent ruling as to invalidity may have to be considered in various aspects—with respect to particular relations, individual and corporate, and particular conduct, private and official. . . . [I]t is manifest . . . that an all-inclusive statement of a principle of absolute retroactive invalidity cannot be justified.

See also Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 26 (1956), where Justice Frankfurter concluded that "adjudication is not a mechanical exercise nor does it compel 'either/or' determinations."

finally ratified just one year prior to the Baker case, it is likely that the Tennessee legislature was unconstitutionally apportioned at the time. Further, it is reasonable to assume that many other legislatures were malapportioned when they ratified the twenty-third amendment.[23] Yet, is there any serious dispute whether a United States citizen residing in the District of Columbia is able to vote in a Presidential election?

It seems even clearer that when the legislature merely requests a Convention rather than ratifies an amendment, an objection to the application on the basis of unequal apportionment will not be sustained. Moreover, such a contention overlooks political and pragmatic considerations. Subsequent constitutionally apportioned legislatures will be able to recall, rescind, or otherwise void the former applications,[24] for apparently there is no restriction upon rescission as there seemingly is with respect to ratification.[25]

B. The Mechanics of Making an Application

Procedural details relating to the time, place, etc., of legislative sessions in which an application for a Convention call may be made are clearly within the state's discretion.[26] While a legislature may desire a special session for this purpose, it seems that this matter could be handled during a general session. The only real procedural question concerns the vote required to make an application. The answer will depend on the form the application takes and what a particular state's consti-

23. Justice Harlan, dissenting in Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368 (1963), pointed to "at least 30 state legislatures [which] had been challenged in state and federal courts, and, besides this one, 10 electoral cases of one kind or another are already on this Court's docket." The assumption is that at least one-quarter plus one of the states in 1960-61 were improperly apportioned when the twenty-third amendment was proposed and ratified.

24. At least twenty-six of the thirty-two legislatures which have applied for reconsideration of the Baker decision, were malapportioned at the time of application. Twenty of these legislatures have subsequently reapportioned, including Alabama, Nebraska, Maryland, Minnesota, and Tennessee. The reapportioned Maryland legislature in March, 1967, considered rescinding their communication and failed to do so by only one vote. But consider the situation where there is a continuing malapportionment or the reapportioned legislature is still not constitutional and the legislature rescinds. What result?

25. See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), as discussed in Forkosch, Constitutional Law 92-93 (1963).

26. See, e.g., Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), which holds that the efficacy of the internal rejection-and-then-ratification procedure by a legislature to be a political question.

tution, statutes, or legislative rules require. Presently, some applications can be made when supported by fifty-one per cent of the legislature. Other legislatures, however, cannot apply unless sixty-five per cent of their members favor such action. Arguably, some uniformity should be sought.

Several state constitutions require a referendum before the legislature may apply. This requirement has been held unconstitutional for purposes of amendment ratification,[27] but it need not follow that for purposes of application the same result is required. However, since the constitutional language makes it clear that the legislatures have to make the applications, one may predict that mandatory referenda will be frowned upon. At the same time, if the legislature chooses to adopt a permissive referendum procedure, it seemingly has not violated its constitutional responsibility, for it must still make the ultimate decision to apply.[28]

Perhaps the most important question facing the legislatures applying for a Convention call is the appropriate form for the application. In the past, Congress has received, inter alia, "memorials,"[29] "petitions," "resolutions," and "statutes."[30] Are these documents effective? Do they each manifest the same thing in the present context? Historically, the term "application" was adopted in its generic sense, albeit within the framework of existing legal definitions. The Constitution's draftsmen, moreover, did not indicate any desire that a technical construction be

27. In Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920), the Court condemned the use of popular referenda during the ratification of the eighteenth and nineteenth amendments. The rationale was that a federal function is involved which "transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a State." Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137 (1922).

28. If the referendum is to be binding when discretionarily held, a different problem would be presented, although here again the above conclusion seems applicable. See Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

29. WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY 1534 (2d ed. unabr. 1934) gives several definitions, one being "a statement of facts, addressed to the government . . . often accompanied with a petition or remonstrance." BLACK, LAW DICTIONARY 1136 (4th ed. 1951) defines it as "a document presented to a legislative body . . . containing a petition . . . ."

30. In late 1964, the annual General Assembly of the States, sponsored by the Council of State Governments, published a model petition which called upon Congress to convene a Constitutional Convention to propose an amendment to permit one house of a state's legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population. This model, however, has not been uniformly adopted. The model, in part, provided "The Legislatures of the State of ....., pursuant to joint resolution hereby makes Application to the Congress of the United States to call a Convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States."

given to the term. Since the state executive may not veto the application, because no law is being created,[31] there is no reason why a "joint resolution" should not qualify as a proper application from the state legislature.[32] The result would be analogous to the use of a congressional Joint Resolution in proposing the twenty-first amendment under the first alternative.[33] In any event, the ultimate decision concerning the appropriate form will be made by Congress. While a uniform application form is desirable, any communication substantially manifesting a legislative desire that such a convention be called should suffice.

While consideration has focused thus far on the form of the application, several points concerning the substantive requirements should be noted. The prime question is what the application must say. Clearly, it should express the legislature's desire for a convention and should apply to Congress to call such a body into existence. Further, there appears to be no reason to require that the application be limited to one particular amendment as article V speaks of "amendments."

Finally, the amending clause clearly provides that each application must be made to Congress. There may be, however, some question as to what the term "Congress" means in this context. The Constitution creates "a Congress . . . which shall consist of a Senate and House . . . ."[34] While joint sessions of Con-

31. Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355 (1932), where a federal census necessitated a loss of representation in the House of Representatives, the legislature reapportioned but the governor vetoed, and the Supreme Court upheld this gubernatorial participation in the lawmaking function, is distinguishable. The Court has refused to uphold a state legislature's concurrent resolution increasing the number of representatives, Koenig v. Flynn, 285 U.S. 375 (1932), or a bill decreasing them, Carroll v. Becker, 285 U.S. 380 (1932), where not submitted to the governor as required by their constitutions.

32. Recognizing that "legislature" has a particular meaning in article I, § 4, clause one of the Constitution, and the Governor may participate therein, it does not necessarily follow that such a construction must be given in all cases. As Chief Justice Hughes wrote:

> The use in the Federal Constitution of the same term in different relations does not always imply the performance of the same function. The legislature may act as an electoral body, as in the choice of United States Senators under Article I, section 3, prior to the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment. It may act as a ratifying body, as in the case of proposed amendments to the Constitution under Article V . . . . It may act as a consenting body, as in relation to the acquisition of lands by the United States under Article I, section 8, paragraph 17. Wherever the term 'legislature' is used in the Constitution it is necessary to consider the nature of the particular action in view. . . .

Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 365-66 (1932).

33. See Hollingworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

34. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 1.

gress are authorized by the Constitution,[35] delivery to these sessions should not be required. The more realistic procedure would be to recognize the applications as delivered when they are deposited with the presiding officer and the keeper of the records of both Houses.

IV. CONGRESS' ROLE

A. The Appropriate Test for Proper Application

Since Congress determines whether a proper and valid ratification has occurred, arguably it has a similar power with respect to applications. The rationale is that some body must have the power to decide such questions and, with judicial withdrawal or impotence,[36] Congress is the only body external to the individual states capable of making this determination. Bootstrap validity to a state's application cannot be granted, even though congressional power may be exercised unwisely, for in this latter situation the state involved may easily reapply in a correct and valid manner. A hodge-podge of conflicting and even peculiar procedures is thus avoided, as a congressional determination in one instance will provide a precedent for the rest of the states.

In construing applications against the language of article V, the test appears to be whether the document substantially manifests a legislature's desire that a Convention call be made. Given that Congress will be the final arbiter, political rather than legal considerations will be involved. It is opined that when the basic political temper of thirty-four states is evidenced in slightly different fashions, as herein considered, Congress will not be likely to nit-pick the applications. Rather, applications will be given liberal constructions. At the same time, however, where an express limitation or requirement is set forth in such an application, restricting the scope of the Convention's authority, so that the application is inconsistent with the other applications, the Judiciary Committees of both Houses will have no choice but to ignore the document or, preferably, to reject and return it to the state legislature with an adequate explanation.

Another consideration in determining whether a proper application has been made is the timeliness of the application. More particularly, is there any time limitation imposed by Congress or the Constitution within which the required number of applications must be received? Several recent proposed amendments have required that ratification must occur within seven years to be effective.[37] The child labor amendment, however, contained no such limitation.[38] Thirteen years later, it still had not been ratified. In the interim there had been rejections, refusals to ratify, ratifications, and even some states taking one position and subsequently reversing it. In Coleman v. Miller,[39] the Court considered a twelve year lapse of time in the Kansas legislature's ratification.[40] Three Justices reasoned that "in the absence of a limitation by the Congress, the Court can [not] and should [not] decide what is a reasonable period within which ratification may be had . . . [as] the questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable."[41] Four concurring Justices felt that even this holding was beyond the Court's power for "undivided control of that [amending] process has been given by the [Fifth] Article exclusively and completely to Congress."[42] By analogy, therefore, Congress has complete power to determine the reasonableness of the time within which the required two-thirds of the legislatures must apply and, regardless of its decision, no judicial relief is possible. However, if the ratification period heretofore used for certain proposed amendments is any criterion, there is support for the view that seven years between the first application by a legislature and that of the last could and should be the standard. As with ratification, a seven

35. U.S. Const. art. II, § 3.

36. Cf. Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939). The Court held that Congress, not the courts, is the body to determine whether a proper ratification has been made, for the question is "political" rather than "legal."

37. See the congressional proposals for the eighteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second amendments.

38. See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

39. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

40. As noted in Coleman, the Kansas Legislature had, inter alia, rejected the amendment in 1925. Twelve years later the legislature reversed its position and ratified the amendment. Id. at 435-36.

41. Id. at 452, 454.

42. Id. at 459. The two dissenters felt the Court should and could decide that more than a reasonable time had elapsed. They quoted at length from and based their dissent upon Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 375 (1921), although there a congressional requirement of 7 years for ratification of the eighteenth amendment was met in a year and half. Included in this quotation was:

> [T]here is a fair implication [in article V] that [ratification] must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number [three-quarters] of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do. . . .

Id. at 472. One may therefore conclude that Dillon v. Gloss has lost its judicial gloss but, it is suggested, the policy may still be applicable to applications because Congress, and not the judiciary, decides this matter.

year period for application would afford states, whose legislatures do not meet annually, sufficient time to consider the proposal adequately while allowing for local discussion.[43] Yet, such a period would require that the necessary number of legislatures must agree, somewhat contemporaneously, that such a convention is necessary.

B. The Convention Call—Mandatory or Permissive?

Assuming that the required number of state legislatures make proper applications, the question arises whether the term "shall," found in the second alternative, places a mandatory obligation on Congress to issue the convention call. To illustrate the importance of this issue, one need only consider the 1929 communication from the Wisconsin legislature informing Congress that with its own application more than two-thirds of the state legislatures had submitted applications for a Constitutional Convention (although on various subjects), that the constitutional language was mandatory, and that Congress should perform its duty.[44] Congress failed to act or even acknowledge the request. If, in disregard of support for a Constitutional Convention, Congress ignores such applications, and the judiciary refuses to exert jurisdiction because of the political nature of the issues involved, then what value can the alternative have?

Further, "shall" has been interpreted by the judiciary as meaning "may"[45] or "must" depending on the particular context.

---

43. Of course these great debates are not a necessity, as the "sleeper" applications—applications passed by one legislature and subsequently reconsidered by the same legislature—seemingly indicate. However, it does seem desirable to allow sufficient time for such discussion.

44. See Martig, Amending the Constitution—Article Five: The Keystone of the Arch, 35 Mich. L. Rev. 1253, 1267, 1269, 1270 (1937), where it is stated that since 1789 "at least thirty-six of the states have at one time or another made application to Congress for a convention. . . ." Since the early applications concerned the later-ratified Bill of Rights, these can be subtracted so that between 1833 and 1929 at least 32 requests were made. However, some of these may be time-condemned and, after 1893 eleven of the thirty-three states applying were satisfied when the seventeenth amendment was submitted and ratified.

45. Taylor v. Taintor, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 366, 371 (1873) held that "shall" in the context of article IV, § 2, clause 2 is not absolute and is qualified by the requirements of the surrounding states. This decision is surprising because earlier Congress had imposed a mandatory duty upon the governors to deliver up fleeing criminals. 1 Stat. 302 (1793), 18 U.S.C. § 3182. See also Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. (24 How.) 66, 107 (1861) (federal statute imposed nonmandatory obligation on recalcitrant official).

If the former meaning is attributed to the amending provision, it would result in the circumscription of the state legislature's role in amending the Constitution.[46] While the members of Congress are subjected to some political pressure from their constituents, this begs the question and is an unsatisfactory safeguard for such a crucial matter.

The more reasonable construction, in view of the alternatives in article V, is that Congress has a mandatory obligation to call the Convention. Thus, Congress is relegated to a purely intermediate role under the second alternative with no power to consider the wisdom and necessity of a Convention call.

The 1787 Convention debates appear to sustain this construction. Madison's Notes disclose that Morris of Pennsylvania, when the amending article was being discussed just two weeks before the Convention terminated, "suggested that the [national] Legislature should be left at liberty [exclusively][47] to call a convention, whenever they please. The art: was agreed to nem: con: [without contradiction]."[48] To that time the major proposals reaching the Convention limited the institution of the amending process to the state legislatures, with Congress required to follow suit, i.e., it "shall call a Convention for that purpose" when two-thirds of the state legislatures make "application" therefor.[49] Morris wanted to have only Congress "at liberty to call a convention, whenever they please,"[50] and the Pinckney Plan,[51] with

46. This was the fear expressed by Mason on September 17, 1787 when he successfully moved the amendment of the proposed article. This stifling of the people's will could be done, for example, in the Senate by a minority of the members where they constitute a majority of a minimum quorum to transact business or where they engage in a filibuster.

47. Mason gives this account of what transpired:

> Anecdote. the constn as agreed at first was that amendments might be proposed either by Congr. or the legislatures a commee was appointed to digest & redraw. Gov. Morris & King were of the commee. one morng. Gov. M. moved an instrn for certain alterns (not ½ the members yet come in) in a hurry & without understanding it was agreed to. the Commee reported so that Congr. shd have the exclusve. power of proposg. amendmts. G. Mason observd it on the report & opposed it. King denied the constrn. Mason demonstrated it, & asked the Commee by what authority they had varied what had been agreed. G. Morris then impudently got up & said by authority of the convention & produced the blind instruction beforementd. which was unknown by ½ of the house & not till then understood by the other. they then restored it as it stood originally.

3 FARRAND, RECORDS 367-68.

48. 2 FARRAND, RECORDS 466.

49. Id. at 467, n.23.

50. See note 48 supra and accompanying text. It is susceptible to the intrepretation that "also" may be inserted between "Legislature" both alternative methods utilized, seemed to have been ignored. However, one week before the delegates terminated their labors both Gerry of Massachusetts and Hamilton of New York contended that the inability of Congress to propose amendments was a defect too great to be permitted,[52] whereupon a motion to reconsider was passed. Madison, seconded by Hamilton, successfully moved a new proposal[53] which modified the desires of Morris slightly. The original major plans and suggestions placed the proposing power exclusively in the hands of the states, (the Virginia Plan specified "that the assent of the National Legislature ought not be required,")[54] so that the states' application required Congress to call an amending convention. Madison and Hamilton wanted to permit only the Congress itself to propose amendments, without any convention, but such proposals were to be made either when both legislative bodies so desired or when the states applied to Congress to propose an amendment. Despite early fears that the Congress may abuse its power,[55] the and "should." If this is the intrepretation then Morris, in effect, was adopting a modified version of the Pinckney alternatives. See note 51 infra. The text intrepretation is utilized, although even with this alternative intrepretation the same conclusions would result.

---

51. The Pinckney Plan provided:

> If Two Thirds of the Legislatures of the States apply for the same The Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution—Or should Congress with the Consent of Two thirds of each house propose to the States amendments to the same—the agreement of Two Thirds of the Legislatures of the States shall be sufficient to make the said amendments Parts of the Constitution.

3 FARRAND, RECORDS 601.

52. 2 FARRAND, RECORDS 557-59.

53. Ibid. The Madison proposal was that the Congress "whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments . . . ."

54. 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 22.

55. "13. Resd. that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto." 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 22. For Randolph's additional views on why article V may not be a sufficient protection against the Constitution's imperfections, see his letter to the Speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates on Oct. 10, 1787. 3 FARRAND, RECORDS 126-27.

The first discussion by the Convention (as a Committee of the Whole House) of this proposal discloses that "several members did not see the necessity of the [entire] Resolution at all, nor the propriety of making the consent of the Natl. Legisl. unnecessary." 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 202. Mason urged the necessity of the Resolution. Concerning the role of the federal legislature, he felt:

> It would be improper to require the consent of the Natl. Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account. The opportunity for such an

Madison-Hamilton language was retained until the last day of the Convention's labors, but the new and additional fears expressed by Mason and others resulted in the language now found in the Constitution.[56]

It may be remarked that Hamilton, in seconding Madison's proposal, was playing a somewhat foxy game. He did not like the Virginia Plan which expressly placed the amending power out of reach of the federal government, but he did not care (dare?) to make a direct assault upon it. His objections stressed the contention that state amending power would be exercised only to increase the states' powers, whereas the Congress would be the first to perceive and would be most sensitive to the need for amendment on behalf of the new federal Union; therefore, this federal body "ought also to be empowered . . . to call a Convention— There could be no danger in giving this power, as the people would finally decide in the case."[57] In other words he would merely add to the pending proposal a second method and body able to call a Convention. Madison's proposal, however, went even beyond Hamilton's desires and the latter, therefore, enthusiastically and quickly seconded it, utilizing Madison's respect and influence amongst the delegates to attain a stronger central government. But, it must be concluded, that when Hamilton's new plan eventually failed, he willingly settled for what still was more than he had suggested. If Congress now could itself propose, without the states, then the states, without the Congress (save for the ministerial call) could have a Convention called for "proposing" new amendments.

This background of conflicting plans, the apparent compromise at the last moment, and the language ultimately adopted, suggests that the draftsmen's intent was that Congress should be able to propose amendments directly and that the states should be able to accomplish the same indirectly. Therefore, unless one does violence to the legislative history, it is clear that abuse, may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendment.

---

1 FARRAND, RECORDS 203. Randolph "enforced" these arguments, and the final clause, i.e., without the consent of the Congress, was postponed, while the first provision was passed. 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 202-04. Eventually, of course, this final clause was deleted, other changes made, and Congress given independent power to propose.

On June 19th the Committee of the Whole House, by a 7-3 vote of the states, decided not to agree to the Jersey propositions but to report those offered by Mr. Randolph. 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 313.

56. See, e.g., the language of the Pinckney Plan, note 51 supra.

57. 2 FARRAND, RECORDS 558 (Emphasis added).

the term "shall" in the present context imposes a mandatory obligation on Congress to call a proposing Convention when two-thirds of the state legislatures properly apply.[58]

Even under the above construction, there is a problem of enforcement should Congress choose to ignore proper and sufficient applications. Arguably, legal recourse is available. The federal judiciary might conceivably take the position that it has jurisdiction to interpret the term "application." It is highly unlikely, however, that the courts would become so involved, let alone attempt to force Congress by a writ of mandamus or otherwise to issue such a call. However, the states may be able to achieve the necessary action by applying political pressure. Were two-thirds of the state legislatures uniformly to move for a Convention, it is politically unrealistic to expect that Congress would ignore the matter. Additionally, personal communications from

---

58. Madison's contributions to the Federalist, number forty-three, is the only one of the eighty-five papers that significantly mentions the amending article. In the eighth subdivision only one paragraph is found on this power. The fifth sentence reads: "It, moreover, equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side, or on the other. . . ."

In the First Congress Madison, on May 4, 1789, gave notice "that he intended to bring on the subject of amendments" so as to comply with the (implied) promises to the ratifying conventions that a Bill of Rights would be added to the Constitution. 1 ANNALS 247 (Gales ed. 1834). [This is discussed in greater detail in Forkosch, Who Are the "People" in the Preamble to the Constitution?, 51 WEST RES. L. REV. — (1967).] The next day Bland (Va.) presented an application by that state's legislature for amendments, attempting thereby to follow the alternative amending procedures. Objections were made to its consideration until the proper number of states "concurred in similar applications," and Madison also "doubted the propriety of" the procedures:

> until two-thirds of the State Legislatures concurred in such application, and then it is out of the power of Congress to decline complying, the words of the Constitution being express and positive relative to the agency Congress may have in case of applications of this nature. . . . From . . . [the Fifth (Amending) Article's language] it must appear, that Congress have no deliberative power on this occasion . . . .

Therefore, he suggested the Virginia application be entered on the House minutes and remain on file until the proper number of "similar applications" arrive. The objecting member agreed with these views but the introducing member, Bland, while agreeing that Congress was "obliged to order the convention when" the proper number of legislatures applied, still felt that as the present application contained "a number of reasons why it is necessary to call a convention," these reasons should "be properly weighed" now in a Committee. A few others discussed this briefly and one member suggested the applications be placed in the minutes and wait for others, the original to be deposited in the archives; to this Bland agreed. Ibid. at 249-251.

constituents and state legislators should sufficiently motivate any Congressmen interested in re-election. Beyond this, unfortunately, Congress may be free to ignore its obligation if it so chooses. This, perhaps, is the most important defect in the amending provision.

C. The Mechanics of a Convention Call

Assuming that the necessary two-thirds of the states satisfy the above requirements, how does Congress call a Convention? It seems that a Joint Resolution, analogous to the one employed for the ratification of the twenty-first amendment, should be sufficient. Moreover, a simple majority of each House should be able to pass such a resolution, as the two-thirds requirement applies only to the state legislatures' applications. This is proper since Congress' function is procedural, and a majority vote should be sufficient to determine how the call is to be worded.

Further, a congressional "call" implies that Congress will do more than inform the states that the requisite number of applications has been received. The importance of this call must not be overlooked. It becomes the guideline for all procedures up to the time of the Convention and, to an extent, is the jurisdictional support for that body. It is, therefore, essential that the call be drafted with care and foresight. The Congress may, of course, delegate some of the procedural matters to the states as it did with respect to ratification of the twenty-first amendment.[59] In any event, the call should make clear who has the power to establish procedures.

V. THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Assuming that Congress issues a call, it is fairly well established that each state need not affirmatively respond. Historical support for this proposition is found in the 1787 Convention.[60] There Rhode Island refused to participate or even sign the proposed Constitution, and it did not ratify until more than a year after the required ninth state had so done.[61] Simi-

59. Compare Lincoln, Ratification by Conventions, 18 Mass. L. Q. 287 (1933) (contending for exclusive state power), with Comment, Ratification of Constitutional Amendment by State Conventions, 2 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 216 (1934) (contending for congressional power).

60. The Journal of the Convention discloses that "sundry Deputies . . . appeared . . . ." 1 Farrand, Records 1.

61. On May 29, 1790. The required ninth state had ratified on June 21, 1788, followed by Virginia (June 25) and New York (July 26).

larly, not all states have ratified all proposed and adopted amendments. Still others have rescinded prior ratifications.[62] It would, therefore, appear that a state may not only refuse to support the Convention but, judicially, no method exists to compel participation.[63]

A. Selection of Convention Delegates

The amending provision is silent on the method of choosing delegates to the Convention. It seems clear that even if Congress has the authority to designate a method of selection, such decisions should be left to the respective states. It is further submitted that a special election, totally unconnected with any other issues, should be held in each state to select the delegates.[64] Such elections should take place no less than thirty days after the final nomination of delegates so as to allow adequate local discussion. This approach is clearly consistent with the tradition, political theory, and spirit of article V.

The qualifications of the voters in such a special election should present little difficulty. Congress could either establish the necessary requirements or delegate this power to the states. Although the Constitution[65] permits Congress to alter regulations (except as to the places of choosing Senators) adopted by the states for national elections, it has not exercised this power. It would seem unlikely that Congress would now attempt to exercise such powers under the alternative amending clause. And since the voters "in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for [voters] of the most numerous branch of the state legislature," state law may be employed to define these qualifications.[66]

---

62. E.g., New Jersey, Ohio, and Oregon later rescinded their ratifications of the fourteenth amendment.

63. While the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court permits a recusant state to be sued, and procedurally a suit is therefore feasible, the substantive cause of action remains unclear regardless of whether the Court would undertake to pass upon the question. Carried to an extreme, suppose not one or two states so refrained but one more than one-third, so that there would be an insufficiency if two-thirds of the states were required to propose under article V.

64. The importance of the Convention and its work suggest a special election. Where ratifying conventions were used for the twenty-first amendment, the delegates were elected.

65. U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

66. U.S. Const. art. 1, § 2, cl. 1; see Brudlove v. Suttles, 302 U.S. 277 (1937); Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 162 (1874). The right to vote is itself a federal constitutional one, United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941); Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884).

The amending provision does not cover expressly or implicitly qualifications and requirements for other delegates to a Constitutional Convention or delegates to a ratifying convention. Thus, a degree of parallel interpretation may be used, and the method and manner of qualifying delegates for a ratifying convention may be drawn upon by analogy.

The initial question is whether Congress has the power to prescribe qualifications for the Convention delegates. The Constitution's silence allows one to argue that by omitting qualifying language the 1787 Convention intended to give Congress such a discretionary substantive power.[67] This position finds some support in the composition and qualifications of the delegates to the 1787 Constitutional Convention.[68] The call by Congress for the original Convention was simply for "delegates who shall have been appointed by the several states."[69] This call, in effect, permits the inference that Congress could have specified the necessary requirements but chose to leave the matter with the states.[70]

Further support for this position is found in the fact that Constitutional Conventions are a federal function. Since ratifying legislators, when Congress chooses this mode, engage in a federal function,[71] a proposing Convention and its delegates, by parity of reasoning, should be similarly viewed as engaging in a

---

Thus, all applicable federal constitutional and statutory limitations upon the states, and rights of persons would apply; e.g., the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 437, 42 U.S.C. § 1971 and the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964. See also 28 U.S.C. § 1343; 18 U.S.C. § 241.

67. This finds support in the February 21, 1787, call by Congress for a convention "of delegates who shall have been appointed by the several states" implying that the qualifications might have been stated but were being left up to the states. 3 FARRAND, RECORDS 13-14.

68. For example, while there were only four delegates under thirty, namely, Dayton (27, N.J.), Mercer (28, Md.), Pinckney (29, S.C.), and Spaight (29, N.C.), there were fifteen in their thirties. Franklin, at eighty-one, was the elder of the Convention. The average age of the delegates was 42. Whether or not the qualifications for a future Senator included the attainment of the age of thirty because of the large number above that age, or shortly to meet it, is conjectural; but the fact that the age for the House was set at twenty-five, when only Dayton (a nonentity) was, for practical purposes, then ineligible for the Senate, suggests that the preponderance of young men in the Convention predisposed youthful qualifications.

69. 3 FARRAND, RECORDS 14.

70. For example, at the New York Convention ratifying the twenty-first amendment, the qualifications for the convention delegates were silent as to age. This was not astonishing as the state constitution omits any requirement of age as a qualification for the state legislature.

71. See notes 27, 31 supra.

federal function. Either by analogy to the preceding conclusions, or because Congress issues the call, or because the process results in one national convention, as opposed to fifty local ones, a federal function is clearly involved in the second alternative.

While it would appear that Congress has the power to establish the qualifications for future Convention delegates, practical political considerations make it unlikely that this power will be exercised. It is far more consistent with a politician's behavioral pattern for him to follow a parallel method, where none else is available, than to blaze new trails. Once a precedent is established, the procedure is thereafter continued save where substantial defects are disclosed. Accordingly, common sense and political considerations conduce to the suggestions hereafter made.

Assuming, therefore, that Congress directs that the delegates to the proposing Convention be selected locally, the question becomes what probable substantive qualifications must the delegates satisfy? The experience under the twenty-first amendment's ratifying conventions should supply part of the answer. There, a congressional Joint Resolution[72] was deposited in the Department of State calling for ratifying conventions, and the state legislatures were promptly notified. The legislatures then passed statutes calling for a "state convention" to be held at a specified time, place, and hour "to consider and act upon the ratification of the proposal."[73] In other words, a procedure had to be improvised, and, to allay any objection, the legislature carefully established procedures consistent with those used in the state functions. The New York statute, for example, provided that one hundred fifty delegates to the Convention were > to be elected from the state at large, each of whom shall be a citizen and inhabitant of the state. . . . A person qualified at the time of such election to vote . . . for a member of assembly [the lower or more popular body] . . . shall be qualified . . . . Statutes disqualifying a person for public office because he then holds another public office shall not apply . . . .[74]

---

72. 47 Stat. 1625 (1933).

73. See, e.g., N.Y. Sess. Laws, 1933, ch. 143, pp. 525-33.

74. Id. at § 2. There was no primary election but nominations were to be by petition, which was then described (§ 3); election details, ballot sample, etc., were then set forth in §§ 4-7; other provisions led up to the convention itself, with delegates to "take the constitutional oath of office" and to be called to order by the governor or lieutenant governor acting as temporary president (§ 10); the "convention shall be the judge of the election and qualification of its members . . ." enact its own rules, elect officers, etc. (§ 11); ratification was to be by "a majority of the total number of delegates" and a certificate, in triplicate, by the con-

The election and convention were duly held and the amendment was ratified without any objection as to the procedural matters. It should be noted that delegates did not have to possess the same qualifications as a congressman or a senator. Rather, citizenship and inhabitancy were the only requirements.[75]

By analogy, delegates to a proposing Convention should not have to satisfy constitutional requirements imposed upon senators or congressmen. Two factors, however, seem to militate against this conclusion. The Constitution permits ratification by state legislatures or state conventions, and no great violence is done to this language if such legislators or delegates, chosen locally, satisfy local qualifications. But with respect to proposing Conventions, it is a national legislature or convention which is involved, and it would appear that the states are, therefore, completely proscribed from any substantive intrusion.[76] This vention's president and secretary was to be deposited with the state's secretary who would transmit one each to the United States Secretary of State, to the Senate's presiding officer, and to the House's presiding officer "in the manner in which amendments to the Constitution of the United States, submitted to the legislature for ratification are certified . . . ." (§ 12). It may be noted that such notice of ratification to the Secretary of State was held to be binding upon him and, when certified by his own proclamation, conclusive upon the courts. See Leser v. Garnett 258 U.S. 130, 137 (1920). This ministerial function has been transferred to the administrator of General Services, 65 Stat. 710-11 (1951), 1 U.S.C. § 112 (1964).

---

75. Of course, state requirements for its lower house applied, but this was by choice

76. Are the states proscribed from determining substantive qualifications unless and until Congress affirmatively so permits? Or may the states act, assuming Congress fails so to do, unless and until Congress prevents them from so doing? These usual proscription-preemption doctrines briefly state that where the subject-matter involved is national in character and requires national uniform legislation the states are proscribed from action, assuming they can act otherwise (e.g., constitutionally they cannot declare war in any conceivable situation), unless and until Congress permits it. See, e.g., Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100 (1890); In re Rahrer, 140 U.S. 545 (1891). However, where such character and uniformity are not found, and assuming the states can otherwise act, the states may do so unless Congress either denies state action, even though it does not itself act, or acts thereon and thereby preempts the subject-matter. Congress may specifically permit the states to act until federal legislation is enacted, as in Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 53 U.S. (12 How.) 299 (1851).

In the instant situation it would appear that the substantive qualifications of proposing delegates is very definitely a national matter requiring uniformity, and thus precluding state action. But does this proscription mean that Congress may affirmatively permit the states, when Congress issues the Convention call, to set any substantive qualifications? Proscription has a coin-face, namely, that in certain instances the states can never act, and Congress has no authority to delegate any means that Congress, in its Convention call, must set the qualifications, because the states, lacking this power, either cannot hold elections or must attempt to utilize some undefined minimum.[77] In such a call it is simple for Congress to follow the Constitution's qualifications for the House of Representatives and require that delegates be at least twenty-five years of age, a United States citizen for at least seven years, and an inhabitant of the state from which he was chosen.[78] Of course, the good sense of the voters may be urged as a sufficient safeguard against unqualified candidates, but this is a rather slim reed upon which to build a Convention empowered to alter our constitutional framework.

A separate question is whether any limitations are imposed by the Constitution precluding otherwise qualified candidates from becoming Convention delegates. For example, article I, section six, clause two, states that Congressmen shall not "be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States" created, or having its emoluments increased, "during the time for which he was elected." The key words in this article are "appointed" and "civil office." Since the delegates are elected, no reason should be found in this clause to preclude members of Congress from being delegates. Further, the delegates do not hold a "civil office." Although a federal function is involved, the delegates are more like legislators than civil servants. Clearly, the original clause sought to prevent corruption[79] that would ruin government by conflicts of interest and patronism.[80] Arguably, the Constitutional Convention does such power, e.g., to declare war. It is suggested this aspect of proscription be applied in the instant situation.

77. Although not further discussed, it would be simple for the states, if the Congressional call omits the suggested clause, to follow the constitutional requirements for the House of Representatives, whereupon, it is opined, the Supreme Court will find it difficult to hold that Congress intended otherwise.

78. U.S. CONST. art. 1, § 2, cl. 2, & § 3, cl. 3. The call might simply state that "Delegates are to possess the qualifications required of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States at the time of their elections [convening]." The bracketed choice is analogized to the situation when Senator Rush D. Holt was elected before reaching the minimum age of thirty but waited to take the oath of office until reaching the required age. S. REP. No. 904, 74th Cong., 1st Sess. (1935), 79 CONG. REC. 9651-653 (1935).

One might even suggest Senatorial years as the minimum, and not be too far out of line with the 1787 Convention, see note 68 supra.

79. Rutledge also used this term, 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 386, as did others, e.g., Martin (reporting to the Maryland Legislature Nov. 29, 1787), 3 FARRAND, RECORDS 201.

80. See 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 376, where Butler spoke of the expernot come within this fear, for betterment by conflicts of interest should result from participation. Moreover, in light of the delegates' function and possible impact on the constitutional scheme, it seems desirable that interested members of Congress be allowed to participate. Finally, the fact that some of the delegates to the 1787 Convention were legislators under the Articles of Confederation should create a significant precedent in favor of congressmen's eligibility.[81]

Similarly, it should be noted that nothing in the Constitution or the legislative history precludes members of the federal judiciary[82] from being Convention delegates. Seemingly, arguments favoring the eligibility of congressmen are equally persuasive in this context. It is suggested, however, that federal judges should refrain from becoming delegates. In fact, Congress may be wise to exclude the judiciary expressly in the call and in its regulation of federal courts.[83] This conclusion is based on policy considerations, rather than dictated by constitutional law. The rationale is that a proposing Convention is distinguishable from a ratifying convention in purpose and in function, and that the Convention may desire to reverse judicial decisions, with resulting embarrassment, conflicts of interest, and a possibility that discussion will be inhibited or restricted if the federal judiciary is present.

The final question in the selection of delegates involves the total number to be selected and their apportionment among the states. The 1787 Constitutional Convention consisted of sevience in Great Britain; Mason also spoke of this, 1 FARRAND, RECORDS 387. Martin, supra note 79, was still more caustic.

81. If the precedent of ratifying conventions is applicable, then either all those conventions having federal legislators are (perhaps) void and the twenty-first amendment has not been duly ratified, or else such an interpretation was never given or was rejected. See, e.g., note 74, supra where the New York ratifying convention stated the non-application of disqualifying statutes. In the current New York Constitutional Convention (for New York's own constitution) meeting during 1967, there are included as members forty-one present or former legislators. Present legislators occupy all the important majority and minority positions. Any conflicting federal statutes could easily be removed from application temporarily.

82. The question whether administrative bodies, whose members at times exercise quasi-judicial power, are subsumed under the article III language must be answered in the negative, for decisions to the contrary are legion. See, e.g., FORKOSCH, ADMINISTRATIVE LAW § 43 (1956). New York's current convention has several former and present judges serving on committees.

83. An objection as to its application to current judges may be made but, it is opined, even if such a statute may be so questioned, judges will undoubtedly not avail themselves of this possible flaw.

enty-four appointed delegates, but only fifty-five ever attended. Moreover, as a result of absentees and abstentions only thirty-nine signed the final proposal.[84] This example, however, should not be adopted as controlling precedent. The ideal Convention must not prove unwieldy but must at the same time fairly represent the people in order to be consistent with its nature and purpose. It is submitted that the number of delegates called for by Congress should equal the number of congressmen as established by the Constitution—presently five hundred and thirty-eight—and a sufficient number of alternates so that full representation throughout the convention can be guaranteed. By allowing each person to vote for one delegate from his congressional district (or at-large as may now be required) plus two delegates at-large in the state (by analogy to senators), this number could easily be selected.[85]

B. The Convention's Authority

The function of the Convention, as expressly stated in article V, is to propose constitutional amendments. The question remains, however, whether there are any limitations upon the power or scope of the Convention to propose such amendments.

Article V, for example, contains the proviso "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." Since the amending article was incorporated to overcome the inability of the states to amend the Articles of Confederation, and since the Great Compromise gave the smaller states equal senatorial representation, this express language clearly means that there can be no amendment depriving any objecting state of its equal senatorial suffrage.[86] Similarly, arti-

84. Forkosch, Constitutional Law 5 (1963).

85. Alaska, in 1958, and Hawaii, in 1960, each elected one Representative, raising the total to 437, with Hawaii thereafter (1962, 1964) electing 2 (also at-large). Representative "at-large" seats are not discussed in any detail, on which see, e.g., U.S. Bureau of the Census, Statistical Abstract of United States 379 (80th ed. 1965), for notes on single and double seats through at-large elections. On the problem of equitableness in such at-large seats see, e.g., Hacker, Congressional Districting 73, n.4 (1963).

86. See, e.g., 2 Farrand, Records 630-31. On September 15th, the last day when the Convention debated the numerous proposals, this proviso to article V was adopted in the identical language found there today, with Madison's Notes stating: "This motion dictated by the circulating murmurs of the small States was agreed to without debate, no one opposing it, or on the question, saying no." See also Jonathan Dayton's remarks in the Senate on November 24, 1803, given in 3 Farrand, Records 400-01.

cle IV, section three, clause one, empowers Congress to admit new states:

> but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

However, it appears that these limitations would also have been incorporated[87] in article V if the desire of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 was to prevent future amendment without the consent of the state. While the quoted clause seeks to continue the territorial dignity and relative power of all states vis-a-vis each other and in the federal-state relationship, the only conclusion possible is that the only proviso constitutionally protected from change by amendment is the one included in article V.[88]

Constitutional limitations aside, article V gives both Congress and the Convention authority to propose amendments.[89] The enabling language in each alternative is identical save for the infinitive-gerund distinction. The use of the plural "amendments" in the second alternative indicates that the Convention may propose as many amendments as it deems necessary and that Congress is constitutionally unable to restrict this right.

---

87. See, e.g., U.S. CONST. art. I, § 9, cl. 1, preventing Congress, before 1808, from prohibiting the importation of slaves, and id. cl. 4, concerning taxes, which are repeated in article V's proviso.

88. See also Madison's views, note 58 supra, where the last two sentences are:

> The exception in favor of the equality of suffrage in the Senate, was probably meant as a palladium to the residuary sovereignty of the States, implied and secured by the principle of representation in one branch of the legislature; and was probably insisted on by the States particularly attached to that equality. The other exception must have been admitted on the same considerations which produced the privilege defended by it.

The other proviso has lapsed because of its built in time limitation, i.e., no amendment prior to 1808 is to be made concerning the importation of slaves, or permitting direct taxes except as there given. The thirteenth amendment, of course, additionally acts upon all those persons covered by the first such item, and the sixteenth amendment has replaced the second.

89. The 1787 Convention is a true illustration of a runaway body. It was called for a single purpose. 3 FARRAND, RECORDS 14. The Randolph-Patterson confrontation pointed up the clash between those who desired to create a new government and those who desired to amend the old. See, e.g., BOWEN, MIRACLE AT PHILADELPHIA 104-08 (1966); FORKOSCH, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 5-7 (1963).

From this it may be concluded that any federal Constitutional Convention has a precedent to enable it to propose any and all amendments, save as otherwise constitutionally limited.

Reference to the article's legislative history supports this conclusion.[90] Throughout the chronological entirety of the Convention's proposals, committee reports, debates, and re-formulations, the assumption seeps through that amendments (plural) were to be proposed by a Convention initially applied for by the legislatures. Hamilton, Madison, and Mason, even though at odds with respect to exact procedure, all consistently referred to the Convention's power by using plurals. Thus, there can be little doubt that the Constitution's draftsmen never intended that article V be so narrowly construed as to limit the power of the Constitutional Convention to propose more than one amendment.

---

90. The Convention adjourned on July 26, 1787, referring its proceedings to a Committee of Detail, chaired by Rutledge of South Carolina and including Wilson of Pennsylvania, see 1 FARRAND, RECORDS at xxii, to report a proposed constitution on August 6th. FARRAND, RECORDS inserts, between these dates, a nearly complete series of documents representing the various stages of the work of the Committee. One of these states that "This Constitution ought be be amended . . . and on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose." [2 id., Document VIII, at 159. Farrand notes this is from a document found among the Wilson papers]. From the chronological background of this reference on July 26th it would appear that the Virginia (Randolph) Plan, proposed on May 29th, influenced these committee views, although the amending portion of the Pinckney Plan, proposed immediately after the Virginia one, seems eventually to have carried the day. It is, however, notable that even this latter Plan's two methods commenced with the convention and then, seemingly as an inserted after-thought, included the Congress. Notwithstanding the ultimate form, the Committee of Detail reported back a proposed constitution which included language practically identical to the Virginia proposal: "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose." 2 FARRAND, RECORDS 188, 557.

The Convention proceeded to take up each of the proposed twenty-three separate articles and it was not until August 30th that the nineteenth was reached. The Journal discloses that "On the question to agree to the 19 article as reported it passed in the affirmative," but Madison's Notes disclose that a suggestion by Morris was accepted. On the 31st of August the entirety of the proceedings were referred to an elected Committee of Eleven. On the following day and thereafter Brearley reported partially each time on behalf of the Committee, and the Convention debated the items so reported, but it was not until September 10th that, on Gerry's motion to reconsider, the amending proposal was taken up. Both Gerry and Hamilton felt that the proposal then was deficient, though for different reasons, as did Madison. See notes 47-74 supra and accompanying text, for an account of what then occurred.

This broad power in the Convention, and the absence of anything contrary in the proposals, debates, or the Constitution itself, also seem to indicate that no time limit is imposed upon the Convention's ability to propose amendments. Thus, a "runaway" Convention may ape the charge that the Supreme Court is a continuing constitutional convention and, at least theoretically, could remain in session indefinitely. Even practical obstacles, such as appropriations and places to meet, need not deter the members from adjourning from month to month or year to year. Apparently, no way out of this political dilemma exists, for the judiciary cannot intervene, and the call cannot restrict. As a practical matter this conjured fear is like the proverbial straw man, albeit when the situation materializes it becomes steel.[91]

C. Voting Requirements in the Convention

Given the above, the Convention's efforts may, and theoretically should, result in proposals. By implication, neither the Congress nor the judiciary has the power to supervise or review the Convention's procedures.[92] Thus, once the Convention is convened, it is free to establish any voting requirements, rules of order, and other procedural framework it desires. For most matters, a simple majority of a quorum should suffice. However, with respect to the method of voting, the Convention should adopt the policy that each delegate may vote individually,

---

91. See, e.g., Holmes' comment in Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200, 208 (1927): "It is the usual last resort of constitutional arguments to point out shortcomings of this sort. . . ."

92. Article V states the Convention is called "for proposing Amendments," so that it appears that Congress has no degree of superintendence, especially as it has its own separate power to propose. Neither has the Supreme Court any power to review procedural or substantive determinations.

The analogy is not to an "ordinary" statute or act of legislation by Congress but to the political concepts inhering in such a body. For example, the 1787 Convention was called "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation," but, as Madison phrased it, "the absolute necessity of the case" permitted it to go beyond this mandate. Forkosch, Constitutional Law 5-6 n.10 (1963). So, if the Supreme Court, for example, is able to examine procedure or substance, a constitutional convention becomes another congress and now not only is subject to judicial review but has its endeavors treated as statutes, not amending proposals. In this respect Justice Black's concurring language in Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 456-60 (1939) (concurred in by Douglas, Frankfurter, and Roberts, J.J.), should apply even more forcefully.

not as part of a state or political party unit.[93] Any other procedure would be contrary to the Constitution's spirit and legislative history, for it would deprive the people of their fundamental right to propose amendments. If required, there are appropriate analogies to the Congress and the ratifying conventions for the twenty-first amendment, where the participating representatives each cast a separate vote.

For the purpose of adopting amendment proposals, a voting requirement analogous to the two-thirds of those entitled to vote on such proposals in Congress and the state legislatures may be appropriate even though such a requirement is not expressed anywhere in the Constitution or its legislative history. Numerous reasons may be advanced for the two-thirds requirement. First, little justification can be found for lowering this figure when such a vote is required of Congress to propose amendments. Also, whatever the number of delegates selected, the chances of combining politicking, emotionalism, bias, prejudice, and other shortsighted subjective considerations to obtain a simple majority are too great to allow. The primary consideration, therefore, should be our historical and political approach to such an important vote and, accordingly, the Convention's rules should require a two-thirds vote to propose an amendment.

VI. RATIFICATION OF THE CONVENTION'S PROPOSALS

Once the Convention has proposed one or more constitutional amendments the question of ratification becomes relevant. The basic question is whether the Convention is to forward the proposals to the states, or whether Congress is to intervene to establish the mode of ratification. Both constitutionally and practically, the solution is for the Convention to forward its proposals to Congress and then dissolve, leaving Congress to handle the ratification procedure. This conclusion stems from language in article V which provides that amendments are valid "when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . . ." Clearly, Congress has the sole power to determine which alternative mode of ratification will be employed. Moreover, article V seems to indicate that the Convention's sole purpose is to propose amendments, for it is not mentioned 93. Any analogy to the 1787 Convention would be disastrous and not in accord with the requirements of article V.

in any other place. Thus, any mention of the mode of ratification by such a Convention will be viewed as surplusage by Congress, but such surplusage cannot be construed to render a proposal invalid.[94]

It is further suggested that the original call should express the mode of ratification, as the amendment proposals then would not have to be returned to Congress except for mere mechanical or procedural effectuation. A contrary procedure would give Congress a superintending power to withhold submission if the proposed amendments did not conform to its desires without fear of judicial interference.[95] Congress has its own independent machinery to propose amendments in the first alternative, and to give Congress the power to review the proposals necessarily deprives the second alternative of its independence. As a result, Congress would become supreme, and article V would automatically read that "The Congress . . . shall call a[n advisory] Convention for proposing Amendments [to it] . . . ." This would be an adoption of the very system rejected by the 1787 Convention. Therefore, the best time and place to make such a choice is in the call, and thereafter any further congressional function should be extremely and strictly limited to simple procedural duties.

While the method of selection is basically a policy consideration, it is suggested that ratification by state legislatures should be the mode selected by Congress in its call. The people already have elected delegates to one proposing convention, and having a second ratifying convention would be asking the same people to approve their own handiwork. In theory there should be two different bodies, one to check on the other; the different sets of delegates to the Convention and to the state's legislature may and should produce different reasons and arguments for so amending the Constitution. Expenses, time, effort, and difficulties, not only of the states but of their delegates, would increase to a regressive point if a separate body was again convened.

94. See, e.g., United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 732-33 (1931), where the eighteenth amendment was attacked because of the tenth amendment's distinction between powers reserved to the states and those reserved to the people; the argument was that states could ratify only their own reserved rights, but that only the conventions could ratify the people's reserved rights; and, since the eighteenth amendment involved the reserved rights of the people, the ratification by states' legislatures was invalid. The Court unanimously rejected this contention: "This court has repeatedly and consistently declared that the choice of mode rests solely in the discretion of Congress." Id. at 732. The Court also stated that the people in adopting the original Constitution, "deliberately made the grant of power to Congress in respect to the choice of the mode of ratification of amendments. . . . Congress must [so] function as the delegated agent . . . ." Id. at 733.

95. See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

In proposing amendments in the past Congress has, in several instances, placed a seven-year limitation for ratification by the states. Does the Convention have such a power under the alternative method or is it still in Congress, through the latter's power to propose the mode of ratification? The amendments which have been so limited have contained the language as a separate section; it would appear that Congress has, by such use, indicated its substantive nature. From this point of view the Convention must have this power, but the counter-argument, based upon Congress' ability to determine the mode of ratification, may prove more persuasive. If a choice must be made, the Convention's power to limit is here accepted, but there is no reason why any difference or disagreement need develop. From a policy approach, a seven-year limit is suggested for all amendments proposed through the alternative method because otherwise the judiciary may enter the picture.[96]

Finally, upon receipt of the official notification of the proposed amendments, the state should promptly begin the process of ratification. Assuming this occurs, properly authenticated and certificated copies of ratification should be promptly forwarded to the appropriate official—the Administrator of General Services.[97] While the date of ratification by the last required state is the operative date of an amendment,[98] a central federal location for purposes of binding the United States and, when "certified to by . . . proclamation, conclusive upon the courts,"[99] is advisable to obviate all objections as to regularity.

VII. CONCLUSION

The foregoing analysis permits the formulation of a suggested procedure whereby the alternative method of amending the Constitution may be effectuated. Criticism and counter-suggestions may thus be provoked, hopefully with the result that a useful uniform mode can be set before the state legislatures, the Congress, and the Supreme Court. Such a plan or

96. Ibid.
97. 65 Stat. 710-11 (1951), 1 U.S.C. § 112 (1964).
98. Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 376 (1921).
99. Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137 (1922).

procedure, it is submitted, should contain the following points.

First, the application by state legislatures should be by at least majority vote for a (joint) resolution, not requiring a governor's approval, and should be couched in the language suggested: The Legislature of the State of ....., pursuant to (Joint) Resolution, hereby makes application to the Congress of the United States to call a Convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Second, in accordance with the states' own procedures, but sufficient to qualify under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for introduction as an exhibit in a federal district court trial, such an application should be certified by the necessary and required officers as an official document of the state, and officially forwarded in an appropriate manner to and filed with at least the parliamentary officers of the House and the Senate. While there is no constitutional need to file with the Secretary of State, the Administrator of General Services, or any other officer, no harm can result therefrom. The forwarding language might be: To the [officer, title, and description] of the United States: Please be informed and take notice that the following (Joint) Resolution was adopted by at least a majority of both houses of the legislature of the State of ..... on the ..... day of ....., 19....., is properly certified as such in accordance with all applicable laws, and is forwarded to you as an officer of the Congress of the United States required to be notified so that application to the said Congress is duly now made and completed: [set forth resolution, certification, etc., and conclude entire notice with names, titles, etc., of the forwarding officials].

Third, the federal officials receiving such an application should respond in an appropriate manner: To the [state's forwarding official]. This will acknowledge receipt this day of your notice dated the ..... day of ....., 19.....

Fourth, when two-thirds of such, or analogous, applications have been received, the persons so receiving them, and now exercising a ministerial function, should forward all such applications to the Senate and House as per their own respective internal procedures, assuming that the next paragraph does not apply, notifying each body of the receipt and date of receipt of each such application and, because of a possible lack of uniformity, perhaps also pointing this out, although this is not strictly required as the forwarded applications will so indicate.

Fifth, depending upon the internal procedures of the two Houses, provision should be had for automatically raising such applications on the floor of each body when the required number has been duly received, or else, if not so presented, then when each House is notified.

Sixth, depending upon the internal procedures of the Senate and House, such applications and notifications may possibly be referred to the appropriate committees. After examination,[100] and if required, verification of the application, the Committee should be required promptly to report back to its legislative body with a proposed Joint[101] Resolution[102] directing issuance of a call for a Constitutional Convention.

Seventh, this combined Joint Resolution call must be detailed, and may include an overall procedure to be followed to the point where, as in an amending proposal by Congress itself, the proposed amendment is forwarded to the states for ratification and the notification by the states thereof. The proposed call given below indicates details which may be utilized.

Eighth, a majority of each House is sufficient to pass such a Joint Resolution call, official copies thereafter being sent to all states as all other official notices and documents are sent.

Ninth, upon receipt of such official calls each state, in accordance with its official legislative procedures and machinery, should enact the appropriate legislation for a special election of delegates who, after the necessary formalties, should be certified as such by the necessary state officials just as federal congressmen are certified by them.[103]

---

100. This may include hearings, although no reason superficially appears why these should ordinarily be necessary.

101. A Concurrent Resolution may be utilized and, in the sense that one body may institute and adopt the procedures and the call in toto, the analogy is to a bill enacted by the House or Senate independently of the other body and then sent over. The form of the Resolution is a political determination to be settled initially by the first Congress confronted by the question and thereafter, perhaps, the precedent is established. What is being suggested in the text makes for an earlier Resolution and call.

102. Both committees may easily correlate their work on the details of this Joint Resolution so as to obviate the necessity for a later conference to iron out differences in language, as there is nothing here of a major substantive nature. However, if the respective committees do not so cooperate, a conference must then so do and the Conference Report will then be utilized; future such Joint Resolutions would then have this as a precedent.

103. There is no provision made in article V concerning travel or other personal expenses, payment for serving, etc., and, it is suggested that these should all be provided for by the states. The costs of the Convention itself should be defrayed by the federal government.

Tenth, at the time and place called for, and under temporary officers set forth in the call, the delegates should meet, approve credentials, choose permanent officers, adopt their own rules, propose amendments, debate, enact, and otherwise function in accordance with the call.

Eleventh, a majority of the Convention delegates, assuming a quorum present, should be sufficient to determine organizational and procedural rules and matters, but at least two-thirds of those present and voting should be required to pass amendments to be proposed for ratification.

Twelfth, the Convention should, as part of its organizational rules, provide that all proposed amendments be forwarded to the appropriate congressional officials so designated for the purpose of processing amendments proposed by Congress, and also that a time limit of seven years be set within which the proposals may be ratified. Moreover, the call by Congress should contain appropriate parallel requirements.

Thirteenth, the mode of ratification being left to Congress, the call should contain this choice and, as a matter of policy, ratification should be by the state legislatures.

Fourteenth, the call should also contain a provision that proper certificates of ratification are to be filed with the Administrator of General Services, and that he, in turn, when the required number of proper certificates is received by him, is to make due proclamation thereof.

Finally, given the importance of the congressional call in view of the role it plays with regard to substantive and procedural matters before and after the Convention, the following is submitted as a form that may well be adopted by Congress:

A PROPOSED CALL BY CONGRESS

Whereas pursuant to article V of the Constitution of the United States at least two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States of the United States have duly and validly made proper and timely application to the Congress of the United States to call a Convention for proposing amendments to the said Constitution, namely, the States of . . .; be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Joint Resolution be and be required to be considered as and is a call, pursuant to article V of the Constitution of the United States, for a Convention for proposing amendments to the said Constitution as is more fully set forth hereafter.

Sec. 2. This Joint Resolution is directed to be duly forwarded by the appropriate officers of both Houses of this Congress to the appropriate officials of each of the several States of the United States within five (5) days after it is approved.

Sec. 3. The appropriate officials of each of the several States of the United States shall thereafter take such action and perform such acts as may be required by or in consonance with their applicable laws to enforce and comply with this Joint Resolution and call.

Sec. 4. No later than [date] each of the said States is to conduct a special election for the sole purpose of electing delegates to said Convention, in accordance with each State's duly enacted or to be enacted laws, Provided, however, that at least thirty days elapse between final nominations for delegates and the election; that the number of delegates elected be equal to the number of Congressmen each said State is then represented by with one to be chosen within each Congressional district within said State plus two at-large; that the qualifications of the voters for delegates be no different than those required for the more numerous body of the State's legislature; that delegates are to possess the qualifications required of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States at the time of convening; and that all statutes of the United States and the several States disqualifying a person for public office because he then holds another public office shall not apply except as to the judges and justices of the United States.

Sec. 5. The delegates so duly elected and properly certified shall meet on the [date] at [place, building, hall] in Washington, District of Columbia, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, present their credentials to the temporary secretary who is hereby designated as [name or office], meet under the temporary chairmanship of [name or office], and when at least a majority thereof is so assembled then duly and regularly organize and deliberate for the purpose for which called, Provided, however, that any amendments to the Constitution of the United States which may be proposed shall receive the approval of at least two-thirds of the members then present and voting at the said Convention.

Sec. 6. The said Convention may authorize and direct that all such proposed amendments be forwarded to the appropriate officials designated by the Congress of the United States for the purpose of forwarding to the States amendments proposed by the said Convention, and said officials are hereby authorized and directed so to act and forward said proposed amendments within five (5) days after receipt thereof, together with a copy of the section following.

Sec. 7. All such proposed amendments shall be inoperative unless they shall have been ratified as amendments to the Constitution by the legislatures of [or by conventions in] the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission thereof to the States.

Sec. 8. Copies of all said ratifications, properly and duly authenticated and certified, shall be forwarded to and filed with the Administrator of General Services of the United States who is hereby authorized and directed to receive and file the same and, when the required number thereof pursuant to article V of the Constitution has been so received and filed, shall make appropriate proclamation thereof.

Sec. 9. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated not more than [$.....] for necessary expenses in conducting and defraying the costs of such Convention, but none of these moneys is to be used for any travel, pay, allowances or like purposes of any delegates to or member of such Convention.[104]

---

104. If there is any question concerning the necessity for a statute, requiring the President's signature, this can be easily accomplished. However, does this mean that the President may veto the Convention? Or that if two-thirds of Congress cannot be mustered the Convention will not be held? It is suggested that here, if at all, is a justification for an appropriation by Joint Resolution, without such a signature being required.

(North Dakota Law Review 1979)

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION BY THE ARTICLE V CONVENTION METHOD

DOUGLAS G. VOEGLER*

I. INTRODUCTION

Article V of the United States Constitution reads as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which in either case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight-hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the First Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Sufferage in the Senate.[1]

Two methods of amending the Constitution are provided for in this Article. Under one method, the amendment is initiated by Congress. Under the alternative method, Congress, after being petitioned by the states, calls a convention to propose amendments. Since our Constitution was adopted in 1787, it has been amended only twenty-six times. If the first ten amendments, the Bill of

*B. A., University of Nebraska, 1973; J. D., University of Nebraska — Lincoln School of Law, 1976; former law clerk, Honorable Paul W. White, Chief Justice, Nebraska Supreme Court.

1. U. S. CONST. art. V.

The "Authorization to Sell Reserved Mineral Interests to Surface Owners" ignores two already existent solutions to the conflicts in surface development with reserved mineral rights. The land developer is, like any other citizen, free under the mining laws to locate mining claims in good faith. He must do the required annual assessment work thereafter, but such assessment work provides for exploration and development work on a gradual and continuing basis,[55] which is precluded by selling the mineral rights at a point in time when an existent mineral value may be much lower than the value future circumstances and developments could realize. The second solution possible under present mining laws is a withdrawal of the land from mineral entry. If the surface development of public land is desirable, Congress has the power to withdraw that piece of land from mineral entry.

But just as the courts have found it easier to entrust the mining laws to land agencies, so the Congress puts up little resistance to easing its responsibilities with regard to withdrawing public land from mineral entry. The despotism of administrative law fills the void at the expense of all the practicality inherent in American mining law. Without the mining laws, which are our heritage, we will be without a true and tested system of mineral development. Administrative law is already without representation from mineral development people, without judicial control, and without the immediate desire to develop minerals. Lacking these, the liquidators of our mineral wealth can not truly concern themselves with a better system. A triumph for the "rule of man" in the Department of the Interior is no triumph for Man.

55. Mining Law, 30 U.S.C. §28 (1872); See generally: MINING RIGHTS ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN, supra, note 25, at 108-137.

Rights, (which were adopted almost simultaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, and can therefore be considered a part of the original document) are excluded from this count, the Constitution has been amended a mere sixteen times in nearly two hundred years.

To date, all of the amendments to the Constitution have been proposed by Congress. There has never been a constitutional convention, "despite the fact that in the years since the Constitution was ratified . . . [several hundred] resolutions have been submitted to Congress by the States calling for national constitutional conventions."[2]

The Article V convention method has been called a "constitutional curiosity,"[3] the forgotten part of the article,[4] and "[o]ne of the best-known 'dead letter' clauses in the federal Constitution."[5]

While there has never been a constitutional convention, the Article V provision has not been without effect in our nation's history.[6] During the ratification of the Constitution, the Anti-Federalists expressed concern that the Constitution did not contain any provisions for the protection of certain basic rights of mankind. Virginia and New York petitioned Congress to call a convention to deal with this perceived defect. This led to Congress' proposing, in 1789, the Bill of Rights to quell these concerns.[7] At the turn of the century, public agitation grew for an amendment to the Constitution for the direct election of Senators. On several occasions between 1893 and 1902, the House of Representatives had passed resolutions calling for such an amendment. The Senate, naturally reluctant to propose an amendment which would place in jeopardy the tenure of its current members, refused to act. After a significant number of states petitioned Congress for a constitutional convention to deal with the problem, Congress, afraid of the peoples'

---

2. Comment, Amendment by Convention, Our Next Constitutional Crisis?, 53 N.C.L. REV. 491 (1975) [hereinafter cited as Comment].

For a comprehensive list and analysis of the state resolutions calling for a constitutional convention see American Bar Association Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, Amendment of the Constitution By the Convention Method Under Article V App. B, at 59-77 (1974) [hereinafter cited as A.B.A. Study].

3. Comment, supra note 2, at 492.

4. Dirksen, The Supreme Court and the People, 66 MICH. L. REV. 837 (1968) [hereinafter cited as Dirksen].

5. Dixon, Article V: The Comatose Article of Our Living Constitution?, 66 MICH. L. REV. 931, 943 (1968) [hereinafter cited as Dixon].

6. Comment, supra note 2, at 499.

7. See A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 69-70.

reaction should such a convention come into being, proposed the seventeenth amendment providing for the direct election of Senators.[8]

In recent times, a significant attempt was made to invoke an Article V convention to reverse the Supreme Court decisions of Baker v. Carr,[9] and Reynolds v. Sims,[10] concerning state legislative reapportionment. The Council of State Governments and the late Senator Everett M. Dirksen of Illinois led an attempt to amend the Constitution to permit one house of a state legislature to be exempt from the "one man, one vote" rule.[11] After the Congressional route failed, the Article V convention method was pursued. By March 1967, "thirty-two states had submitted arguably valid applications to Congress — only two shy of the magic number representing two-thirds of the States."[12] On March 18, 1967, a New York Times' story caught the nation off guard, with these comments:

"(A) campaign for a Constitutional convention to modify the Supreme Court's 'one man-one vote' rule is nearing success. It would be the first such Convention since the Constitution was drafted in Philadelphia in 1787."[13]

While this attempt to call a constitutional convention did not succeed, it did serve to stimulate a great deal of scholarly and Congressional debate over the Article V convention method. As a direct result, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina introduced comprehensive legislation to deal with the Article V convention method on August 17, 1967.[14] Senator Ervin's

---

8. "The history of the 17th amendment illustrates the usefulness of having a method by which a recalcitrant Congress can be bypassed when it stands in the way of the desires of the country for constitutional change." S. REP. No. 93-293, REPORT OF THE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY UNITED STATES SENATE TOGETHER WITH ADDITIONAL VIEWS TO ACCOMPANY S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 6 (1973) [hereinafter cited as S. REP. No. 93-293]. See also A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 72.

9. 369 U. S. 186 (1961).

10. 377 U. S. 533 (1964).

11. See Dirksen, supra note 4.

12. Comment, supra note 2, at 502.

13. New York Times, March 18, 1967 (city ed.) at 1, col. 6.

14. The legislation was first introduced as S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967). Hearings were held on the bill. Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Sub-Committee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967) [hereinafter cited as Hearings on S. 2307]. Thereafter the bill was revised and reintroduced. S. 623, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969). The Subcommittee reported S. 623 to the full Committee on the Judiciary but no action was taken during the 91st Cong. The legislation was reintroduced in the 92d Cong., as S. 215. The Subcommittee reported the bill to the full Committee which reported the bill to the Senate on July 20, 1971. With one amendment the bill passed by a vote of 84-0. The bill was then referred to the House Judiciary Committee. No action was taken on the bill by the House during the 92d Cong. The legislation was reintroduced in the 93d Cong., 1st Sess. as S. 1272, which was identical to S. 215. The Subcommittee reported the bill to the Committee which reported the bill favorably to the full Senate. See S. REP. No. 93-293, supra note 7. The bill was again passed by the Senate, and again referred to the House Judiciary Committee. Again, no further action was taken. During the 94th Congress the "Ervin" legislation was introduced as S. 1815 by Senator Abourezk. The bill was referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee. No action was taken. During the 95th Congress, the "Ervin" legislation was introduced legislation was the first comprehensive attempt by Congress to deal with the Article V convention method, though it had previously touched upon the problem.[15] Senator Ervin's efforts received much attention and stimulated long-needed discussion.[16] Senator Ervin gave these reasons for introducing the legislation:

> The scant information and considerable misinformation and even outright ignorance displayed on the subject of constitutional amendment, both within the Congress and outside it — and particularly the dangerous precedents threatened by acceptance of some of the constitutional misconceptions put forth — prompted me to introduce in the Senate a legislative proposal designed to implement the convention amendment provision in article V.[17]

Congress to date, however, has refused to take action on comprehensive legislation dealing with the Article V convention method.[18]

It has been observed that "the primary importance of Article V may be found in the in terrorem effect of an ultimate appeal to the people for the correction of the abuses of their government."[19] In the past, states applied to Congress for a constitutional convention because they thought such a convention would be desirable. However, "[b]eginning with the twentieth century . . . the process has been used primarily as a prod in the side of Congress to force that body to propose a specific amendment."[20] Currently there are as H.R. 7008 by Congressman Hyde, and as S. 1880 by Senator Helms. H.R. 7008 was referred to the House Judiciary Committee which referred it to its Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights. S. 1880 was referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee. No action was taken on either bill.

---

Because Senator Ervin was the first to consider this issue and draft legislation and because subsequent Congressional legislation has been substantially identical to Senator Ervin's, this article will cite Senator Ervin's legislation, S. 1272, as exemplifying the Congressional approach.

15. See, e.g., Hearings on Amending the Constitution Relative to Taxes on Income, Inheritance, and Gifts Before Subcomm. No. 3 of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 2d Sess. (1958); Hearings on S. J. Res. 23 Before the Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 83d Cong., 2d Sess. (1954); STAFF OF THE HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 86TH CONG., 1ST SESS., STATE APPLICATIONS ASKING CONGRESS TO CALL A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION (Comm. Print 1959); STAFF OF THE HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82d CONG., 2d SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS ON FEDERAL TAX RATES (Comm. Print 1952).

16. See, e.g., Black, Amending The Constitution: A Letter To a Congressman, 82 YALE L. J. 189 (1972) [hereinafter cited as Black]; Note, Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1612 (1972).

17. Ervin, Proposed Legislation To Implement The Convention Method of Amending The Constitution, 66 MICH L. REV. 875 (1968) [hereinafter cited as Ervin].

18. See also H. Con. Res. 340, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. (1977); H. Con. Res. 28, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. (1975).

19. Kurland, Article V and the Amending Process, in AN AMERICAN PRIMER 148, 152. (D. Boorstin ed. 1966).

20. Comment, supra note 2, at 500, citing, W. Pullen, The Application Clause of the Amending attempts to have an Article V convention call on the issues of forced school busing,[21] abortion,[22] and a balanced federal budget.[23]

Even though there has never yet been an Article V convention, the possibility of one being convened is not so remote that the issues raised by the convention method should be ignored. The attempt to call a constitutional convention to deal with reapportionment of state legislatures came very close to success. As long as the states use the convention method to prod Congress, the prospect exists that someday a convention may be brought into being.

It further seems that the convention method is well suited to highly controversial and emotional issues. The congressional method of amending the Constitution depends upon the actions of the Members of Congress. In all practicality there is little effective recourse which can be taken by a dissatisfied group against a Congressman who votes against its proposed Constitutional amendment. They could only work for his defeat in the next general election, where his vote on the amendment would be just one of many which the voters would have to decide upon. Also, proposed amendments are often killed in committees, thereby giving all but a few Members the opportunity of avoiding responsibility for the fate of the amendment. A citizen or group, however, has much greater impact with members of a state legislature, where a single vote on one issue can be very important. It thus seems likely that those favoring constitutional amendments dealing with emotional and controversial issues will increase use of the Article V convention method.

The purpose of this article is to explore the issues raised by the Article V convention method.

II. THE GENESIS OF ARTICLE V AND THE CONVENTION METHOD

As has been observed, "[t]he idea of amending the organic instrument of a state is peculiarly American."[24] Prior to adoption

---

Provision of the Constitution 105 (1951) (unpublished thesis in Wilson Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill) [hereinafter cited as W. Pullen].

21. Comment, supra note 2, at 503 n.64.

22. As of August 3, 1978, 13 states had petitioned Congress for a constitutional convention on the subject of a pro-life amendment to the Constitution. Interview with Edward Zorinsky, U. S. Senator (Aug. 3, 1978).

23. As of August 3, 1978, 23 states had filed petitions with Congress calling for a convention to produce an amendment which would require a balanced federal budget. Interview with Edward Zorinsky, U. S. Senator (Aug. 3, 1978).

24. L. ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 1 (1942) [hereinafter cited as L. ORFIELD].

of the Constitution, several states had provisions for amending their constitutions. Article XIII of the Articles of Confederation provided for such amendment in the following manner:

> And the Articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state.[25]

The unanimous consent requirement created many difficulties for the united colonies after the Revolution.[26] As Charles Pinckney of South Carolina observed, "it is to this unanimous consent, the depressed situation of the Union is undoubtedly owing."[27]

On February 21, 1787, Congress passed a resolution calling a convention, > for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall, when agreed in Congress, and confirmed by the states, render the federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union.[28]

It was inevitable that this convention would consider a provision permitting admendments with the consent of less than the whole number of states.[29]

In May, 1787, the convention convened at Philadelphia. Several plans of proposed government, which contained provisions for amendment, were presented during the convention.[30] Of the 25. Martig, Amending the Constitution, Article Five: The Keystone of the Arch, 35 MICH. L. REV. 1253, 1255 (1937) [hereinafter cited as Martig]. citing, DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE FORMATION OF THE UNION OF THE AMERICAN STATES, H.R. DOC. No. 398, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. 35 (1927).

---

26. For a review of the events leading up to the 1787 convention, see, e.g., M. FARRAND, THE FRAMING OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 4-5 (1962); Martig, supra note 25, at 1253-61.

27. 3 M. FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION 120 (1937) [hereinafter cited as M. FARRAND].

28. 1 J. ELLIOT, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS ON THE ADOPTION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 120 (2d ed. 1896) [hereinafter cited as J. ELLIOT].

29. Scheips, The Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW 46, 48 (1950).

30. On May 29, Edmund Randolph of Virginia introduced his plan (The Virginia Plan). On the same date, after Randolph had introduced his plan, Charles Pinckney of South Carolina introduced his plan. Article 16, which provided as follows:

> If Two Thirds of the Legislatures of the States apply for the same The Legislature various plans presented, the resolutions of Edmund Randolph of Virginia are the most important,[31] and are the proper place to begin an inquiry into the genesis of the Article V convention method. Resolution 13 of the Randolph Resolutions (the Virginia Plan) provided as follows: "Resd. that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union, whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto."[32]

Resolution 13 was discussed on June 11th, with the convention resolved into a Committee of the Whole House. Several members did not see the necessity of the resolution at all, nor the propriety of making the consent of the national legislature unnecessary.[33] Colonel George Mason of Virginia argued in favor of the necessity of such a provision by stating the following:

> The plan now to be formed will certainly be defective, as the Confederation has been found on trial to be. Amendments therefore will be necessary, and it will be better to provide for them, in an easy, regular, and Constitutional way than to trust them to chance and violence. It would be improper to require the consent of the Natl. Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse, may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendment.[34]

Randolph supported Mason's arguments.[35] However, the latter of the United States shall call a convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution — or should Congress with the Consent of Two Thirds of each house propose to the States amendments to the same — the agreement of Two Thirds of the Legislatures of the States shall be sufficient to make the said amendments Parts of the Constitution.

---

The Ratifications of the Conventions of _____ States shall be sufficient for organizing this Constitution.

1. M. FARRAND, supra note 27 at 23;3 M. FARRAND, supra app. D, at 601.

On June 15, William Patterson of New Jersey introduced nine resolutions (The New Jersey Plan). Resolution 2 of the plan provided that "in addition to the powers vested in the U. States in Congress, by the present existing article of Confederation, they be authorized . . . to alter and amend in such manner as they shall think proper . . ." 1 M. FARRAND, supra at 243.

On June 18, Alexander Hamilton of New York read a sketch of a plan of government, which was never formally placed before the convention. Article IX, Section 12 of Hamilton's plan provided the following:

> This Constitution may receive such alterations and amendments as may be proposed by the Legislature of the United States, with the concurrence of two thirds of the members of both Houses, and ratified by the Legislatures of, or by Conventions of deputies chosen by the people in, two-thirds of the States composing the Union. 3 M. FARRAND, supra at 630.

31. M. FARRAND, THE FRAMING OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 68 (1962).
32. 1 M. FARRAND, supra note 27, at 22.
33. Id. at 202.
34. Id. at 202-03 (Madison's notes).
35. Id. at 203.

part of the resolution, providing that the consent of the national legislature should not be required, was lost.[36] The remainder of the resolution was accepted and referred to the Committee of Detail[37] wherein the provision for amending the Constitution was discussed.[38]

On August 6, the Committee of Detail presented the first draft of the Constitution to the full convention. Article XIX of the draft read as follows:

"On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the states in the Union, for an amendment, of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose.[39]

This draft was printed for the use of the convention delegates and occupied their discussions for over a month. Article XIX of the draft came up for discussion on August 30th. Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania suggested that the Legislature should be left at liberty to call a convention whenever they pleased.[40] Thereafter the article was unanimously agreed to.[41]

On September 10th, Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts moved to reconsider Article XIX of the first draft on the grounds that since the Constitution was to be paramount to the state constitutions, two-thirds of the states could obtain a convention wherein a majority could bind the union to innovations which might subvert the state constitutions.[42] Alexander Hamilton of New York seconded Gerry's motion to reconsider, citing the following different reasons:

> He (Hamilton) did not object to the consequences stated by Mr. Gerry — There was no greater evil in subjecting the people of the U.S. to the major voice than the people of a particular State — It had been wished by many and was much to have been desired that an easier mode for introducing amendments had been provided by the articles of Confederation. It was equally desirable now that an easy mode should be established for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new System. The mode proposed was not adequate. The State

36. Id.
37. Id. at 237; 2 M. FARRAND, supra at 83.
38. Id. at 148, 152, 159, 174.
39. Id. at 188.
40. Id. at 468.
41. Id.
42. Id. at 557-58.

> Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers — The National Legislature will be the first to perceive and will be the most sensible to the necessity of amendments, and ought also to be empowered, whenever two thirds of each branch should concur to call a Convention — There could be no danger in giving this power, as the people would finally decide in the case.[43]

James Madison of Virginia also favored the motion to reconsider, perceiving the vagueness of the provision.

"Mr. Madison remarked on the vagueness of the terms 'call a Convention for the purpose' as sufficient reason for reconsidering the article. How was a Convention to be formed? By what rule Decide? What the force of its act?"[44]

The motion to reconsider was passed.[45] James Wilson of Pennsylvania and Roger Sherman of Connecticut then moved to amend the proposed article.[46] Consideration of this was postponed upon a motion by Madison, who suggested the following provision in place of what had previously been agreed to:

> The Legislature of the U.S. — whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as parts thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U.S.[47]

Madison's motion was seconded by Hamilton. John Rutledge of South Carolina moved to amend Madison's proposal to protect slavery interests.[48] His amendment was accepted by the convention, and Madison's proposal, as amended, approved.[49]

Article XIX of the first draft of the Constitution was reported

---

43. Id. at 558 (Madison's notes).
44. Id.
45. Id.
46. Id. at 558-59.
47. Id. at 559.
48. Id.
49. Id.

out of the Committee of Style and Revision as Article V of the second draft of the Constitution. Article V then read as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the legislatures of the several states, shall propose amendments to this consitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the legislatures of the several scates, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the____ and ____ sections of article _____.[50]

Article V came up for discussion on September 15. Sherman expressed fears that three-fourths of the states might abolish particular states or deprive them of their equal representation in the Senate, and felt that the Article V provision which prevented use of the amendment power to affect slavery should be expanded to provide that no State could be affected in its internal police power or deprived of its equality in the Senate.[51] Mason thought that the plan for amending the Constitution as proposed was exceptionable and dangerous. He pointed out that as proposing amendments, under both modes, depended either immediately or ultimately upon the Congress, no amendments could ever be obtained by the people should the government become oppressive, as he believed it someday would.[52] Upon Mason's objections, Gouverneur Morris and Eldbridge Gerry moved to amend the article so as to require a Convention upon the application of two-thirds of the states.[53] Madison stated that he did not see why the Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two-thirds of the States as to call a convention on like application. He added, however, that he saw no objection against providing for a Con-

---

50. Id. at 629. The blanks were filled in to read, "affect the first and fourth sections of Article I."

51. Id.

52. Id. In the margin of his copy of the second draft (September 12) Mason wrote as follows:

> Article 5th — By this article Congress only have the power of proposing amendments at any future time to this constitution and should it prove ever so oppressive, the whole people of America can't make, or even propose alterations to it; a doctrine utterly subversive of the fundamental rights and liberties of the people.

Id. n.8.

53. Id. at 629.

vention for the purpose of proposing amendments, except for the difficulties which might arise as to the form, the quorum, etc., which he thought in Constitutional regulations ought to be avoided as much as possible.[54] The Morris and Gerry amendment was accepted. After further discussion, Article V was amended a final time, to quell the fears raised by Sherman and the smaller states, adding the proviso, "[t]hat no State, without its consent shall be deprived of its equal sufferage in the Senate."[55] Article V thus assumed its present form.

When the Constitution was before the various state conventions for ratification, the amendment procedure in Article V appears generally to have been viewed positively, a reason for ratification.[56]

James Madison, in The Federalist No. 43, made these observations regarding Article V:

> That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against the extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables that general and state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by experience on one side or another.[57]

Article V, like numerous other constitutional provisions, is a result of compromise. The majority of convention members recognized that the new Constitution should contain a method whereby it could be altered or amended if such need should arise in the future. One faction did not trust giving the states the amending power for fear that they would use this power either to weaken the strong national union being forged or to destroy and discriminate

---

54. Id. at 629-30.

55. Id. at 631.

56. Before North Carolina's ratifying convention James Iredell argued, "it is a most happy circumstance, that there is a remedy in the system itself for its own fallibility, so that alterations can without difficulty be made, agreeable to the general sense of the people." 4 J. ELLIOT, supra note 28, at 176-77.

57. THE FEDERALIST No. 43 (Cooke ed. 1961).
Justice Story also spoke highly of the usefulness and propriety of the amending provision.
J. STORY, 2 COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES §§ 1827-28(5th ed. 1891)(hereinafter cited as J. STORY).

against other states. The other faction did not trust the national legislature with sole possession of the amending power, fearing that if the government became oppressive, it would never permit amendments to end the abuses.

The debates of 1787 make it clear that the convention method of amending the Constitution was devised as a protection against this latter concern. There was to be an amending process whereby Congress would be bypassed, and the people could initiate amendments, despite opposition from Congress.[58] When trying to resolve the issues and questions raised by the Article V convention method, this purpose must be clearly kept in mind.

III. ISSUES RAISED BY THE ARTICLE V CONVENTION METHOD

Article V speaks in general terms. It neither describes nor defines the convention which it contemplates. The debates of the 1787 convention are not very helpful in attempting to perceive the constitutional shape of such a convention. It would appear initially that an Article V convention must be some sort of deliberative body.[59]

Many questions have been raised concerning the Article V convention method, some of which have been satisfactorily resolved. Others continue to plague those concerned in this area. This section of the article will discuss these questions.

A. Can Congress Call a Constitutional Convention Absent State Applications?

One question that has arisen is whether Congress on its own initiative can call an Article V convention. It is generally agreed that Congress does not have the power to do so. The argument against Congress' power to do so, has been thusly stated:

> Congress is neither authorized nor compelled to summon an Article V convention prior to the submission by two-thirds of the state legislatures of proper and timely applications for such a convention. The reasons for this are

58. Comment, supra note 2, at 498.

59. See Bonfield, Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems, 39 Notre Dame Law. 659, 662 (1964); Platz, Article V of the Federal Constitution; 3 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 17, 45 (1934) [hereinafter cited as Platz].

> several. Since the United States is a government of delegated powers, it possesses no authority except that conferred upon it by the Constitution. Article V, the only provision in the Constitution dealing with its amendment, must therefore be deemed exhaustive and not merely illustrative of the federal government's power in this regard. That provision explicitly sets out two modes for proposing constitutional amendments, only one of which contemplates the convening of a convention empowered to propose amendments. Such a convention is authorized by Article V only when two-thirds of the state legislatures have made 'Applications' for a convention. As a result, applications within the meaning of Article V from two-thirds of the states legislatures must fairly be deemed absolute prerequisites to the summoning of such a body.[60]

A contrary argument, however, has been advanced.[61]

Nothing in the 1787 convention debates supports the view that Article V was merely meant to be illustrative of one method of constitutional amendment,[62] and that Congress could therefore, in the absence of state applications, call a convention.[63]

B. Is Congress Obligated to Call a Constitutional Convention when Properly Petitioned?

It has been argued that the terms of Article V, providing that Congress shall call a constitutional convention when petitioned, are

---

60. Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 949, 951 (1968) [hereinafter cited as Bonfield]. See also L. Orfield, supra note 24, at 37, 40.

61. See Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 Notre Dame Law 185, 196 (1951) [hereinafter cited as Corwin & Ramsey].

62. On August 30, Morris suggested that the national legislature should be at liberty to call a convention whenever they pleased. Supra note 40 and accompanying text. On September 10, Hamilton also suggested that the national legislature should be empowered to call a convention absent state application. Supra note 43 and accompanying text.

These actions clearly would not support an argument that Article V is merely illustrative. At the time these actions were taken, the only method contemplated by the convention for proposing amendments was to call a convention for that purpose. Thus Morris and Hamilton were merely stating their viewpoint that the national legislature should also be able to initiate amendments — not conventions — without the need for state request, which ultimately it was given the power to do.

63. It could be argued that Congress does in fact have such a power. By accepting the liberal interpretation that all applications from the States, regardless of their reasons, should be counted together to meet the two-thirds requirement, and by accepting a lengthy period during which applications would be counted, at almost any given point, Congress would have no difficulty in finding the Article V prerequisites to a constitutional convention arguably met.

64. See, e.g., Dodd, Judicially Non-Enforceable Provisions of the Constitution, 80 U. Pa. L. Rev. 54, 82 1931); Platz, supra note 59, at 44.

not mandatory but merely permissive.[64] There has been strong objection to this viewpoint.[65] The evidence that Article V places a mandatory duty upon Congress to call a convention, when properly petitioned, is overwhelming.

The wording of Article V supports this argument. Article V provides that "on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States (Congress) shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . "[66] In Martin v. Hunter's Lessee,[67] the Supreme Court interpreted the word "shall" as having a mandatory effect in the contest of the Constitution.[68]

It seems clear that the framers intended that Congress be subjected to a mandatory duty to call a convention when properly petitioned.[69] In The Federalist No. 85, Hamilton wrote:

> In opposition to the probability of subsequent amendments, it has been urged that the persons delegated to the administration of the national government will always be disinclined to yield up any portions of the authority of which they were once possessed. For my own part I acknowledge a thorough conviction that any amendments which may, upon mature consideration, be thought useful, will be applicable to the organization of the government, not to the mass of its powers; and on this account alone I think there is little weight in the observation just stated. I also think there is little weight in it on another account. The intrinsic difficulty of governing thirteen states at any rate, independent of calculations upon an ordinary degree of public spirit and integrity, will, in my opinion constantly impose on the national rules the necessity of a spirit of accommodation to the reasonable expectations of their constituents. But

---

65. See Bonfield, supra note 60, at 976; Ervin, supra note 17, at 886.

66. U.S. Const. art. V.

67. 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304 (1816).

68. Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304, 327 (1816).

69. In a letter on the subject, Madison observed that the question concerning the calling of a convention, "will not belong to the Federal Legislature. If two-thirds of the states apply for one, Congress cannot refuse to call it: if not, the other mode of amendments must be pursued." Letter from Madison to Mr. Eve, dated January 2, 1789, reprinted in 5 U. S. Bureau of Rolls & Library, Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States of America 1786-1870 143.

One delegate to the North Carolina ratifying convention explained Article V as follows: ". . . that it is very evident that . . . [the proposal of amendments] does not depend on the will of Congress: for . . . the legislatures of two-thirds of the states were authorized to make applications for calling a convention to propose amendments, and, on such applications, it is provided that Congress shall call such convention, so that they will have no option."

4 J. Elliot, supra note 28, at 178. See also Corwin & Ramsey, supra note 61, at 195.

> there is yet a further consideration, which proves beyond the possibility of doubt, that the observation is futile. It is this that the national rulers, whenever nine States concur, will have no option upon the subject. By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obligated 'on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the States (which at present-amount to nine), to call a convention for proposing amendments, which shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof.' The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence, all the declamation about the disinclination to a change vanishes in air.[70]

Further, keeping in mind the purpose behind the Article V convention method; i.e., insuring that the people would always have at their disposal a method of correcting defects in the system should the national government become oppressive and refuse to initiate changes, it becomes apparent that the duty imposed upon Congress must be mandatory. Were Congress to have discretion over the calling of a convention, the purpose behind the provision would be nullified.

C. State Applications for a Constitutional Convention

The duty of Congress to call a convention when properly petitioned is mandatory. Congress, however, has the power to ascertain whether the prerequisites to this duty have been met.[71] Article V states that Congress shall call a convention "on the Applications of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states."[72] This provision raises several questions. How long should Congress count state applications? Should only those applications which deal with the same subject matter be counted together, or should all states applications regardless of subject matter be included? May a state rescind its application for a convention?

It is generally agreed that Congress should consider only those applications which are submitted reasonably contemporaneously

---

70. The Federalist No. 85 (Cooke ed. 1961).
71. Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 Ill. L. Rev. 782, 790 (1927) [hereinafter cited as Wheeler].
72. U.S. Const. art. V.

with one another when determining whether the prerequisites of its Article V duty have been met.[73] The framers intended that the Constitution be modified only when there was significant agreement among the states and the people to do so.[74] The framers thus provided that Congress must call a convention only when two-thirds of the states petitioned for one; that an amendment would not be ratified unless three-fourths of the states agreed thereto; and that two-thirds of both Houses of Congress must concur before the amendment was initiated. The framers required significantly more than mere majority agreement at all phases of the amending process. The implicit requirement of substantial agreement, when applied to the application process, calls for two-thirds of the states to agree that the convention procedure be invoked. Inherent in the concept of agreement is a contemporaneous convergence of desire for a specified course of action.

The next issue then is what constitutes a contemporaneous period during which to count applications? One writer has suggested that applications tendered during one "generation" be counted together.[75] Another suggests that Congress count only those applications which it receives during one session.[76] The best view appears to be that there be no definite period since what is contemporaneous in each case will vary, depending on factors such as the issues involved and the political climate. In Coleman v. Miller,[77] involving the validity of Kansas' ratification of the proposed Child Labor Amendment, the Supreme Court held that the validity of a state's ratification of a proposed amendment, nearly thirteen years after it has been proposed, was nonjusticiable.[78] The Court stated that the question of a reasonable time for ratification involved considerations of political, social, and economical conditions prevailing since the amendment was submitted for ratification and that Congress, not the Court, was in the best position to evaluate these.[79] Applying the same rationale to applications, the converse side of the amending process, in determining whether the prerequisites of its duty to call a convention have been met, Congress would analyze the above

73. See Bonfield, supra note 60, at 958; Corwin & Ramsey, supra note 61, at 195-96.
74. Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1071-72 (1957).
75. L. ORFIELD, supra note 24, at 42.
76. Sprague, Shall We Have a Federal Constitutional Convention, and What Shall it Do?, 3 ME. L. REV. 115, 123 (1910) [hereinafter cited as Sprague].
77. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
78. Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 450 (1939).
79. Id. at 453-54.

mentioned factors and decide whether contemporaneous agreement for a constitutional convention was present.[80]

Congress may, if it so desired, choose to set a definite period during which applications calling for a convention to deal with a particular subject would be counted. In Dillon v. Gloss, [81] the Supreme Court upheld the validity of a definite period imposed by Congress for state ratifications. The Court held:

> We do not find anything in the Article [V] which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the States may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective . . . First, proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time . . . . [A]s ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do. These considerations and the general purport and spirit of the Article lead to the conclusion expressed by Judge Jameson 'that an alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed by Congress.'[82]

Applying the rationale of Dillon to the application process, Congress may impose a reasonable period during which state applications would be considered together.[83] Such a definite period would have the advantage of removing the subjective determinations previously mentioned, but would not unduly burden the use of the convention method, as state legislatures could

---

80. See Bonfield, supra note 60, at 961.
81. 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
82. Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 374-75 (1921).
83. Accord, A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 31-32.

periodically renew their applications, if they retained their interest in calling a convention.

The Ervin legislation provides that an application submitted to the Congress by a state shall remain effective for seven calendar years after the date it is received by Congress.[84] Presumably this time period was suggested by analogy to the limitation period set for ratifications.[85] It has been suggested, however, that the considerations pertinent to ratification are not the same for the application process, and that four years might be a more appropriate period.[86]

Another issue raised is whether only those applications which deal with the same issue should be counted together, or whether all state applications requesting a constitutional convention, regardless of the reasons cited by the state in its application therefor, should be included.

Initially, in order to be an "application" within the meaning of Article V, a state's communication with Congress must somewhere contain a request for a constitutional convention.[87] It also appears that Congress may not require the state's application to be in any particular form.[88]

Article V seems to require a general consensus among two-thirds of the states that a constitutional convention be called. Thus, only those applications which request a convention to deal with the same issue should be counted together. If one state, for example, desires a constitutional convention to propose a pro-life amendment, and another state desires a convention to propose an amendment requiring a balanced federal budget, there is a general consensus or agreement that a convention be called, but a basic disagreement exists regarding what the convention should consider. If two states, however, request a convention to consider a balanced budget amendment, then the requisite agreement exists. The Ervin legislation adopts this approach, counting together only those applications which call for a constitutional convention to deal with "the same subject."[89]

Another issue concerning state applications is whether a state may rescind its application for a constitutional convention. The Ervin legislation permits such recission up until the required number of states have petitioned Congress for a convention.[90] This

84. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 5(a).
85. See S. REP. No. 93-293, supra note 8, at 11.
86. Note, 85 HARV. L. REV. supra note 16, at 1620-21; A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 32.
87. A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 30.
88. See Dirksen, supra note 4, at 864; S. REP. No. 93-293, supra note 8, at 10.
89. S. 1272, supra note 14, §§ 5(a), 6(b).
90. Id. § 5(b).

is clearly the correct approach. State applications for a convention should show a general consensus among the requisite number of states that a constitutional convention be held. A state can hardly be said to be part of a consensus to call a convention after it has rescinded its application. After the requisite number of states have petitioned Congress and invoked its duty to call a convention, a state has other courses of action open to it should it, after reconsidering, no longer desire the convention. Allowing a state to rescind its application after the required number of states have submitted applications and the duty to call the convention has arisen would amount to giving a single state, or handful of states, a veto power over the convention method after it has been set in motion.

A final issue with state applications is the effect of calling a constitutional convention upon previously submitted applications. If one accepts the viewpoint that a duly convened constitutional convention has the power to propose amendments on any subject, it would appear that all previously submitted applications would lose their validity once the convention is held, since each state would have the right to seek adoption by the convention of amendments on any subject. If the viewpoint is accepted that the convention can be limited in scope to consideration of the topic placed by Congress in the call, then only those state applications dealing with that topic should lose their validity once the convention is held.

D. THE ROLE OF THE PRESIDENT, STATE GOVERNORS, AND THE VICE-PRESIDENT IN THE ARTICLE V CONVENTION METHOD.

Article 1, Section 7 of the Constitution in part provides as follows:

> Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules of Limitations prescribed in the case of a Bill.[91]

91. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 7.

The Supreme Court has held that provisions of the Constitution must be read in light of each other.[92] Consequently, it has been argued that the President has the power to veto Congress' call of a constitutional convention.[93] It is pointed out that Congress must enact legislation, pursuant to its call of the Convention, which is similar to other types of legislation which Congress normally deals with, and therefore, no logical reason exists to exclude the convention process from the scope of Article I, Section 7.[94] The President, it is urged, would be under a duty to veto a call if he believed the constitutional prerequisites were not met[95] or if he believed that the convention was not in the nation's best interests.[96]

This viewpoint is clearly untenable. Despite the surface similarity between legislation which Congress must enact incidental to a convention call and other types of legislation over which the President possesses the veto power, Congress, when enacting legislation pursuant to the call of a constitutional convention, is performing a unique function delegated to it by a specific article of the Constitution. Congress is not acting in its regular lawmaking role. Congress is merely the agency selected by the framers through which this process is to be effectuated.[97]

The history of Article V lends no support to the proposition that the President has a role in the amendment by convention process. Article V speaks only of Congress. No mention is made of the President, nor can a role for him be inferred into the article from its specific language or from the 1787 debates.[98] Were the President given a veto power over the Article V convention method a great obstacle would stand in the way of the people as they attempt to amend the Constitution. The Article V convention method was designed to insure the people a way to amend the Constitution in the event the national government, presumably including the President, should ever become oppressive. To include

---

92. See Hostetter v. Idlewild Liquor Corp., 377 U.S. 324, 332 (1964); Prout v. Starr, 188 U.S. 537 (1902).

93. See, e.g., Black, supra note 16, at 206-09.

94. Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L. J., 957, 965 (1963) [hereinafter cited as Black]; Bonfield, supra note 60, at 986.

95. See, e.g., Bonfield, supra note 60, at 986.

96. Black supra note 94, at 965.

97.

> Since Article V is a grant of power to Congress, and not to the Federal Government, as we have seen, and since Congress is bound to call a convention upon the application of the requisite number of states, it would seem that such act should not be subject to the President's veto.

Platz, supra note 59, at 37.

98. See Gilliam, Constitutional Conventions: Precedents, Problems, and Proposals, 16 ST. LOUIS U.L.J. 46, 48 (1971) [hereinafter cited as Gilliam].

the President in this process would be contrary to the intent of the framers. Presumably, the act of calling a convention, and all legislation incidental thereto, would require a mere majority vote of both houses.[99] If the President had the power to veto matters relating to the call of such a convention, each house would be required by Article I, Section 7 to repass the measures by a two-thirds vote. This would greatly inhibit the effectiveness of the convention method.[100]

The first ten amendments were submitted to the states for approval without having first been sent to President Washington.[101] In Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[102] the Supreme Court considered a case involving the validity of the eleventh amendment. It was argued that the amendment was void because it was not proposed in the form prescribed by the Constitution, having never been submitted to the President for his approval, as it was contended was required under Article I, Section 7.[103] Counsel argued that the President's concurrence was required in matters of infinitely less importance than amending the Constitution and that the language of Article I, Section 7 applied equally, whether on subjects of ordinary legislation or of constitutional amendment.[104] Hollingsworth involved the congressional method of amending whereby amendments are proposed by two-thirds of the members of each house. Counsel stated as follows:

> . . . . it is no answer to the objection, to observe, that as two-thirds of both houses are required to originate the proposition, it would be nugatory to return it with the president's negative, to be repassed by the same number; since the reasons assigned for his disapprobation might be so satisfactory as to reduce the majority below the constitutional proposition.[105]

The Attorney General pointed out that the same course (not requiring the approval of the President) had been followed in all the other amendments which had been adopted. He argued that the case of amendments is a substantive act, unconnected with the

---

99. Platz, supra note 59, at 37.

100. The A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, supports the opinion that the President has no role in the amendment process. Id. at 26-28.

101. Annot., Article 1, Section 7, in THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA: ANALYSIS AND INTERPRETATION, S. Doc. No. 39, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 136 (1964 ed.).

102. 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

103. Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378, 378-79 (1798).

104. Id. at 379.

105. Id. at 378-79.

ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms investing the President with a qualified negative on acts and resolutions of Congress.[106] In a footnote to the Attorney General's argument, Justice Chase wrote, "[t]here can, surely, be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the president applies only to ordinary cases of legislation: he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the constitution."[107]

In 1803, a motion to submit the twelfth amendment to the President was defeated in the Senate. In 1861, a proposed amendment on slavery was presented to and signed by President Buchanan. In 1865, the proposed thirteenth amendment was submitted to President Lincoln and signed by him, in apparent inadvertence. This matter was discussed in the Senate and a resolution was passed declaring that the President's signature was unneccessary, that his actions were inconsistent with previous practice and that this should not constitute a precedent for the future. In 1866, President Andrew Johnson made clear, in a report sent to Congress, that actions taken by the President relating to amendments were ministerial in nature and did not commit the President to a role in the process. Since that time, no proposed amendment has been submitted to the President.[108] Finally, in Hawke v. Smith, No. 1,[109] the Supreme Court, citing Hollingsworth, stated unequivocably that, "[A]t an early day this court settled that the submission of a constitutional amendment did not require the action of the President."[110]

While Hollingsworth dealt with the Congressional amendment process, there is no reason to believe that had the question arisen in connection with the Article V convention method that a different result would have been reached. The Ervin legislation provides that the convention shall be called by the passage of a concurrent resolution which does not require the signature of the President.[111]

Another issue concerns the role of a state governor in the Article V convention method. May the governor veto a state's application to Congress for a constitutional convention? Article V provides that, "[c]ongress . . . on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a

106. Id. at 380.
107. Id.
108. A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 27.
109. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).
110. Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221, 229 (1920).
111. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 6(a).

convention for proposing Amendments. . . ."[112] The answer to the question concerning the role of the state governor in this process revolves around the meaning of the word "Legislatures" as used in Article V.

The Supreme Court has held that the term "legislature" in a particular clause of the Constitution depends upon the type of activity that the legislature is called upon to perform. In Smiley v. Holm,[113] the Supreme Court held that when a state legislature prescribes the time, place, and manner of holding elections under Article I, Section 4 of the Constitution, it is enacting legislation and in that context "legislature" means the entire legislative process of the state, including the executive veto. As stated by the Court, "[w]herever the term 'legislature' is used in the Constitution it is necessary to consider the nature of the particular action in view."[114]

In Hawke v. Smith, No. I,[115] the Supreme Court struck down a provision in Ohio's constitution requiring ratification of proposed constitutional amendments by popular referendum. The Court found this to be invalid because Article V required ratification by "legislatures" and that a popular referendum was not a "legislature" within the sense the term was used in Article V. The Court wrote as follows:

> The only question really for determination is: What did the framers of the Constitution mean in requiring ratification by "Legislatures"? That was not a term of uncertain meaning when incorporated into the Constitution. What it meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation. A Legislature was then the representative body which made the laws of the people.[116]

Ratification of a proposed amendment, the Court stated, was not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word, but merely an expression of assent for which no legislative action is authorized or required. The Court further held that the power to ratify a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution had its source in the Federal Constitution; and the act of ratification by a state

---

112. U.S. Const. art. V.
113. 285 U.S. 355 (1932).
114. Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 366 (1932). See also Note, 70 Harv. L. Rev., supra note 74, at 1074.
115. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).
116. Id. at 227.

derived its authority from the Federal Constitution to which the state and its people had assented.[117]

The term "legislatures" in Article V thus means the representative body which ordinarily makes the laws. The function given to this agency by Article V is a federal function derived from the Constitution. Consequently, when state legislatures apply to Congress for an Article V convention they are not acting as lawmakers under their state constitutions but as federal agents performing a federal function. They are representatives of the people of the State under the power granted by Article V. The article imports a function different from that of lawmakers and renders inapplicable the conditions which usually attach to the making of state laws, such as the governor's approval. [118] The Ervin legislation follows this viewpoint by providing that a state's application for a convention need not be approved by the state's governor.[119]

The final issue for discussion is whether the Vice-President has a role in the Article V convention process. Article I, Section 3 provides that, "[t]he Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided."[120] If the Senate is equally divided on the calling of a constitutional convention, may the Vice-President cast his vote to break the tie? As in the case of the President, Article V makes no specific reference to the Vice-President, nor do the debates of 1787. There exists, however, evidence that the framers did not intend for the Vice-President to have a role in the amending process.[121]

In applying the same reasoning to the Vice-President as applies to the role of the President, it appears that the Vice-President should likewise have no role in the amending process. Just as the power of the President to veto legislation under Article I,

---

117. Accord, Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137 (1922). See also Petuskey v. Rampton, 307 F. Supp. 235 (1969), rev'd on other grounds, 431 F.2d 378 (10th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 913 (1971).

118. C. BRICKFIELD, STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 85TH CONG., 1ST SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 10-11 (Comm. Print 1957) [hereinafter cited as C. BRICKFIELD]. See State ex. rel. Sanstead v. Freed, 251 N.W.2d 898 (N.D. 1977) (lieutenant governor could not vote upon final disposition of resolutions proposing amendments to the U. S. Constitution); Opinion of the Justices to the Senate, 366 N.E.2d 1226 (Mass. 1977) (signature of Governor not required on resolutions calling for a national convention).

119. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 3(a); But see Black, supra note 16, at 209-10, where the author argues that state governors should not be excluded from the amendment by convention process of Article V.

120. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 3.

121. In 1803, Pierce Butler, then Vice-President of the United States, who had been a delegate from South Carolina to the 1787 Convention, stated on the floor of the Senate, "It was never intended by the Constitution that the Vice-President, should have a vote in altering the Constitution."

3 M. FARRAND, supra note 27, at 400.

Section 7 applies only to ordinary legislation, so should the power of the Vice-President to cast a deciding vote in the Senate. It would be anomalous if the Vice-President were to have a role in the amending process, but not the President or the state governors. Hollingsworth and Hawke, which held that the President had no role in the amendment process should apply to the Vice-President by analogy. Provision is made in the Ervin legislation for the Vice-President to convene the constitutional convention, administer the oath of office, and preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer.[122]

E. Representation At and Delegates To an Article V Convention.

One of the most important issues concerning an Article V convention is representation. Should each state have one vote, should delegates be apportioned strictly on the basis of population, or according to some other scheme?

It seems reasonable that the framers, when devising the convention method, contemplated a convention substantially similar, if not identical, to the one they were then attending. The 1787 convention was organized on the basis of state representation. Each state had one vote. Seven states, a simple majority, constituted a quorum, a majority of those states present being competent to decide all questions.[123] The provision in Article V for a separate ratification stage was adopted after it was pointed out in the debates that if the convention were to have both the power to propose and to adopt amendments,[124] a majority of the states could bind the whole union.

The entire scheme for amendment as provided for in Article V is evidence that the framers viewed amendments to the Constitution as alternations in the fundamental compact between the states. In this compact each state is the theoretical and legal equal of the others, regardless of such differences as wealth or population. Article V provides that whenever two-thirds of the legislatures of the several states apply, a convention shall be called. This convention shall then propose amendments which when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states or by conventions in the states, shall be valid. The states have an equal

122. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 8(a).
123. M. Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 57 (1962).
124. Supra note 42 and accompanying text.

voice in both the application stage and in the ratification stage of the amending process. It would be illogical to assume that the framers did not intend for the states to have an equal voice during the convention.[125] Madison wrote in The Federalist No. 43 concerning Article V, "[i]t moreover equally enables the general and state governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by experience on one side or another."[126] While the amendment power ultimately rests with the people, it is exercised by them through the states, and, in the legal contemplation of the Constitution, each state is regarded as an equal. As stated by one eminent authority, Article V:

> recognizes the concept of dual constituency of the Federal Government. A ratification signifies not only the assent of a section of the people of the United States, expressed by their agent, but that of a state, regarded as a political community, as well, and the vote of New York . . . has no more weight than that of . . . Nevada. Likewise, no state may be deprived of its equal sufferage in the Senate without its consent. Finally, a convention is to be called upon the application of two-thirds of the states, and here also the shout from New York has no more weight than the whisper from Nevada.[127]

It is interesting to note that the legislation originally drafted by Senator Ervin provided for representation modeled after the 1787 convention; i.e., each state having one vote.[128] Senator Ervin, however, was forced to modify this, after hearings, presumably as the result of political pressure from the populous states. S. 1272 provides that a convention shall be composed of as many delegates from each state as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress.[129]

The American Bar Association's Special Study Committee believes that convention representation should be guided by the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" rule. It suggests representation identical to that of the states in the House of 125. See Hearings on S. 2307, supra note 14, at 33 (remarks of Senator Hruska); Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 16, at 1625.

126. THE FEDERALIST No. 43 (Cooke ed. 1961) (emphasis added).

127. Platz, supra note 59, at 29.

128. "[I]n voting on any question before the convention each state shall have one vote which shall be cast as the majority of the delegates from the state, present at the time, shall agree." S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., § 9(a) (1967).

129. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 7(a).

Representatives.[130] Another writer has suggested a bicameral convention modeled after Congress.[131]

Those who disagree with the idea of representation at an Article V convention patterned after the 1787 convention either ignore the clear intent of the framers,[132] or in the alternative argue that even if this was their intent we should no longer be bound to follow it.[133]

If the argument that a convention should be based upon proportionate representation is followed to its logical conclusion, then representation at an Article V convention should be totally on the basis of one man, one vote. There is no compelling reason, once the intent of the framers is cast aside, to accord each state even a minimum of one delegate, since even this would result in population deviations of up to fifty percent.[134] While the specific language of Article V arguably does not bar a convention based upon proportionate representation according to population, such a convention would be an anomaly within the Article V scheme of amendment. The application and ratification provisions of Article V clearly give each state an equal vote. This language cannot be ignored. What would be the advantage of having a convention, based solely upon proportionate representation by population, propose amendments which would have to be ratified with each state having one vote. Such an interpretation would merely place a barrier upon the practical use of this method. If each state had an equal vote at an Article V convention, amendments proposed from such a convention would stand a far greater chance of adoption because majority agreement and compromise would already have been hammered out between the states at the convention level.

The clear intent of the framers, that an Article V convention should be based upon equal state representation, is an inherent constitutional requirement of Article V. While on occasion, when exceptional circumstances were present, the Supreme Court has wandered away from the strict intent of the framers,[135] the traditional approach of the Court being to follow the clear intent of

130. A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 35-36.

131. Note, 70 HARV. L. REV., supra note 74, at 1076 n.50.

132. Kauper, The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations, 66 MICH. L. REV. 903, 909 (1968) [hereinafter cited as Kauper]; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV., supra note 74, at 1075.

133. Bonfield, supra note 60, at 988; McClesky, Along the Midway: Some Thoughts on Democratic Constitution-Amending, 66 MICH. L. REV. 1001, 1006-07 (1968); Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 16, at 1625-27; A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 35.

134. See A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 36.

135. See, e.g., Brown v. Board of Educ., 347 U.S. 483, 489 (1954); Home Building Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 442-43 (1933); Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 433 (1920); McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 415 (1819).

the framers when interpreting the Constitution.[136] If this requirement of Article V is outmoded and archaic, like the electoral college is argued to be, then the proper remedy is to amend the Constitution not to ignore the clear intent of the framers or to rationalize it away.

Accepting the viewpoint that each state has one vote at an Article V convention on all matters, it follows that each state should be allowed to select its delegates, in any manner it chooses.[137] A State should have members of its delegation either elected or appointed. The states' legislatures would be in charge of the delegation selection. A state could put in its delegation as many persons as it desired, though each state would have but one vote at the convention. Presumably, however, practical and financial considerations would prevent an excessive number from being sent. If the 1787 convention precedent is followed, and a state appoints its delegation, supposedly only those best qualified, e.g., respected elder statesmen and state political leaders, would be appointed. Prudent men, not likely to be given to any excesses or abuses of the convention process, certainly would be chosen.

The Ervin legislation, proceeding upon the premise that Congress has the power to prescribe the selection of delegates to an Article V convention, provides that two delegates shall be elected at large and one elected from each congressional district according to state law. Any vacancy occurring in a state delegation is to be filled by appointment by the state's governor.[138]

A final issue is whether there are any constitutional limitations upon whom may be a delegate to an Article V convention. Article I, Section 6 of the Constitution states the following:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office un-

136. See, e.g., South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 448 (1905); Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 95 (1900); Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U.S. 662, 670 (1889); Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 12 (1887); Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 657, 722 (1838).

The Supreme Court has held that if the meaning of a constitutional provision is at all doubtful, wherever reasonably possible to do so, the doubt should be resolved in a way to forward the evident purpose with which the provision was adopted. Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581 (1900); Jarrolt v. Moberly, 103 U.S. 580 (1880).

The Supreme Court has long recognized the propriety of drawing upon the debates of the 1787 Convention, The Federalist, and other writings of the founding fathers to construe vague constitutional provisions. Missouri Pac. R.R. v. Kansas, 248 U.S. 276 (1919); Pollack v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895); Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821).

137. "It would seem proper for each state to determine the procedure for the election of its delegates and the qualifications of the electors, since matters of this kind have traditionally been left to the states." Note, 70 HARV. L. REV., supra note 74, at 1076. See also Platz, supra note 59, at 37-38.

138. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 7(a).

> der the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.[139]

Are members of Congress prevented by this provision from being delegates to an Article V convention? The Supreme Court has suggested that an "Office under the Authority of the United States" must be one created under Article II's appointive provisions,[140] consequently excluding the position of delegate to a constitutional convention, which arises under Article V. Selection of a member of Congress by a state to a position on its delegation to an Article V convention clearly does not come within the policy behind Article I, Section 6, and thus should not be barred.[141] The Articles of Confederation contained a prohibition similar to the present Article I, Section 6,[142] yet several delegates to the 1787 convention were members of the Continental Congress.[143] Theoretically state laws and state constitutions may prescribe directly or indirectly who may not serve as Article V convention delegates, e.g., minors, incompetents, criminals, etc.

F. Financial Issues Pertaining to an Article V. Constitutional Convention.

Article V is silent about the financing of a constitutional convention. It would seem that Congress has inherent power and the responsibility, incidental to its power to call the convention, to provide reasonable funds for the convention. Congress' minimal responsibility should be to provide the actual costs of the convention, leaving to the states the burden of travel expenses and personal expense money of the delegates.[144] Nothing, however, would preclude Congress from paying for the expenses of convention delegates. Hopefully, whether it be the federal or the state government, some one will pay the expenses of the delegates, so that being

---

139. U.S. Const. art. I, § 6.

140. United States v. Smith, 124 U.S. 525 (1888); United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508 (1878).

141. See Forkosch, The Alternative Amending Clause in Article V: Reflections and Suggestions, 51 Minn. L. Rev. 1053, 1072-73 (1967) [hereinafter cited as Forkosch].

142. Article V of the Articles of Confederation provided that "nor shall any person being a delegate [to Congress], be capable of holding any office under the United States, for which he, or another for his benefit receives any salary, fees, or emolument of any kind."

M. Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States 213 (1962).

143. A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 37.

144. Forkosch, supra note 141, at 1082 n.103.

a delegate to a constitutional convention would not become a privilege accorded only to the affluent.

An interesting question would arise if Congress, disfavoring the convention, were to attempt to use the "power of the purse" over it, and totally deny it funding or appropriate an insufficient fund. One writer has suggested that in such a case, the convention would have inherent power to appropriate its own funding.[145] This position is untenable at best. A convention could not enforce such an "appropriation." In our era of electronic media, however, should a convention duly convened find itself without funding, it could likely make a successful appeal to the American people and thus raise sufficient funds. Furthermore, a duly convened convention, as an agency of the United States, probably could charge its expenses, and possibly those of its delegates, to the credit of the United States, leaving creditors with the right to recover such sums against the United States in the federal courts.

The Ervin legislation authorizes the payment of such sums as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses of such a convention,[146] and provides that the concurrent resolution calling for the convention shall set delegate compensation for each day of service and for travel.[147]

G. The Power of the States over an Article V. Constitutional Convention and the Alternative Amending Process.

The initial question which arises in this area is whether states have the power, via their applications to Congress, to limit the scope of an Article V convention. If thirty-four states petition Congress for an Article V convention to propose a pro-life amendment, can this convention, so formed, expand its deliberations beyond that topic? The authorities overwhelmingly believe that the states have no such power.[148] In the words of one writer:

> even though the application were for a limited purpose, it would seem that the state legislatures would have no authority to limit an instrumentality set up under the Federal Constitution. In reality, the right of the

145. Platz, supra note 59, at 47.
146. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 8(b).
147. Id. § 7(d).
148. See Bonfield, supra note 60, at 995; Platz, supra note 59, at 45; Wheeler, supra note 71, at 795.

> legislatures is confined to applying for a convention, and any statements of purpose in their petitions would be irrelevant as to the scope of the powers of the convention.[149]

Another question concerning this issue is whether a state has the power to order its delegation home if it becomes dissatisfied with the way the convention is proceeding, or whether it can direct its delegation to vote a certain way at the convention, or only upon certain matters. the answer to these questions would seem to be no. If the viewpoint is accepted that a state cannot limit the scope of the convention directly via its application, then it should not be able to do so indirectly by controlling the actions of its delegates in the convention. The framers contemplated that an Article V convention would be a deliberative body which would discuss freely and fully any proposed constitutional changes.[150] In Hawke v. Smith, No. 1,[151] the Supreme Court, commenting upon the ratification process, stated that "both methods of ratification, by legislatures or conventions, call for action by deliberative assemblages. . . ."[152] The deliberative nature of a constitutional convention would be destroyed if delegates were subject to control by their state governments like puppets on a string, and their powers of participation limited. In conjunction with this area, it would seem appropriate that some sort of immunity be given to delegates to an Article V convention for their actions in connection therewith.[153]

Once two-thirds of the states have petitioned Congress for an Article V convention, and the call has been issued, must a state attend? One author suggests that a state need not attend an Article V convention,[154] though it seems unlikely in this day and age that a state would waive its opportunity to participate in such an assemblage.

Finally, Article V gives the states power to ratify proposed amendments, whether proposed by Congress or by a convention. In Coleman v. Miller,[155] the Supreme Court held that the question of the effect of a previous rejection of a constitutional amendment on a subsequent ratification was a political one to be determined by Congress. The Court held that absent a fixed period for

---

149. L. ORFIELD, supra note 24, at 44-45.
150. Bonfield, supra note 60, at 992.
151. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).
152. Id. at 226 (emphasis added).
153. The Ervin legislation follows this approach. See S. 1272, supra note 14, § 7(c).
154. Forkosch, supra note 141, at 1067-68.
155. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

ratification, the question of what was a reasonable time for ratification was a political question for Congress to decide. Following Coleman by analogy, Congress would have the power to decide if a state could rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment prior to ratification by the required number of states. In the past, Congress has determined that a state cannot rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment. The current trend, however, seems to be towards allowing a state to withdraw or rescind its own ratification prior to ratification by the required number of states. Since a consensus is required throughout the amendment process, recission is consistent because this consensus no longer exists as to a rescinding state. The Ervin legislation follows this approach.[156]

When analyzing the relationship of the states to the Article V convention method, it must be remembered that Article V is superior to state law under the "Supremacy Clause."[157] The states thus possess no powers which go contrary to the letter and spirit of Article V.

H. The Power of Congress over the Article V Convention Method

Congress has the power, incidental to its ministerial duty to call a convention, to ascertain whether the prerequisites of its duty to call exist.[158] The power of Congress over the Article V convention method is primarily based upon the fact that, under Article V, it is to "call" the convention. Congress' powers are said to be incidental to, or implied by, its power to call the convention.[159] Since Article V speaks in general terms, Congress, it is said, is best suited to fill the gaps in the convention method.[160] In Dillon v. Gloss,[161] the Supreme Court stated as follows:

> An examination of Article V discloses that it is intended to invest Congress with a wide range of power in proposing amendments.[162]
>
> . . . .
>
> As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal with subsidiary matters of detail

156. S. 1272, supra note 14, §§ 13(a), 13(b). See also S. Rep. No. 93-293, supra note 8, at 19-20 (additional views of Senators Bayh and Cook).
157. U. S. Const. art. VI, 2d.
158. Kauper, supra note 132, at 906.
159. Id. at 906-07.
160. See Black, supra note 94, at 964.
161. 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
162. Id. at 373.

> as the public interests and changing conditions may require; and Article V is no exception to the rule.[163]

In Dillon, the Supreme Court upheld the power of Congress to set a time period for ratification. In Coleman v. Miller,[164] the Supreme Court held that, absent a set time limit upon ratification, Congress was best suited to determine what constituted a reasonable period for ratification of a proposed amendment, and that the Courts would not interfere in that determination.

Support for Congress' power over the Article V convention method is also found in Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution, the "necessary and proper" clause, which provides that "Congress shall have Power. . . To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."[165] Added to this is the sweeping pronouncement by Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland,[166] "[l]et the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional."[167]

Congress' power over the Article V convention method is subject only to the limitations which the Constitution places upon it. When ascertaining the powers of Congress in this area, the purpose behind the convention method must always be kept in mind. This method of amendment was placed in the Constitution to insure that the states would always have an avenue of amending open to them should the national government become oppressive. In exercising its powers over the Article V convention method, Congress could severely inhibit the use of this alternative method.[168] Keeping the purpose behind the convention method in mind, it would seem that whenever there is a serious doubt as to whether Congress has a particular power over the Article V

---

163. Id. at 376.
164. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
165. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.
166. 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).
167. Id. at 421.
168. Senator Ervin recognized this possibility when drafting his legislation.
> This legislation can be drawn so as to place as many hurdles as possible in the way of effective use of the process; or it can be drawn in a manner that will make such a process a possible, however improbable, method of amendment. The first alternative would be a flagrant disavowal of the clear language and intended function of Article V. I have assumed that the Congress will wish to take the second road, and the bill is drawn with that principle in mind.

Ervin, supra note 17, at 880.

convention method, a presumption against the existence of such a power should arise.

The proper view with respect to Congress' power over the Article V convention method is that the only powers which Congress possesses are those concerning housekeeping matters.[169] It would seem proper for Congress to set the date and location of the convention; put a reasonable time limit upon the length of its deliberations (it can hardly be suggested that an Article V convention once convened can continue in existence forever); and to appropriate a reasonable amount to finance the convention's expenses. Under the view accepted in this article, Article V implies a convention where each state has an equal vote. Consequently Congress cannot otherwise constitute the convention, e.g., base representation on population or other factors. If the opposite view is accepted then Congress could determine the composition of the convention on some reasonable basis.

Under Dillon, Congress may set a time limit for states to ratify a proposed amendment. By analogy, Congress may set a time limit for the validity of applications for an Article V convention. It would appear then that an Article V convention would have inherent power to determine its own internal rules of procedure,[170] and any attempt by Congress to try to determine the convention's procedures would be futile.

I. The Scope of an Article V Convention's Authority.

As previously discussed, it is generally agreed that states have no power, via their applications, to limit the scope of an Article V convention's deliberations. One of the most vexing questions is whether Congress, in its call of a convention, can limit the subject matter upon which the convention may deliberate and act.

The observation has been made that "[t]here is a general aversion to tinkering with the Constitution . . . "[171] In his Farewell Address, President Washington warned, "[o]ne method of assault (against the Union) may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown."[172] Overall, the American people are quite satisfied with our constitutional system. Justice Felix Frankfurter once observed the following:

169. Note, 85 Harv. L. Rev., supra note 16, at 1617.
170. Note, 70 Harv. L. Rev., supra note 74, at 1076.
171. Wheeler, supra note 71, at 803.

> For the general scheme of our constitutional system there is deep acquiescence and even attachment. One hears occasionally loose talk that our form of government is an anachronism, and dissatisfaction with some act of government or some failure to act is vaguely charged against our constitutional mechanism. But much more significant than these expressions of episodic discontent is the absence of any widespread or sustained demand for a general revision of our Constitution.[173]

There have been, however, occasional suggestions that our entire national framework of government be revised.[174]

Our present Constitution, amended relatively few times, has been in existence nearly two hundred years during which time a complex social, political and economic system has developed. Our present Constitution protects many vested interests, be they property rights or civil liberties. Many people regard the prospect of an Article V convention as an unknown, uncertain element in our system, having the potential to stir constitutional waters.[175] Some suggest that an Article V constitutional convention once called into being might cast aside its mandate, draft an entirely new constitution, declare it effective, and invite the states and existing government to acquiesce in it.[176] It has even been wildly speculated that an Article V constitutional convention could simply declare itself the new national government.[177] These arguments arise from the theory of "convention sovereignty." In 1911, Senator Hayburn stated the theory as follows: "When the people of the United States meet in a constitutional convention there is no power to limit their action. They are greater than the Constitution, and they can repeal every section of it because they are the peers of the people who made it."[178] It has been properly pointed out that there is no merit to this theory.[179] Of course, it is possible that an Article V

172. Washington's Farewell Address, quoted in J. BECK, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES: YESTERDAY, TODAY — AND TOMMORROW? 269 (1924).

173. F. FRANKFURTER, THE PUBLIC AND ITS GOVERNMENT 51 (1930).

174. See, e.g., Tugwell, Rewriting the Constitution: A Center Report, CENTER MAGAZINE 18 (Mar. 1968).

175. See, e.g., Sorensen, The Quiet Campaign to Rewrite the Constitution, SATURDAY REVIEW. 17, 18 (July 15, 1967).

176. Wheeler, supra note 71, at 801-02.

177. Carson, Disadvantages of a Federal Constitutional Convention, 66 MICH. L. REV., 921, 922-23 (1968) [hereinafter cited as Carson].

178. 46 CONG. REC. S 2769 (1911) (remarks of Senator Hayburn).

179. Bonfield, supra note 60, at 993.

convention could take such actions as declaring itself to be the new national government or proclaiming a new constitution. This, however is highly improbable. The chances of this ever happening are small, and the chances of the success of such a move even smaller.

In addition to these unfounded and exaggerated concerns, a more reasonable concern has been aired; i.e., that once an Article V convention is formed, its delegates might propose amendments to the Constitution on subjects different from those placed by Congress in the call and cited by states in their applications.[180] Some have suggested that an Article V convention, if it desires, could choose to redraft the Constitution and submit the new draft to the states for ratification.[181] Even though these proposals stand little chance of ultimate ratification, it apparently is felt that their mere proposition by a prestigous body, as would be an Article V convention, would be greatly disruptive and bring into question the basic fabric of our national government.

The Ervin legislation attempts to limit the scope of an Article V convention's deliberations and actions. It provides that Congress, when calling the convention, shall in its concurrent resolution set forth the nature of the amendment or amendments which the convention is called to consider.[182] Each delegate to the convention is to subscribe to an oath, before taking his seat, that he shall be committed during the conduct of the convention to refrain from proposing or casting his vote in favor of any proposed constitutional amendment relating to any subject not named or described in the concurrent resolution calling the convention.[183] The legislation provides specifically that no convention called under the act may propose any amendment or amendments of a different nature than those stated in Congress' concurrent resolution.[184] Finally, the legislation provides that all amendments proposed by the convention be sent to the states for ratification, unless Congress passes a concurrent resolution disapproving the submission of a proposed amendment on the grounds that it includes a subject different from or not included among the subjects named in our described in Congress' concurrent resolution calling for the convention.[185]

180. 113 CONG. REC. S 5458 (daily ed. Apr. 19, 1967) (remarks of Senator Javits); id. at S. 5462 (remarks of Senator Proxmire).
181. L. ORFIELD, supra note 24, at 44-45; Platz, supra note 59, at 31.
182. S. 1272, supra note 14, § 6(a).
183. Id. § 8(a).
184. Id. § 10(b).
185. Id. § 11(b)(1)(B).

Several policy arguments support the concept of a limited Article V convention. First, if an Article V convention were "wide-open" once the convention were convened, it would immediately become the focal point of every dissident group in the nation seeking constitutional change. Delegates to the convention would be subjected to intense pressure from many groups resulting in the impairment of the deliberative quality of the convention. The 1787 convention decided to hold its deliberations in secret, hiding from the public its day to day shift in temperament and announcing only its final product.[186] An Article V convention, held now, would find it most difficult to duplicate this.[187] As a result of the hectic conditions inherent in a wide-open convention, the ultimate product might not reflect thoughtful deliberation. Such a wide-open convention could become a circus. However, were the convention limited in its discussions and in its ability to propose amendments, the debate need not be sidetracked.

Another argument in favor of limiting the scope of an Article V convention would be that it would allow an intelligent choice of delegates.[188] If the convention were called, for example, to propose a pro-life amendment, then the state, when selecting its convention delegates, could choose persons with knowledge and expertise in the particular area.

Finally, it can be argued that the concept of a wide-open convention might discourage the states from using the convention method. The states will make greater use of this method if they know that the authority of the convention will be limited to discussion of the problem which they, and the other thirty-three states, are interested in correcting.[189]

It appears desirable to limit the scope of an Article V convention to the subject matter placed in the call by Congress on the basis of these policy arguments. The determination of whether Congress may limit the scope of an Article V convention rests, however, not upon policy considerations, but upon whether the

---

186. The 1787 convention kept its deliberations secret because, "it was considered important that the delegates should be protected from criticism and that their discussions should be free from the pressure of public opinion."
M. FARRAND, THE FRAMING OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, 58 (1962).

187.
> [T]he proceedings of convention delegates will be conducted in the intense glare of publicity. Every word will be transcribed. Imputations of motive, analyses, and predictions will fill the newspaper columns and flood the airways. Television will obtrude itself on the proceedings, in the name of the so-called 'right of the people to know.' A multitude of issues clamoring for attention will leave no time for reflection or long-range thought.

Carson, supra note 177, at 927.

188. A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 17.

189. Kauper, supra note 132, at 911-12. See also Comment, supra note 2, at 513.

Constitution mandates that an Article V convention be free from such a limitation.

To determine whether Article V contemplates limited conventions, an attempt must be made to ascertain the probable intent of the framers in this regard. The argument that the framers envisioned Article V conventions as limited conventions when they drafted the provision is presented first, followed by the opposite argument.

It is argued that pre-1787 state convention practices support the idea of limited conventions.[190] The framers, it is urged, had this type of convention in mind when they provided for one in Article V. Support for this contention is allegedly found in Article XIX of the first draft of the Constitution, delivered to the full convention on August 6th by the Committee of Detail, and passed by the convention on August 30th. That Article read as follows: "On the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose.[191]

Support for this view is also found in The Federalist No. 43 where Madison wrote that Article V, "equally enables the general and the state government to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by experience on one side or another."[192] Hamilton in The Federalist No. 85, had the following to say concerning the amendment power:

> [E]very amendment to the Constitution, if one established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise in relation to any other point — no giving nor taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently, whenever nine, or rather 10 States, were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place. There can, therefore, be no comparison between the facility of affecting an amendment and that of establishing, in the first instance, a complete constitution.[193]

190. A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 11-17.
191. 1 M. FARRAND, supra note 27, at 188 (emphasis added).
192. THE FEDERALIST No. 43 (Cooke ed. 1961) (emphasis added).
193. THE FEDERALIST No. 85 (Cooke ed. 1961) (emphasis added).

These two extracts from The Federalist Papers have been interpreted to indicate that the framers intended Article V conventions to be limited in scope, having only the power to rectify particular errors and not to redraft the whole Constitution. This interpretation, however, has been met with some disagreement.[194]

The argument in favor of a wide-open convention being envisioned by the framers finds its strongest support in the very words of Article V, that "Congress. . . on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments . . . "[195] The use of the word "Amendments" rather than a phrase such as "for proposing an amendment" is clear evidence, it is argued, that Article V conventions were meant to have wide-open powers, and that a convention once convened has the authority to propose anything which it deems to be in the best interests of the nation, regardless of the reasons for which the convention was requested by the states, and regardless of the limitations which Congress may attempt to place on the convention.

Support for this position is also found in the precedent of the 1787 convention which clearly exceeded its powers.[196] That convention was called ". . . for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation. . . "[197] The Convention was not authorized to draft an entirely new frame of government. Additionally, the Constitution provided that it would become effective when ratified by nine states, contrary to the provision in the Articles of Confederation which required unanimous consent before the Articles could be altered.[198] The framers clearly recognized that no plan of government is perfect.[199] Therefore, they surely must have contemplated that the plan they were then creating might someday be required to give way to an entirely different framework of government. That being the case, and given the precedent of the 1787 convention where they admittedly went beyond their powers,[200] surely they realized and intended that a convention called under Article V might someday have to draft a totally different framework of government or otherwise address problems which it perceived in addition to the ones for which it was called.

194. See, e.g., Black, supra note 16, at 197, wherein the author argues that The Federalist, Nos. 43 and 85 do not support the idea of a limited convention.
195. U.S. CONST. art. V (emphasis added).
196. Martig, supra note 26, at 1256.
197. J. ELLIOT, supra note 28.
198. Supra note 25.
199. Supra notes 29, 34, 43, and 57.
200. Comment, supra note 2, at 506.

Those who disagree with this view attempt to distinguish the 1787 convention on grounds that it was a "revolutionary" convention and that Article V only contemplates "constitutional" conventions. Judge Jameson, in his treaties, defined the two types of conventions. A "revolutionary" convention is said to > consist of those bodies of men, who in times of political crisis, assume or have cast upon them, provisionally, the function of government. They either supplant or supplement the existing government organization . . . [t]hey are not subaltern or ancillary to any other institution whatever, but lords paramount of the entire political domain . . . In short, a Revolutionary Convention is simply a PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT.[201]

A constitutional convention

> differs from the [revolutionary convention] in being as its name implies, constitutional; not simply as having for its object the framing or amending of Constitutions, but as being within, rather than without, the place of the fundamental law; as ancillary and subservient and not hostile and paramount to it. . . . It is charged with a definite, and not a discretionary and indeterminate function. It always acts under a commission. . . . It never supplants the existing organization. It never governs.[202]

The 1787 convention, it is said, took place during extraordinary times and its actions were justified solely on the basis of the circumstances which had led the united colonies to the brink of dissolution. The Articles of Confederation, it is argued, had no viable amendment provision like the present Constitution. The circumstances surrounding the 1787 convention are unlikely to happen again. The framers believed that they had created a strong federal union. They did not contemplate an Article V convention ever having the potential of a "revolutionary convention." It was to be a "constitutional convention." It also is pointed out that even though the 1787 convention did exceed its authority, its actions were subsequently ratified by Congress and the states.[203]

---

201. J. JAMESON, A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 6 (4th ed. 1887).
202. Id. at 10.
203. A.B.A. Study, supra note 2, at 14.

The 1787 convention seems to fit somewhere between Jameson's two definitions. It clearly went beyond its express mandate, but it did not function as, or purport to be, a provisional government. Naturally, the framers intended an Article V convention to be a "constitutional" convention operating within the framework of the Constitution. But what was this framework meant to be? Does Article V contemplate a convention with the powers to propose anything which it feels to be in the best interests of the nation, or does it contemplate a limited convention?

Here again, the purpose behind the convention method must be considered. The Article V convention method was designed to be an alternative amending process, for use of the states in the event that Congress became oppressive. With this in mind, it seems that Congress must not be allowed to have the power to limit the scope of the convention's deliberations and actions. Congress' only powers should be over housekeeping matters. A power in Congress to limit the scope of the convention goes to the very heart of the reason behind the convention method, and for this reason, Congress does not have the power to limit the scope of an Article V convention's deliberations and actions.[204] The Ervin legislation's attempt to limit the scope of an Article V constitutional convention to the same subject matter placed by Congress in the call would therefore be unconstitutional.

There is, however, no reason to fear such an interpretation of an Article V convention's powers. An Article V convention only has the power to "propose" amendments. Any amendments, or new Constitution, have to be ratified by three-fourths of the states in order to take effect.[205] If a proposition is issued by an Article V convention and subsequently ratified by the required number of states, one can hardly be in a position to complain about it.[206] Even if the mere propostion of proposals by an Article V convention causes great debate and discussion, and calls into question the basic fabric of the national government, such discussion would only result in a stronger national government.

It has been pointed out that Congress, which has power to initiate constitutional amendments upon the vote of two-thirds of the members of both houses, has not yet "run away" with the

---

204. Black, supra note 16, at 203; Platz, supra note 59, at 46; Wheeler, supra note 71, at 796; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV., supra note 74, at 1076.

205. Dirksen, supra note 4, at 873.

206. J. STORY, supra note 57, §§1830, 1831.

Constitution or otherwise abused the amendment powers.[207] There is no valid reason to expect an Article V constitutional convention to do so either.

The proper statement of an Article V convention's powers would be that such a convention is a deliberative body, created ministerially by Congress at the request of the states which, when duly convened, possesses the amendment power under Article V, that power being subject to no limitations other than those in the constitution.[208] If Congress has no power to limit the scope of an Article V convention's deliberations and actions, then it cannot refuse to transmit to the states for ratification any and all propositions which the convention originates.

If and when the first Article V convention is held, it would be desirable for the delegates selected thereto to voluntarily refrain from proposing any amendments upon subjects other than those cited in the call or in state applications, and thus establish, by precedent, a self-imposed limitation upon the convention, which could always give way in times of crisis.

J. Should Article V Itself Be Amended?

Over the years there have been numerous attempts to amend Article V.[209] Some have been aimed at Article V's convention method.[210] Others have suggested that the convention method be stricken from Article V.[211] Still others have urged that it be replaced by a different method of allowing the states to initiate amendments to the Constitution.[212] It has also been suggested that, rather than eliminating or replacing Article V's convention method, it be amended in order to clear up the present ambiguities.[213]

The Article V convention method should neither be eliminated from Article V nor replaced. While it has never recently

---

207. 113 Cong. Rec. 11113 (1967) (remarks of Senator Hruska).

208. L. Orfield, supra note 24, at 45; Wheeler, supra note 71, at 796.

209. See Martig, supra note 25, at 1275-83, for a review of the efforts up to 1937 to amend Article V.

210. See L. Orfield, supra note 24, at 168-72 wherein the author reviews proposed reform of the national convention amendment procedure.

211. Martig, supra note 25, at 1284. See also Hearings on S.J.R. 134, 75th Cong., 3d Sess. (1938) at 3-4, 65, 79, 84.

212. See Black, supra note 94, at 958; 117 Cong. Rec. S 16, 519 (daily ed. Oct. 19, 1971).

213. See, e.g., Platz, supra note 59, at 47-49, (where the writer suggests several changes in Article V to clear up ambiguities in it); Comment, supra note 2, at 526-539 (where the writer suggests that Article V be amended to clear up present uncertainties and offers a proposed draft of a new Article V).

been used, it has in the past and still serves a useful function. The reasons behind its creation are still potentially valid.

Article V should, however, be amended to overrule the Supreme Court's decision in Hawke v. Smith, No. 1[214] In that case, the Court struck down a provision in the Ohio state constitution which required all proposed constitutional amendments to be submitted to a popular referendum. The Court found this to be contrary to the requirement in Article V that ratification be by "legislatures" and that a popular referendum was not a legislature as contemplated by the framers, a legislature being in their mind a deliberative representative body which was charged with making the laws which governed the people.

The amendment process, at all stages, should be accompanied by thoughtful deliberation. The framers provided that a state's ratification of proposed amendments be either by action of the state legislature or by convention, leaving Congress to choose the mode of ratification. To date, with one exception, Congress has chosen ratification by state legislatures. Article V should be amended to permit Congress a third choice, by popular referendum. In 1920, when Hawke was decided, a meaningful debate could not have been conducted on a statewide basis prior to a popular referendum. Thus, ratification by referendum would not have been accompanied by thoughtful deliberation prior to the state's action. However, with radio, television, and other mass media of our time, a thoughtful debate and disscussion could easily be had on a statewide basis on a proposed constitutional amendment prior to a popular referendum. This would allow for deliberation at the ratification stage, were ratification to be by popular referendum.

The framers typically entrusted ratification to the representative body of the people in the state rather than to the people themselves because of their general distrust of government by the masses. This attitude is clearly out of date, and there is no valid reason today to prohibit ratification by popular referendum. In fact, it should be the preferred method.

K. Justiciability of Questions Arising under Article V

The Ervin legislation attempts to cut off judicial review of questions arising under the Article V convention method by providing that questions concerning adoption of a state's application, questions pertaining to the ability of the convention to initiate proposals different from or additional to those placed by Congress in its concurrent resolution calling the convention, and questions concerning a state's ratification or rejection of proposed constitutional amendments, "shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States, and its decisions shall be binding on all others including State and Federal courts."[215]

214. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

It has long been settled that the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction, "with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."[216] Therefore, it would seem that Congress could successfully cut off appellate review of Article V constitutional questions from the Supreme Court. Congress, however, has no power to limit the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction. The Constitution provides that, "[i]n all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be a Party, the Supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction."[217] It is probable that many potential suits over Article V will involve a state as a party. In such cases, Congress' attempt to limit the determination of questions over the Article V convention method would be to no avail.

Even if jurisdiction in the Supreme Court is obtained, the question remains whether the Court might voluntarily refrain from deciding the issue raised on the grounds that it is a "political question." State courts have almost uniformly held that the question of amending the state constitution is justifiable.[218] After reviewing the relevant Supreme Court decisions, however, one can only speculate what the Court might do if presented with a suit arising out of the Article V convention method.

In the 1798 case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[219] the Supreme Court held that the eleventh amendment was validly enacted and that Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution did not require the approval of the President in the amendment process. At this early date the Supreme Court seemed to be of the view that controversies over the amendment of the Constitution were justiciable, though the issue was not specifically presented to them in those terms.

Chief Justice Taney, in Luther v. Borden,[220] indicated that the Court believed that questions concerning the amendment of constitutions 215. S. 1272, supra note 14, §§ 3(b), 5(c), 10(b) and 13(c).

216. U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2; Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1868).
217. U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2.
218. Comment, supra note 2, at 516.
219. 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).
220. 48 U.S. (7 Howard) 1 (1849).

were nonjusticiable political questions.[221] In Dodge v. Woolsey,[222] Justice Wayne determined that the power to amend the Constitution was constitutionally limited.[223] The Supreme Court, in White v. Hart,[224] said of the validity of a state's ratification of a constitutional amendment, "[t]he action of Congress upon the subject cannot be inquired into. The case is clearly one in which the judicial is bound to follow the action of the political department of the government, and is concluded by it."[225] It would seem that by the end of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court felt that questions regarding amending the constitution were political and nonjusticiable.

In Myers v. Anderson, it was argued that the fifteenth amendment was invalid, if construed to apply to state and municipal elections, on grounds that it violated the provisions of Article V which state that no state, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate.[227] The Court ignored the argument. In Hawke v. Smith No. 1,[228] the Supreme Court held that a provision in the Ohio constitution which required that all proposed constitutional amendments be submitted to a popular referendum was violative of the terms of Article V, a popular referendum not being within the definition of the terms "legislatures." The Court also reaffirmed the holding of Hollingsworth. The Solicitor General argued in the National Prohibition Cases,[229] that the question of whether the eighteenth amendment was within the amending power was one committed to the political, not the judicial branch of the government.[230] The Court ignored the plea and held that the eighteenth amendment was duly enacted and that its substantive content was within the

---

221.
In forming the constitutions of the different States, after the Declaration of Independence, and in the various changes and alterations which have since been made, the political department has always determined whether the proposed constitution or amendment was ratified or not by the people of the State, and the judicial power has followed its decision.
Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 Howard) 1, 38-39 (1849).

222. 59 U.S. (18 Howard) 331 (1855).

223.
"[The Constitution] is supreme over the people of the United States, aggregately and in their separate sovereignties, because they have excluded themselves from any direct or immediate agency in making amendments to it, and have directed that amendments should be made representatively for them. . . ." Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. (18 Howard) 331, 348 (1855).

224. 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 646 (1871).

225. White v. Hart, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 646, 649 (1871).

226. 238 U.S. 368 (1915).

227. Myers v. Anderson, 238 U.S. 368, 374 (1915).

228. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

229. 253 U.S. 350 (1920).

230. National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350, 381-82 (1920).

power to amend reserved by Article V. In Dillon v. Gloss,[231] the Court held that Congress could set a reasonable time for ratification of proposed constitutional amendments, and that the seven year period set by it was a reasonable time. The Court stated the following:

> Whether a definite period for ratification shall be fixed so that all may know what it is and speculation on what is a reasonable time may be avoided, is, in our opinion, a matter of detail which Congress may determine as an incident of its power to designate the mode of ratification.[232]

Fairchild v. Hughes,[233] and its companion case, Leser v. Garnett,[234] both involved the validity of the nineteenth amendment. In Fairchild, the Court held that a taxpayer lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the amendment prior to its ratification by the states. In Leser, the Court held that the proclamation by a state's Secretary of State that the state had ratified the amendment was "conclusive upon the courts."[235] The Court, in Druggan v. Anderson,[236] held that the moment the eighteenth amendment was ratified by the required number of states it became law, and that Congress could legislate in anticipation of its effective date of operation. In United States v. Sprague,[237] the Court held that the choice of the mode of ratification of amendments was in the sole discretion of the Congress. The Court in a later case took judicial notice of the fact that the twenty-first amendment, which repealed the eighteenth amendment, had been ratified, and held that neither the Congress nor the Courts could give it continued validity.[238] These early twentieth century cases seem to show a general willingness on the part of the Court at that time to decide both substantive and procedural questions concerning the amendment process.

The most important case in this area is Coleman v. Miller,[239] wherein the Supreme Court showed a definite shift in attitude. The Court there held that the question of the effect of a previous

---

231. 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
232. Id. at 376.
233. 258 U.S. 126 (1922).
234. 258 U.S. 130 (1922).
235. Id. at 137.
236. 269 U.S. 36 (1925).
237. 282 U.S. 716 (1931).
238. United States v. Chambers, 291 U.S. 217 (1934).
239. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

rejection of a proposed constitutional amendment by a state on its subsequent ratification was a political question to be settled by Congress.[240] The Court also held that the question of what constitutes a reasonable time for ratification, absent a set time limit by Congress, was likewise a political question for the Congress to decide.[241] It was contended that the vote of the Lieutenant Governor should not have been counted towards the subsequent ratification because he was not part of the "legislature" within the meaning of Article V. The Court stated that it was split on this point and expressed no opinion as to its justiciable nature.[242]

In a concurring opinion, Justice Black, joined by Justices Douglas, Frankfurter, and Roberts, contended that the entire constitutional amendment process was nonjusticiable.

> [t]o the extent that the Court's opinion in the present case even impliedly assumes a power to make judicial interpretation of the exclusive constitutional authority of Congress over submission and ratification of amendments we are unable to agree. . . . The Court here treats the amending process of the Constitution in some respects as subject to judicial construction, in others as subject to the final authority of the Congress. . . . No such division between the political and judicial branches of the government is made by Article V which grants power over the amending of the Constitution to Congress alone. Undivided control of that process has been given by the Article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is 'political' in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point.
>
> . . . .
>
> Congress, possessing exclusive power over the amending processes, cannot be bound by, and is under no duty to accept the pronouncements upon that exclusive power by this Court or by the Kansas courts. Neither state nor federal courts can review that power. Therefore, any judicial expression amounting to more than mere acknowledgement of exclusive Congressional power over the political process of amendment is mere admonition to

240. Id. at 450.
241. Id. at 454.
242. Id. at 447.

> the Congress in the nature of an advisory opinion, given wholly without constitutional authority.[243]

In the companion case, Chandler v. Wise,[244] Justices Black and Douglas adhered to their views.[245] The Court, in 1967, again touched upon the amendment process in Whitehall v. Elkins.[246]

The important question which remains is whether Coleman stands for the proposition that all questions arising out of the Article V amendment provisions are nonjusticiable political questions. It has been strongly argued that Coleman does not stand for absolute nonjusticiability of all questions related to the amendment process.[247] In Coleman, the Court stressed the fact that the particular issue it was asked to decide involved determinations of political, social, and economic conditions which the Court found Congress to be better equipped to handle. All questions arising out of Article V, particularly the convention method, will not involve determinations of these kinds.[248]

Since Coleman, the Supreme Court has significantly expounded upon the concept of the political question. In Baker v. Carr,[249] the Court held that state legislative reapportionment raised a justiciable controversy and laid down guidelines on what was involved in a political question.

> Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for non-judicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments.[250]

---

243. Id. at 458-60.

244. 307 U.S. 474 (1939).

245. "[W]e do not believe that state or federal courts have any jurisdiction to interfere with the amending process." Chandler v. Wise, 307 U.S. 474, 478 (1939) (Black, Douglas, J., concurring).

246. 389 U.S. 54 (1967). "[T]he Constitution prescribes the method of 'alteration' by the amending process in Article V; and while the procedure for amending it is restricted there is no restraint on the kind of amendment that may be offered." Id. at 57.

247. See Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 16, at 1636.

248. Id.

In Powell v. McCormack,[251] the Court held that Congress had no right to exclude Congressman-elect Adam Clayton Powell from his seat in the House of Representatives. Powell had requested a declaratory judgment stating that his exclusion from the House was unconstitutional, being in violation of Article 1, Section 2 of the Constitution. The Court held that this presented a justiciable controversy, stating that "[o]ur system of government requires that federal courts on occasion interpret the Constitution in a manner at variance with the construction given the document by another branch. The alleged conflict that such an adjudication may cause cannot justify the court's avoiding of their constitutional responsibility."[252]

In Baker v. Carr, the Supreme Court stated that one of the criteria for a political question was a "textually demonstrable commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department."[253] In Coleman, which involved the congressional method of amending the Constitution, the four concurring Justices stressed the fact that Article V gives power over the amending process to Congress. When the Court is faced with a question arising out of the congressional method of amending, it seems totally appropriate to treat this as a political nonjusticiable issue. It does not follow, however, that the convention method of amendment should be treated likewise. One must keep in mind the purpose behind the convention method, i.e., a remedy for the possible oppressiveness of the government. Congress is merely the agency through which certain acts are performed. It is to perform these acts in a ministerial and functional way, exercising only minimal discretion. The convention method is not "committed" to the Congress to the extent that the congressional method of amending is, and hence, it should not be treated as giving rise to political, nonjusticiable questions. Keeping in mind the purpose behind the convention method, the courts, which are charged with interpreting the Constitution,[254] should not regard the questions arising out of the convention method as nonjusticiable political ones.[255] It is the Court's responsibility to insure that this method be kept available to the states to use, something which would not occur were the Court to treat Article V convention method issues as nonjusticiable political questions. Were the Court to treat these issues as political, 249. 392 U.S. 186 (1962), 36.9 U.S. 186 (1961).

250. Id. at 217.
251. 395 U.S. 486 (1969).
252. Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 549 (1969).
253. 369 U.S. at 217.
254. Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18 (1958).

it would, in effect, be surrendering the convention method to Congressional control and dominance, clearly hostile and contrary to the reasons for placing it in the Constitution.

Assuming that the Court would find Article V convention issues justiciable, questions arise concerning remedies. The areas ripe for controversy would include the situation where two-thirds of the states had arguably submitted valid applications for a convention to Congress and that body refused to call a convention, or where the convention adopted amendments on subjects additional to that placed in the call by Congress or cited by the states in their applications, and Congress subsequently refused to transmit such amendments to the states for ratification.

It has been argued by some, on the basis of Marbury v. Madison,[256] that a writ of mandamus should issue against the Congress, compelling action on its part.[257] It is questionable whether the Court would do this. Standing in its way is the doctrine of Mississippi v. Johnson.[258] In that case, the Court refused to enjoin President Andrew Johnson from enforcing certain Reconstruction Acts stating the following:

> The Congress is the legislative department of the government, the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department; though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance.
>
> . . . .
>
> If the President refuse obedience, it is needless to observe that the court is without power to enforce its process.[259]

It has been suggested that this doctrine has since been eroded. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer,[260] given as an example of such a case, arose when President Truman issued an executive Order directing the Secretary of Commerce to take control of the nation's steel mills and operate them in order to avert a nationwide strike. The district court enjoined the Secretary from continuing

---

255. Some have argued that the courts should treat questions involving the amendment process as nonjusticiable because many proposed amendments are designed to overturn unpopular Supreme Court decisions. Bonfield, supra note 60, at 980.

256. 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163, 170, 179-80 (1803).

257. Dirksen, supra note 4.

258. 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1866).

259. Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475, 500-01 (1866).

260. 343 U.S. 579 (1952).

possession of the plants and the Supreme Court affirmed. Another case mentioned as weakening the doctrine of Mississippi v. Johnson is Powell v. McCormack,[261] where the Supreme Court held that the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution[262] does not prevent action by the Court against legislative employees.[263] In Powell the Court left open the possibility of direct action against Members of Congress.[264]

One can merely speculate as to whether the Supreme Court would order Congress to call a convention, or submit an Article V convention's proposals to the states for ratification. If the Court did issue such a writ against Congress, and Congress refused to comply, what would, and what could the Court do? Some have suggested that the Court take charge of the calling and setting up of the convention,[265] although others have disagreed.[266] Due to the inability of the Court to fashion effective relief in the event that its directive against Congress is ignored, several writers have concluded that the sole remedy should Congress refuse to perform its duties in regard to the Artice V convention method, lies with the people.[267]

A more probable path to be followed by the Court is that taken in Powell. Were Congress to refuse to call a convention, or to submit an Article V convention's proposals to the states for ratification, it would attempt to justify its actions on the grounds that the constitutional prerequisites to its duty to call the convention were not met, or that the convention had exceeded its constitutional powers. A declaratory judgment by the Supreme Court to the contrary would certainly undercut Congress' justifications and stir public opinion.[268]

Precisely what the Supreme Court would do when faced with a question arising under the Article V convention method is presently a matter of mere conjecture. Given cases such as Coleman, Baker, and Powell, there is ample precedent for the Court to go either direction, i.e., to find Article V convention issues political

261. 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

262. U.S. Const. art. I, § 6.

263. See also Dombrowski v. Eastland, 387 U.S. 82 (1967); Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168 (1881). In both, suits were brought against Congressional employees.

264. "Given our disposition of this issue, we need not decide whether under the Speech or Debate Clause petitioners would be entitled to maintain this action solely against members of Congress where no agents participated in the challenged action and no other remedy was available." 395 U.S. at 506 n.26.

265. Carson, supra note 177, at 921.

266. Kauper, supra note 132, at 906.

267. Bonfield, supra note 60, at 983; Wheeler, supra note 71, at 792; Note, 70 Harv. L. Rev., supra note 74, at 1071.

268. See Note, 85 Harv. L. Rev., supra note 16, at 1644.

and nonjusticiable, or to go the opposite way. As a matter of judicial policy, it is hoped that the Court would elect to find Article V convention method questions justiciable, even though the scope of its remedial powers raises questions.[269]

A final question concerns standing to raise Article V convention litigation. In Coleman v. Miller,[270] the majority held that twenty state senators who had voted against ratification of the proposed Child Labor Amendment had standing to bring suit. The Court stated as follows:

> Here, the plaintiffs include twenty senators, whose votes against ratification have been overridden and virtually held for naught although if they are right in their contention their votes would have been sufficient to defeat ratification. We think that these senators have a plain direct and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes.[271]

Four Justices dissented on the issue of standing. "No matter how seriously infringement of the Constitution may be called into question, this is not the tribunal for its challenge, except by those who have some specialized interest of their own to vindicate apart from a political concern which belongs to all."[272]

Under the majority view espoused in Coleman, it would seem that a proper party to bring suit regarding Article V convention questions would be, for example, state senators who voted in favor of an application for an Article V convention, or conceivably, a member of the Article V convention who voted in favor of the proposals which Congress refused to transmit to the states for ratification. Certainly a state which has petitioned for a convention would have standing. Finding a plaintiff with proper standing to raise questions concerning the Article V convention method would seem to raise no great difficulties.

IV. CONCLUSION

In the closing moments of the 1787 convention, Charles Pinckney of South Carolina remarked, "[c]onventions are serious

---

269. See L. ORFIELD, supra note 24, at 7-36; Clark, The Supreme Court and the Amending Process, 39 VA. L. REV. 621 (1953).
270. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
271. Id. at 438.
272. Id. at 464 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

things and ought not to be repeated."[273] When there was talk of having a second constitutional convention, shortly after the Constitution had been proposed, James Madison aired the following feelings:

> [An Article V Constitutional Convention] would consequently give greater agitation to the public mind; an election to it would be courted by the most violent partisans on both sides; it would probably consist of the most heterogeneous characters; would be the very focus of the flame which has already too much heated men of all parties; would no doubt contain individuals of insidious views, who under the mask of seeking alterations popular in some parts, but inadmissible in other parts of the Union might have a dangerous opportunity of sapping the very foundations of the fabric. Under all these circumstances it seems scarcely to be presumable that the deliberations of the body could be conducted in harmony, or terminate in the general good. Having witnessed the difficulties and dangers experienced by the first convention which assembled under every propitious circumstance, I should tremble for the result of a second.[274]

That attitude has persevered through the ages. Generally the prospect of an Article V convention has been ignored, disfavored, and even feared.[275] Over the years there has been much discussion about Article V's convention method, ranging from wild, unfounded speculation to serious scholarly debate. It seems desirable for Congress to settle as many of the issues raised over the Article V convention method, prior to the actual calling of such a convention, as it constitutionally can.

In the abstract, scholars can and no doubt will, debate these issues endlessly. Most of these questions, however, will never be

---

273. 2 M. FARRAND supra note 27, at 632.

274. Letter of James Madison to G. L. Turberville (November 2, 1788), reprinted in 5 U.S. BUREAU OF ROLLS & LIBRARY, DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA 1786-1870 104-05.

275. A notable exception, however, was President Lincoln, who preferred the convention method of amending the Constitution. In his First Inaugural Address, he stated as follows:

> [T]he convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves; instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others, not especially chosen for the purpose, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish to accept or refuse. . .

S. Jour., 36th Cong., Spec. Sess. 404 (1861).

resolved until the day that an Article V convention is actually held. And then, as one writer has observed, "a Convention would be a new thing and what it would do would depend mostly upon the men composing it, upon the issues before the people and the strength of public feeling and opinion at the time."[276]

276. Sprague, supra note 76, at 123.

(Notre Dame, Lawyer, 1964)

OBSERVATIONS ON THE PROPOSED ALTERATION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDATORY PROCEDURE*

*Albert E. Jenner

The enactment of the amendments now under consideration would, I feel, lead to an outright revolution in this country, a revolution not in the gradual sense, but a fighting one conducted by the nation's great majorities who would be, in that eventuality, under the complete domination and subjection of minorities of both states and people.

The first of these proposals, the subject of the present inquiry, would alter the amendatory process prescribed by Article V of the Constitution. It is designed to vest the amendatory power in the state legislatures to the exclusion of the Congress.

The sponsors of these amendments seem to have erred, strategically at least, in going beyond their first proposition for it is the remaining two amendments, that calling for the overruling of Baker v. Carr and the last to create a "Court of the Union" to review the rulings of the United States Supreme Court, which betrayed their underlying purpose and intent, thus giving warning of the extremes to which the minority group of states and the minorities within these states might go.

The adoption of the first of these amendments would effect a complete redistribution of governmental power, channelling to the states much of which now rests with the federal Congress. The ultimate result would be a confederation or league of states similar to that under the Articles of Confederation of 1777. No longer would we maintain in the central government the power and jurisdiction so essential to the preservation of the Union. While the states would be afforded sufficient sovereignty to devote their attentions to purely local problems, their participation in the national picture would be barely adequate to make known the parochial views of the fifty separate jurisdictions. It should be noted in this connection that this process would not be a mere transference of power to the states as states, but to the state legislatures. The importance of this distinction is obvious upon the slightest consideration of the present maldistribution of representation in the legislative bodies. The inequalities presented by these apportionments would thus be preserved, and, by the increase of power, worsened. A representative form of government would vanish.

Apparently, then, the lessons of the errors and impracticality of the Articles of Confederation have been lost to the amendments' sponsors. The blood bath of the Civil War, fought in great part to accentuate the indissolubility of the Union, will have been for naught.

Political, as well as legal, repercussions would ensue. There would be

---

* The following article is Mr. Jenner's oral presentation at the Notre Dame Law School on February 29, 1964, as edited by the Editorial Board of the Lawyer.

 Well-known trial lawyer and partner in the Chicago firm of Raymond, Mayer, Jenner & Block; LL.B., University of Illinois; long-time active member of the Chicago, Illinois, and American Bar Associations.

precluded any possibility of a national forum for the debate of national and international issues. Limited debating societies would obtain in each of the fifty states. With Nebraska as the only state with a unicameral legislature, we would be left with ninety-nine such societies.

How, then, did such proposals ever come about? While there is general agreement that the danger of their passage is slight, the meandered method of their genesis is highly pertinent to a fair evaluation. The sponsorship rests with the general assembly of the Council of State Governments, a normally conservative group and one of our most highly respected organizations and institutions. It consists almost exclusively of legislators of considerable prominence and ability from each of the several states selected from commissions on interstate cooperation existing in each of the states. The National Legislative Council, an affiliate of the Council of State Governments, was the initial proponent and drafter of the amendment. While this National Legislative Council meets annually, the general assembly convenes only half as often. This fact, as we shall see, becomes quite significant. In September of 1962, with a meeting of the general assembly but three months distant, the National Legislative Council met, fully realizing that whatever proposals were not submitted in December to the general assembly would not be acted upon for at least two additional years. It issued a report critical, in a fairly statesmanlike but direct fashion, of the action of the Congress and the executive department of the federal government over the preceding decade, which action, it alleged, had served to erode the powers and functions of the states, an erosion which had progressed to that point where the Union itself might be adversely affected. While it is true that the Union depends upon alert, dynamic and powerful states for its most effective functioning, the Council, rather than discuss the central requisites of that delicate balance between Union and state, chose to devise a "meat-cleaver" method of rectification. Rather than restore the scale's balance, if such seemed necessary, the Council's amendments so weighted the opposite pan as to plummet the scale to the ground.

This report was circulated among the delegates and a committee drawn up to draft the present amendments. The actual draft of these amendments was not submitted to the delegates of the general assembly until the opening day of its convention. In the course of but one day, the day following the opening, the delegates read, debated, and acted favorably upon all three of these amendments. Hence, as a special order of business, on the sixth of December, 1962, it was proposed completely to revamp the government of the United States. The complete unpreparedness of these delegates to pass upon motions of such moment is perhaps best evidenced by the fact that the second amendment received fewer favorable votes than the first, and the third still fewer. This suggests that the delegates became relatively more informed as the afternoon wore on.

Under Article V of the Constitution, amendments may be initiated either by the Congress or by the legislatures of the several states; the latter method has never been used. Under the former, the Congress, on a two-thirds vote of both Houses, submits the proposal to the state legislatures or to state conventions. The proposal becomes a constitutional amendment when and if it is ratified by three-fourths of such legislatures or conventions, depending upon which avenue Congress has chosen. At present, then, the consent of thirty-eight such legislatures or conventions conditions the adoption.

The alternative method requires the Congress, upon the application of two-thirds of the state legislatures, to "call a convention for proposing amendments." Nothing further is said concerning what this convention is to do. The proposals which emanate from that convention take effect in the same manner provided for the alternative passage, namely, ratification by three-fourths of the state legislatures or state conventions.

The general assembly's proposal seeks to eliminate completely the national convention method of amendment. It further proposes to abolish the state convention alternative method of amendment regardless of whether the original proposal was initiated by Congress or by a national convention. It is intended, then, that the state legislatures control the amendatory process. Also, if three-fourths of the state legislatures submit identical proposals by way of application, then the Congress is required, by purely ministerial procedures, to certify these proposed amendments to the very same state legislatures. This empty course of action serves to circumvent completely the Congress, relegating the entire amendatory procedure to the mercy of the state legislatures. The potential effects of this procedure to the Constitution need not be listed. The combined effects of this and the other two amendments would possibly include the destruction of the Supreme Court of the United States, the elimination of Congress, and the sharp modification of at least the first eight amendments to the Constitution, at least as applied to the states via the Fourteenth Amendment.

As an incidental point, it is interesting to note that Section Two of these resolutions recites that the article shall be inoperative unless ratified, within seven years of the date of its submission, by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states. This is apparently an adroit attempt to prevent the Congress from employing the state convention alternative method, which it is empowered to do under the Constitution. Yet it is only through this alternative method that any semblance of representation of all the people can be obtained.

Finally, the amendment under consideration is perhaps the most extraordinary and astounding governmental proposal of recent times. If there is at present an imbalance in the federal-state area of action (and such an imbalance is by no means conceded), correction of the defect lies in the strengthening of the states under our present system and not in the virtual demolishing of the Congress by its reduction to a pleasant debating society.

PROPOSAL II AND THE NATIONAL INTEREST IN STATE LEGISLATIVE APPORTIONMENT

*Carl A. Auerbach

Shortly after President Eisenhower asked Congress, in May, 1953, to permit the personal income tax cuts scheduled for January 1, 1954, to go into effect, I had occasion to lunch with Thurman Arnold. I asked Mr. Arnold what he thought of the impending tax cut and he replied, "Fine, we can enjoy it privately and kick like hell publicly." Remember, this was before we were told by President Kennedy and President Johnson that what we can do most for our country is to pay less taxes.

My initial reaction to the Supreme Court's decision in Baker v. Carr[1] was like Thurman Arnold's response to President Eisenhower's first venture into deficit financing. As a private citizen, suburbanite and member of the Democratic Party, I relished the result. But as a student of constitutional law, I agreed with Mr. Justice Frankfurter that legislative apportionment was none of the Supreme Court's business. I intended to kick about it publicly — at this symposium, in fact.

However, as I studied the three so-called states' rights amendments to which our symposium is devoted, I came to doubt my original conclusion that the Supreme Court had overstepped the bounds of its proper role in our democracy when it decided Baker v. Carr.

Provisions of Proposal II. For our immediate purpose, however, it is important to point out that even those who agree with Mr. Justice Frankfurter's dissenting opinion in Baker v. Carr have reason to oppose the constitutional amendment which purports to overrule the Court's decision in that case. For the proposal — which I shall refer to as Proposal II — goes far beyond its alleged purpose. Section 2 of Proposal II provides that:

> The judicial power of the United States shall not extend to any suit in law or equity, or to any controversy, relating to apportionment of representation in a state legislature.[2]

This section, however, is ancillary to the basic aim of Proposal II set forth in Section 1, which provides that:

> No provision of this Constitution, or any amendment thereto, shall restrict or limit any state in the apportionment of representation in its legislature.[3]

Proposal II and the State Courts. If Proposal II contained only its second section and, thus limited, became part of the Constitution, the Supremacy Clause of Article VI would still obligate the state courts to decide apportion-

---

* Professor of Law, University of Minnesota Law School; A.B., Long Island University; LL.B., Harvard Law School.

1 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

2 The texts of the three states' rights amendments are set forth in State Government, Winter 1963, p. 10.

3 Ibid. Section 3 of Proposal II provides that the proposed amendment "shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states within seven years from the date of its submission." Ibid.

ment cases in the light of the requirements of the federal Constitution. In all likelihood, then, the state courts would not interpret these requirements uniformly, with the anomalous result that the existence and vindication of federal constitutional guarantees would depend upon the immaterial circumstance of where the case was brought.

Granting, then, that the proposed limitation on the federal judicial power is justified, it makes sense to impose the same limitation upon the state courts — so far as the enforcement of federal constitutional guarantees is concerned. This may have been all that the draftsmen of section 1 of Proposal II intended. But as drafted, section 1 would accomplish a great deal more than even its supporters have not sought to defend.

Proposal II and Racial Discrimination. Dissenting in South v. Peters, Mr. Justice Douglas remarked: "I suppose that if a State reduced the vote of Negroes, Catholics, or Jews so that each got only one-tenth of a vote, we would strike the law down."[4] But if these shameful objectives were achieved under the guise of state laws apportioning representation in state legislatures, section 1 of Proposal II would not only bar the federal courts from striking the laws down, but would also bar the state courts from striking the laws down under the authority of the federal Constitution.

We are not dealing with a remote contingency. If Proposal II had been in effect, no court could have prevented the racial discrimination which the Alabama legislature tried to perpetrate in Gomillion v. Lightfoot.[5] The Alabama courts would have been bound by state law. Speaking for the Court in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, Mr. Justice Frankfurter held that federal court intervention was warranted precisely because abstention "would sanction the achievement by a State of any impairment of voting rights whatever so long as it was cloaked in the garb of the realignment of political subdivisions."[6]

Clearly, then, Proposal II would abridge the national guarantees of equality imbedded in the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution. But surely we will not permit the long, historic, and increasingly successful struggle of the Negro citizen for the right to vote to culminate in districting and apportioning schemes which deprive him of the fruits of victory.

Proposal II and Congressional Power. Under Proposal II, the Congress of the United States would also be deprived of authority to take action against the kind of racial discrimination involved in Gomillion v. Lightfoot. Section 1 would strip Congress of its powers under the enforcement sections of the three Civil War Amendments whenever legislative districting or apportionment was used as the vehicle for discrimination.

Proposal II and Presidential Power. Proposal II is aimed at the President, as well as Congress. It would curtail the powers of the President and Congress under Article IV, Section 4 of the federal Constitution which requires that the "United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican form of government." I agree with Mr. Justice Frankfurter that the Tennessee

4 339 U.S. 276, 277 (1950).
5 364 U.S. 339 (1960).
6 Id. at 345.

citizens and voters who brought suit in Baker v. Carr were asserting "a Guarantee Clause claim."[7] As Professor Willard Hurst has written:

> No issue is more at the heart of "a Republican form of government" than the basis on which men and women are represented in their legislature. Indeed, fair representation in a freely elected legislature is what is meant by "a Republican form of government."[8]

On no other basis, I would add, is there government with the consent of the governed.

The apparent aim of the advocates of Proposal II, to preserve the past rulings of the Supreme Court that the Guarantee Clause is not judicially enforceable, does not justify the obliteration of Congressional and Presidential power to enforce the Clause. It is not inconceivable that in a time of strife, districting and apportionment of representation in a state legislature might become the instruments of totalitarian rule in a particular state. It is pointless to insist that this will never happen here, or that, if it does, the President and Congress will act anyway, with or without an amendment. Professor Hurst reminds us that:

> A constitution has no more important function than to provide an accepted, legitimate framework of values and procedures within which men may confront crisis. . . . In declaring that no agency of the federal government may concern itself with subversion of the key element of the republican form of government of a state of the Union, the proposed amendment would reverse a basic value judgment written into the Constitution of the United States. In doing so the proposal would depart from a wise conservatism.[9]

It is impossible to know whether the advocates of Proposal II really intend to write into the Constitution the principle that it shall never be the nation's business how a state apportions representation in its legislature. That many of its supporters intend precisely such a result is evidenced by the fact that they insist on describing the three proposals as states' rights amendments. By now, however, their intent is immaterial. As of June 17, 1963, Proposal II, as presently worded, passed both houses of thirteen state legislatures (Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Louisiana, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Washington and Wyoming) and one house of two state legislatures (Colorado and Mississippi). It also passed the unicameral legislature of Nebraska but was vetoed by Governor Frank Morrison. Both houses of the Utah legislature adopted a resolution somewhat different in language from that of the standard Proposal II.

Proposal II and States' Rights. Is Proposal II a states' rights amendment? This depends upon how we define "states' rights." It is a fact, however, that the Advisory Commissions on Intergovernmental Relations under both the Eisenhower and Kennedy Administrations blamed malapportionment in large part for the relative decline of state governmental power. In 1955, the Kestnbaum Commission warned:

---

7 369 U.S. at 289-97.

8 Hurst, Memorandum Regarding Pending Proposals to Amend the United States Constitution, 36 WIS. BAR BULL. No. 4 (1963), pp. 7, 11.

9 Ibid.

> If states do not give cities their rightful allocation of seats in the legislature, the tendency will be toward direct Federal-municipal dealings. These began in earnest in the early days of the depression. There is only one way to avoid this in the future. It is for the states to take an interest in urban problems, in metropolitan government, in city needs. If they do not do this, the cities will find a path to Washington as they did before, and this time it may be permanent, with the ultimate result that there may be a new governmental arrangement that will break down the constitutional pattern which has worked so well up to now.
>
> One result of State neglect of the reapportionment problem is that urban governments have bypassed the States and made direct cooperative arrangements with the National Government in such fields as housing and urban development, airports, and defense community facilities. Although necessary in some cases, the multiplication of National-local relationships tends to weaken the State's proper control over its own policies and its authority over its own political subdivisions.
>
> Paradoxically enough, the interests of urban areas are often more effectively represented in the National legislature than in their own State legislatures.[10]

The present Advisory Commission similarly fears the "eclipse of state government because the people will turn to a more broadly responsive National Government to obtain their needs" if "minority interests are permitted to control the legislative branch of State Government. . . ."[11]

Yet those who raise the banner of states' rights to justify Proposal II are not eager to make state government stronger and more responsible so that it will be able and willing to cope with the problems which now receive either national attention or no attention at all. For them, states' rights is synonymous with state inaction. Their only complaint is that state inaction is not accompanied by federal inaction, which is their ultimate goal.

Enactment of Proposal II would assure continued state inaction. It would also have profound implications for our federal system, particularly if the proposed method of amending the Constitution is also adopted. As a first step, for example, the minorities controlling the state legislatures could reach out to alter the popular character of the Presidency by changing the composition of the Electoral College. Obviously, these so-called states' rights amendments impinge upon vital national interests.

Proposal II and the Presuppositions of Democratic Government. These proposals for constitutional change have more general and, for a constitutional lawyer, more absorbing implications. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes taught us that behind "the words of the constitutional provisions are postulates which limit and control."[12] I have argued elsewhere that Article V of the Constitution postulates the illegitimacy of an amendment which would destroy the democratic character of our system of government — for example, an amendment, even if supported by a majority of the people, which would establish the framework for totalitarian dictatorship in the United States.[13] Certainly such an amendment would upset the basic system of government envisaged in the Constitution at least as much as an amendment depriving the states, without their consent, of their equal representation in the Senate — which Article V prohibits expressly. That the federal government will remain republican in form is a postulate on which the whole Constitution is based; there was no need to make it explicit.

10 Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, Report to the President 39-40 (1955).

11 Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, Report on Apportionment of State Legislatures 71, 24-28 (1962).

12 Principality of Monaco v. Mississippi, 292 U.S. 313, 322 (1934).

I am not suggesting that the Supreme Court should undertake to declare that certain amendments to the Constitution are unconstitutional. The Court itself would probably not survive the kind of change in government I am supposing. But the people would then have the moral right to overthrow the anti-constitutional totalitarian government established by constitutional amendment.

What has all this to do with Proposal II? Let us see. Under Proposal II, minority rule of state legislatures could be perpetuated. Congress, the President and the federal courts could do nothing about it. Nor could the people remedy the situation in any state in which the state Constitution may be amended only at the initiative, or under the control, of the state legislature. Based on past experience, too, the state courts cannot be relied upon for assistance even in cases in which minority state legislatures ignore state constitutional provisions governing state legislative apportionment.

The critics of Baker v. Carr may protest that I am assuming its correctness and that a particular system of districting or apportionment can be said to enthrone minority, rather than majority, rule. But surely some systems of districting and apportionment can easily be imagined which, even the critics of Baker v. Carr would have to agree, do impose minority rule. In any case, the crucial point is that adoption of Proposal II, together with the proposal to revise the method of amending the Constitution, would make it impossible for those who think that each state legislator should represent an approximately equal number of people from ever having their way. No matter how large a majority of the people they might win to their view, the path of further constitutional amendment could be closed to them by the minority legislatures of no more than thirteen states.[14] It is inconsistent with the presuppositions of democratic government to make the possibility of peaceful change depend exclusively on the ability of the majority to persuade the minority to abdicate its power.

How then can the advocates of Proposal II ever win by constitutional means? They can not and should not win, if we adhere to democratic principles. Every principle of democracy is flouted if a minority of the people effectuates constitutional change in a manner which perpetuates its rule.

A Look at Baker v. Carr. Would there be more to say for Proposal II if 13 See Auerbach, The Communist Control Act of 1954: A Proposed Legal-Political Theory of Free Speech, 23 U. CHI. L. REV. 173, 186-202 (1956).

14 It should be recalled that the proposal to revise the method of amending the Constitution would abolish the alternative now provided by Article V of submitting amendments proposed by two-thirds of each house of Congress for ratification by conventions in three-fourths of the states.

it had left intact the power of Congress and the President to act under the Guarantee Clause and Congress' power to enforce the Civil War Amendments? The answer to this question brings us closer to the merits of Baker v. Carr and to Mr. Justice Jackson's question as "to what extent Supreme Court interpretations of the Constitution will or can preserve the free government of which the Court is a part."[15]

Before considering these questions briefly, I should say — in partial sympathy with the draftsmen of Proposal II — that it is difficult to draft a constitutional amendment overruling Baker v. Carr which would not have undesirable side effects. An editorial in the Journal of the American Judicature Society highlights one of the inevitable bad effects:

> [T]here is something very wrong in a movement to remove a court's jurisdiction to speak simply because of dissatisfaction with the way it has spoken. To do this is to attack not only the rule that was announced but also the court that announced it, and this is something we do not believe Americans really want to do.[16]

To this criticism, Dean Fordham adds:

> Were the approach freely used, the generality of the Constitution would be destroyed by a scatteration of specific denials of power having no necessary sensitivity to the basic theory and design of the Constitution.[17]

While I approve these sentiments in general, I do not think they are pertinent here. The principled opposition to Baker v. Carr — voiced by Mr. Justice Frankfurter — is based on the argument that the issue of apportionment is not justiciable. From this standpoint, the principled purpose of a constitutional amendment overruling Baker v. Carr is to save the Court from itself. This purpose can be shared even by those who would like to see apportionment based exclusively on population. Such advocates of a constitutional amendment overruling Baker v. Carr would not necessarily be interested in writing into the federal Constitution any particular principle or rule for state legislative districting and apportionment. They would merely want to get the Supreme Court out of the "political thicket." How else can this objective be attained except by an amendment withdrawing the Court's jurisdiction over the kind of controversy involved in Baker v. Carr?

In judging the wisdom of the Court's involvement in apportionment issues, it must be remembered that the evils of malapportionment have been with us since the turn of the century. For more than 60 years, they have been ignored by a good many state legislatures and by the Congress of the United States. In Baker v. Carr, the Court pointed out, the Tennessee legislature, since 1901, had ignored the requirements of the State constitution that both houses of the legislature, with minor modifications, should be apportioned according to population. There was no provision for popular initiative and referendum to impose a new districting and apportionment plan. And the state courts had declined to afford any relief. Resort to the federal courts was the last 15 JACKSON, THE SUPREME COURT IN THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT 57-58 (1955).

16 47 J. AMER. JUD. SOC'Y 4-5 (June, 1963).
17 Fordham, The States in the Federal System — Vital Role or Limbo?, 49 VA. L. REV. 666, 672 (1963).

hope of the Tennessee citizens and voters who sought to revitalize the democratic process in Tennessee. In Baker v. Carr, the Supreme Court made itself and the lower federal courts available for this purpose. Mr. Justice Frankfurter, on the other hand, would have acknowledged that "there is not under our Constitution a judicial remedy for every political mischief, for every undesirable exercise of legislative power."[18]

No case was more likely to draw a sharp and bitter line between the "judicial activists" and the advocates of "judicial self-restraint" — and it did. So it is not surprising that Professor Emerson, representing the judicial-activist wing of the Yale Law School, should hail Baker v. Carr as "indeed a 'massive repudiation' of the school of thought of which Mr. Justice Frankfurter has been the intellectual and spiritual leader."[19] Professor Bickel, representing those at Yale who extol the Court's "passive virtues," retorts: "It is an irony . . . that the super-democrats should look to the unrepresentative courts for an arbitrary decision that they resent when it is made by a faulty representative legislature, acting in concert with a majoritarian governor."[20] I do not find my views compatible with those of Professor Emerson or Professor Bickel.

I agree with Mr. Justice Frankfurter that our system of judicial review "is a deliberate check upon democracy through an organ of government not subject to popular control."[21] I am also a majoritarian — so long, I should again add, that no existing majority seeks to close the avenues of peaceful change to all future majorities. But I agree with Professor Hook that the "dictatorship of the majority" is a "bugaboo which haunts the books of political theorists but has never been found in the flesh in modern history."[22] Consequently, I do not think that a Supreme Court declaration of constitutionality is needed to confer legitimacy upon an act of the legislature.[23] Furthermore, it is positively baneful to assume that because the Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of a legislative act, it must be a good or wise measure. The legislature in a democracy should be able to make a fool of itself and still be accountable for its foolishness only to the people.

Nor do I look exclusively to the Supreme Court to be "the pronouncer and guardian" of the "enduring values" of our society.[24] As I reflect upon our history, I must conclude that the enduring values of our society have been embodied more in the acts of our legislatures than in the decisions of the Supreme Court declaring some of these acts unconstitutional.[25] Let us not forget

18 369 U.S. 186, 270 (1962).
19 Emerson, Malapportionment and Judicial Power, 72 YALE L. J. 64, 79 (1962).
20 Bickel, Reapportionment and Liberal Myths, Commentary, June, 1963, p. 490.
21 FRANKFURTER, OF LAW AND MEN 17 (Elman ed. 1956).
22 HOOK, THE PARADOXES OF FREEDOM 66 (1962).
23 See BLACK, THE PEOPLE AND THE COURT 34 ff. (1960).
24 See BICKEL, THE LEAST DANGEROUS BRANCH 24 (1962).
25 For the values reflected in legislation, see Auerbach, Law and Social Change in the United States, 6 U.C.L.A. L. REV. 516 (1959). Professor Bickel seems to assume, quite erroneously in my opinion, that because legislatures are guided by interest and expediency, their acts cannot also embody enduring values. This assumption leads him to justify the Supreme Court as "an institution which stands altogether aside from the current clash of interests, and which, insofar as is humanly possible, is concerned only with principle." Bickel, op. cit. supra note 24, at 25. But I do not know any "principle" which does not emerge from the "clash of interests." I also find it difficult to accept the enunciation and application of "enduring basic values" by 5-4 votes.

that in the first three decades of this century, the Supreme Court upheld the sanctity of private property against the claims of a majority of the people which the legislatures sought to satisfy. While no one should underestimate the historic significance of the Court's role in the current struggle for racial equality, let us also not forget that the Court held basic Civil Rights Acts of the Reconstruction Period to be unconstitutional in 1883,[26] upheld the separate-but-equal doctrine in 1896[27] and as late as 1935 ruled, unanimously, that political parties were purely private organizations entitled to bar Negroes from voting in their primaries.[28]

Bickel's jibe at Emerson is warranted, but he fails to appreciate its full significance. Although Emerson thinks Baker v. Carr "moves broadly in the direction of developing and supporting procedures necessary for the effective operation of a modern democratic system,"[29] he is not a "super-democrat." He proves this by preceding his praise of the Court for Baker v. Carr with an aside criticizing the Court for its decisions in the Smith and McCarran Act cases which he thinks "have no future in the democratic process."[30] While Emerson professes to see the Court "as an institution for supporting and vitalizing the mechanisms of the democratic process without undertaking to supervise the results reached by that process,"[31] it is a fair guess that he would not approve the decisions in the Smith Act and McCarran Act cases even if these acts had unanimously passed a Congress elected from districts of strictly equal population and had been signed enthusiastically by a President elected by an overwhelming majority of the popular vote.

But there is also paradox in the position of the champions of judicial self-restraint on the apportionment issue. Restraint is called for because of majoritarian assumptions — that the Court is reviewing the acts of representatives who are elected by a majority of the people and who can be turned out of office if their acts are disapproved by a majority of the people. But when malapportionment frustrates the possibility of majority rule, the case for judicial restraint is weakened considerably. Judicial intervention under these circumstances is not nearly as intolerable as the self-perpetuation of minority rule. No more suitable role for the Court can be envisaged than to make it possible for majority rule to function because, without it, the whole idea of self-government is debased. And past experience gives us every reason to think that the scope of freedom — including the protection of minority rights — will expand progressively as the electoral base of our representative institutions becomes broader and more democratic. Those who share Mr. Justice Frankfurter's intellectual outlook do him a disservice by disparaging the underlying assumptions of democratic self-government in order to discredit Baker v. Carr.

---

26 Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883).
27 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896).
28 Grovey v. Townsend, 295 U.S. 45 (1935).
29 Emerson, supra note 19, at 64.
30 Ibid. Professor Emerson cites "Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951). See also, Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961); Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U.S. 1 (1961)." Id. n. 3.
31 Id. at 68.

THE COURT OF THE UNION or JULIUS CAESAR REVISED

*Philip B. Kurland

Dean O'Meara's subpoena was greeted by honest protests from me that I had nothing to contribute to the "Great Debate" over the proposed constitutional amendments that are the subject of today's conference. The Dean, apparently of the belief that suffering might help this audience toward moral regeneration, suggested that I come anyway. I proceed then to prove my proposition and to test his hypothesis.

I have chosen as a title for this small effort: "Julius Caesar Revised." "Revised" because, unlike Mark Antony, I have been invited here not to bury Caesar but to praise him. Our Caesar, the Supreme Court, unlike Shakespeare's Julius, does not call for a funeral oration, because the warnings of lions in the streets — instead of under the throne — were timely heeded as well as sounded. Caesar was thus able to rally his friends to fend off the death strokes that the conspirators would have inflicted. The conspiratorial leaders were the members of the Council of State Governments. The daggers they proposed to use were the chief justices of the various high state courts, to whom they would entrust, under the resounding label of "The Court of the Union," the power to review judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States whenever that tribunal dared to inhibit the power of the states. It should be made clear that the chief justices of the states would be the instruments of the crime and not its perpetrators. You will recall that when these chief justices spoke through their collective voice, the Conference of Chief Justices, in condemnation of some of the transgressions of the Supreme Court, they asked only that the physician heal himself. They did not propose any organic changes, however little they liked the Court's work. Their report stated:[1]

> . . . when we turn to the specific field of the effect of judicial decisions on federal-state relationships we come at once to the question as to where power should lie to give the ultimate interpretation to the Constitution and to the laws made in pursuance thereof under the authority of the United States. By necessity and by almost universal common consent, these ultimate powers are regarded as being vested in the Supreme Court of the United States. Any other allocation of such power would seem to lead to chaos.

Even in the absence of Caesar's murder, however, it is possible to pose the issue raised by Brutus: whether our Caesar has been unduly ambitious and grasping of power. And implicit in this question is a second: if Caesar's ambitions do constitute a threat to the republic, is assassination the appropriate method for dealing with that threat?

---

* Professor of Law, University of Chicago Law School; A.B., University of Pennsylvania; LL.B., Harvard Law School; member, Chicago and American Bar Associations.

1 REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONSHIPS AS AFFECTED BY JUDICIAL DECISIONS, August, 1958.

The second question is easier to answer than the first. Whether Caesar be guilty or not, it would seem patently clear that his murder, as proposed, must be resisted. Its consequences could only be costly and destructive civil conflict resulting in the creation of a new Caesar in the place of the old one, a new Caesar not nearly so well-equipped to perform the task nor even so benevolent as Julius himself.

It is probably because of the obvious absurdity of the method chosen for limiting the Supreme Court's powers that there is today even more unanimity in opposition to the proposal than existed when Caesar was last attacked — not by the current self-styled patricians, but by the plebeians under the leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. For then it was only the conservatives that came to the defense of the Court; the liberals were prepared to destroy it. Today, as Professor Charles Black has made clear, even if in rather patronizing tones, the conservatives are solidly lined up in defense of an institution many of whose decisions are repugnant to them.[2] The conservatives would seem to be concerned with the preservation of the institution; the liberals with the preservation of the benefits that the current Court has awarded them. For the latter the contents of Caesar's will appears to make the difference.

It would seem, therefore, that only those close to the lunatic fringe, the Birchers and the White Citizens Councils and others of their ilk, are prepared to support the purported court-of-the-union plan. Even in the Council of State Governments the proposed amendment was supported by a majority of only one vote. The few legislatures that have voted in support of this amendment are those normally concerned with their war on Robin Hood and similarly dangerous radicals. I do not mean to suggest that the Court is not in danger of being restrained. But I do think that the proposed method of destruction is not a very real threat unless this country is already closer to Gibbon's Rome than to Caesar's.

On the other hand, to say that the plan for a Court of the Union is an absurdity is not to answer the question whether Caesar suffers from an excess of ambitions. The Great Debate called for by the Chief Justice at the American Law Institute meeting last May has not really concerned itself with this problem. The Great Debate has taken the form of rhetorical forays. Each side argues that the proposed limitation on the powers of the Court would result in the removal of national power and the enhancement of the power of the states. The forces of Cassius and Brutus argue that this is a desirable result because the dispersal of government power is the only means of assuring that individual liberty will not be trodden under the tyrannous boots of socialist egalitarianism. Antony contends that the adoption of the proposal would be to return us to a fragmented confederation impotent to carry on the duties of government in the world of the twentieth century. Roosevelt's words about a "horse and buggy era" are this time used in defense of the Court. With all due respect, I submit that the essential question remains unanswered. The Talmud tells us that ambition destroys its possessor. Does the Court's behavior invite its own destruction?

2 Black, The Occasions of Justice 80 (1963).

In what ways is it charged that this Caesar seeks for power that does not belong to him? Some such assertion can be rejected as the charges of disappointed suitors. But there are others that cannot be so readily dismissed on the ground of the malice of claimant. Allow me to itemize a few of the latter together with some supporting testimony:

Item: The Court has unreasonably infringed on the authority committed by the Constitution to other branches of the Government.

Listen to one of the recent witnesses:

> The claim for judicial relief in this case strikes at one of the fundamental doctrines of our system of government, the separation of powers. In upholding that claim, the Court attempts to effect reforms in a field which the Constitution, as plainly as can be, has committed exclusively to the political process.
>
> This Court, no less than all other branches of the Government, is bound by the Constitution. The Constitution does not confer on the Court blanket authority to step into every situation where the political branch may be thought to have fallen short. The stability of this institution ultimately depends not only upon its being alert to keep the other branches of government within constitutional bounds but equally upon recognition of the limitations on the Court's own functions in the constitutional system.

This is not the charge of a Georgia legislator. These are the words of Mr. Justice Harlan, spoken as recently as last February 17, in Wesberry v. Sanders.[3]

Item: The Supreme Court has severely and unnecessarily limited the power of the states to enforce their criminal laws.

Thus one recent critic had this to say:

> The rights of the States to develop and enforce their own judicial procedures, consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment, have long been recognized as essential to the concept of a healthy federalism. Those rights are today attenuated if not obliterated in the name of a victory for the "struggle for personal liberty." But the Constitution comprehends another struggle of equal importance and places on [the Supreme Court] the burden of maintaining it — the struggle for law and order. I regret that the Court does not often recognize that each defeat in that struggle chips away inexorably at the base of that very personal liberty which it seeks to protect. One is reminded of the exclamation of Pyrrhus: "One more such victory . . . , and we are utterly undone."

This, I should tell you, is not the Conference of Chief Justices complaining about the abuses of federal habeas corpus practices; it is Mr. Justice Clark expressing his dissatisfaction in Fay v. Noia.[4]

Item: The Court has revived the evils of "substantive due process," the cardinal sin committed by the Hughes Court, and the one that almost brought about its destruction.

Here another expert witness has said:

> Finally, I deem this application of "cruel and unusual punishment" so novel that I suspect the Court was hard put to find a way to ascribe to the Framers of the Constitution the result reached > today rather than to its own notions of ordered liberty. If this case involved economic regulation, the present Court's allergy to substantive due process would surely save the statute and prevent the Court from imposing its own philosophical predilections upon state legislatures or Congress. I fail to see why the Court deems it more appropriate to write into the Constitution its own abstract notions of how best to handle the narcotics problem, for it obviously cannot match either the States or Congress in expert understanding.

3 376 U.S. 1, at 48 (1964) (dissenting opinion).
4 372 U.S. 391, 446-47 (1963) (dissenting opinion).

This is the hand as well as the voice of Mr. Justice White in Robinson v. California.[5]

Item: The Court has usurped the powers of the national legislature in rewriting statutes to express its own policy rather than executing the decisions made by the branch of government charged with that responsibility.

Listen to two deponents whose right to speak to such an issue is not ordinarily challenged.

> What the Court appears to have done is to create not simply a duty of inspection, but an absolute duty of discovery of all defects; in short, it has made the B&O the insurer of the condition of all premises and equipment, whether its own or others, upon which its employees may work. This is the wholly salutary principle of compensation for industrial injury incorporated by workmen's compensation statutes, but it is not the one created by the F.E.L.A., which premises liability upon negligence of the employing railroad. It is my view that, as a matter of policy, employees such as the petitioner, who are injured in the course of their employment, should be entitled to prompt and adequate compensation regardless of the employer's negligence and free from traditional common-law rules limiting recovery. But Congress has elected a different test of liability which, until changed, courts are obliged to apply.

No, those are not the words of Mr. Justice Frankfurter, but those of his successor, Mr. Justice Goldberg, in Shenker v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co.[6]

Listen to the same criticism in even more strident tones:

> The present case . . . will, I think, be marked as the baldest attempt by judges in modern times to spin their own philosophy into the fabric of the law, in derogation of the will of the legislature.

Here we have Mr. Justice Douglas in dissent from the opinion of Mr. Justice Black in Arizona v. California.[7]

Item: The Court writes or rewrites law for the purpose of conferring benefits on Negroes that it would not afford to others.

I offer here some testimony endorsed by Justices Harlan, Clark, and Stewart, in N.A.A.C.P. v. Button:[8]

> No member of this Court would disagree that the validity of state action claimed to infringe rights assured by the Fourteenth Amendment is to be judged by the same basic constitutional standards whether or not racial problems are involved. No worse setback could befall the great principles established by Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, than to give fair-minded persons reasons to think otherwise. With all respect, I believe that the striking

5 370 U.S. 660, 689 (1962) (dissenting opinion)
6 374 U.S. 1, 14-15 (1963) (dissenting opinion).
7 373 U.S. 546, at 628 (1963) (dissenting opinion).
8 371 U.S. 415, 448 (1963) (dissenting opinion).

> down of this Virginia statute cannot be squared with accepted constitutional doctrine in the domain of state regulatory power over the legal profession.

Item: The Court disregards precedents at will without offering adequate reasons for change.

Mr. Justice Brennan puts his charge in short compass in Pan American World Airways, Inc., v. United States:[9]

> The root error, as I see it, in the Court's decision is that it works an extraordinary and unwarranted departure from the settled principles by which the antitrust and regulatory regimes of law are accommodated to each other.

Item: The Court uses its judgments not only to resolve the case before it but to prepare advisory opinions or, what is worse, advisory opinions that do not advise.

The testimony here includes the following:

> The Court has done little more today than to supply new phrases — imprecise in scope and uncertain in meaning — for the habeas corpus vocabulary of District Court judges. And because they purport to establish mandatory requirements rather than guidelines, the tests elaborated in the Court's opinion run the serious risk of becoming talismanic phrases, the mechanistic invocation of which will alone determine whether or not a hearing is to be had.
>
> More fundamentally, the enunciation of an elaborate set of standards governing habeas corpus hearings is in no sense required, or even invited, in order to decide the case . . . and the many pages of the Court's opinion which set these standards forth cannot, therefore, be justified even in terms of the normal function of dictum. The reasons for the rule against advisory opinions which purport to decide questions not actually in issue are too well established to need repeating at this late date.

This is not the plea by academic followers of Herbert Wechsler for principled decisions nor even an argument by Wechsler's opponents for ad hoc resolutions. It is the view of Mr. Justice Stewart in Townsend v. Sain.[10]

Item: Not unrelated to the charge just specified is the proposition that the Court seeks out constitutional problems when it could very well rest judgment on less lofty grounds.

Here is the Chief Justice himself speaking in Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board:[11]

> . . . I do not believe that strongly felt convictions on constitutional questions or a desire to shorten the course of this litigation justifies the Court in resolving any of the constitutional questions presented so long as the record makes manifest, as I think it does, the existence of non-constitutional questions upon which this phase of the proceedings can and should be adjudicated. . . . I do not think that the Court's action can be justified.

Item: The Court has unduly circumscribed the Congressional power of investigation.

---

9 371 U.S. 296, 319 (1963) (dissenting opinion).
10 372 U.S. 293, 327 (1963) (dissenting opinion).
11 367 U.S. 1, 116 (1961).

The testimony I offer here is not that of the chairman of the House Un-American Affairs Committee nor that of the Birch Society. It derives from Mr. Justice White's opinion in Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee:[12]

> The net effect of the Court's decision is, of course, to insulate from effective legislative inquiry and preventive legislation, the time-proven skills of the Communist Party in subverting and eventually controlling legitimate organizations. Until such a group, chosen as an object of Communist Party action, has been effectively reduced to vassalage, legislative bodies may seek no information from the organization under attack by duty-bound Communists. When the job has been done and the legislative committee can prove it, it then has the hollow privilege of recording another victory for the Communist Party, which both Congress and this Court have found to be an organization under the direction of a foreign power, dedicated to the overthrow of the Government if necessary by force and violence.

Item: I will close the list with the repeated charge that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as applied by the Court consists only of the "evanescent standards" of each judge's notions of "natural law." The charge is most strongly supported by the opinions of Mr. Justice Black in Adamson v. California [13] and Rochin v. California,[14] which I commend to you.

I close the catalogue not because it is exhausted. These constitute but a small part of Brutus's indictment and an even smaller proportion of the witnesses prepared to testify to the Court's grasp for power. These witnesses are impressive, however, for they are not enemies of the Court but part of it. Moreover, their depositions may be garnered simply by thumbing the pages of the recent volumes of the United States Reports, which is exactly the way my partial catalogue was created.

Let me make clear that this testimony does not prove Caesar's guilt, but only demonstrates that these charges cannot be dismissed out of hand. The fact that they are endorsed by such irresponsible groups as would support the proposed constitutional amendment does not add to their validity. But neither does such support invalidate them.

What then of Antony's defenses of Caesar?

First is the proposition that our Caesar has done no more than perform the duties with which he is charged. We have it from no less eminent an authority than Paul Freund that the Court has not exceeded its functions and he defines them thus:[15]

> First of all, the Court has a responsibility to maintain the constitutional order, the distribution of public power and the limitations on that power. . . .
>
> A second great mission of the Court is to maintain a common market of continental extent against state barriers or state trade preferences. . . .

---

12 372 U.S. 539, 585 (1963) (dissenting opinion).
13 332 U.S. 46, 68 (1947) (dissenting opinion).
14 342 U.S. 165, 174 (1952) (concurring opinion).
15 Freund, The Supreme Court Under Attack, 25 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 1, 5-6 (1963).

> In the third place, there falls to the Court a vital role in the preservation of an open society, whose government is to remain both responsive and responsible. . . . Responsive government requires freedom of expression; responsible government demands fairness of representation.

And so, Professor Freund suggests, the Court has done no more than its duty and he predicts that we shall be grateful to it:[16]

> The future is not likely to bring a lessening of governmental intervention in our personal concerns. And as science advances into outer and inner space — the far reaches of the galaxy and the deep recesses of the mind — as physical controls become possible over our genetic and our psychic constitutions, we may have reason to be thankful that some limits are set by our legal constitution. We may have reason to be grateful that we are being equipped with legal controls, with decent procedures, with access to the centers of decision-making, and participation in our secular destiny, for our days and for the days we shall not see.

It is not clear to me that the second defense is really different from the first. Here we are met with the proposition that the Court, politically the least responsible branch of government, has proved itself to be morally the most responsible. In short, the Court has acted because the other branches of government state and national have failed to act. And a parade of horribles would not be imaginary that marched before us the abuses that the community has rained on the Negro; the evils of McCarthyism and the continued restrictions on freedom of thought committed by the national legislature; the refusal of the states and the nation to make it possible for the voices of the disenfranchised to be heard, either by preventing groups from voting, or by mechanisms for continued control of the legislature by the politically entrenched, including gerrymandering, and subordination of majority rule by the filibuster and committee control of Congress; the police tactics that violate the most treasured rights of the human personality, police tactics that we have all condemned when exercised by the Nazis and the Communists. This list, too, might be extended almost to infinity. There can be little doubt that the other branches of government have failed in meeting some of their essential obligations to provide constitutional government.

The third defense is that which I have labelled the defense of Caesar's will. It is put most frankly and tersely by Professor John Roche in this way:[17]

> As a participant in American society in 1963 — somewhat removed from the abstract world of democratic political theory — I am delighted when the Supreme Court takes action against "bad" policy on whatever constitutional basis it can establish or invent. In short, I accept Aristotle's dictum that the essence of political tragedy is for the good to be opposed in the name of the perfect. Thus, while I wish with Professors Wechsler and Kurland, inter alios, that Supreme Court Justices could proceed on the same principles as British judges, it does not unsettle or irritate me when they behave like Americans. Had I been a member of the Court in 1954,

16 Id. at 7.
17 Roche, The Expatriation Cases: "Breathes There the Man, With Soul So Dead. . . ?" 1963 SUPREME COURT REVIEW, 325, 326 n.4.

> I would unhesitatingly have supported the constitutional death-sentence on racial segregation, even though it seems to me that in a properly ordered democratic society this should be a task for the legislature. To paraphrase St. Augustine, in this world one must take his breaks where he finds them.

There then are the pleadings. I do not pretend to a capacity to decide the case. It certainly isn't ripe for summary judgment on the pleadings. I am fearful only that if the case goes to issue in this manner, the result will be chaos whichever side prevails. For, like Judge Learned Hand, I am apprehensive that if nothing protects our democracy and freedom except the bulwarks that the Court can erect, we are doomed to failure. Thus, I would answer the question that purports to be mooted today, whether the court-of-the-union amendment should be promulgated, in the words of that great judge:[18]

> And so, to sum up, I believe that for by far the greater part of their work it is a condition upon the success of our system that the judges should be independent; and I do not believe that their independence should be impaired because of their constitutional function. But the price of this immunity, I insist, is that they should not have the last word in those basic conflicts of "right and wrong — between whose endless jar justice resides." You may ask then what will become of the fundamental principles of equity and fair play which our constitutions enshrine; and whether I seriously believe that unsupported they will serve merely as counsels of moderation. I do not think that anyone can say what will be left of those principles; I do not know whether they will serve only as counsels; but this much I think I do know — that a society so riven that the spirit of moderation is gone, no court can save; that a society where that spirit flourishes, no court need save; that in a society which evades its responsibility by thrusting upon the courts the nurture of that spirit, that spirit in the end will perish.

I find then that I have come neither to praise nor to bury Caesar. I should only remind those who would destroy Caesar of the self-destruction to which the noble Brutus was brought; nor can the Antonys among us — who would use Caesar for their own ends — rejoice at his ultimate fate. For Caesar himself, I should borrow the advice given Cromwell by Wolsey: "I charge thee, fling away ambition: By that sin fell the angels."

---

18 HAND, THE SPIRIT OF LIBERTY 164 (2d ed. 1953).

(Notre Dame Lawyer, Symposium 1964)

PROPOSING CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS BY CONVENTION: SOME PROBLEMS

*Arthur Earl Bonfield

All of the existing amendments to the United States Constitution were proposed to the states by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress. Proponents of the three provisions under discussion here seek to avoid this procedure. They are attempting to invoke an alternative means of submitting to the states amendments to our fundamental law. In addition to the direct Congressional initiation of the amending process, Article V[1] provides that "on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states [Congress] shall call a Convention for proposing amendments." The present paper will consider some of the difficult questions raised by the current effort to utilize this particular mode of "proposing" amendments to our Constitution.

At the outset, it should be noted that many of the significant questions that will arise in the present attempt to propose amendments to our fundamental law by convention will not be resolvable in the courts.[2] Strong dicta even go so far as to insist that all questions arising in the amending process are nonjusticiable.[3] But there is evidence of a substantial nature to the contrary. It would indicate that some of the questions which may arise in this process can be settled on the merits by the judiciary.[4] However, those that are beyond the capacity of the courts to decide because they are nonjusticiable

---

* Assistant Professor of Law, University of Iowa College of Law; B.A., Brooklyn College; LL.B., LL.M., Yale Law School.

1 U.S. Const. art. V.

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

2 See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 457 (1939) (concurring opinion). Dowling, Clarifying The Amending Process, 1 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 215 (1945). In Coleman v. Miller, the Court held that the effectiveness of a state's ratification of a proposed amendment which it had previously rejected, and the period of time within which a state could validly ratify a proposed amendment, were nonjusticiable political questions within the exclusive and irrevocable determination of Congress.

3 See id. at 457-59 (concurring opinion).

> Proclamation under authority of Congress that an amendment has been ratified will carry with it a solemn assurance by the Congress that ratification has taken place as the Constitution commands. Upon this assurance a proclaimed amendment must be accepted as a part of the Constitution, leaving to the judiciary its traditional authority of interpretation. . . . Undivided control of [the amending] process has been given by the Article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is "political" in its entirety . . . and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point.

See also text accompanying note 22 infra, and Dowling, note 2 supra.

4 See Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922); Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920); Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221 (1920); Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

This article will not attempt to fully explore the extent to which the Courts can or should take it upon themselves in suits properly before them to independently resolve the varipolitical questions will be resolvable solely by Congress. Its decision in such cases will be final and conclusive on the courts.[5] Nevertheless, "in the exercise of that power Congress . . . is [still] governed by the Constitution."[6]

I.

The first question raised by the current effort to propose amendments to our National Constitution via a convention concerns the sufficiency of the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments for this purpose.[7] Are they proper applications for a "Convention" within the meaning of Article V? If they are not, their adoption by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states would neither authorize nor compel Congress to summon a convention empowered to propose amendments to the Constitution. The reasons for this are several.

In the first place, the United States is a government of delegated powers. Consequently, it possesses no authority save that conferred upon it by the Constitution. Article V, the only provision in the Constitution dealing with its amendment, must therefore be deemed exhaustive and not merely illustrative of the Federal Government's powers in this regard. That provision explicitly provides two modes for proposing constitutional amendments. Only one of these contemplates the convening of a convention empowered to propose amendments. Such a "Convention" is authorized by Article V only when two-thirds of the state legislatures have made "Applications" for one. As a result, applications within the meaning of Article V from two-thirds of the state legislatures must fairly be deemed absolute prerequisites to the summoning of such a body.[8]

There is a second reason why valid Article V applications from the requisite number of state legislatures must be deemed prior conditions to the summoning of any convention empowered to propose amendments. If these applications are not prerequisites to such a convention call, on its own say-so, a majority of Congress could validly summon such a body.[9] By the same simple majority, Congress could determine the convention's make-up and mode of operation. It could therefore provide that the convention could propose amendments to the states by a mere majority of its delegates.

But Article V insists that a two-thirds vote be required by both Houses of Congress, or that two-thirds of the state legislatures make "Application" for a "Convention," before an amendment to the Constitution may be proposed ous questions that may arise in the amending process. On the justiciability of questions arising in the amending process see ORFIELD, AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 7-36 (1942); Clark, The Supreme Court and the Amending Process, 39 VA. L. REV. 621 (1953); Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067 (1957).

---

5 Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939); cf. United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

6 Coleman v. Miller, supra note 5, at 457 (1939).

7 Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10 (Winter No. 1 1963).

8 See ORFIELD, AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 40 (1942); Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW, 185, 196 (1951); Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 957, 962-64 (1963).

9 The terms of Article V in no way suggest that Congress may not convene such a body by the usual vote required for Congressional action. Consequently, no more than a majority vote would seem to be required to "call a Convention."

to the states. This reflects the conviction of the founding fathers that the seriousness of this kind of action demands a national consensus of the sort required to achieve such two-thirds votes. Permitting a majority of Congress, on it own say-so, to call a convention empowered to propose constitutional amendments approved by a simple majority of the latter's delegates would, therefore, frustrate the well-reasoned intentions of the founding fathers in this respect; for the kind of consensus required to secure a two-thirds vote of Congress or applications for a "Convention" from two-thirds of the state legislatures would no longer be required to trigger the amending process.

There is a further reason why Congress may not call a convention empowered to propose amendments to the Constitution until it has received the kinds of applications contemplated by Article V from the requisite number of state legislatures. "A high degree of adherence to exact form . . . is desirable in this ultimate legitimating process."[10] Because of the uniquely fundamental nature of a constitutional amendment, attempts to alter our Constitution should not be filled with highly questionable procedures which could reasonably cast doubt on the ultimate validity of the provision produced. The procedure followed in any effort to amend the Constitution should be so perfect that it renders unequivocal to all reasonable men the binding nature of the product. Consequently, Article V must insist upon a firm and unyielding adherence to the precise procedures it provides. This unusual need for certainty in the process of amending our fundamental law also lends additional force to the assumption that the precise procedures provided in Article V must be deemed exclusive.

Prior discussion demonstrates that in the process of "proposing Amendments" to the Constitution by "Convention," Congress resembles those state legislatures that are empowered to create such a body only after a demand for such action by the people at the polls.[11] That is, Congress may not call a convention empowered to "propose" amendments to the Constitution unless it receives from two-thirds of the state legislatures the kinds of applications for such action that are contemplated by Article V. As a consequence, the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments and adopted by the legislatures of several states must be carefully scrutinized in order to determine their adequacy in this respect. If these resolutions are not applications for a convention within the meaning of Article V in no case would Congress be authorized or obligated to call a "Convention" pursuant thereto.

The resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments provide as follows:

> Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring that this Legislature respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. [The text of one of the three desired constitutional amendments is then inserted.][12]

10 Black, supra note 8, at 963.

11 See Iowa Const. art. X, § 3; Nev. Const. art. XVI, § 2; N.Y. Const. art. XIX, § 1; S.D. Const. art. XXIII, § 2; Tenn. Const. art. XI, § 3.

12 Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10, 11-14 (Winter No. 1 1965).

It can be argued with substantial persuasiveness that these resolutions are not applications for an Article V "Convention."

Article V clearly specifies that Congress "shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." The process of proposing amendments contemplates a conscious weighing and evaluation of various alternative solutions to the problems perceived. As Professor Charles Black has noted:

> The process of "proposal" by Congress, contained in the first alternative of Article V, obviously [and necessarily] includes the process of plenary deliberation upon the whole problem to which the amendment is to address itself. It entails choice among the whole range of alternatives as to substance and wording. It is "proposal" in the most fully substantial sense, where the proposer controls and works out the content and form of the proposition. It is very doubtful whether the same word two lines later, in the description of the second alternative, ought to be taken to denote a mechanical take-it or leave-it process.[13]

Common sense alone suggests that Article V contemplates a deliberative convention that would itself undertake fully to evaluate a problem, and propose those particular solutions that it deems desirable. The reason for this is that amendments to our National Constitution are chiefly matters of national concern. Consequently, all the alternatives should be carefully explored and debated on a national level, and the details of any proposed amendments fully worked out on a national level, before they are sent to the states for their more locally oriented action of ratification.

With this in mind, it can reasonably be assumed that the two modes provided for "proposing" amendments found in Article V were to be symmetrical. Whether "proposed" by Congress or a "Convention," the problem at which any amendment is directed is to be "considered as a problem, with [an evaluation] of a wide range of possible solutions and an opportunity to raise and discuss them all in a body with national responsibility and adequately flexible power."[14] Consequently, the "Convention" contemplated by Article V was to be a fully deliberative body — with power to propose to the states as amendments any solutions to the problem submitted to the "Convention" that it deemed best.

If Article V contemplates this kind of a "Convention . . . for proposing Amendments," the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments should be deemed insufficient applications within the meaning of that provision. Instead of requesting a deliberative convention with full power to propose to the states any amendments dealing with the subject in question that it thinks proper, these resolutions demand "a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States."[15] As a result, the resolutions in issue really call for a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove in a mechanical way the text of specific amendments that have already been "proposed" elsewhere. In this sense, the proponents of these resolutions seek to make the "Convention" part of the ratifying process, rather than part of the deliberative process for "proposing" constitutional amendments.[16] Consequently, the resolutions in question should not empower Congress to call a convention authorized to submit amendments to the states for ratification. They are not "Application[s for a] Convention . . . for proposing amendments" as Article V demands; rather, they are applications for a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove the submission to the states of particular amendments "proposed" elsewhere.

13 Black, supra note 8, at 962.
14 Id. at 963 (emphasis added).
15 See text accompanying note 12, supra.

Furthermore, Congress has no authority to treat the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments as applications for the kind of convention Article V does contemplate. It cannot be inferred from these resolutions requesting a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove particular amendments for submission to the states, that the state legislatures tendering them would be satisfied or willing to have a plenary convention consider the problems at which these amendments were directed, and submit to the states the solutions to those problems that the convention deems best. "It is not for Congress to guess whether a state which asks for one kind of a 'convention' wants the other as a second choice. Altogether different political considerations might govern."[17]

A further defect in the resolutions may preclude their characterization as valid Article V applications. The text of each of the amendments contained in the propositions sponsored by the Council of State Governments specifies that it is to be ratified by "the state legislatures."[18] Article V clearly indicates that regardless of the mode of an amendment's proposal, Congress is to decide whether it shall be ratified by three-fourths of the state legislatures or three-fourths of special ratifying conventions held in each state.[19] As a result, the resolutions in question may also be deemed insufficient as Article V applications because they are attempting to achieve an illegitimate end. They seek to deny Congress the discretion to choose the mode whereby the states might ratify any product of the convention they seek.

Prior discussion should demonstrate that Congress could not legitimately treat the resolutions in question as valid applications for an Article V convention. Consequently, it should have no authority to call such a "Convention for proposing Amendments" to the Constitution pursuant thereto. Since precedent does exist for the proposition that courts will review the validity of a constitutional amendment on the merits in light of some procedural defects that may have vitiated its proper proposal or adoption,[20] there is a possibility that amendments proposed by any convention called pursuant to these resolutions

16 Shanahan, Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Will Strengthen Federal-State Relations, 49 A.B.A.J. 631, 633 (1963). He specifically notes that the purpose of including the actual text amendments was to insure that the "applicants" for a convention retained control over the amendments ultimately proposed.

17 Black, supra note 8, at 964.

18 Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10, 11-14 (Winter No. 1 1963).

19 United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

20 The courts will adjudicate on the merits the validity of a constitutional amendment in light of any alleged procedural defects that may have vitiated its proper proposal or adoption. See Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920); Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221 (1920); Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

would be held invalid in an appropriate judicial proceeding. Indeed, at the behest of a proper litigant a court might even enjoin the election of delegates to any convention called on the basis of such inadequate Article V applications.

However, it can be argued with great force that the sufficiency for Article V purposes of the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments is a nonjusticiable political question,[21] whose resolution is committed exclusively and finally to Congress. While there is no case directly on point, the dicta of four Justices of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Coleman v. Miller[22] should be recalled. "Undivided control of [the amending] process has been given by . . . Article [V] exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is 'political' in its entirety from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point."[23]

Furthermore, there may be a "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the [particular] issue to a coordinate political department."[24] That is, since Congress is to call the Article V convention on receipt of applications from the proper number of states requesting such a body, Congress alone may be empowered to decide whether those applications tendered are sufficient. By the same token it can be argued that the validity of these resolutions as applications for an Article V convention is nonjusticiable because of "the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution [of the question] without expressing lack of respect due coordinate branches of government."[25] If this is true, and the validity of these resolutions as applications for an Article V convention is "not meet for judicial determination," the decision of Congress on this question, whatever it is, will be conclusive on the courts for all purposes.

II.

The next question presented by the current effort to propose amendments to the Constitution by convention concerns the role of state governors in the application process. Must applications for an Article V convention be approved by the legislatures and the governors of two-thirds of the states to be effective? Or, is legislative approval of these applications by the required number of states alone sufficient to empower Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments?

It should be noted that the Council of State Governments specifies that the resolution it sponsors "should be in whatever technical form the state employs for a single resolution of both houses of the legislature which does not require the Governor to approve or veto."[26] The correctness of the approach taken by the Council of State Governments in this respect depends on whether the term "legislature" in the application provision of Article V means the

21 See Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 ILL. L. REV. 782, 791-92 (1927); Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1071 (1957).
22 Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
23 Id. at 459 (1939) (concurring opinion).
24 Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).
25 Id. at 217.
26 Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10, 11 (Winter No. 1 1963).

whole legislative process of the state — as defined in the state constitution — or only its representative lawmaking body. As we will see, close analogies suggest that this is a justiciable question.

The 1920 case of Hawke v. Smith, No. 1[27] interpreted "legislatures" in the ratification clauses of Article V to mean the representative lawmaking body only, since "ratification by a State of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word."[28] If the term "legislature" is interpreted to mean only the state's representative lawmaking body in the ratification clauses of Article V, it should bear the same meaning in the application clauses of that provision. There would seem to be no valid reason for according a different meaning to the one term in these two different clauses of the same constitutional provision.

Further support for the view that the governor of a state need not sign its application for an Article V convention can be gleaned from the case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia.[29] In that suit counsel argued that the Eleventh Amendment was invalid because after it had been approved for proposal to the states by a two-thirds vote of Congress, it had not been tendered to the President for his signature. On this basis it was asserted that the Amendment had never been properly submitted to the states for their ratification. Mr. Justice Chase answered this contention by asserting that "the negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation; he has nothing to do with the proposition, or adoption, of amendments to the Constitution."[30]

It is easy to apply this reasoning to the powers of state governors and conclude similarly that the executive of the state has no function to perform in the application process under Article V. The governor's approval of such an application for a convention is unnecessary; and an executive veto may be disregarded. Consequently, effective applications for an Article V convention need only be approved by a state's legislature[31] — and in this respect, the theory upon which the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments is predicated is correct.

III.

The current effort to seek a constitutional convention through the application process also raises a question of timing. That is, in order to be effective,

27 253 U.S. 221 (1920). That case held that a state could not restrict the ratifying power of its legislature by providing for a binding popular referendum on the question.

28 Id. at 229. As a result, the Court held that a state constitutional provision that provided for a referendum on the action of the General Assembly in ratifying any proposed amendment to the United States Constitution was in conflict with Article V. Contra, State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 107 Wash. 167, 181 Pac. 920 (1919). An approach similar to that of Hawke v. Smith, No. 1 has been taken by state courts with regard to state constitutional amendments. See Mitchell v. Hopper, 153 Ark. 515, 241 S.W. 10 (1922); Larkin v. Gronna, 69 N.D. 234, 285 N.W. 59 (1939).

29 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

30 Id. at 381. "The most reasonable view would seem to be that the signature of the chief executive of a state is no more essential to complete the action of the legislature upon an amendment to the Federal Constitution than is that of the President of the United States to complete the action of Congress in proposing such an amendment." Ames, The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the U.S. During the First Century of Its History, H.R. Doc. No. 353, pt. 2, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 298 (1897).

31 See Staff of House Comm. on the Judiciary, 82nd Cong., 2d Sess., Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates 7-8 (Comm. Print 1952); Note, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 1075 (1957).

within what period must the resolutions be adopted by two-thirds of the state legislatures? There would seem little doubt that Congress would neither be empowered nor under a duty to call an Article V convention unless it receives "relatively contemporaneously," proper applications from the required number of state legislatures.[32] The reason for this is that each step in the amending process is meant to demonstrate significant agreement among the people of this country — at one time — that changes in some particular part or the whole of our fundamental law are desirable. Nothing less would seem acceptable in a process of such significance and lasting impact.

The case of Dillon v. Gloss[33] lends support to the assumption that a convention can properly be called pursuant to applications for an Article V convention only if they are made relatively contemporaneously by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. In that suit the United States Supreme Court sustained the power of Congress to fix the time period during which ratification of a pending amendment could be effective. After noting that Article V was silent on this question, the Court commented as follows:

> What then is the reasonable inference or implication? Is it that ratification may be had at any time as within a few years, a century or even a longer period; or that it must be had within some reasonable period which Congress is left free to define?[34]

After admitting that neither the debates in the Federal Convention nor those in the state conventions ratifying the Constitution shed any light on this question, the Court concluded that "the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal, which Congress is free to fix."[35] The Court's rationale was:

> As ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people

32 Additionally, Congress may not properly call an Article V Convention unless a sufficient number of timely applications also agree on the problem or general subject matter that such a body should consider. But they need not be otherwise identical. That is, it is sufficient if the specific constitutional changes suggested by each application concern the same general subject matter; it is not necessary that each application propose the same changes in that subject matter. See STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82ND CONG. 2d SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL TAX RATES 15 (Comm. Print 1952); Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW. 185, 195-96 (1951); Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067 (1957). But see ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 42; Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 ILL. L. REV. 782, 795 (1927).

The prior position seems correct for many of the same reasons that such applications must be reasonably contemporaneous to be effective. Sufficient national agreement to warrant the calling of an Article V Convention is evidenced only if the legislatures of two-thirds of the states agree that a convention is needed to deal with the same general problem or subject matter. Consequently, applications for a convention dealing with divergent subjects such as some dealing with the treaty power, some dealing with the taxing power, and some desiring a general constitutional revision, should not be counted together. The problem of whether heterogeneous applications should be considered together does not really arise in the present case since the Council of State Governments proposes that two-thirds of the states adopt identical resolutions. Twelve states have already adopted one of these resolutions. Graham, The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments, 49 A.B.A.J. 1175, 1182-83 (1963).

33 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

34 Id. at 371.

35 Id. at 375.

> in all sections at relatively the same period which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do.[36]

This logic would seem equally compelling in regard to the process of proposing amendments to the Constitution. Article V is silent as to how long applications for a convention are to retain their vitality. But to exhibit any significant or meaningful agreement as to the desirability of such a convention, applications from two-thirds of the states must be "sufficiently contemporaneous . . . to reflect the will of the people in . . . [different] sections at relatively the same period." That is, "to be obligatory upon Congress, the applications of the states should be reasonably contemporaneous with one another, for only then, would they be persuasive of a real consensus of opinion throughout the nation for holding a convention, and by the same token, they ought also to be expressive of similar views respecting the . . . [subject matter] of the amendment sought."[37]

While Dillon v. Gloss[38] seems to establish the authority of Congress to fix reasonable time limitations for the application as well as the amending process, it does not solve the problem as to what would be considered sufficient contemporaneity in absence of such a stipulation. The case of Coleman v. Miller[39] is relevant to this inquiry, since it held that the period of time within which the states could validly ratify a proposed amendment was a nonjusticiable political question. That is, in the absence of any edification from Congress as to what constitutes a reasonable time in the ratification process, the Court refused to make such a determination. Its rationale was that > . . . the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve . . . an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of the Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment.[40]

While the previous discussion only directly considers the role of the judiciary in defining time limits in the ratification process, it probably also means that the courts will not independently determine whether applications from two-thirds of the states for an Article V convention have been tendered to Congress

36 Id. at 375. The Court quotes JAMESON, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS § 585 (4th ed. 1887) at this point to the effect that: "an alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed by Congress."

37 Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of a Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW. 185, 195-98 (1951).

38 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

39 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

40 Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 453-54 (1939).

with sufficient contemporaneity. Coleman v. Miller would seem to indicate that this question is solely for Congress, and its decision on the matter will be binding on the judiciary for all purposes.

How, then, should Congress determine whether tendered applications are sufficiently contemporaneous to be counted together? It has been suggested that the current Congress might only consider those applications submitted during its tenure.[41] That is, in order to ascertain whether it is empowered or under an obligation to call an Article V convention, each Congress need only look to those applications tendered during its life. The 88th Congress need not consider any applications tendered during the 87th Congress, since the life of an application is only as long as the particular Congress to which it is tendered.

This standard of contemporaneity seems unacceptable for a variety of reasons. In the first place, ten applications tendered the last day of one Congress, and thirty submitted the first day of the following one would be insufficient even though they may have been submitted only three months apart. Additionally, it should be recalled that the state legislatures do not address their applications to any specific Congress.

It has also been suggested that at maximum only those applications tendered within the last generation be counted with each other; that is, that the effective life of an application not exceed a generation.[42] However, no measure of the precise length of a generation is provided; nor is any satisfactory rationale offered to justify Congress' counting applications together that have been tendered over such an appreciable time period.

Congress might determine the effective life of an application, and therefore whether it can properly be counted with later applications on the same subject, by engaging in a full analysis of the application itself and all surrounding circumstances. This was at least suggested in Coleman v. Miller.[43] Among the factors that could be considered in determining the continuing vitality of an application might be the political tenor of the times, then and now; intervening or changing circumstances relevant to the subject matter of the application since its filing; the transitory or long-term nature of the problem to which the application for a convention addresses itself; whether the problem is still considered grave by most Americans; and so on. The difficulty with this approach is that it requires Congress to make a determination with regard to many variables that are unusually difficult if not impossible for even that politically oriented body properly to evaluate or handle.

A more persuasive and perhaps more sensible approach to the question of reasonable contemporaneity can be devised than any of the prior possibilities. In counting applications for an Article V convention, Congress should properly consider only those tendered in that period, prior to the most recent application, during which all of the state legislatures have had an opportunity to consider the question at a full regular session. That is, the maximum time between those applications that can be counted together should not exceed that period during which all state legislatures have met once for a full regular session. In no case could the time period involved exceed about two and a half years.[44]

41 Sprague, Shall We Have a Federal Constitutional Convention, and What Shall It Do?, 3 MAINE L. REV. 115, 123 (1910). The author admits that as a practical matter, such a requirement of contemporaneity would render the application process incapable of fulfillment.

42 ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 42.

43 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

The advantage of this approach seems evident. The burden should always be on those who invoke this process to demonstrate clearly by sufficient contemporaneity of their applications that there is a present agreement among two-thirds of the states as to the desirability of a constitutional convention. Such a present consensus can only be realistically demonstrated by limiting the count of such applications to those made during the most recent period during which all state legislatures have had a reasonable opportunity to consider the question. Only applications filed during this period would accurately represent the results of the most recent poll that could reasonably be taken on the subject.

There are other advantages to limiting the life of an application to that period during which all other state legislatures have had a subsequent opportunity to consider similar action during a full regular session. Once applications for a convention are filed, attempts to withdraw them are not likely to be strenuously pressed. This is true even though the legislature may have changed its mind — or would no longer make such an application as a de novo proposition.[45] The requirement suggested here would cure this by forcing a reasonably frequent reconsideration of the desirability of such a convention in each state that had previously applied for one. Some assurance is thereby provided that such an extraordinary body will be convened only if applications from two-thirds of the states clearly demonstrate by the most recent, hence most reliable poll practicable, a present agreement on the subject.

The suggested requirement is neither unduly onerous, nor necessarily destructive of the "Application" process. States generally will not act alone in such matters. Indeed, the founding fathers probably contemplated some concert of action in such attempts to obtain a convention. The present effort is an excellent example. Furthermore, once a state legislature tenders such an application it can continually renew that application in its subsequent sessions. If there really is substantial agreement on the desirability of such a convention, debate on subsequent renewals of such applications should be relatively perfunctory, and the renewals easy to obtain.

The precise formulation that is offered for measuring the required contemporaneity of the applications may be fruitfully tested against the treatment

44 If legislature A made such an application at the very start of its session, say in February 1962, its application would retain its validity until the end of the next full regular session of all the state legislatures. Since many states meet only every other year, and one of those might make such an application at the end of its session, for example, as late as June or July 1964, a period of two and a half years may elapse between the first and last applications that may be counted together.

45 But note that in a good number of cases, states have attempted to rescind applications for an Article V Convention that they had previously tendered. 49 A.B.A.J. 1181-82 (1963).

of the same problem in the ratification process. The two situations seem closely analogous and probably would be treated similarly by Congress.[46]

In four of the last seven amendments that Congress proposed to the states it specified that the latter were to have up to seven years to effectively ratify them.[47] Congress has also deemed all of the twenty-four amendments to the Constitution properly ratified within a time period sufficiently short to demonstrate a contemporaneous agreement among the people in three-fourths of the states, despite the fact that one took as long as four years from the date of its submission and another three and a half years.[48]

So far, Congress has therefore rejected any test of contemporaneity as stringent as that suggested here. However, on the basis of its express action in four of the last seven amendments it submitted to the states, Congress may be inclined to consider seven years the absolute maximum period allowable to demonstrate a "current" agreement among the people in all sections of the country in respect to any question dealing with amendments to the Constitution. If this is so, proponents of the three "states' rights" amendments will have to secure the endorsement of their resolutions by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states within that period of time.

Congress could, of course, greatly reduce this period and quite reasonably choose to ignore any applications submitted prior to that most recent period during which all state legislatures had an opportunity to consider the question during a full regular session. But it seems rather unlikely that Congress would adopt a standard of contemporaneity in the "Application" process so much stricter than that which it has recently used in the ratification process.

IV.

The next major issue likely to arise in the current effort to convene a constitutional convention is the right of states tendering such applications to withdraw them. Coleman v. Miller[49] held that "the efficacy of ratifications by state legislatures, in light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal, should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments, with the ultimate authority in Congress."[50] It is likely that the courts would treat the closely analogous question of the effect of a state's "withdrawal" of its application for an Article V convention in a similar way. If this is true, the judiciary will refuse independently to resolve the question, feeling itself conclusively bound by Congress' decision in the matter.

How should Congress handle this problem? It has been argued that under 46 It might be contended that applications for a convention need not be made contemporaneously to be effective because the calling of a convention empowered only to propose amendments is far less significant than ratification. But this notion should be rejected. All parts of the amending process are too important to demand anything less than the kind of contemporaneous agreement suggested here.

47 U.S. CONST. amend. XXII; U.S. CONST. amend. XXI; U.S. CONST. amend. XX; U.S. CONST. amend. XVIII; see also Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

48 The Constitution of the United States of America 47-48, 54 (Corwin ed. 1952). The 16th Amendment was proposed July 12, 1909, and ratification was completed on February 3, 1913, while the 22d Amendment was proposed on March 24, 1947, and ratification was completed on February 27, 1951.

49 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

50 Id. at 450 (1939).

Article V only forward steps can be taken and therefore a state cannot effectively withdraw an application for a convention.[51] This view seems entirely erroneous and untenable. It would base the presence of a sufficient number of applications solely upon a mechanical process of addition and ignore the extent to which each application reflects the existence of the required contemporaneous agreement that an Article V convention is desired. Consequently, in determining whether two-thirds of the states have applied for a convention, applications which have been rescinded should be disregarded;[52] for they no longer evidence any present agreement that a convention should be called.

Any precedent that may exist for denying states the right to rescind their ratifications of interstate compacts[53] or constitutional amendments[54] is not apposite here. Ratification is the "final act by which sovereign bodies confirm a legal or political agreement arrived at by their agents."[55] Applications for a constitutional convention, however, are merely "formal requests" by state legislatures to Congress, requesting the latter to "call a Convention for proposing Amendments" because there is a present consensus that such action is desirable. Consequently, they do not share the same dignity or finality as ratifications which might justify the latter's irrevocable nature.[56]

V.

Assuming that the resolutions in question are deemed to be valid Article V applications and are tendered to Congress by two-thirds of the states within a "reasonable" time of each other, is Congress under a duty to call a constitutional convention? Or, does it have discretion to use its judgment as to whether such a convention is really desirable or necessary? The former conclusion seems most plausible.

Article V states: "On the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States [Congress] shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." From this language alone it would seem clear that Congress was to be under a firm and nondiscretionary obligation to call a Convention when sufficient applications from two-thirds of the states are tendered. The word "shall" as used in Article V is clearly mandatory.

More, however, is available than the bare language itself to support this conclusion. The debates of the Constitutional Convention indicate that in pro-

51 See Note, Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions, 30 CHI.-KENT. L. REV. 339 (1952).

52 Fensterwald, Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process — A Reply, 46 A.B.A.J. 717, 719 (1960); Grinnel, Petitioning Congress for a Convention: Cannot a State Change Its Mind?, 45 A.B.A.J. 1165 (1959); Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Amendment, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1071 (1957). Contra, Packard, Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process, 45 A.B.A.J. 161 (1959).

53 See West Virginia v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22 (1950).

54 There is precedent for Congressional refusal to permit a state to withdraw its ratification. Congress did so during Reconstruction when several states attempted to withdraw their ratification of the post-Civil War amendments. The decision of Congress in that case seems clearly wrong. Its action may be attributed to the unusual temper of the times. See Clark, The Supreme Court and the Amending Process, 39 VA. L. REV. 621, 624-26 (1953); Grinnel, supra note 52, at 1165.

55 Fensterwald, supra note 52, at 719.

56 The common sense of Article V, however, would seem to be that ratifications can also be effectively rescinded anytime before three-fourths of the states lend their assent to the proposed amendment. But see note 54 supra.

viding for the proposal of amendments by convention the founding fathers intended to furnish a method by which the Constitution could be altered even though Congress was opposed.[57] Further support for the mandatory and nondiscretionary nature of Congress' duty to call a convention when the prerequisites are met can be found in the Federalist Papers. In paper No. 85 Hamilton insisted:

> By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obligated "on application of the legislatures of two thirds of the states . . . to call a Convention for proposing amendments . . ." The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body.[58]

It therefore seems clear that if Congress receives applications for an Article V convention from two-thirds of the state legislatures within a "reasonable time period," it is absolutely bound to convene such a body.[59]

However, it should be relatively clear that the courts would never attempt to force Congress to call such a convention[60] since the latter's decision as to whether many of the prerequisites to such a call have been met will probably be conclusively binding on the former. For example, prior discussion demonstrates that the intrinsic adequacy as applications for an Article V convention of any resolutions tendered to Congress, their timeliness, and their continuing validity in light of attempts to withdraw them, are all likely to be considered by the judiciary as nonjusticiable political questions. If this is so, Congress' decision on these matters will conclusively bind the courts, and necessarily disable the latter from playing any positive role in forcing a convention call.

It should also be noted that the courts have never issued an injunction or writ of mandamus directly against the President or Congress because of the doctrine of separation of powers embodied in our National Constitution, and the consequent obligation of respect owed co-equal branches of the National Government by the federal judiciary.[61] To do so here would reflect a "lack of 57 When final debate on Article V began in the Constitutional Convention the draft being considered provided that "the Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the applications of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States shall propose amendments to this Constitution . . ." 2 FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 629 (1911).

---

"Col. Mason thought the plan of amending the Constitution exceptionable and dangerous. As the proposing of amendments is in both the modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second, ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the national government should become oppressive . . ." 2 FARRAND, op. cit. supra, at 629. As a result, Mr. Gouverneur Morris and Mr. Gerry moved to amend the article to require a convention or application of two-thirds of the states. 2 FARRAND, op. cit. supra, at 629. "Mr. Madison did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two-thirds of the States as to call a call (sic) a convention on the like application." 2 FARRAND, op. cit. supra, at 629-30.

58 THE FEDERALIST No. 85, at 546 (Wright ed. 1961) (Hamilton).

59 See 1 WILLOUGHBY, THE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF THE UNITED STATES § 331 (2d ed. 1929); Packard, Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program, 30 CHI.-KENT L. REV. 128, 133-34 (1952); Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067 (1957). Contra, Platz, Article V of the Federal Constitution, 3 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 17, 44 (1934).

60 See 1 WILLOUGHBY, op. cit. supra note 59, § 331; Fensterwald, supra note 52, at 720. Contra, Packard, supra note 52, at 196.

61 In Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1866), the Supreme Court unanimously held that the President himself is not accountable to any court save that of impeach-respect" for the actions of a coordinate branch of the Federal Government in regard to a subject that may even textually be exclusively committed to its judgment by the Constitution.[62] Therefore, aside from the very practical inability of the courts adequately to enforce any decree directing Congress to call such a convention,[63] sound reasons and well-established precedent dictate the correctness of the assumption that it lacks the authority to do so.

Recent cases holding that the courts can force the states to reapportion their legislatures conformably to equal protection,[64] or that the courts can force state legislatures to draw congressional districts so that they are as nearly equal in population as practicable[65] are inapposite here. The reason for this is that "it is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government, and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States which gives rise to the 'political question'."[66] That is, "the nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers."[67] Judicial review on the merits of state legislative apportionment or the drawing of congressional districts by the states only involves federal judicial superintendence of state action or inaction; but judicial review of Congress' failure to call an Article V convention directly involves the federal courts in an effort to force its co-equal branch of government to perform a duty exclusively entrusted to it by the Constitution.

VI.

What is the President's role in the calling of an Article V convention? Does the call for a convention, like any ordinary piece of legislation, require his signature or a two-thirds vote of Congress for it to be valid?

The previously discussed case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia[68] would seem to indicate that the need for Presidential concurrence in any convention call is justiciable, but that his signature is never required for the valid issuance of such a call. Consequently, the President's failure to join in the Congressional summons of such a convention would in no way impair the validity of any amendment the latter body proposed. The language of Article V directly supports this conclusion since it asserts that "the Congress" is to call a "Convention for proposing Amendments" on "the Application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states."

However, a contrary argument of substantial weight has been made.[69] Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution provides that ment either for the nonperformance of his constitutional duties or for the exceeding of his constitutional powers.

---

"The Congress is the legislative branch of the Government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department; though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance." Mississippi v. Johnson, supra at 500.

62 Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).

63 How could the courts force Congress to call a convention when all the details of such a body seem to be left to the unreviewable discretion of Congress? Would a court call one itself if Congress failed to follow a court decree directing it to do so?

64 Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

65 Westberry v. Sanders, 84 S. Ct. 526 (1964).

66 Baker v. Carr, supra note 64, at 210. (Emphasis added.)

67 Id. at 210.

68 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

69 See Black, supra note 8, at 965.

> . . . every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary . . . shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the case of a Bill.

Hollingsworth v. Virginia carved an exception to this rule as far as Congress' proposal of Constitutional Amendments was concerned. But it can be argued that this mode of proposing constitutional amendments was taken out of the veto process by the Supreme Court in that case solely because "the congressional proposal must be by two-thirds in each house [and] it [therefore] may have been thought that the requirement for overriding the veto was already met."[70] This ground would not exist if Congress called a constitutional convention to propose amendments by a simple majority vote.

As a result, it can be argued that the commands of Article I, Section 7, apply to the convention call since it is an "Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives [are] . . . necessary." If this is true, the President must sign any call by Congress for a constitutional convention and if he vetoes it, Congress can override him only by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

Further support for this point of view can be gleaned from the fact — to be shortly noted — that Congress can specify how the convention is to be chosen, its organization, rules, etc. This being so, Congress must necessarily make more than a mere call for a convention. Such a call would be meaningless without the inclusion of the specific terms upon which such a body is to be constituted, organized, and conducted. These terms to be spelled out by Congress would appear similar to the general kinds of legislation with which Congress normally deals. Consequently, no reason of logic dictates its different treatment in respect to the need for Presidential approval.

This conclusion is bolstered by the desirability of such a requirement. The President is the only official who is elected by and responsible to the American people as a whole. His concurrence in the summoning of such a convention that would intimately affect the concerns of all individual Americans, and our Nation as a whole, therefore seems most logical and desirable.

The President's duty in such a case would be the same as that of Congress; to participate in such a call only if, in good conscience, he deems the requisites for such a convention to have been properly met. If Article V demands Presidential concurrence in such a call, the refusal of the chief executive to act, like that of Congress, would probably be conclusive on the courts,[71] subject however to the right of Congress to override his judgment by a two-thirds vote. However, it should be reiterated that the need for Presidential concurrence in any congressional convention call might well be decided otherwise on the basis of

70 Id. at 965.
71 See note 61 supra and the text accompanying that note.

Article V's specific language directing "The Congress" to call a convention, and the analogous case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia.[72]

VII.

If Congress does call an Article V convention pursuant to the resolutions in question here, on what terms may it do so? How would such a convention be constituted, how would it operate, and what would be the scope of its authority? The terms of Article V give us little help. Indeed, Madison worried about these questions at the Convention of 1789. "He saw no objection . . . against providing for a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum, etc."[73]

Since Article V empowers "Congress" to call the "Convention" when the requisites for the summoning of such a body are met, and Article V does not indicate the terms upon which such a convention is to be constituted, organized, or operated, Congress must be authorized to decide such questions. Under its power to call a convention, Congress therefore has implied authority to fix the time and place of meeting, the number of delegates, the manner and date of their election, whether representation shall be by states or by population, whether voting shall be by number of delegates or by states, and the vote in convention required to validly propose an amendment to the states.[74]

If the broad dictum of Coleman v. Miller[75] is any guide to present judicial conviction Congress' determination in the above matters may be conclusive on the courts for all purposes. Such a refusal by the courts to review on the merits the propriety of the organizational ground rules imposed by Congress on an Article V convention might be defensible on the assumption that in Article V there is a "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of th[is] issue to a coordinate political department."[76] Even if the courts are conclusively bound for all purposes by the congressional specifications regarding the terms upon which such a convention must be constituted, organized and operated, Congress will still be bound in its action on these questions by the Constitution and its judgment of the popular will. However, here as in most places in the amending process, the only available remedy for Congressional abuse may be political — resting with the electorate at the polls.

In calling an Article V convention Congress would not be justified in following by analogy the Constitutional Convention of 1787 where representation and voting were by states.[77] Nothing in the terms of Article V requires representation or voting in such a body to be on that basis. Furthermore, at the time of the 1787 Constitutional Convention the states

> . . . were in a position of at least nominal sovereignty, and were

---

72 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

73 2 FARRAND, supra note 57, at 630.

74 See ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 43-44; Black, supra note 8, at 959; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1075-76 (1957). This continuing hand of Congress in the convention process need not appear unduly strange since Article V explicitly gives it the power to decide between modes of ratification regardless of the mode of proposing the amendment to the states.

75 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

76 Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962). However, a good argument can be made to the contrary.

77 FARRAND, THE FRAMING OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 57 (1962).

> considering whether to unite. The result of the Convention would have bound no dissenting state or its people; the same was true of the acceptance of a new Constitution by the requisite nine. All these conditions are now reversed. We are already in an indissoluble union; there is a whole American people. The question in an amending convention now would [only] be whether innovations, binding on dissenters, were to be offered for ratification.[78]

As a result, the propriety of a vote or representation by states in the 1787 Convention cannot settle the propriety of similar action in a convention today.

More appropriate than representation or voting by states in any Article V convention would be an apportionment of the delegates and voting power in such a body on the basis of population alone. Such an approach makes good sense not only because it would conduce to the most accurate expression of the national will, but also because regional interests are more than adequately weighted at the ratification stage where each state is given an equal voice. Congress should therefore provide that delegates to any Article V convention be elected from districts of equal population, and that each delegate have one vote.

Congress should also provide that an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the delegates would be required to propose any given amendment to the states. In this way it would assure a symmetry of concurrence in the bodies empowered to propose constitutional amendments — whether the body was Congress or a convention. Such symmetry is desirable because it would assure the same kind of overwhelming consensus in one route to proposal as the other, thereby avoiding possible forum shopping. A two-thirds requirement in such a convention would also guarantee that no amendment, regardless of its means of proposal, is ever submitted to the states before an overwhelming consensus as to its desirability is evidenced in a nationally oriented body.

From all of the above, it would seem clear that "no Senator or Representative [or the President if his concurrence is required] is bound to vote for a convention call which in its form fails to safeguard what he believes to be vital national interests."[79] And as noted previously, their decision in this regard would seem to be unreviewable in the courts. That is, the sole remedy available to check an abuse of Congress' judgment in this matter may be at the polls.

A further question is raised by the current effort to propose amendments to the Constitution by convention. Can either the states or Congress limit the scope of such a convention's authority in any way? It should be recalled that the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments avowedly attempt to restrict the convention to the approval or rejection of the precise amendments contained in those resolutions. Prior discussion has already demonstrated that an Article V convention is to be a fully deliberative body empowered to propose those solutions to a problem that it deems best. Consequently, such a convention cannot be limited by the state applications upon which it is predicated to the approval or rejection of the text of any particular amendments contained therein. By the same token, Congress may not limit such a convention to the approval or rejection of any particular amendments.[80]

78 Black, supra note 8, at 964-65.
79 Id. at 964.

While neither the states nor Congress may limit an Article V convention to the consideration of the terms of any particular provision, they should be able to restrict such a body to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that contained in the applications upon which the convention is predicated. Indeed, of their own force, the state applications should limit any convention called by Congress to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that requested in those applications. The reason for this is as follows.

An agreement is required among two-thirds of the state legislatures that a Convention ought to be held before Congress is empowered to convene such a body. No Article V convention may be called in absence of such a consensus. If the agreement is that a convention is desired only to deal with a certain subject matter, as opposed to constitutional revision generally, then the convention must logically be limited to that subject matter. To permit such a body to propose amendments on any other subject would be to recognize the convention's right to go beyond that consensus which is an absolute prerequisite for its creation and legitimate action.

If the prior conclusion is correct, and the state applications of their own force can bind any convention called pursuant thereto solely to a consideration of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter requested in those applications, then Congress should disregard any amendment proposed by such a body which is outside of that subject matter. Here, as elsewhere, the courts will be bound by Congress' decision on the question if the issue is nonjusticiable. This, regardless of whether Congress deems a proposed amendment ineffective because it is beyond the scope of the convention's authority, or effective because it is within the scope of the convention's authority. On the other hand, if this question is justiciable, the courts may independently determine whether an amendment proposed by such a convention is beyond the general subject matter requested by the state applications. If such an amendment is outside that subject matter the courts might enjoin its ratification, or set the amendment aside afterwards because it was never properly proposed.

The notion that state applications can limit a convention called pursuant thereto solely to a consideration of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that contained in those applications is not widely accepted. It has been insisted that "the nature of the right conferred upon the state legislatures in requesting Congress to call a constitutional convention is nothing more or less than the right of petition."[81] The Convention itself is a Federal instrumentality set up by Congress under powers granted to it by the Constitution. Since Article V directs Congress to call the convention, and is silent as to the details of such a body, Congress is the only authority entitled to specify

80 There is another reason why Congress cannot properly limit a convention to the approval or rejection of the text of any particular amendment. The framers of the Constitution probably intended the convention method of proposing amendments to be as free as possible from Congressional interference so that the "Convention" could propose any amendments it deemed desirable in spite of any Congressional objections to the provision. See note 57 supra.

81 Wheeler, supra note 21, at 795.

those details. Consequently, if any power can limit such a convention to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same subject matter as that contained in the state applications, it can only be Congress.[82] "State legislatures . . . have no authority to limit an instrumentality set up under the federal Constitution. . . . The right of the legislatures is confined to applying for a convention, and any statement of purposes in their petition would be irrelevant as to the scope of powers of the convention."[83]

If this is true, and the state applications cannot themselves bind a convention to a consideration of only the same subject matter requested in those applications, then Congress should be able to do so pursuant to its implied power to fix the terms upon which such a body shall operate.[84] A convention called pursuant to the resolutions in question here, for example, should not be permitted to propose amendments concerning the treaty power.[85] The reason for this is that the applications specifically request a convention for another purpose. A constitutional change should never be proposed by a convention unless two-thirds of the states have previously agreed that an amendment dealing with the particular subject matter involved is desirable, or that a convention was needed to consider a general constitutional revision. For this reason, it would seem anomalous were Congress powerless to limit the scope of a convention's authority to the general subject matter requested in the text of the applications upon which it is predicated. Certainly it would be under a duty to call a general convention if two-thirds of the state legislatures properly ask for one. Equally obvious should be its right and obligation to limit the scope of a convention to the same subject matter requested by the state applications.

Some authority for Congressional power in this respect can be gleaned from those state cases insisting that state constitutional conventions are subject to the restrictions contained in the call for the convention. The theory is that the legislatures call is a law and the delegates are elected under the terms of that law.[86] Consequently, they can exercise no powers beyond that conferred by such a statute or the Constitution itself.

Prior discussion should demonstrate that at least Congress can limit the scope of any Article V convention to the "subject matter" or "problem" at which the state applications were directed. Clearly, Congress is at least morally bound to do so. And in any subsequent litigation, the courts should respect

---

82 STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82ND CONG., 2d SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL TAX RATES 15 (Comm. Print 1952).

83 ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 45.

84 Contra, 46 Cong. Rec. 2769 (1911) (remarks of Senator Heyburn). ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 45; Wheeler, supra note 21, at 796; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1076 (1957).

85 See STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82ND CONG., 2d SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL TAX RATES 15 (Comm. Print 1952); JAMESON, A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS; THEIR HISTORY, POWERS AND MODES OF PROCEEDING 10, 11, 493 (4th ed. 1887).

86 See Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 51 (1874). But see Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 49, 53 (1858) (dictum). For debate on both sides of this question, see 1 DEBATES OF THE CONVENTION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA 1872-73, 52-61 (1873).

such a limitation imposed by Congress and disregard any provisions proposed by a convention that were beyond the latter's authority as so limited. Of course, the notion that the state applications can themselves limit the scope of a convention's authority solely to a consideration of the same subject matter as that contained in those applications should not be ignored. However, if that theory is rejected, the people of the United States will have to rely on Congress to expressly limit any Article V convention it calls to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that contained in the state applications.

VIII.

If the amendments sponsored by the Council of State Governments were proposed by a validly convened and constituted convention, the states would still need to ratify them. As previously noted, the terms of the three "states rights" amendments specify that they are to be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. Even if these precise amendments could be validly proposed by a convention called pursuant to the resolutions in question here, Congress would not be bound in this respect. Article V clearly empowers Congress to determine in its sole discretion which of the two modes of ratification specified in that provision shall be utilized;[87] this regardless of the method of the particular amendment's proposal. Consequently, that decision would still rest with Congress in the case at hand, and the courts would be bound in all respects by its choice in the matter. Congress could, therefore, choose to have any amendment proposed by such a convention "ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof . . . ."

87 United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

(North Carolina Law Rev.--1975)

COMMENT

Amendment by Convention: Our Next Constitutional Crisis?

On September 15, 1787, in the waning moments of the Philadelphia Convention, which drafted the United States Constitution, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney of South Carolina observed that "conventions are serious things and ought not to be repeated."[1] Americans have apparently taken Pinckney's wisdom to heart, for in our long history as a constitutional republic, there has never been another federal constitutional convention. This is true although the Constitution expressly authorizes "a Convention for proposing Amendments,"[2] and despite the fact that in the years since the Constitution was ratified approximately two hundred sixty-nine resolutions have been submitted to Congress by the States calling for national constitutional conventions.[3]

Article V is the part of the Constitution that provides for its own amendment. It reads as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as a part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Under article V there are two means of proposing constitutional amendments: either by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress,

---

1. 2 M. FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, at 632 (1911) [hereinafter cited as FARRAND].

2. U.S. CONST. art. V.

3. State Applications Calling for a Constitutional Convention to Propose Amendments to the Constitution of the United States: 1787 to July 1, 1974 (unofficial list prepared by the staff of the United States Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, as revised, September 25, 1974) [hereinafter cited as State Applications].

or by a constitutional convention called by Congress in response to petitions of two-thirds of the state legislatures. The powers of Congress or of the constitutional convention are limited to proposing amendments. Proposed amendments become part of the Constitution only when ratified by three-fourths of the States. Congress, regardless of how the amendments are proposed, has the exclusive power to determine the method of ratification[4] and must choose to have the proposed amendments ratified either by the state legislatures or by conventions held in each state for that purpose. Each of the present twenty-six amendments to the Constitution were initially proposed by the Congress. Since the national convention procedure has never been used, it remains a constitutional curiosity. As is clear from the language of article V, the convention would be a truly national forum with the authority to propose important changes in our system of government. But beyond this literal reading, article V is tantalizingly vague.

American constitutional law and history have developed within the long shadow cast by the Philadelphia Convention of 1787, and students and practitioners of our national political system have generally shared Gladstone's opinion of the Constitution as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." It is, then, understandable that constitutional scholars from James Madison[5] to Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr.[6] have approached the subject of a new constitutional convention with a prudent degree of apprehension bred by proper respect for the enduring vitality of the Constitution. Much of the fear of a constitutional convention, which might, for example, seek to undermine important rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, springs undoubtedly from the language of article

4. United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 730 (1931).

5. [An article V national convention] would consequently give greater agitation to the public mind; an election into it would be courted by the most violent partisans on both sides; it wd probably consist of the most heterogenous characters; would be the very focus of that flame which has already too much heated men of all parties; would no doubt contain individuals of insidious views, who under the mask of seeking alterations popular in some parts but inadmissible in other parts of the Union might have a dangerous opportunity of sapping the very foundations of the fabric. Under all these circumstances it seems scarcely to be presumable that the deliberation of the body could be conducted in harmony, or terminate in the general good. Having witnessed the difficulties and dangers experienced by the first Convention which assembled under every propitious circumstance, I should tremble for the result of a second.

Letter of James Madison to G.L. Turberville, November 2, 1788, in 5 U.S. BUREAU OF ROLLS AND LIBRARY, DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, 1786-1870, at 104-05 (1905).

6. See, e.g., Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, Press Release, Aug. 17, 1967.

V itself, which leaves unanswered numerous questions concerning the nature and scope of the powers of a national constitutional convention.[7]

The heat of the controversy surrounding article V represents the constitutional friction generated by the insertion of a new deliberative body into a political system carefully balanced by the doctrine of separation of powers and limited by the principles of federalism.[8] Who determines the validity of state applications? Where would the convention be held and how long would it last? May Congress refuse to call a convention, given a sufficient number of valid applications? Are questions such as these justiciable in the courts, or are they "political questions"[9] to be left to other departments of government?

Since there has never been a constitutional convention under article V, there exists no precedent to suggest solutions for these difficult problems. Likewise, there are no Supreme Court cases directly on point, and precious few on the amendment process generally.[10] Congress, though it has considered the problem on several different occasions,[11] has passed no legislation on the subject. Fear and uncertainty, in many cases justified, have left the convention procedure much ignored and little understood. Yet so long as the words remain in the Constitution, a national constitutional convention is a possibility. Fundamental wisdom and common sense on so important a matter would thus seem to require that the problems in the article V conven-

7. Concern over the wording of the national convention procedure is as old as article V itself: "Mr. Madison remarked on the vagueness of the terms, 'call a Convention for the purpose,' as sufficient reason for reconsidering the article. How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?" 2 FARRAND, supra note 1, at 558 (quoting Madison's notes).

8. Professor Orfield has suggested that an article V convention would be, in effect, a fourth branch of government, coequal with the Congress, the Executive and the Judiciary. See L. ORFIELD, THE AMENDING OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 47-48 (1942).

9. For a discussion of justiciability and the political question doctrine see text accompanying notes 130-34 infra.

10. See text accompanying notes 137-67 infra.

11. See, e.g., Hearings on S. 1272 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973); Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967); STAFF OF THE HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 86TH CONG., 1ST SESS., STATE APPLICATIONS ASKING CONGRESS TO CALL A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION (Comm. Print 1959); Hearings on Amending the Constitution Relative to Taxes on Incomes, Inheritances, and Gifts Before Subcomm. No. 3 of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 2d Sess. (1958); Hearings on S.J. Res. 23 Before a Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 83d Cong., 2d Sess. (1954); STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82D CONG., 2D SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS ON FEDERAL TAX RATES (Comm. Print 1952).

tion process be anticipated and dealt with effectively. Given the dearth of contemporary authority, investigation into the meaning and requirements of article V, as with other parts of the Constitution, might best begin with the comments of the men who wrote it.[12]

I. Background and History of Article V

Although today it might seem that an amendment clause should be an indispensable part of any national charter, this view was by no means common among eighteenth century political theorists. In fact, just the opposite was true; the idea of making changes in a constitution was foreign to European political systems. The power of amendment was a unique product of the American experience,[13] arising out of the conviction that ultimate sovereignty is in the people. This radical conception of state sovereignty found power in the people not only to make a constitution, but, as a necessary corollary, to amend and to revise it.[14] It was the impotence of the national government under the Articles of Confederation,[15] manifested in part by the unanimity requirement for amendment, that led Congress in 1787 to call for a federal conven-

12. The Supreme Court has long recognized the propriety of drawing upon the debates in the Philadelphia Convention of 1787, the essays of The Federalist and other writings of the Founding Fathers as aids in construing vague and ambiguous constitutional provisions. See, e.g., Missouri Pac. R.R. v. Kansas, 248 U.S. 276 (1919); Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U.S. 208 (1901); Pollack v. Farmer's Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895); Transportation Co. v. Wheeling, 99 U.S. 273 (1878); Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821).

13. See, e.g., C. Brickfield, House Comm. on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess., Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention 1 (Comm. Print 1957); Scheips, The Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution, 26 Notre Dame Law. 46, 48 (1950).

14. L. Orfield, supra note 8, at 1. For the first time in the history of written constitutions, an amending provision appeared in the Pennsylvania Frame of Government drawn up by William Penn and his colonists in 1683. By 1787 the constitutions of eight states contained clauses dealing with amendment; five provided for amendment by convention and three, by the legislature. W. Pullen, The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution 1 (1951) (unpublished thesis in Wilson Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill). In states such as Virginia, whose constitution did not permit amendment, the need for an amending clause was strongly felt. During debate on article V, Madison lamented that "[t]he Virginia state government was the first which was made, and though its defects are evident to every person, we cannot get it amended. The Dutch have made four several attempts to amend their system without success. The few alterations made in it were by tumult and faction, and for the worse." 1 Farrand, supra note 1, at 476.

15. Article XIII provided (in part): "The Articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration shall be agreed to in a congress of the united states, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state." Documents of American History 115 (8th ed. H. Commager 1968). Note, incidentally, that article XIII made no provision for a constitutional convention.

tion "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall, when agreed to in Congress, and confirmed by the States, render the federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union."[16]

A. Prerequisite Conditions for Amending the Constitution

In the proceedings and debates of the 1787 Convention, some general philosophical and political considerations emerged as to the intent of the Framers regarding the amendment process generally and the function of an article V convention specifically. Broadly speaking, written into the language of article V as it appears today are three prerequisite conditions for amending the Constitution:

(1) "Perfection" and the Amendment Process

The Constitution proposed by the Philadelphia Convention was intended to be the ultimate expression and statement of the sovereignty of the American people. Continued acceptance by the people of the authority and legitimacy of the Constitution requires that amendments be the product of an orderly, controlled and procedurally correct constitutional process.[17] Professor Bonfield summarizes the argument in this manner:

> Because of the uniquely fundamental nature of a constitutional amendment, attempts to alter our Constitution should not be filled with highly questionable procedures which could reasonably cast doubt on the ultimate validity of the provision produced. The procedure followed in any effort to amend the Constitution should be so perfect that it renders unequivocal to all reasonable men the binding nature of the product.[18]

---

16. 1 J. ELLIOT, THE DEBATES IN THE SEVERAL STATE CONVENTIONS ON THE ADOPTION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 120 (2d ed. 1836).

17. The Constitution expressly provides that all amendments "shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution . . ." U.S. CONST. art. V (emphasis added). As Professor Black has written, "a high degree of adherence to exact form, at least in matters of importance, is desirable in this ultimate legitimating process; a constitutional amendment ought to go through a process unequivocally binding on all." Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 957, 963 (1963).

18. Bonfield, Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems, 39 NOTRE DAME LAW. 659, 661 (1964). The point was also made during debate on article V at the Philadelphia Convention. Col. Mason argued that "[a]mendments will therefore be necessary, and it will be better to provide for them, in an easy, regular and constitutional way than to trust to chance and violence." 1 FARRAND, supra note 1, at 202-03. James Iredell of North Carolina, later a United States Supreme Court Jus-

(2) The Need for a National Consensus

A procedurally "perfect" amendment process should operate to change the Constitution only when there exists a national consensus for change.[19] Such a national consensus is virtually assured by the requirement of article V that amendments be proposed only by a two-thirds majority in both Houses of Congress, or by a convention called at the request of two-thirds of the States. In addition, after the amendments are proposed, they do not become part of the Constitution until ratified by three-fourths of the States in the manner chosen by Congress. Thus at every stage of the amendment process the consent of supermajorities is required, under the presumption that it will be impossible to achieve such majorities without widespread national agreement on the need for amendment.[20]

(3) Deliberation and Debate Before a National Forum

Given a procedurally correct amendment process and a national consensus for change, the Framers further intended that amendment proposals be brought before a national assembly of representatives of the people.[21] As the United States Supreme Court noted in Hawke

---

tice, argued before the state convention considering ratification of the Constitution that "it is a most happy circumstance, that there is a remedy in the system itself for its own fallibility, so that alterations can without difficulty be made, agreeable to the general sense of the people." 4 J. ELLIOT, supra note 16, at 176-77. Likewise Madison commented in The Federalist:

> That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite, therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty, which might perpetrate its discovered faults. It, moreover, equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendments of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side, or on the other.

THE FEDERALIST No. 43, at 315 (B. Wright ed. 1961) (J. Madison).

19. Professor Dodd has written, "in bringing about a change in the federal Constitution . . . two elements must unite: (a) the sentiment of the people in favor of change, and particularly in favor of the specific change being urged; and (b) operation of the machinery for the purpose of effecting such a change." Dodd, Amending the Federal Constitution, 30 YALE L.J. 321, 354 (1921).

20. See, e.g., Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921). The provisions of article V thus illustrate "the conviction of the Founding Fathers that the seriousness of this kind of action demands a national consensus of the sort required to achieve such two-thirds votes." Bonfield, supra note 18, at 661.

21. "On principle, it appears to me that the point is that no constitutional changes should go forward to ratification without having first undergone examination and debate in a national forum, whether it be Congress or a convention." Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 60, 62 (1968) (statement of A. Bickel).

v. Smith,[22] "This article [V] makes provision for the proposal of amendments either by two-thirds of both houses of Congress, or on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States; thus securing deliberation and consideration before any change can be proposed."[23] Once the national forum, whether Congress or convention, is satisfied with the proposal and has submitted it to the States for ratification, article V insures yet further debate and discussion by requiring that the amendment be ratified either by the State legislatures or State conventions, "which it was assumed would voice the will of the people."[24]

B. Proposing Amendments by Convention: An Alternative to Congress

The above-mentioned conditions are satisfied under the procedure whereby Congress proposes amendments. Yet article V provides for an alternative process—proposing amendments by constitutional convention. Since the congressional procedure works effectively, is technically simple in its operation, and has built around it a formidable body of constitutional-amendment law based upon precedent and repetition, what distinguishable purpose is the convention procedure intended to serve?

The delegates to the Philadelphia Convention of 1787 were in sharp disagreement as to how amendments ought to be brought about. At the center of the dispute was the role of the Congress.[25] Some of the delegates were deeply suspicious of allowing the national government to interfere in the amendment process.[26] Eventually a major

---

22. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).

23. Id. at 226. "What is a convention? A constitutional convention . . . must be a deliberative body, but beyond that it cannot be accurately described." Platz, Article V of the Federal Constitution, 3 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 17, 45 (1934).

24. Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 226-27 (1920).

25. As Madison noted, "the exclusion of the National Legislature from the process was at issue." 1 FARRAND, supra note 1, at 202. Some, like Col. Mason, believed that the Congress should not be a part of the amending process. 1 J. ELLIOT, supra note 16, at 182. Others, such as Gouverneur Morris, advocated a role for Congress. Id. at 498.

26. Resolution 13 of the Virginia Plan introduced by John Randolph provided that "the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required" to amend the Constitution. 1 FARRAND, supra note 1, at 22. Col. Mason defended this position, noting that "[i]t would be improper to require the consent of the Nat'l Legislature, because they may abuse their power and refuse their consent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse, may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendment." Id. at 203.

Hamilton displayed somewhat greater confidence in the integrity of future Congresses: "The mode proposed was not adequate. The State Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers—The National Legislature compromise was reached, albeit over Madison's misgivings.[27] The Convention drafted article V to require Congress to call a constitutional convention for proposing amendments upon application of two-thirds of the states.[28] This procedure was to be a genuine alternative to the procedure under which Congress proposes amendments.

As the debates make clear,[29] the article V convention provision was inserted to allow the people of the States to propose amendments should the Congress be unwilling to do so. The compromise was motivated by the fear of some that the Congress might someday abuse, neglect, or exceed its constitutional powers and would then be most unlikely to propose amendments on the issue of its own wrongdoing.[30] The convention procedure was conceived as yet another of the fundamental checks and balances written into our constitutional system.

There is nothing to suggest that the Framers intended the congressional procedure to be the predominant amendment process. To the contrary, they felt that they had struck a proper balance in distributing the power to propose amendments, intending to express a preference for neither method.[31] The popular appeal of the alternative amendment process was frequently exploited as delegates pleaded with their various state conventions to ratify the new Constitution.[32] Hamilton defended article V by characterizing the alternative amendment process as a safeguard against a reluctant or despotic Congress. He felt that the process of collecting the required number of state ap-will be the first to perceive and will be most sensible to the necessity of amendments. . . . —There could be no danger in giving [Congress] this power [to call a convention], as the people would finally decide in the case." 2 id. at 558.

---

As a result of this disagreement, the Committee of Style and Revision reported back a revised draft of article V that made no provision for proposing amendments independent of the Congress. Id. at 602. In the margin of his copy of the revised draft, an outraged Col. Mason scribbled his objection that "should [Congress] prove ever so oppressive, the whole people of America can't make, or even propose alterations to it; a doctrine utterly subversive of the fundamental principles of the rights and liberties of the people." Id. at 629 n.8.

27. Id. at 629-30.

28. Id.

29. See note 26 supra.

30. Id.

31. The Senate Judiciary Committee in 1973 concluded that "[t]here is no evidence whatsoever that the Framers did not regard this means to be as desirable and as viable as that which allows for constitutional amendment at the initiation of Congress." SENATE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES ACT, S. REP. No. 293, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1973).

32. Madison felt that article V "equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendments of errors . . . ." THE FEDERALIST No. 43, at 315 (B. Wright ed. 1961).

plications and calling the convention under article V manifested "one of those rare instances in which a political truth can be brought to the test of mathematical demonstration."[33]

C. Historical and Political Significance of Article V

Although a national convention has never been called, still the alternative amendment procedure has played a significant role in the American political process.[34] The constitutional history of the United States is replete with state applications calling for a convention,[35] and more than once the awesome spectre of an impending constitutional convention has inspired an otherwise reluctant Congress to act.[36]

For example, following the adjournment of the Philadelphia Convention during the State ratification debates, anti-federalists in control of legislatures in Virginia[37] and New York[38] led the way in calling for a new constitutional convention. Pressure from these influential states resulted, on September 25, 1789, in the proposal by Congress of twelve amendments.[39] This made the second convention unnecessary, for ten of the proposals, the present Bill of Rights, were ultimately ratified by the States.[40]

Other significant national movements for a second convention arose in the late 1820's and early 1830's during the nullification controversy,[41] and during the crisis period immediately preceding the outbreak of the Civil War.[42]

The twentieth century brought a new period of article V activism among the States. During this century Congress has been flooded with

---

33. Id. No. 85, at 546 (A. Hamilton).
34. For an excellent general treatment of the historical importance of article V's alternative amendment procedure in national policy-making see W. Pullen, supra note 14.
35. See State Applications, supra note 3.
36. See, e.g., W. Pullen, supra note 14, at 105-13.
37. Id. at 10-11.
38. Id. at 21.
39. Id. at 30.
40. U.S. CONST. amends. I-X.
41. W. Pullen, supra note 14, at 33-67. The doctrine of Nullification, or State Interposition, held that the States, as sovereigns, retained the power to "veto" or "nullify" acts of Congress when the state legislature determined that the congressional statute was, in its sole opinion, unconstitutional. Calhoun and others were fierce advocates of the doctrine, convinced that it was the only possible way the Union could be preserved short of civil war. See generally J. BLUM, B. CATTON, E. MORGAN, A. SCHLESINGER, JR., K. STAMPP, & C. WOODWARD, THE NATIONAL EXPERIENCE (2d ed. 1968).
42. W. Pullen, supra note 14, at 68-84.

applications for a convention.[43] And as the number of applications has increased sharply, the purpose of the States in submitting them has also changed. States have seized upon the alternative amendment process as a tactical device to catch the attention of Congress.[44]

This shift in purpose is perhaps best illustrated by the national controversy in the early 1900s over direct election of United States Senators.[45] The States played upon the chronic fear of the American people, Congressmen and Senators included, of another constitutional convention, and in the end compelled Congress to propose the seventeenth amendment.[46] Some Senators who were opposed to direct election preferred the submission of the amendment by Congress rather than risk a convention.[47] Between 1893 and 1911, thirty-one applications were collected,[48] and under intense pressure to call the convention, the Congress in 1912 chose to avert a constitutional crisis by proposing the seventeenth amendment. Thus, even though an article V convention was never called, the possibility, or rather the apparent inevitability, of a national convention eventually compelled Congress to take action favored by the people. In this manner, then, the alternative amendment process served precisely the function intended by the Framers.[49]

The most recent effort by the States to have Congress call a

---

43. From 1906 to 1916, twenty-seven petitions were filed to propose an amendment banning polygamy; from 1939 to 1960, twenty-eight states called for a convention to limit the taxing power of the federal government; from 1943 to 1949, six states petitioned for a convention on the issue of world federal government; and scattered applications have been filed on such far flung issues as controlling the Communist Party, balancing the federal budget and limiting the tenure of federal judges. See State Applications, supra note 3. See also Graham, The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments, 49 A.B.A.J. 1175 (1963).

44. "In the [past], application was made by a state because a convention was thought to be desirable. Beginning with the twentieth century, however, the process has been used primarily as a prod in the side of Congress to force that body to propose a specific amendment." W. Pullen, supra note 14, at 105.

45. Id. at 105-13.

46. S. REP. No. 293, supra note 31, at 6.

47. "'In this country, just as soon as a constitutional convention was assembled they would be seeking to open every door to access and to carry out or make impossible the carrying out of the fallacies, the fads, and the fancies of the imagination of the people who talk about Government and the Constitution of the United States as glibly as though they knew something about it . . . .'" W. Pullen, supra note 14, at 111, quoting remarks of Senator Heyburn.

48. See State Applications, supra note 3.

49. "The history of the 17th amendment illustrates the usefulness of having a method by which a recalcitrant Congress can be bypassed when it stands in the way of the desires of the country for constitutional change." S. REP. No. 293, supra note 31, at 6. Also recall the intentions of the Framers in providing a genuine alternative to Congress discussed in text accompanying notes 25-33 supra.

national convention came in the 1960's in the wake of the landmark Supreme Court decisions on the malapportionment of state legislatures. In 1962 in Baker v. Carr[50] the Court held that the issue of state legislative reapportionment was justiciable,[51] abruptly reversing its long-standing position to the contrary.[52] Baker v. Carr provoked an explosive reaction among the States. In December 1962 the Council of State Governments passed resolutions urging state legislatures to petition Congress for a national convention to consider constitutional amendments aimed at stripping the federal courts of jurisdiction in maters of legislative reapportionment.[53] Then, in 1964 with Reynolds v. Sims[54] as its flagship case,[55] the Supreme Court established the principle of "one-man, one-vote."[56] Following this decision, the Seven-

50. 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

51. "[T]he complaint's allegations of a denial of equal protection present a justiciable constitutional cause of action upon which appellants are entitled to a trial and a decision. The right asserted is within the reach of judicial protection under the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 237.

52. See, e.g., Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549, 552 (1946) ("due regard for the effective working of our Government revealed this issue to be of a peculiarly political nature and therefore not meet for judicial determination."); cf. Radford v. Gary, 352 U.S. 991 (1957) (per curiam); Anderson v. Jordan, 343 U.S. 912 (1952) (per curiam); Remmey v. Smith, 342 U.S. 916 (1952) (per curiam); South v. Peters, 339 U.S. 276 (1950) (per curiam); MacDougall v. Green, 335 U.S. 281 (1948) (per curiam); Colegrove v. Barrett, 330 U.S. 804 (1947) (per curiam); Cook v. Fortson, 329 U.S. 675 (1946) (per curiam).

53. The Sixteenth General Assembly of the States, 36 STATE GOV'T 2, 10-15 (1963). The Council passed three resolutions calling for amendment of article V designed to overturn the Baker v. Carr decision and recommended

> [t]hat the attached joint resolutions, dealing with proposed amendments to the United States Constitution be adopted by every State Legislature without change and in a uniform manner which will leave no question as to the intent of the several States:
>
> a. A resolution to amend Article V so as to simplify state initiation of proposed amendments.
>
> b. An amendment to eliminate federal judicial authority over the apportionment of State Legislatures.
>
> c. An amendment to establish a "Court of the Union" with authority to review Supreme Court decisions relating to the rights reserved to the States under the Constitution.

Id. at 11. The Council proposals created quite a stir. See, e.g., Caldwell, Freund & Bernard, Debate of Three Proposed Constitutional Amendments, 53 ILL. B.J. 1040 (1965); Hurst, Memorandum Regarding Pending Proposals to Amend the United States Constitution, 36 WIS. B. BULL., Aug. 1963, at 7; Monroe, To Preserve the United States: A Brief for the Negative on Three Current Plans to Amend the Constitution, 8 ST. LOUIS U.L.J. 533 (1964); Shanahan, Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Will Strengthen Federal-State Relations, 49 A.B.A.J. 631 (1963).

54. 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

55. See also Lucas v. Forty-fourth Gen. Assembly, 377 U.S. 713 (1964); Roman v. Sincock, 377 U.S. 695 (1964); Davis v. Mann, 377 U.S. 678 (1964); Maryland Comm. for Fair Representation v. Tawes, 377 U.S. 656 (1964); WMCA v. Lomenzo, 377 U.S. 633 (1964).

56. "[A]s a basic constitutional standard, the Equal Protection Clause requires teenth Biennial General Assembly of the States passed a resolution urging States to petition Congress for a convention to propose an amendment that would permit states to apportion one house of a bicameral legislature on some basis other than population.[57] This "quiet campaign to rewrite the Constitution"[58] steadily gained momentum and was abetted by the active support of certain members of Congress.[59] By March 1967, thirty-two states had submitted arguably valid applications to Congress—only two shy of the magic number representing two-thirds of the States.[60]

Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. of North Carolina then introduced, for the first time in our nation's history, legislation[61] on article V national conventions.[62] The Ervin Bill was designed to establish effective procedures for the calling and functioning of the convention and to delineate carefully the nature and scope of the convention's powers. Unfortunately, though the Ervin Bill has twice passed the Senate unanimously, it remains languishing in the House Judiciary Committee.[63]

Since 1967 the two additional state applications required to initiate the article V convention process have not been forthcoming. Indeed, the possibility of a constitutional convention has now dimmed considerably since several states have sought to withdraw their applications. At the present, it seems certain that the two-thirds requirement will not be met on reapportionment.

---

that the seats in both houses of a bicameral state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis." 377 U.S. at 568.

57. The Seventeenth Biennial General Assembly of the States, 38 STATE GOV'T 39, 62 (1965).

58. Sorenson, The Quiet Campaign to Rewrite the Constitution, 50 SAT. REV., July 15, 1967, at 17.

59. Chief among them was United States Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois. See, e.g., Dirksen, The Supreme Court and the People, 66 MICH. L. REV. 837 (1968).

60. "At this point," Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. recalls, "the situation attracted the first attention in the press. . . . The immediate reaction was a rash of newspaper editorials and articles, almost uniformly critical of the effort to obtain a convention, and a flurry of speeches on the subject in the Congress." Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875, 877 (1968).

61. S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (1967).

62. 113 CONG. REC. 23005 (1967).

63. No action was taken by the Congress until October 19, 1971, when the Ervin Bill, slightly amended and renumbered, S. 215, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971), passed the Senate eighty-four to nothing. 117 CONG. REC. 36804 (1971). Action by the House was not forthcoming on the Ervin Bill during the ninety-second congress, and so Senator Ervin reintroduced the bill, S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973), in the ninety-third congress in March 1973. 119 CONG. REC. S. 5017 (daily ed. March 19, 1973). On July 9, 1973, S. 1272 passed the Senate on a voice vote with no opposition. 119 CONG. REC. S. 12728 (daily ed. July 9, 1973).

The excellent study, research and scholarship fostered by America's flirtation with a constitutional convention during the late 1960's should not, however, be filed away simply because a convention appears to be a short-term improbability. Today, in a political atmosphere not cankered by partisanship on issues that might be the subject of state applications, is the perfect time for article V to be considered on its own merits.[64] The serious constitutional problems inherent in article V's vagueness ought to be resolved in anticipation of a future time when the Congress finds itself in possession of the required number of state applications. Given that the amendment process in a constitutional political system should be "perfect," unhappily the procedure for assembling and conducting the business of an article V convention is not at all clear, precise or perfect. If past experience is any guide, were a national constitutional convention held today, with no legislative or other authority to guide and limit its activities, it is doubtful that all segments of the population would accept the product of that convention as constitutionally binding.[65]

The most conceptually difficult questions left unanswered by article V concern the powers of Congress and the federal judiciary over the convention. Initially, it is essential to define and analyze the power of Congress, if any, to limit the scope and subject matter of an article V convention. Secondly, to what extent does the power of the federal judiciary extend to the amendment process generally and to national conventions particularly? These twin considerations cannot be resolved independently of one another, for any effort made by Congress to legislate in this field will be limited ultimately by the constitutional

---

64. There is now in progress, however, a movement to have a convention called on the issue of forced busing of schoolchildren to achieve racial balance in public schools. To date, the following twelve states have sent applications to Congress asking for a convention on this issue: Alabama, 119 CONG. REC. S. 15869 (daily ed. Sept. 5, 1973); Delaware, 119 CONG. REC. S. 15869 (daily ed. Sept. 5, 1973); Georgia, 119 CONG. REC. H. 5158 (daily ed. June 21, 1973); Louisiana, 116 CONG. REC. 5479 (1970), 111 CONG. REC. 164 (1965); Massachusetts, 120 CONG. REC. S. 7035 (daily ed. May 6, 1974); Michigan, 117 CONG. REC. 41210 (1971); Mississippi, 119 CONG. REC. S. 4839 (daily ed. March 15, 1973), 116 CONG. REC. 6097 (1970); Nevada, 119 CONG. REC. S. 9728 (daily ed. May 29, 1973); Oklahoma, 119 CONG. REC. S. 8316 (daily ed. May 7, 1973); Tennessee, 118 CONG. REC. 16214 (1972), 112 CONG. REC. 44 (1966); Texas, 119 CONG. REC. S. 6878 (daily ed. April 10, 1973); Virginia, 119 CONG. REC. H. 2400 (daily ed. April 3, 1973).

65. For example, the movement in the 1960's for a convention in the wake of Baker v. Carr and Reynolds v. Sims led to much bickering over whether a malapportioned state legislature could submit a constitutionally-valid application to Congress on the issue of its own malapportionment. See, e.g., 113 CONG. REC. 1010 (1967) (remarks of Senator Tydings).

power and political disposition of the Supreme Court. When presented with such legislation the Court might choose to ignore the issue as properly a "political question,"[66] to uphold the constitutionality of the legislation on the merits, or to toss it on the mile-high scrap heap of congressional dreams wrecked by that relentless engine Judicial Review.

II. The Power of Congress to Limit the Scope and Subject Matter of an Article V National Convention

The problem of delineating congressional power[67] springs from the difficulty in reconciling the express language of article V with the purpose the convention procedure is intended to serve. If the Framers intended to eliminate Congress entirely from the alternative amendment process, the language of article V is uncharacteristically misleading. The article clearly establishes an important role for Congress in the convention process. For example, before a convention can be assembled Congress must first perform an affirmative act in calling for it.[68] It is also Congress and not the convention that determines how amendments proposed by the convention shall be ratified by the States.[69]

On the other hand, the convention procedure was intended to be an alternative to Congress.[70] Therefore, a search for that proper degree of control that Congress may exert over the convention involves balancing the unambiguous language of article V against the intent of the Framers that the two methods of proposing amendments be genuine alternatives.

The desire of some to have Congress limit the scope and subject matter of a national convention is undoubtedly rooted in the age-old fear of the "runaway" convention.[71] This apprehension is most likely engendered by the rather embarassing realization that our own political

66. See text accompanying notes 130-34 infra.

67. Discussion of Congress' power to limit the convention should focus upon procedural rather than substantive aspects of the amendment process. There are few constitutional restrictions on the substantive content of a constitutional amendment. See text accompanying notes 154-55 infra. Procedural uncertainties are the source of difficulty. Thus, the subject-matter validity of an amendment proposed by convention must be determined in its procedural context.

68. U.S. Const. art. V.

69. Id.

70. See text accompanying notes 25-33 supra.

71. See, e.g., Forkosch, The Alternative Amending Clause in Article V: Reflections and Suggestions, 51 Minn. L. Rev. 1053, 1077 (1967).

59-609 O - 80 - 55

system is acually the product of clearly ultra vires acts committed by a small group of federalist partisans meeting secretly in Philadelphia in 1787.[72] In complete disregard of the Articles of Confederation and their congressional mandate,[73] the delegates to the Philadelphia Convention wrote an entirely new constitution, "the product of a revolution, bloodless though it was."[74] Members of the convention later frankly admitted that the Convention had acted beyond the scope of its authority, but defended the procedure on grounds of absolute necessity.[75] The fear that modern-day convention delegates might fancy themselves similarly inspired has led many to conclude that Congress should protect the nation from such a convention by requiring the States to disclose in their applications the general subject matter or problem area to be considered by the convention.[76] As a corollary to this point, advocates of a limited convention would have Congress refuse to submit for ratification any proposed amendments that deal with any other issue. Others vigorously insist that Congress has no such power.[77]

This latter group stresses the need for the convention to remain independent of Congress.[78] They acknowledge Congress' function in calling the convention and prescribing the mode of ratification, but contend that any other authority Congress may have is limited strictly to routine "housekeeping" functions such as providing for the date, place and financing of the convention.[79] Arguably the purpose of the alternative amendment process would be defeated if Congress could impose substantive restraints disguised as procedure that would effectively block state access to the process or that would allow Congress to ob-

72. See, e.g., Carson, Disadvantages of a Federal Constitutional Convention, 66 MICH. L. REV. 921, 925 (1968).

73. The mandate of the Philadelphia Convention was expressly limited to proposing amendments to the existing Articles of Confederation. See text accompanying note 16 supra.

74. L. ORFIELD, supra note 8, at 10.

75. Martig, Amending the Constitution Article V: The Keystone of the Arch, 35 MICH. L. REV. 1253, 1257 (1937).

76. See, e.g., Bonfield, supra note 18; Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcomm. on Separation of Powers of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 233 (1967) (memorandum from Philip B. Kurland to Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr.); id. at 46 (remarks of Professor Wallace Mendelson); id. at 36 (remarks of Theodore C. Sorenson).

77. See, e.g., id. at 231 (letter from Alexander M. Bickel to Professor Philip B. Kurland); Black, supra note 17.

78. Professor Black contends that the idea that article V conventions can and ought to be limited in scope is "a child of the twentieth century." Black, Amending the Constitution: A Letter to a Congressman, 82 YALE L.J. 189, 203 (1972).

79. See, e.g., Hearings on S. 2307, supra note 76, at 7 (statement of Senator Hruska).

struct amendments with which it disagreed.[80] Therefore, the autonomy of the convention must be preserved,[81] and Congress must not impose restrictions inconsistent with the implied requirements of article V.[82]

This position finds some support in the debates of the Philadelphia Convention and in the language of article V itself. The phrase "convention for proposing Amendments,"[83] using the plural form of the noun, indicates that the convention might be able to propose as many amendments as it finds necessary and that Congress is constitutionally unable to restrict this right.[84] Furthermore, it can be argued that the Constitution's draftsmen never intended article V to be so narrowly construed as to limit the power of the convention to propose more than one amendment.[85]

Proponents of an unlimited convention have, in addition, generally taken the position that Congress may not limit the constitutional effect of state applications to the subject or issue, if any, stated therein as the motivation for requesting a convention. Thus, all state applications, regardless of subject, should be counted together in computing the two-thirds requirement.[86] In 1929 the state legislature of Wisconsin concluded that a constitutional convention was long overdue,[87] in the process taking the argument to its extreme. The legislature passed a joint resolution[88] reminding Congress that since the first petition filed in 1788,[89] a sufficient number of state applications had been submitted to Congress in the intervening one hundred forty-one years so that, when counted all together, the two-thirds requirement was satisfied.[90] The more reasonable inference is that "such petitions must be pre-

80. Note, Proposed Legislation on the Convention Method of Amending the United States Constitution, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1612, 1618 (1972).

81. Platz, Article V of the Federal Constitution, 3 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 17, 46 (1934).

82. Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 80, at 1618.

83. U.S. CONST. art. V (emphasis added).

84. Forkosch, supra note 71, at 1075.

85. Id. at 1076.

86. See, e.g., L. ORFIELD, supra note 8, at 42; W. Pullen, supra note 14, at 155.

87. Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW. 185, 195 (1951). See also 71 CONG. REC. 3369 (1929).

88. STATE OF WISCONSIN JOINT RESOLUTION 83 (Sept. 23, 1929), FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS, S. Doc. No. 78, 71st Cong., 2d Sess. 32 (1930).

89. See generally W. Pullen, supra note 14, at 145.

90. The resolution then requested "that the Congress of the United States perform the mandatory duty imposed upon it by the above quoted Article V and forthwith call a convention to propose amendments to the constitution of the United States. . . ." STATE OF WISCONSIN JOINT RESOLUTION 83, supra note 88, at 32.

sented within a sufficiently reasonable time to justify the belief that they represented the state of public sentiment at the time."[91]

The arguments put forward by those who find in article V a requirement for an unlimited convention reveal a certain fascination for the concept of a national convention and betray an exaggerated notion of the proper powers of a truly constitutional convention. As Cyril Brickfield has noted, "[t]hose who deny that Congress has the power to bind a convention rely heavily on the so-called doctrine of 'conventional sovereignty.' "[92] And as Senator Heyburn explained on the floor of the Senate in 1911: "When the people of the United States meet in a constitutional convention there is no power to limit their action. They are greater than the Constitution, and they can repeal the provision that limits the right of amendment. They can repeal every section of it, because they are the peers of the people who made it."[93]

Supporters of this doctrine of conventional sovereignty attempt to soothe fears of a runaway convention by correctly pointing out that a convention can only propose amendments, not ratify them.[94] Although the convention would have no power to change the Constitution, it would have the complete power to propose changes. Therefore, when one speaks of an "unlimited convention" this means only that the Convention would be free to propose amendments on any subject it saw fit. Ratification of these proposals by the States would still be required.

---

91. Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 ILL. L. REV. 782, 794 (1927). See also Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 375 (1921); text accompanying notes 19-20 supra.

92. C. BRICKFIELD, supra note 13, at 16.

93. 46 CONG. REC. 2769 (1911). Cyril Brickfield has noted that

> [a]ccording to this [Heyburn's] theory, a convention is, in effect, a premier assembly of the people, a representative body charged by the people with the duty of framing the basic law of the land, for which purpose there devolves upon it all the power which the people themselves possess. In short, that for the particular business of amending and revising our Constitution, the convention is possessed of sovereign powers and therefore is supreme to all other Government branches or agencies.

C. BRICKFIELD, supra note 13, at 16.

94. The power of the convention is thus viewed as equal to, but not greater than that of Congress. The convention can only set into motion the amendment process in the same sense as Congress, which is free at any time to propose any amendment whatever upon which two-thirds of both Houses agree. "Why does not this Congress amend in every conceivable manner the Constitution . . . ? It can propose amendments all over the place if it wants to. Why does not this Congress run away in its effort to amend the Constitution? Common sense and good faith restrains it. For the same reason I would be very confident and extend every good faith to the representatives in a national convention." 113 CONG. REC. 10113 (1967) (remarks of Senator Hruska). See also Hearings on S. 2307, supra note 11, at 7.

On the other hand, a compelling argument can be made that the power of amendment in article V is itself constitutionally limited.[95] This approach sees article V as only one part of a fragile and delicately balanced political structure in which the equilibrium between article V's express language and the need for an independent convention is more properly weighted in favor of greater congressional control. Thus Congress should have the power to restrict the convention to those amendments that dealt with the general issue or problem that had inspired two-thirds of the States to call for a convention.[96]

The conceptual framework for this approach to article V appears in Judge Jameson's classic treatise on constitutional conventions.[97] Central to Jameson's analysis in his distinction between the revolution-

---

95. One of the first acts of the fledgling Congress under the new Constitution was designed to make clear that the overall authority of the Constitution was superior to the power to amend contained in article V. In 1789, reacting to amendments proposed by James Madison, Roger Sherman objected to the idea of interweaving amendments into the text of the original Constitution, urging that the latter sprang from a higher authority than the amending power. 1 ANNALS OF CONG. 707-08 (1789). Accordingly, Sherman suggested that the original text of the Constitution be left undisturbed, and that amendments be proposed as supplementary to it. Id. Sherman's proposal eventually prevailed, and the precedent thus created has been followed ever since. Amendments appear as additions to the original document, as is illustrated, by way of example, by the eleventh amendment, which clearly supersedes the original language of portions of article III.

96. Within this general area the convention would have a free hand to propose any amendment it felt necessary to resolve the problem. Outside that area the convention would have no power to act, and Congress might justifiably refuse to submit to the States for ratification any ultra vires amendment proposal. See, e.g., STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82D CONG., 2D SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS ON FEDERAL TAX RATES 16 (Comm. Print 1952).

The Ervin Bill, discussed in note 63 supra, would require a valid state application to specify "the nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed," S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. § 2 (1973), and would give Congress the power to refuse to submit for ratification an amendment proposed by the convention "because such proposed amendment relates to or includes a subject which differs from or was not included among the subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called . . . ." Id. § 11(b)(1)(B).

The Ervin Bill is likewise careful to preserve the right of a state to call for a general revision of the Constitution. S. REP. No. 293, supra note 31, at 1. Those who favor a limited convention do not deny or doubt a power in the States to call for a wide-open convention to propose amendments which, if ratified, would amount to a general revision of the Constitution. They do insist, however, that a general convention should not be called unless the States expressly ask for one. That is, there should be general popular dissatisfaction with the Constitution and a national consensus for wide-ranging reform. Such a consensus should not be inferred from the fact that two-thirds of the States had applied for a convention on a variety of different subjects. See, e.g., Hearings on S. 2307, supra note 11, at 67 (remarks of Professor Bickel); Bonfield, supra note 18; Kauper, The Alternative Amendment Process: Some Observations, 66 MICH. L. REV. 903 (1968).

97. J. JAMESON, A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS (4th ed. 1887).

ary and the constitutional convention. A revolutionary convention > consists of those bodies of men who, in times of political crisis, assume, or have cast upon them, provisionally, the function of government. They either supplant or supplement the existing governmental organization. . . . [t]hey are not subaltern or ancillary to any other institution whatever, but lords paramount of the entire political domain. . . . In short, a Revolutionary Convention is simply a PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT.[98]

The Philadelphia Convention of 1787 meets all of Jameson's criteria for a revolutionary convention.[99] Likewise Jameson implies that most state constitutional conventions held during the independence movement were clearly revolutionary.[100]

In opposition to the revolutionary convention is the constitutional convention.

> It differs from the [revoluntary convention] in being, as its name implies, constitutional; not simply as having for its object the framing or amending of Constitutions, but as being within, rather than without, the pale of the fundamental law; as ancillary and subservient and not hostile and paramount to it. . . . It is charged with a definite, and not a discretionary and indeterminate, function. It always acts under a commission, for a purpose ascertained and limited by law or by custom. . . . It never supplants the existing organization. It never governs.[101]

Jameson then notes that the two concepts are mutually exclusive, and that a convention may not at the same time claim to be a constitutional convention while exercising revolutionary powers.[102] He objects to the doctrine of conventional sovereignty, calling it promotive of "a degree of omnipotence to which, in a government of law, there can be found no parallel, and which is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of American liberty."[103] Using Jameson's terminology, plainly article V contemplates a constitutional convention as opposed to a revolutionary one.[104]

---

98. Id. at 6.
99. Although Jameson is loath to admit it. See id. at 377-80.
100. Id. at 9.
101. Id. at 10.
102. Jameson contends that a convention which at any stage of its proceedings overreaches itself becomes ab initio a revolutionary convention. Id. at 10-11.
103. Id. at 15.
104. Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process, 66 MICH. L. REV. 949, 994 (1968). For example, Jameson postulates that the legislative branch retains considerable power over a convention. As to routine housekeeping matters, "it is in general the right and the duty of a legislature to prescribe when, and where, and how a Convention shall meet and proceed with its business. . . ." J. JAMESON, su-

The Jameson analysis is widely accepted,[105] for it blends more smoothly into our constitutional system and more accurately reflects both the expectations of the Framers and the practical realities of modern American politics. Properly understood, the power to amend the Constitution expressed by article V is a constitutionally limited power and can have only the effect that the Constitution, taken as a whole, permits.[106] The express limitations set out in the language of article V contradict the theory that the power to amend springs from the same source as the Constitution itself.

The Founding Fathers apparently felt that, although the Constitution was fundamentally sound, certain defects would be certain to emerge. Thus article V was included as a device by which the Constitution could be adapted to new realities and situations while leaving certain indispensable rights and freedoms undisturbed.[107] Hamilton in The Federalist remarked that "every amendment to the constitution, if once established, would be a single proposition, and might be pra note 97, at 365. On the broader question of congressional power generally, he refers to the legislative branch as "the sentinel on duty," charged with protecting the republic against a runaway convention, an obligation which the legislature "cannot rightfully abdicate." Id. Furthermore, the legislature, and only the legislature, "has a clear constitutional right, in its discretion, to prescribe the scope of duties of the Convention it calls. . . ." Id. at 364.

---

105. See, e.g., C. BRICKFIELD, supra note 13; Bonfield, supra note 104; Gilliam, Constitutional Conventions: Precedents, Problems, and Proposals, 16 ST. LOUIS U.L.J. 46 (1971).

106. See, e.g., Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 331, 347-49 (1855). Furthermore, the restrictions upon amendment imposed by article V itself contradict the theory that the power to amend springs from the same source as the Constitution. For example, article V clearly prohibited any amendment before 1808 which would have interfered with the African slave trade. Article V also forbids any amendment that would deprive any State of its equal representation in the Senate without its consent. Arguably the Senate could be reorganized on some basis other than equal representation for every State, but this could be accomplished only if every State in the Union consented to the change, for article V's prohibition applies only insofar as a change is attempted without the consent of a State. To illustrate, reorganization of the Senate on some basis otber than equal representation can be accomplished under the Constitution. Yet such a change cannot be made under the proposal/ratification procedure in article V. If only one State, for example, failed to ratify an amendment changing the representation formula of the Senate, then presumably that State could not be compelled to accept the change, even though ratified by three-fourths of the other States. Likewise, if all fifty States indicated their consent to the change in some manner acceptable to all, but different from the ratification process of article V, then such an expression of consent might be sufficient to amend effectively article I of the Constitution. The power and procedure of amendment under article V are thus not exclusive, reinforcing the idea that the power to amend is constitutionally limited.

107. Madison, in The Federalist, speaks of article V only in relation to the "amendment of errors," and suggests a constitutionally limited power of amendment by noting that the article is "under two exceptions." THE FEDERALIST No. 43, at 315 (B. Wright ed. 1961) (J. Madison) (emphasis added).

brought forward singly. . . . There can therefore be no comparison between the facility of effecting an amendment, and that of establishing in the first instance a complete constitution."[108]

When taken as a constitutionally limited power of amendment, article V must be made consistent with other powers created and distributed by the Constitution, and, in particular, the power to amend must be reconciled with the power of Congress. For example, although article V is silent on Congress' ability to restrict a convention, persuasive authority for the existence of such powers is found in the general grant of legislative authority in article I. The broad scope of the "necessary and proper"[109] clause was first sketched out in 1816 by the Supreme Court in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee.[110] The Court held that:

> The constitution unavoidably deals in general language. . . . Hence, its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving to the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mould and model the exercise of its powers, as its own wisdom, and the public interests, should require.[111]

As Chief Justice Marshall wrote for the Court three years later in McCulloch v. Maryland:[112]

> [T]here is no phrase in the Constitution which, like the articles of confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers; and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described.
>
> . . . .
>
> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional.[113]

One hundred two years later the Supreme Court applied the principles established in these two cases directly to the scope of congressional power in the amendment process. In Dillon v. Gloss[114] the Court held that the necessary and proper clause authorized Congress to impose time limits upon the ratification process.[115] Thus the as-

108. Id. No. 85, at 545 (A. Hamilton).
109. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8.
110. 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304 (1816).
111. Id. at 326-27.
112. 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).
113. Id. at 406, 421.
114. 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
115. "As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal

sumption that Congress has a broad power to fashion the ground rules for the convention and to prescribe basic procedures is well founded.[116]

There is, then, a close relationship between the principal congressional power conferred under article V and the supporting or ancillary powers, conferred under the necessary and proper clause, to execute the principal power.[117] Without this supporting power, the principal power could not exist.[118] These powers apply not only to procedural functions such as calling the convention, but also extend to the vital function of determining the ultimate scope of the convention.[119]

Although the unlimited convention concept does attempt to guarantee a convention as independent of Congress as is constitutionally possible, in doing so it rides roughshod over an equally compelling element of the amendment process. As noted above,[120] regardless of the procedure used, the Framers clearly intended that amendments be proposed only when there exists a broad national consensus for change. While the two-thirds supermajority required before Congress may propose amendments is a proper measure of this consensus, an independent, wide-open convention could easily be the source of proposals that reflect no national consensus at all. Accordingly, the notion that all state applications should be counted together in computing the two-thirds requirement for a convention seems to contradict the need for a national consensus. Equally inconsistent is the argument that the convention, once assembled, is free to propose amendments on any subject it chooses.[121] Manifestly, it is more reasonable to conclude that Congress, having been delegated the exclusive authority to call the conwith subsidiary matters of detail as the public interests and changing conditions may require; and Article V is no exception to the rule." Id. at 376 (footnote omitted).

---

116. Kauper, supra note 96, at 906. "The national legislature is obviously the most appropriate body for exercising a supervisory authority, for the duty to call a convention necessarily embraces the authority to determine whether the conditions which create the duty are satisfied." Id. at 906-07.

117. C. BRICKFIELD, supra note 13, at 19.

118. Id.

119. Id.

120. See text accompanying notes 19-20 supra.

121. As a 1952 House Judiciary Committee Staff Report concluded,

> To argue that Congress must launch the cumbersome, costly, and confusing proceedings of a national convention whenever 32 States fortuitously submit resolutions requesting a convention for one purpose or another does not seem sound when viewed from a realistic standpoint. . . . [T]o transform every petition asking for a specific remedial amendment into a request for a general convention by classifying it with every other application asking for constitutional change would constitute a strained interpretation of article V wholly at variance with the present needs and desires of the States.

STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, supra note 96, at 11.

vention, has the power to see to it that all required elements of the amendment process, including the national consensus, are present before issuing such a call. Practically speaking, Congress should not count all applications together regardless of timeliness or subject matter. Moreover, Congress should require that the nature of a particular problem be stated in the language of the state application and should refuse to submit for ratification amendments proposed by the convention unrelated to that problem. Only in this way can the Constitution's national consensus requirement be fulfilled. The independence of the convention can be protected by giving the convention a totally free hand to propose any and all amendments it deems necessary that reasonably relate to the general problem area or subject matter stated in the applications.

Ironically, the wide-open convention approach, which in the abstract seems to facilitate the convention mode of proposing amendments, would in all probability have precisely the opposite effect.[122] States that desire constitutional changes only within a particular problem area will be more reluctant to petition Congress for a convention if they know that their limited applications will be counted together with others dealing with completely different subjects.[123]

In conclusion, an analysis of congressional power over the alternative procedure of article V must take into account the three requisite conditions in the amendment process: perfection, national consensus, and deliberation and debate over a national forum. Additionally, the independence of the convention from Congress must be preserved. Both the congressional and convention procedures satisfy the national forum requirement. The unlimited convention approach emphasizes the independence of the convention, but in so doing loses sight of the need for national consensus, thereby creating the possibility that the perfection of the amendment process will be spoiled by the proposal of amendments that do not reflect the national mood. The proper balance between congressional power and conventional independence can be achieved, however, by an acknowledgement of the power of Congress to limit the subject matter of the convention, but a denial of any power in Congress to interfere with or limit the convention in pro-

122. See, e.g., Ervin, supra note 60, at 883.

123. "Indeed, the usefulness of the alternative amendment procedure as a means of dealing with a specific grievance on the part of the states will be defeated if the states are told that it can be invoked only at the price of subjecting the nation to all the problems, expense, and risks involved in having a wide open constitutional convention." Kauper, supra note 96, at 911-12; see, e.g., S. REP. No. 293, supra note 31, at 9.

posing any and all amendments within that general area. This analysis, it is submitted, successfully integrates all relevant policy considerations germane to the amendment process generally and would provide a climate in which the states could take advantage of the alternative process with hope for success and without fear of provoking a serious constitutional crisis.[124]

III. The Courts and Article V

A. Introduction

The second great mystery shrouding article V involves the latent power of the federal courts over a constitutional convention. The powers of Congress must be considered in light of the justiciability of issues arising under article V, for it is in the courts that the issue of congressional authority will finally be decided. Should the courts find these issues justiciable, any attempt by Congress to control the convention will most surely be made in anticipation of how the Supreme Court might react. On the other hand, if these problems are found non-justiciable, the only check upon congressional power will be the good faith of Congress itself.[125]

At first blush it seems axiomatic that the great constitutional issues raised by article V are within the scope of the judicial power. There are those who suggest that an issue is rightly before a federal court when its resolution depends upon the construction of the laws or Constitution[126] of the United States,[127] for "the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution . . . ."[128] Under this view, any question involving the amendment procedure in

---

124. This is the approach taken by the Ervin Bill, S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973), discussed in note 63 supra. See also S. Rep. No. 293, supra note 31, at 6-7.

125. Concededly, the Congress cannot be forced by the courts or by the provisions of this bill to convene a convention when the constitutional prerequisites have been satisfied. And since the obligation to call the convention is given to Congress, neither the President nor the Supreme Court could act in its stead. However, every Member of Congress has taken an oath to support the Constitution and it is inconceivable that Congress would refuse to perform its duty. No adequate argument has been brought forth to suggest a different conclusion.

S. Rep. No. 293, supra note 31, at 9.

126. "[T]he basic operating principle of American federalism [is] that the ultimate determination of federal constitutional questions rests with the Supreme Court of the United States . . . ." Swindler, The Current Challenge to Federalism: The Confederating Proposals, 52 Geo. L.J. 1, 38 (1963).

127. Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 379 (1821).

128. Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18 (1958).

article V presents a federal question that must ultimately be decided by the Supreme Court.[129]

But the issue of judicial authority and article V is not so easily resolved, for over the years the federal courts have imposed upon themselves restrictions in certain areas of constitutional law. The "political questions" doctrine,[130] for example, is a theory of judicial self-restraint whereby the courts refuse to find many constitutional issues[131] justiciable on the grounds that the subject matter involved is more suited to the "political departments" of the government.[132] Through the years the standards formulated by the Supreme Court for determining which issues present nonjusticiable political questions have reflected the Court's self-perception of its own authority. In 1962 the Court substantially revised its approach to political questions,[133] and the new guidelines[134] put forward have thickened the fog of uncertainty shadowing the justiciability of the amendment process.

To further exacerbate the problem, since there has never been an article V convention, the Supreme Court has never had reason to focus its attention directly upon the subject. However, the Court has on numerous occasions considered questions raised by the amendment process generally. As a result, an inquiry into the power of the judiciary over national conventions must proceed in two parts: first, a review of past cases in which the Supreme Court has ruled on issues regarding constitutional amendment generally; second, a bit of speculation as to how the Court might react to particular problems springing from a national convention.

---

129. In re Opinions of the Justices, 204 N.C. 806, 809, 172 S.E. 474, 476 (1933).

130. See generally C. WRIGHT, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF FEDERAL COURTS § 14 (2d ed. 1970); Scharpf, Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Anaiysis, 75 YALE L.J. 517 (1966).

131. For example, the Court has determined that the issue of the validity of the Constitution itself is non-justiciable. Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1, 39 (1849).

132. "The non-justiciability of a political question is founded primarily on the doctrine of separation of powers and the policy of judicial self-restraint." C. WRIGHT, supra note 130, § 14, at 45. See generally Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 164-66 (1803) (Marshall, C.J.).

133. E.g., Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

134. Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for non-judicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

Id. at 217.

B. Justiciability of the Amendment Process

Although state courts have almost uniformly held that the question of amendment of state constitutions is justiciable,[135] the federal courts have been somewhat less than confident in handling the subject, and the Supreme Court has left a trail of confusing decisions.[136] During the nineteenth century,[137] the drift of Supreme Court opinions tended toward nonjusticiability.[138] With the exception of a 1798 case,[139] in which neither the parties nor the Court considered the issue,[140] the Court generally was of the opinion that, with regard to constitutional amendments, "the judicial is bound to follow the action of the political department of the government, and is concluded by it."[141]

It was not until after the turn of the century that the Supreme Court tipped the scales of justiciability in the opposite direction.[142] The Court asserted its power in a number of cases to decide positively several issues of constitutional amendment law, obviously confident of its authority to pass upon both procedural and substantive aspects of the amendment process.[143]

---

135. See, e.g., Collier v. Frierson, 24 Ala. 100 (1854); Carton v. Secretary of State, 151 Mich. 337, 115 N.W. 429 (1908); Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39 (1874).

136. See, e.g., Annot., 122 A.L.R. 717 (1939); Annot., 87 A.L.R. 1321 (1933); Annot., 83 A.L.R. 1374 (1933).

137. The Supreme Court was for the first time confronted with the issue of the validity of a constitutional amendment in Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798). See note 140 infra.

138. In 1849, Chief Justice Taney strongly hinted that constitutional amendments presented nonjusticiable political questions. Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1, 39, 47 (1849). Nevertheless, in 1855 Justice Wayne concluded that the power to amend the Constitution is a constitutionally limited one. Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U.S. (18 How.) 331, 348 (1855). In 1871 the Court, in an aside, held that insofar as the validity of the Civil War Amendments was concerned, action by Congress was conclusive upon the courts. White v. Hart, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 646, 649 (1871).

139. Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

140. Neither party to the suit maintained that the issue of constitutional amendment ought to be a political question, and the Court, in its brief five-line opinion, did not discuss the problem. See, e.g., L. ORFIELD, supra note 8, at 7.

141. White v. Hart, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 646, 649 (1871).

142. First of the twentieth century amendment cases was Myers v. Anderson, 238 U.S. 368 (1915), in which it was argued that the fifteenth amendment was invalid insofar as it applied to state or municipal elections, on the grounds that when so applied the amendment had the effect of depriving the state of its equal representation in the Senate. Id. at 374. The Court ignored the point.

143. In Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920), the Court held that constitutional amendments can be ratified only in the manner provided for by Congress and that the role of the state legislature in the ratifying process is a federal function, derived not from the people of that State, but rather from the United States Constitution. The Court also reaffirmed Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798), that the decision of the Congress to propose an amendment to the States for ratification was not subject to the veto power of the President. See id. at 381 (the famous footnote by Justice

Perhaps the most important case in the area of justiciability of constitutional amendment issues came in 1939 in Coleman v. Miller.[144] This case involved the validity of Kansas' ratification of the proposed Child Labor Amendment and is significant in that the Court expressly found two areas of constitutional amendment law nonjusticiable. The Court held that the effect of a previous rejection of an amendment by a State "should be regarded as a political question."[145] The Court also held that the validity of a State's ratification of a proposed amendment nearly thirteen years after it had been proposed was also nonjusticiable.[146]

Chase).

Despite protests by the Solicitor General that the issues presented were nonjusticiable, in the National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920), the Court ruled that the substantive content of the eighteenth amendment was within the scope of the amendment power and that the amendment had been properly adopted. The Court also held that the required two-thirds vote in each house is a vote by two-thirds of those members present, presuming a quorum, and not a vote by two-thirds of the total elected membership.

Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921), held that constitutional amendments must be ratified within a reasonable time after they are proposed, and that Congress has the power to set a reasonable time limit upon the ratification process. Query: does Congress also have the power to set time limits for ratification of amendments proposed by convention?

Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126 (1922), and Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922), both involved the validity of the nineteenth amendment. In the former case the Court held that a taxpayer lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the amendment prior to its ratification by the States. In the latter case, the Court held that equal suffrage was a proper subject for amendment under article V, and restated the federal function of state legislatures in ratifying proposed amendments. At this point, however, the Court's engine of justiciability ran out of steam. The opinion revived the political question doctrine to hold that the proclamation of an amendment by the Secretary of State is conclusive upon the courts. Id. at 137.

In Druggan v. Anderson, 269 U.S. 36 (1925), the Court held that, although by its own terms the eighteenth amendment would not go into force until one year from the date of ratification, the amendment itself became effective upon its ratification. As a result, Congress was held to have power to legislate in anticipation of enforcement of the amendment and was not obliged to wait until the year had expired.

Six years later, in United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931), the Court rejected the argument that amendments dealing with personal rights and individual liberties must be ratified by state conventions rather than state legislatures. The Court expressly held that regardless of the substantive content of a proposed amendment, Congress has the unqualified power to choose the one or the other method of ratification. Id. at 732. More importantly, the language of the opinion is such as to induce the belief that the Court regarded the amending process as generally justiciable. L. ORFIELD, supra note 8, at 18.

The effect of the absolute repeal of a constitutional amendment was the issue in United States v. Chambers, 291 U.S. 217 (1934). The Court first took judicial notice of the ratification of the twenty-first amendment and then declared the eighteenth amendment "inoperative," id. at 223, holding that "neither the Congress nor the courts could give it continued vitality," id. at 222.

144. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

145. Id. at 450.

146. The Court distinguished Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921), by noting that

The case owes its fame, however, to the concurring opinion of Justice Black,[147] who contended that the entire constitutional amendment process was nonjusticiable:

> To the extent that the Court's opinion in the present case even impliedly assumes a power to make judicial interpretation of the exclusive constitutional authority of Congress over submission and ratification of amendments we are unable to agree.
>
> . . . The Court here treats the amending process of the Constitution in some respects as subject to judicial construction, in others as subject to the final authority of the Congress. . . . No such division between the political and judicial branches of the government is made by Article V which grants power over the amending of the Constitution to Congress alone. Undivided control of that process has been given by the Article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is "political" in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point.
>
> . . . .
>
> Congress, possessing exclusive power over the amending process, cannot be bound by and is under no duty to accept the pronouncements upon that exclusive power by this Court or by the Kansas courts. Neither state nor federal courts can review that power. Therefore, any judicial expression amounting to more than mere acknowledgment of exclusive Congressional power over the political process of amendment is a mere admonition to the Congress in the nature of an advisory opinion, given wholly without constitutional authority.[148] in Dillon the Court had merely upheld Congress' determination that seven years would be the maximum period for ratification. In Coleman, Congress had imposed no such time limit, and the Supreme Court was reluctant to provide one, concluding it lacked the proper criteria for such a determination. It held that the issue "can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment." 307 U.S. at 454.

---

In a fit of schizophrenia, however, the Court expressly declined to hold nonjustifiable whether the lieutenant governor is part of the "legislature" as contemplated by article V. The majority opinion noted that the Court was "equally divided" on the issue, and "therefore the Court expresses no opinion upon that point." Id. at 447. The practical difficulties presented by an "equally divided" nine-man Court are discussed, tongue-in-cheek, in Note, Sawing a Justice in Half, 48 YALE L.J. 1455 (1939). It appears, however, that no High Court prestidigitation was involved, for Mr. Justice McReynolds was absent on the day of decision. See, e.g., 28 GEO. L.J. 199, 200 n.7 (1939).

147. He was joined by Justices Roberts, Frankfurter and Douglas.

148. 307 U.S. at 458-60. Black and Douglas clung to their convictions in the companion case of Chandler v. Wise, 307 U.S. 474 (1939), where they stated in a concurring opinion that "we do not believe that state or federal courts have any jurisdiction to interfere with the amending process." Id. at 478.

The impact of Coleman v. Miller has been enormous. Some commentators have concluded, presumably on the basis of Black's concurring opinion, that the case stands for the complete repudiation of judicial power over the amendment process.[149] A number of lower federal courts have so interpreted the case.[150] However, viewed in its historical context and given the proliferation of opinions filed in the case, Coleman v. Miller more properly appears to offer extremely weak precedential authority for advocates of nonjusticiability. Since it did not overrule earlier cases such as Dillon v. Gloss,[151] and since the Court based its holding on the particular relevance of the economic and social issues involved, Coleman v. Miller clearly does not stand for the proposition that absolute nonjusticiability attaches to all questions related to the amendment process.[152] As Professor Orfield remarked, "[i]f the Supreme Court is not ready to apply the doctrine of political questions to all phases of the amending process . . . it will apply it to some phases of the amending process and what such phases are remains largely uncertain."[153]

In 1967 the Supreme Court again touched upon the substantive content of constitutional amendments. In Whitehill v. Elkins,[154] Justice Douglas observed that "the Constitution prescribes the method of 'alteration' by the amending process in Article V; and while the procedure for amending it is restricted, there is no restraint on the kind of amendment that may be offered."[155]

The cases thus reveal three distinct periods in which the attitude of the Supreme Court toward the justiciability of amendment issues has shifted to and fro. In the cases decided in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, with the exception of Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[156] the Court tended to view article V as a political issue. Then, in the nationwide turmoil over both the eighteenth and nineteenth amendments, the Court jumped headlong into the amendment business, apparently un-

149. See, e.g., Dixon, Article V: The Comatose Article of Our Living Constitution?, 66 MICH. L. REV. 931 (1968).

150. See, e.g., Maryland Petition Comm. v. Johnson, 265 F. Supp. 823 (D. Md. 1967); United States v. Gugel, 119 F. Supp. 897 (E.D. Ky. 1954).

151. 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

152. See Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 80, at 1636.

153. L. ORFIELD, supra note 8, at 36.

154. 389 U.S. 54 (1967).

155. Id. at 57.

156. 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798). But recall that the political question issue was not raised in this case. See text accompanying notes 145-46 supra.

moved by protests of nonjusticiability.[157] And then, just as suddenly, in Coleman v. Miller[158] the Court reversed its ground, reverting to the idea of nonjusticiability and political questions, and coming within a whisper of declaring all issues involving the amendment process beyond the scope of the judicial power. In the confused aftermath of Coleman v. Miller, the historical record of the Supreme Court can be all things to all men.

Advocates of nonjusticiability emphasize the uniqueness of the amendment process in that it provides the American people with their only means of correcting "errors" in the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Constitution.[159] They argue that since the only way to overturn an unpopular Supreme Court decision is by Constitutional amendment,[160] the Court and all lower federal courts should decline to interfere with the amendment process.

Those who favor justiciability insist that all questions of constitutional law should be resolved ultimately by the Supreme Court, and stress that the Court cannot be coerced into acting upon the basis of any amendment which it does not believe has the force of law.[161] Theoretically, the power to adjudicate amendments is identical to the power to declare laws unconstitutional.[162] Once the Court determines in good conscience that it does have jurisdiction, the argument continues, there is no power in the "political department" capable of stopping the judiciary from hearing the case and deciding the issue.[163]

In conclusion, it seems reasonable to assume the present inclination of the Supreme Court would be to favor justiciability. Since Coleman, the Court has reworked its entire conceptual approach to political questions.[164] Baker v. Carr,[165] for example, strongly suggests that the

157. See note 143 supra.
158. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
159. Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 80, at 1640 n.140.
160. Indeed, the eleventh, fourteenth, sixteenth and nineteenth amendments all operated to nullify prior Supreme Court decisions, and had the Child Labor Amendment been ratified, it would have had the same effect. See, e.g., I. BARRON & A. HOLTZHOFF, FEDERAL PRACTICE § 54.1, at 303 (C. Wright ed. 1960).
161. See Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414 (1944); United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128 (1872). See also Black, supra note 78, at 211.
162. L. ORFIELD, supra note 8, at 13.
163. "The issue is whether Congress may tell the courts, state or federal, that they may not inquire into certain issues of law, in cases where they do have jurisdiction. Unless the whole theory of Marbury v. Madison is wrong, it is inconceivable that Congress has such power." Black, supra note 78, at 211.
164. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962). See note 134 supra.
165. 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

Court will not remain the shrinking violet of the Coleman v. Miller era, and possibly forecasts an expanded role for the federal courts in previously uncharted "political thickets." It would appear that many potential amendment-related issues would not fall within the class held by Baker v. Carr to constitute political questions,[166] and in the Court's own words, "[u]nless one of these formulations is inextricable from the case at bar, there should be no dismissal for nonjusticiability . . . ."[167]

C. Justiciability of Issues Raised by National Conventions

The Supreme Court has never ruled directly on any aspect of the alternative amendment process. Should a national convention ever be called, however, there could arise any number of legal challenges to the power of the federal judiciary over that amendment procedure. For purposes of discussion, then, the amendment process in general will be presumed to be justiciable.[168] The discussion is thus left free to focus upon the particular problems raised by a constitutional convention and to speculate about which of these could ultimately be resolved in the courts.

A serious question looms at the very threshold: the power of the courts to compel the doing of an affirmative act by an elected Congress. This problem might arise in at least two obvious contexts: first, if Congress refused to call a convention, despite submission of a sufficient number of arguably valid state applications to warrant such an act; second, if Congress refused to submit proposed amendments for ratification on the grounds that the convention had exceeded its authority. In these situations, can Congress be forced to act?

As to the initial calling of the convention, it was without question the understanding of the Framers that the duty imposed upon the Congress in article V is mandatory rather than discretionary.[169] The express language of article V requires that Congress "shall call a Convention."[170] In Martin v. Hunter's Lessee,[171] the Supreme Court con-166. See generally Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 80.

167. 369 U.S. at 217.
168. See text accompanying notes 130-34 supra.
169. "[T]he national rulers, whenever nine states concur, will have no option upon the subject. . . . The words of this article [V] are peremptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence, all the declamation about the disinclination to a change vanishes in air." THE FEDERALIST No. 85, at 546 (B. Wright ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton) (emphasis added).
170. U.S. CONST. art. V (emphasis added).
171. 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304 (1816).

strued the word "shall" in its constitutional context as having mandatory effect.[172] As a result, a number of commentators have generalized that in the two circumstances mentioned above, a coercive writ of mandamus should issue to compel Congress in the first instance, to call the convention, and later to submit all amendments proposed by the convention to the States for ratification.[173] During the height of the reapportionment controversy,[174] when it seemed inevitable that two-thirds of the States would apply for a convention, Senators Dirksen and Hruska vigorously argued for such a broad interpretation of the judicial power,[175] citing as authority Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison.[176] They claimed that Marbury stood for mandamus as a proper remedy to compel the doing of nondiscretionary, purely ministerial acts.[177] At least one authority has concluded that given a refusal by Congress to perform the acts required of it by article V, the Supreme Court itself should call the convention.[178]

This position distorts and exaggerates the power of the federal judiciary and brutalizes the doctrine of separation of powers. The Supreme Court, in contrast, has traditionally upheld the inherent limitations upon the judiciary. In Mississippi v. Johnson,[179] the Court, in refusing to enjoin President Andrew Johnson from executing certain Reconstruction Acts, held that "the Congress is the legislative department of the government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial Department. . . ."[180] Accordingly, the courts have never issued an injunction or

---

172. "[W]henever a particular object is to be effected, the language of the constitution is always imperative, and cannot be disregarded, without violating the first principles of public duty." Id. at 327-33.

173. See, e.g., Carson, supra note 72; Dirksen, supra note 59; Packard, Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program, 30 CHI.-KENT L. REV. 128 (1952); Tuller, A Convention to Amend the Constitution—Why Needed—How May It Be Obtained?, CXCIII N. AM. REV. 369 (1911).

174. See text accompanying notes 50-63 supra.

175. See, e.g., Dirksen, supra note 59; 113 CONG. REC. 12267 (1967) (remarks of Senator Hruska).

176. 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803).

177. See, e.g., 113 CONG. REC. 12272 (1967) (remarks of Senator Hruska).

178. "A deliberate refusal on the part of Congress to call a convention, once the requisite number of state applications were in hand, may be expected, by enlarged analogy to what has been done in the recent civil rights cases and what is being proposed in the electoral apportionment cases, to bring into play the powers of the Supreme Court to direct the setting up of the national convention." Carson, supra note 72, at 921. But cf. Kauper, supra note 96, at 906 ("I find it difficult to believe that the Supreme Court would . . . take it upon itself to prescribe the procedures for a convention").

179. 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1866).

180. Id. at 500.

writ of mandamus directly against the President or the Congress.[181]

The better view is that article V imposes an "imperfect obligation"[182] upon Congress in which the duty is defined, but the sanction is withheld. Accordingly, while Congress has a clear constitutional obligation under article V, the courts will not compel the discharge of that duty.[183] The proper remedy for congressional inaction is that which congressmen know best and fear most—the ballot box.[184]

In a similar vein, the power of the courts to enjoin the proceedings of the convention once assembled poses a crucial problem. Numerous charges could be raised to present an attractive case for injunctive relief. For example, it could be alleged that the petitions used as a basis

---

181. Bonfield, supra note 18, at 672. As Professor Dodd has written:

> Although there are elements of judicial enforceability in certain constitutional provisions requiring affirmative legislative action, these elements are usually not present, and where they are, courts are loath to take advantage of them. In general, therefore, constitutional provisions that the legislature "shall" do a certain thing are equivalent to statements that the legislature "may" or "shall have the power." The Federal Constitution provides that Congress, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments" to the constitution, but there is no compulsion upon Congress to call a convention.

Dodd, Judicially Non-enforceable Provisions of Constitutions, 80 U. PA. L. REV. 54, 82 (1931).

182. Chafee, Congressional Reapportionment, 42 HARV. L. REV. 1015, 1018 (1929).

183. Wheeler, supra note 91, at 792. It has been suggested that the doctrine established in Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1866), has not been scrupulously observed. See, e.g., Gilliam, supra note 105, who suggests that subsequent Supreme Court cases have seriously eroded the separation of powers doctrine. Id. at 51 n.35. Examples of such cases, suggests Gilliam, are Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952) (President Truman held without power to seize steel mills during Korean conflict; Secretary of Commerce enjoined from enforcing Executive Order to that effect); Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969) (Congress' exclusion of Powell held improper; although Court barred from issuing direct order to members of Congress, Speech and Debate Clause does not prevent action by Court against legislative employees charged with unconstitutional activity). These two cases, along with Dombrowski v. Eastland, 387 U.S. 82 (1967); United States v. Johnson, 383 U.S. 169 (1966); Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367 (1951); Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168 (1880), seem to suggest, in their cumulative effect, that whenever the Supreme Court desires a particular response from a coequal branch of government, a proper party can be found against whom the Court can act to achieve its purpose. Indeed in Powell v. McCormack, supra, the Court left open the frightening prospect of action directly against members of Congress: "we need not decide whether under the Speech and Debate Clause petitioners would be entitled to maintain this action solely against members of Congress where no agents participated in the challenged action and no other remedy was available." Id. at 506 n.26. The Court, it should be noted, still has stopped short of ever ordering a coequal branch or its agents to perform a positive, affirmative act. Both Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, supra, and Powell v. McCormack, supra, involved essentially negative directives. See Dixon, supra note 149.

184. As the Supreme Court held in Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946), "[t]he Constitution has left the performance of many duties in our governmental scheme to depend on the fidelity of the executive and legislative action and, ultimately, on the vigilance of the people in exercising their political rights." Id. at 556.

for the convention were invalid in some respect, or that the convention had acted wrongfully or was about to usurp powers not granted to it by the Constitution.

State courts that have considered this problem in the state constitutional convention context have concluded that there exists no provision for court supervision of constitutional conventions, and that the state courts will not anticipate the action of a proposed convention or control it when assembled.[185] That the convention has full control of its proceedings has also been held,[186] but these decisions have not had the effect of precluding subsequent judicial review by state courts of the validity of the convention's work product.[187] In the federal scheme, Professor Orfield views an article V national convention as essentially a fourth branch of government, co-equal with the judiciary and thus entitled to the same respect and autonomy as the executive and legislative branches.[188] Orfield suggests that just as injunctive relief against another branch of government is beyond the power of the courts, these same limitations would apply to a national convention.[189]

Although the Supreme Court would most likely not compel a co-equal branch of government either to do or to stop doing a thing, the federal courts could nevertheless rule upon constitutional issues presented by article V, yet refrain from upsetting the separation of powers equilibrium by exercising their power to "declare the rights and other legal relations of any interested party seeking such declaration, whether or not further relief is or could be sought."[190] In cases in which the courts felt that an issue raised by article V was properly justiciable, they could hand down declaratory judgments. The courts would presumably rely upon the good faith of the parties to give such judgments their full effect. If Congress' only justification for refusing to call a convention were that the constitutional requirements of article V had not been met, a declaration by the Supreme Court that the requirements had in fact been satisfied would undermine the excuse.[191] Pressure upon Congress to call the convention in light of such a decision would be

185. Wheeler, supra note 91, at 800.
186. Id. at 800-01.
187. Bonfield, supra note 18, at 672-73.
188. L. ORFIELD, supra note 8, at 47-48.
189. Id.
190. Declaratory Judgments Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201-02 (1970). See also FED. R. CIV. P. 57. For a general review of declaratory judgments in the federal scheme see C. WRIGHT, supra note 130, § 100.
191. Note, 85 HARV. L. REV., supra note 80, at 1644.

well-nigh irresistible. In Powell v. McCormack,[192] the Supreme Court ruled that despite article I, section 5 of the Constitution,[193] Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., of New York was entitled to a declaratory judgment that he had been unlawfully excluded from the House of Representatives for the Ninetieth Congress. The Court said that a "court may grant declaratory relief even though it chooses not to issue an injunction or mandamus."[194] Thus, although the courts may lack power to compel Congress to act, this lack of authority should not deter the use of declaratory relief to decide justiciable article V issues.

The Ervin Bill[195] attempts to bar all judicial review of its provisions by insisting that constitutional issues "shall be determinable by the Congress of the United States and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal Courts."[196] However, there is serious question of the effectiveness and constitutionality of this approach. The Congress has considerable power over the jurisdiction of lower federal courts, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and the jurisdiction of state courts when federal questions are involved.[197] However, Congress has no power to expand or limit

---

192. 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

193. This section assigns to each house of Congress the exclusive power to judge the elections and qualifications of its members, and to punish them for disorderly conduct. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 5.

194. 395 U.S. at 499. Some pages later the Court elaborated upon the appropriateness of declaratory relief under the circumstances:

> Respondents do maintain, however, that this case is not justiciable because, they assert, it is impossible for a federal court to "mold effective relief for resolving this case." . . . We need express no opinion about the appropriateness of coercive relief in this case, for petitioners sought a declaratory judgment, a form of relief the District Court could have issued . . . . The availability of declaratory relief depends upon whether there is a live dispute between the parties, . . . and a request for declaratory relief may be considered independently of whether other forms of relief are appropriate.

Id. at 517-18.

195. S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973).

196. Id. §§ 3(b), 5(c), 10(b), 13(c).

197. [H]aving a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers.

> . . . .
>
> . . . [T]he statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction, cannot be in conflict with the Constitution, unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.
>
> Such has been the doctrine held by this court since its first establishment. To enumerate all the cases in which it has either been directly advanced or tacitly assumed would be tedious and unnecessary.

Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 441, 449 (1850). Likewise, in Kline v. Burke Constr. Co., 260 U.S. 226, 234 (1922), the Court noted that "Only the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is derived directly from the Constitution. Every other court created by the general government derives its jurisdiction wholly from the authority of Congress." See generally C. WRIGHT, supra note 130, § 10; Hart, The Power of Congress to Limit the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.[198] Thus if the Ervin Bill should be enacted, it would clearly be ineffective to bar an original suit in the Supreme Court in which a State were a party.[199] For example, should a State, whose application for a convention was rejected as inadequate under the Ervin Bill object to the provisions of that bill as unconstitutional, presumably that State could bring suit in the Supreme Court to have its application declared valid under article V. Since there would be both a federal question and a State as a party involved, such a suit would fall squarely within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.[200] Further, since the Court cannot be made to apply a rule of law which it finds unconstitutional,[201] congressional attempts to exclude judicial review or limit the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court would be ineffective. This fact is of critical importance, for at various stages in the alternative amendment process, it is probable that the States which have petitioned Congress for a convention will be the parties most likely to challenge any act or lack of action by Congress which such States feel interferes with their prerogatives under article V.

The question of justiciability of the amendment process generally and of the alternative amendment procedure specifically remains unsettled. Likewise the power of Congress to limit judicial review of issues arising under article V is restricted, and in an important class of cases, that power is ineffective. The scope of the judicial power over the amendment process is today so poorly defined that no one, for any purpose, should presume that the federal courts will not play an important role in the future development of article V.

IV. NOSTRUM

In retrospect, perhaps the most striking feature of the above discussion is the sharp disagreement among legal scholars regarding the distribution and scope of the amendment power, particularly with the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: an Exercise in Dialectic, 66 HARV. L. REV. 1362 (1953).

---

198. E.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803). Wright also points out that the Supreme Court has always understood that the constitutional grant of original jurisdiction is self-executing, and thus Congress cannot take it away. C. WRIGHT, supra note 130, § 10.

199. U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2.

200. For a general review of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court see C. WRIGHT, supra note 130, §§ 109-10.

201. E.g., Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414 (1944); United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128 (1871).

respect to the convention procedure. Indeed, on the subject of constitutional conventions, the Constitution is either textually ambiguous or provocatively mum. In truth, then, no one really knows how to amend the Constitution by convention, and among those who claim to know, there are general differences of opinion on even the most fundamental propositions. Accordingly, the debate and discussion concerning article V has resolved nothing, but has instead merely isolated the major points of controversy.

In a word, the alternative amendment procedure is "imperfect"; and as such it is repugnant to the first of the three essential prerequisites for amendment discussed earlier.[202] Our present "imperfect" understanding of the convention procedure could forever cloud the legitimacy of any amendment proposed and ratified under this process. The underlying political environment, if cankered by extreme partisanship on some issue of basic concern, could poison the amendment process; and should any sizable portion of the people become convinced that a constitutional amendment was wrongfully adopted or rejected, respect for the authority of the Constitution generally would be undermined.

Clearly some sort of action is required which will clarify the convention procedure and remove the element of risk which has so long forestalled full participation by the States in the amendment process. Now is a most propitious time to formulate policies for change, for there is at present no major nationwide effort by the States to have a convention called.[203] This situation permits the convention process to be examined on its own merits, and not merely as the means to a particular end. The lack of any serious ongoing movement to call a convention enables reform of article V to proceed without suspicion of the true motives of the reformers.

Recent efforts to reform the alternative amendment procedure have focused upon Congress. The Ervin Bill[204] reflects the confidence of many that Congress can solve most of the troublesome problems legislatively. A recent report of the American Bar Association,[205]

202. See text accompanying notes 17-24 supra.

203. The busing controversy could, however, provoke such an effort in the near future. See note 64 supra.

204. S. 1272, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973), discussed in notes 61-63, 96 and accompanying text supra.

205. SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION STUDY COMMITTEE, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION BY THE CONVENTION METHOD UNDER ARTICLE V (1974).

while suggesting that certain portions of the Ervin Bill warrant substantial revision,[206] concludes nevertheless that legislation by Congress is the proper vehicle for article V reform.[207] However, the power of Congress is too often overstated, and the general confidence in this power is misplaced. Acts of Congress will prove ultimately inadequate for at least two reasons.

First, the present Congress has no power through legislation to bind and limit the discretion of future Congresses. While legislation presently enacted may prove entirely satisfactory for the time being, such legislation would remain subject to revision or repeal at any time. Legislation today cannot eliminate the possibility that some future Congress, confronted with a strong movement to have a convention called, might suddenly enact new legislation, in effect changing the rules to make the convention more difficult to obtain.

Secondly, it begs the question to assert that Congress can resolve article V problems when the power of Congress to interfere in the convention process is itself a focal point of controversy. Any attempt by Congress to regulate the alternative amendment procedure inevitably will raise the question of the power of Congress to do so, serving only to further complicate the issue.

Greater direction and guidance from the Constitution itself is most obviously lacking, and is consequently most desperately required. Since the alternative amendment procedure in article V is imperfect, attention should focus directly upon article V and not upon Congress. In short, the Constitution should be amended to "perfect" article V.[208] Only when the resolution of problems in the convention procedure carries with it the full force and authority of the Constitution will amendment by convention become the genuine alternative to Congress it was intended to be.[209]

---

206. In particular, the ABA report would amend the Ervin Bill to provide clearly for federal court jurisdiction of controversies arising under article V without regard to the amount in controversy. Id. at 57.

207. Id. at 7-9.

208. The idea of amending article V relative to the convention procedure is certainly not a new one. See, e.g., note 53 and accompanying text supra. Past attempts to amend article V, however, have always arisen in the context of some other, more immediate political issue. Amending article V has most often been suggested as a secondary device to achieve a primary political purpose. The time has now come for article V to be considered on its own merits.

209. This point, as does this entire comment, presumes that the alternative amendment procedure should be preserved. This commentator rejects arguments suggesting that the convention procedure is a mere historical relic and should be scrapped entirely, leaving the congressional mode as the sole means of proposing constitutional amend-

Congress should propose and the States should ratify a constitutional amendment expanding and clarifying article V. The following language illustrates what such an amendment might attempt to do.[210]

ARTICLE V.

SECTION I. The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution.

SECTION 2. Upon the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States within any_____-year period, Congress shall call a Convention which shall have the power to propose Amendments to this Constitution; provided that Congress shall not have power to call a Convention except upon such application, and

a. such Applications shall
   i. reasonably reflect a common desire for amendment upon a particular subject, or
   ii. shall reflect a common desire to amend in a general manner the provisions of this Constitution; and provided further that

b. in issuing the call for a Convention, Congress shall
   i. provide for the total number of delegates, the manner of their selection, and the apportionment of their number among the several States, and
   ii. specify the date, time and place of the first meeting of the Convention, and
   iii. fix the compensation of the delegates and provide for the expenses of the Convention, to be paid from the Treasury.

A convention called under this Article shall not remain in session beyond the expiration of the Congress which originally called it into session, except whenever two-thirds of both Houses of that Congress shall deem it necessary, and then only for a term not to exceed that of the next-elected Congress.

When, under rules and procedures agreed to by the delegates, the Convention shall have concluded its business, it shall present to the Congress all proposed Amendments agreed to; the Congress shall then submit these proposed Amendments to the States for ratification subject to SECTION 3 of this Article: provided that the ments. Cf. note 49 supra. The remainder of the comment is intended to suggest means whereby the convention procedure can be preserved and revitalized.

---

210. The complete language of present article V appears in text accompanying notes 3-4 supra.

Congress shall not be obliged to submit for ratification any proposed amendment which two-thirds of both Houses agree does not reasonably relate to the particular subject manifested in the applications for a Convention under SECTION 2, Clause I(a)(i) of this Article.

SECTION 3. Amendments proposed under this Article shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

SECTION 4. Acts of Congress under this Article are not subject to disapproval by the President under the provisions of Article I, SECTION 7 of this Constitution.

Sections 1 and 3 are intended to preserve the present congressional mode of proposing amendments. Note that the ratification process in section 3 would apply equally to both the congressional and convention procedure. Language in original article V pertaining to the end of the slave trade in 1808 is obsolete and has been eliminated.

Section 2 provides a revised procedure for proposing amendments by constitutional convention and attempts to resolve many of the problems inherent in original article V. Section 2, clause I insures the existence of a national consensus for amendment by requiring that state applications be submitted within a specified number of years in order to be counted toward fulfilling the two-thirds requirement. The precise number of years is left blank and would be subject to thorough consideration by Congress and the States. Clause I, by its use of the plural form "Amendments," is intended to make clear the power of the convention to propose more than one amendment, providing all other conditions are satisfied.

The two provisos to section 2, clause I set out the requirements for a valid application and delineate the powers of Congress over the initial proceedings. In addition, the first clause of the first proviso makes it impossible for Congress to call a convention unless the States apply for one. Congress would not, under this provision, have power to call a convention on its own initiative. A national consensus for amendment, expressed in applications from two-thirds of the States, is thus made a prerequisite to the calling of a convention.

Section 2, clause I, subsection a(i) contemplates an appropriate national consensus by providing that applications which do not pertain to the same general subject will not be counted toward the two-thirds requirement. Congress, as the body which has responsibility for calling the convention, would make the initial determination of whether a sufficient number of "reasonably-related" applications had been submitted. Any dispute under a(i) whether an application should be counted could be resolved in the courts, and the weight given to Congress' determination that a particular application did not bear sufficient relationship to others would also be for the courts to decide.[211] Subsection a(ii) is cast in disjunctive terms from a(i) and preserves the right of the States to petition for a convention with power to propose general, far-ranging revisions of our constitutional system. Such proposals would, however, be subject to ratification under section 3. Phrasing a(i) and a(ii) in the alternative makes it clear that a general convention may be called only when specifically requested and that applications within the time limit from two-thirds of the States on a variety of different subjects do not warrant or require Congress' calling a general convention.

Section 2, clause I, subsection b(i) gives Congress the power and obligation to determine the number, manner of selection and apportionment of delegates to the convention. The question of whether members of Congress may simultaneously serve as delegates is implicitly left subject to the rulemaking authority of the convention referred to in clause III. Subsection b(ii) permits Congress to fulfill its duty to call the convention by providing for the date, time and place of the first meeting of the convention. Once convened, the convention would then be free to determine its own schedule and meeting place. Subsection b(iii) imposes a duty upon Congress to appropriate funds for the expenses of the convention, so that Congress could not by indirection defeat the purpose of the convention by depriving it of financial support.

211. This commentator believes that such issues as this, presented in the context of an article V amended as herein suggested, would clearly be within the judicial power of the federal courts under article III. Accordingly, language to this effect in article V is not required. In order to insure the availability of a judicial forum for the ultimate resolution of article V disputes, Congress could enact a special statute extending jurisdiction over such matters to the federal courts, presumably with no jurisdictional amount requirement. Cf. SPECIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION STUDY COMMITTEE, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, supra note 205, § 16(a), at 57. Since time is a key factor in assembling the required number of petitions under this amended article V, some provision for expedited appeals should be included if jurisdiction arises originally in the federal district courts. In cases where a State is a party to the action, serious consideration should be given to expressly including such cases within the original and exclusive jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under 28 U.S.C. § 1251 (1970), since such a case would present issues of paramount constitutional significance.

Section 2, clause II is designed to allay fears of those who are anxious that the convention would transform itself into a permanent and perpetual "fourth branch of the government." Under this clause, the maximum length of a convention would be just under four years, presuming the original convention to be called immediately after the swearing-in of a newly-elected Congress. The convention could be extended beyond the two-year term of that Congress only by consent of Congress, and then for only one additional two-year term. Since two-thirds of both houses is required to submit for ratification an amendment proposed by Congress, this same supermajority should be required to extend a convention. Note that "extension" of a convention already in session differs from "calling" a convention originally. Under section 2, clause I, Congress is not permitted to call a convention unless it has a sufficient number of valid applications. Section 2, clause II, however, would permit Congress in its discretion to extend a convention which it had originally called, and such extension would not require further applications. Only one extension is permitted, since there is no assurance that the national consensus would continue for a longer period of time. If such a consensus were to persist, it could again be manifested by applications for a new convention.

Section 2, clause III provides the machinery with which the convention actually proposes amendments. Under the "rules and procedures" authority recognized by this clause, the delegates would adopt their own rules of procedure and would have power to determine the size of the majority needed to propose a particular amendment. The clause requires presentation of all proposed amendments to Congress, which in turn has the responsibility of submitting them to the States for ratification under section 3. The proviso to clause III strikes an essential balance between the powers of Congress and those of the convention. If two-thirds of both houses of Congress agree that any or all of the proposed amendments do not pertain to the particular subject matter stated in the applications [section 2, clause Ia(i)], then Congress may refuse to submit such amendments for ratification. Again, this congressional determination should be reviewable in the federal courts.[212] All amendments proposed by a general convention called under section 2, clause Ia(ii) should be submitted for ratification since the proviso in clause III does not apply in this situation.

212. See note 211 supra.

Section 4 would write into the Constitution the sound wisdom of the Supreme Court in Hollingsworth v. Virginia[213] to the effect that the President's veto does not apply to acts of Congress involving constitutional amendments. This section would apply to acts of Congress pursuant to either mode of amendment.

Recent events have focused popular attention upon our Constitution and the fundamental principles of our form of government to a degree unmatched perhaps since the great ratification debates of the eighteenth century. In return, our constitutional system has proved its worth, its strength and ability to withstand extreme challenge and emerge the better for it. Accordingly, the present affords an ideal time to consider the problems inherent in the procedure whereby our Constitution may be changed as contemporary wisdom dictates. In so doing, the role of the States in the constitutional amendment process can be reaffirmed. This can best be achieved by amending the words of the Founding Fathers to reflect more accurately their original expectations. Until this is done, there remains with us the spectre of a fresh constitutional crisis, one involving not merely the petty motives and ambitions of individual persons, but the very right of States to determine to some extent the essential terms of their federalism.

MICHAEL A. ALMOND

213. 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798), discussed in note 143 supra.

(Ohio State Law Journal--1970, Vol 31)

THE MANDATORY REFERENDUM ON CALLING A STATE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION: ENFORCING THE PEOPLE'S RIGHT TO REFORM THEIR GOVERNMENT

By ROBERT J. MARTINEAU*

I. INTRODUCTION

Included in the constitutions of thirty seven of the fifty states is the bold and provocative manifesto that the people[1] have the right at all times to alter or reform their government.[2] This statement, which found early expression in the Declaration of Independence,[3] is generally considered to be another way of phrasing the principle that ultimate sovereign power is in the people.[4] The direct exercise of sovereignty by the people of a state is, with one exception, limited to voting on statutory or constitutional measures presented through the initiative, referendum or constitutional revision procedures specified in state constitutions. In all other situations the people have delegated their sovereignty to their state government. Even the three acts of popular soveignty listed find their source in the state constitution and not in the inherent power of the people. There is, however, one aspect of sovereignty that does not depend

* Associate Professor of Law, University of Iowa. The author wishes to acknowledge the contribution of Jon H. Kent, his research assistant, in the preparation of this article.
25 (1917). See also Forkosch, Who are the "People" in the Preamble to the Constitution, 19 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 644 (1968).

[1] The definition of "people" is discussed in HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 16-25 (1917). See also Forkosch, Who are the "People" in the Preamble to the Constitution, 19 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 644 (1968).

[2] Alabama, art. I, §2; Arkansas, art. II, §1; California, art. I, §2; Colorado, art. II, §2; Connecticut, art. I, §2; Delaware, Preamble; Georgia, art. I, §2-501; Idaho, art. I, §2; Indiana, art. I, §1; Iowa, art. 1, §2; Kentucky, §4; Maine, art. I, §2; Maryland, Declaration of Rights art. I; Massachusetts, pt. I, art. VII; Minnesota, art. I, §1; Mississippi, art. 3, §6; Missouri, art. I, §3; Montana, art. III, §2; Nevada, art. I, §2; New Hampshire, pt. I, art. X; New Jersey, art. I, §2; North Carolina, art. I, §3, North Dakota, art. I, §2; Ohio, art. I, §2; Oklahoma, art. II, §1; Oregon, art. I, §1; Pennsylvania, art. I, §2; Rhode Island, art. I, §1; South Carolina, art. I, §1; South Dakota, art. VI, §26; Tennessee, art. I, §1; Texas, art. I, §2; Utah, art. I, §2; Vermont, c. I, art. 7; Virginia, art. I, §3; West Virginia, art. 3, §3; Wyoming, art. I, §1. Of the other thirteen states, Alaska, Arizona, Florida, Hawaii, Kansas, Michigan and Washington provide in their constitutions that political power is inherent in the people, Illinois, Wisconsin and Nebraska that government derives its powers from the consent of the governed, Louisiana that government originates from the people, and New Mexico that political power is vested in and derived from the people. In addition, Alaska, Arizona, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Nebraska, New Mexico, and Washington have constitutional statements that all unenumerated powers are retained by the people. Only New York has no provision that refers to any basic political right existing in the people.

[3] "That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute New Government . . ." Declaration of Independence, par. 2.

[4] Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1, 47 (1849); Gatewood v. Matthews, 403 S.W.2d 716, 718 (Ky. 1966); Wheeler v. Board of Trustees, 200 Ga. 323, 331-33, 37 S.E.2d 322, 328-29 (1946); Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 623, 33 S.E.2d 49, 53-54 (1945); Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 46 (1873); HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 11-15 (1917).

upon the state constitution but, rather, is inherent in the people of a state—the power to revise their form of government by means of a constitutional convention. The state constitutional convention has been described as (in the field of constitution writing) the repository of the sovereignty of the people—an all-powerful body, subject to no limitations except those imposed by the people themselves and by the Federal Constitution.[5] It is through the constitutional convention and the subsequent referendum on its proposals that the people are able to exercise directly their right to alter or reform their government. The constitutional convention has been considered so basic that the power to have a convention has been held to exist even though the state constitution makes no mention of it.[6]

The usual procedure for a state to follow in having a constitutional convention involves (1) a decision by the state legislature to submit the question of calling a convention to the people; (2) a favorable vote by the people; (3) the adoption by the legislature of enabling legislation for the convention including providing for the election of delegates to the convention and funding the convention; (4) the election of the delegates. Under this process the holding of a convention is completely dependent upon the legislature. A number of states have, however, attempted to bypass the legislature by including in their constitutions not only the statement as to the right of the people to change their government but also a requirement that the question of calling a constitutional convention be submitted to the people at specified or minimum intervals. These provisions direct that if the people in a mandatory referendum vote for a convention, a convention be held, and they either are self-executing to the extent that no further legislative action is necessary for a convention to be held, or impose a duty upon the legislature to provide the mechanics for holding a convention. At the present time, there are eleven states[7] with [5] Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 531, 616 (1865) quoted with approval in Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 433-34, 229 A.2d 388, 397 (1967); HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 128-48 (1917); DODD, THE REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS 72-117 (1910); Note, State Constitutional Change: The Constitutional Convention, 54 VA. L. REV. 995, 1012-16 (1968), Note, The Constitutional Convention, Its Nature and Powers-And the Amending Procedure, 1966 UTAH L. REV. 390, 401-09; White, Amendment and Revision of State Constitutions, 100 U. PA. L. REV. 1132, 1139-47 (1952); Note, State Constitutional Conventions: Limitations on Their Powers, 55 IOWA L. REV. 244, 261-62 (1969). The principal exponent of the contrary view is JAMESON, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 301-28 (4th ed. 1887).

[6] Harvey v. Ridgeway, —— Ark. ——, 450 S.W.2d 281 (1970); Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 229 A.2d 388 (1967); Gatewood v. Matthews, 403 S.W.2d 716 (Ky. 1966), HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS: ch. IV (1917); DODD, THE REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS 44 (1910); White, Amendment and Revision of State Constitutions, 100 U. PA. L. REV. 1132, 1134-35 (1952).

[7] Alaska, Connecticut, Hawaii, Iowa, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio and Oklahoma. Arkansas and Illinois will join the group if the new constitutions adopted by the 1969 Arkansas constitutional convention and the 1970 Illinois constitutional convention are ratified by the voters in November and December, 1970, respectively. In the Appendix there is a state by state listing of the mandatory referendum provision of mandatory referendum provisions and, in view of the recent spate of constitutional conventions[8] and the trend toward the inclusion by these conventions of the mandatory referendum in state constitutions,[9] it is likely that there will be an increasing number of mandatory elections on the issue of calling a constitutional convention. Whenever the convention issue is submitted pursuant to a constitutional directive but the actual holding of a convention is dependent upon legislative action, there is always the risk that the legislature will not comply with its duty to see that a convention is held. This has, in fact, occurred on several occasions in the past.[10] The question presented by this situation is whether the judicial process is available to force the holding of a convention. Up to the present this issue has never been judicially determined, but the general opinion is that a court in these circumstances is powerless.[11] In this article, the history and use of the mandatory referendum on calling a constitutional convention will be reviewed, the advisibility of the different types of mandatory referendum provisions will be assessed, and an analysis made of the legal theories which are available to provide justification for a court to make effective a vote for a constitutional convention and thus enforce the people's right to reform or alter their government.

---

the state constitution, the date of each mandatory submission, the vote at each submission, and a statement as to whether the vote resulted in a convention being held. The states are listed in the order in which they adopted the mandatory referendum.

[8] During the period 1950-65, fifteen constitutional conventions were held. Sturm and Craig, State Constitutional Conventions: 1950-65, 39 STATE GOVT. 152, 152-53 (1966). In the past three years Arkansas, Hawaii, Illinois, Maryland, New Mexico, New York, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island have had conventions.

[9] Since 1959 Hawaii, Alaska and Connecticut have included the mandatory referendum in their constitutions. In addition within the last three years constitutional conventions in Rhode Island and New Mexico incorporated a mandatory referendum in their constitutional proposals but in both states the new constitutions were rejected by the voters. The 1969 Arkansas constitutional convention has proposed a constitution with a mandatory referendum and the 1970 Illinois constitutional convention has voted to do likewise. In 1968 Florida adopted a legislatively drafted constitution which authorizes a vote on calling a constitutional convention only when the issue has been put on the ballot by an initiative petition. If the vote is in favor of a convention, the procedure for calling a convention is self-executing and not dependent upon legislative action. Fla. Const. art. XI, §4. The National Municipal League's Model State Constitution also provides for a mandatory submission at least once every 15 years. Model State Const. art. 12, sec. 12.03(a) (6th ed. rev. 1968).

[10] See infra at notes 15-17.

[11] "[T]he decision to revise the constitution by means of a convention having been made, it is the legal obligation of the legislature to provide for the holding of the convention. Unfortunately, however, the fact that the people have voted for a convention provides little assurance that the legislature will properly discharge its responsibility, as the experience of Iowa well illustrates. Since the legislature cannot be mandamused, there is apparently no effective legal remedy." GRAVES, AMERICAN STATE GOVERNMENT 71-72 (4th ed. 1953); WHEELER, Changing the Fundamental Law, in SALIENT ISSUES OF CONSTITUTIONAL REVISION 59 (Wheeler ed., 1961); STURM, METHODS OF CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM 88 (1954); HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 71-76, 117-18 (1917); Note, State Constitutional Change: The Constitutional Convention, 54 VA. L. REV. 995, 1008 (1968); Note, The Constitutional Convention, Its Nature and Powers-And the Amending Procedure, 1966 UTAH L. REV. 390, 397; Dodd, Judicially Nonenforcible Provisions of Constitutions, 80 U. PA. L. REV. 54, 78-80 (1931). The only suggestion to the contrary is found in Note, State Constitutional Conventions: Limitations on Their Powers, 55 IOWA L. REV. 244, 252-53 (1969).

II. The Constitutional Provisions

There have been a total of fifteen states which at some time in their history have included in their constitutions a mandatory referendum requirement.[12] Submission of the convention issue pursuant to these provisions has occurred on seventy-two[13] occasions. Twenty-nine times a majority of those voting on the question were in favor of a convention. Of these twenty-nine pro-convention votes, twenty-one have resulted in constitutional conventions being held.[14] In the other eight instances a convention was not called, three times because of an outright refusal on the part of the legislature to pass the necessary legislation,[15] and five times in part because the constitutional provision was read to require a majority voting in favor of a convention greater than a simple majority of those voting on the question.[16] On one other occasion the legislature of New York, after the people had voted for a convention, delayed the holding of a convention for eight years.[17] This could be considered at least a partial non-compliance with the constitional mandate.

Three states adopted their mandatory referendum provisions prior to 1800, three in the period 1801-1850, four from 1851-1900, two more between 1901-1950, and four since 1950.[18] Under the constitutions of the first four of these states, the sole means whereby the constitutions could be revised or amended was by a constitutional convention called pursuant [12] Alaska, Connecticut, Hawaii, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, and Virginia, with Arkansas and Illinois as potential members of this group. For more detailed information as to each state, see the Appendix.

[13] The number of submissions in each state are: Indiana, 2; Iowa, 10; Kentucky, 1 (submissions occurred in 1797 and 1798 but because the issue had to be approved in each year to be effective they are counted as one); Maryland, 4; Massachusetts, 1; Michigan, 7; Missouri, 3; New Hampshire, 30; New York, 5; Ohio, 5; Oklahoma, 3; Virginia, 1. For more detailed information including the dates of the submissions, see the Appendix.

[14] The states in which mandatory referenda have resulted in conventions being held, and the year of each referendum, are: Kentucky, 1797 and 1798; Michigan, 1866, 1961; Missouri, 1921, 1942; New Hampshire, 1850, 1876, 1886, 1900, 1910, 1916, 1928, 1937 1946, 1954, 1962; New York, 1866, 1886, 1936; Ohio, 1871, 1910. For more detailed information as to each referendum, see the Appendix.

[15] New Hampshire, 1861, 1864; Iowa, 1920. For more detailed information, see the Appendix. Graves, State Constitutional Law: A Twenty-Five Year Summary, 8 WM. & MARY L. REV. 1, 6 (1966) relates that in California the legislature in 1934 and again in 1946 refused to call a constitutional convention after the voters had adopted initiated proposals for a convention.

[16] Maryland, 1930, 1950; Massachusetts, 1795; Michigan, 1898, 1958. For more detailed information, see the Appendix.

[17] See note 25, infra.

[18] Massachusetts, 1780; New Hampshire, 1792; Kentucky, 1792; Indiana, 1816; New York, 1846; Michigan, 1850; Maryland, 1851; Ohio, 1851; Iowa, 1857; Virginia, 1870; Oklahoma, 1907; Missouri, 1920; Alaska, 1959; Hawaii, 1959; Connecticut, 1965. New Hampshire had included in its constitution of 1784 a mandate that seven years after the effective date of that constitution delegates were to be elected to a convention to consider revisions in that constitution. The convention which convened in 1791 drafted what became the 1792 constitution. COLBY, MANUAL OF THE CONSTITUTION OF NEW HAMPSHIRE 140-45 (1902).

to a mandatory referendum. The philosophy of these states would appear to have been that the task of changing the constitution was reserved solely to the people and that the legislature was to have no role in it, neither by being able to propose amendments nor by having specific authority on its own initiative to call a convention or to submit the question to the people. New York in its 1846 constitution was the first state to combine a mandatory referendum provision with legislative authority to propose specific amendments.[19] The committee of the 1846 New York convention which proposed the requirement to that convention defended it on the grounds that "it asserted a great principle, and that once in twenty years they might have the matters into their own hands," but "if the people were satisfied with the Constitution, they could endorse it, and the state of things would continue."[20] Similar sentiments were expressed in the 1850-51 Ohio constitutional convention and the New York Constitution was pointed to as an example to follow.[21] The reason expressed for the mandatory referendum in the 1857 Iowa convention—a desire to insure that the people are able to exercise their right to reform their government without interference by the legislature[22]—has become the most often articulated basis for it.[23]

There are two major points upon which mandatory referendum provisions may differ. The first and most important is whether the section is self-executing, i.e. once the voters speak in favor of a convention one will be held without further action by the legislature. Of the eleven states which now have the mandatory referendum, the constitutions of Alaska, Hawaii, Michigan, Missouri, New York, and New Hampshire are self-executing, while Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland, Ohio and Oklahoma (plus Arkansas and Illinois if their new constitutions are ratified) depend upon legislative action to make them effective.[24] There is ample justification for a provision which is self-executing. This is the surest way in which the avowed purpose of the mandatory referendum provision—to permit the people to exercise their right to reform their government without interference by the existing government—can be fulfilled. The self-executing provision also avoids the problems necessarily involved in an effort to obtain a convention through the judicial process. To the extent that conflicts between different branches of government can be avoided, they should be.

---

[19] N. Y. CONST. art. XIII (1846).

[20] NEW YORK STATE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION COMMITTEE, LEGISLATURE ORGANIZATION AND POWERS 365 (1938).

[21] II DEBATES OF 1850-51 OHIO CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 429-36 (1851).

[22] I DEBATES OF 1857 IOWA CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 604-09 (1857).

[23] See e.g., DEBATES OF 1950 HAWAII CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 748-49 (1961); WHEELER, Changing the Fundamental Law, in SALIENT ISSUES OF CONSTITUTIONAL REVISION 58-59 (Wheeler ed. 1961).

[24] The relevant constitutional provision of each state is set out in the Appendix.

The other major difference between the states is on the question of the majority required by the constitution to have a convention. Several of the states have in the past required a majority of all those voting at the election rather than a voting-on-the-question majority before a convention would have to be held. Experience has shown, however, that it is almost impossible in a general election to have a majority even vote on a constitutional issue, much less be in favor of a proposition. Now only Maryland would appear to require the voting-at-the-election majority. This trend is advisable because it avoids having the person who votes at the election, but not on the referendum question, counted as a negative vote. Treating his non-vote in this manner is a presumption that has no basis in fact and thus should not be applied to the fundamental issue of revising the state constitution.

III. Judicial Relief for Non-Compliance

In determining the availability of judicial relief to obtain a convention when the legislature refuses to act in accordance with a constitutional directive, it should first be noted that the early mandatory referendum provisions were not self-executing but depended upon the legislature to call the convention and provide for the election of delegates. It was not until the New York convention of 1894 that an attempt was made to bypass the legislature and make the constitution self-executing. This change resulted from the delay by the New York legislature in calling a convention after the mandatory 1886 referendum favored a convention.[25] It appears that New York and the other states which followed its lead included the self-executing provisions because in their absence it was thought that there was no means available to compel the legislature to call a convention after a favorable vote of the people. In those states that do not have a self-executing provision, the philosophy is that the legislature will comply with the vote of the people.[26] As we have seen, however, this assumption is not justified because legislatures in the past have refused or neglected to comply with the constitution.[27] In this situation must a court deny relief on the ground that it cannot force compliance with the constitution? There are several theories which indicate that a court may be able to compel the calling of a convention and thus make effective the people's right to reform their government.

The principle that a court lacks power to do anything in the face of a legislative refusal to do what the constitution commands is based on several different theories: (1) mandamus will not issue to compel the legislature to pass legislation which necessarily involves the exercise of discretion;[28] (2) one branch of government cannot interfere with another branch in the performance of duties exclusively committed by the constitution to the latter.[29] Both of these theories are generally encompassed by the concepts of separation of powers, political question and non-justiciability.[30]

[25] New York State Constitutional Convention Committee, Legislative Organization and Powers 369-70 (1938).

[26] See e.g., I Debates of 1857 Iowa Constitutional Convention 622-26 (1857).

[27] See note 15, supra.

One potential justification for judicial involvement in the calling of a constitutional convention lies in the nature of the convention and the role of the legislature in calling a convention. A careful analysis of both of these issues was made by the Maryland Court of Appeals in Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General.[31] The people of Maryland at a special election in 1966 had voted to have a constitutional convention.[32] In considering the enabling legislation for the convention, an argument arose as to whether members of the legislature were able to be delegates to the convention notwithstanding a prohibition in the Maryland constitution against a person holding more than one public office. The legislature caused a declaratory judgment suit to be filed to determine this and other relevant questions, including that of whether the legislature could delay the calling of a convention beyond the deadline included in the 1966 referendum. The court held on the main issue that legislators and other public officials could be delegates to a constitutional convention. It reasoned that the Maryland constitutional prohibition against a person holding more than one office applied only to offices created by or under the constitution, that the office of convention delegate was not an office created by or under the constitution, and thus the prohibition did not apply.[33] In deciding that a convention delegate was not an officer under the constitution, the court held that a convention is not an agency under the constitution but is the direct agent of the people and exists independent of the constitution as the means by which the people exercise their reserved and inherent right to alter or reform their government. As corollaries to this, the court stated that the role of the legislature in the calling of a constitutional convention is independent of its law-making role assigned to it by the constitution, and that in par-

[28] Re State Census, 6 S.D. 540, 542, 62 N.W. 129, 130 (1895); Fergus v. Marks, 321 Ill. 510, 517-18, 152 N.E. 557, 560 (1926). Note, State Constitutional Change: The Constitutional Convention, Its Nature and Powers-And the Amending Procedure, 1966 UTAH L. REV. 390, 397; GRAD, THE DRAFTING OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS pt. II, 25-39 (1967).

[29] Dodd, Judicially Non-enforcible Provisions of Constitutions, 80 U. PA. L. REV. 54, 56-61, 84-92 (1931).

[30] The relationship between these three concepts is discussed in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 208-37 (1962). In this opinion the Court points out that the "nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers." Id. at 211.

[31] 246 Md. 417, 229 A.2d 388 (1967).

[32] The legislature submitted the question to the people on its own initiative and not pursuant to any specific constitutional authorization. The power of the legislature to do this was one of the issues in Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, id. The court held that the submission was proper.

[33] Accord, Harvey v. Ridgeway, — Ark. —, 405 S. W.2d 281 (1970).

ticipating in calling a convention it is not carrying out its law-making function under the legislative article of the constitution but is merely assisting the people to perform their reserved constitution-making function.[34] It can be concluded from this discussion that the reason the legislature participates in this process is because it is a convenient agency for doing so and not because the tasks ordinarily performed by a legislature in calling a convention are inherently legislative in nature.[35] If this view of the legislative role in the calling of a constitutional convention is accepted, the problem of separation of powers, which arises whenever it is suggested that a court either order a legislative body to act or act in place of the legislature to effectuate the people's call for a convention, does not appear to be relevant. The doctrine of separation of powers is concerned with those governmental powers which are assigned by the constitution—the legislative, executive and judicial powers.[36] If as the Maryland court has stated, participation in the calling of a constitutional convention is not one of those powers, then separation of powers is not applicable to it and it would not be a violation of the principle for the court to play a role in it.

It could be argued that the Maryland case is not on point because it did not involve the 20-year referendum required by the Maryland Constitution but a referendum submitted by the legislature on its own initiative. In the mandatory referendum situation, the duty is specifically imposed by the constitution upon the legislature to call a convention if the people vote in favor of one. Even if the separation of powers doctrine is not applicable when the constitution is silent on whose function it is to call a convention, it does apply if the constitution imposes the obligation to call a convention upon the legislature, then no other branch of government has the power to interfere with the legislature's compliance or non-compliance with its constitutional duty. It is suggested that even though the constitution does assign the duty of calling a convention to the legislature when the people vote in a mandatory referendum to have one, if the legislature refuses to comply with the people's directive, it would not violate the constitution for a court to take whatever steps are necessary to see that a convention is held. As has been pointed out by the Maryland case, the role of the legislature in the calling of a convention arises out of convenience, not because the duties involved are

---

[34] Board of Supervisors v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 428-34, 229 A.2d 388, 394-97 (1967). Accord, Carpenter v. Cornish, 83 N.J.L. 254, 83 A. 31 (1912); HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 80-85 (1917).

[35] HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 75-78 (1917) comes very close to making this point.

[36] People v. Bissel, 19 Ill. 229, 231-32 (1857). See generally, VILE, CONSTITUTIONALISM AND THE SEPARATION OF POWERS (1967); JAFFE, JUDICIAL CONTROL OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION 28-40 (1965).

legislative in nature.[37] It would seem strange that a constitutional assignment of a duty based on convenience could be used as a reason to deny another agency of government, the court, the power to insure that the vote of the people and the directive of the constitution are made effective. Convenience would then become the master rather than the slave of the ultimate objective—the right of the people to reform their government.[38] To deny the power of a court to do what is necessary to make a reality of this basic sovereign right when the legislature refuses to carry out its duty on the ground that the people in the constitution have given to the legislature and to no one else the responsibility for assisting them in implementing their right, is putting form over substance. If the legislature refuses to act the people have no direct recourse except to the courts.[39] If the courts refuse to act, they have no recourse at all.[40] The result would be that the basic feature of our system of government, the power of the people over the form of their government, is completely frustrated, and all in the name of a constitutional provision designed to insure that the people are able to exercise this power. It is doubtful that the courts would be held to be powerless in those states in which the responsibility for initiating the machinery for holding a convention is assigned not to the legislature, but to the governor, lieutenant governor or secretary of state.[41] There should be no different result merely because the legislature rather than an official of the executive branch was chosen as the agent to carry out the mandate of the people.

Several cases indicate that the traditional reluctance of courts to order a legislature to act may not apply in the constitutional convention referendum situation. In Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General[42] the Maryland Court of Appeals, in discussing the issue of whether the legislature could delay the convention beyond the period authorized by the voters in the 1966 referendum, agreed with the trial court which

---

[37] See discussion supra notes 34-35.

[38] The Prohibitory-Amendment Cases, 24 Kan. 700, 710-11 (1881) make the same point in upholding the validity of a constitutional amendment which had been adopted by the people but had not been printed in full in the legislative journals as required by the existing constitution. Accord, Baker v. Moorhead, 103 Neb. 811, 174 N.W. 430 (1919).

[39] Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 47-48 (1873) suggests that the only remedy is for the people to elect new representatives who will call a convention. This, as HOAR, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS 76 (1917) points out, is not sufficient. Elections of a majority of the members of a state legislature do not turn on such issues. Stubbs, Constitution-Making in Georgia, 6 GA. BAR J. 207, 212 (1944) suggests that if the legislature refuses to provide for the election of delegates to a convention, the governor, pursuant to his duty to uphold the constitution, is obligated to do so.

[40] Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 47-48 (1873) makes the further suggestion that if the elective process does not work there is always the right of revolution but this is hardly tenable, particularly in view of the responsibilities of the Federal Government under the guarantee clause of article IV of the Constitution.

[41] Alaska, Hawaii, Missouri, and New Hampshire. For the particular provision of each state, see the Appendix.

[42] 246 Md. 417, 229 A.2d 388 (1967).

had held that the "convention was called by the Legislature and confirmed by the people. The General Assembly cannot ignore this mandate." In submitting the issue to the people it "bound itself to the mandate expressed by them. The people have spoken in clear and unmistakable terms, and the legislature is bound to obey. The only thing remaining to be done is to provide for the election of delegates." The Court of Appeals went on to say that "it was mandatory that a convention be called at this time and that the call could not be delayed."[43] The court did not discuss what it would have done had the legislature refused to take the necessary steps to have a convention, but it is unlikely that it would have used the strong language it did, had it not been willing to go beyond merely stating the obligation of the legislature under the circumstances.

The Court of Appeals of Kentucky in Chenault v. Carter[44] went even further than the Maryland court when it described the function of the legislature, once the people had voted for a convention, as a "ministerial duty enjoined upon it by the constitution in the execution of a public mandate."[45] The court also stated that the "choice of whether a constitutional convention shall be called rests entirely with the electorate. The discretion of the legislature is at an end when the matter is finally proposed."[46]

Another case in which a court has commented on the nature of the function of the legislature once the people have decided to have a convention is Carton v. Secretary of State[47] in which the issue before the Supreme Court of Michigan was whether the constitution adopted by the 1907-08 Michigan constitutional convention was to be submitted to the people at the time directed by the legislature in the convention enabling act or on the date fixed by the constitutional convention. The court held that it was within the discretion of the convention to determine when the constitution should be voted on by the people. In so holding the court made it clear that once the people indicated they wanted a convention the legislature's power over it was limited to providing for the election of delegates to the convention. The court stated that the "power to provide for an election is the sole power conferred" on the [44] 332 S.W.2d 623 (Ky. 1960). In this case the court was faced with the question of whether the legislature could submit to the people the issue of whether a convention, limited in the areas of the constitution to which it could propose revisions, should be held. The court held that the convention could be so limited, but that the limiting authority would be the people by their approval of the referendum rather than the legislature by its passage of the act providing for the referendum.

---

[43] Id. at 445, 229 A.2d at 403.

[45] Id. at 626.

[46] Id.

[47] 151 Mich. 337, 115 N.W. 429 (1908).

legislature and that "the power then conferred [in the constitution] is ministerial rather then legislative."[48]

The use of the words "duty," "ministerial" and "discretion" are significant here because this is the language of the law of mandamus, the general rule being that a court will issue a writ of mandamus only when the duty of the public officer in question is ministerial and involves no discretion on the part of the officer.[49] These three cases, by the use of language that is usually reserved for situations in which mandamus is the appropriate remedy, have established the basis for a court to hold that it has the power to compel the legislature to provide for election of delegates to a convention and that in so doing it is not violating the separation of powers. A court should be able to accept the position that after the people vote for a convention, the legislature's subsequent duty to provide the necessary machinery to have an election of delegates to a convention is merely ministerial and does not call for the exercise of discretion. Having adopted this view, a court could legitimately rule that the legislature is subject to a writ of mandamus to carry out its constitutional duty. In carrying out a non-legislative ministerial duty the legislature, as well as the executive and other public officers, is subject to being ordered by a court to perform its duty.

Apart from enforcing a ministerial duty of the legislature, it can also be maintained that the "right to reform" supposedly guaranteed by the constitution is not merely an indefinite and vague "right of the people" not belonging to anyone in particular but is rather a right that is individual and personal and capable of being enforced by the courts. When a constitution states that it is the "right" of the people to reform their government, what does the use of the word "right" imply? It should be noted that the term is not used extensively in the body of state constitutions even though every constitution has a portion of it designated as a bill or declaration of rights.[50] These bills or declarations generally contain what are commonly thought of as "rights," i.e., affirmative or negative commands to the government for the protection of the individual, but they also include many other statements which are mere expressions of political philosophy.[51] Is the "right" to reform the government a true "right" or just a statement of political philosophy? Up to the present the judicial reliance on the "right" has been to justify some action leading to constitutional reform but not as a basis for affirmative judicial action to compel a legislature to comply with the wishes of the people

---

[48] Id. at 341, 115 N.W. at 431.

[49] JAFFE, JUDICIAL CONTROL OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION 176-92 (1965).

[50] Force, State "Bills of Rights": A Case of Neglect and the Need for a Renaissance, 3 VAL. U. L. REV. 125, 137 (1969).

[51] The various provisions of the Bills of Rights are set forth in the Appendix to id. at 164-82.

as expressed in a referendum.[52] It is suggested that by the use of the word "right" in relation to the control the people have over their government, something more is meant than sheer power or authority.[53] If those words or words of similar import were intended, they, rather than the word "right", would have been included in the constitution and it would have been understood by all that the statement was nothing more than a recognition of the obvious, that if the people are successful in forcibly taking power into their own hands notwithstanding the opposition of existing governmental institutions, they can reform their government and cannot be called to account for it. But the word "right" was used, and in a society which is premised upon the recognition by the government of the rights guaranteed by the constitution and upon a judicial process designed to enforce those rights, it must be assumed that the constitutional draftsmen and the people who adopted the constitution did so with full knowledge of its significance.

Under the "right" theory, it can be argued that the legislature should be compelled to provide for a convention on the basis that it is denying an individual's right to reform his government after he and others had been a majority in a referendum on the question of holding a convention. Once the people have attempted to guarantee the right by constitutionally mandating a periodic vote on calling a convention and by commanding that in the event of a favorable vote a convention must be held, the "right" to reform is no longer only a general statement of principle but something to which a person who voted for a convention is entitled as a matter of constitutional guarantee. There would be little point in the constitutional draftsmen adding to the constitution this mandatory machinery designed to result in a convention being held when the people so desire, if the legislature is free to disregard the wishes of the people and the people are left without recourse. The objective of the mandatory provision is to do away with the necessity for reliance on the legislature and thus enable the people to exercise their right to reform their government without interference. This is shown by the debates in the constitutional conventions which adopted the mandatory provisions. In Iowa, for example, in the debate on the periodic mandatory vote, those who favored it stressed the importance of permitting the people to exercise their right to reform their government without having to rely on the existing government.[54] The example of Doar's Rebellion in Rhode Is-[52] See e.g., Harvey v. Ridgeway, —— Ark. ——, 450 S.W.2d 281 (1970); Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General, 246 Md. 417, 229 A.2d 388 (1967); Re Opinion of the Justices 55 R.I. 56, 178 A. 433 (1935); Wheeler v. Board of Trustees, 200 Ga. 323, 37 S.E.2d 322 (1946); Gatewood v. Matthews, 403 S.W.2d 716 (1966); Cummings v. Beeler, 189 Tenn. 151, 223 S.W.2d 913 (1949); Staples v. Gilmer, 183 Va. 613, 33 S.E.2d 49 (1945).

---

[53] Braxton, Powers of Conventions, 7 VA. L. REG. 79, 81 (1901).

[54] I DEBATES OF 1857 IOWA CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 604-09 (1857).

land in 1842, as related in the case of Luther v. Borden,[55] was cited to show what can happen when the people's inherent right to reform their government is blocked by the government in power.[56] The mandatory referendum is, consequently, intended to be an alternative to armed revolution. But if there is no way to have a convention when the legislature refuses to act, the people are in the same position as had the mandatory referendum not been placed in the constitution, that is with armed revolt as the only recourse open to a people who want to exercise their right to reform their government. Such a result could hardly have been intended by those who included the mandatory referendum in the constitution. It seems reasonable to conclude that what was intended by the adoption of the mandatory referendum was not only that a vote would be taken, but that if the vote were in favor of a convention, a convention would be held. It was certainly not the intention of the draftsmen that the legislature would still have the discretion as to whether a convention would occur.

The case usually cited in support of the proposition that the calling of a constitutional convention is completely subject to the will of the legislature notwithstanding a vote of the people in favor of a convention is Wells v. Bain.[57] In that case the narrow issue before the court was whether a convention has the authority to control the procedures at the election at which the constitution drafted by the convention was to be accepted or rejected by the voters. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court held that because the enabling act for the convention provided that the referendum on the constitution was to be conducted in the same manner as other general elections, the convention could not establish a different procedure. In so holding, the court made an extensive analysis of the status and power of a constitutional convention and, in particular, of the convention's relationship to the legislature and to the people. The court's discussion was based on its construction of the section of the Pennsylvania Constitution preserving the right of the people to alter or reform their government. The court stated that there were three ways in which this right could be executed: "(1) The mode provided in the existing constitution. (2) A law as the instrumental process of raising the body for revision and conveying to it the powers of the people. (3) A revolution."[58] The court in its opinion was only concerned with the situation described in the second alternative, that is when the constitution itself does not regulate the manner in which a convention is to be called. The first alternative was inapplicable because the Pennsylvania Constitution did not provide for the calling of a constitutional convention. Thus,

[55] 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 1849.

[56] I DEBATES OF 1857 IOWA CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 609, 623-24 (1857).

[57] 75 Pa. 39 (1873).

[58] Id. at 47-48.

the entire discussion by the court is irrelevant to the situation in which the constitution does specify the duty of the legislature to call a convention. It should also be noted that Wells v. Bain is inconsistent with the Maryland case, Board of Supervisors of Elections v. Attorney General,[59] and with the thinking of most other courts in its view that, when the people vote for a convention in a referendum proposed by the legislature on its own initiative, the vote merely authorizes the legislature to call a convention but is not a mandate on the legislature to do so.

Several provisions of the United States Constitution are also possible bases for judicial enforcement of the people's call for a convention. The federal claim most likely to be accepted by a court is one based on the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment. Adapting the principle of the reapportionment cases to the refusal of a state government to comply with a convention referendum, it appears that this action of the state government is a denial of the effectiveness of an individual's vote in an even more direct way than is a malapportionment of legislative seats.[60] In the reapportionment situation, the impact of the failure to give equal weight to each person's vote is complicated by the vagaries of the legislative process and the other factors which militate against the one man-one vote principle achieving the desired result.[61] It has, in fact, only the advantage of mathematical symmetry. In the situation of a legislature's refusal to abide by a convention referendum, however, the effectiveness of the vote of a person who favors a convention is not merely being reduced, it is being denied completely. The result is the same as if the election officials had torn up all the ballots in favor of a convention or had refused to permit those who favored a convention to cast their vote.

It can also be argued that the right to reform the government is one of those fundamental rights contained in the concept of liberty protected by the due process clauses of the fifth and fourteenth amendments. It has been recognized that the due process clause "protects those liberties that are so rooted in the tradition and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental,"[62] including the right to privacy,[63] the right to travel,[64] and the right to educate one's children.[65] It is suggested that the most fundamental of all rights is the right of the

[59] 246 Md. 417, 229 A.2d 388 (1967).

[60] For another possible application of the equal protection clause to a voting situation see Note, Supermajority Voting Requirements: Possible Constitutional Objections, 55 IOWA L. REV. 674 (1970).

[61] Dixon, The Warren Court Crusade for the Holy Grail of "One Man-One Vote," 1969 SUP. CT. REV. 219.

[62] Justice Goldberg, concurring in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 487 (1965).

[63] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

[64] Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964).

[65] Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923).

people and of the individuals who constitute the people to reform their government. This right was recognized in the Declaration of Independence as a justification for the American Revolution.[66] It is recognized in most state constitutions,[67] and it has been held that the right exists even if not specifically mentioned in the constitution.[68] It is consequently one of the most basic of all fundamental rights and thus is within the liberty protected by the fifth and fourteenth amendments.

Another argument that can be made is that the ninth amendment is a basis for recognizing the existence and enforceability of the right to reform the government. The ninth amendment, which provides that "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people," has recently been used to justify the judicial recognition of rights not specifically mentioned in the Constitution.[69] In view of the fundamental nature of the right to reform the government, it seems logical to include it within those unenumerated rights recognized by the ninth amendment.

The guarantee of a republican form of government contained in section 4, article IV of the Constitution[70] can also be used as a foundation for judicial relief. The essential concept of a republican form of government is that the ultimate control over the government resides in the people.[71] If this is the case, and if it is the responsibility of the federal government to guarantee this control, then it seems appropriate that when a state government refuses to follow the command of the people as expressed in a convention referendum, a federal court, as one of the institutions established to insure that the Constitution is observed, or a state court, which has a similar obligation to uphold the federal Constitution, must take appropriate steps to insure that a reluctant state government maintains a republican form of government by complying with the mandate of the people as expressed in a referendum established by the state constitution.[72]

---

[66] Note 3, supra.

[67] Note 2, supra.

[68] See the cases and authorities cited in note 6, supra.

[69] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), concurring opinion of Justice Goldberg at 486 (right of privacy).

[70] "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government . . ."

[71] Bonfield, The Guarantee Clause of Article IV, Section 4: A Study in Constitutional Desuetude, 46 MINN. L. REV. 513, 558 (1962).

[72] The major difficulty with this thesis is that in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), the Court specifically held that a case arising under the guarantee clause was a non-justiciable political question and that a case involving the apportionment of a state legislature was justiciable because it involved the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment and not the guarantee clause of article IV. This rationale was criticized by Justice Frankfurter in his dissent in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. at 297, and by Bonfield, Baker v. Carr: New Light on the Constitutional Guarantee of Republican Government, 50 CAL. L. REV. 245 (1962). In Kobler v. Tugwell, 292 F. Supp. 978 (E.D. La. 1968), aff'd 393 U.S. 531 (1969), two mem-

There are two major hurdles which a court would have to face in considering a suit seeking relief from a legislative refusal to call a constitutional convention. The first deals with the power of the court to hear the case and the second with the type of relief which the court can grant. A court would initially be confronted with objections to its jurisdiction to hear the case on the grounds that the issue was not justiciable, was a political question or was a violation of the separation of powers, or a combination of all three.[73] Essentially, no matter how it is phrased, the issue involves the propriety of a court considering the matter of the legislative refusal to take action when the constitution says it must do so. If the claim is based upon the alleged violation of a federal constitutional right, Baker v. Carr[74] would appear to eliminate any serious question as to the jurisdiction of the court. That case makes it clear that the limitations of justiciability, political question and separation of powers do not apply to a suit alleging that a federal constitutional right has been violated by a refusal by a state legislature to act.[75] This was, of course, the exact situation presented in the apportionment cases.

Similarly, there is no problem in a court taking jurisdiction of a case in which the plaintiff's claim is based on the theory that the duty of the legislature in calling a convention after a referendum in favor of one is merely ministerial and does not call for the exercise of legislative discretion. If a court agrees with that theory it merely applies the usual mandamus principles.[76] Any problem arising from traditional notions of separation of powers can be avoided by a recognition of the fact that a legislature, when it deals with the question of a constitutional convention, is not exercising normal legislative power but a special power assigned to it as a matter of convenience to assist the people in exercising their sovereign right to revise their constitution. A court, by refusing to act in such circumstances, would not be respecting a constitutional limitation on its powers but merely permitting a designated agent of the people not to do what the people have said it must do.[77]

Even if a court does accept jurisdiction of the case and holds that the plaintiff is entitled to relief, is there any relief which the court is able to grant? Again, the reapportionment cases may provide the basis for an bers of a three judge panel were of the opinion that under some circumstances the guarantee clause might be judicially enforceable.

---

[73] See the discussion at notes 28-36, supra.

[74] 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[75] "[I]t is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States which give rise to the 'political question'." Id. at 210. Cases involving the guarantee clause of article IV are an exception to this statement because the Court has construed that clause to be enforceable by other branches of the Federal Government. Id. at 218-25.

[76] See the discussion at notes 42-49, supra.

[77] See the discussion at notes 28-36, supra.

affirmative answer. In those cases the courts have at first delayed granting relief to permit the state legislatures to have an opportunity to reapportion themselves. The courts then have reviewed the reapportionment measures adopted by the state legislatures, and if they still did not meet the requirements of equal protection, the judges themselves have reapportioned the legislatures.[78] Applying this precedent to the convention problem, a court could direct that unless the legislature enacted by a certain date the legislation appropriate for a convention, the court would enter an order which would include the same provisions as would be in an enabling act.

It is at this point that the most substantial objection to a court assuming a role in the calling of a constitutional convention arises. It is obvious that in calling a constitutional convention there are several details concerning the election and compensation of delegates and operating funds for the convention which may involve the exercise of discretion on matters ordinarily the subject of legislative action. Particularly difficult for a court would be the questions of the number of delegates, the districts from which they would be elected, and whether the election would be partisan or non-partisan.[79] Presumably, to the extent of reasonable applicability, the election would be held in the same manner as other state elections. If the state constitution does not specify the essential provisions for the election of the delegates to the convention, the court is not without any guidance in the matter. It could, for example, merely follow the pattern set by the most recent constitutional convention held in that state or, if for some reason that was not practical, it could use the existing state legislature, or one house thereof, as its model.

The question of providing funds for the convention is just as difficult. State constitutions do not, with one exception,[80] specify that a convention may spend whatever it deems appropriate. To the contrary, in most states public funds may not be expended without a legislative appropriation. Notwithstanding this, it would seem that if the state constitution commands that under certain circumstances a convention be held and the sole purpose of the judicial proceeding is to achieve compliance with the constitution, it would not be inconsistent with the constitution for a court to authorize the expenditure of state funds for a convention. Again it comes down to a question of not permitting the legislature to negate the fundamental right of the people to reform their

---

[78] See DIXON, DEMOCRATIC REPRESENTATION: REAPPORTIONMENT IN LAW AND POLITICS ch. 12 (1968).

[79] Under some constitutions these matters would not prove a problem because most of these details are specified in the constitutions themselves. See e.g., the HAWAII CONST. art. XV, §1. All the court would have to do is order the state or local officials in charge of election to hold an election on a certain date.

[80] MISSOURI CONST. art. XII, §3(b).

government by a refusal to act when it has a constitutional obligation to act.[81]

The court need not consider any issues beyond the election of the delegates to the convention and making sure that the convention is funded. Other matters such as when the convention begins, how long it sits, what votes are necessary for it to take action, and when the constitution it adopts is to be submitted to the people, are all matters which are properly left to the convention, although most legislatures attempt to control these details by means of the enabling legislation for the convention.[82]

IV. Conclusion

It is clear that notwithstanding the central place in our political system of the right of the people to reform their government, without a mandatory referendum on calling a constitutional convention this right is dependent upon legislative action which often is not forthcoming. Unless the people have voted for a convention, judicial relief from a refusal of the legislature to act is not possible because, among other reasons, there is no way in which a court can determine whether the people actually desire to exercise this right. As a response to this problem, an increasing number of states, including eleven at the present time, have included in their constitutions a provision which requires that the question of calling a constitutional convention be submitted to the people at stated or minimum intervals and, if the requisite majority of voters favors a convention, either imposes upon the legislature the duty to provide the mechanics for the holding of a convention or is self-executing to the extent that a convention will be held without further action of the legislature. The self-executing provision is preferable, because legislatures can and have refused to call a convention on several occasions when the people have voted in favor of having a convention. It has been accepted up to now that in the face of a legislative refusal to comply with a vote of the people for a convention, the courts are powerless to order the legislature to do what the constitution says it must do. Several recent cases have, however, suggested a number of legal bases for a court to take the action necessary for a convention to be held. These bases include the several federal constitutional provisions and an understanding of the role of the legislature in calling a constitutional convention. Whatever basis is used, it is suggested that a court need no longer stay its hand in the face of legislative opposition to the holding of a constitutional convention called for by the people in a constitutionally mandated referendum. In this way the fundamental right of the people to reform their government can be protected.

[81] Hoar, Constitutional Conventions 177-80 (1917) suggests that a convention has the inherent power to incur whatever expenses it deems necessary. But see Constitutional Convention v. Evans, — N.M. —, 460 P.2d 250 (1969).

[82] Note, State Constitutional Conventions: Limitations on Their Powers, 55 Iowa L. Rev. 244 (1969).

APPENDIX

SUMMARY OF DATA ON MANDATORY CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION REFERENDA

State	Const. Provision	Date	Vote		Result when Majority Voted for a Convention
Massachusetts	Const. 1780[1] part II, § chapter VI, art. X	May 6, 1795	For: Against:	11,386[2] 10,867	no convention called[3]
New Hampshire	Const. 1792[4] part II, §§99 and 100	Mar. 1800	For: Against:	2,478[5] 4,246
		Mar. 1807	For: Against:	1,722 10,903
		Mar. 1814	For: Against:	532[6] 16,141
		Mar. 1821	For: Against:	2,407 13,853
		Mar. 1833[7]	For: Against:	4,623 11,818
		Mar. 1834	For: Against:	5,973 12,183
		Mar. 1838	For: Against:	2,821 16,830
		Mar. 1844	For: Against:	10,855 20,994

59-609 O - 80 - 58

State	Const. Provision	Date	Vote		Result when Majority Voted for a Convention
		Mar. 1847	For:	4,583
			Against:	12,415
		Mar. 1850	For:	28,877	convention called:
			Against:	14,482	Laws of N.H., 1850, c.959
		Mar. 1858	For:	2,822
			Against:	18,499
		Mar. 1861	For:	11,078	no convention called[8]
			Against:	9,753
		Mar. 1863	For:	1,044
			Against:	12,428
		Nov. 1864	For:	18,422	no convention called[9]
			Against:	15,348
		Nov. 1868	For:	12,219
			Against:	12,346
		Mar. 1870	No Record
		Mar. 1876	For:	28,971	convention called:
			Against:	10,912	Laws of N.H., 1876, c.30
		Nov. 1884	For:	13,036
			Against:	14,120
		Mar. 1886	For:	11,466	convention called:
			Against:	10,213	Laws of N.H., 1887, c.107
		Nov. 1894	For:	13,681
			Against:	16,689

Nov. 1896	For:	14,099
	Against:	19,831
Nov. 1900	For:	10,571	convention called:
	Against:	3,287	Laws of N.H., 1901, c.85
Nov. 1910	For:	23,105	convention called:
	Against:	15,541	Laws of N.H., 1911, c.187
Nov. 1916	For:	21,589	convention called:
	Against:	14,520	Laws of N.H., 1917, c.121
Nov. 1924	For:	22,520
	Against:	42,616
Nov. 1928	For:	29,848	convention called:
	Against	21,831	Laws of N.H., 1929, c.190
Mar. 1937	For:	20,559	convention called:
	Against:	20,462	Laws of N.H., 1937, c.187
Nov. 1946	For:	49,230	convention called:
	Against:	29,326	Laws of N.H., 1947, c.77
Nov. 1954	For:	64,813	convention called:
	Against:	37,494	Laws of N.H., 1955, c.42

State	Const. Provision	Date	Vote		Result when Majority Voted for a Convention
		Nov. 1962	For: Against:	94,597 49,418	convention called: Laws of N.H., 1963, c.143
Kentucky	Const. 1792[10] article XI	May 1797	For: Against:	5,446[11] 4,367	no convention called[12]
		May 1798	For: Against:	8,804[13] 3,049	convention called:[14] Laws of Ky., 1798, c.140
Indiana	Const. 1816[15] article VIII	Aug. 4, 1828	For: Against:	10,092[16] 18,633
		Aug. 3, 1840	For: Against:	12,277[17] 61,721
New York	Const. 1846[18] article XIII, §2	Nov. 6, 1866	For: Against:	352,854[19] 256,364	convention called: Laws of N.Y., 1867, c.194
		Nov. 2, 1886	For: Against:	574,993 30,766	convention called: Laws of N.Y., 1892, c.398 Laws of N.Y., 1893, c.8 Laws of N.Y., 1894, c.228
	Const. 1895[20] article XIV, §2	Nov. 7, 1916	For: Against:	506,563 658,269

		Nov. 3, 1936	For:	1,413,604	convention called[21]
			Against:	1,190,275
		Nov. 5, 1957[22]	For:	1,242,568
			Against:	1,368,063
Michigan	Const. 1850[23] article XX, §2	Nov. 1866	For:	79,505[24]	convention called: Laws of Mich., 1867, No. 41
			Against:	28,623
		Nov. 1882	For:	20,937
			Against:	35,123
		Nov. 8, 1898	For:	162,123	no convention called[25]
			Against:	127,147
	Const. 1908[26] article XVII, §4	1926	For:	119,491
			Against:	285,252
		1942	For:	408,188
			Against:	468,506
		1958	For:	821,282	no convention called[27]
			Against:	608,365
		1961	For:	596,433	convention called[28]
			Against:	573,012
	Const. 1963[29] article XII, §3
Maryland	Const. 1851[30] article XI	No vote taken[31]

State	Const. Provision	Date	Vote	Results when Majority Voted for a Convention
	Const. 1864[32] article XI, §3
	Const. 1867[33] article XIV, §2	Nov. 8, 1887	For: 72,464[34] Against: 105,735
		Nov. 5, 1907	For: 32,778 Against: 87,035
		Nov. 4, 1930	For: 108,351 Against: 93,701	no convention called[35]
		Nov. 7, 1950	For: 200,439 Against: 56,998	no convention called[36]
Ohio	Const. 1851[37] article XVI, §3	Oct. 10, 1871	For: 264,970[38] Against: 104,231	convention called: Laws of Ohio, 1873, pp. 6-8
		Nov. 3, 1891	For: 99,784 Against: 161,722
		Nov. 8, 1910	For: 693,263 Against: 161,722	convention called: Laws of Ohio, 1911, pp. 298-303
		1932	For: 853,619 Against: 1,056,855
		1952	For: 1,020,235 Against: 1,977,313
Iowa	Const. 1857[39] article X, §3	1870	For: 24,846[40] Against: 82,039

		1880	For:	69,762
			Against:	83,784
		1890	For:	27,806
			Against:	159,394
		1900	For:	176,337[41]
			Against:	176,892
		1910	For:	134,083[42]
			Against:	166,054
		1920	For:	279,652[43]	no convention
			Against:	221,763	called[44]
		1930	For:	140,667[45]
			Against:	195,356
		1940	For:	199,247[46]
			Against:	353,142
		1950	For:	221,189[47]
			Against:	319,704
		1960	For:	470,257[48]
			Against:	534,628
Virginia	Const. 1870[49] article XII	1888	For:	3,698[50]
			Against:	63,125
Oklahoma	Const. 1907[51] article XXIV, §2	Nov. 2, 1926	For:	47,510[52]
			Against:	241,040
		Nov. 7, 1950	For:	159,908
			Against:	347,143

State	Const. Provision	Date	Vote	Result when Majority Voted for a Convention
		Mar. 17, 1970	For: 58,223[53] Against: 187,934
Missouri	Const. 1875[54] article XV, §4	Aug. 2, 1921	For: 175,355[55] Against: 127,130	convention called[56]
		Nov. 3, 1942	For: 366,018[57] Against: 265,294	convention called[58]
	Const. 1945[59] article XII, §3(a)	Nov. 6, 1962	For: 295,972[60] Against: 519,499
Alaska	Const. 1959[61] article XIII, §3	[62]
Hawaii	Const. 1959[63] article XV, §2	[64]
Connecticut	Const. 1965[65] article XIII, § § 2,3
Arkansas	Const. 1970[66] article XII, §2
Illinois	Const. 1970[67] article XIV, §1

[1] In order the more effectually to adhere to the principles of the constitution, and to correct those violations which by any means may be made therein, as well as to form such alterations as from experience shall be found necessary, the general court which shall be in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, shall issue precepts to the selectmen of the several towns, and to the assessors of the unincorporated plantations, directing them to convene the qualified voters of their respective towns and plantations, for the purpose of collecting their sentiments on the necessity or expediency of revising the constitution, in order to amendments. And if it shall appear, by the returns made, that two-thirds of the qualified voters throughout the state, who shall assemble and vote in consequence of the said precepts, are in favor of such revision or amendment, the general court shall issue precepts, or direct them to be issued from the secretary's office, to the several towns to elect delegates to meet in convention for the purpose aforesaid.

The said delegates to be chosen in the same manner and proportion as their representatives in the second branch of the legislature are by this constitution to be chosen.

[2] Morison, The Vote of Massachusetts on Summoning a Constitutional Convention, 1776-1916, 50 MASS. HIST. SOC. PROC. 241, 247 (1917).

[3] No convention was called because the constitution required a two-thirds majority in favor of a convention before one was to be called.

[4] The New Hampshire Constitution of 1792, part II, section 99 provided:
It shall be the duty of the selectmen and assessors of the several towns and places in this State, in warning the first annual meetings for the choice of senators, after the expiration of seven years from the adoption of this constitution as amended, to insert expressly in the warrant this purpose among others for the meeting, to wit: to take the sense of the qualified voters on the subject of a revision of the constitution; and the meeting being warned accordingly, and not otherwise, the moderator shall take the sense of the qualified voters present as to the necessity of a revision; and a return of the number of votes for and against such necessity shall be made by the clerk, sealed up, and directed to the general court at their then next session; and it if shall appear to the general court, by such return, that the sense of the people of the State has been taken, and that, in the opinion of the majority of the qualified voters in the State, present and voting at the said meetings, there is a necessity for a revision of the constitution, it shall be the duty of the general court to call a convention for that purpose; otherwise the general court shall direct the sense of the people to be taken, and then proceed in the manner before mentioned; the delegates to be chosen in the same manner and proportioned as the representatives to the general court: Provided, That no alterations shall be made in this constitution before the same shall be laid before the towns and unincorporated places, and approved by two-thirds of the qualified voters present and voting on the subject.
Section 100 provided:
"And the same method of taking the sense of the people as to the revision of the constitution, and calling a convention for that purpose, shall be observed afterward, at the expiration of every seven years."
Articles 99 and 100 were amended in 1964 to provide, in part:
Amendments to this constitution may be proposed by the general court or by a constitutional convention selected as herein provided.
(a) The senate and house of representatives, voting separately, may propose amendments by a three-fifths vote of the entire membership of each house at any session.
(b) The general court, by an affirmative vote of a majority of all members of both houses voting separately, may at any time submit the question 'Shall there be a convention to amend or revise the constitution?' to the qualified voters of the state. If the question of holding a convention is not submitted to the people at some time during any period of ten years, it shall be submitted by the secretary of state at the general election in the tenth year following the last submission. If a majority of the qualified voters voting on the question of holding a convention approves it, delegates shall be chosen at the next regular general election, or at such earlier time as the legislature may provide, in the same manner and proportion as the representatives to the general court are chosen. The delegates so chosen shall convene at such time as the legislature may direct and may recess from time to time and make such rules for the conduct of their convention as they may determine.

[5] The election results for the years 1800, 1807, 1821, 1833, 1834, 1838, 1844, 1847, 1850, 1858, 1861, 1863, 1864, 1876, 1884, 1886, 1894, 1896 and 1900 are found in COLBY, MANUAL OF THE CONSTITUTIONS OF THE STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE 191-239 (1902).

[6] The election results for the years 1814, 1868, 1870, 1910, 1916, 1924, 1928, 1937, 1946, 1954 and 1962 are contained in a letter from Constance T. Rinden, Assistant Law Librarian, New Hampshire State Library, to Author, October 9, 1968.

[7] Letter from Constance T. Rinden to Author, October 28, 1969, indicates that there are no sources available to indicate when mandatory referenda were submitted from 1833 to the present. She indicates that in 1828 the expediency of taking the sense of the voters was referred to a committee which never reported it out. The question was not raised in the legislature until 1832, when action was taken. For these reasons, the 1833 referendum and subsequent submissions to the people have all been included in this appendix.

[8] Although the vote taken showed a majority, the Senate and House of Representatives at the June session, 1861, failed to agree upon a bill for a convention. Colby, supra note 5 at 218.

[9] The legislature, at the June session, 1865, by joint resolution decided to take no action. Id.

[10] That the citizens of this State may have an opportunity to amend or change this constitution in a peaceable manner, if to them it shall seem expedient, the persons qualified to vote for representatives shall, at the general election to be held in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninty-seven, vote also, by ballot, for or against a convention, as they shall severally choose to do; and if thereupon it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens in the State voting for representatives have voted for a convention, the general assembly shall direct that a similar ballot shall be taken the next year; and if thereupon it shall also appear that a majority of all the citizens in the State voting for representatives have voted for a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there shall be in the house of representatives, to be chosen in the same manner, (at the same places and at the same time that representatives are,) by the citizens entitled to vote for representatives, and to meet within three months after the said election for the purpose of readopting, amending, or changing this constitution. If it shall appear upon the ballot of either year that a majority of the citizens voting for representatives is not in favor of a convention being called, it shall not be done until two-thirds of both branches of the legislature shall deem it expedient.

[11] Executive Papers of Governor James Garrard, Section 1, Box 2, Jacket 8.

[12] No convention was called because the constitution required a second submission in 1798.

[13] Executive Papers of Governor James Garrard, Section 1, Box 2, Jacket 9.

[14] 2 LITTELL, THE STATUTE LAW OF KENTUCKY 211-12 (1810).

[15] Every twelfth year, after this Constitution shall have taken effect, at the general election held for Governor there shall be a poll opened in which the qualified electors of the State shall express, by vote, whether they are in favor of calling a convention or not; and if there should be a majority of all the votes given at such election in favor of a convention, the Governor shall inform the next General Assembly thereof, whose duty it shall be to provide, by law, for the election of the members to the convention, the number thereof, and the time and place of their meeting, which law shall not be passed unless agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to both branches of the General Assembly, and which convention, when met, shall have it in their power to raise, amend or change the Constitution. But as the holding any part of the human creation in slavery or involuntary servitude can only originate in usurpation and tyranny, no alteration of this Constitution shall ever take place so as to introduce slavery or involuntary servitude in this State otherwise than for the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

[16] KETTLEBOROUGH, CONSTITUTION MAKING IN INDIANA 608-10 (1916).

[17] Id. at 610-12.

[18] At the general election to be held in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and also at such time as the Legislature may by law provide, the question, 'Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and amend the same?' shall be decided by the electors qualified to vote for members of the Legislature; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified, voting at such election, shall decide in favor of a Convention for such purpose, the Legislature at its next session, shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

[19] The election results for the years 1866, 1886, 1916, 1936, and 1957 are found in MANUAL FOR THE USE OF THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK 316, 318, 322, 329, 339, (1967).

[20] At the general election to be held in the year one thousand nine hundred and sixteen, and every twentieth year thereafter, and also at such times as the Legislature may by law provide, the question, 'Shall there be a convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?' shall be decided by the electors of the State; and in case a majority of the electors voting thereon shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the electors of every senate district of the State, as then organized, shall elect three delegates at the next ensuing general election at which members of the Assembly shall be chosen, and the electors of the State voting at the same election shall elect fifteen delegates-at-large. The delegates so elected shall convene at the capitol on the first Tuesday of April next ensuing after their election, and shall continue their session until the business of such convention shall have been completed. Every delegate shall receive for his services the same compensation and the same mileage as shall then be annually payable to members of the Assembly. A majority of the convention shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and no amendment to the Constitution shall be submitted for approval to the electors as hereinafter provided, unless by the assent of a majority of all the delegates elected to the convention, the yeas and nays being entered on the journal to be kept. The convention shall have the power to appoint such officers, employés and assistants as it may deem necessary, and fix their compensation and to provide for the printing of its documents, journal and proceedings, choose its own officers, and be the judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its members. In case of a vacancy, by death, resignation or other cause, of any district delegate elected to the convention, such vacancy shall be filled by a vote of the remaining delegates representing the district in which such vacancy occurs. If such vacancy occurs in the office of a delegate-at-large, such vacancy shall be filled by a vote of the remaining delegates-at-large. Any proposed constitution or constitutional amendment which shall have been adopted by such convention, shall be submitted to a vote of the electors of the State at the time and in the manner provided by such convention, at an election which shall be held not less than six weeks after the adjournment of such convention. Upon the approval of such constitution or constitutional amendments, in the manner provided in the last preceding section, such constitution or constitutional amendment, shall go into effect on the first day of January next after such approval.

[21] Because the constitution is self-executing, no legislation was necessary.

[22] The New York Constitution of 1895, article XIV, section 2 was amended on November 8, 1938, and was renumbered article XIX, section 2. This provision states:

At the general election to be held in the year nineteen hundred fifty-seven, and every twentieth year thereafter, and also at such times as the legislature may by law provide, the question Shall there be a convention to revise the constitution and amend the same? shall be submitted to and decided by the electors of the state; and in case a majority of the electors voting thereon shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the electors of every senate district of the state, as then organized, shall elect three delegates at the next ensuing general election, and the electors of the state voting at the same election shall elect fifteen delegates-at-large. The delegates so elected shall convene at the capitol on the first Tuesday of April next ensuing after their election, and shall continue their session until the business of such convention shall have been completed. Every delegates shall receive for his services the same compensation as shall then be annually payable to the members of the assembly and be reimbursed for actual traveling expenses, while the convention is in session, to the extent that a member of the assembly would then be entitled thereto in the case of a session of the legislature. A majority of the convention shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and no amendment to the constitution shall be submitted for approval to the electors as hereinafter provided, unless by the assent of a majority of all the delegates elected to the convention, the ayes and noes being entered on the journal to be kept. The convention shall have the power to appoint such officers, employees and assistants as it may deem necessary, and fix their compensation and to provide for the printing of its documents, journal, proceedings and other expenses of said convention. The convention shall determine the rules of its own proceedings, choose its own officers, and be the judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its members. In case of a vacancy, by death, resignation or other cause, of any district delegate elected to the convention, such vacancy shall be filled by a vote of the remaining delegates representing the district in which such vacancy occurs. If such vacancy occurs in the office of a delegate-at-large, such vacancy shall be filled by a vote of the remaining delegates-at-large. Any proposed constitution or constitutional amendment which shall have been adopted by such convention, shall be submitted to a vote of the electors of the state at the time and in the manner provided by such convention, at an election which shall be held not less than six weeks after the adjournment of such convention. Upon the approval of such constitution or constitutional amendment, in the manner provided in the last preceding section, such constitution or constitutional amendment shall go into effect on the first day of January next after such approval.

[23] The Michigan Constitution of 1850, article XX, section 2 provided, in part:

At the general election to be held in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and in each sixteenth year thereafter, and also at such other times as the legislature may by law provide, the question of a general revision of the constitution shall be submitted to the electors qualified to vote for members of the legislature; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified, voting at such election, shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the legislature, at the next session, shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such convention.

An 1862 amendment did not change the substance of this section.

[24] The election results for the years 1866, 1882, 1898, 1926, 1942, 1958 and 1961 are contained in a letter from Bernard J. Apol, Director of Elections, to Author, September 5, 1968.

[25] No call for a convention was forthcoming because a majority of all the voters in the election did not vote affirmatively as was necessary to require a convention to be held.

[26] The Michigan Constitution of 1908, article XVII, section 4 provided:

At the general election to be held in the year nineteen hundred twenty-six, in each sixteenth year thereafter and at such other times as may be provided by law, the question of a general revision of the Constitution shall be submitted to the electors qualified to vote for members of the Legislature. In case a majority of such electors voting at such election shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, at the next biennial spring election the electors of each senatorial district of the State as then organized shall elect three delegates. The delegates so elected shall convene at the State capitol on the first Tuesday in September next succeeding such election, and shall continue their sessions until the business of the convention shall be completed. A majority of the delegates elected shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The convention shall choose its own officers, determine the rules of its proceedings and judge of the qualifications, elections and returns of its members. In case of a vacancy by death, resignation or otherwise, of any delegate, such vacancy shall be filled by appointment by the Governor of a qualified resident of the same district. The convention shall have power to appoint such officers, employes and assistants as it may deem necessary and to fix their compensation, and to provide for the printing and distribution of its documents, journals and proceedings. Each delegate shall receive for his services the sum of one thousand dollars and the same mileage as shall then be payable to members of the Legislature, but such compensation may be increased by law. No proposed Constitution or amendment adopted by such convention shall be submitted to the electors for approval as hereinafter provided unless by the assent of a majority of all the delegates elected to the convention, the yeas and nays being entered on the journal. Any proposed Constitution or amendments adopted by such convention shall be submitted to the qualified electors in the manner provided by such convention on the first Monday in April following the final adjournment of the convention; but, in case an interval of at least ninety days shall not intervene between such final adjournment and the date of such election, then it shall be submitted at the next general election. Upon the approval of such Constitution or amendments by a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon such Constitution or amendments shall take effect on the first day of January following the approval thereof.

This section was amended by initiative petition and ratified at election on November 8, 1960. This amendment provided:

At the biennial spring election to be held in the year 1961, at each sixteenth year thereafter and at such times as may be provided by law, the question of a general revision of the constitution shall be submitted to the electors qualified ro vote for members of the legislature. In case a majority of the electors voting on the question shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, at an election to be held not later than 4 months after the proposal shall have been certified as approved, the electors of each house of representatives district as then organized shall elect 1 delegate for each state representative to which the district is entitled and the electors of each senatorial district as then organized shall elect 1 delegate for each state senator to which the district is entitled. The delegates so elected shall convene at the capital city on the first Tuesday in October next succeeding such election, and shall continue their sessions until the business of the convention shall be completed. A majority of the delegates elected shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The convention shall choose its own officers, determine the rules of its proceedings and judge of the qualifications, elections and returns of its members. In case of a vacancy by death, resignation or otherwise, of any delegate, such vacancy shall be filled by appointment by the governor of a qualified resident of the same district. The convention shall have power to appoint such officers, employees and assistants as it may deem necessary and to fix their compensation, and to provide for the printing and distribution of its documents, journals and proceedings. Each delegate shall receive for his services the sum of 1,000 dollars and the same mileage as shall then be payable to members of the legislature, but such compensation may be increased by law. No proposed constitution or amendment adopted by such convention shall be submitted to the electors for approval as hereinafter provided unless by the assent of a majority of all the delegates elected to the convention, the yeas and nays being entered on the journal. Any proposed constitution or amendments adopted by such convention shall be submitted to the qualified electors in the manner provided by such convention on the first Monday in April following the final adjournment of the convention; but, in case an interval of at least 90 days shall not intervene between such final adjournment and the date of such election, then it shall be submitted at the next general election. Upon the approval of such constitution or amendments by a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon such constitution or amendments shall take effect on the first day of January following the approval thereof.

[27] No call for a convention was forthcoming because a majority of all the voters in the election did not vote affirmatively. See Stoliker v. Waite, 359 Mich. 65, 101 N.W.2d 299 (1960).

[28] Constitutional provision is self-executing so no enabling legislation was necessary.

[29] At the general election to be held in the year 1978, and in the 16th year thereafter and at such times as may be provided by law, the question of a general revision of the constitution shall be submitted to the electors of the state. If a majority of the electors voting on the question decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, at an election to be held not later than six months after the proposal was certified as approved, the electors of each representative district as then organized shall elect one delegate and the electors of each senatorial district as then organized shall elect one delegate at a partisan election. The delegates so elected shall convene at the seat of government on the first Tuesday in October next succeeding such election or at an earlier date if provided by law.

[30] It shall be the duty of the legislature, at its first session immediately succeeding the returns of every census of the United States, hereafter taken, to pass a law for ascertaining, at the next general election of delegates, the sense of the people of Maryland in regard to the calling of a convention for altering the constitution; and in case the majority of votes cast at said election shall be in favor of calling a convention, the legislature shall provide for assembling such convention, and electing delegates thereto at the earliest convenient day; and the delegates to the said convention shall be elected by the several counties of the State and the city of Baltimore, in proportion to their representation respectively in the senate and house of delegates at the time when said convention may be called.

[31] MARYLAND CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION COMMISSION, REPORT 49, 444-45 (1967).

[32] At the general election to be held in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, and in each twentieth year thereafter, the question, 'Shall there be a convention to revise, alter or amend the constitution,' shall be submitted to the electors of the State, and in any case a majority of all the electors voting at such election shall decide in favor of a convention, the general assembly at its next session shall provide by law for the election of delegates and the assembling of such convention, as is provided in the preceding section; but no amendment of this constitution agreed upon by any convention assembled in pursuance of this article shall take effect until the same shall have been submitted to the electors of this State, and adopted by a majority of those voting thereon.

[33] The Maryland Constitution of 1867, article XIV, section 2 as originally adopted provided, in part:

> It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide by Law for taking, at the general election to be held in the year eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, and every twenty years thereafter, the sense of the people in regard to calling a convention for altering this Constitution; and if a majority of voters at such election or elections shall vote for a convention, the General Assembly, at its next session, shall provide by Law for the assembling of such convention, and for the election of Delegates thereto. Each County and Legislative District of the City of Baltimore shall have in such convention a number of Delegates equal to its representation in both Houses at the time at which the convention is called.

The Maryland Constitution of 1867, article XIV, section 2 was amended in 1922 by the addition of article XVII, section 9 which provided:

> The vote to be held under the provisions of section two of article fourteen of the Constitution for the purpose of taking the sense of the people in regard to calling a Constitutional Convention shall be held at the general election in the year nineteen hundred and thirty, and every twenty years thereafter.

Article XVII, section 9 was repealed in 1956 and article XIV, section 2 was amended to provide, in part:

> It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide by Law for taking, at the general election to be held in the year nineteen hundred and seventy, and every twenty years thereafter, the sense of the People in regard to calling a Convention for altering this Constitution; and if a majority of voters at such election or elections shall vote for a Convention, the General Assembly, at its next session, shall provide by Law for the assembling of such convention, and for the election of Delegates thereto. Each County, and Legislative District of the City of Baltimore, shall have in such Convention a number of Delegates equal to its representation in both Houses at the time at which the Convention is called.

[34] The election results for the years 1887, 1907, 1930 and 1950 are found in MARYLAND CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION COMMISSION, REPORT 65 (1967).

[35] Id. at 433-34.

[36] Id. at 433-34.

[37] The Ohio Constitution of 1851, article XVI, section 3 provided:

> At the general election, to be held in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and in each twentieth year thereafter, the question: 'Shall there be a convention to revise, alter, or amend the constitution?' shall be submitted to the electors of the state; and, in case a majority of all the electors, voting at such election, shall decide in favor of a convention, the General Assembly, at its next session shall provide, by law, for the election of delegates, and the assembling of such convention, as it provided in the preceding section; but no amendment of this constitution, agreed upon by any convention assembled in pursuance of this article, shall take effect, until the same shall have been submitted to the electors of the state, and adopted by a majority of those voting thereon.

This section was amended on September 3, 1912, to provide:

> At the general election to be held in the year one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two, and in each twentieth year thereafter, the question: 'Shall there be a convention to revise, alter, or amend the constitution' shall be submitted to the electors of the state; and in case a majority of the electors, voting for and against the calling of a convention, shall decide in favor of a convention, the general assembly, at its next session, shall provide, by law, for the election of delegates, and the assembling of such convention, as is provided in the preceding section; but no amendment of this constitution, agreed upon by any convention assembled in pursuance of this article, shall take effect, until the same shall have been submitted to the electors of the state, and adopted by a majority of those voting thereon.

[38] The election results for the years 1871, 1891, 1910, 1932 and 1952 are found in Appendix 580, OHIO REV. CODE ANN. (Page 1955).

[39] The Iowa Constitution of 1857, article X, section 3 provides:

> At the general election to be held in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and in each tenth year thereafter, and also at such times as the General Assembly may, by law, provide, the question, 'Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and amend the same?' shall be decided by the electors qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified, voting at such election for and against such proposition, shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the General Assembly, at its next session, shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

This section was amended in 1964 to provide, in part:

At the general election to be held in the year one thousand nine hundred and seventy, and in each tenth year thereafter, and also at such times as the General Assembly may, by law, provide, the question, 'Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and propose amendment or amendments to same?' shall be decided by the electors qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified, voting at such election, for and against such proposition, shall decide in favor of a Convention for such purpose, the General Assembly, at its next session, shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such Convention, and for submitting the results of said Convention to the people, in such manner and at such time as the General Assembly shall provide.

[40] Election results for the years 1870, 1880, and 1890 are found in DOCUMENTARY MATERIAL RELATING TO THE HISTORY OF IOWA, 282-83 (B. F. SHAMBAUGH ed. 1897).

[41] 19 IOWA OFFICIAL REGISTER 363 (1901).

[42] 24 IOWA OFFICIAL REGISTER 457 (1911-1912).

[43] 29 IOWA OFFICIAL REGISTER 483 (1921-1922).

[44] SHAMBAUGH, CONSTITUTIONS OF IOWA 281-83 (1934).

[45] Letter from Robert C. Landes, Deputy Secretary of State, to Author, September 6, 1968.

[46] Des Moines Register, January 1, 1961, at 10, col. 6.

[47] 44 IOWA OFFICIAL REGISTER 318 (1951-1952).

[48] 49 IOWA OFFICIAL REGISTER 369 (1961-1962).

[49] The Virginia Constitution of 1870, article XII provides, in part:

At the general election to be held in year 1888, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and also at such time as the general assembly may by law provide, the question, 'Shall there be a convention to revise the constitution and amend the same?' shall be decided by the electors qualified to vote for members of the general assembly; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified voting at such election shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the general assembly at its next session shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such convention: Provided, That no amendment or revision shall be made which shall deny or in any way impair the right of suffage, or any civil or political right as conferred by this constitution, except for causes which apply to all persons and classes without distinction.

The 1887 Code of Virginia numbers this provision as section 2; however, The Acts of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia (1870), The Code of Virginia (1873), and 7 THORPE, THE FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS 3897-98 (1909) treat this and the preceding provision as one article without sections.

[50] W. VAN SCHREEVEN, THE CONVENTIONS AND CONSTITUTIONS OF VIRGINIA, 1776-1966, 15 (1967).

[51] No convention shall be called by the legislature to propose alterations, revisions, or amendments to this constitution, or to propose a new constitution, unless the law providing for such convention shall first be approved by the people on a referendum vote at a regular or special election, and any amendments, alterations, revisions, or new constitution, proposed by such convention, shall be submitted to the electors of the State at a general or special election and be approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon, before the same shall become effective: Provided, That the question of such proposed convention shall be submitted to the people at least once in every twenty years.

[52] Election results for the years 1926 and 1950 are contained in a letter from Basil R. Wilson, Secretary, State Election Board, to Author, September 18, 1968.

[53] Letter from Basil R. Wilson, Secretary, State Election Board, to Author, May, 1970.

[54] This section was submitted by initiative and adopted November 2, 1920. The provision states:

The question 'Shall there be a convention to revise and amend the Constitution?' shall be submitted to the electors of the state at a special election to be held on the first Tuesday in August, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, and at each general election next ensuing the lapse of twenty successive years since the last previous submission thereof, and in case a majority of the electors voting for and against the calling of a convention shall vote for a convention, the governor shall issue writs of election to the sheriffs of the different counties, ordering the election of delegates, and the assembling of such convention, as is provided in the preceding section.

[55] OFFICIAL MANUAL STATE OF MISSOURI 478-79 (1921-22).

[56] The convention was called by the governor, as provided by the Missouri Constitution article XV, section 4.

[57] OFFICIAL MANUAL STATE OF MISSOURI 397-98 (1943-44).

[58] The convention was called by the governor, as provided by the Missouri Constitution article XV, section 4.

[59] This section provides, in part:

At the general election on the first Tuesday following the first Monday in November, 1962, and every twenty years thereafter, the secretary of state shall, and at any general or special election the general assembly by law may, submit to the electors of the state the question 'Shall there be a convention to revise and amend the Constitution?'. The question shall be submitted on a separate ballot without party designation, and if a majority of the votes cast thereon is for the affirmative, the governor shall call an election of delegates to the convention on a day not less than three nor more than six months after the election on the question. At the election the electors of the state shall elect fifteen delegates-at-large and the electors of each state senatorial district shall elect two delegates. Each delegate shall possess the qualifications of a senator; and no person holding any other office of trust or profit (officers of the organized militia, school directors, justices of the peace and notaries public excepted) shall be eligible to be elected a delegate. To secure representation from different political parties in each senatorial district, in the manner prescribed by its senatorial district committee each political party shall nominate but one candidate for delegate from each senatorial district, the certificate of nomination shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state at least thirty days before the election, each candidate shall be voted for on a separate ballot bearing the party designation, each elector shall vote for but one of the candidates, and the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes in each senatorial district shall be elected. Candidates for delegates-at-large shall be nominated by nominating petitions only, which shall be signed by electors of the state equal to five percent of the legal voters in the senatorial district in which the candidate resides until otherwise provided by law, and shall be verified as provided by law for initiative petitions, and filed in the office of the secretary of state at least thirty days before the election. All such candidates shall be voted for on a separate ballot without party designation, and the fifteen receiving the highest number of votes shall be elected. Not less than fifteen days before the election, the secretary of state shall certify to the county clerk of the county the name of each person nominated for the office of delegate from the senatorial district in which the county, or any part of it, is included, and the names of all persons nominated for delegates-at-large.

[60] OFFICIAL MANUAL STATE OF MISSOURI 1179 (1963-64).

[61] If during any ten-year period a constitutional convention has not been held, the secretary of state shall place on the ballot for the next general election the question: 'Shall there be a Constitutional Convention?' If a majority of the votes cast on the question are in the negative, the question need not be placed on the ballot until the end of the next ten-year period. If a majority of the votes cast on the question are in the affirmative, delegates to the convention shall be chosen at the next regular statewide election, unless the legislature provides for the election of the delegates at a special election. The secretary of state shall issue the call for the convention. Unless other provisions have been made by law, the call shall conform as nearly as possible to the act calling the Alaska Constitutional Convention of 1955, including, but not limited to, number of members, districts, election and certification of delegates, and submission and ratification of revisions and ordinances. The appropriation provisions of the call shall be self-executing and shall constitute a first claim on the state treasury.

[62] Letter from Thelma Cutler, Director of Elections to Author, October 21, 1969:

The question of a constitutional convention will appear on the ballot in the 1970 General Election and the voters will vote on the question at that time.

[63] This section provides, in part:

> The legislature may submit to the electorate at any general or special election the question, 'Shall there be a convention to propose a revision of or amendments to the Constitution?'. If any ten-year period shall elapse during which the question shall not have been submitted, the lieutenant governor shall certify the question, to be voted on at the first general election following the expiration of such period. If a majority of the ballots cast upon such question be in the affirmative, delegates to the convention shall be chosen at the next regular election unless the legislature shall provide for the election of delegates at a special election . . . Unless the legislature shall otherwise provide, there shall be the same number of delegates to the convention, who shall be elected from the same areas, and the convention shall be convened in the same manner and have the same powers and privileges, as nearly as practicable, as provided for the convention of 1968.

The only change in this language adopted in 1968 was the reference to the 1968 convention in place of the 1950 convention.

[64] Hawaii held a convention in 1968 pursuant to a 1966 referendum authorized by the legislature. Porteus, The Constitutional Convention of Hawaii of 1968, 42 STATE GOV. 97 (1969). Thus another vote is not required in Hawaii until 1976.

[65] The question 'Shall there be a Constitutional Convention to amend or revise the Constitution of the State?' shall be submitted to all the electors of the state at the general election held on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November in the even-numbered year next succeeding the expiration of a period of twenty years from the date of convening of the last convention called to revise or amend the constitution of the state, including the Constitutional Convention of 1965, or next succeeding the expiration of a period of twenty years from the date of submission of such a question to all electors of the state, whichever date shall last occur. If a majority of the electors voting on the question shall signify 'yes', the general assembly shall provide for such convention as provided in Section 3 of this article.

> In providing for the convening of a constitutional convention to amend or revise the constitution of the state the general assembly shall, upon roll call, by a yea vote of at least two-thirds of the total membership of each house, prescribe by law the manner of selection of the membership of such convention, the date of convening of such convention, which shall be not later than one year from the date of the roll call vote under Section 1 of this article or one year from the date of the election under Section 2 of this article, as the case may be, and the date for final adjournment of such convention.

[66] This section is included in the proposed new constitution of Arkansas which will be submitted to the voters at the 1970 general election. The section provides:

> A constitutional convention may be called by law, by initiative or by the voters of the State at a general election upon submission of the question by resolution of the General Assembly. If a constitutional convention has not been held or if the question of calling a convention has not been submitted to the voters of the State for a period of twenty years, then the question shall be submitted at the next general election. The General Assembly shall provide by law for the holding of a convention within one year after a majority of those voting on the question approves the calling of a convention.

[67] This section has tentatively been approved by the 1969-70 Illinois constitutional convention. It is subject to being finally included in the convention's draft constitution and being approved by the Illinois voters in December, 1970. The section provides, in part:

> In the year 1990 and every twenty years thereafter the Secretary of State shall submit to the electors at the general election in that year the question of whether a Constitutional Convention should be called, unless there has been a similar submission during the preceding twenty years.
>
> The vote on calling a Convention shall be on a separate ballot. A Convention shall be called if three-fifths of those voting on the question vote in the affirmative.
>
> The General Assembly shall, at the next session following approval by the electorate, provide for the Convention and for the election on a non-partisan ballot of two delegates from each senatorial district. The General Assembly shall designate the day, hour and place of the Convention's initial meeting, which shall be within three months after the election of delegates. The General Assembly shall fix the pay of delegates and officers, and provide for that pay together with all expenses necessarily incurred by the Convention in the performance of its duties.

(St. Louis Univesity Law Journal--1971)

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS: PRECEDENTS, PROBLEMS, AND PROPOSALS

THOMAS A. GILLIAM*

INTRODUCTION

The evidence suggests that, after nearly one hundred years, there is a possibility of a second constitutional convention. If this be the case, solutions to the problems of a twentieth-century convention will soon become necessary. The problems themselves, perhaps, may be grouped into categories, the most immediate being those centering around the issue of Congressional discretion in calling a convention when the legislatures of two-thirds of the states request it, in view of seemingly mandatory phrasing of article V of the Constitution. If so, inquiry follows regarding the extent to which a convention is to be controlled, its composition (to insure that its members represent the people) and the subject matter of its deliberation (to insure that any constitutional change proposed reflects not a wholesale tampering with the Constitution, but deals with a particular alleged dissatisfaction). Then there may remain the issue of what alternatives are available even beyond those that are constitutionally provided. In the remainder of this article the available precedents, pertinent Congressional history, and the most important scholarly writings will be examined and evaluated and a few conclusions will be made.

Article V of the Constitution requires that:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . .

The only remaining precondition is that "no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate." It could be thought, since the convention method of proposing amendments is initiated by the states, that it is the function of Congress to propose amendments from time to time on particular controversies, and that of states to apply through the convention method for general revision of the Constitution. Still, that does not seem to have been the general intent of the Framers, whose debates reflect that a convention was only a means of providing the states with an alternative should the national legislature refuse to act on some desired constitutional change.[1] However, James Madison felt that the article enabled both the general and state governments "to originate the amendment of errors."[2] A fear of another convention was expressed then,[3] as now, although Hamilton felt that if it were requested by the requisite number of states, Congress had no alternative but to call one.[4] This expression of fear and of limitation may have been precipitated by the precedent of the Convention of 1787 itself. Its delegates had disregarded the instructions from the Continental Congress to simply amend the Articles of Confederation, although in the end the Framers still sought the approval of the Congress of the draft product.[5]

* Thomas A. Gilliam, Assistant City Attorney, Denver, Colorado; Member of the Colorado Bar.

Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., the noted authority of Constitutional law in the Senate, most recently involved in the problems of article V, notes that the Founders did not place the new government in the strait-jacket that inhibited the Confederation (the inability to change fundamental law without the consent of every state), but instead compromised between those who would utilize state legislatures as the sole means of initiating amendments, and those who would lodge it in the national legislature.[6] Nevertheless, with the adoption of the Constitution,[7] a new federalism developed with Congress taking the lead as to the amendatory power. While the impetus for inclusion of the Bill of Rights came from the states,[8] it was Congress that initiated the first ten amendments, thereby becoming an active participant in the continuing constitution-making process of 1787. Also, while conceiv-

1. M. FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787, 203-04 (1937).

2. The Federalist No. 43[42] (J. Madison); that every amendment is a single proposition, see The Federalist No. 85 (A. Hamilton).

3. See Carson, Disadvantages of a Federal Constitutional Convention, 66 MICH. L. REV. 921 (1968), citing Charles Pickney of North Carolina in the closing debate of the Philadelphia Convention, September 15, 1787, that "Conventions are serious things and ought not to be repeated."

4. The Federalist No. 85 (A. Hamilton).

5. American Enterprise Institute, Special Analysis: A Convention to Amend the Constitution? (1967) found in Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 128 (1968), citing J. BECK, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 173 (1924).

6. Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875, 881 (1968).

7. Rhode Island, it has been noted, did not participate in the Convention of 1787 and did not ratify the Constitution until more than a year after the required ninth state had done so. Forkosch, The Alternative Amending Clause in Article V: Reflections and Suggestions, 51 MINN. L. REV. 1053, 1067 (1967).

8. Brickfield, Staff of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 8th Cong., 1st Sess., Problems Relating To A Federal Constitutional Convention 7 (Comm. Print 1957), notes that as early as 1789 New York and Virginia made application for a general convention for inclusion of the Bill of Rights. This was also the concern of the closing debate of the Convention of 1787 with reference to holding another convention for this purpose, see note 3 supra.

ably those amendments could have been incorporated in the main body of the Constitution, Congress added them as separate articles of amendment and set a pattern for the amendatory power that has been followed ever since.

That Congress has a large measure of control over the process of amendment was further illustrated by Hollingsworth v. Virginia.[9] In that case, questions were raised as to the effect and validity of the Eleventh Amendment limiting the judicial power, including the question as to whether the amendment was void for not having been submitted by Congress for Presidential approval. It was questioned whether this failure of submission contravened section 7 of article I of the Constitution, requiring such approval of every Congressional order, resolution or vote.[10] The Court held that the procedure adopted for the amendment was valid even though it had been urged that it was no answer to the question to observe that the two-thirds vote of Congress needed to initiate amendments was the same vote that would override the executive's negative. This did not answer the question, it was argued, because his reasons for disapproval might be so satisfactory as to reduce the vote below the constitutional proportion.[11]

The Court's holding in Hollingsworth appears to have been predicated upon the premise that the first ten amendments had not been submitted for Presidential approval, the Court reasoning that the proposition or adoption of amendments was unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation.[12] The case has been taken ever since, with reference to a state's application for a constitutional convention, as also not requiring the submission to a state's governor of the application.[13] And while it has been urged that the exclusion of the executive is more appropriate to a parliamentary system where executive and legislative functions are intertwined,[14] with reference to gubernatorial power, it has been pointed out that in the beginning very few of the original states lodged veto power in that office.[15] And in regard to the Presidency, the Founding Fathers could have included his office expressly as a third participating agency of the Government had it been their desire to do so. It also appears that the participation of the Vice-President in the amendatory process was not contemplated.[16]

---

9. 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).
10. Id.
11. Id. at 378-79.
12. Id. at 380 n.(a).
13. See e.g. Ervin, supra note 6, at 888-89.
14. McCleskey, Along the Midway: Some Thoughts on Democratic Constitution-Amending, 66 MICH. L. REV. 1001, 1014 (1968).
15. Brickfield, supra note 8, at 1.
16. Forkosch, supra note 7, at 1054 n.10, citing 3 FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787 400 (1911); Staff Report to the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 82nd Cong., 2nd Sess., Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Fed-

INTERIM PRECEDENT

After these initial clues to the States' amending power, little light was shed on this area in the first one hundred years of constitutional history, for during that century only ten petitions for a constitutional convention were received from the states.[17] There was little to note in this interim period except that the Congressional refusal to permit several states to withdraw their approval of post-Civil War amendments was probably more attributable to the temper of the time than related to the question of whether States may rescind their applications before two-thirds have completed the petitioning process.[18] Finally, however, in 1887, Judge John A. Jameson filled the breach of commentary on the subject with an extensive work wherein he inquired of the typical American constitutional convention generally:

> Is this institution, it might be asked, subject to any law, to any restriction? What claims does it itself put forth, and what do the precedents teach, in relation to its nature and powers? When called into existence, is it the servant, or the master, of the people, by whom it was spoken into being?[19]

In distinguishing the functions and purposes of the revolutionary convention, so often confounded with the constitutional convention,[20] Jameson viewed the latter as being subaltern to and never supplanting the existing organization and never governing.[21] He asserted that sovereignty is not vested in the states but in the Congress that represents all of the people.[22] In view of the shared power to propose amendments, he felt that delegates to a constitutional convention also ought to be elected by the entire electoral body.[23] While conceding that the delegates should be given the liberty to discharge in some measure their essential function of deliberation,[24] Jameson found from precedent generally that a constitutional convention has no inherent rights and exercised delegated power only.[25] Consequently, unless the convention could point to express general authority to propose amendments at will, it could be restricted to a specific mandate.[26] The end product of the convention's deliberations, he concluded, was eral Tax Rates, 103 (Comm. Print 1942), citing from Annals 8th Cong., 1st Sess., remarks of Pierce Butler, who had been a member of the Convention of 1787.

---

17. Brickfield, supra note 8, at 7.

18. Bonfield, The Dirksen Amendment and the Article V Convention Process, 66 MICH. L. REV. 949, 967 n.70 (1968).

19. J. JAMESON, A TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS, THEIR HISTORY, POWERS, AND MODES OF PROCEEDING 2 (4th ed. 1887).

20. Id. at 6-9.

21. Id. at 10.

22. Id. at 51-52.

23. Id. at 258-69.

24. Id. at 364.

25. Id. at 408, citing Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39 (1874), where a court enjoined commissioners appointed by a convention from holding an election on the convention's terms when the enabling legislation had provided otherwise.

26. J. JAMESON, supra note 19, at 412.

subject to legislative review before submission to the people.[27]

Jameson clearly did not envision a runaway federal convention, although perhaps he realized its possibility since he made so strong an argument for control. The states, in any event, were receptive to his point of view and thereafter forwarded petitions only for specific reforms.[28] The greatest demand was that for the direct election of Senators, and, from 1893 to 1911, a total of seventy-three petitions were received by the Congress from thirty-one legislatures on that subject.[29] This was an impressive request, if not the requisite one, for there is scholarly research that only around two-thirds of the states then existing had so petitioned.[30] The Senate had blocked passage of a House resolution for a constitutional amendment for the popular election of Senators, and, only after such incisive state demand, did it concur in the resolution submitting the Seventeenth Amendment to State legislatures for approval.[31] This, of course, may have been an indication that the Senate, at least, did not believe that it could control the action of a constitutional convention in this area in which it had an obvious vested interest, though it is doubtful this decision was made on strictly constitutional grounds. It has been observed, however, that Congress, by taking the easy way out, hardly refuted Jameson's theory of the ancillary role of a constitutional convention and did not decide this all important, pivotal issue.[32]

Judicial Precedent

As previously noted, the Supreme Court's early determination that submission by Congress of an amendment for Presidential approval is not constitutionally required was probably predicated upon the fact that the Bill of Rights itself had not been so submitted.[33] Thus, regard may have been given to the course of action that Con-

27. Id. at 421. Jameson's conclusion as to a reasonable time limit for ratification of amendments was "that an alteration to the Constitution . . . has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of to-day, and that, if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed by Congress," id. at 634. Jameson also concluded that a State, after once taking action on an amendment, might reconsider and reverse its previous action prior to binding action by the States. Id. at 624-33.

28. These ranged from the prohibition of polygamy to world federal government, Brickfield, supra note 8 at 74.

29. Id. at 7.

30. Id. at 74 and House Comm. on the Judiciary, State Applications Asking Congress to Call a Federal Constitutional Convention, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (Comm. Print 1959), also prepared by Brickfield, where he indicates that "on one occasion, at least, more than the necessary two-thirds of the number of States then comprising the Union had submitted applications seeking a convention on the same subject matter", citing to 23 app. Table 2, Item 1, relating to the direct election of Senators.

31. Brickfield, supra note 8, at 8.

32. American Enterprise Institute, Special Analysis found this in Hearings, supra note 5, at 129.

33. Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378, 380 (1798).

gress had pursued, a precedent that gained added impetus subsequently in the Court's dictum that questions pertaining to amendments of constitutions belonged to the political power and not to the judicial.[34] Again, in refusing to enjoin President Andrew Johnson from enforcing Reconstruction legislation, the Court had remarked that neither Congress nor the President can be restrained by the judicial department.[35] In a series of cases from 1920 to 1939, however, the Court did take cognizance of questions pertaining to amendments of the Constitution, although summarily disposing of the objections raised.

In Hawke v. Smith, No. 1,[36] the Court held that the action of a State legislature in ratifying the proposed Eighteenth Amendment could not be referred to the electors of the state, for the provisions of its constitution requiring such a referendum were inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. While this case by analogy may be taken to prohibit the imposition of a popular referendum upon any part of the amendatory process, it does not necessarily mean that a Congressional referendum of an advisory nature is also prohibited, as will be considered later. Nor was this the only question raised by the Eighteenth Amendment, for when it was enacted, it gave rise to a number of questions in the National Prohibition Cases.[37] There it was belatedly urged that the power of amendment was limited to the correction of errors in the Constitution's framing and does not contemplate the adoption of additional and supplementary provisions. It was further contended that ordinary legislation could not be embodied in a constitutional amendment, and, also, that amendments could not be proposed that involved the exercise or relinquishment of a State's sovereign powers.[38] In these cases, and in Leser v. Garnett,[39] wherein a similar States' rights argument was made against the Nineteenth Amendment (women's suffrage), the Court entertained but rejected the arguments and held the amendments valid. Thus, it would appear that amendments, as indicated by the above examples, may upset the "balance" of the federal system (at least in the eyes of the beholder!).

More important to the subject of discussion here, the Court indicated in Leser v. Garnett,[40] as it had in Hawke v. Smith, No. 1,[41] that a State legislature in its participation in the amending process is per-

34. Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 1, 39 (1849).
35. Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475, 500 (1866). This general judgment of the Court has not been followed absolutely. See Youngstown Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952) and Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969).
36. 253 U.S. 221 (1920).
37. 253 U.S. 350 (1920).
38. E. CORWIN, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA 800 (1964).
39. 258 U.S. 130 (1922).
40. Id. at 137.
41. 253 U.S. 221, 230 (1920).

forming a federal function, not subject to limitation by the State. It should also be noted that on the same day that Leser v. Garnett was decided, the Court held that the general right of a citizen to have the government administered according to law does not entitle him to institute a suit in the federal courts to secure a determination of whether a constitutional amendment about to be adopted will be valid.[42] Thus, with this limitation on the justiciability of attempted attack and its subordination of the States' role in the amendatory process, the Court tended in the post-World War I era to defer to Congress as the main arbiter of questions under article V. In Dillon v. Gloss,[43] the Court further held that, since the article implies that amendments submitted thereunder must be ratified within some reasonable time after their proposal, that Congress may fix, as it did for ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment, seven years for ratification. In Dillon, the Court, moreover, cited Jameson[44] that constitutional alteration should relate to the "felt needs of today,"[45] thereby giving an indication that Congress, if it desired, could also decide the time limits within which the states must make application for a convention so as to express those needs. This view is reinforced by the Court's finding that "proposal and ratification are not treated [by article V] as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor."[46]

In United States v. Sprague[47] the Court rejected another contention against the Eighteenth Amendment, namely, that it should have been ratified by convention rather than by State legislatures, as Congress pursuant to the choice granted by article V had selected. The argument in support of the contention rejected in Sprague was that legislatures are incompetent to surrender personal liberties of the people under the Tenth Amendment. Perhaps now, however, it could be argued in view of the new vitality of the Ninth Amendment,[48] (providing as it does that the enumeration of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people) that use of a national plebiscite in the process of amending the Constitution is not barred by article V. Indeed, the Supreme Court of Rhode Island in In re Opinion to the Governor,[49] held that an alternative method of amending the State's constitution was not impliedly prevented by the constitution's listing of but one method of amendment. In that case the statutory alternative advanced and upheld was the convention method of proposing amendments as opposed to the listed constitutional method of legislative proposal. In the course of its opinion, the 42. Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126, 129-30 (1922).

43. 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
44. Id. at 375.
45. Text in note 27 supra.
46. 256 U.S. 368, 374 (1921).
47. 282 U.S. 716 (1931).
48. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).
49. 55 R.I. 56, 178 A. 433 (1935).

court approved language that the right of amendment is construed from the fact that the people undoubtedly possessed the right in the beginning and have not parted with it by expressly confining amendment to some other method.[50] Nevertheless, it may be that, since federal judicial precedent is that the States at least may not ratify amendments by referendum,[51] Congress would be unwilling in the usual case to resort to the ballot box.

The paramount role of Congress in matters of federal constitutional amendment was perhaps made most apparent by the Supreme Court in Coleman v. Miller,[52] though the issues there involved again largely related to the role of the States in the amendatory process. One such issue was that the proposed Child Labor Amendment to the Constitution had suffered a tie vote in the State Senate of Kansas but was broken in favor of the proposal by its Lieutenant Governor. The measure duly passed both houses of the State legislature, and members opposing the amendment unsuccessfully petitioned the Kansas Supreme Court to declare that the measure had not validly passed in view of their allegation that the Lieutenant Governor should not have participated. They also urged that the proposed amendment had been previously rejected by the State and that it had lost vitality since twelve years had elapsed between Congressional submission and the State's most recent action. The United States Supreme Court, while holding that plaintiffs had standing to take an appeal,[53] was equally divided on the participation of the Lieutenant Governor[54] and so let the decision of the state court stand. As to the effect of the previous rejection of the amendment, the Court noted that the state court had cited[55] Jameson to the effect that article V says nothing of rejection but speaks only of ratification and provides that a proposed amendment shall be valid as part of the Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the States.[56] Subscribing to this view, the Court did not go behind the State's resolution of ratification.[57] On the third issue, dis-

50. Id. at 451, citing HOLCOMBE, STATE GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES 97 (1926). The court also followed the recognized rule "that if two constructions of a constitutional provision are reasonably possible, one of which would diminish or restrict a fundamental right of the people and the other of which would not do so, the latter must be adopted." 178 A. at 441-42.

51. Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U.S. 221 (1920). ORFIELD, AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 37 (1942), takes the view that either this case held that article V indicates that its methods of amendment are exclusive or that other methods would be revolutionary. Cf. Brickfield, supra note 8, at IX-X, to the effect that the Court has never held that the Constitution may be amended in any other way than in accordance with article V, and Jameson, supra, note 19, at 624 that Congress can only act within the special powers received from the people.

52. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

53. Id. at 437-46.

54. Id. at 446-47.

55. Id. at 447, n.13.

56. J. JAMESON, supra note 19, §§ 576-81.

57. 307 U.S. 433, 447-51 (1939).

tinguishing Dillon v. Gloss[58] wherein it had held the seven years fixed by Congress for ratification of an amendment to be reasonable, the Court found it did not follow, whenever the Congress had failed to exercise the power of time limitation, that the Court should take upon itself the responsibility of deciding what constitutes a reasonable time.[59] Since the question of a reasonable time as to the ratification of an amendment would involve a great variety of political, social and economic conditions, the Court concluded that it was a political question to be decided by Congress.[60]

Thus, again the Court indicated that questions as to the amendatory power were, in the main, political. Four justices, concurring, would have gone further. They were of the view that:

> The Court here treats the amending process of the Constitution in some respects as subject to judicial construction, in others as subject to the final authority of the Congress . . . . No such division between the political and judicial branches of the government is made by Article V which grants power over the amending of the Constitution to Congress alone. Undivided control of that process has been given by the Article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is 'political' in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point.[61]

Professor Orfield, writing in 1942, also complained of the Court's position in that

> [i]f the Supreme Court is not ready to apply the doctrine of political questions to all phases of the amending process, as four members of the court wish, it will apply it to some phases of the amending process and what such phases are remains largely uncertain.[62]

He succinctly listed the difficulties or obstacles to obtaining Court review on any part of the process: whether a justiciable question is presented, whether a case may have been brought in the proper court, whether it is timely, whether brought by a proper party plaintiff, or whether there was an actual controversy.[63] As a result, it would appear that the determination of questions relating to the convention method of amending the Constitution will largely remain with Congress.

Congressional Precedent

In the last two decades, a number of proposals have been studied by Congressional committees in seeking a solution to the problems raised by the possibility of a constitutional convention. One such

---

58. 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
59. 307 U.S. 433, 451-53 (1939).
60. Id. at 453-54.
61. Id. at 456, 458-59.
62. Orfield, supra note 51, at 36 (1942).
63. Id.

proposal, entitled the "Constitutional Convention Act of 1953",[64] developed as the result of a number of petitions then received for constitutional limitations on federal taxation.[65] It provided that a State could adopt a resolution favoring the calling of a convention to propose an amendment generally revising the Constitution, or to propose one or more amendments of a limited nature, and that the resolution shall be effective for the purposes of the Act without regard to whether it is approved or disapproved by the state's governor.[66] The proposed Act thus attempted to solve several problems in the manner suggested by precedent. It further provided that if during a seven-year period resolutions were received from two-thirds or more of the states, and, if each were of the same general nature as each other, a resolution to call the convention would be in turn introduced by Congressional judiciary committee chairmen that would be non-amendable and subject to limited debate.[67] The President of the Senate was to be the interim chairman, and, each state was to have a number of votes equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which it was entitled in the Congress. The votes were to be cast as the majority of the State's delegates present decided, and any amendment proposal required the affirmative vote of a group of states having two-thirds or more of the total votes cast on the proposal.[68] It was further provided that no convention called to propose an amendment of a limited nature shall propose any amendment whose general nature differed from that stated in the resolution calling the convention.[69]

This draft legislation, by designating seven years as the limit of vitality of State petitions for Congressional consideration, selected the same time limit that Congress had previously set for ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment.[70] Orfield, who has written the most recent treatise on the subject and who has suggested perhaps a generation as the maximum time, nevertheless had also found a perfect analogy to the time that Congress had previously allowed for ratification.[71] Despite this, and although from 1939 to 1957 petitions had been received from twenty-seven States seeking a limitation on the federal taxing power,[72] the next legislative proposal considered by House Judiciary Committee provided for an effective time for appli-

64. Staff Report to the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 82nd Cong., 2d Sess., Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates, App. 21-24 (1952).
65. Id. at 24-27.
66. Id. at 21, § 2(b).
67. Id. at 22, § 3(c).
68. Id. at 23-24, §§ 5(c), 6(a).
69. Id. at 24, § 6(b).
70. See Dillon v. Gloss, supra note 43.
71. ORFIELD, supra note 51, at 42-43.
72. Brickfield, Staff of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess., Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention 89 (Comm. Print 1957).

cations of fifteen years.[73] Had this provision been enacted, however, it would have eliminated some of the State petitions on the provocative subject of federal tax limitation. This new proposal, moreover, would have provided that States may rescind their applications at any time except when two-thirds of the States had valid applications pending on the same subject.[74] In other ways it was similar to the previous proposal, except that the Chief Justice was to be the interim chairman of a convention that would be composed of as many delegates from each State as it was entitled to Representatives in Congress.[75] A substantial difference was that each State would have one vote with a majority of the total vote cast being sufficient to propose amendments.[76] Further procedures limiting the convention's session to one year and providing for approval of Congress of the convention's work were based upon the Constitutional Convention of 1787.[77]

Thus, there was evolving in the House Judiciary Committee, at least, greater Congressional direction of the States' amendatory process. Impetus for federal tax limitation also grew. In 1961, a study by the staff of the Joint Economic Committee of the House and Senate revealed that, since the late thirties, thirty-one States had enacted resolutions that would set a twenty-five percent limit on federal income, estate, and gift taxes during peacetime, and that, in two years prior to the study, four States had enacted resolutions for the outright repeal of the Sixteenth Amendment.[78] If those petitions had been taken as all relating to the same subject matter, then again there was a subject ripe for a constitutional convention. Undoubtedly, however, Congress by its inaction felt that the applications were neither sufficiently contemporaneous so as to reflect the state of public opinion at a given time, nor sufficiently relevant to the same subject matter as to have warranted so drastic a step affecting the economy. This was the apparent conclusion of the Joint Committee's study, for it listed Orfield, among others, in support of its conclusion that lack of relevancy and timeliness was "the position most commonly held."[79] Thus, treatises and other legal writings have influenced informal Congressional attention given to conventions, as well as the more formal treatment by the courts of the general amendatory power.[80]

---

73. Id. at 79, § 5(a).
74. Id., § 5(b).
75. Brickfield, supra note 72, at 80, §§ 7(a), 8(a).
76. Id., §§ 9(a), 10(a).
77. Brickfield, supra note 72, at 76.
78. The Proposed 23d Amendment to the Constitution to Repeal the 16th Amendment to the Constitution Which Provides That Congress Shall Have Power to Collect Taxes on Income, S. Doc. No. 5, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1961).
79. Id. at 23-24, citing Corwin and Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Conventions, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW., 185, 194-96 (1951); ORFIELD, supra note 51, at 41-42; and Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 ILL. L. REV. 782, 792-794 (1927), in accord for the time element but contra as to the subject matter of the petitions, 21 ILL. L. REV. 795.
80. See text to notes 55-56 and 44-45 supra.

The recent attraction of a constitutional convention arose, of course, with reference to the holdings of the Supreme Court regarding the apportionment of legislative bodies.[81] Even while entering "the political thicket"[82] of reapportionment, however, the Court may have indicated the extent of its participation in the amendatory process. As shown before, the trend of decision has been to leave a large measure of control over the process to Congress, the Court abstaining from the political question it thought Congress better able to handle. But in Baker v. Carr,[83] the first of the reapportionment cases, the Court indicated where the political question arose in government by stating:

> . . . it is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States, which gives rise to the 'political question.'[84]

Here may be the solution of the problem that Orfield noted[85] as being unanswered in Coleman v. Miller, that is, where and when the Court would deal with questions as to the amendatory procedure. While the Court might hesitate in assuming direction over Congressional action in the process, it might not be as reluctant with reference to the action of the States.

In December, 1962, the Sixteenth Biennial General Assembly of the States in initial reaction to Baker v. Carr resolved in favor of a constitutional amendment, inter alia, to limit the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary thereby excluding State reapportionment cases, and the petitions of three States, among the many since seeking a convention, immediately dealt with that subject.[86] But it was not so much Baker v. Carr as Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly[87] that caused widespread ire, particularly that of the late Senator Dirksen.[88] In the latter case, two amendments had been referred to the people of Colorado, one seeking the reapportionment of both houses of the 81. See e.g. Avery v. Midland County, 390 U.S. 474 (1968); Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly, 377 U.S. 713 (1964); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

---

82. Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549, 556 (1948).

83. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

84. Id. at 210. But see Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 518-49 (1969), where the Court, after reviewing the several criteria as to a political question set forth in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. at 217, concluded from historical precedent that Powell was at least entitled to a declaratory judgment that he was wrongfully excluded from Congress, the Court reiterating from the Baker case at 211, that it was its responsibility to act as the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution.

85. Note 62 supra and accompanying text.

86. Hearings on S. 2307 Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 114-17, (1968) [hereinafter referred to as Hearings] from American Enterprise Institute, Special Analysis: A Convention to Amend the Constitution? (1967).

87. 377 U.S. 713 (1964).

88. Dirksen, The Supreme Court and the People, 66 MICH. L. REV. 837, 849-56 (1968).

General Assembly on a strict population basis, which resulted in a substantial defeat, and the other, known as the "Federal plan", that allowed the members of the State senate to be elected on additional relevant factors. The "Federal plan" had substantial success.[89] The Court's requirement in Lucas, nevertheless, that both houses of the legislature be apportioned on a population basis, led to Dirksen's labelling of the Court as a "judiocracy."[90] It also led to his unsuccessful attempt to introduce in the Senate an amendment following the Colorado example,[91] and to applications for a convention from a majority of State legislatures along similar lines proposing specific amendments for the convention's action.[92]

Opposition to this campaign to overrule the Court gained support in the United States Senate. Former Senator Paul Douglas declared, "In my opinion, and that of other observers, there is little expectation that the Congress will call a convention even if two-thirds of the State legislatures pass the applications. It cannot, I believe, be forced to do so."[93] Senator Dirksen's later response was to point to the obligation of the oath upon members of Congress to respond and, should they not, that perhaps the Supreme Court could by mandamus order them to do so.[94] It seems doubtful to this author that the Supreme Court would make such an extravagant extension of the Powell v. McCormack decision, though admittedly the possibility does exist.

Debate continued in the Senate giving rise to new questions on the reapportionment issue not heretofore raised by precedent. In a floor speech, former Senator Tydings asked, "Should Congress regard as invalid petitions from malapportioned legislatures calling for a constitutional amendment to authorize malapportionment?"[95] His answer was "[E]very first-year law student knows the basic principles of equity that a claimant 'must come into court with clean hands' before the court will hear his claim", and that "no illegally apportioned

---

89. Id. at 849.
90. Id. at 839.
91. Id. at 856-59.
92. Hearings, supra note 86, at 115-18.
93. Hearings on Reapportionment of State Legislatures Before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 35, 40 (1965) (statement of Senator Paul Douglas).
94. Dirksen, supra note 88, at 868-71.
95. 113 Cong. Rec. 10101 (1967). While acknowledging by reference to Ryan v. Tinsley, 316 F.2d 430, 432 (10th Cir. 1963), that to rule invalid all acts of malapportioned legislatures would produce chaos, Senator Tydings cited Toombs v. Fortson, 205 F. Supp. 248 (N.D. Ga. 1962), vacated in part and remanded, 279 U.S. 621 (1965), as a holding of a federal court enjoining a general assembly from calling a constitutional convention to revise a state constitution until reapportioned, 113 Cong. Rec. supra note 95, at 10102. Analysis of that case, however, reveals that the lower court's order was against submission of a new constitution drafted by the legislature itself, but left no doubt that the malapportioned legislature could call a convention whose delegates were elected on a valid apportionment basis, Hearings, supra note 86, at 125 from American Enterprise Institute, Special Analysis.

legislature had 'clean hands' in calling for a constitutional convention to legitimize its own illegality."[96] His second argument was on more familiar ground: the identity of the subject matter of the petitions. Three sought to deprive the federal courts of all reapportionment jurisdiction, he pointed out, whereas the remainder would allow one house of a State legislature to be apportioned on the basis of factors other than population, subject matters that he considered to be fundamentally different.[97]

The late Senator Robert Kennedy also presented new and old grounds for rejecting the petitions. He again urged that twenty-six of the thirty-two resolutions then received were invalidly enacted, since many legislatures were malapportioned when they passed them, and that "[t]heir hastily enacted and ill-considered applications are thus nothing more than attempts of malapportioned bodies to preserve their lost power."[98] He also urged that Congress could not join the three petitions seeking to strip the judiciary of all jurisdiction in reapportionment cases with those petitions sanctioning malapportionment in only one house of a bicameral legislature.[99] Senator Kennedy's third argument was that the resolutions, by stipulating in favor of the texts of the amendments and in favor of ratification by State legislatures, were invalid for making the convention merely a ratifying rather than deliberative agency in the amendatory process, and in disregard of the power of Congress under article V to decide the method of ratification.[100] Finally, he felt that, because the great majority of the States submitting petitions were malapportioned at the time of submission and had subsequently changed their composition and outlook, Congress would be justified in setting a two or three year time limit in order to represent "a valid reflection of the will of the people at any one time."[101]

Senator Javits was another who felt that there was a commanding case for rescission of petitions in view of his fear of a constitutional convention on the issue.[102] Senator Dirksen, on the other hand, saw no basis for this fear and pointed out that, although some of the applications dated back to 1963, Dillon v. Gloss had upheld a seven year period set by Congress with reference to amendatory procedures.[103]

Floor debate was apparently abandoned on the subject, but Senator Ervin introduced a bill seeking a solution to the problems of a con-

96. 113 Cong. Rec. supra note 95, at 10102, citing Petuskey v. Rampton, 243 F. Supp. 365, 374 (D. Utah 1965).
97. 113 Cong. Rec. supra note 95, at 10103.
98. Id. at 10105.
99. Id.
100. Id.
101. 113 Cong. Rec. supra note 95, at 10105-06.
102. Id. at 10108-09.
103. Id. at 10110-11, 10113.

stitutional convention. In hearings on the bill, Senator Proxmire continued the debate by noting the lack of publicity given to the matter as it was rushed through State legislatures and difficulties encountered in some efforts since made at rescission.[104] Theodore Sorensen saw serious flaws in the Ervin bill itself. His principal objections to it were: (1) it permitted delegates to be appointed instead of requiring that they be elected, (2) it gave to each state delegation a unit vote and (3) it let the conventions propose amendments by a majority rather than by a two-thirds vote of its members.[105] His opposition to the latter provision was as much directed against the convention method itself, for he pointed out that after thirty-four states that might represent as little as thirty percent of the population had called the convention, twenty-six states representing one-sixth of the population could propose new amendments, before thirty-eight states that could represent less than forty percent of the population ratified them.[106] Sorensen also urged a reduction of the six year period provided by the bill during which the states might petition amendment, and for a cooling-off period of at least a year between receipt by Congress of the requisite number of applications and its authorization of "so potentially drastic a convention."[107] Thus, while he may have feared it, his testimony was not directed so much against the possibility of a runaway convention as it was to the possibility that the convention method of amendment could be the expression of a minority will.

Congressional Solution

As a result of the hearing on the bill, it was amended to provide a four year period for the submission of amendments but without the "cooling-off period" suggested by Sorensen.[108] The bill, however, was superseded in the Ninety-First Congress, and the new bill provided for the traditional seven-year period.[109] In this respect, the bill hardly differed from a less formal predecessor in the House, except that the Vice-President was to be the interim presiding officer.[110] The differences between it and legislation previously proposed were that a convention was to be composed of as many delegates from each State as it was entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress, two delegates to be elected at large and one from each congressional district,[111] and that the vote on amendments was to be by a majority of the total

104. Hearings, supra note 86, at 8-9, 11.
105. Id. at 36-37.
106. Id. at 37.
107. Id.
108. Ervin, Proposed Legislation to Implement the Convention Method of Amending the Constitution, 66 MICH. L. REV. 875, 897 § 5(a) (1968).
109. S. 623, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., § 5a (Comm. Print 1969).
110. Id. § 8(a), the earlier proposal being note 64 supra and text accompanying notes 66 to 69.
111. S. 623, supra note 109, § 7(a).

number of delegates.[112] The bill also followed other thoughts Sorensen had about the convention amendatory process:[113] exclusion of a state's governor from participation, deletion of a specific expense provision as premature and flexibility in the method of ratification.[114]

Apparently, after eliminating the State unit vote, it was thought unnecessary to require a two-thirds vote by convention delegates to propose amendments. The bill, however, would require a State legislature to state the nature of an amendment or amendments that it proposed and have Congress determine if there were in effect valid applications made by two-thirds of the States with respect to the same subject.[115] This determination, together with a provision that Congress disapprove of a proposed amendment by the convention if it related to or included a subject differing from, or that was not included in, the convention's call,[116] would afford a large measure of control by Congress in furtherance of its representation of the people. It is not unlikely, moreover, that the bill will be amended in passage to require of a convention the same vote that Congress itself must have to propose constitutional amendments. At least previous consideration was given to this by a House Judiciary Committee when a constitutional limitation regarding federal tax rates was under consideration.[117]

Nor is the foregoing proposal the only course of action that Congress may take. It could simply take no action at all. There is again precedent in the more probable interpretation of its earlier determination that proposals for limiting or repealing of the federal income tax provisions had insufficient concurrence of the States either as to subject matter or timeliness.[118] Even after receiving applications from two-thirds of the States, Congress could follow the precedent it took as to the popular election of Senators by initiating the amendment itself[119] and thereby avoiding the questions of the convention alternative. More probably, however, Congress will enact an agreed on version of the proposed legislation. Even then, under a prominent feature of the current proposal and on grounds of previous debate,[120] a majority of either House may reasonably decide that there are not enough valid applications in effect.

Finally, Congress could, under section 18 of article I of the Constitution, refer to the electorate the question as to whether malappor-

112. Id., § 10(a).
113. Hearings, supra note 86, at 38.
114. S. 623, supra note 109, §§ 3(a), 12(b); 8(b) and 12(b) and (c).
115. S. 623, supra note 109, §§ 2 and 6(a).
116. Id., § 11(b)(1); or it could be because procedures specified were not followed, i.e. each delegate to have one vote and the convention should terminate within a year unless the period were extended by Congress, id., § 9.
117. Note 64 supra and text to note 68.
118. Text accompanying notes 78 and 79 supra.
119. Supra note 30.
120. S. 623, supra note 109, § 6(a) and text to notes 95-100.

tioned legislative bodies may still be tolerated. It might let this nation of nomads decide. Even if that would not be a binding decision, it would at least enable Congress to determine whether the States' petitions reflect the will of the people. This latter course of action would seem entirely within the power of Congress under the "necessary and proper" clause contained in that section. A better indication of a real desire for change would seem to be indicated on this question. In the last analysis it is difficult to conceive of the States as entities apart from the people.

Conclusion

There is ample precedent showing a certain evolution toward the solution of the problems of a constitutional convention. An alternative method of solution may be indicated, however, as to the reapportionment issue. Short of amendment of article V itself, containing as it does a process of amendment that may not reflect the national will, an impending constitutional crisis may be averted by some direct reference to that will. For the proposed amendment on apportionment is a case where a right of all of the people, achieved after extensive litigation of cases and controversies and change of position, is now sought to be curtailed by a relatively unpublicized attempt to amend the Constitution, potentially by a minority. Since the Court has determined the "one-man-one-vote" principle to be a right of the whole electorate, Congress in this instance at least might take special care to ascertain if there is a present desire to surrender to any degree the right to equal representation.

South Dakota Law Review

VOLUME 9 SPRING 1964

CONFEDERATION vs. UNION

By GEORGE MCGOVERN*

"One Country, One Constitution, and One Destiny." Daniel Webster's conclusion and plea, is once again challenged. New anti-Federalists seek to fragment the unitary, national character of our civil rights and duties. They have proposed Constitutional change intended to permit the several states to go their separate ways on public issues of vital national character.

These men have offered to the state legislatures three amendments to the Federal Constitution. The first permits a minority of states to amend the Constitution without application for a national consensus on the proposal. The second subjects Supreme Court judgments relating to federal-state jurisdiction to review by a superior court made up of the Chief Justices of the 50 states. The third permits entrenched minority rule to circumscribe democratic government in the states. All, to Charles L. Black, Jr., Professor of Jurisprudence at Yale Law School, are "radical in the extreme".[1] As a former professor of American history and as a practicing politician, I agree with Professor Black.

It is curious to see how these "radical" proposals have been propelled into prominence and adoption by nearly twenty state legislatures to the point now that there is a serious possibility they will become the law of the land. Less than a year and a half ago, on July 27, 1962, officials representing twelve Southern states, all delegates to the regional meeting of the Council of State Governments, met in Biloxi, Mississippi. Concerned with the effect of federal Constitutional litigation from Brown v. Board of Education[2] to Baker v. Carr[3] on the civil rights posture in their states, these officials adopted two resolutions: the first, to forbid federal judicial intervention in state legislative ap-

* B.A. 1946, Dakota Wesleyan University; M.A. 1949, Ph.D. 1952, Northwestern University; United States Senator from South Dakota.

1. As quoted in CONG. REC. 8263 (daily Ed. May 15, 1963).
2. 349 U.S. 294 (1955).
3. 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

portionment, and the second, to curb the jurisdiction of the federal courts and strengthen the Tenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

As an example of how a minority proposal without grass roots support can be catapulted to endorsement by a widely respected and influential national conference of responsible citizens, the capable reporter, Fred J. Cook, has chronicled the growth of the Biloxi resolutions.[4] The National Legislative Conference meeting in Phoenix, September 21, 1962, passed a resolution, "Strengthening the states in the Federal System," detailing its Federal-State Relations Committee to report to the December meeting of the General Assembly of the States on how the Constitution could be amended effectively by state initiation for the purpose of strengthening state sovereignty. The members of this Federal-State Relations Committee were selected by the Chairman of the National Legislative Conference, a man of like mind to the Biloxi delegates. Understandably, of the nine man committee he selected, eight strongly supported the state sovereignty proposal. Using the Biloxi resolutions as a base, the Federal-State Relations Committee drafted the three amendments discussed below including the suggested method of having them adopted: upon "application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states" followed by a national convention and subsequent ratification by three-fourths of the states.[5]

The Council of States Governments, without endorsement but at the Federal-State Relations Committee's request, placed the three amendments before the General Assembly of the States, meeting in Chicago December fifth. The General Assembly, a gathering of state legislators and officials, received copies of the three proposed amendments only on the day they were brought out. There was little debate, no time for the opposition to organize its objections, less for proper reflection on the effect these amendments to our Constitution would have on effective government and Federal-State jurisdiction. Reportedly, the resolutions were brought out, read, debated and passed all in two hours. The votes on these resolutions were as follows:[6]

---

4. COOK, THE PROGRESSIVE, (1963). Another history of the proposals may be found in Morgan, "Seventeen States Vote to Destroy Democracy as We Know It," Look, Dec. 3, 1963, p. 76.

5. The efficacy of this method has been attacked by Professor Black in "The Proposed Amendment to Article V: A Threatended Disaster," 72 YALE L. J. 957 (1963).

6. 36 STATE GOVERNMENT 12-15.

AMENDMENT	STATE DELEGATIONS For	Against	Passing
—To simplify state initiation of proposed amendments	37	4	4
—To establish a "Court of the Union" to review Supreme Court decisions relating to the rights reserved to the states.	21	20	5
—To eliminate Federal review of apportionment of State Legislatures	26	10	10

Thus, the small group of state officials meeting in Biloxi, Mississippi had obtained apparent endorsement by the General Assembly of the States, a national body of state officials, in just five and one half months. Now, armed with this "national consensus" many state legislators felt empowered to seek adoption of the resolutions in their own legislatures, resolutions which if finally enacted would increase their own powers and those of their state governments.

Still lacking grass roots support and prior to representative public discussion on the resolutions, by July 1963, seven months later, seventeen states had passed one or more of them. The roll call of the states follows:[7]

State	Resolution Simplify Amendments	Court of the Union	Apportionment
Alabama		X
Arkansas	X	X	X
Florida	X	X
Idaho	X		X
Illinois	X
Kansas	X		X
Missouri	X		X
Montana			X (a)
Nebraska			X
Nevada			X

7. Information supplied by Council of State Government as of July 1963.

New Hampshire	X
			(b)
New Jersey	X	X	X
Oklahoma	X		X
South Carolina	X	X	X
South Dakota	X		X
Texas	X		X
			(c)
Utah			X
Washington			X
Wyoming	X	X	X

(a) In Nevada the proposal was vetoed by the Governor.
(b) In New Jersey the legislature later rescinded its action.
(c) In Utah the language differs from the standard resolution.

The Amendment to Simplify State Initiation of Proposed Constitutional Amendments

The first of these alleged reforms would alter the Article V procedure for amending the Constitution to the end that the state legislatures could bypass Congress, or any other national forum, such as a constitutional convention, and directly effect changes in the Constitution. Under this proposal, the existing provision in Article V for a convention would be eliminated.

Article————

Section 1. Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states. Whenever applications from the Legislatures of two-thirds of the total number of states of the United States shall contain identical texts of an amendment to be proposed, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall so certify, and the amendment as contained in the application shall be deemed to have been proposed, without further action by Congress. No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Section 2. This Article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states within seven years from the date of its submission.

The political philosophy behind this proposal mistakenly considers that the United States exists only as fifty and separate political groups and that a national interest, if it does exist, can and ought to find expression only through the separate action of a qualified majority of fifty geographical political units. National questions ought surely at some stage to be deliberated upon in a national forum. Only thus can they receive the consideration of representatives whose responsibility in office is the welfare of the country as a whole. But here is a proposal for state rule only, on the basis of state-by-state count only, and through state institutions only, with national issues submerged.

State legislatures, by the very nature of their purpose and function, have relatively small acquaintance with problems of a national character. They have little or no experience in dealing with problems in such perspective. Even given the best of intent on the part of any state legislature there would be great difficulty in acquainting the members with the attitudes, views, and needs of sections of the country other than their own. The Congress with its nationwide news is best designed to generate the kind of national debate and public scrutiny that is needed to prevent hasty or ill-advised changes in our Constitution. The issue, in short, is whether or not measures of national interest should be subjected to debate, deliberation and publicity at a national level before going out to the several states for their adoption. Do we favor a union of states or a return to the Articles of Confederation?

Using the 1960 census, Professor Black has noted that a muster of thirty-eight least populated states needed to ratify a Constitutional amendment account for 40% of the national population.[8] In these 38 state accounting for 40% of our population

8. Supra note 6, at 959.

a minority of the people elect the legislators, on the average about 38%. Thus legislators representing 38% of 40%, or some 15% of the American people, could freely amend the Constitution under this proposal. Such an exact coalition is unlikely, true, but a minority should not possess such power. Our system now places checks on the majority to ensure the rights of the minority, a negative minority power; but what is here proposed is quite the opposite. It would allow the minority to override the majority on questions that concern the very nature of our federal government and federal-state balances. It would be "a change in the distribution of ultimate power".[9]

THE AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH A "COURT OF THE UNION".

The "Court of the Union" Amendment delegates to a court composed of the fifty state chief justices convened upon motion of five non-contiguous states the power to review decisions involving a substantial question under the Tenth Amendment.

Article————

Section 1. Upon demand of the legislatures of five states, no two of which shall share any common boundary, made within two years after the rendition of any judgment of the Supreme Court relating to the rights reserved to the states or to the people by this Constitution, such judgment shall be reviewed by a Court composed of the chief justices of the highest courts of the several states to be known as the Court of the Union. The sole issue before the Court of the Union shall be whether the power or jurisdiction sought to be exercised on the part of the United States is a power granted to it under this Constitution.

Section 2. Three-fourths of the justices of the Court of the Union shall constitute a quorum, but it shall require concurrence of a majority of the entire Court to reverse a decision of the Supreme Court. In event of incapacity of the chief justice of the highest court of any State to sit upon the Court of the Union, his place shall be filled by another justice of such state court selected by affirmative vote of a majority of its membership.

9. Supra note 6, at 957.

Section 3. On the first Monday of the third calendar month following the ratification of this amendment, the chief justices of the highest courts of the several states shall convene at the national capital, at which time the Court of the Union shall be organized and shall adopt rules governing its procedure.

Section 4. Decisions of the Court of the Union upon matters within its jurisdiction shall be final and shall not thereafter be overruled by any court and may be changed only by an amendment of this Constitution.

Section 5. The Congress shall make provision for the housing of the Court of the Union and the expenses of its operation.

Section 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

The fact that this fantistic resolution has passed legislatures in only six states reflects the problems and uncertainties it creates.

Such a court, required to sit with a quorum of 38, would be inefficient. Deliberations would be cumbersome, and compromise to minimize dissenting and separate concurring opinions would be difficult. If it sat frequently and mutual confidence among the justices thrived, it would paralyze the judicial process; if it sat infrequently, its decisions would not be reliably judicious in the field of Constitutional law.

One might presume that this court will hear its first case and render its first decision under Section 1 of the Amendment from a jurisprudential base of Constiutional law already established by the U.S. Supreme Court through the years. Even so, they must be prepared to make the policy decisions required when particular cases call for interpretation of vague and sometimes conflicting provisions of the Constitution. How does this new superior court decide any more judiciously the policy issue involved in, say, the Brown[10] case? They might come to a different conclusion than the Supreme Court did,[11] but the difficult policy decision there appears to have been whether the issue presented was one of civil rights, and therefore clearly within the concern of the 14th Amendment, or public education, an area in the tradition left essentially to state concern. Clearly, both were involved. Both found sources for decision in the Constitution. The choice had to be made. The "Court of the Union" would be no better equipped, likely far less equipped, to make judicial sense out of its resolution of the conflict.

The Congress is empowered to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review Congressional enactments.[12] Although I believe that such limitations are inadvisable, I find a transfer of an important part of that jurisdiction to the "Court of the Union" destructive of the entire concept of a national government.

The Court of the Union amendment would deprive the national government of ability to function through its own institutions independent of reliance upon state concurrence, and subvert the principle of national supremacy as designed in the Constiution.[13] Upon its adoption, the United States would cease to remain a sovereign in its own house. There would arise a league of states as weak and as ineffectual as the Confederation which preceded adoption of the present Constitution.

---

10. 349 U.S. 294 (1955).

11. Justice Cardozo, reflecting on the intimacy of the making of judicial decision, said "We can never see (things) with any eyes except our own". CARDOZO, THE NATURE OF THE JUDICIAL PROCESS 13 (1921).

12. U.S. CONST. art. III, § 1.

13. The intent of the Court of the Union amendment's proponents is manifested in the Statement of Principles of the Committee on Federal-State Relations of the National Legislative Conference: "The basic difficulty is that the Supreme Court's decisions concerning the balance between federal and state power are final and can be changed in practice only if the states can muster sufficient interest in Congress, backed by a three-fourths majority of the states themselves to amend the Constitution. While the founding fathers fully expected and wished the words of the Constitution to have this degree of finality, it is impossible to believe that they envisaged such potency for the pronouncements of nine judges appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The Supreme Court is, after all, an organ of the federal government. It is one of the three branches of the national government, and in conflicts over federal and state power, the Court is necessarily an agency of one of the parties in interest. As such, its decision should not be assigned the same finality as the words of the Constitution itself. There is need for an easier method of setting such decisions straight when they are unsound.

"To amend the Federal Constitution to correct specific decisions of the federal courts on specific points is desirable, but it will not necessarily stop the continuing drift toward more complete federal domination. The present situation has taken a long time to develop and may take a long time to remedy. Accordingly, some more fundamental and far-reaching change in the Federal Constitution is necessary to preserve and protect the states." 36 STATE GOVERNMENT 10 (1963).

THE AMENDMENT TO ELIMINATE FEDERAL JUDICIAL REVIEW OF THE APPORTIONMENT OF STATE LEGISLATURES

The apportionment amendment would overrule the Supreme Court in Baker v. Carr[14] and remove from Constitutional text and federal court jurisdiction review of State apportionment of legislatures.

Article———

Section 1. No provision of this Constitution, or any amendment there to, shall restrict or limit any state in the apportionment of representation in its legislature.

Section 2. The judicial power of the United States shall not extend to any suit in law or equity, or to any controversy relating to apportionment of representation in a state legislature.

Section 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

The Amendment's proponents fear an undue encroachment by the federal courts and the Congress on the states' power to establish standards for the elections of state legislators. Baker v. Carr does not warrant this concern. It represents only a recognition of the Federal Court's power under the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution to protect the equality of individuals who are in certain circumstances cast as members of minority groups[15]

This is not a new power. With the Supreme Court decision in Gomillion v. Lightfoot,[16] the 15th Amendment has protected such persons from dilution of their political equality caused by gerrymandering of state legislative districts. Congressional districts in the several states long have been subject to federal court review on the grounds that in the election of a Congressman no American citizen counts for more than any other American citizen.[17] Justice Douglas, in his concurring opinion in Baker v. Carr[18] recites other areas in which Constitutional limits have been placed upon states' powers over voting rights.

14. 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

15. While the provision does not seem to strike at the unconstitutionality of certain situations of gerrymandering, where districts equal in number of voters are so designed to dilute the power of sizeable population groups and render them underrepresented in State Legislatures, it may render the Guaranty Clause, Article IV, Section 4 of the Constitution, forever stillborn.

16. 364 U.S. 339 (1960).

It is difficult to believe that there are legislators who support the apportionment amendment to perpetuate privilege for themselves divorced from the very principles of equality which our public institutions are bound to support and which our traditions compel us to champion.

In Baker v. Carr, the petitioners claimed among other things that the apportionment of the Tennessee lower house districts, not altered since 1901, had so diluted their votes as to violate the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment. They were not suing because they were Negroes or Jews or because they lived in cities or on farms, but because they were American citizens and residents of Tennessee. Yet, their individual right to equality in voting for members of the General Assembly of Tennessee had been effectively diluted by the twentieth century shifts in population densities and by a nineteenth century apportionment law.[19]

Let us look at the facts of this Tennessee case. Between 1901 and 1960 the state population increased from 2,020,616 to 3,567,089 and the number of qualified voters from 487,380 to 2,092,891.[20] Today 37% of the voters elect 20 of the 33 Senators and 40% elect 63 of the 99 Assemblymen.[21] Carter County with a population of 23,303 had half the representation of Maury County, population 24,556, and the same representation as Decatur County with a population of only 5,563.[22] As is clear from Table I on page 262 of the Clark opinion, disparity was statewide. Some might be explainable, Justice Clark thought, "but when the entire table is examined—comparing the voting strength of counties of like population as well as contrasting that of the smaller with the larger counties—it leaves but one

17. See United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941).
18. Id. at 242-245.
19. Plaintiffs claimed, too, that the 1901 apportionment law, based on the census of 1900, was unconstitutional. Id., at 192.
20. United States v. Classic, supra note 17, at 192.
21. Id. at 253.
22. Id. at 255.

conclusion, namely that Tennessee's apportionment is a crazy quilt without rational basis."[23]

The three judge lower court from which the appeal to the Supreme Court arose found "a clear violation of the state constitution and of the rights of the plaintiffs.[24] The evil was a serious one," the court agreed, "one which should be corrected without further delay.[25] Only, the courts, it thought, were without power to correct the evil.[26] This was a non-justiciable "political question".[27] It should be solved by the political branches of government.

The Supreme Court, in reversing, dispelled the misconception of the role of the judiciary in apportionment cases.[28] It made clear that the Constitution and the nature of the powers vested in the organs of government dictated that certain public issues were not for judicial solving. Such restraint was necessary and fruitful for the effectiveness of the system of checks and balances. When that system, however, was not affected, when federal-state relationships were involved, such Constitution bred considerations and judicial restraint were necessarily replaced "It is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government, and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States, which gives rise to the 'political question.' "[29]

---

23. Id. at 254.
24. Id. at 197.
25. Ibid.
26. Lack of a procedure for voters' initiative or referendum in Tennessee and failure of the state legislature to effect a reapportionment after several attempts to demonstrate plaintiff's need to invoke the power of th courts. 396 U.S. at 191, 193 n. 14.
27. The concept of the non-justiciable "political question" is demonstrated by such cases as Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946). It is distinguished by the Court in Baker v. Carr beginning at page 202. Interestingly, the proposed apportionment amendment would overrule this case, as well.
28. "We hold that this challenge to an apportionment presents no non-justiciable 'political question.' " 369 U.S. at 209. " '[T]he right to relief under the equal protection clause is not diminished by the fact that the discrimination relates to political rights.' " 369 U.S. at 210, quoting Snowden v. Hughes, 321 U.S. 1, 11 (1944).
29. United States v. Classic, supra note 17, at 210. The Court then stated: "We come, finally to the ultimate inquiry whether our precedents as to what constitutes a non-justiciable 'political question' bring the case before us under the umbrella of that doctrine. A natural beginning is to note whether any of the common characteristics which we have been able to identify and label descriptively are present. We find none. The question here is the consistency of state action with the Federal Constitution. We have no question decided, or to be decided, by a political branch of government coequal with this Court. Nor do we risk embarrassment of our government abroad, or grave disturbance at home if we take issue with Tennessee as to the constitutionality of her action here challenged. Nor need the appellants, in order to succeed in this action, ask the Court to enter upon policy determinations for which judicially manageable standards

There are, the Court finds, Constitutional mandates protecting the rights of individuals from state as well as federal action. Justice Brennan's majority opinion states:

> the complaint's allegations of a denial of equal protection present a justiciable constitutional cause of action upon which appellants are entitled to a trial and a decision. The right asserted is within the reach of judicial protection under the Fourteenth Amendment.[30]

"The question here", he summarizes, "is the consistency of state action with the Federal Constitution."[31]

Charging that Tennessee's apportionment statute worked an "invidious discrimination", this case could have been initiated by other claimants in other states.[32] The following table shows those states where less than 35% of the population can control the respective state lower terms[33]

State	Population of District		Percent
	Largest	Smallest	Necessary to Control
Alabama	104,767	6,743	25.7
Arkansas	31,686	4,927	33.3
Colorado	63,760	7,867	32.1
Connecticut	81,089	191	12.0
Delaware	58,228	1,643	18.5
Florida	311,682	2,868	14.7
Idaho	15,576	915	32.7
Indiana	79,538	14,804	34.8
Iowa	133,157	7,910	26.9
Kansas	68,646	2,069	18.5
Kentucky	67,789	11,364	34.1
Louisiana	120,205	6,909	34.1

are lacking. Judicial standards under the Equal Protection Clause are well developed and familiar, and it has been open to courts since the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment to determine, if on the particular facts they must, that a discrimination reflects no policy, but simply arbitrary and capricious action." Id., at 226.

30. United States v. Classic, supra note 3, at 237.

31. Ibid.

32. "At the time of the decision, some twenty-seven states were subject to apportionment laws unchanged in twenty-five years, and in about eight states there had been no change in more than fifty years." 36 STATE GOVERNMENT 13 (1963).

33. N.Y. Times, March 28, 1962, p. 22, col. 1.

Minnesota	99,446	8,343	34.5
Mississippi	59,542	3,576	29.1
Missouri	52,970	3,960	20.3
New Mexico	29,133	1,874	27.0
North Carolina	82,059	4,520	27.1
Ohio	97,064	10,274	30.3
Oklahoma	62,787	4,496	29.5
Tennessee	79,301	3,454	28.7
Utah	32,380	1,164	33.3
Vermont	33,155	38	11.6

This is nearly half of all these state. Further in New York the largest State Assembly district has a population ten times that of the smallest; in Pennsylvania, the largest is more than 27 times larger; in Rhode Island over 37 times; West Virginia, over 50 times. Facts such as these point the conclusion that "invidious discrimination" is widespread in state legislatures throughout the nation.

The threat of federal judicial review of state apportionment statutes has generated a panoply of reactions. The men at Biloxi and their followers at the Chicago meeting of the General Assembly of the States a year ago set out to reverse the decision by proposing a Constitutional amendment to eliminate federal review of state apportionment systems. The League of Women Voters, local Civil Liberties Unions, labor unions, and taxpayers have sought to implement the decision and have brought reapportionment suits before Federal and state courts in 39 states. Twenty state legislatures have proposed and adopted new apportionment plans[34]

It is the state legislatures themselves which should answer the Supreme Court's challenge. They are the prime institution through which our state democracies act. Jefferson said: "The will of the people is the only legitimate foundation of any government and to protect its free expression should be our first object."

Our state legislatures must represent their electorates.

34. N.Y. Times, Nov. 13, 1963, p. 1, col. 5. A brief state-by-state review of the cases and statutory reapportionment plans as of March 22, 1963, is found in 21 CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY 424 (1963).

This demands political equality for the voters[35] and majority rule[36] with minority rights protected. Legislators who would create or perpetuate a system not based on per capita equality must establish convincingly the rationality of such a system, the overriding values which compel its use.[37]

Legislators owe a duty of loyalty to their constituents but they also owe a duty of supreme loyalty to the democratic tradition, to that political idea which gives the color of right to the exercise of their office. If they subvert this higher loyalty and advocate a system which secures political power for entrenched minority interests, the aggrieved have little recourse except to the Court. For too long too many state legislatures have overlooked this responsibility. They have now been brought to task.

Experience has shown the need for an objective standard by which democratic representation in states is to be judged. Perhaps that standard requires only that the scheme of representation be a rational one. Circumstances in one state may justify a different scheme from an equally fair one in another state. Although the historical and dual sovereignty rationale for a bicameral legislature on the federal level does not exist at the state level, it may be Constitutionally justifiable to permit two state houses, one giving disproportional weight to the views of an important minority. Perhaps a chamber with such strong minority representation does not cause illegal discrimination if it can merely delay legislative action or can vote only on cer-

35. Although specifically avoiding concern with the Baker v. Carr problem, Justice Douglas in Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368 (1963) said, "The concept of 'we the people' under the Constitution visualizes no preferred class of voters but equality among those who meet the basic qualifications....The conception of political equality from the Declaration of Independence, to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, to the Fifteenth, Seventeenth, and Nineteenth Amendments can mean only one thing, one person, one vote." Id. at 379, 381.

36. Of course the composition of the "majority" may shift from issue to issue; but on the larger issues it will be more or less homogeneous. It may even have an agreed upon political program or platform.

In certain legislative districts the larger issues will be civil rights and job opportunities, in others better housing and welfare services, and in others taxes and improved transportation facilities. But if the majority in a district cannot marshall sufficient voter strength to elect representatives who will present their views in the legislature, the system of representational government is frustrated. If the issues are large enough, if the frustration is complete, the result may be a bypassing of the offending legislature. Recourse may then be to the state governor, Washington or the streets.

37. See Walters v. City of St. Louis, 347 U.S. 231 (1954). "Equal protection does not require identity of treatment. It only requires that classification rest on real and not feigned differences, that the distinction have some relevance to the purpose for which the classification is made, and that the different treatments be not so disparate, relative to the difference in classification, as to be wholly arbitrary." Id. at 237.

tain kinds of legislation. The Supreme Court has yet to define the scope of the standards[38] beyond outlawing the patent "invidious discrimination" of the Tennessee system.

CONCLUSION

These three proposed Constitutional amendments slipped quietly into prominence. They came from inception to serious contention for adoption in a relatively few months. Yet lawyers and judges soon saw the dangers these proposals were about to impose on our Constitutional system. Many called for public discussion of the proposals rather than hasty adoption by state legislatures.[39] Articles were written about them, and they were debated in the press and on the floor of both houses of Congress. They must be further discussed and argued. Their ramifications must be further explored and clearly understood.

What is clear is that together they would chip away our Constitutionally guaranteed rights, reverse the expansion of our individual civil rights and freedoms, take from us some of the reasons for establishing a free and democratic society and "a more perfect union." They would reincarnate the divided and ineffectual league of states which floundered under the Articles of Confederation.[40] They would institutionalize us as Alabamans, Californians, Virginians and South Dakotans first, Americans second.

But we have, in fact, fought a great Civil War under Abraham Lincoln's leadership to establish the supremacy of our federal union over the sovereignty of any single state. No state in the nation can be permitted to make itself a power free from the claims of the Union and the Constitution. No single state should be empowered to take from any American his God-given, democratically defined and Constitutionally protected civil rights, to deprive him of life, liberty or property without due process of law or deny him the equal protection of the laws

38. Alan L. Clem, Associate Professor of Government at the University of South Dakota has reviewed the problems deciding on the proper methods of carrying out the Supreme Court's prescription in Baker v. Carr. In his helpful article he states: "Perhaps the most serious handicap to the efforts of those advocating more equitable distribution of legislative power is that neither lawyers nor political scientists nor mathematicians have yet been able to agree on a method to define a proper apportionment system." Clem, Problems of Measuring and Achieving Equality of Representation in State Legislatures, 42 NEB. L. REV. 622, 623 (1963).

39. By letter, dated October 2, 1963, the American Bar Association reported that its House of Delegates has recorded its opposition to all three proposed amendments.

40. A "confederacy" is defined as a "body formed. . . .by states. . . .united by a league"; and is a "looser union than a federation." WEBSTER'S THIRD NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY. In the Articles of Confederation of 1777, Article III provided that the "States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, ..." and Article II provided that "Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled."

59-609 O - 80 - 61

PART 3—PAST LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

[From the Congressional Record, Sept. 5, 1979]

STATEMENT ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. Hatch:

S. 1710. A bill to provide procedures for calling Federal constitutional conventions under Article V for the purpose of proposing amendments to the U.S. Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION IMPLEMENTATION ACT OF 1979

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, article V of the U.S. Constitution provides that constitutional amendments may be proposed in either of two ways. The first—the means by which every successful amendment to the Constitution has been proposed—requires the agreement of two-thirds of each House of Congress. The second requires the agreement of a convention called by Congress in response to the petitions of two-thirds of the State legislatures. Ratification of amendments proposed through either method is to be done either by the legislatures, or by conventions, in three-fourths of the States, depending upon the decision of Congress.

Largely as a result of the fact that the convention method of constitutional revision has never been successfully employed, there are substantial questions that relate to it:

What exactly constitutes a valid petition to the Congress?

What procedures must a State follow in submitting a petition?

Must the precise language of the proposed amendment be included within the petition?

How similar must the language be in the petitions of various States in order to allow them to be aggregated?

How long does a petition remain valid? May such petitions be rescinded by the States?

What is the extent of congressional power to review petitions? What is the extent of congressional power to restrict the deliberations of the convention?

What is the extent of State power to restrict the deliberations of the convention?

How is the convention to be organized? How are the States to be represented at the convention?

May Congress refuse to submit the product of a convention to the States for ratification?

How are constitutional convention-proposed amendments to be ratified in the States?

With respect to most of these questions, there is very little constitutional guidance. The relevant language of article V states simply:

"The Congress . . . on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments."

Nor are there useful precedents in view of the fact that there has never been a constitutional convention. Each of the questions involved in this, the "alternative" means of amending the Constitution, is therefore a threshold question.

Article I, section 8, clause 18 of the Constitution invests authority in Congress to—"Make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States."

The provision clearly authorizes the Congress to pass legislation that would give effect to the convention method of constitutional alteration. This would be a direct function of its article V authority to "call" a convention pursuant to petitions by two-thirds of the States.

OBJECTIVES OF ACT

I am introducing legislation, the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act," which would fill in the interstices of article V. It is particularly important that this body act on this, or similar legislation, in view of the fact that at least 30 States legislatures have already purported to submit petitions to Congress for the convening of a constitutional convention on the subject of a balanced budget amendment. I would hope that this act, however, could be considered separately from the merits of this specific amendment. The "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act" is designed to establish what are basically neutral procedures to guide the conduct of constitutional conventions generally. While the imminence of a convention of the matter of a balanced budget has clearly created the urgency for this legislation, the act is designed neither to facilitate nor obstruct the eventual achievement of a balanced budget amendment, or any other constitutional amendment.

One must look to the policy underlying the establishment of the convention form of amendment in order to construct a fair procedures bill. Even a cursory analysis of the original constitutional convention (convened under the auspices of the articles of confederation) would suggest that the final provision of article V resulted from a compromise between those delegates who sought to invest proposal authority solely in Congress and those who sought to invest it solely in the State legislatures. The two modes of initiating amendments were viewed as essentially equivalent alternatives, each of which was to serve as a check upon the intransigence of either the National Legislature or the State legislature in the matter of proposing constitutional revision.

In view of this fundamental purpose, I believe that legislation giving effect to the convention method of amendment should be such that resort to its use will not render the Constitution "too mutable" (the Federalist No. 43) while at the same time insuring that it will not be rendered null and void because it is too cumbersome a method. The amendment process should never be one that can be successfully employed with great ease, yet neither should it be a process totally incapable of being used to alter the Constitution. It is this general philosophy that guides congressionally-initiated amendments and would seem most appropriate with respect to convention-initiated amendments as well.

PROVISIONS OF ACT

I would like to briefly discuss the provision of this act and explain their justification. I should add at the outset my debt to the efforts of our former colleague, Senator Sam Ervin. While my bill differs in a number of respects from legislation that Senator Ervin successfully shepherded through the Senate in 1971, its basic structure is closely related to that legislation. This measure has been reintroduced in the present Congress as S. 3 by our distinguished colleague from North Carolina (Senator Helms).

Section 1 of my bill states that its short title is the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act of 1979."

APPLICATIONS FOR CONVENTION

Section 2 states the manner in which States are to make applications for a constitutional convention. It states simply that the legislature shall state, within its application for a convention, the "General Subject" of the amendment or amendments to be proposed. It is expected that the application is to be sufficiently precise so as to enable Congress to determine whether or not the application ought to be aggregated with the applications of other States. It would not, for example, be enough for a State to say that it desired a convention for the purpose of "improving the functioning of the executive branch of the Federal Government," and have it aggregated with an application specifying its desire for a convention for the purpose of "considering changes in the length of the presidential term of office."

The purpose of the initiating process is to determine that there exists some form of consensus among the States on the matter of a relatively well-defined area of amendment. This consensus cannot fairly be said to be in evidence if aggregation is to be permitted of applications that are, at best, only incidentally related.

On the other hand, it cannot reasonably be expected that identical, or even nearly identical, language be employed in petitions that ought to be aggregated.

Such a requirement is highly unrealistic with respect to fifty diverse State legislative bodies; the imposition of such a rigid rule would effectively render the alternative method of amendment provided in article V useless. Further, to the extent that a petition was required to be precise, either with respect to the specific amendment sought, or the specific language sought, there would be little use for the convention itself. To limit the convention to the consideration of a single, meticulously worded amendment is to make the convention a farce. In order for the convention to be a meaningful part of the article V process, it must have some leeway within which to exercise its legitimate discretion.

LIMITED CONVENTIONS

That this discretion, however, is not without its limits is the subject of section 2(B), and, indeed, is the basic theme of the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act." This section states that the procedures provided in the act are to be followed in the case of applications for what are commonly referred to as "limited conventions." Such conventions are defined for the purposes of this act as conventions "for the purpose of proposing one or more specific amendments to the Constitution of the United States." Implicit in this section is the recognition that the States may call for the convening of either "limited" or "general" conventions; it is, however, simply with respect to the former that the terms of this act apply.

A "general" convention would be one in which the States petitioned for a convention, not with any specific or limited purposes in mind, but for the purpose of making whatever revisions were deemed necessary or desirable by the convention itself. It is this sort of convention that poses such great concerns to most observers, including myself. I am far from confident that a contemporary "General" convention could do much to improve upon the work of Madison, Hamilton, and Mason. While there is no way that Congress, through passage of a simple statute, could preclude the States from requesting a "general" convention—this is their right under article V—neither is Congress precluded from clarifying that the States are fully within their rights in seeking a "limited" convention.

There is significant academic dispute as to the possibilities of a "limited" constitutional convention. Prof. Charles Black of the Yale Law School, for example, believes that the constitutional convention is a "free agent," sovereign and without limitations. According to this theory, the convention represents the premier assembly of the people, and is therefore supreme to all other Government branches and agencies.

I would disagree with this interpretation. The constitutional convention, while clearly a unique and separate element of the Government—a new branch of the Government, so to speak—is subject to the same limitations and checks and balances as the other, permanent branches of the Government. A constitutional convention, as its name clearly implies, is a constitutional entity; it is appointed under the terms of the Constitution and subject to all of the express and implied limitations imposed by that document. As observed by Professor Jameson in his classic work on constitutional conventions:

"The convention's principal feature is that it is subaltern—it is evoked by the side and at the call of a government pre-existing and intended to survive it, for the purpose of administering to its special needs. It never supplants the existing organization. It never governs. Though called to look into and recommend improvement in the fundamental laws, it enacts neither them nor the statute law; and it performs no act of administration."

The Federal constitutional convention is an instrument of the Government, and acts properly only when it acts in conformity to its authorized powers.

There is nothing in the language of article V to suggest that the convention method of amendment cannot be limited to a single area of amendment, although the article states that the convention is to be convened for the purpose of proposing "amendments," resort to the plural is made also describing the scope of Congress' proposing authority. The symmetry between the competing processes of constitutional amendment is emphasized by Madison in the Federalist No. 43 in discussing the objectives of article V:

"That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other."

It was clearly contemplated that the convention anticipated specific amendment or amendments, rather than general revisions, and that no distinction was to be drawn between the competing methods of amendment in this respect.

To enable Congress to propose specific constitutional amendments while allowing the States only to propose general constitutional revision is to confer markedly unequal powers of amendment upon these governments, an intention contradicted by the unanimous weight of documentary evidence. If the States are to have no ability to control the actions of a convention in the form of their convention applications, then there will be strong disincentives for them to seek such conventions. In the absence of broadbased dissatisfaction with the existing constitutional system, why should they want to create the threat or possibility of a convention acting beyond the scope of the application? Why, in seeking to originate the "amendment of errors" described by Madison, should the States have to risk total revision of the constitutional system?

It is anomalous that in seeking to correct what might be a narrow defect in the system that the States should have to place the entire system in jeopardy? What better means could there be to "perpetuate the discovered faults" of the system? What better means could there be to place the convention system of amendment in an unequivalent position to the congressional system of amendment? What better means could there be to completely discourage any and all resort to the convention means of constitutional amendment?

It is the States, not Congress, that ought to properly have the ability to limit the scope of the convention, through the convention applications. While Congress, under section 6 of the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act," is empowered to specify in its call for the convention the scope of permissible deliberations, it is performing basically an administrative, nondiscretionary function in doing so; it is simply translating the State applications into a formal convention call.

APPLICATION PROCEDURES

Section 3 of the act specifies that the procedures to be followed in making a convention application are generally to be those established by the States themselves. Section 3(a) states that for the purpose either of adopting a resolution or withdrawing one (pursuant to section 6) the State legislature is to follow the same rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a simple statute, except that the action is to be considered valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

Thus, the term "legislatures" in article V is treated in the same manner for the purpose of convention applications as it has traditionally been treated for the purpose of amendment ratification. It has generally been thought that, had the Founders intended to require gubernatorial participation in the amendment process, they would have made express reference either to the need for ratification or proposal by the "States," or by the legisltaures with the assent of the "Executive." As the Supreme Court has observed in Lester v. Garnett 258 U.S. 130, 137 (1922) :

"The function of the State legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing the amendment, is a Federal function derived from the Federal Constitution; and it transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a State."

In an analogous decision, the Court in the early case of Hollingworth v. Virginia 3 Dall. 376 (1798) interpreted the provision of article V to require the exclusion of the national executive from the amendment process.

Section 3(b) provides further that questions concerning the validity of application procedures are to be decided by the State legislatures themselves. While recognizing that, in pursuit of their authority under article V, the States are acting in a quasi-Federal capacity, rather than in a purely State role, it would nevertheless be incongruous for any body to determine whether or not there has been procedural regularity in a State legislative action other than the State legislature itself.

In Field v. Clark 143 U.S. 649 (1892), it was decided by the Supreme Court that the procedural requirements of the legislative process were presumed to have been satisfied when legislation was formally certified by the appropriate legislative officers. Rather than intruding Congress or the courts into this area, there is no reason why this traditional rule ought not to continue to apply with respect to convention application actions. There is no compelling reason why article V should require sacrifice by the State legislatures of their right to regulate their own proceedings.

TRANSMISSION OF APPLICATIONS

Section 4 of the act specifies the means by which the States are to transmit their applications for a convention to Congress. Section 4(a) states that, within 30 days of the adoption by a State of an application, the appropriate official is to transmit copies to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Section 4(b) directs the States to include within these applications: the title of the resolution, the exact text of the resolution, the date of adoption, and an official certification. In addition, States are encouraged, but not compelled, to list in the application other effective State applications which are deemed to concern substantially the same subject. While such a listing is not expected to be conclusive with respect to Congress, it is nevertheless considered that such a listing will be useful to Congress in carrying out its responsibilities in aggregating similar applications.

Section 4(c) requires each house to establish a public record of each State application, and to notify each State legislature of the fact of each application. Through internal procedures to be determined by each House of Congress, Congress would be charged with making its decisions on whether or not to aggregate applications within the 10-day period following each new application. The criteria would be whether or not the applications referenced the "same general subject or subjects."

As observed earlier, it is the objective of this language to ensure the existence of some real consensus among the States with respect to the need for constitutional revision in some relatively circumscribed area. At the same time, in order not to interfere with the legitimate freedom of action of a convention, there ought not to be the requirement of extreme precision, either in the text or in the subject-matter. The language contained in the bill is designed to draw some rough balance between these requirements.

In order to ensure that the consensus for a constitutional amendment remains a relatively "contemporaneous" one (see Dillon v. Gloss 256 U.S. 368 (1921)), section 5(a) states that an application shall be effective for no longer than a 7-year period, with shorter effective periods contained within the body of an application to be respected. The court in Dillon stated that,

"Proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavour, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time . . . must reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do . . . We do not find anything in article V which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open for ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the states may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective."

Similarly, State convention applications and the "calling" of a constitutional convention are not unrelated acts, but necessary, succeeding steps in a single endeavor. There should be a "reasonable" relationship in time (see Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1938)) between these actions. There is the same need to avoid staleness of applications to Congress as there is to avoid staleness of amendment proposals to the States.

In view of the fact that every amendment proposed by Congress, except one, since the 18th amendment has contained a 7-year time limitation either in the body or in the enacting clause, it was decided to use the same period for determining effectiveness of applications.

Section 5(b) authorizes States to withdraw their applications at any time prior to the time that there are a sufficient number of valid applications before Congress to enable it to call a convention. There would seem to be no valid policy reason for denying them this right. Indeed, in order to insure that the amendment process reflects the notion of "contemporaneous consensus," it is vital that the States have the right to reconsider and reverse their application decisions.

States should not be dragooned unwillingly into artificial consensuses because of an inability to rethink earlier application decisions.

CALLING OF THE CONVENTION

Section 6 of the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act" relates to the actual calling by Congress of the convention. It provides that upon receipt in each House of that application putting two-thirds of the States in agreement on the need for some amendment, it is the duty of that House to call for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention on that general subject. Congress is to designate the time and place of the meeting of the convention, and set forth the general subject of the amendment or amendments for consideration. The convention is to be convened not later than 6 months following the adoption by Congress of its resolution.

Despite some popular misconceptions on this point, it is obligatory that Congress call a convention upon the receipt of valid applications by two-thirds of the States. Alexander Hamilton observed in the Federalist No. 85 that—

"The national rulers, whenever nine states concur, will have no option upon the subject. By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obliged "on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the states to call a convention for proposing amendments" . . . the words of this article are premptory. The Congress "shall call a convention". Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."

James Madison, in a 1789 letter, remarked further—

"It is to be observed however that the question concerning a general convention will not belong to the Federal legislature. If two-thirds of the States apply for one, Congress cannot refuse to call it."

CONVENTION DELEGATES

Section 7 relates to the selection of delegates to the constitutional convention. The language is taken nearly verbatim from article II, section 1, paragraph 2 of the Constitution concerning the selection of Presidential electors. The "Great Compromise" between the larger and the smaller States is carried over into the selection of convention delegates with each State being entitled to that number of delegates equal to the combined number of its Senators and Representatives in Congress. The States are given a free hand in selecting their delegates in whatever (otherwise constitutional) manner they think appropriate. If the experience of the electoral college is at all relevant, and I believe that it is, each of the States will undoubtedly introduce some means of popular election for the delegate positions.

While there are those who would prefer to see a delegate selection system more precisely based upon population, I see no reason not to extend smaller States that slight disproportionate influence in the proposal of amendments through the convention system that they currently enjoy in the proposal of amendments through the congressional system. This is the method of delegate selection that most closely conforms to the basis for congressional representation, and which would most closely aline the alternative systems of proposing amendments.

Section 7 also excludes Members of Congress, the very embodiment of the national influence, from serving as convention delegates, directs the States to coordinate its delegate lists with the House and Senate, and confers the same immunity from arrest upon convention delegates, for the duration of the convention, that article I, section 6 of the Constitution confers upon Members of Congress.

CONVENING OF CONVENTION

Section 8 directs each delegate to the convention to subscribe to an oath by which he commits himself, during the conduct of the convention to "comply with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act." As I discussed earlier, I do not believe that the concept of a "limited" convention is precluded in any manner by article V. The purpose of this purposely broad oath is simply to give effect to any limitations that may have been placed upon a convention by Congress acting on behalf of the States. Since the provisions of the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act purport to represent congressional interpretation of the provisions of article V, it is perhaps unnecessary to specify compliance with these as part of the delegate oath. I felt, however, that specificity was desirable in order to clarify that Congress is acting wholly within its appropriate authority in filling in the gaps of article V, and that the delegates to the convention themselves are not empowered to alter this interpretation.

Administering the oath of office to the delegates would be that chief justice serving on a State supreme court with the greatest seniority in that position. Rather than having the Vice President, or the Chief Justice of the United States fill this function, it is my belief that what is basically a State convention should remain that and not run any unnecessary risks, however remote, of being influenced by national officials. I stress the basic purpose for including the convention method of amendment in article V—the need for the States to be able to amend the Constitution in the face of an intransigent national Government.

CONVENTION PROCEDURES

Section 8 also states clearly that the convention itself is to have responsibility for drawing up its own rules of procedures, rather than Congress. No Federal funds whatsoever may be appropriated specifically for the purposes of payment of the expenses of the convention, except that the Administrator of the General Services Administration is authorized to provide facilities for the convention. At the request of the convention, the Federal Government is also permitted to provide sundry information and assistance to the convention.

Section 9 creates a single exception to the convention's prerogatives to determine its own rules by specifying that each delegate is to be entitled to a single vote on all questions before the convention.

The section also provides that the convention is to maintain a daily verbatim record of proceedings, analogous to the Congressional Record. All records of official proceedings are to be transmitted by the convention to the National Archives within 30 days following termination of the proceedings of the convention.

Section 10 again underscores the premise of this act that a "limited" convention to amend the Constitution may properly be called. It restates what is already implicit in the act that a convention called under its terms may not propose amendments of a "general subject" different from that stated in the convention's charter—the resolution approved by Congress. The convention exercises no legitimate governmental authority beyond that granted by the States through Congress. The convention is morally obliged to limit its considerations to the subjects set forth in the State applications; I believe further that it is appropriate for Congress to establish a legal obligation to this same effect.

SUBMISSION OF AMENDMENTS TO STATES

Section 11 concerns the procedures through which the convention product is submitted to the States for ratification. Within 30 days after the completion of the convention, its Presiding Officer is to transmit the exact text of any proposed amendments to Congress. The officers of each House, within 30 more days of continuous session, are to transmit the amendments to the General Services Administrator who, in turn, is to submit the amendments to the States. The amendments are to be accompanied by a congressional resolution specifying, pursuant to article V, the mode of ratification—whether it is to be ratified by the State legislatures or by special ratifying conventions within each of the States.

Congress may refuse to transmit an amendment and resolution to the States, through the GSA, only if it makes the determination that the amendment "relates to or includes" a general subject which differs from or was not included as one of the general subjects within the scope of the convention's authority. The objective is to provide some remedy to a failure by the convention to honor the limitations on its authority to propose amendments to the Constitution. Congress has no power whatsoever to refuse to submit an amendment because of disagreement with its substantive merits. Nor is it empowered to refuse to submit an amendment because of what it perceives as procedural irregularities in the proceedings of the convention. Convention procedure is not within the ambit of congressional concern; checks upon procedural abuse must come from the States themselves in the form of the ratification process. Because this check also exists with respect to conventions acting in an ultra vires manner, it is hoped that Congress will resolve any doubts as to whether or not the convention acted within the scope of its authority in favor of an affirmative finding.

RATIFICATION OF AMENDMENTS

Section 12 of the act, borrowing language directly from article V, states simply that amendments proposed by "limited" constitutional conventions are to become part of the Constitution when ratified in accordance with the terms of article V—by three-fourths of the States in a timely and proper manner. Certified copies of the ratification document are to be forwarded by the States to the General Services Administration, although the ratification itself becomes effective once action is completed within the State legislation, Dillon v. Gloss 256 U.S. 368 376 (1921).

Section 13 expressly holds that the States are free to reconsider and reverse their ratification decisions, at least until that point that an amendment has been ratified by three-fourths of the States. Thus, any State may ratify a proposed amendment after having previously rejected it, or may rescind an earlier ratification of a proposed amendment. It is again my view that the most reliable determination of the existence (or lack thereof) of a "contemporaneous consensus" can be made if the States are free to reconsider and rethink their ratification decisions until that point that three-fourths of the States are in agreement in support of amendment, or until that point that a "reasonable" period of time has passed for ratification. My views on the matter of rescission of ratifications are discussed at far greater length in the Congressional Record of October 4, 1978, at pages S17043–S17045.

Section 14 imposes upon the General Services Administrator the duty to proclaim the final ratification of an amendment once it is in receipt of certifications of ratification from three-fourths of the States. As section 16 clarifies, however, this is an administrative duty of a symbolic nature, not one with an impact upon the actual effectiveness of an amendment. Under article V (and section 16), the amendment becomes part of the Constitution at the moment the final State has ratified, or on any date specified in the body of the amendment itself.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Finally, section 15 discusses the role of the judicial branch in the constitutional convention process. It establishes two express situations in which an aggrieved State may bring a direct action in the Supreme Court, pursuant to article III, section 2 of the Constitution. The first involves cases in which a State disputes any determination or finding by Congress, or the failure of Congress to make a determination or finding, with respect to its section 6 responsibilities. Section 6 requires Congress to "call" a convention upon determining the existence of valid applications for such a convention from two-thirds of the States.

The second situation involves cases in which Congress' actions with respect to its section 11 responsibilities are questioned. Section 11 requires Congress to submit amendments proposed by the convention to the States unless it determines that the convention acted on subject matter outside the purview of its authority.

Section 15(c) expressly states that these two actions may not be inclusive concerning the right to a Supreme Court hearing, and that nothing in the act is intended to preclude such review "as is otherwise provided by the Constitution or any other law of the United States." Section 15 further requires suit to be brought within 60 days of a claim, either against the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, the General Services Administrator, or "such other parties as may be necessary to afford the relief sought."

Thus, I would reject that version of the so-called "political questions" doctrine that suggests that all interpretative matters deriving from article V are to be resolved by Congress solely at its discretion. I find it ironic that so many individuals who have been so sympathetic to the advance of judicial activism in recent years are also those who would deny the Federal courts, particularly the Supreme Court, their constitutional obligation to interpret the plain language of that document. My views on the "political questions" doctrine are explained more thoroughly in the Congressional Record of October 4, 1978, at pages S17044–5.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, the convention method of constitutional amendment has been defended and described as an essential component of our Constitution by such men as James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Abraham Lincoln. While no amendment has ever been ratified that has been proposed through this method, it has nevertheless exerted its influence in indirect ways. The 17th amendment to the Constitution, for example—providing for the direct election of U.S. Senators—was proposed by Congress in 1912 in response to an effort in the States to call a convention on this subject. Other convention efforts on such matters as Federal tax limitations and State legislative apportionment have also evoked a significant congressional response. It is clear, too, that the present "balanced budget" movement is having an impact upon national public policy.

It is necessary, however, in order to insure some measure of symmetry in the alternative amendment processes under article V to establish some clear-cut procedures for resort to the convention method. While the absence of legislation such as the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act" will not preclude the States from exercising their right to call a convention, it will insure that the amendment process will become bogged down in constant litigation, partisan political decisions, and uncertainty. The primary effect of this can only be to undermine the integrity of our constitutional system. In the process, also, we will be eroding one of the basic elements for preserving some semblance of balance between the national and the State governments, as observed by Alexander Hamilton:

"The most powerful obstacle to the Members of Congress betraying the interest of their constituents is the State legislatures themselves, who will be standing bodies of observation, possessing the confidence of the people, jealous of Federal encroachments and armed with every power to check the first essays at treachery."

While there is no one who respects more than I do the achievement of the Founding Fathers, nor anyone who would place a greater burden of proof upon those who propose to alter the Constitution, I would nevertheless agree with Malcolm Eiselen who stated (in 1937):

"To assume, as many apparently do, that a second convention could alter the Constitution only for the worse . . . is an unwarrantable libel upon the creative statesmanship and political sagacity of the American people."

A more contemporary observer has noted:

"To those who fear a 'runaway convention', it need only be observed that the only group threatening to run away with it so far is Congress itself."

The purpose of the "Constitutional Convention Implementation Act" is to prevent both Congress and the Constitutional Convention from acting outside the scope of each of their proper authority. It is designed to insure that the States, in the event that Congress remains intransigent with respect to some deeply felt public problem, are able to circumvent Congress and act on their own to remedy such a situation. It is designed also to insure that the States—and Congress—are not forced to surrender totally their sovereignty to the Convention. It is designed to insure that the same matrice of constitutional checks and balances are applicable to the Constitutional Convention as to the other more permanent institutions within our governmental system. There can be no "runaway" Convention unless, ultimately, the dissatisfactions of the people are so broad and pervasive that it is a "runaway" Convention that they expressly request. The best way that Congress can work to insure that this never becomes the case is to allow the people and the States to work their will under established procedures when their grievances are more narrow, rather than allowing them to fester as a result of contrived "procedural irregularities." It is occasionally sobering to some of my colleagues, yet it is true, that ultimately it is the citizenry, not Congress, that is the responsible party in our political system.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

S. 1710

APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 2. (a) The legislature of a State, in making application to the Congress for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States, shall adopt a resolution pursuant to this Act stating, in substance, that the legislature requests the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more specific amendments to the Constitution of the United States and stating the general subject of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

(b) The procedures provided by this Act are required to be used whenever application is made to the Congress, under article V of the Constitution of the United States, for the calling of any convention for the purposes of proposing one or more specific amendments to the Constitution of the United States each applying State stating in the terms of its application the general subject of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

APPLICATION PROCEDURE

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting or withdrawing a resolution pursuant to section 2 and section 5 of this Act, the State legislature shall follow the rules of procedure that govern the enactment of a statute by that legislature, except that the action shall be valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

(b) Questions concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption or withdrawal of a State resolution cognizable under this Act are determinable by the State legislature.

TRANSMITTAL OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) Within thirty days after the adoption by the legislature of a State of a resolution to apply for the calling of a constitutional convention, the secretary of state of the State, or, if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Each copy of the application so made by any State shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution, the exact text of the resolution signed by the presiding officer of each house of the State legislature, the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution, and a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution; and

(2) to the extent practicable, a list of all State applications in effect on the date of adoption whose subject or subjects are substantially the same as the subject or subjects set forth in the application.

(c) Within ten day after receipt of a copy of any such application, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall report to the House of which he is presenting officer, identifying the State making application, the general subject of the application, and the number of States then having made application on such subject. The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall jointly cause copies of such application to be sent to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of every other State and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

EFFECTIVE PERIOD OF APPLICATION

SEC. 5. (a) An application submitted to the Congress by a State, unless sooner withdrawn by the State legislature, shall remain effective for the lesser of the period specified in such application by the State legislature or for a period of seven calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, except that whenever within a period of seven calendar years two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same general subject all such applications shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 6 of this Act, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State may withdraw its application calling for a constitutional convention by adopting and transmitting to the Congress a resolution of withdrawal in conformity with the procedures specified in sections 3 and 4 of this Act, except that no such withdrawal shall be effective as to any valid application made for a constitutional convention upon any subject after the date on which two-third or more of the State legislatures have valid applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same general subjects.

CALLING OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 6. (a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to maintain a record of all applications received by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives from States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon each general subject. Whenever applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same general subject have been received, the Secretary and the Clerk shall so report within five days, in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer within five days thereupon shall announce on the floor of the House of which he is an officer the substance of such report. It shall then be the duty of such House to determine that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds of the States with respect to the same general subject. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect valid applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same general subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that general subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and time of meeting of the convention, and (2) set forth the general subject of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention is called. A copy of each such concurrent resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress shall be transmitted forthwith to the Governor and to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of each State.

(b) The convention shall be convened not later than six months after adoption of the resolution.

DELEGATES

SEC. 7. (a) Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of delegates, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress. No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed as delegate. Any vacancy occurring in a State delegation shall be filled by appointment of the legislature of that State.

(b) The secretary of state of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function shall certify to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives the name of each delegate elected or appointed by the legislature of the State pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

CONVENING THE CONVENTION

SEC. 8. (a) Of those persons serving as chief justices of the State supreme courts, the person who is senior in years of service as such a chief justice shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office of the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe to an oath by which he shall be committed during the conduct of the convention to comply with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this Act. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as the convention may adopt.

(b) No Federal funds may be appropriated specifically for the purposes of payment of the expenses of the convention.

(c) The Administrator of the General Services shall provide such facilities, and the Congress and each executive department, agency, or authority of the United States, including the legislative branch and the judicial branch, except that no declaratory judgment may be required, shall provide such information and assistance as the convention may require, upon written request made by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

PROCEDURES OF THE CONVENTION

SEC. 9. (a) In voting on any question before the convention, including the proposal of amendments, each delegate shall have one vote.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily verbatim record of its proceedings and publish the same. The vote of the delegates on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) Within thirty days after the termination of the proceedings of the convention, the presiding officer shall transmit to the Archivist of the United States all records of official proceedings of the convention.

PROPOSAL OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 10. No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a general subject different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention.

APPROVAL BY THE CONGRESS AND TRANSMITTAL TO THE STATES FOR RATIFICATION

SEC. 11. (a) The presiding officer of the convention shall, within thirty days after the termination of its proceedings, submit to the Congress the exact text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention.

(b)(1) Whenever a constitutional convention called under this Act has transmitted to the Congress a proposed amendment to the Constitution, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such amendment to the Administrator of General Services upon the expiration of the first period of thirty days of continuous session of the Congress following the date of receipt of such amendment unless within that period both Houses of the Congress have agreed to (A) a concurrent resolution directing the earlier transmission of such amendment to the Administrator of General Services and specifying in accordance with article V of the Constitution the mode of ratification in which such amendment shall be ratified or (B) a concurrent resolution stating that the Congress disapproves the submission of such proposed amendment to the States because such proposed amendment relates to or includes a general subject which differs from or was not included as one of the general subjects named or described in the concurrent resolution of the Congress by which the convention was called. No measure agreed to by the Congress which expresses disapproval of any such proposed amendment for any other reason, or without a statement of any reason, shall relieve the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the obligation imposed upon them by the first sentence of this paragraph.

(2) For purposes of paragraph (1) of this subsection, (A) the continuity of a session of the Congress shall be broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and (B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of the period of thirty days.

(c) Upon rectipt of any such proposed amendment to the Constitution, the Administrator shall transmit forthwith to each of the several States a duly certified copy thereof, a copy of any concurrent resolution agreed too by both Houses of the Congress which prescribes the mode in which such amendment shall be ratified, and a copy of this Act. Such concurrent resolution may also prescribe the time within which such amendment shall be ratified in the event that the amendment itself contains no such provision. In no case shall such a resolution prescribe a period of ratification of less than four years.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. (a) Any amendment proposed by the convention and submitted to the States in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when duly ratified by three-fourths of the States in the manner and within the time specified consistent with the provisions of article V of the Constitution of the United States.

(b) The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State action ratifying any proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services.

RESCISSION OF RATIFICATIONS

SEC. 13. (a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment by the same processes by which it ratified the proposed amendment, except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendment by three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.

PROCLAMATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 14. The Administrator of General Services, when three-fourths of the several States have ratified a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

SEC. 15. (a) Any State aggrieved by any determination or finding, or by any failure of Congress to make a determination or finding within the periods provided, under section 6 or section 11 of this Act may bring an action in the Supreme Court of the United States against the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives or, where appropriate, the Administrator of General Services, and such other parties as may be necessary to afford the relief sought. Such an action shall be given priority on the Court's docket.

(b) Every claim arising under this Act shall be barred unless suit is filed thereon within 60 days after such claim first arises.

(c) The right to review by the Supreme Court provided under subsection (a) does not limit or restrict the right to judicial review of any other determination or decision made under this Act of such review as is otherwise provided by the Constitution or any other law of the United States.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 16. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date specified therein or, if no date is specified, then on the date on which the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the States of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

Excerpt
Senate Hearings, Committee on the Judiciary
TAXES ON INCOMES, INHERITANCES, AND GIFTS
April 27, 1954

CHAPTER VI

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT BY CONVENTION [1]

The Constitution of the United States, Article V, providing an amending process reads as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Of the four possible ways of amending the Constitution, only two have been used. All amendments except the twenty-first were initiated by two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress and ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. The twenty-first amendment was initiated in the same manner as the others but was ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the States. So far the Congress has never called a convention to propose amendments.

Consideration of the provision for initiation of amendments by a convention called by Congress at the petition of two-thirds of the State legislatures raises a number of questions. How did the provision come to be included in the Constitution? How frequently, and on what subjects, have State legislatures petitioned Congress for a convention? To what extent does it lie within the discretion of Congress to determine when a convention shall be called? How close together in time and in subject matter must petitions be to count toward the requisite two-thirds? What is the effect of a resolution rescinding a petition? If Congress should decide to call a convention, how would it be organized? Could its powers be limited?

It is hoped that the discussion which follows will throw some light on the above and related questions, although it does not purport to answer them definitively. An attempt has been made to summarize the more significant historical information, to outline the major constitutional issues, and to analyze the various possible lines of argument with respect to each of these issues.

ARTICLE V IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787

On May 29, 1787, shortly after the Constitutional Convention had met and organized, Edmund Randolph of Virginia and Charles Pinckney of South Carolina presented general plans for a new Constitution. In both plans the States were given a voice in the initiation of constitutional amendments. Article 13 of the so-called Virginia plan, presented by Randolph, stated simply—that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary; and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto. [2]

[1] Prepared by Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress.

Article 16 of the Pinckney plan, which closely resembled the amending procedure finally adopted, read as follows:

If two-thirds of the legislatures of the States apply for the same, the legislature of the United States shall call a convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution—or should Congress with the consent of two-thirds of each House propose to the States amendments to the same—the agreement of two-thirds of the legislatures of the States shall be sufficient to make the said amendments parts of the Constitution.

The ratifications of the conventions of — States shall be sufficient for organizing this Constitution.[3]

When article 13 of the Randolph plan was discussed in Committee of the Whole House on June 11, Madison reported that—

Several Members did not see the necessity of the resolution at all, nor the propriety of making the consent of the National Legislature unnecessary.

Colonel Mason and Randolph supported the resolution, Colonel Mason arguing that—

It would be improper to require the consent of the National Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendment.

The Convention (in committee) then voted to postpone consideration of the words "without requiring the consent of the National Legislature," and passed the other provision in the clause. This vote was ratified by the Convention on July 23.[4]

When the Committee on detail reported on August 6, the amending provision (article XIX) was worded as follows:

On the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a convention for that purpose.[5]

On August 30, article XIX was agreed to, with no opposition, although Gouverneur Morris suggested that the National Legislature should be left at liberty to call a convention whenever it pleased.[6]

Then, on September 10, only a week before the Convention adjourned, Elbridge Gerry moved to reconsider article XIX. "This Constitution" he said "is to be paramount to the State constitutions. It follows, hence, from this article that two-thirds of the States may obtain a convention, a majority of which can bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the State constitutions altogether." Hamilton seconded the motion, but on the grounds that "the State legislatures will not apply for alterations, but with a view to increase their own powers"; he wanted the National Legislature to be given power to call a convention, on the vote of two-thirds of each branch. Madison made an interesting observation on the vagueness of the [2] Max Farrand (ed.), The Records of the Federal Convention (New Haven, 1937), vol. I, p. 22. The account of the convention proceedings contained in this section is taken from Farrand's four-volume work. For a detailed discussion of the history of article V in the convention, see Paul J. Scheips, The Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution, Notre Dame Lawyer, vol. 26, pp. 46–67 (Fall, 1950).

[3] Farrand, III, p. 601.
[4] Farrand, I, pp. 202–3; II, p. 84.
[5] Farrand, II, p. 188.
[6] Ibid., pp. 467–8.

wording of article XIX: "How was a convention to be formed? By what rule decide? What the force of its acts"? Following this discussion the Convention voted to reconsider, nine States to one, New Hampshire being divided.[7]

Sherman then moved to add the words: "or the legislature may propose amendments to the several States for their approbation; but no amendments shall be binding until consented to by the several States."[8] After this motion had been amended by inserting "three-fourths of" before "the several States" (in the proviso), Madison moved to postpone consideration of the amended proposition to take up the following:

> The Legislature of the United States whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the legislatures of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the United States.[9]

With the slavery proviso added, Madison's proposition passed, nine States to one, with New Hampshire's vote again divided.

When the committee of style reported on September 12 the amending article was worded as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the legislatures of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the — and — sections of article —.[10]

This article was not taken up until September 15, when the Constitution was ordered to be engrossed. Sherman wanted more protection of the rights of the States. Mason thought the proposed amendment procedures "exceptionable and dangerous. As the proposing of amendments is in both the modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case."[11]

Morris and Gerry moved to amend, to require a convention on application of two-thirds of the States.

Madison "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two-thirds of the States, as to call a convention on the like application. He saw no objection, however, against providing for a convention for the purpose of amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum, etc., which in constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided."[12]

The motion of Morris and Gerry was then unanimously agreed to.

On this same day, after being further amended to safeguard the equal representation of the States in the Senate, article V, along with the other provisions of the Constitution, was ordered to be engrossed.[13]

[7] Ibid., pp. 557–8.
[8] Ibid., p. 558.
[9] Ibid., p. 559.
[10] Ibid., p. 602.
[11] Ibid., p. 629.
[12] Ibid., pp. 629–30.
[13] Ibid., pp. 630, 633.

The history of article V is an erratic one, and the recorded debate concerning its provisions is scanty. It is interesting to note, however, that the participation of the States in the process of initiating amendments appears to have been taken for granted. There were differences of opinion as to the desirability of having any provision for amendment, and, if there was to be one, of excluding the National Legislature from having a voice in it. With regard to State participation in the proposal of amendments, however, the only real point at issue was what form it should take.

PREVIOUS USAGE OF THE STATE PETITION PROCEDURE [14]

The contrast between the apparent expectation of the framers as to the importance of State initiation of amendments and the actual use made of the procedure is startling. General petitions were presented to Congress in 1789 by New York and Virginia.
The next petition, also general in nature, was by Georgia in 1833. Later in the same year Alabama petitioned with respect to an amendment against the protective tariff. Shortly before the Civil War six State legislatures petitioned for the calling of a drafting convention.[15] These 10 petitions appear to have constituted the entire output for over 100 years.

In the past 50 years petitions have been much more numerous. The largest number of petitions so far recorded on a single subject called for a convention to initiate an amendment providing for the popular election of Senators. A total of 55 petitions were adopted, representing 29 State legislatures. This movement took place chiefly between 1901 and 1911. In second place comes the current income-tax limitation proposal, on which 24 States have petitioned. Beginning with New York in 1906, 18 States petitioned for a convention on the subject of prohibiting polygamy. These are the only three subjects on which a substantial number of petitions have been recorded. One to half a dozen petitions have been adopted on a wide range of subjects, including antitrust control, repeal of the eighteenth amendment, taxation of tax-exempt securities, regulation of hours of labor and minimum wages by Congress, method of apportionment and presidential tenure. In addition, several legislatures have adopted petitions calling for a convention without specifying any object. Altogether there appear to have been over 100 petitions in the last half century, but many of these represent second and third petitions from several of the State legislatures on the subject of popular election of Senators.

---

[14] Information in this section concerning petitions adopted up to 1930 is based chiefly on Federal Constitutional Convention, Senate Document No. 78, 71st Cong., 2d sess. (1930) and Wayne B. Wheeler, "Is A Constitutional Convention Impending?", Illinois Law Review, Vol. 21, pp. 782 ff. (Apr. 1927). Petitions on the income tax proposal are listed in Appendix A of this report. The following list of additional petitions is not intended to be complete: Taxation of securities, previously tax-exempt, by federal government: Idaho 1928, C. R. 69:455; California, 1935, C. R. 79:10814. General constitutional convention: Wisconsin, 1929, C. R. 71:2590, 3369. Repeal of Eighteenth Amendment: Massachusetts, 1931, C. R. 74:45; New York, 1931, C. R. 75:48; Wisconsin, 1931, C. R. 75:57; Rhode Island, 1931, C. R. 75:495–6; New Jersey, 1932, C. R. 75:3299. Regulation of wages and hours by Congress in intrastate commerce: California, 1935, C. R. 79:10814. Change of method of apportionment of congressmen: Iowa, 1941, C. R. 87:2494. Limitation of presidential tenure (either action by Congress or by convention requested): Iowa, 1943, C. R. 89:2516, 2728; Illinois, 1943, C. R. 89:2516–7. Distribution of Federal revenues (see ch. II, this report): Nebraska, 1949, C. R. 95:7893–4; Iowa, 1951, C. R. (daily), Apr. 17, pp. 4045–6; Maine, 1951, C. R. (daily), June 4, pp. 6186–7; New Hampshire, 1951, C. R. (daily), Aug. 28, pp. 10920–31; New Mexico, 1952, C. R. (daily), Feb. 11, 1962. In view of the difficulties in tabulating petitions—one of which is that petitions are not always presented to Congress—most of the figures in this section must be regarded as approximate.

[15] Herman V. Ames, The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of Its History (Washington, U. S. Government Printing Office, 1897), p. 283. (H. Doc. No. 353, pt. 2, 54th Cong.)

Only in the case of the provision for popular election of Senators has the petition procedure proved influential in amending the Constitution. The seventeenth amendment was, of course, initiated by Congress, but between 1894 and 1902 the Senate four times blocked passage of resolutions adopted by the House.[16] Following the flood of State petitions for the calling of a convention the Senate finally concurred in the resolution initiating the amendment.

The history of the State petition procedure suggests that from a political standpoint it is nearly always simpler for the advocates of an amendment to concentrate their efforts on persuading Congress to initiate it by a two-thirds vote of both Houses than to secure the adoption of petitions by the legislatures of two-thirds of the States. The exception in the case of the seventeenth amendment is easily explained by the Senate's direct involvement in the proposal. At the same time, the sharp rise in the number of petitions in the past 50 years—some 10 times the number in the first 100 years—makes one hesitate to predict that it will continue to be a vehicle for lost causes.

WHEN IS A CONVENTION TO BE CALLED?

In providing that—

> The Congress * * * on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments * * *.

Article V leaves unanswered many important questions. How closely must petitions be related in time to be counted toward the necessary two-thirds? In subject matter? Should a petition be counted if it is later rescinded by the legislature? If it is vetoed by the governor? Is the role of Congress simply the ministerial one of issuing a call for a convention when two-thirds of the States have applied, or can it determine for itself the desirability of calling a convention? To what extent will the courts review the action of Congress in calling or in failing to call a convention?

1. The nature and extent of Congress' responsibilities

In the light of the history of the amending article in the Constitutional Convention, it is reasonably clear that when two-thirds of the States have made application Congress is to call a convention, not consider whether one should be called. Our constitutional history makes it equally clear that the duty to call a convention is one to be enforced by the Congress itself. It is unlikely that the courts would attempt to compel the Congress to perform a positive act in furtherance of a constitutional obligation. Failure to call a convention would be comparable to the failure after the census of 1920 to make a reapportionment of seats in the House of Representatives, contrary to the requirement of article I, section 2.

When it comes to judicial review of action taken by Congress in calling a convention, the answer is not so clear. Specific rulings of the courts are referred to below, in connection with particular problems of interpretation. In general, it may be said that the Supreme Court has been increasingly inclined to leave to the political branches of the Government the decision of questions arising out of the amending process. In Coleman v. Miller, which presented several issues concerning the ratification of the twenty-first amendment, Mr. Justice

[16] Wheeler, op. cit., p. 786.

Black in a concurring opinion, speaking for himself and Justices Roberts, Frankfurter, and Douglas, said that article V—> grants power over the amending of the Constitution to Congress alone. Undivided control of that process has been given by the article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is "political" in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control, or interference at any point. [17]

The above four members of the Court, in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Frankfurter, contended that the courts had no jurisdiction over the issues there in question. The decision in the case did not go so far. The Court took jurisdiction, but held that two of the questions involved (see below) were "political" and not "justiciable." On a third question it was evenly divided on this point.

Whether decision-making authority is ultimately held to vest in the Congress or in the courts, it is to be presumed that it will not be exercised on the basis of sheer whim. It will be useful, therefore, in discussing the various questions enumerated at the beginning of this section, to review whatever precedents may appear relevant and to indicate alternative solutions which have been or might be advanced.

2. The time element

An extremely rigid and no doubt unreasonable interpretation would be that Congress is required to call a convention only if the legislatures of two-thirds of the States petition during the life of that Congress. At the other extreme is the view that the time of making application for a convention is irrelevant. The position most commonly held, however, is that petitions ought to be "reasonably contemporaneous," so that they reflect the state of public opinion at a given time.[18] A comparable issue has arisen in connection with the ratification of amendments. In Dillon v. Gloss the Supreme Court not only upheld the 7-year time limit provided by Congress for the ratification of the eighteenth amendment, but stated that even in the absence of such express limitation:

> there is a fair implication that it [i. e., ratification] must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period.[19]

In Coleman v. Miller one of the points at issue was whether the proposal by Congress of the Child Labor Amendment had lost its validity through lapse of time. In that case nearly 13 years had elapsed between the proposal and the Kansas ratification, which was in question. The Court refused, however, in the absence of a limitation set by Congress, to take upon itself the responsibility of setting a limit. The Court's view was that:

> * * * the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as in this case it does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social, and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of the Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by the Congress

[17] Coleman v. Miller, (307 U. S. 433, 459 (1938)).
[18] Wheeler, op. cit., pp. 792–794; Lester Bernhardt Orfield, The Amending of the Federal Constitution (Ann Arbor, 1942), pp. 41–42; and Edward S. Corwin and Mary Louise Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, Notre Dame Lawyer, vol. 26, pp. 194–196 (Winter, 1951).
[19] Dillon v. Gloss (256 U. S. 368, 375 (1921)).

with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social, and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment.[20]

On the basis of this decision it would appear that Congress, while it need not require that petitions be "reasonably contemporaneous," would have ample authority and justification to so require.

3. Subject matter of petitions

Does article V mean that Congress is to call a convention whenever two-thirds of the States apply, regardless of the subject matter of the petitions? Some writers have contended that it does. Wheeler comments as follows:

* * * Even where 32 State legislatures made application for a convention, each requesting a different amendment it might be considered sufficient to call a convention on the ground that they conclusively showed a widespread demand for changes in Government, provided, of course, the resolutions of the State legislatures were sufficiently concurrent in point of time.

The nature of the right conferred upon the State legislatures in requesting Congress to call a constitutional convention is nothing more or less than the right of petition. The statements of the purposes and objects underlying the petition would have no legal effect except as they indicated to any convention assembled the wishes of the people in regard to proposed changes. It would therefore appear that under article V, whenever two-thirds of the State legislatures apply to Congress, it becomes the duty of Congress to call a convention if the petitions were passed within a reasonable time.[21]

Corwin and Ramsey express a contrary view:

* * * To be obligatory upon Congress, the applications of the States should be reasonably contemporaneous with one another, for only then would they be persuasive of a real consensus of opinion throughout the nation for holding a convention, and by the same token, they ought also to be expressive of similar views respecting the nature of the amendments to be sought.[22]

This question would seem to be eminently political in nature, as much or more so than the question of relation in time. Congress would appear to have ample justification for requiring general similarity of purpose, should it so desire, but whatever decision it might make would in all probability be sustained.

4. The effect of rescinding action

A number of the State legislatures which petitioned for a convention on the tax-limitation proposal later rescinded their petitions.[23] Do these States count toward the required two-thirds?

In Coleman v. Miller the Supreme Court dealt at some length with the effect both of previous rejection and of attempted withdrawal of ratifications by State legislatures. The Court found that in practice the political departments of the Government had "determined that both were ineffectual in the presence of an actual ratification."[24] The Court's actual holding in this case, however, was that—the question of the efficacy of ratifications by State legislatures, in the light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal, should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments, with the ultimate authority in the Congress in the exercise of its control over the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment."[25]

---

[20] Coleman v. Miller (307 U. S. 433, 453–4 (1938)).

[21] Wheeler, op., cit. p. 795. In 1929 Wisconsin presented a resolution to Congress, asking that Congress, having received petitions for a convention from 35 different States, proceed with the call for a convention. The petitions referred to covered a variety of subjects and a period of approximately 100 years.

[22] Corwin and Ramsey, op. cit., pp. 195–196. [Italics added.]

[23] See appendix A.

[24] Coleman v. Miller (307 U. S. 433, 449 (1938)).

[25] Ibid., 450.

Corwin and Ramsey find the legislative precedent less certain than the above opinion indicates.[26] Apart from this, it may be questioned whether the attempted withdrawal of a ratification is strictly comparable to the withdrawal of a petition requesting Congress to call a convention. Ratification of a proposed constitutional amendment might be considered a more formal and irrevocable action than the adoption of a petition.

5. Procedure in petitioning

In two instances petitions relating to the proposed tax limitation were vetoed by the Governor of the State. This raises the question, What is meant by the term "legislature" as used in article V?

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the term "legislature" means the representative body which makes the laws, and that the holding of a popular referendum on ratification of an amendment is inconsistent with article V.[27] Approval of the governor has been regarded as unnecessary,[28] although there has been no clear-cut decision to that effect. Many other procedural issues, such as applicability of State constitutional provisions relative to a quorum, and the right of the lieutenant governor to cast a vote in case of a tie, remain unsettled, even as regards ratification. In Coleman v. Miller the Supreme Court was equally divided as to whether or not the latter question was "political." The effect in this instance was to uphold the decision of the lower court, which had sustained the lieutenant governor's participation in the vote.[29]

ORGANIZATION AND POWERS OF CONVENTION

Neither the wording of article V nor the debates in the Constitutional Convention shed any light on the numerous problems that would arise should Congress decide to call a convention. It seems to be the view that Congress would possess the implied power to regulate all matters concerning the composition of the Convention, should it choose to do so. This would include the determination as to whether the delegates should represent the States, or the Nation at large.[30] It has been suggested that Congress would probably prefer to address the call to the States and leave to them the method of selecting delegates.[31] This, of course, was the method followed in calling the Convention of 1787, in which voting was by States.

Doubt has been expressed that either the petitioning States or the Congress could restrict the powers of a constitutional convention. Orfield's view is as follows:

> * * * Where the States apply for a convention for general purposes, it would seem that the convention would be free to draft a new document. But even though the application were for a limited purpose, it would seem that the State legislatures would have no authority to limit an instrumentality set up under the Federal Constitution. In reality, the right of legislatures is confined to applying for a convention, and any statement of purposes in their petitions would be irrevelant as to the scope of powers of the convention. Inasmuch as Congress issued the call simply on the basis of the application of the State legis-

[26] Corwin and Ramsey, op. cit., pp. 202 ff.
[27] Hawke v. Smith (253 U. S. 221 (1920)).
[28] Corwin and Ramsey, op. cit., p. 207.
[29] Coleman v. Miller (307 U. S. 433, 446-447).
[30] Orfield, op. cit., pp. 43-44, and Wheeler, op. cit., p. 798.
[31] Wheeler, op. cit., pp. 798-799.

latures, there would seem to be no warrant for an attempt by Congress to limit the changes proposed. The primary and in fact the sole business of the convention would be to propose changes in the Constitution. In this sphere the only limitation on it would seem to be article V.[32]

[32] Orfield, op. cit., pp. 44–55. Wheeler is of the same opinion: op. cit., p. 795 ff., especially pp. 96.
See, however, this report, ch. II, for a provision in the proposed amendment controlling the distribution of tax moneys which attempts to limit the power of the convention to the purpose specified. In justification of this limitation, the proposed amendment uses the following language:
"That since this method of proposing amendments to the Constitution has never been completed to the point of calling a convention and no interpretation of the power of the States in the exercise of this right has ever been made by any court or any qualified tribunal, if there be such, and since the exercise of the power is a matter of basic sovereign rights and the interpretation thereof is primarily in the sovereign government making such exercise and since the power to use such right in full also carries the power to use such right in part the legislature of the State of Nebraska interprets article V to mean that if two-thirds of the States make application for a convention to propose an identical amendment to the Constitution for ratification with a limitation that such amendment be the only matter before it, that such convention would have power only to propose the specified amendment and would be limited to such proposal and would not have power to vary the text thereof nor would it have power to propose other amendments on the same or different propositions" (Congressional Record, June 20, 1949, vol. 95, pp. 7893–7894).

APPENDIXES

APPENDIX A

ITEM 1.—State legislative action on the proposed 25-percent limitation amendment

Year of adoption	States	Status of resolution
		Rescinded	Vetoed by Governor	In effect
1939	Wyoming			Wyoming.
1940	Mississippi			Mississippi.
	Rhode Island	Rhode Island (1949).
1941	Iowa	Iowa (1945)
	Maine			Maine.
	Massachusetts			Massachusetts.
	Michigan			Michigan.
1943	Alabama	Alabama (1945)
	Arkansas	Arkansas (1945)
	Delaware			Delaware.
	Illinois	Illinois (1945)
	Indiana			Indiana.
	New Hampshire			New Hampshire.
	Pennsylvania		Pennsylvania (1943).
	Wisconsin	Wisconsin (1945)
1944	Kentucky	Kentucky (1946)
	New Jersey			New Jersey.
1950	Louisiana			Louisiana.
1951	Florida			Florida.
	Kansas			Kansas.
	Montana		Montana (1951)
	Nevada			Nevada.
	Utah			Utah.
1952	Georgia			Georgia.
Total	24	7	2	15.

Source: Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress, Feb. 21, 1952.

ITEM 2.—Status of State actions to place a 25 percent maximum rate on incomes, estates, and gifts [1]

States	Endorsing	Rescinding	Congressional Record
			Endorsing	Rescinding
Alabama	July 8, 1943 (H. J. Res. 66).	June 13, 1945 (H. J. Res. 10).	Vol. 89, pp. 7523-7524.	None.
Arkansas	April 1943 (H. J. Res. 10).	Jan. 18, 1945 (H. Con. Res. 4).	Daily, Feb. 4, 1952, p. 752.	Vol. 91, p. 11209.
Delaware	Apr. 22, 1943 (S. Con. Res. 6).		Vol. 89, p. 4017
Florida	May 5, 1951 (S. Con. Res. 206).		Daily, May 10, 1951, p. 5273.
Georgia	Feb. 6, 1952		Daily, Feb. 18, 1952, p. 1076.
Illinois	May 26, 1943 (H. J. Res. 32).	1945 (H. J. Res. 7)	Daily, Feb. 4, 1952, p. 752.	Daily, Feb. 4, 1952, p. 752.
Indiana	Mar. 2, 1943 (H. Con. Res. 10).		Daily, Feb. 18, 1952, p. 1075.
Iowa	Feb. 14, 1941 (H. Con. Res. 15).	Mar. 14, 1945 (H. Con. Res. 9).	Vol. 87, p. 3172	None.
Kansas	Mar. 21, 1951 (S. Con. Res. 4).		Daily, Mar. 28, 1951, p. 3026.
Kentucky	Mar. 20, 1944 (H. R. 79).	Apr. 12, 1946 (S. Res. 43).	Vol. 90, p. 4040	Daily, Sept. 6, 1951, p. 11195.
Louisiana	June 12, 1950 (H. Con. Res. 24).		None
Maine	Apr. 17, 1941		Vol. 87, pp. 3370-3371.
Massachusetts	Apr. 29, 1941 (S. 658).		Vol. 87, pp. 3812-3813.
Michigan	May 16, 1941 (S. Con. Res. 20).		Vol. 87, p. 8904
Mississippi	Apr. 29, 1940 (S. Con. Res. 14).		Vol. 86, p. 6025
Montana	Feb. 1951 (H. J. Res. 4).		Daily, Mar. 16, 1951 p. 2613 vetoed).
Nevada	Mar. 1951 (S. J. Res. 5).		None
New Hampshire	Apr. 24, 1943		Vol. 89, p. 3761
New Jersey	Feb. 25, 1944 (S. J. Res. 3).		Vol. 90, p. 6141
Pennsylvania	June 7, 1943 (H. R. 50).		Vol. 89, p. 8220 (vetoed).
Rhode Island	Mar. 15, 1940 (S. 80).	May 3, 1949 (H. 548).	Vol. 86, p. 3407	None.
Utah	1951 (H. J. Res. 3)		Daily, Feb. 11, 1952, p. 962.
Wisconsin	Apr. 1943 (J. Res. 75).	Jan. 1945 (J. Res. 114).	Vol. 89, p. 7525	None.
Wyoming	Feb. 23, 1939 (H. J. Memorial 6).		Vol. 84, p. 2509

[1] As of Feb. 21, 1952.

APPENDIX B

FORMS OF RESOLUTIONS ACTED ON BY VARIOUS STATES

Petition adopted by Arkansas, 1943; Delaware, 1943; Indiana, 1943; Iowa, 1941; Mississippi, 1940; New Hampshire, 1943; Pennsylvania, 1943;[1] and Wyoming, 1939. [States italicized have rescinded their petitions.]

SECTION 1. The sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration; provided that in no case shall the maximum rate of tax exceed 25 percent.

SECTION 3. The maximum rate of any tax, duty, or excise which Congress may lay and collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein; upon or in contemplation of death, or by way of gift, shall in no case exceed 25 percent.

[1] Vetoed by the governor.

SECTION 4. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December, following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

Petition Adopted by Alabama, 1943; Florida, 1951; Georgia, 1952; Illinois, 1943; Kansas, 1951, Kentucky, 1944; Louisiana, 1950; Maine, 1941; Massachusetts, 1941; Michigan, 1941; Rhode Island, 1940; Utah, 1951; and, Wisconsin, 1943. [States italicized have rescinded their petitions.]

SECTION 1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration: Provided, that in no case shall the maximum rate of tax exceed 25 percent.

SECTION 3. The maximum rate of any tax, duty, or excise which Congress may lay and collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift, shall in no case exceed 25 percent.

SECTION 4. The limitations upon the rates of said taxes contained in sections 2 and 3 shall, however, be subject to the qualification that in the event of a war in which the United States is engaged creating a grave national emergency requiring such action to avoid national disaster, the Congress by a vote of three-fourths of each House may for a period not exceeding 1 year increase beyond the limits above prescribed the maximum rate of any such tax upon income subsequently accruing or received or with respect to subsequent devolutions or transfers of property, with like power, while the United States is actively engaged in such way, to repeat such action as often as such emergency may require.

SECTION 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on incomes for any period ending on or prior to said 31st day of December laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

SECTION 6. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight on the last day of the sixth month following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

Petition adopted by Montana,[1] 1951; Nevada,[2] 1951; and New Jersey, 1944.

SECTION 1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration. The maximum aggregate rate of all taxes, duties, and excises which the Congress may lay or collect on, with respect to, or measured by, income, however, shall not exceed 25 percent. In the event that the United States shall be engaged in a war which creates a national emergency so grave as to necessitate such action to avoid national disaster, the Congress by a vote of three-fourths of each House, may while the United States is so engaged, suspend, for periods not exceeding one year each, such limitation with respect to income subsequently accruing or received.

SECTION 3. The maximum aggregate rate of all taxes, duties, and excises which the Congress may lay or collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift, shall not exceed 25 percent.

[1] Vetoed by the Governor.

[2] Nevada's petition asks that the Congress submit the amendment to the States for ratification. Also, the petition contains only the first three sections.

SECTION 4. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December following the ratification of the article. Nothing contained in the article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on, with respect to, or measured by, income for any period ending on or prior to said 31st day of December laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

SECTION 5. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight on the last day of the sixth month following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax with respect to any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

APPENDIX C

FORMS OF RESOLUTIONS USED IN RESCINDING PREVIOUS ACTION

KENTUCKY

(S. R. 43)

A JOINT RESOLUTION repudiating, retracting, and withdrawing House Resolution No. 79 of the Regular Session of the 1944 General Assembly

Whereas, by House Resolution No. 79 of the Regular Session of the 1944 General Assembly, application was made to the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to taxes on income, inheritance, and gifts; and

Whereas, such resolution was adopted by the General Assembly under a misapprehension as to its true meaning, intent, and purpose, and without a full consideration of the results that might obtain from such action, and

Whereas, the amendment proposed in such resolution establishes a policy with regard to taxation that is contrary to the established public policy of Kentucky, and will impose the burden of taxation upon those least able to bear it: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That House Resolution No. 79 of the Regular Session of the 1944 General Assembly of Kentucky is hereby repudiated and retracted, and the General Assembly hereby withdraws the same.

The Secretary of State is directed to send a duly certified copy of this resolution to the Senate of the United States and to the House of Representatives in Congress of the United States.

Passed and enrolled March 21, 1946.

ILLINOIS

OPPOSITION OF MAXIMUM INCOME TAX RATE

(H. J. Res. No. 7)

Whereas the Sixty-third General Assembly adopted House Joint Resolution No. 32 thereby making application to the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing a suggested amendment to the Federal constitution, the effect of which would be to fix the maximum income tax rate at 25 percent; and

Whereas the Sixty-fourth General Assembly considers the proposal made by such resolution inadvisable and is opposed thereto: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fourth General Assembly of the State of Illinois, the Senate concurring herein, That it express its opposition to the application and intent of the resolution set forth in the preamble hereof; and, be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to forward a copy of this resolution to the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

Adopted by the House, March 13, 1945.

Concurred in by the Senate, March 28, 1945.

APPENDIX D

LIMITATION RESOLUTION AS INTRODUCED IN CONGRESS

82D CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. J. RES. 323

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SEPTEMBER 13, 1951

Mr. REED of Illinois introduced the following joint resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

JOINT RESOLUTION Proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to taxes on incomes, inheritances, and gifts

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

"ARTICLE—

"SECTION 1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration. The maximum top rate (including the aggregate of all top rates) of all taxes, duties, and excises which the Congress may lay or collect on, with respect to, or measured by, income shall not exceed 25 per centum: Provided, however, That Congress by a vote of three-fourths of all the Members of each House may fix a rate in excess of 25 per centum, but not in excess of 40 per centum, for periods, either successive or otherwise, not exceeding one year each. In the event that the United States shall be engaged in a war which creates a national emergency so grave as to necessitate such action to avoid national disaster, the Congress by a vote of three-fourths of all the Members of each House may, while the United States is so engaged, suspend, for periods, either successive or otherwise, not exceeding one year each, such limitation with respect to income subsequently accruing or received.

"SEC. 3. The Congress shall have no power to lay or collect any tax, duty, or excise with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift.

"SEC. 4. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on, with respect to, or measured by, income for any period ending on or prior to said 31st day of December laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

"SEC. 5. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight of the day of ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax with respect to any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect."

APPENDIX E

EXCERPT FROM TESTIMONY, PANEL HEARINGS, JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE ECONOMIC REPORT: JANUARY 31, 1952 [1]

Representative PATMAN. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Colin Clark proposition, which has been mentioned by Mr. Heller, is not the same thing as the proposal that has been adopted by many State legislatures, commencing prior to 1940, calling for a limitation of personal and corporate income taxes to not more than 25 percent in any one year. The Clark contention is that in the aggregate not more than 25 percent of the national income may safely be taken in taxes; is that right?

[1] Hearings, January 1952, Economic Report of the President, Joint Committee on the Economic Report, pp. 344-347. Participants at the panel were the following: Arthur Smithies, Harvard; H. van Buren Cleveland, Committee for Economic Development; Walter W. Heller, University of Minnesota; Carl S. Shoup, Graduate School of Business, Columbia University, John P. Miller, Yale; Richard Musgrave, University of Michigan; Alfred G. Buehler, University of Pennsylvania; and Milton Friedman, University of Chicago.

Mr. HELLER. That is correct, sir.

Representative PATMAN. I want to ask about this proposal that has been sponsored by different organizations, one in particular, before various legislatures. Now that proposal, of course, appeals to a lot of people. I have personal knowledge of a meeting in a certain city in the Southwest. They got people at this meeting who were in the high income brackets, and asked them to take a card and determine for themselves how much money they would save if there were a constitutional limitation against the collection of more than 25 percent in taxes.

Naturally, they found that they would save a lot of money if such a limitation were in effect. The person holding the meeting didn't have any trouble getting a lot of money for his fund to campaign for this limitation before the legislatures. You can see why. That is a selfish reason. We expect people to be selfish up to a point but it shouldn't interfere with the public interest.

There are other reasons, I think, why they are pushing that, but that is not so important as what effect it would have on the country. Personally, I am in favor of a balanced budget. I have always advocated that.

I would be in favor of joining with the majority of the Members of the House in staying in session and we will not adjourn this Congress until the budget is balanced. But we cannot always get done what we want done, because legislation in a democracy is a matter of give and take; compromise and adjustment.

But it occurs to me that it would be a very bad thing fof the sovereign power to have a restriction like that of 25 percent. All the States, counties and cities, the political subdivisions, are restricted by State constitutions. In the event of serious trouble, the only government that heretofore has been able to bail us out and do what is necessary would, if the limitation were adopted, be restricted in its operations. For that reason I think it would be very bad. What do you think about that, Mr. Heller?

Mr. HELLER. As you spoke, I did not find myself disagreeing with anything you said. In fact, I would go beyond it. If we actually were to cut back to 25 percent today on our existing corporate and individual income and estate taxes, we would lose—according to a rough calculation I made a year ago—around $15 billion of revenue. It would certainly be more today. Needless to say, this has to be made up somewhere.

If we follow the tax path, it leads pretty straight to a broad-based consumption tax of some kind, presumably a sales tax. This may very well be exactly what some of the backers of the 25-percent limitation amendment would have in mind. From that standpoint it runs counter to our whole tradition of progressivity in taxation and to the whole democratic structure of income distribution. Moreover, in peacetime such heavy reliance on consumption taxes would make serious inroads on the mass-consumer markets which provide the ultimate base for a full-employment economy.

Representative PATMAN. It is true that these amendments vary somewhat in form. I have read every one of them. In most of them there is a provision that in the event of war a three-fourths majority of Congress may suspend the limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, that the Congress could.

Representative PATMAN. That is setting a bad example. That is endorsing minority control. In a democracy I think the majority should rule. Why should we set up any standards whereby a minority would have absolute control of the House or Senate?

For instance, we are now at war with Korea. That war, I think, was accepted by unanimous consent. I don't think a single Member of the House or Senate said a word of opposition to it until later on; when it became a little unpopular in some quarters, some began to criticize.

But now I don't know but what we would have trouble making the appropriations to carry on operations if it required three-fourths of the Members of the House and Senate.

I think that it is equally as bad in a democracy to have minority control as to have the limitation.

Mr. HELLER. As I recall, it is three-fourths of both Houses of Congress.

Representative PATMAN. That is right.

Mr. HELLER. It is not only of those present but of all Members.

Representative PATMAN. That makes it doubly bad, because it is so seldom we have all Members present in either House. Under that proposal, it has to be a constitutional three-fourths of the Members elected to that body, which wouldn't require many to obstruct absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. And also unless the amendment established a new cloture rule for the Senate, you would never get it through.

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Patman, may I make one comment about the illusions under which I think some States are operating that have supported this amendment. I understand, by the way, the actual number whose memorials to Congress are firm and solid is only about 15 instead of the 26 claimed by the groups pushing for this amendment.

Representative PATMAN. But even those 15—I wonder if they realize this would be driving the Federal Government into the very areas of taxation that they now occupy. It really would not open up the income tax to them because they can't impose high rates of income taxation.

As I understand, some additional ones may rescind. At one time there were more States approving. I took it upon myself, just as a poor humble Member of the House, to make a few speeches and send those speeches to the 7,500 members of the legislatures of the 48 States, and some of these States that had passed this amendment actually passed an amendment stating they were opposed to it; in other words, to cancel it or wipe it off the books. They didn't want to be certified as being in favor of that type of amendment. I think it was seven States that did that.

Investigation will disclose that not a single one of those amendments has passed the legislature of a State after full, free, and fair discussion. Every one of them has passed right at the end of a session, when the opportunity for public consideration was limited.

In one legislature they were ready to pass it; maybe they were foolish in inviting me, but I went over to that legislature and answered questions. One plea I made was, like you did just now, about the taxing power. That legislature, although they were ready to pass it, decided not to pass it. If a Member as ineffective as I am can persuade them against it, I know that when the legislatures and people get the truth and logic and reason against it, very few States will pass or insist upon it. But unanswered, it has an awful appeal. It wouldn't surprise me, if the Congress submitted that amendment to the States, they would probably adopt it right off without sufficient consideration and debate on the theory that the big bureaucracy in Washington ought to be stopped, and if we stop them from taxing, we can tax in our State. It has a tremendous appeal, but when you analyze it like you have, I think the good arguments are all against it, but it is an issue that has to be met in a forthright manner right away, right now.

This committee, realizing that, has been making a study, which I hope will be available very soon, and that we can begin to circulate this information and place it where it is needed.

The CHAIRMAN. Now let me say for the record that that pamphlet is wholly objective in its purpose. It does not attempt to take sides on this issue, but does attempt to gather together in one compendium, so to speak, all of the facts which seem to have been developed so far.

Representative PATMAN. Since Senator Flanders is interested in this as well as other Members, I would like to ask if any of the other members of the panel would like to express an opinion on this proposal.

Mr. BUEHLER. Could I say a word?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Buehler.

Mr. BUEHLER. Pennsylvania is one of the States that passed the resolution, and Senator Martin, who was then Governor, vetoed the resolution.

Representative PATMAN. That is right.

Mr. BUEHLER. I think our Attorney General has given out the opinion unofficially that the veto would have no legal effect.

Representative PATMAN. That would be up to Congress to decide.

Mr. BUEHLER. I presume so. I thought that was a curious twist. But I think that underneath the agitation for a constitutional tax limit is not only a resistance to the higher taxes on incomes, but also a resistance to the growing Federal budget. I have had the proposed amendment explained to me as a way by which Congress would be forced into reducing the budget, keeping expenditures down. You would have available only the revenues that could be raised under the 25 percent limitation, and therefore you would have to cut the budget. Actually, the total taxes which would be available might support a much larger budget than we now have.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt to say I think from what I have seen that there is a very widespread misapprehension among at least some of those who are supporting this movement, that when the requisite number of States have passed a resolution, it will be mandatory that Congress submit such an amendment for ratification; whereas, that isn't the fact at all.

Congress would be required only to call a Constitutional Convention, and that Convention could at the same time consider and perhaps report and recommend the amendment which was suggested here this morning, that the Federal Government be given the power to tax real property within the boundaries of the several States.

Representative PATMAN. That is under article V of the Constitution, and you are exactly right about it.

Senator FLANDERS. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Flanders.

Senator FLANDERS. I think this thing might be resolved by a show of hands on the part of the economists. All those in favor of this constitutional amendment, you might ask them to raise their right hands, and those opposed afterwards. I can guess very clearly just how the vote would come out.

Representative PATMAN. Suppose you do that.

The CHAIRMAN. At the suggestion of the distinguished and able Senator from Vermont, the chairman invites those who are in favor of the constitutional amendment to limit to 25 percent for every individual the tax burden which may be levied in a single year upon an individual to raise their hands.

There are no hands showing.

Those who are opposed please raise their hands.

The voting is unanimously against.

APPENDIX F

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY [1]

A. GENERAL

Buehler, Alfred G. Public Finance. New York, McGraw-Hill Book Co., 1948, 3d ed. 740 p.

A general textbook on public finance.

Clark, Colin. The Danger Point in Taxes. Harpers Magazine, December 1950, pp. 67–69.

Article by famous economist giving recent examples of high taxation and concluding that a rate of 25 percent would appear to be about the limit.

Groves, Harold M. Viewpoints on Public Finance. New York, Henry Hold and Co., 1947, pp. 2–23.

Selections from various writers on canons of taxation, the benefit principle, sacrifice theories, ability to pay, progressive taxation, proportional taxation, plus a brief bibliography.

Kimmel, Lewis H. Taxes and Economic Incentives. Washington, The Brookings Institution, 1950. 217 p.

Background discussion of taxable capacity, followed by analysis of economic effects of various types of taxes.

Lindholm, Richard W. Public Finance and Fiscal Policy, New York, Pitman Publishing Corp., 1950. 732 p.

Textbook review of general tax policy and an analysis of the various types of taxes, their development, purpose, and economic effects.

[1] Prepared by Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress.

Lutz, Harley L. Guideposts to a Free Economy. New York, McGraw-Hill Book Co., 1945. 206 p.
States the case against progressive income taxes.
Seligman, Edwin R. A. Progressive Taxation in Theory and Practice. Princeton, American Economic Association, 1908, 2d ed.
States the case for progressive taxation.
Wyden, Peter. Tax Relief "for Millionaires Only," St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 6, 1952, Part 3.

B. AMENDMENT BY CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Orfield, Lester B. The Amending of the Federal Constitution. Chicago, Callaghan and Co., 1942. 242p.
Extensive review of the amending process.
Tydings, Millard E. Federal Constitutional Convention. Washington, Government Printing Office, 1930. 32p. (71st Cong., 2d. sess., Sen. Doc. 78).
Compilation showing the applications made to the Senate by State legislatures for calling a constitutional convention.
Wheeler, Wayne B. Is a Constitutional Convention Impending? Illinois Law Review, April 1927, pp. 782–803.
Extensive review of constitutional amendment by convention.

C. ARTICLES ADVOCATING TAX LIMITATION

American Taxpayers Association. Tax Information Series. Various issues of this currently issued series give brief notes on the proposed constitutional amendment.
———. Why the 25 Percent Limit on Federal Taxes. 1944. 28 p. pamphlet.
Dangers in the 16th amendment, effect of unsound heavy taxation, the issues involved, etc.
Casey, D. E. Our Postwar Welfare Demands a Limitation of Taxing Power. Proceedings of the 38th Annual Conference on Taxation under the auspices of the National Tax Association, 1945. pp. 307–313.
Why a limitation is needed; answers to objections to a limitation. (Reprinted by American Taxpayers Association under title "Federal Taxing Power must be Limited.")
Citizens National Committee. A Proposed Amendment to the Constitution: 25 percent Tax Rate Limitation . . . Its Pros and Cons . . . (Research Report No. 2–403). 1945. 23 p. pamphlet.
Summary of the proposal, and the pro and con views of various people.
Dresser, Robert B. Brief in support of Proposed Constitutional Amendment Limiting the Power of Congress to Impose Taxes on Incomes, Inheritances and Gifts to a Maximum Rate of 25 percent. 1943. 39 p. Committee for Constitutional Government pamphlet.
Evil consequences of excessive taxation; quotations from various persons as to such consequences.
———. The Case for a Constitutional Limitation on Federal Taxes. Bulletin of the National Tax Association. March 1944, pp. 170–177.
Another statement of the argument in support of the proposal.
———. Robert B. Dresser's reply to objections of Tax Research Division of U. S. Treasury . . . 8 p. Committee for Constituitonal Government pamphlet.
A point by point rebuttal of Treasury arguments against the 25 percent limitation.
National Research Institute. 17 States Say—Repeal the Income Tax Amendment; Limit U. S. Taxes to 25 percent. 1944. 58 p. pamphlet.
Historical development of the tax limitation movement and tax rates; beneficial effect of prior tax reductions.
Seidman, M. L. Should a Constitutional Limit be Placed on Federal Income Tax Rates? Modern Industry, March 15, 1944, p. 109.
A debate with Professor Groves.
Should the Federal Taxing Power Be Limited? Congressional Digest, November 1944, pp. 259–288.
A pro and con discussion.

D. ARTICLES OPPOSED TO TAX LIMITATION

Citizens National Committee. A proposed Amendment to the Constitution: 25 percent Tax Rate Limitation . . . Its Pros and Cons . . . (Research Report No. 2–403). 1945. 23 p. pamphlet.
Summary of the proposal, and the pro and con views of various people.
Groves, Harold M. Federal Constitutional Tax Limitation. Proceedings of the 38th Annual Conference on Taxation under the auspices of the National Tax Association. 1945. pp. 314–320.
Experience of States with tax limitations, fallacies in the arguments of proponents of the limitation, undesirable consequences of the proposed limitation.
———. Should a Constitutional Limit be Placed on Federal Income Tax Rates? Modern Industry, March 15, 1944, p. 109.
A debate with Mr. Seidman.
Olmstead, H. M. The Tax Limitation Delusion. National Municipal Review, February 1945, pp. 64–68.
Discusses and opposes the 25 percent limitation.
Patman, Wright. Attack on Sixteenth Amendment to United States Constitution. Congressional Record, May 31, 1951, pp. 6164–6169.
Reproduction of Legislative Reference report on the Method of Amending the Constitution being followed by the proponents of the Amendment, together with a reproduction by Mr. Patman of his June 8, 1944, speech on the proponents of the Amendment.
Should the Federal Taxing Power Be Limited? Congressional Digest, November 1944. pp. 259–288.
A pro and con discussion.
U. S. Treasury Department, Division of Tax Research, Proposed Constitutional Amendment to Prohibit Federal Tax Rates Exceeding 25 Percent. 1944. 20 p. mimeographed study.
Dangerous consequences of the proposed constitutional amendment.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

HEARINGS

BEFORE THE

SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS

OF THE

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY UNITED STATES SENATE

NINETIETH CONGRESS

FIRST SESSION

ON

S. 2307

A BILL TO PROVIDE PROCEDURES FOR CALLING CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS FOR PROPOSING AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, ON APPLICATION OF THE LEGISLATURES OF TWO-THIRDS OF THE STATES, PURSUANT TO ARTICLE V OF THE CONSTITUTION

OCTOBER 30 AND 31, 1967

Printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary

U.S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE
88-138 WASHINGTON : 1968

For sale by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office
Washington, D.C. 20402 - Price 60 cents

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

JAMES O. EASTLAND, Mississippi, Chairman

JOHN L. McCLELLAN, Arkansas
SAM J. ERVIN, Jr., North Carolina
THOMAS J. DODD, Connecticut
PHILIP A. HART, Michigan
EDWARD V. LONG, Missouri
EDWARD M. KENNEDY, Massachusetts
BIRCH BAYH, Indiana
QUENTIN N. BURDICK, North Dakota
JOSEPH D. TYDINGS, Maryland
GEORGE A. SMATHERS, Florida

EVERETT McKINLEY DIRKSEN, Illinois
ROMAN L. HRUSKA, Nebraska
HIRAM L. FONG, Hawaii
HUGH SCOTT, Pennsylvania
STROM THURMOND, South Carolina

SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS

SAM J. ERVIN, JR., North Carolina, Chairman

JOHN L. McCLELLAN, Arkansas
QUENTIN N. BURDICK, North Dakota

EVERETT McKINLEY DIRKSEN, Illinois
ROMAN L. HRUSKA, Nebraska

PAUL L. WOODARD, Chief Counsel and Staff Director
PHILIP B. KURLAND, Chief Consultant
LAWRENCE J. BRADY, Minority Counsel

CONTENTS

PROCEDURES FOR CALLING CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS UPON APPLICATION BY STATES

MONDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:10 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen presiding.

Present: Senators Dirksen, Hruska, and Tydings.

Also present: Paul L. Woodard, chief counsel, Lawrence J. Brady, minority counsel; Prof. Philip B. Kurland, chief consultant, Prof. Robert G. McCloskey, consultant, and Prof. Alexander M. Bickel, consultant.

Senator DIRKSEN. The committee will come to order.

I will ask that there be included at this point in the hearings record the text of article V of the Constitution of the United States.

(Article V follows:)

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

ARTICLE V.

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Senator DIRKSEN. Senator Ervin is unable to be present at today's session. I think it would be appropriate to insert into the record the statement which he made on August 17, 1967, when he introduced Senate bill 2307.

I will also ask that a copy of the bill be made a part of the record.

(The statement of Senator Ervin, and S. 2307 follow:)

REMARKS OF SENATOR SAM J. ERVIN, JR., DEMOCRAT OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to establish procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States upon application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to Article V of the Constitution.

In recent weeks there has been much information, misinformation and ignorance displayed on the subject of amending the Constitution by a convention called by the State legislatures. With the sudden realization that thirty-two State legislatures already have called for a new federal constitutional convention, many persons have concluded that the Nation is on the verge of the worst internal crisis since the Civil War. They have warned that if any such convention is called the result will surely be a constitutional nightmare. They foresee a runaway convention proposing wholesale amendments abolishing the Bill of Rights, repealing the income tax, providing for the election of the Supreme Court, and the like. Even those persons who favor a constitutional convention and view it as the highest forum for the expression of the will of the people, are quick to agree that the Congress, in seeking to implement the provision in Article V for the convening of a convention upon application of two-thirds of the States, would be virtually without precedent to guide it in answering the myriad sensitive questions involved.

Amendment of the Constitution is too important a subject to remain thus enshrouded in darkness. And I hope by introduction of this bill to evoke some light—through committee hearings—and to reduce to orderly processes the chaos, and, indeed, the anarchy, that threatens in the absence of such legislation.

At the outset I should say that the problem dealt with in this bill transcends the issue that brought it to light. It would be grossly unfortunate if the partisanship over State legislative reapportionment—and I speak as a partisan on that issue—should distort an attempt at clarification of this process for amendment of the Constitution. For certainly we must recognize that the amendment process in the long-run must command a higher obligation and duty than any single issue that might be the subject of that process.

[S. 2307, 90th Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Constitutional Convention Act."

APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 2. The legislature of a State, in making application for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States, shall, after adopting a resolution pursuant to this Act, petition the Congress stating, in substance, that the legislative requests the calling of a convention for the purpose of proposing one or more amendments of a particular nature to the Constitution of the United States and stating the specific nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed.

APPLICATION PROCEDURES

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting or rescinding a resolution pursuant to section 2, the State legislature shall adopt its own rules of procedure.

(b) Questions concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act shall be determinable by the State legislature and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts, and the Congress of the United States.

(c) A State resolution adopted pursuant to this Act shall be effective without approval by the Governor of the State.

TRANSMITTAL OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) Within sixty days after a resolution to apply for the calling of a constitutional convention is adopted by the legislature of a State, the secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Each copy of the application so made by any State shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution,

(2) the exact text of the resolution, signed by the presiding officer of each house of the State legislature, and

(3) the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution; and shall be accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution.

(c) Upon receipt of a copy of any such application, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause copies to be made thereof and shall forthwith send a copy thereof to the presiding officer of each House of the legislature of every other State.

EFFECTIVE PERIOD OF APPLICATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) An application submitted to the Congress by a State pursuant to this Act, unless sooner rescinded by the State legislature, shall remain effective for six calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, except that whenever the Congress determines that within a period of six calendar years two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same subject all such applications shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 8, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State may rescind its application calling for a constitutional convention by adopting and transmitting to the Congress a resolution of rescission in conformity with the procedure specified in sections 3 and 4, except that no such rescission shall be effective as to any application made for a constitutional convention upon any subject after the date on which two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same subject.

(c) The Congress of the United States shall have the sole power of determining whether a State's action to rescind its application has been timely taken.

CALLING OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

SEC. 6. (a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate to maintain a record of all applications received by the President of the Senate, and it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the House of Representatives to maintain a tabulation of all applications received by the Speaker of the House of Representatives from the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon each subject. Whenever the Secretary or the Clerk has reason to believe that such applications made by two-thirds or more of the States with respect to the same subject are in effect, he shall so report in writing to the officer to whom those applications were transmitted, and such officer thereupon shall announce upon the floor of the House of which he an officer the substance of such report. Pursuant to such rules as such House may adopt, it shall be the duty of such House to determine whether the recitation contained in any such report is correct. If either House of the Congress determines, upon a consideration of any such report or of a concurrent resolution agreed to by the other House of the Congress, that there are in effect applications made by two-thirds or more of the States for the calling of a constitutional convention upon the same subject, it shall be the duty of that House to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a Federal constitutional convention upon that subject. Each such concurrent resolution shall (1) designate the place and time of meeting of the convention; (2) set forth the particular nature of the amendment or amendments for the consideration of which the convention was called; (3) prescribe the time within which any amendment or amendments proposed by such convention must be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or be deemed inoperative; and (4) specify the manner in which such amendment or amendments shall be ratified in accordance with article V of the Constitution. A copy of each such resolution agreed to by both Houses of the Congress shall be transmitted forthwith to the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of each State.

(b) The convention shall be convened not later than one year after the adoption of the resolution.

DELEGATES

SEC. 7. (a) A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Representatives in Congress. Each delegate shall be elected or appointed in the manner provided by State law. Alternate delegates, in the number established by State law, shall be elected or appointed at the same time and in the same manner. Any vacancy occurring in the State delegation shall be filled by appointment of one of the alternate delegates in the manner provided at the time of his election or appointment as an alternate delegate. No alternate delegate shall take part in the proceedings of the convention unless he is appointed a delegate..

(b) The secretary of state of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function shall certify to the Vice President of the United States the name of each delegate and alternate delegate appointed or elected pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(d) Each delegate and each alternate delegate shall receive compensation at the rate of $50 per day for each day of service and shall be compensated for traveling and related expenses in accordance with the provisions of sections 5701–5702 and 5704–5708, inclusive, of title 5 of the United States Code. The convention shall fix the compensation of employees of the convention.

CONVENING OF CONVENTION

SEC. 8. (a) The Vice President of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office of the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe an oath not to attempt to change or alter any section, clause or article of the Constitution or propose additions thereto which have not been specified in the resolution calling the convention. Upon the election of permanent officers of the convention, the names of such officers shall be transmitted to the President, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the elected presiding officer of the convention. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as the convention may adopt.

(b) The Congress shall appropriate moneys for the payment of all expenses of the convention.

(c) Under such regulations as the President shall prescribe, the Administrator of General Services shall provide such facilities, and each executive department and agency shall provide such information, as the convention may require upon written request made by the elected presiding officer of the convention.

PROCEEDINGS OF CONVENTIONS

SEC. 9. (a) In voting on any question before the convention each State shall have one vote which shall be cast as the majority of the delegates from the State, present at the time, shall agree. If the delegates from any State present are evenly divided on any question before the convention, the vote of that State shall not be cast on the question.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily verbatim record of its proceedings and publish the same. The votes of the States on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

(d) Within thirty days after the termination of the proceedings of the convention, the presiding officer shall transmit to the Archivist of the United States all records of official proceedings of the convention.

PROPOSAL OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 10. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a majority of the total votes cast on the question.

(b) No convention called under this Act may propose any amendment or amendments of a general nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. No controversy arising under this subsection shall be justiciable but shall be determined solely by the Congress of the United States.

APPROVAL BY THE CONGRESS AND TRANSMITTAL TO THE STATES FOR RATIFICATION

SEC. 11. (a) The presiding officer of the convention shall, within thirty days after the termination of its proceedings, submit the exact text of any amendment or amendments agreed upon by the convention to the Congress for approval and transmittal to the several States for their ratification.

(b) Upon the expiration of the first period of three months of continuous session of the Congress following the receipt of any proposed amendment by the Congress, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit such proposed amendments to the Administrator of General Services for submission to the States, but only if prior to the expiration of such period the Congress has not adopted a concurrent resolution disapproving the submission of the proposed amendment to the States on the ground that its general nature is different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention.

(c) Upon receipt of any such amendment or amendments, the Administrator of General Services shall transmit exact copies of the same, together with his certification thereof, to the legislatures of the several States.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. Any amendment proposed by the convention and submitted to the States in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when duly ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States in the manner and within the time specified in the concurrent resolution calling for the convening of the convention.

PROCEDURE FOR RATIFICATION

SEC. 13. (a) For the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments transmitted by the States pursuant to this Act the State legislatures shall adopt their own rules of procedure except that the acts of ratification shall be by convention or by State legislative action as the Congress may direct. All questions concerning the validity of State legislative procedure shall be determined by the legislatures and their decisions shall be binding on all others.

(b) Any State resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be valid without the assent of the Governor of the State.

TRANSMITTAL OF RATIFICATIONS

SEC. 14. The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State resolution ratifying any proposed amendment to the Administrator of General Services.

RESCISSION OF RATIFICATIONS

SEC. 15. (a) Any State may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment except that no State may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications of such amendment by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it previously may have rejected the same proposal.

(c) The Congress of the United States shall have the sole power of determining all questions relating to the ratification, rescission, or rejection of amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States.

PROCLAMATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 16. The Administrator of General Services, when three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States have ratified a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation proclaiming the amendment to be a part of the Constitution of the United States.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF AMENDMENTS

SEC. 17. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date on which the legislature of the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the legislatures of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

Senator DIRKSEN. Before calling the first witness, the Chair would like to say that he has a statement on the matter to be heard this morning which, rather than deliver, I will insert in the record, if there is no objection.

(Statement follows:)

STATEMENT BY HON. EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN

We are deeply indebted to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Ervin, for the initiative he has taken in introducing S. 2307 and thereby attempting to answer some of the questions surrounding the calling of a convention as a method of proposing amendments to the Constitution. Senator Ervin, who in my estimation is one of the great scholars of Constitutional law, is performing an invaluable service to the nation by exposing to public scrutiny legislation designed to implement the provision in Article V of the Constitution which directs the Congress to call a convention whenever two-thirds of the state legislatures have applied to the Congress. This is a most complex area, for in seeking to implement Article V, the Congress is virtually without precedent to guide it. Since the Constitution's adoption, there have been over 200 applications calling for conventions to amend the Constitution and they covered a wide variety of subjects. Despite this number, however, we have never received applications from two-thirds of the state legislatures on any one subject. Therefore, the convention method of proposing amendments has never been employed. But today the matter of Constitutional conventions is of serious concern because of the fact that 32 state legislatures have applied to the Congress for a convention on the subject matter of reapportionment of state legislatures. The mood of these legislatures leads me to believe that the Congress will be confronted with the requisite number of applications so as to compel the calling of a convention. The applications may be on a subject other than reapportionment, but I expect them.

Article V is silent on questions as to when conventions are to be convened; how the conventions are to be formed; or what rules are to govern their acts. And too, questions exist as to the authority of the Congress, of the states, and of the people themselves, when this method of proposing amendments is employed.

Article V does, however, provide us with the foundation on which we must proceed in developing implementing legislation.

The language of Article V reads, "The Congress . . . on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which . . . shall be valid to all intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified. . . ." I can find nothing in that language of Article V that is not as clear and unambiguous as the English language can be made. We, as members of Congress are bound by Oath as provided by Article VI to support not only that part of Article V that I have quoted, but all of the Constitution.

Let me discuss the reasons as I understand them for the inclusion in Article V of this language that has been described by Alexander Hamilton as "peremptory." There was general acceptance among the delegates to Philadelphia of the necessity of providing a means whereby this new Constitution that was being developed could, when necessary, be amended. Their own experience with the Articles of Confederation attested to this need. But how was this to be accomplished? Two types of proposals were advanced, and without going into any of the details of either of them, I think that it is sufficient to say that neither really met the need that the delegates felt existed. From my reading of history it seems to me that there was a clear recognition of the necessity of providing an unqualified method whereby the people who were surrendering certain authority to a Federal Republic could change that authority at any future time when they felt it necessary to do so and that nothing should be left to stand in the way of the exercise of that right. No Congress could deny it, no court nor executive; this was to be an unqualified right to be retained by the people and exercised by them through their elected representatives in the state legislatures.

I am repeatedly surprised as I read the history of our Constitution at how often I find illustrations of the foresight that these delegates at Philadelphia possessed. Consider that part of the debate that had to do with the adoption of this very language. Fear was expressed that under the other amending proposals some future Congress, assuming greater and greater authority, might become unresponsive to the desires of the people and fail to heed their request for a change in this basic document that was to safeguard their liberties. It was reasoned that the people might want to reduce the power of Congress and it was considered unlikely that a strong Congress would be responsive to such a proposal. The solution was to provide a means whereby the Congress, upon application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States would be mandated to call a Constitutional Convention for the purposes of proposing amendments to the Constitution.

I believe it is with this background in mind that we should proceed to the consideration of S. 2307. Although I have problems with a few parts of the bill, which I have set down in a much longer memorandum I prepared for the Subcommittee's use, I think that legislation along the lines of that embodied in S. 2307 is of the highest urgency and it is my belief that the function being performed by exposing this problem to debate and scrutiny in these hearings is of great importance to the country.

Senator DIRKSEN. Senator Hruska, do you have a statement?

Senator HRUSKA. Yes; I do, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to read it, if there is no objection.

STATEMENT BY HON. ROMAN L. HRUSKA, U.S. SENATOR FROM NEBRASKA

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, for the first time since the adoption of the Constitution on September 17, 1787, this Nation may be on the verge of convening another Constitutional Convention. It is well for us, in this light, to examine and study the constitutional procedure for convening a future Convention.

Article V of the Constitution provides two methods for amending the Constitution. It includes a procedure "on Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, (the Congress) shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, * * *." The delegates to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia inserted this provision for one very obvious reason. This reason was the great fear of the delegates of a balky future Congress, a Congress that might prove unresponsive to the wishes of the States, and more importantly, to the wishes of the citizens in those States.

There have been many hobgoblins raised as a result of the recent pressure by the States to call a Constitutional Convention. Many of these objections are based, in my opinion, upon a fear of some individuals that the people are not able to make their own decisions.

To determine the proper role that Congress must play in the convention method of amending the Constitution, two principles must be kept in mind. One is that whatever the Congress does, it can only do as a result of authority delegated to it in the Constitution. Secondly, Congress in proposing amendments or calling a constitutional convention is not exercising a legislative function.

Since Congress is without authority of its own to call a convention, it is possessed at most with authority only over routine housekeeping functions. Functions, such as providing for the place, date, presumably the duration, financing, voting, and other similar matters of a convention, are within this authority.

It should not be overlooked that there are two basic safeguards against a "wide open" convention, as many may fear. The first is the good faith, judgment, and responsibility of its delegates. The second is the requirement that any proposal of the convention must be ratified by three-fourths of the States—38 of them—before becoming effective.

Mr. Chairman, it is appropriate that Senator Ervin has introduced S. 2307 and that these hearings are being held in order that the many unfounded fears of a constitutional convention will be laid to rest and that the true constitutional participation of Congress in such a convention will be highlighted.

Senator DIRKSEN. Now, my understanding is that Senator Proxmire is the first witness. Senator, please come up to the witness table.

My friend, you may proceed in your own way.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM PROXMIRE, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF WISCONSIN

Senator PROXMIRE. Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to have an opportunity to present to your subcommittee my comments on S. 2307, the bill to provide procedures for calling Federal constitutional conventions to propose amendments to the Constitution. First, I want to commend Senator Ervin for introducing legislation on the subject so that we can begin to come to grips with a very delicate problem—one which has been thrust into the spotlight of public interest by efforts to call a constitutional convention on reapportionment. It is very, very helpful to have before the Congress legislation that can serve as a welcome basis for a discussion of the problem, although I feel the proposal could be improved, as my testimony will indicate.

In my estimation, one of the prime benefits of an orderly procedure for the calling of a Constitutional Convention should be the notice such a process will provide that State petitions for a Constitutional Convention on a particular subject are mounting and that a Convention is a definite possibility. Thus we would avoid the type of situation that erupted this spring when the New York Times observed, with justification, regarding the reapportionment issue that—> most of official Washington has been caught by surprise because the state legislative actions have been taken with little fanfare. Most Congressional leaders seemed to be unaware that the effort to convene a constitutional convention was so near its goal.

This attempt to quickly and quietly gather petitions for a Convention in such a way that the States themselves do not realize the significance of their action was highlighted by a statement in the same Times article that—

> Senator Dirksen had hoped to keep the progress of the campaign quiet until the end of next week in the hope that two more states would have passed resolutions by then. He then planned to make a dramatic announcement that the requirements for convening a constitutional convention had been met.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the fact that not a single State has acted since that March 17 date to petition the Congress on the subject of reapportionment is eloquent testimony to the importance of complete disclosure in this area.

Such disclosure should also prevent the kind of summary treatment petitions for a constitutional convention have received by State legislatures in the past. Certainly the people of Illinois would have urged the Illinois Legislature to give more consideration to a reapportionment petition that passed the Illinois House after a suspension of the rules and without hearings had the people known that 26 States already had petitioned the Congress on the same subject. As an editorial in the March 16 Chicago's American stated:

> We only wish (the people) had been given a chance to decide, or even to ask questions, while the legislature was suspending the rules and shutting off debate to hustle this resolution thru.

I doubt that the Indiana State Senate would have passed a similar resolution, in the words of the Indianapolis Star, because Senators "did not have enough votes to pass their own 'Kizer plan' on congressional redistricting, and wanted badly to send it to the House to make a record" had those State legislators known of the stakes involved. Finally, I believe it would be much more difficult for State legislators to urge adoption of a convention-call resolution on the grounds that "the convention would never be held, but that Congress would get some idea of unrest by the people," as a legislator in my State, a very prominent and well-informed legislator, said. He wouldn't have said that if disclosure provisions similar to those contained in the Ervin bill were to become law.

However, I think S. 2307 should be amended to require resolutions calling for a constitutional convention to be transmitted to the U.S. Congress within 10 days after such a resolution is adopted by a State legislature rather than the 60 days provided by the bill. I also believe such resolutions should be numbered before they are transmitted to "the presiding officer of each house of the legislature of every other State" by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House so that States considering similar resolutions can be made aware of the number which have already been passed. I would hope that copies could also be made available to Members of both Houses of the U.S. Congress so that they could be made aware of developments in this area. Finally, I support a clarifying amendment to S. 2307 which would require transmission of copies of these resolutions to the States and the U.S. Congress within 10 days after their receipt.

All of these proposed amendments should work no great hardship on the officials involved. On the other hand, they will insure prompt notice to both State and National Legislatures of the progress of efforts to call constitutional conventions.

The bill provides that applications for a constitutional convention shall remain effective for 6 calendar years. In my estimation, this is too long a period of time in today's quickly changing world. Theodore Sorenson, in a speech made earlier this year, suggested that 34 petitions should be received in the same Congress since congressional initiation of a constitutional amendment has to take place in the same Congress. While I feel this requirement is a bit stringent in view of the fact that some State legislatures meet only every other year, a 4-year requirement makes great sense to me. Each and every one of the amendments to our Constitution have been ratified by the States in less than 4 years. In my estimation, the States should be given no more time than this for calling a constitutional convention.

Once again, I feel that a reference to the reapportionment experience is in order. Most of the States that petitioned Congress on the subject were malapportioned at the time the petitions were passed. Those States are, by and large, now apportioned fairly. It is quite likely that most of those State legislatures would not now support a reapportionment resolution. Thus the petitions are badly outdated.

I think it is very important to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, as the Ervin legislation does, that the constitutional conventions will be called upon specific subjects and on the basis of State legislative requests "stating the specific nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed." I hope that it will be possible for this subcommittee to give careful consideration to the precise meaning of this language and, perhaps, go into the matter in a committee report should S. 2307 or a similar proposal be reported from the Judiciary Committee. As I read this language, for example, it would rule out three of the 32 reapportionment petitions—those three that would limit the jurisdiction of the courts over reapportionment actions. Clearly there is a substantial difference between a constitutional amendment limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and an amendment reserving to the States the right to apportion one house of their legislature on a basis other than population.

S. 2307 provides that each State shall have one vote in a constitutional convention, although the number of delegates representing a State at the convention would be equivalent to the number of Representatives the State has in the U.S. Congress. Each vote shall be cast as the majority of delegates from each State decides. This proposal is in sharp contrast to draft legislation proposed in a House Judiciary Committee staff report back in 1952 which would have given each State a number of votes equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which the State is entitled in Congress with all votes of a particular State delegation being cast as the majority of the delegation decides.

In my estimation, both of these proposals have serious drawbacks. If each State had one vote in a convention, 26 States representing one-sixth of the population could propose new amendments after 34 States representing 30 percent of the population had called a convention. This hardly would correspond with the injunction that the proponents of a constitutional convention on reapportionment have used in their campaign that we should "let the people decide." In fact, a very small minority of the people of the United States would be deciding to submit a constitutional amendment to the States. This contrasts sharply with the process that has been followed to date in amending the Constitution—a process in which two-thirds of the House of Representatives, apportioned on a population basis, has to approve any amendment.

On the other hand, the type of bloc-voting approach advocated in the House staff report raises all of the many objections that have been discussed in connection with our electoral college system for electing Presidents. A State such as New York, which would be entitled to 43 votes at a constitutional convention, could cast all 43 votes for an amendment although 21 members of the delegation opposed the amendment. Of course, a similar objection could also be raised to the approach taken in S. 2307 although only one vote would be at issue.

As an equitable alternative, I propose that each State be permitted a number of delegates at any constitutional convention equivalent to the number of Representatives and Senators the State has in the Congress. However, each delegate, not each State, should have one convention vote. In this way, we would be taking a giant stride toward truly letting the people decide while at the same time recognizing factors other than population by allotting each State a minimum of three votes since each State has at least two Senators and one Representative in the Congress. I also think that it should be made clear that these delegates should be elected by the people of the 50 States, not appointed as S. 2307 would permit.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, in my estimation, amendments to the Constitution should be proposed by two-thirds rather than a majority of the votes cast, just as two-thirds of both Houses of Congress must approve amendments before they can be submitted to the States.

These, then, are my suggestions for change in S. 2307. They are an attempt to pinpoint some of the problems that go to the heart of the amendatory process. However, they are in no sense meant to be an exhaustive critique of the bill. I am sure that many substantial questions will be raised by other witnesses testifying on this legislation.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator DIRKSEN. I notice you make considerable point of making certain that people and States be fully aware of what is going on if a resolution is passed by a legislature.

In view of the fact that the Council of State Governments was created some years ago and has become immensely active all along the line, are you of the opinion that States and State legislatures are not aware of what is going on? I am referring particularly to your allusion to that New York Times article as if there was some stealth about these efforts of working with the legislatures.

Doesn't it completely ignore the years of work that were done behind the resolution that was introduced in the Congress and on which we voted and for which we got a very substantial vote in excess of a majority? Do you think there was something secretive or hidden about that?

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, of course, what I was talking about was not the fact that it is well known throughout the country, and I am sure it is well known in the State legislatures everywhere that there was a very hot and highly controversial debate going on in the Congress of the United States over the one-man, one-vote issue.

But the point I was making, and I think the New York Times was substantially right on, is that State legislatures were not aware that this change—this proposed Constitutional Convention, rather—was so well on its way and seemed to be very close to being called. I think that this is because, after all, the 50 States are not in the center of national interest, and they don't get national attention, and when a State takes this action, while it might be big news in the State or might not be, it is not very big news in any other State.

Senator DIRKSEN. Isn't the fact that no legislature rescinded its action rather indicative that it knew quite well what was going on, notwithstanding the efforts that were made to have legislatures rescind?

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, as the Senator from Illinois is well aware, it is difficult to rescind and it is sometimes felt in some of these States that it was perhaps unnecessary to go to the difficulty of rescinding even though many of us were deeply concerned. Many State legislators shared that concern. In at least one State I know of where there was an attempt to rescind, it was very clear, in my view, that there was a big majority, and I am referring to Maryland, for rescinding the action.

But there were technical reasons and time reasons why it was impossible to consummate that rescinding action.

Senator DIRKSEN. You raised some question about the validity of the State action taken inasmuch as it was taken in malapportioned legislatures. If that be true, if this could be challenged on that ground, what happens to the host of legislation of all kinds that was enacted by the very same malapportioned legislatures? Does it fall?

Senator PROXMIRE. No, indeed; no, indeed, and I would agree wholeheartedly that this is a critical point that has to be met.

My point, however, is that this is a peculiarly sensitive issue. This is the issue on which a malapportioned legislature might very clearly take a position that would be different from the position of a legislature apportioned on a one-man, one-vote basis. For this reason it seems to me that this can be treated distinctively and specifically without considering action that would, of course, result in chaos, in which you would have to abolish all of the work of legislatures for years before, because many have been malapportioned throughout the country for many, many years.

Senator DIRKSEN. Of course, I want to make abundantly clear that the whole issue involved in the effort which was put forth over a period of time was clearly misrepresented to the country and in many cases to the legislatures. The emphasis was constantly put on one man, one vote when, in truth and in fact, the question was: Is this matter in the State domain and does the legislature take action or does the Supreme Court take action? That was the issue, really.

Now, if a legislature wants to employ one man, one vote for its State, I wouldn't quarrel with it for a moment. But it is a legislative job and it falls within the domain of the State, if we are going to have a proper regard for our federal-state system.

Senator PROXMIRE. Here is where you and I would sharply disagree. I would agree wholeheartedly that it is perfectly proper and legitimate to consider the States rights aspects of this, but there is also no question in my mind that it was proper for the Supreme Court to decide as it did, and under these circumstances for the Congress to take the position that one man, one vote is a legitimate principle to insist that State legislatures follow.

Senator DIRKSEN. Well, I don't quarrel with the principle as such. I just quarrel with the source of power that gives its approval, and that was the position taken by Justice Frankfurter who said this was a legislative thicket where the Supreme Court has no business, and I emphatically agree with the viewpoint that he expressed. But, of course, it is your right to disagree.

Senator PROXMIRE. Of course, my view is the view of the majority of the Supreme Court that, if you are going to have equal rights under the Constitution, this is where the equality must be meaningful.

Senator DIRKSEN. Well much could be said on that subject also. Senator Hruska?

Senator HRUSKA. Senator Proxmire, I don't know that it is particularly determinative of any of the issues here, but many people have been amused by the statement that "in the last 4 years there has been a quiet campaign to rewrite the Constitution." It has been suggested to me that the members of the fourth estate were probably not as alert as they could have been, and because they had been so busy with many other things, they lost count of the number of States whose legislatures had petitioned the Congress for a constitutional convention. Maybe as a defensive measure they might have thought, "Well, we are going to attribute to some Senator the idea that this campaign to get 34 States to petition for a convention was conducted in a secret and quiet manner." I don't know that I would subscribe to that, but it is an interesting concept to contemplate.

The question I would like to ask is, How can it be said that there would be a quiet campaign? I had never known that State legislatures were exactly quiet places of doing business. My experience is that the press is around each of those legislative sessions in great abundance. Here in the Senate in 1965 and 1966, when the Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on the subject of State legislative reapportionment, repeatedly this Senator, as well as other Senators, including the Senator from Illinois, interrogated witnesses to the effect that "There are now x States that have petitioned for national conventions on the Constitution. Which would you prefer, the submission to the State legislatures of an amendment on legislative reapportionment proposed by Congress or a constitutional convention?" And I recall at that juncture as many as two dozen States had petitioned for a national convention.

Now, when that question is asked repeatedly of witnesses, and they respond that they would prefer, if they could choose, the consideration by the State legislatures of a proposed amendment passed by Congress as an alternative to a constitutional convention, do you think, in view of all these things, that the words "quiet campaign to rewrite the Constitution" are particularly applicable?

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, of course, it depends entirely on your viewpoint. I think you could say it was proper, a proper interpretation of the situation, because, as the Senator from Nebraska is undoubtedly very sensitive about, as I am too, a great deal that comes out of committee, and properly so, is not deemed by the press as newsworthy. A lot of the questions that go back and forth in the enormous record of hearings we compile have to be more or less overlooked if they don't seem to be timely on the big issue that is before the committee or the Congress at that point.

It did seem, I think, and I am sure the Senator is right in reference to his records, that this question was repeatedly asked. Apparently there was a feeling on the part of the press that this wasn't the central issue that was being discussed at that particular time. And I think, as I said to Senator Dirksen, that the fact that the States are not subject to national reporting means that much that goes on within a State government is not given attention even within the State. It is understandable, then, that this thing can proceed quietly, quietly in a sense that it wasn't called to the attention of many of us in the Senate or in the House, although I am sure that the people such as the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Maryland, who were members of the Judiciary Committee and deeply interested in this, were aware of it.

Senator HRUSKA. Your statement indicates and implies that in some instances in the State legislatures there was hasty or hurried action and the real essence and the real significance of the signing and approving of a petition calling for a constitutional convention really wasn't realized. That would indicate, wouldn't it, that you would be interested in a more deliberate procedure, a more studious contemplation of the issues involved? Is that a fair statement?

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes, indeed.

Senator HRUSKA. It appears to this Senator that that kind of an idea would be at variance with some of the amendments you propose to the pending bill. For example, numbering of the resolutions is called for so that all of the States would know how many had petitioned for a convention. When a petition is accepted and numbered does that constitute approval? Would that be a judgment by the man—by the official who numbers the petition that it is to all intents and purposes a valid one and will be counted toward the number required for proposing a constitutional convention?

Senator PROXMIRE. The main purpose of that, as the Senator from Nebraska, I think, is aware, is that it would inform other States and would inform the Nation and inform the Congress as to just exactly what progress this campaign for a constitutional convention had achieved, whether it was the 19th State or the 23d State or the 25th State, whatever it was. You would then be in a position to assess the urgency of the situation or would be in position to assess the desirability of being very careful when you come to the States which are close to the two-thirds, the special wisdom of being careful about it.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, I agree it would be good to put everyone on notice and I think that they should be on notice. However, each of the resolutions that was passed by the legislatures in the last 3 or 4 years have been filed in the Congress and they have been here. It is true that no number has been attached to them, but most people can count up to 34 without too much difficulty.

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, at the same time I think the Senator from Nebraska is aware of the fact there is considerable debate as to how many acceptable petitions have been filed. There is some concern as to whether three of these legislatures actually did file petitions that were valid and proper. I think if we had a system of numbering the petitions that were deemed valid then at the point where they are numbered there can perhaps be a challenge if there were those who felt that a petition was not in proper order, and they would also be in position to be aware that you were progressing to a certain point in the campaign.

Senator HRUSKA. The bill does provide for the filing with the Senate and the House of the applications by the legislatures. Of course, that is very important. It is very important so that everyone knows what is going on and so that any action they are requested to take should be on the basis of that information.

One of the other proposed amendments made by the Senator from Wisconsin, however, calls for haste rather than deliberation. That is while it might be too short a period of time to require that State legislative petitions be filed in the same Congress, the period of time should not be much longer than that.

Now, considering that a Constitutional Convention is a unique and potent instrument to be used with extreme rarity, would it not be wise to say "Now, here is a proposition that is rather unusual, it should receive study and maybe before acting upon it there should be more than one term of the legislature at which it should be considered so that as the representative members of that legislature go back to their constituents they can bring the reflected desires and wishes of their constituents back to the legislature and then act upon it, having had due deliberation and study."

Senator PROXMIRE. I made two points on that. Point No. 1 is that as the Senator knows most of our State legislators go home at least once a week and sometimes more than once a week.

Senator HRUSKA. In the sandhills in Nebraska they are, very often, lucky to see our legislators twice in the session.

Senator PROXMIRE. At any rate, they do get home and get some reflections of views, and I think during the full session there would be an opportunity to secure public reaction to this. However, as the Senator will recall, I said that while I thought you could make a strong case and I thought Mr. Sorenson did make a strong case for requiring the petitions all to be filed in 2 years, nevertheless I thought that it might be all right to permit the petitions to be filed over a period of 4 years instead of 2 years and, therefore, I thought I was taking a moderate middle point rather than the 6 years which the bill provides.

Senator HRUSKA. Twenty-four months has been described by some as being a totally unrealistic period of time in which to make such filing on behalf of 34 States. Do you agree with that?

Senator PROXMIRE. I wouldn't say totally unrealistic; no. I think you can make a strong case for 24 months, but I would be willing to compromise at 48 months instead of 24.

Senator HRUSKA. Is it really 24 months or is it rather a much shorter time period inasmuch as many legislatures have a 60-day or a 90-day time limit and meet only in January of the uneven numbered year. Is 60 days or 90 days a sufficient period of time in which to exercise and call into being a unique and potent instrument which is to be used with extreme rarity?

Senator PROXMIRE. I would say in answer to that, Senator Hruska, that in all the years of this Republic, the oldest Republic in the world, with all the amendments we have adopted, every single one of them has been adopted within a 4-year period on the basis of the testimony I have given this morning.

Senator HRUSKA. That is for adoption after they have been proposed. We are now talking about proposing.

Senator PROXMIRE. I understand there is a difference, but many of these constitutional amendments have been immensely important and should require very substantial deliberation on the part of the States, and yet as I say, year after year, decade after decade, throughout the many years of the Republic, we have been able to adopt our amendments by this way, and within a 4-year period. So I think the 4 years are a modest and moderate compromise.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you on that point.

You make a further point in your statement that each member of the Constitutional Convention should have one vote as opposed to having the States vote on a unit plan. Unfortunately, article V is pretty much on the basis of State action; isn't it?

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes, sir.

Senator HRUSKA. Rather than individual action. That is the essence of the method of proposal of amendments by States. Whenever on the application of legislatures of two-thirds of the States, then there shall be a Constitutional Convention called. One of the leading reasons for providing for a Constitutional Convention to be called as a result of States taking action was the belief by those who wrote the Constitution that a future Congress might prove to be obdurate, and that such a Congress might take steps to inhibit and to prevent the States from doing certain things which the States would like to see done. Therefore, an avenue was left open in the amendment process on the basis of State initiative. That is what article V is clearly based upon. What is your reasoning into thinking that we should have a one-man, one-vote rule when article V is clearly based upon the concept of State action?

Senator PROXMIRE. Mine is based on the recognition that the electoral college system that was approved in 1789, that the Constitutional Convention approved then, has gradually evolved into a different kind of system. The growing feeling in the Congress on the part of Senators, representing all kinds of States, that we should provide a proportional opportunity for the minority group in the State to have their position count. If you have the States vote on a unit basis then you would give disproportionate influence to a relatively small group within the State who can make a majority.

Senator HRUSKA. What is the remedy for achieving some satisfaction to the feeling of unrest and unhappiness with the present electoral system in the presidential election process? What is the remedy?

Senator PROXMIRE. The remedy, of course, is a constitutional amendment.

Senator HRUSKA. Wouldn't that be a pretty good way to change article V before we tried to distort it by a legislative process trying to make article V say and provide and mean something different from what it clearly does say? I just wonder if we should emulate another independent branch of the Government in that respect, one that is criticized quite a bit for changing and legislating the Constitution without resorting to the regular amendment processes. I don't believe Congress should get into that.

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, I am not sure I would accept the reasoning in your argument. It would seem to me perfectly proper to permit the interpretation of this article of the Constitution to provide a divided vote in the State.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, it is interesting to get that point of view. It is the hope of this Senator that we will go by the Constitution as it is written and particularly so in article V.

Article V also stipulates that in the process of ratification it is again action by States, either in conventions or in State legislatures. Again it is the State as a unit that will take action. Your proposal wouldn't go to the point of having a popular vote in a State like some people are proposing for the presidential election, without first amending article V; would you?

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes.

Of course, what I am getting at and I think where the difference here is, the whole thrust of our position is, this is something that should be decided by the people, by the people, and it cannot be decided by the people if you rely on a system in which you have one vote per State or if you have alternatively a system in which you have a greater representation for the larger States than the smaller States and then provide that the entire State will go the way a very narrow majority goes. I am trying to break through to the position that it seems to me more logical and more democratic and more in accordance with the recent Supreme Court opinions and more in accordance, it seems to me, with the view that many of us feel so strongly, that everybody should have an equal opportunity to representation in these great decisions made by our Government.

Senator HRUSKA. Is that what article V says? Article V says that any proposal for amendment of the Constitution shall be ratified by the State. It says ratification shall be by three-fourths of the States, three-fourths thereof.

Senator PROXMIRE. It does indeed say that, and that is why, with your very narrow and very stringent and strict interpretation, we get away from any opportunity to interpret this particular article to permit more equitable representation. At least, for this purpose, the constitutional convention should provide an opportunity for the people to have a chance to determine by majority vote what they want.

As I say, 26 percent or 30 percent, anyway, a small minority of the people, will be able to prevail on the basis of the strict interpretation the Senator from Nebraska is giving this article. I would like to give it an interpretation that would provide by a decision of the people, by a majority of the people, not by a minority.

Senator HRUSKA. The Constitution was written so that the people of this Republic could understand it. We are not supposed to be engaged in using in the Constitution words that have a highly technical or skilled or a word-of-art meaning attached to them. The Supreme Court has said that many times and article V doesn't say ratification by the people of a State. It says ratification by the State, and the States speak either through conventions or through legislatures. That is what article V says.

Would the Senator from Wisconsin want to say "Well, let's disregard that and let's put it on a popular-vote basis? It is true if we do that in the presidential election process we have to have a constitutional amendment, but in this case let us disregard article V. Let us disregard the two alternatives that article V provides for ratification and let's have a popular election." Is that the position of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Senator PROXMIRE. The Senator from Nebraska keeps saying that I say "Let's disregard." I don't say "Let's disregard." I say "Let's interpret it."

Senator HRUSKA. You said "Let the people decide by popular vote"; didn't you?

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes; let the people decide.

Senator HRUSKA. By popular vote; isn't that what you said?

Senator PROXMIRE. What I am trying to do is provide an interpretation of article V which will come as close as possible to permitting a majority decision for these constitutional conventions rather than a decision by a relatively small minority, and the Senator from Nebraska keeps saying you cannot do this unless you amend the Constitution, because to do it does violence to his interpretation of the meaning of the word "State" and we simply disagree on that point.

Senator HRUSKA. A State acting in one of two ways, article V says, either through a State legislature or a convention, whichever method is prescribed by Congress. But the Senator from Wisconsin, the way

I understand it, says "Let's introduce a third factor in it. Let's have a popular vote within a State and then let us add those votes some way with some other votes and arrive at the decision rather than having a vote by a State which is what is clearly contemplated by article V as presently written." Am I mistaken in that construction of the testimony from the Senator?

Senator PROXMIRE. I think the Senator's position is prefectly understandable and perfectly consistent, and I can understand, because it is consistent, why he disagrees with my position. What I am saying is, I believe you can interpret article V to provide the kind of proportionate representation for each State in the constitutional convention that I am talking about if you wanted to elect that particular option.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the witness for his very fine and frank testimony. It will be of very great value I am sure. It certainly would be my hope that we will go by what article V says and give full credit and intent to action by respective States rather than some interpretation of that requirement which would do great violence to its spirit.

Senator PROXMIRE. May I simply say to the Senator from Nebraska that I think his line of questions have been very effective and very forceful. I think he makes a very strong point but I think it emphasizes the great difficulty of relying on a constitutional convention under that interpretation because it does permit a minority, and a small minority, of the country to change our Constitution and it does so under circumstances where I think all of us feel that an amendment to the Constitution is something that should only be arrived at on the basis of more than a majority vote and certainly not by a minority vote.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, is there any difference between that situation and the situation in the Senate of the United States where a minority insofar as representation of population within States sometimes is able to either prevail one way or another? Is there any difference between those two problems?

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes, indeed, there is great difference because the Senate cannot be effective in terms of any of the substantial legislation affecting our country without concurrence by the House of Representatives which is on a population basis.

Senator HRUSKA. Nor can a constitutional convention be effective without concurrence by three-fourths of the States, can it?

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, that is correct. But in the constitutional convention I wanted to give some consideration to the representation of population, representation of people.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, it is this Senator's suggestion that you prepare a petition for the legislative bodies of the States, saying article V should be amended to read thus and so and when you get 34 of those petitions on file here let's call a convention on the Constitution and see if we can convince them that Senator Proxmire is right. I have the idea if he has the privilege of addressing such a convention he might sweep it off its feet and induce it to act as he suggests.

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, I doubt that. [Laughter.]

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator DIRKSEN. I think emphasis has got to be placed on this question of ratification. You mentioned a moment ago that you cannot permit a minority to rewrite or amend the Constitution. Well, it is an impossibility in the nature of things. It wouldn't make any difference what a constitutional convention does. It always under article V must go back to the States for ratification, and that means three-fourths of the States. Now, they have an opportunity either through the legislature or through the convention to ratify or not ratify. Can you conceive of a minority, as you call it, getting by that provision in order to amend the Constitution?

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, I certainly can. I think it is very easy to put that together. All you have to do is get a bare majority in each of three-quarters of the States. The Senator from Illinois is well aware, on the basis of the debates we have had and on the basis of his own experience, that at least some of us feel that State legislatures can very often act under the basis of pressure and excitment to take action without the kind of deliberation, without the kind of consideration, they should. But just from the standpoint of simple logic, if you take the 38 smallest States and take a bare majority in each of the 38 smaller States you certainly have far less than half the country represented by that position. I would say you probably would have, and this would permit amendment of the Constitution, you probably would have close to—well, you have maybe 35 percent of the people represented, or less, much less.

Senator DIRKSEN. I have an idea that if you got an amendment before the people you would have a resounding response from the people, and it would be vastly greater than what you referred to as a minority. Now, this gives point to that spate of articles and speeches that have been made from time to time that they are tampering with the Constitution, they are going to rewrite the Constitution, and you can almost see hands of horror in the air as other profane hands are about to be laid upon our organic act. Well, it is just a lot of nonsense. Maybe it may be the byline or headline writers, I don't know, but I just want to express my emphatic exception to it, because there isn't an iota of fact or truth in it. A convention cannot rewrite the Constitution no matter what mood it might be in. I can only propose amendments to the Constitution and they must be resubmitted to the States for ratification and that is quite a different thing.

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes, indeed, but if a constitutional convention has met and changed the Constitution, and done so rather drastically, and done so in a summary way, it seems to me that we are taking a long step down a very dangerous path. It means instead of relying on a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress on the basis of all the tradition and experience we have had with every amendment to the Constitution adopted this way, instead we are going with a convention and no experience with it and an opportunity as I pointed out, as the Senator from Nebraska pointed out better than I did this morning, for a small minority of the people to propose amendments to the Constitution that then have only one hurdle to overcome and that is three-quarters of the States. And while that hurdle may seem rather great to the Senator from Illinois, it seems to me, with the momentum going and with the kind of organized pressure you can get behind these amendments, I think there is a real threat to our Constitution.

I am surprised that the distinguished Senator from Illinois, who is a man for whom I have the greatest respect and who has served this country so well and so brilliantly, and the Senator from Nebraska has, too, should not be much more concerned with the damage that could be done to our Constitution by a constitutional convention that could act to provide repeal of so many parts of our Constitution that are so precious and so sacred to many of us, and I am sure they are to the Senator from Illinois.

Senator DIRKSEN. I give you three answers: The first one is that the Constitution in this country belongs to the people, because the preamble says "We, the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this Constitution." That is No. 1.

No. 2 is that there are a redoubtable 38 States that you have got to negotiate before you can amend the Constitution by means of the ratification clause.

And the third answer is, and I think the distinguished Senator from Nebraska shares this view, we still have a consummate faith in the people even in a sophisticated and cynical age.

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, may I say to my good friend from Illinois that every single one of those points, it seems to me, falls on the basis of the argument we have just had this morning. Point 1 and point 3 are that you have faith in the people. You rely on the people, and it ought to be up to the people and it is exactly what we say. But you are not relying on the people if you permit a minority to call a Convention, a minority to be represented in the Convention, a minority to submit the amendments, and then as I say a bare majority of 38 States, which would be a minority, to ratify amendments to the Constitution. Even with a number of States that you say represents the obstacle to minority determination of constitutional changes, this could not be an adequate barrier in view of the fact you can get 38 of the smaller States with a bare majority in each of them to take this kind of action.

Senator DIRKSEN. Then I think you have a clear duty and that is to introduce a resolution to modify article V according to your own desires, and if you do and you get it in pretty good form I am not so sure but what I may give you a little assistance.

Senator PROXMIRE. Fine. I tried to do that this morning on a legislative basis. You are suggesting a constitutional amendment basis?

Senator DIRKSEN. The committee has a guest this morning. I see the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Senator Tydings. Have you questions?

Senator TYDINGS. I have some questions, Mr. Chairman.

To begin with, Mr. Proxmire, the bill proposes to restrict what a Constitutional Convention could do by legislation. Now, under the constitutional history of this country, including the records of the debate in the Constitutional Convention itself, I think there is some question as to whether or not any constitutional enactment can restrict what a Constitutional Convention can do, and I want to refresh your recollection as to the procedures adopted at the Constitutional Convention both before and during the Convention of 1787.

To begin with, the request for the Convention were petitions by State legislators sent to the original Congress under the Articles of Confederation, and those petitions requested that Congress call a Constitutional Convention for the purpose of proposing amendments to the Articles of Confederation and then returning those amendments to the State legislatures to pass on. And the Constitutional Convention called by the Congress under the Articles of Confederation was for those purposes.

Actually, once the Congress met, and I am speaking now of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 in Philadelphia, they neither limited their considerations nor deliberations or their charter to pure amendments of the existing Articles of Confederation, nor did they resubmit their proposed charter to the Congress under the Articles of Confederation nor did they submit it to the State legislatures for ratification. In fact they set up proceedings for ratification themselves by calling for individual State conventions. Is that a fair statement?

Senator PROXMIRE. I am sure it is. The Senator from Maryland is far more historically informed than I am in this particular area, and I am impressed. I must say I am delighted he is challenging the assumptions here and that he is making such good history, such pertinent history.

Senator TYDINGS. But even more important, in the actual Convention itself when the debates on article V took place, there is substantial evidence based on the notes of Colonel Mason, of Virginia, who opposed the original Madison proposition which would have limited what material a Convention called under article V by State petitions to consider, Madison would have limited it to specific proposals given by the Congress. But this original proposal was not accepted, and we have article V as stated and expressed by the Constitution today, and we have the notes and reasons of Colonel Mason, of Virginia, particularly his criticism of the original Madison proposal, and I might say that this legislation is drafted on the Madison proposal basis; namely, that the Congress could restrict with a Constitutional Convention could do and Madison commented in his notes as appear at Farrand 629, volume 2 of Farrand's Citation 629 and this is a criticism of this type of procedure. He said:

> By this Article Congress only would have the power proposing amendments at any future time in this convention and should it ever prove so oppressive the whole people of America can't make or even propose alterations to it, and a doctrine utterly subversive to the fundamental principles of the rights and liberties of the people—

And that original Madison proposal was not adopted and the present proposal was.

I say under that history, Isn't there substantial reasoning, both desirable and historical, to the fact that if a constitutional convention is called, neither the Congress nor anyone else can restrict it as to what areas or what matters it can cover?

Senator PROXMIRE. Certainly it sounds that way. The Senator from Maryland is making the argument that this bill cannot have effect with regard at least to limiting the Constitutional Convention.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, the second point I would like to take up with you, Senator Proxmire, is the matter of the election of delegates.

Under the proposal before us, it proposes that each delegate shall be elected or appointed in a manner provided by State law. Now, wouldn't that provide or give the opportunity for an irresponsible legislature to actually have the appointment or designation of delegates to perhaps the most important convocation of representatives in the Nation's history by just an appointment of the Governor, with no recourse to the electorate, no recourse to the people whatsoever under the proposal before us? Wouldn't it be possible to have all of your delegates to the constitutional convention just appointed by Governors?

Senator PROXMIRE. That is exactly right, and that is one of the reasons why I objected to it and made that particular point that you could have appointment of convention delegates. I object very much to appointment. This would take it out of the proper hands. Of course, the appointment wouldn't necessarily have to be by the Governor. It could be by a committee and a small committee of the legislature for that matter. It just says by State law, it is up to the State to decide it.

Senator TYDINGS. Actually, if you had a very powerful speaker of the house of delegates——

Senator PROXMIRE. He might do it.

Senator TYDINGS (continuing). Of the State legislature he might do it himself. So in effect you might have, or even the majority leader.

Senator PROXMIRE. It could be someone who is not at all responsive to all the people of the State.

Senator TYDINGS. So under this proposal before us, the selection of delegates to the constitutional convention could completely bypass the people.

Senator PROXMIRE. No question about it.

Senator TYDINGS. Next, it provides in this proposal that each State shall have one vote and cast as a majority of the delegates from that State decide.

Under this, actually it would be possible for States representing only 16.3 percent of the population of the United States to propose an amendment, and if the Constitution should adopt rules which would provide that a majority vote were sufficient to act, if only one more than half the delegates of each of the States voted for such an amendment under section 9(a), the State's votes would have to be cast for the amendment and thus, assuming that all delegates were elected on a one-man, one-vote basis, you could have 8 percent or delegates representing 8 percent of the population of the United States adopting amendments or proposals at this Constitutional Convention.

Senator PROXMIRE. Well, I haven't had a chance to check the Senator's arithmetic, but that doesn't sound too far out to me. It seems to me it is a small minority which can propose these amendments to the Constitution to the States.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the Senator yield?

Senator TYDINGS. I think I will go ahead through with my questions and then I will be happy to yield later.

Even if the convention should adopt rules which require that a two-thirds vote of delegates would be necessary to obtain an amendment, it would still be possible under a one-State, one-vote rule for 31 percent of the population to control all of the votes in the constitutional convention. Do you think that is a proper way to have the Constitution of the United States amended.

Senator PROXMIRE. It would be hard to conceive of a way that more clearly violates the principle of one man, one vote to which we subscribe or the principle of leaving it to the people, let the people decide. What people? It is obviously a minority of the people that can decide and propose these amendments to the Constitution to the States to have them ratified.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, in addition, section 5(a) provides that the convention calling the State legislatures shall be, conclusively be, presumed to be valid for 6 years after it was received by the Congress, and you and Senator Hruska had some dialog, but actually for a matter so important as the convention of a constitutional convention, a matter which could only be the most urgent and pressing matter to bypass the normal constitutional procedures which we have used for the past 150 years, wouldn't a reasonable period of time be that period from the time the first petition was received and publicity noted on it across the Nation until every other legislature in the Nation had had a full session or an opportunity to consider it, in other words, a 2½-year period so that every legislature in the Nation would have had one full session in which to consider the gravity, the import, the urgency of such a proposal?

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes.

I think you make a strong case for that, as Mr. Sorenson did in my quotation from him. I indicated that I would be willing to accept a 4-year limit; but certainly not a 6-year limit, especially in view of the experience we have had that our amendments have been adopted within a 4-year period—ample time for the legislatures to act. The only objection I might have to the point made by the Senator from Maryland is that these State legislatures do in many cases meet only once every 2 years and their meeting can be brief; it might be desirable to give them a second chance.

Senator TYDINGS. All right.

Now, section 3(b) of this proposal provides that the validity of any State legislative action adopting one of these petitions shall be determinable only by that State legislature and its decision shall be binding on all others, including the State courts of the very State, not to mention the Federal courts and the Congress. So, thus, you could have a runaway legislature that violates its own rules, its own State constitution in adopting a petition, and it couldn't even be reviewed by the State courts in its own State. Do you think that is a wise procedure?

Senator PROXMIRE. That procedure certainly calls for amendment; it calls for change.

Senator TYDINGS. I mean this would give complete and absolute dictatorial power without recourse to the people or anyone else.

Senator PROXMIRE. Especially since, as the Senator from Maryland makes the point so well, you don't have reliance, No. 1, on rules and, No. 2, on the courts to interpret the rules. You have a situation in which there is sheer raw power incapable of interpretation.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, section 6(a) of this bill provides that the Congress shall call a constitutional convention by a concurrent resolution without the need for Presidential approval, by majority vote, in other words, without the need for Presidential approval.

Now, as I gather, it is based on the analogy that Congress acts alone without Presidential participation in proposing amendments, but it does not follow, and I ask you, does it follow that the Congress can act alone in calling constitutional conventions when article I, section 17 of the Constitution says that "every order, resolution vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, except on the question of adjournment, shall be presented to the President," and I ask you whether if this legislation is going to permit the passage of such a concurrent resolution, not by the two-thirds vote that historically we have always required in any constitutional amendment, but by a majority vote, that they shall be able to bypass the approval of the authority of the President?

Senator PROXMIRE. Absolutely not. The calling of a constitutional convention is such a solemn, such a powerful instrument, it can do so much for good and evil, that certainly the President of the United States, the only man who represents all the people of the country, ought to have a voice in it. I would agree wholeheartedly with the point made by the Senator from Maryland.

Senator TYDINGS. Now Section 3(c) of this proposal provides that the State petition, this petition, mind you which has no review by anyone, which is not subject to the people, to the courts, anyone, shall be effective without the approval of the Governor of the State regardless of what the constitution of that State says, what the laws of the State say, what the rules of the legislature say, we are going to say the State can call or can pass such a petition without any approval by the Governor of that State. Now, would you have any comment on that?

Senator PROXMIRE. Once again, I think it is exactly the same point. This is a very solemn, important, powerful instrument, and the Governor is the only man in most States who represents the entire State, is their leading official. He should have a voice. If you rule out both the Governor of the State and the President of the United States, it means no official who represents all of the people, either in the country or of the particular State, would have a voice in this very powerful convention.

Senator TYDINGS. Let me address your attention or direct your attention to a series of questions by Senator Dirksen in which he asked you in reference to pending proposals of calling for a constitutional convention (which were made by) some malapportioned legislatures. He asked you how could you argue that those proposals petitioning the Congress to hold a convention permit malapportionment in one house of the legislature. He asked you whether, if you are going to say that these proposals are illegal or unlawful, every action of the legislature while they were malapportioned would not also have been illegal?

I ask you, hasn't this point been specifically passed on by two Federal courts, one in Georgia in the Toombs case, one in Utah in the Petuskey case, in which it is said that although the actions of the malapportioned legislature which deals with routine affairs of the State, of course, couldn't be set aside, the courts would not permit the legislature to act on matters involving their own malapportionment. Specifically in Georgia case in Toombs against Fortson, a three-judge Federal court enjoined the Georgia General Assembly from calling a constitutional convention to revise the State constitution until the general assembly is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards, and in its order dated June 24, 1964, the three-judge Federal court specifically stated:

We do not feel it would be proper to permit such new constitution as may be proposed to be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection when it is as is the case here, proposed under conditions of doubtful legality by a malapportioned State legislature.

As this order was being appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States a new election was held in Georgia, and it was not necessary to enforce the injunction.

However, in the Petuskey case, the court held there that a malapportioned legislature may be competent pending its reapportionment to pass legislation generally but such a legislature has no competence to initiate amendments to the Constitution to make legal its own illegality. In Petuskey v. Rampton, 243 Fed. Supp. 365, decided in 1965, the Court states:

A well-known general principle of equity requires that the malapportioned legislature not consider or vote upon any proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States on the subject of legislative reapportionment.

Senator PROXMIRE. I am very grateful to the Senator from Maryland. That provides excellent legal support for the general opinion I gave that there should be a distinction between a reapportioned legislature acting an its own malapportionment and providing the general housekeeping legislation and the other legislation which you are talking about.

Senator TYDINGS. Let me refresh your recollection on one more point, and that is on the point that there is grave doubt, constitutional doubt, whether any act of Congress should bind a future constitutional convention. In the debate on the floor of the Senate last April 1967, you quoted a distinguished constitutional authority, former Republican U.S. Senator from the State of Idaho. His language was this, and I use it to refresh your recollection.

Senator DIRKSEN. What was his name?

Senator TYDINGS. His name was U.S. Senator Hayburn, and on the floor of the Senate, February 17, 1911, Senator Hayburn stated:

When the people of the United States meet in a constitutional convention there is no power to limit their action. They are greater than the Constitution. They can repeal the provision that limits the right of amendment: they can repeal every section of it because they are the peers of the people who made it.

Does that refresh your recollection?

Senator PROXMIRE. It does indeed, and it goes right back to the very first point made by the Senator from Maryland that there is this very serious question as to whether or not Congress could take action as this legislation does here to limit whatever action a constitutional convention might want to take. I think that is a most important point.

Senator TYDINGS. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin. I would be happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska for whom I have the greatest esteem and affection.

Senator HRUSKA. The Senator from Nebraska is interested in the arithmetic of the Senator from Maryland when he says it is conceivable that States containing only 16.3 percent of the population could cause a constitutional convention to be convened and, presumably, therefore, only 8 percent inasmuch as a majority vote is necessary—States representing 8 percent of the population, can control the convention.

It would be my idea that in order for those 8 percent to do that, only the delegates from the States containing the 16.3-percent population would be present at the session, and no more and no less, and it is only by that curious reasoning that 8 percent would then be called upon to exercise and control the destiny of the convention.

The question I would have is this: Is it reasonable to suppose that 49 percent of the delegates or the delegates representing 83.7 percent of the population would not be present at that convention, they would go home in a huff and say "A pox on your house. Go ahead and run your convention. We want no part of it," and thereby 8 percent of the population's delegates could control the convention?

Senator PROXMIRE. I say to the Senator from Nebraska, without accepting the arithmetic necessarily of the Senator from Maryland, I think his point is right for this reason, that if 16 percent of the population represents half the States, and if just half the people in each one of those States takes a position under the unit rule, the entire State vote will go that way, and you get a majority of the States voting that way.

In other words, 8.1 percent would control 16 percent, and, therefore, you get in effect 8.1 percent having their will prevail.

Senator TYDINGS. I would be happy to give the facts, Senator, if you are really interested.

You take the 26 smallest State of the Union, and their population is 16.3 percent of the total population of the United States.

Now, each of these States has a delegation, and if you have a difference of one vote in a majority and a minority position, and under the proposed rules the majority would control the vote of the State delegation, and that means 8 percent or a little bit more than 8 percent, would be controlling.

Senator HRUSKA. Under the unit rule.

Senator TYDINGS. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. That clears up the muddled-thinking processes of the Senator from Nebraska. I can see the suppositious case that you put in that situation.

Senator TYDINGS. I thank my colleague.

Senator HRUSKA. It is not infrequently that the Senator from Maryland changes the mind of the Senator from Nebraska.

Senator TYDINGS. I would say more often not.

Senator HRUSKA. Maybe he can help me with this. Section 6(a) says that no Presidential signature is necessary, and later in the bill there are provisions that no Governor's signature is necessary on the petition for a National Convention. It has been held ever since the Republic started and continuing without deviation to the present that the President's signature is not necessary for an amendment to be constitutionally adopted. A question was raised to this effect in 1798 with regard to the 11th amendment. In the case Hollingsworth v. Virginia, Justice Chase said:

> There can surely be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to ordinary cases of legislation. He has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution.

That has been the undeviating rule since. The matter of proposing amendments to the Constitution is a Federal function delegated to the Congress, not to the Congress and the President but to the Congress, and likewise the ratification by the legislatures or the proposal of a National Constitutional Convention for amending the Constitution does not require the signature of the Governor because article 5 says that when two-thirds of the legislatures of the States propose, and the Governor is not a member of the legislature and, therefore, has no part. It is not a legislative function, it is a function given and granted to the State legislatures, not the legislature and Governor. So maybe the Senator can enlighten me on that.

Senator TYDINGS. I would be delighted to have the opportunity, Senator.

To refer you back to the decision, the rather cursory decision, in 1798, is it not a fact that Justice Chase was commenting on a necessity of a Presidential signature on the proposal, by two-thirds vote of the Congress of a constitutional amendment?

Obviously, his opinion was based on the ground that since you needed a two-thirds vote of both Houses for a constitutional amendment, a Presidential veto could have been overridden by the two-thirds majority and hence there was no need for the Presidential signature; whereas inthis bill you abandon the two-thirds requirement and you move to just the simple majority.

Senator HRUSKA. For a limited purpose—of calling the Constitutional Convention which is a mandated, ministerial act after two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States shall have proceeded.

Senator TYDINGS. But you do see the difference between the proposal before Justice Chase and the proposal we have before us. I might also point out as recently as 1943 in at least one State, Pennsylvania, the Governor vetoed a petition to Congress by the State legislature for a Constitutional Convention and, as I read article V, it is the States which call it, and they should follow the normal procedure if the States the State of Pennsylvania, the State of Nebraska, or the State of Maryland has in its constitution that the Governor shall have the right of veto and shall require a two-thirds vote rather than a majority. I do not think that the Congress of the United States should be telling the States how they are going to file their petition, particularly when you do not even give the State courts the right to review the action of the legislature.

Senator HRUSKA. The Senator cannot ride two horses at one time, I am sure, dexterous as he is. He refers to normal processes of the State legislature requiring signature by the Governor. This is not a normal function of the legislature, in fact it is one of great rarity, and a very solemn and sacred moment. He himself has so testified.

This is not a normal legislative function, it is a function prescribed by article V, and when it says on the application of legislatures up to two-thirds of the several States. Article V knew what legislatures were, and if they thought that it would be necessary to have a Governor's signature they would have said, assuming that they were writing this Constitution for the people of the Republic to read and understand, on the application of the legislatures plus the signature of a Governor.

They did not say that. The legislature is an independent, coordinate branch of the Government, and that is what article V says, and the same thing in reference to the ratification—ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States or by conventions in three-fourths of the several States.

If it is done by convention will the Governor have to sign it?

Where is there any reference to the Governor in article V?

Senator TYDINGS. I do not know whether the Governor will ever see the matter again because the constitutional convention might determine that the ratification shall be chosen or appointed assemblages, and that is one of my great fears in this whole matter, that the ratification would be completely taken out of the existing bodies of the State legislature and the State constitutional authorities.

Senator HRUSKA. In an effort to remove some of the concern and fears from the soul of the Senator from Maryland, I am wondering if he would refer to section 7(a) on page 6 of the bill which starts out by reading "Each delegate shall be elected or appointed in the manner provided by State law." Now he is a proponent and advocate of the people ruling, that the Senator from Maryland has said so many times, and I believe it. Would his heart be made happy if there were stricken from the bill the two words "or appointed" so that that sentence would read, "Each delegate shall be elected in the manner provided by State law"?

Senator TYDINGS. I think that would be a step forward, but that would be the first step of the hike around the world.

Senator HRUSKA. And you would rather have the Congress approve the election of delegates in the several States?

What method would you provide as an alternative?

Senator TYDINGS. In that whole section, first of all, I think delegates to the convention should be elected on a one-man, one-vote basis by the people of the State according to State law and according to the State constitution, and I do not think their election should be determined by the legislature without any reference to State law or State constitutional procedure.

Senator HRUSKA. The sentence does refer, it says, "Provided by State law," and I presume there is——

Senator TYDINGS. But there is also——

Senator HRUSKA (continuing). A presumption of constitutionality of any State law, any act of the State legislature, and I would not imagine they would pass something that is unconstitutional. If we are going to proceed on that assumption and have fears on that score, is that any place in the legislative field that is going to give the Senator from Maryland any feeling of assurance or certainty? I cannot quite see this business of expecting the people to do the wrong thing.

The essential basis of our whole Republic is that men of good faith will act in a responsible and good way and the presumption should be given to that.

If we are going to indulge in all kinds of nightmares about the things, then we will never do anything, because the people might make a mistake, they might be pressured, they might even be brainwashed, you cannot tell in these modern days what might happen.

Senator PROXMIRE. May I say to the Senator from Nebraska my point is that the people do not have a chance.

Senator HRUSKA. By electing delegates.

Senator PROXMIRE. But our statement is, you should not let a minority, 8 percent of the people, decide on this. We want an opportunity for a majority to decide on several ways. No. 1, to permit as close to a majority as you can possibly get by whatever interpretation you want to put on article V; No. 2, by permitting a man elected by the people, all the people of the Nation, to have a voice in this, the President of the United States; No. 3, by permitting the man, the only man, elected to be head of the State by all the people of the States, to have a voice in this.

On all these grounds and all these steps the Senator from Nebraska takes a contrary position in supporting the bill. He says that under the circumstances so well described and agreed to, stipulated to, by the Senator from Nebraska, so well described by the Senator from Maryland, neither the people, the Governor, nor the President should have a voice.

Senator HRUSKA. The Senator does not say that. It is the Constitution that says it. The Constitution does not say a majority of the popular vote.

Senator PROXMIRE. Perhaps it does not, Senator Hruska, but you are saying go back to the people. You say let the people decide.

Senator HRUSKA. Let the people decide.

Senator TYDINGS. That is what we want, the majority of the people.

Senator HRUSKA. If that is the case we should say every time the Supreme Court acts on a case, let the people decide, refer their decision to the people. There is no warrant for that in the Constitution nor is there any warrant in the Constitution for letting the people decide by a popular vote under article V. Until we change it, article V should mean and be applied for what it says. The people are making the decision because they elect the delegates to the legislature, they elect the delegates to the convention, and under article V the States speak either by the legislature or by the convention.

Now, if we are going to say by legislation, "Well, the people should decide and, therefore, we will disregard article V and we will say by popular vote this shall be done," then we are doing great violence to our pledge and our oath to protect and defend the Constitution and apply it as it plainly reads.

Senator PROXMIRE. Yes. What you are doing is that the people should decide on the basis of your definition of the people.

Senator HRUSKA. No; on the basis of the language.

Senator PROXMIRE. You are not saying the majority of the people shall decide or that the Court shall have a voice or that the President or that the Governor shall have a voice. That is the difficulty with the Constitution——

Senator HRUSKA. It may be narrow, but it is article V that is narrow, and I am going to respect article V as it is written and not put some meaning in it that is not there such as inserting the President's and the Governor's signature and popular vote when they are not even mentioned and when the history of article V plainly shows what was meant.

I second the suggestion by the Senator from Illinois that if article V is not satisfactory to any Senator, let him get up on the Senate floor and propose a resolution which will amend article V.

Senator TYDINGS. I am impressed by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska's argument and his eloquence. But I think he overlooks the complete history surrounding the adoption of article V and, particularly, the arguments of Colonel Mason of Virginia who successfully opposed the first draft, the Madison draft, and got the second draft with the specific purpose that it should give the people an opportunity to bypass the Congress.

Now, if we, in a sense, structure article V in the Congress of the United States rather than let the people have a voice, by giving control of a constitutional convention to 8 percent of the population of the United States and give them the right to amend our charter, I think we do great violence to the right of the people of the United States, and I think it shows a lack of confidence in the majority of the people.

Senator HRUSKA. The Senator again, by his deliberate statement, tries to tell the people of this Nation that this 8 percent, these delegates representing 8 percent, are going to amend the Constitution. They cannot do that any more than the Senator from Maryland or myself can do it. All they can do, even if his computation is correct, all they can do, is propose an amendment.

Senator PROXMIRE. But it is a long, dangerous step.

Senator HRUSKA. They could not change the Constitution.

Senator TYDINGS. Let us concede every point made by the Senator from Nebraska, that all those representatives of 8 percent of the people can do is propose it.

Senator HRUSKA. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. Don't you think that it violates the basic structure of our democracy to have amendments to the Constitution of the United States proposed by representatives of 8 percent of the people? You think that 8 percent of the people are so superior to the rest of us that they should be able to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States?

Senator HRUSKA. No; I do not think it does, because in the first place, we are not a democracy, we are a federated Republic, and, in the second place, we have a Constitution to go by.

So I say again, if some people are unhappy with article V let them propose an amendment to article V to say, "When two-thirds of the legislatures, joined in by the Governor, shall petition for a constitutional convention." It could also say when the Congress passes a concurrent resolution it shall be signed by the President. However, that is not the law today. The law is plain today.

Now, that is separate and apart from its wisdom. But, at the same time, there it is, and I am not going to put myself on public record as saying I will favor a legislative proposal to disregard and to violate the clear meaning of article V as it stands today and as it has been interpreted all these decades.

Senator TYDINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I put the following statistics into the record at this point. In the 1960 census the 26 smallest States had a population of 29,312,000; the 34 smallest States had a population, as of 1960, of 54,567,000; the total population of the United States for the 1960 decenniel census, 179,323,000. The 26-State proportional figure is 16.3 percent of the total population, the 34-State figure is 31 percent of the total population.

Senator DIRKSEN. Without objection.

I have only one comment to make on this question of reposing in Congress any restrictive powers with respect to this. Alexander Hamilton was fully aware of that in that very clear treatise in "The Federalist." He wrote, simply stated, that you could conceivably have a Congress which, by the simple device of inaction, refused to take any action on the applications filed by the States either for amendment of the Constitution or in this case for a convention—simple inaction and nothing more. So the Congress could thwart the will of the States and of the people.

In the campaign for ratification of the Constitution Hamilton and Madison had to go to New York and elsewhere and make it abundantly clear that if they did not like the Constitution there was article V, and in Hamilton's own language he says no discretion remains in the Congress. It is preemptory.

I will be pretty careful about reposing any restrictive powers in the Congress because it would appear to me, as a matter of course, that when you got up to 32 States petitioning the Congress that instead of trying to get legislatures to rescind their action there ought to be people in the Senate going out encouraging the legislatures to act so that we come to grips with it, and so that we have a constitutional convention, because the safeguards are there.

I do not entertain for a moment the strange fears that motivate these interesting titles to speeches and articles that "they are tampering with the Constitution," as if there is no commonsense left in this country.

Senator HRUSKA. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that an excerpt from Alexander Hamilton's Federalist Paper No. 85 bearing on this particular point be printed in the record here in full text.

Senator DIRKSEN. Without objection.

(The document referred to follows:)

By the fifth article of the plan the congress will be obliged, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states (which at present amounts to nine), to call a convention for proposing amendments, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof." The words of this article are peremptory. The congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence all the declamation about their disinclination to a change, vanishes in air. Nor however difficult it may be supposed to unite two-thirds or three-fourths of the state legislatures, in amendments which may affect local interests, can there be any room to apprehend any such difficulty in a union on points which are merely relative to the general liberty or security of the people. We may safely rely on the disposition of the state legislatures to erect barriers against the encroachments of the national authority.

Senator DIRKSEN. Professor Kurland, have you any questions?

Professor KURLAND. No questions, Senator.

Senator DIRKSEN. And Professor Bickel, what about you?

Professor BICKEL. Well, I hate to keep the committee, because it is getting late in the morning, but if there is a moment, I would just like to suggest to Senator Hruska that article V, while it addresses itself quite literally to the issue of ratification, does not, it seems to me, address itself at all to the question of whether States are to vote by the unit rule in the convention. It speaks of legislatures, Congress, conventions, ratification. It says nothing that I can see about whether in a convention that is called by the States the States must vote by the unit rule. That seems to me an open question.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the gentleman agree that there are two methods by which States can act, as clearly set out in article V in the ratification process?

Professor BICKEL. In the ratification process.

Senator HRUSKA. That is by either the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions in three-fourths thereof.

Would the gentleman agree?

Professor BICKEL. Quite so, in the ratification process.

Senator HRUSKA. I fail to see any indefiniteness about it. Can I get some explanation?

Professor BICKEL. Quite so. But, as I understood the colloquy between yourself and Senator Proxmire, the issue was whether in the convention called by the States, in the constitutional convention, it was necessary under article V that the States vote by the unit rule, one vote per State, and that I do not see.

Senator HRUSKA. I say the entire thrust of article V in the calling of the convention and the ratification of any proposal for amendment to the Constitution, however derived, is toward a State basis.

Professor BICKEL. I quite agree.

Senator HRUSKA. A State basis; and it is upon that premise that the bill builds the idea that there should be the unit rule in the constitutional convention as well, so that there will be a continuity in that regard and a harmony in that regard.

Professor BICKEL. If I may just continue this for 1 second, I quite agree with the Senator that the thrust of article V is the States call the convention, the States ratify the convention's product.

What article V does not say is that in the convention the States vote by the unit rule as States; this the bill inserts as a choice, as a matter of a policy choice made by Congress, and I understood Senator Proxmire to oppose that choice on the ground that, as Senator Tydings' arithmetic demonstrates, the result would be that in the convention States representing a quite small minority of the population might succeed in proposing amendments.

That may be a good or a bad thing—I think a bad—but it is not compelled by article V, and that is the point I am trying to make.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, wouldn't that circumscribe very greatly the practical success of any constitutional amendment that is proposed?

Professor BICKEL. I should hope so.

Senator HRUSKA. Because unless there is some certainty inasmuch as ratification must be on the basis of States, unless there is some sympathy for the proposal on the part of the majority, in fact, of three-fourths of the States, there will never be an amendment to the Constitution.

Professor BICKEL. I should hope so. But I should hope also that the convention's work might be more fruitful and might give more hope of ultimate success if, in pursuing its work, in voting in the convention, the vote was per capita, as it is in Congress and all State legislatures. I should hope that would be a better method for insuring the success of the convention.

Senator HRUSKA. Even that would never succeed as a proposed amendment because under article V when you come to ratification I doubt very much that three-fourths of the States are going to say, "All right, we will put ourselves on the chopping block. We will let eight States in the Nation govern the Constitution." I imagine eight States would have as much as a majority of the population in this Nation. It might be 10.

Professor BICKEL. Well, Senator, we are discussing a provision in the Ervin bill that the States shall vote by the unit rule in the convention, and your support of it, as I understand it, is based on the proposition that it is not going to come to anything, it does not matter, the convention will vote essentially by majority vote anyway, because they would never propose for ratification an amendment that had behind it only 8½ percent of the population.

But that is a rather negative way to support an affirmative policy decision by Congress that the States should vote by the unit rule in the convention. I see no reason why that should not be provided.

Senator HRUSKA. You see, we might have a runaway constitutional convention. I suppose a legislature is a runaway legislature, and a constitutional convention is a runaway constitutional convention if it does something that one considers undesirable. But we could have a runaway constitutional convention controlled by eight States, I will have to get the figures and add up enough States to make a majority of the Nation, and that would form an oligopoly of the federation of States.

That is not what the Constitution provides for. This is a Constitution of federated States with equal representation in the U.S. Senate for each and every State, and for other purposes the State is considered as a unit of government.

If we want to rub that out, then let us resort to the regular amendatory process to achieve it. Let us not try to do it legislatively.

Professor BICKEL. What I was pointing out, Senator, is that on this point, we do not need the amending process because article V leaves us entirely free. On the ratification and the calling we are bound. On how the convention votes, we are under article V entirely free, and the choice is a stark one, whether to let the convention act by possibly a minority vote on a population basis, or whether to require it to act as all our legislative bodies act, by a majority vote of persons present, presumably representing a majority of the population.

Senator HRUSKA. Is that true in the Senate of the United States?

Professor BICKEL. That is not necessarily true in the Senate of the United States.

Senator HRUSKA. Would you have it apply in the Senate of the United States?

Professor BICKEL. I am bound on that, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. How are you bound?

Professor BICKEL. By the Constitution.

Senator DIRKSEN. Professor McCloskey, any questions?

Professor MCCLOSKEY. No questions.

Senator DIRKSEN. Thank you for your fine testimony, Senator Proxmire.

Senator PROXMIRE. Thank you.

Senator DIRKSEN. Our next witness is Theodore Sorensen.

I might say about Mr. Sorensen that he was born in Lincoln, Nebr. I hope my distinguished colleague——

Senator HRUSKA. I have taken note of that fact for many, many years, as the witness will testify.

Senator DIRKSEN. He received a B.S. degree and an LL. B. from the University of Nebraska in 1949 and 1951, and was admitted to the Nebraska bar in 1951. From 1951 to 1952 he was a staff attorney for the Federal Security Agency, and in 1952 served on the Senate staff of the Joint Committee on Revision of the Railroad Retirement System. In 1953 he became administrative assistant to Senator John Fitzgerald Kennedy, and served in that capacity until the late Senator was elected President. Mr. Sorensen then became special counsel to President Kennedy and he now practices law in New York City.

He is the author of a book, entitled "Decisionmaking in the White House" and a book on his association with President Kennedy entitled "Kennedy," published in 1965.

Mr. Sorensen, we will be glad to hear you.

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my welcome to the gracious welcome and introduction which the chairman just made.

We have had occasion to engage in colloquy and in discussion before, and unstrangely enough, Mr. Sorensen and this Senator have not always agreed on philosophical questions, but we have always been congenial and good friends, and for that I am grateful.

Senator TYDINGS. I, too, Mr. Chairman, would like to take this opportunity to welcome your distinguished witness. I have had personal friendship with him for many years, and I am delighted that he has reached the same eminence in the private practice of law as he did in the Government while he was here, both the executive and legislative branches.

STATEMENT OF THEODORE C. SORENSEN, ATTORNEY AT LAW

Mr. SORENSEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen.

I am here in response to Chairman Ervin's invitation, for which I am grateful, and appear not in any representative capacity but simply as a concerned private citizen.

I am concerned about the choice between constitutional crisis and constitutional chaos which would almost surely confront this country if the effort to call a new National Constitutional Convention ever received the endorsement of 34 State legislatures. We are perilously close to that point today, 32 States at last count having enacted and transmitted such resolutions in varying forms. In the absence of any congressional standards or procedures, in the absence of any precedent other than the Convention of 1787, the country might well experience either a bitter and confused dispute—possibly spilling into the courts—over whether the Congress should or must call such a Convention and under what conditions, or, on the other hand, a runaway convention, under pressure if not domination from all kinds of special interests, tinkering in unlimited fashion with the greatest charter of government ever known to man.

No matter how many and how sincere are the assurances from the backers of a new Convention that their sole concern is reapportionment, no one can safely assume that the delegates to such a Convention, once seated and in action, would wish to go home without trying their hand at improving many parts of this delicately balanced document. All of us know of the pressures that will then build up to amend the Bill of Rights, to halt supposed pampering of the criminally accused, to stop so-called abuses of the fifth amendment, to limit free speech for the disloyal, to reopen the wars between church and state, to limit the Supreme Court's jurisdiction or the President's veto power or the congressional warmaking authority.

The kinds of amendments likely to be considered are reflected in those introduced in the Congress this year, including those that would abolish the income tax, require a balanced budget, permit prayers in public schools, elect the Supreme Court, regulate pornography, limit social security taxes, restore to the States certain rights taken away by the Court, require the advice and consent of the House to treaty-making, allow each State to enact its own legislation on questions of decency and morality, preserve our Nation's spiritual heritage, and establish the paramount right of society and the individual to be protected from crime.

Other proposals contained in various State applications for a constitutional convention over the years have included world federal government, State control of education, revision of article V, provision for a higher court above the Supreme Court, abolition of Federal enterprises, the allocation of oil and mineral rights, and changes in the electoral college. The current church-state debate in New York over its proposed new State constitution illustrates the bitterness as well as the strength of both those who feel that the first amendment "wall" is not high enough and those who might be inclined to lower it.

Whatever one's party or philosophy, whatever his position on a particular amendment or his faith in our State legislative bodies, the prospect of wide-open dabbling with the classic work of 180 years ago can only fill the constitutionalist with alarm. Unlike 1787, there is today no nationwide need or demand for such a Convention. There are no flaws in our system requiring so radical a step. There is no difficulty—as is true of some State constitutions—in invoking the usual amendment route.

I realize that such a convention could do no more than the Congress can already do; namely, propose amendments for ratification by at least 38 States. But Congress does not merely propose amendments. It first approves them on the basis of its own insight into Federal constitutional problems. Neither the members of a new Convention, nor the State legislatures—or State conventions—which ratified their proposals, could possibly have the same knowledge of Federal problems as the Congress or the same degree of responsibility for meeting them. The Convention route has the effect, in the absence of Federal legislation, of practically bypassing the body who will bear the burden of implementing any amendments, and whose members by definition better reflect the national interest and long-range perspective than either the State legislatures or a temporary convention whose delegates need not run for reelection. I note, for example, that seven State legislatures have petitioned for a convention to propose the so-called "Liberty Amendment"—which would repeal all Federal income, gift, and estate taxes, liquidate most Federal programs, and necessitate a national sales tax. But I doubt if very many of the Congressmen and Senators from those same seven States would ever vote for such an irresponsible proposal.

It was for these reasons that I proposed last spring that the Congress involve itself in this wholly unused amendment route—the convention route—by enacting legislation for the implementation of that portion of article V; and it is for these reasons that I commend Chairman Ervin for his initiative in introducing the pending bill.

In my opinion, the basic legal premise of S. 2307 is valid. The constitutional authority of the Congress to establish rules and procedures regularizing the use or application of principles set forth in the Constitution has been too frequently exercised to be doubted today. Moreover, because State legislatures in proposing amendments via the convention route are performing a Federal function derived from the Federal Constitution, they could not be heard in court to complain about the imposition of reasonable standards and procedures by the Federal Congress, so long as their fundamental right to amend the Constitution is not thereby impaired. Article V, it should be noted, gives to the Congress both the responsibility for calling such conventions and the separate responsibility—which could logically be exercised at the convention's close—of determining the mode of ratification for any amendments proposed. It also contains certain restrictions on the subject matter of proposed amendments. The original Constitution itself was submitted to the Congress for that body to submit to the States in accordance with the original call of the Convention; and Federalist Papers 43 and 85 seem to assume that future amendments would be considered piecemeal, not wholesale.

Thus it would appear that the authors of the Constitution clearly contemplated the enactment of legislation such as S. 2307 giving Congress a role prescribing the convention-amendment process; and the courts, by ruling that other congressional actions of this kind—with respect, for example, to ratification—are "political" questions, have made clear that they will not question the right of Congress to enact such legislation. In short, I fully concur with Chairman Ervin that Congress has both the power and the duty to implement article V, to prevent the crisis and chaos that would otherwise result and to restrict any such convention to those topics that are specified in the applications of State legislatures. These limitations, the clarification of the rescission and ratification processes and the assertion of congressional review all represent commendable steps forward.

Much to my regret, however, other portions of S. 2307 as presently drafted contain serious flaws which, if enacted, would make the threat of a national constitutional convention more dire than ever. Indeed, I regard these flaws as dangerously destructive to our basic constitutional principles.

Under section 7(a) the delegates to such a convention could be appointed instead of elected. I know of no modern precedent or acceptable reason for permitting the very State legislatures who call such a convention to avoid by State statute the popular election of their delegates. A Constitutional Convention is the embodiment of the ultimate power of the people; surely its membership must be directly chosen by the people it purports to represent if we are not to turn the clock back to the days before the direct election of Senators.

Under section 9(a) each State delegation to such convention is to have one vote, regardless of size. That proposal is so flagrantly in violation of the one-man, one-vote doctrine—and so obviously contrary to the very notion of a representative body—that even a constitutional convention founded on such a premise could not withstand judicial injunction. I am assuming, I might add, that "Representatives in Congress" in section 7(a) as a basis for convention apportionment means "representatives to the U.S. House of Representatives" as it does elsewhere in the Constitution. Any other meaning would be an unnecessary distortion of the convention's representatives. History and the Constitution make special provision for equal suffrage in one of the two Houses of Congress; and considerations of diplomacy and sovereignty have necessitated it in the U.N. General Assembly; but neither of those bodies is a proper precedent for a constitutional convention convoked in the name of the people with power to submit far-reaching amendments. In addition, the proposed unit rule for each State delegation would, even if each State's vote were properly weighted, place a curb on dissent and diversity which should not be imposed by the Congress but at best adopted or not adopted voluntarily by each State, as is now the case at our political conventions.

Finally, under section 10(a) such conventions would propose amendments by a majority of the total votes cast. The Congress, on the other hand, can propose amendments under article V only by a two-thirds vote in both Houses. A convention, for the reasons previously indicated, will not be entitled to the same confidence in its deliberations, in my opinion, as the Congress; and it would be most unwise to make even easier its submission of amendments.

The combination of section 9(a) and 10(a) is particularly disturbing. Any amendment submitteed by the Congress has first been approved by not only two-thirds of the Senate—which means at least 34 States and possibly all of them—but also two-thirds of the House, which means at least 290 Members who, even if they came from the smallest constituencies, would still represent roughly two-thirds of the population. But under section 9(a) and 10(a), after 34 States which might represent as little as 30 percent of the population had called the convention, 26 States representing one-sixth of the population could propose new amendments, before 38 States which could represent less than 40 percent of the population ratified them. Such a possibility drastically upsets the very checks and balances on which the Union was founded. And if under section 7(a), the delegates in those 26 States were appointed and not elected, the travesty on democracy contained in this process would be even more shocking. Therefore, I strongly urge the amendment of S. 2307 to provide that all delegates shall be elected and represent a substantially equal portion of their State's population, that each deleagte shall have one vote to be individually cast, and that a two-thirds vote of the convention shall be required to submit amendments for ratification. In the absence of such changes, this bill will do more damage than it prevents.

I would also respectfully urge:

(1) Reduction of the 6-year period provided in section 5(a) during which two-thirds of the States may propose the same amendments via the convention route, in view of the 2-year period in which a two-thirds vote of each House must be obtained to propose amendments via the congressional route;

(2) A cooling-off period in section 6 of at least 1 year between receipt by the Congress of the necessary two-thirds applications and specific authorization by the Congress of so potentially drastic a convention;

(3) A requirement in section 3 that such applications be the product of the same legislative processes at the State level as such State requires for the enactment of a State law, as distinguished from memorials to the Congress—but not including approval by its Governor which, I must inform my friend from Maryland, I now agree could not be constitutionally required;

(4) A requirement in section 6 that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House report annually to their respective bodies on the applications on file, to prevent the kind of surprise which came upon the Congress this year;

(5) The deletion as premature of those provisions attempting to specify now the method and time period of ratification in section 6(a) (3) and (4) and the compensation of delegates in section 7(d); and

(6) I am submitting a list of seven very minor and largely technical or clarifying amendments as an appendix to this statement.

I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the spirit with which Senator Ervin has put forward this draft bill without committing himself to all of its provisions; and I know that this committee's deliberations will be guided by that same devotion to our Constitution and admiration for its authors that guide every practitioner of the law.

(The appendix referred to follows:)

APPENDIX

TECHNICAL OR CLARIFYING AMENDMENTS TO S. 2307

Page 4, line 5—substitute the words "Section 6" for the words "Section 8"
Page 4, line 13—insert the word "effective" before the word "applications"
Page 4, line 23—substitute the word "record" for the word "tabulation"
Page 6, line 1—delete the words "the legislatures of"
Page 10, line 22—delete the words "the legislatures of"
Page 7, line 24—substitute for the words "have not been" the words "changes or additions are different in general nature from those"
Page 8, line 14—delete remainder of sentence after word "require"

Senator DIRKSEN. Thank you, Mr. Sorensen.

Do you have any questions, Senator Hruska?

Senator HRUSKA. I just have one question, Mr. Sorensen. It is a splendid statement and I commend you for it. It is restrained and it is factual in many, many ways. I would respectfully differ with some of the suggestions that you make by way of amendment.

Can an analogy really be drawn between the necessity to act on a resolution in Congress by a two-thirds vote within a period of 2 years in order to get a proposal for an amendment properly submitted to the State legislatures, and the other situation of having the legislatures limited to a 2-year period in which to petition Congress for a convention?

I cannot quite follow you when you suggest that, since Congress must act within 2 years, therefore everything else by way of proposing a constitutional convention must be done within 2 years.

Mr. SORENSEN. I am frank to say, Senator, that I think the calling of a national constitutional convention is such a serious step that it should not be made easy, it should be made difficult.

Senator HRUSKA. And it should not be made hastily. Some legislatures meet only 60 days, some 90 days, and since it is an event of great rarity, don't you think that they ought to discuss it at one session, come back a couple of years later and say, "Where do we stand now?" That would give them an opportunity to act studiously and properly?

Mr. SORENSEN. Each legislature meets at least every 2 years, and some of them do meet every year, so that the 2-year period would certainly give every legislature a chance. Perhaps as Senator Proxmire suggested, a 4-year period would be an acceptable compromise.

I do not, however, underestimate the difficulty of getting a two-thirds vote of the Congress even in a single 2-year period, so that I think that the process of amending the Constitution is difficult under either route.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, 2 years is a misleading term not intentionally, but in fact, because of some of the legislatures being allowed to meet only 60 or 90 days. Now that is not 2 years, but rather 60 or 90 days and between the time of proposing a resolution and its adoption, it has to go through two Houses, and so on. If we put it in terms of legislative sessions perhaps that would be a little easier to understand, would it not?

Mr. SORENSEN. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. It is one possibility.

On another score on page 9 of your statement you suggest the requirement that such applications—excuse me, I withdraw my question. I had hastily read that and understood that there was a proposal to include the signature of the Governor.

Mr. SORENSEN. No.

Senator HRUSKA. It is the State legislature by itself that takes that action, is it not?

Mr. SORENSEN. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. And, of course, there is that reference to Federalist Paper No. 85 of Mr. Hamilton which pretty much goes into that situation.

Mr. SORENSEN. Yes, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. Those are all the questions I have.

Mr. SORENSEN. I am sorry that my friend from Maryland is not here because, while I admire the effort which he has made on this matter, I do have admiration for Nebraska lawyers, and I must agree with you that the Governor and the President are not a part of the article V process.

Senator HRUSKA. Thanks very much. Those are all the questions I have.

Senator DIRKSEN. Mr. Sorensen, where Congress fails to act in amending the Constitution, and you only have this one remaining route; namely, the applications of the States, have you any comment upon the inclusion in those applications of limitations on the subject matter that you would like to see handled in a convention?

Mr. SORENSEN. I believe that the provisions in S. 2307 which would require the State legislatures to set forth in their applications the specific matters on which they believe a convention should be held, and then the subsequent requirement that the convention limit itself to that subject matter, are valid.

Senator DIRKSEN. Are you of the opinion that under the present language of article V that is an entirely open question?

Mr. SORENSEN. Yes.

Senator DIRKSEN. And that the Congress could not put restrictions or inhibitions on a convention?

Mr. SORENSEN. I would be very much afraid of that.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the Senator yield?

Would Congress be limiting or restricting the States or would Congress in Senate bill 2307 simply be assuring, making assurances, to all the States and the people of the Republic that only the text of the resolution and the petition of each State will not be exceeded in the convention?

Mr. SORENSEN. In the convention.

Senator HRUSKA. In other words, any limitation of scope will not be imposed by Congress, it will be imposed by the text of the State legislature's resolutions, and all we undertake to do in S. 2307 would be to say whatever that text is, that is what will be considered and nothing more; isn't that the thrust of 2307?

Mr. SORENSEN. That is correct; yes, sir.

Senator HRUSKA. Now, then, could you conceive of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States saying, "We petition the Congress for a constitutional convention which will consider a general revision of the U.S. Constitution"?

Is that a possibility?

Mr. SORENSEN. I would have to——

Senator HRUSKA. And if so is there any way that the Congress can say, "You cannot do that"?

Mr. SORENSEN. S. 2307, Senator, refers to a State's request for the calling of a convention "for the purpose of proposing one or more amendments of a particular nature to the Constitution, and stating the specific nature of the amendment or amendments to be proposed." I think that is a desirable safeguard which would prevent the kind of wholesale application by the State legislatures that you describe.

Senator HRUSKA. Is it a constitutional limitation? Where do we have language which will enable us to negate the express wishes of two-thirds of the State legislatures saying what they want?

Mr. SORENSEN. Once S. 2307 has been passed it stands as an act of Congress implementing and interpreting article V, which, similar to other acts of Congress on many parts of the Constitution would, I believe, stand. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, we can get into that question in greater detail later. But it seems to me that one of the points that we ought to canvass, Mr. Chairman, when we get into executive session and of witnesses as they appear here, is to determine whether we want to foreclose by statute the right of two-thirds of these State legislatures to say the time has come that we want a general revision of our Federal Constitution. If two-thirds of the State legislatures say, "We want that considered," I would have misgivings, that we by statute, can deny them that right—we, meaning the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SORENSEN. Perhaps it is a question of semantics, Senator, since presumably a State could list practically every article in the Constitution in its request.

Senator HRUSKA. Yes; they can do it the hard way.

Senator DIRKSEN. Professor Kurland, have you any questions?

Professor KURLAND. No questions.

Senator DIRKSEN. Professor Bickel.

Professor BICKEL. One brief question, if I may.

Mr. Sorensen, I take it the reason you thing the Governor is excluded from the proposing process in the States is that article V refers to the legislatures of the States—it says "on application of the legislatures of the States."

Mr. SORENSEN. Yes.

Article V refers to the legislatures, both with respect to the proposing of amendments via the convention route and the ratification of amendments. I believe the courts have held that in the ratification process the Governor's participation is not required, and I would assume, too, it would not be——

Professor BICKEL. That is the point I was coming to. The courts have not held it was required or forbidden. In other words, the courts have, as I understand it, held that the phrase "legislatures of the States" means that the framers of the Constitution wanted to be sure to insert the legislatures, but they did not necessarily intend action by the legislatures exclusively outside the normal legislative processes of the State. As I understand it, what the States have been told, in effect, is, "If you want to insert your Governor into it you may; if not, no."

Well, all right, if it is an open question under article V, then I do not see why Congress cannot, as it could in providing for the ratification of an amendment, say, "This time we choose that you should insert the Governor."

Mr. SORENSEN. I did not read the decisions that way. I thought it was left up to the individual States as to whether they wished to insert the Governor in the process, which is a different question from whether the Congress can insert the Governor in the process.

Professor BICKEL. Well, all I mean is that this process of application and ratification is essentially a Federal process as to which, when Congress has said nothing, the States may do as they wish, but it is essentially a Federal process. Hence, when Congress chooses to do something it is free to do so, and certainly under article V it is free to do so.

Professor MCCLOSKEY. I wonder if I might ask Mr. Sorensen for some brief clarifications of congressional powers of ratification under article V.

I understand from his suggestions they do imply that he believes Congress does have rather broad powers to prescribe the procedures by which the conventions shall be chosen and the route the convention shall proceed. So procedurally you think the Congress can prescribe; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. SORENSEN. Yes.

Professor MCCLOSKEY. Are you also entirely sure one way or another that Congress has no power over the substance of the proposals that are submitted? Are you clear that Congress is in no position to disapprove of the substance? Article V simply says Congress shall call a convention. Are you assuming that becomes purely ministerial, a ministerial obligation, with no congressional discretion once the question of procedures is dealt with?

Mr. SORENSEN. I would not want to say that I was absolutely sure about anything in article V, Doctor. It is certainly a confused area of constitutional law. It is my view, though, that the combination of language in article V and the language in the "Federalist Paper" which Senator Dirksen previously quoted, would certainly limit very severely the role of Congress in reviewing the subject matter which could be submitted, once the States had specifically indicated what subject they wanted taken up in constitutional convention.

Senator DIRKSEN. If there are no more questions, the hearing stands adjourned until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

(Whereupon, at 12:15 o'clock, the committee adjourned, to reconvene at 10 a.m., on Tuesday, October 31, 1967.)

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON SEPARATION OF POWERS
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:10 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., presiding.

Present: Senators Ervin and Tydings.

Also present: Paul L. Woodard, chief counsel; Lawrence J. Brady, minority counsel; Prof. Philip B. Kurland, chief consultant; Prof. Robert G. McCloskey, consultant; and Prof. Alexander M. Bickel, consultant.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will come to order.

The first witness today is Dr. Wallace Mendelson, from the Department of Government, University of Texas.

Dr. Mendelson is professor of political science at the University of Texas, Austin, Tex. He was born in Dubuque, Iowa, on September 25, 1911. He received an A.B. degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1936, an LL.B. from Harvard in 1936, and a Ph. D. from the University of Wisconsin in 1950.

In addition to teaching at the University of Texas, Dr. Mendelson has taught at the universities of Missouri, Illinois, and Tennessee.

Dr. Mendelson is the author of "Justices Black and Frankfurter: Conflict in the Court," and "Capitalism, Democracy and the Supreme Court."

We are delighted to have you with us today, Dr. Mendelson.

You may proceed.

STATEMENT OF WALLACE MENDELSON, PROFESSOR, DEPARTMENT OF GOVERNMENT, UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS, AUSTIN, TEX.

Professor MENDELSON. Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, in relation to the pending legislation, may I state that there is an effort to make the amending process more flexible, and there is a great fear on the part of some that this will lead to a runaway modification of the Constitution. Certainly, these two claims can be reconciled by a procedure enacted by the Congress that would permit change and yet guard against any amendment that does not reflect a genuine national consensus. To that end I would suggest that we are not without experience in the amending process.

We have 50 State constitutions, each one of them presumably including an amending process. And so it seems to me that the people of America have spoken very clearly as to what they require in the way of amending procedures.

I would suggest the subcommittee might want to make an analysis of those 50 constitutions. Meanwhile, I can give a general impression, namely, that the American people are not satisfied to have even the initiation of an amendment based simply on a simple majority vote of one session of a legislative body. Thirty States, for example, require an extraordinary majority in at least one of the two houses. Ten States require that a legislature may propose an amendment, but that proposal is not effective until the intervention of a popular election and adoption of the proposal by a second legislative session.

Senator TYDINGS. How many States is that?

Professor MENDELSON. Ten.

And then there are a great number of other qualifications. For example, Tennessee has a provision that a convention may not be called more than once every 6 years; and there are a number of limitations by way of publicity. I would suggest that, on the basis of that quite clear expression of opinion by the American people, this legislation might well require a two-thirds vote in both houses of a State legislature as a prerequisite for a petition for amendment, or it might simply adopt for initiating a Federal amendment the various procedures for initiating State constitutional amendments.

I would hate to see this legislation outlaw a review by the Congress of the validity of a State petition, if the Congress sees fit to impose what I am suggesting, certain limitations with respect to such petitions.

Then, to move to the next step, the convention itself.

I think it must be plain that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the United States about the fact that Nigeria or Albania have exactly the same vote in the United Nations General Assembly that the United States has. On that same basis, it is very difficult for me to see why, in the convention, Alaska should have exactly the same vote as North Carolina or Nebraska or Texas. In other words, I would strongly urge that population be the basis of representation and voting in a Constitutional Convention.

Madison in Federalist No. 49, and in many other places, states that the people are the only legitimate fountain of power, and, of course, this would seem to be an endorsement of the one-man, one-vote principle.

It seems to me that the delegates to a national convention ought to be elected by the people, not appointed as the present bill permits.

It seems also that since in the other amending procedure Congress cannot propose an amendment without a two-thirds vote in both Houses, certainly the convention ought to operate on the same two-thirds vote basis.

Now, as to the ratification stage, the Constitution leaves the matter, of course, to the choice of Congress, and I would strongly urge that the ratification be by State convention, a convention chosen by the people by popular election. Of course, that is how the 1787 Constitution was ratified.

What I have suggested is really a three-way filter system, to guarantee against amendments that would not represent a genuine national consensus. At the petition stage there would be action by the State legislatures operating on a one-State, one-vote basis. Then at the proposal stage, there would be popular participation, all people being equally represented.

Finally, at the ratification stage, there is, again, the one-State, one-vote approach, but this time as reflected by popular vote in the State convention.

Certainly, that ought to give major protection against ill-considered proposals.

As to the question of participation by the President in the proposing process, the Constitution seems to me to speak very clearly. We had some discussion yesterday about the necessity of following the literal language of the Constitution. I cannot see how literalists can escape the literal language of the Constitution, article I, section 7, which requires Presidential approval or disapproval of any vote of the Congress. Now, I must confess that tradition and custom has modified that somewhat, but if we are going to be literalists, the Constitution speaks very plainly.

Can a constitutional convention be limited? I think it should. The convention of 1787 was. It sent its proposal to the Congress not merely for transmittal to the States but for approval by the Congress and then transmittal to the States. Such a "request" for approval by the Congress would seem to imply that Congress was free to disapprove.

I cannot read the proceedings of the convention or the Federalist papers without coming away with a very clear impression that no general constitutional revision was contemplated by the convention system. The reason for including the convention system in article V seems to have been perfectly clear to provide a means for correcting errors: that is, specific, concrete errors or abuses by the National Government. Moreover, the language of article V speaks specifically of "amendments."

Hamilton in the 85th Federalist says that every amendment would be a "single proposition." Similarly, Madison in the 43d Federalist speaks of the "amendment of errors." Neither gentleman seems to have contemplated a general constitutional convention. Both seem to have contemplated State petitions for specific amendments to correct specific national "abuses," for example, a particular Supreme Court decision. Surely it was not thought that by petitioning for an innocuous amendment, for example, on daylight saving time, the States would open up the way for a constitutional convention that would be free to revise the entire taxing authority of the United States or abolish the House of Representatives.

I cannot accept that as a sensible approach, but I would suggest that, apart from questions of legality, there is an important political consideration. I lived for some years in Tennessee. In the early fifties, I think it is fair to say that Tennessee was a quite conservative State; that its constitution was out of date, that here was a general recognition that the constitution needed revising, and yet a deadly fear of a general constitutional convention. Indeed, the fear was so great that, as a political matter, it was not possible in Tennessee to call a general constitutional convention. The matter was solved, however, by what, in Tennessee, is called a "limited constitutional convention," a convention limited to the consideration of specific items, with the expectation, of course, that either the legislature or the courts, or both, could enforce the stated limitations upon the convention.

So, I would agree very heartily with section 10(b) of this bill.

I have a bit of difficulty with the language, which requires merely that petitions be "on the same subject." It seems to me that is not enough. You can take very different views on the same subject. For example, 20 States may propose an amendment to permit prayers in public schools; another 20 States may propose amendments to the opposite effect. In my view, S. 2307 should require that at least two-thirds of the States take substantially the same view on the same subject as a precondition of the calling of a convention. Otherwise, you could get together a whole conglomeration of different proposed amendments and use this as a basis for calling a constitutional convention.

So, I would strongly urge that Congress in this legislation tighten the language to permit only limited constitutional conventions and to retain in Congress the power to review what the convention has done for the purpose of enforcing the limitations.

Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. As I construe your statement, if I construe it rightly, you take the position that, under section 7 of article I of the Constitution, the President would have to approve the action of the Congress in calling for a convention?

Professor MENDELSON. I do not quite say that. I say that there is authority in the language of the Constitution for such a provision in this bill.

Senator ERVIN. I misunderstood you, then. You do recognize that in practice it has always been the procedure to exclude the President from participation when Congress submitted a constitutional amendment.

Professor MENDELSON. I think the reason, perhaps, that this has been done when Congress proposes an amendment is that such an amendment can be proposed only by a two-thirds vote in each house, which is kind of anticipatory overriding of the Presidential veto.

Senator ERVIN. I am sorry; I did not understand you correctly, then. Section 7 of article I provides that every resolution or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and the House of Representatives may be necessary, except on the question of adjournment, shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or upon being disapproved by him, shall have been repassed by two-thirds vote of the Senate and the House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Now, article V requires a two-thirds vote on the part of both houses of Congress before Congress can propose an amendment. Therefore, Congress cannot present an amendment to the President unless it has already passed by a two-thirds vote. If the President vetoed it, then it would presumably pass a second time by a two-thirds vote. So, it seems to me that, since the general rule of the law is that you shall not require unnecessary things, the President has no voice in the submission of a constitutional amendment.

Professor MENDELSON. I think you and I are in agreement. We are talking about the so-called "regular" method of proposing amendments by Congress.

Senator ERVIN. Yes.

Professor MENDELSON. Two-thirds approval is not required at the convention. I am suggesting that it should be.

Senator ERVIN. Of course, article V tells us that two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress is required where Congress itself proposes the amendment to the States. But is not the second alternative method one which should be initiated on the application of two-thirds of the States without any action on the part of the Congress?

Professor MENDELSON. Right.

Senator ERVIN. I am not sure the Congress would have the power to add additional qualifications, such as that the States could not petition for a convention without approval by two separate terms or two-thirds vote. Would not the Congress thereby be limiting and restricting the power of the States, the power vested in the States? In other words, would it not be implied in the Constitution that wherever action is required to be taken by legislative bodies that a majority is sufficient to take such action?

Professor MENDELSON. I am not clear on that at all. It seems to me that the State constitutions reflect the feelings of the people of the States about how these things ought to be done. It should be done by something more than a simple majority vote, it seems to me. The language of the Constitution reads in such fashion as to leave it completely open, and this is a matter of judgment by the Congress. What I am saying is that if the Founding Fathers saw fit to require a two-thirds vote in both Houses of Congress, the situation where you have one House checking upon the other, it seems incredible that the Congress could not, in interpreting this article V, require also something more than a simple majority vote for the initiating of amendments by the States.

Senator ERVIN. Well, of course, it is certainly manifest in the purpose that there should be great deliberation when it comes to amending the Constitution. The Founding Fathers expressed that concern by requiring a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress to submit an amendment. But they also showed that concern, it seems to me, in the alternative method, because they required that it should be upon the application of two-thirds of the several States. You would seem to me to be adding something to the Constitution that was not there.

You would be amending the Constitution to say, or for Congress to undertake to say, not only that two-thirds of the States must apply, but that two-thirds of the members of each State's legislature must agree to its application. It is an interesting question. I am inclined to think that you cannot put that additional limitation on the States; that Congress would thereby be depriving the States of a power that the Constitution itself vests in the States to exercise, each State presumably acting by majority vote of its legislative body.

Professor MENDELSON. On the other hand, most of the States' constitutions have a limitation of that type with respect to amendment of State constitutions.

Senator ERVIN. Of course, and I think any such provision would be clearly binding on the State, because a State has the power to say how its constitution shall be amended. But, likewise, the Federal Government, the Federal Constitution, undertakes to say how the Constitution shall be amended. And I think that a literal reading indicates that where Congress initiates the amendment procedure there must be a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress; but where the States initiate the alternative amendment procedure, two-thirds of the States must act, and, in general, the principle must be followed that wherever a body is authorized to act, in the absence of specific provisions to the contrary, a majority of that body has the power to act.

Professor MENDELSON. Of course, one difficulty in that position, it would seem to me, would be that it would permit less than a majority of the people, in effect, to petition for amendments.

Senator ERVIN. I agree with you that that would be the result, but article V is concerned with the States rather than the people of the States or the people of the country.

Professor MENDELSON. I have difficulty seeing anything in the concept of a State other than people. Ours is a government of the people and not of the States.

Senator ERVIN. Well, of course, certainly, there is the concept of one-man, one-vote, which interestingly did not come into effect, apparently, until the 14th amendment was ratified in 1868, and, thereafter, was not discovered for many years after that.

Senator TYDINGS. Is that a fact?

Professor MENDELSON. The 14th amendment?

Senator TYDINGS. No, no. Is it a fact that the one-man, one-vote business did not come into effect until the 14th amendment?

Professor MENDELSON. I do no think so, no.

Senator TYDINGS. What was the first legislature to move on the one-man, one-vote proposition? Was it not the State of Virginia when Thomas Jefferson resigned as a delegate in the Continental Congress and ran for the House of Burgesses and gave the people representation the western people of Virginia, as well as the tidelands area?

Professor KURLAND. I would suggest that it was a good deal less than one-man, one-vote in the State of Virginia. History would reveal there was a problem of universal suffrage at the time of Mr. Jefferson's action.

Senator TYDINGS. And there still is.

Professor KURLAND. Mr. Justice Chase had some trouble over the proposal to grant universal male suffrage. That was in 1802 or 1803.

Senator TYDINGS. He got himself into trouble on a lot of things, Mr. Chase did.

Senator ERVIN. I believe that Justice Harlan pointed out in one of the reapportionment cases that you got yourself in trouble when you applied the one-man, one-vote proposition. He said that the one-man, one-vote proposition applied to the Congress originally, because they were to be elected by the people; but that the only people that could vote for Members of Congress were those who elected representatives to the State legislature, and a lot of people could not vote in those elections.

Senator TYDINGS. That was one that he prevailed on.

Professor MENDELSON. It seems to me, apart from history, what the real problem here is that we would not want an amendment that did not reflect a genuine national consensus. And if you control the amendment process by the one-State, one-vote procedure you might well get an amendment that does not reflect the wishes of the American people. It would seem to me that this legislation ought to move in the direction of preventing minority amendments, and, certainly, one way to do that is by the popularly elected convention voting on a per capita basis.

Senator ERVIN. If you did it on that basis, would you not have to negative a part of article V, because it says that two-thirds of the States could take this action, and, in effect, would you not have to write into that, that two-thirds of the States may take action but only if they contain a majority of the people?

Professor MENDELSON. No, I am satisfied that, just as in Congress the States have a participating role, so in the amending process the States should have a participating role; but, also, just as in Congress, the people ought to have a participating role. The States operating on a one-State, one-vote basis are effective at the petition stage and at the ratification stage. There is nothing, I think, in the Constitution that forecloses popular representation in the middle stage, in the convention stage.

Senator ERVIN. I am inclined to agree with you, that just with respect to membership and voting power in the convention, the States should be weighted, roughly according to their representation in Congress.

Professor MENDELSON. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. But I have difficulty in accepting the view that Congress would have the power to require the States to petition by a two-thirds majority of their legislatures rather than a simple majority. Now, on another question, do you think that Congress has any discretion about the question of calling the convention when two-thirds of the States have adopted resolutions asking for the calling of the convention?

Professor MENDELSON. Yes, I do. I think that if Congress prescribes any kind of limitations on the States, for example, a two-thirds vote on petitions, that certainly Congress ought to be the judge as to whether those limitations have been met. I think when the States petition for a daylight savings time amendment, moreover, that the Congress ought to be able to confine the Constitutional Convention to a daylight savings amendment, and to make that effective Congress should be in a position to review what the Convention does.

Senator ERVIN. It may be that ought to be so, but what words of the fifth article make that so? I think that this method of allowing amendments to be made as the result of the application of legislatures of two-thirds of the States was provided to take care of a situation where the people want a constitutional amendment submitted and the Congress refuses to submit it?

Professor MENDELSON. All right, exactly. The whole thrust of the background of the amendment and the whole thrust of the Federalist Papers seem to be that the States should be able to petition the Congress for the correction of some specific evil. And so it would be the States who are confining the constitutional convention. Congress is just speaking the will of the States. They say they want an amendment on daylight saving. Congress is simply reflecting the desire of the States, confining the Convention to the daylight savings amendment.

Senator ERVIN. But, assuming that you are correct in that position, that two-thirds of the States have to concur in a specific proposal, when two-thirds of the States do concur in the proposal that they have daylight savings, is it not mandatory on the Congress to call the Convention?

Professor MENDELSON. Assuming that the Congress is satisfied that the States' petitions are bona fide legal petitions; yes, sir. The Congress should have the authority to review the validity of the petitions, however.

Senator ERVIN. Well, now, what would that involve in the way of action on the part of the Congress?

Professor MENDELSON. Well, suppose that a State legislature does vote for a petition. The Congress certainly can look to the validity of that petition. The Congress does not have to accept as valid any paper labeled "petition" that comes to it.

Senator ERVIN. Would they not have to accept it as valid, that is, a petition submitted by a majority vote of a State legislature, when those members of the State legislature have been elected to office and were openly exercising their office?

Professor MENDELSON. The Congress, it seems to me, must, if a required majority does this in proper fashion.

Senator ERVIN. I agree with you on that.

Professor MENDELSON. That is all I am saying.

Senator ERVIN. The point I am getting at is that there has been some intimation on the Washington scene that the Congress would have the right to go into the question of whether the legislature which submitted the application was malaportioned under the one-man, one-vote decision.

Professor MENDELSON. Well, does not that become somewhat academic?

After all, virtually all of the State legislatures have now been reapportioned.

Senator ERVIN. I think so, but I just wondered. There is such a thing as a de facto legislature. I am suggesting that where an officer is elected to office and the exercises the function of that office, his acts are binding on the public and all individuals so long as the law under which he was elected has not been judged unconstitutional.

Professor MENDELSON. It would certainly be opening a hornets' nest if the Congress were to be permitted to go behind the formalities.

Senator TYDINGS. You say "go behind the formality." When you say that, suppose that the newspapers published in a particular area stated that the majority leader and three members had been bribed and that there was a grand jury convened to investigate the situation. Is it your position that the Congress could not go behind the strict formality of that situation?

Professor MENDELSON. This is a problem, much the same as the valid election of a member of the Senate or of the House.

Senator TYDINGS. We have the right here to go into that. We are the judge of the credentials of a Member of the Congress. We have committees that go right out and look into the ballot boxes and take testimony. That is not what you are saying in regard to this.

Professor MENDELSON. No.

Senator TYDINGS. Do you feel that we should have the same right, vis-a-vis the examination of the legality or the validity of the petitions that we would have as to the legality of an election?

Professor MENDELSON. It seems to me it never resolves the problem when the Congress goes back to checking the validity when the States submit them. There must be something——

Senator TYDINGS. Do you or do you not feel that the Congress would be able to check the validity of the petitions?

Professor MENDELSON. It should be able to check, but I have some question as to whether it can go behind what I call the formalities.

Senator TYDINGS. I think that the specific point that Senator Ervin raises and which has been raised by myself and other Members of the Senate, relates to a petition by a malapportioned legislature to call a constitutional convention for the purpose of making legal its own illegal apportionment.

Professor MENDELSON. In other words, the State legislature judging its own case?

Senator TYDINGS. Right.

Professor MENDELSON. I suppose that you could conceive making a special case of this kind of a problem, where it is judging its own case.

Senator ERVIN. The Congress could not very well undertake to inquire into what motivated the votes of the members of the State legislatures when they made the request for the calling of the convention. The remedy for the situation that the Senator from Maryland has suggested would be to prosecute the guilty man for taking a bribe. In other words, nobody would have a right to contest the validity of an act of the Congress on the theory that some of the Congressmen voted for the act had been bribed to vote for the act, that they were motivated by pecuniary gain, rather than a love for country, or something like that. And, similarly, you would penalize State government, if you tried to make the acts of State legislatures, passed by a majority vote, dependent upon a question to be determined later by somebody else, whether a Member of the Congress had been bribed.

Professor MENDELSON. The 14th amendment itself might be the subject of a very serious question on that score.

Senator ERVIN. It certainly is. It was certainly coerced. Now, assuming that two-thirds of the States requested specific legislation and Congress called the convention; then, after the convention undertook the subject matter, the convention acted, the Congress would not have the power to go into the wisdom or the unwisdom of whether or not the convention should have done what it did do, as far as this specific thing was concerned? That would be beyond its powers, would it not?

Professor MENDELSON. As I envision the petitions, they ought to take a specific stand on a specific subject. It is not enough to say: "We want something done about daylight savings." They must petition for an amendment to have daylight savings. And then the Congress should be in a position not to accept an amendment, a proposed amendment on income taxes.

Professor KURLAND. You have been talking about, as an example, a daylight savings amendment. Does it not satisfy your standard if the requisite number of States say that they thought it appropriate for a national, uniform rule? Or would you require that each of the States propose daylight savings? And if each application were to call for it to go into effect at different times, would that preclude adding the applications together?

Professor MENDELSON. Hamilton, I think, dealt with the problem in the Federalist No. 85, and he put it, I think, similarly to the way that I put it. He treats the convention almost as a mechanical device which would simply vote "Yes" or "No."

Professor KURLAND. You are suggesting that they go through the process of proposing, as well as asking for, a convention, and that they go through the steps twice, once by way of the original procedure, and then——

Professor MENDELSON. No. What I am saying is that the petitioning process is part of the proposing process. This is, I think, the way Hamilton looked at it.

Professor KURLAND. Then, you do not feel that regardless of minor inconsistencies in the applications, the convention could be called?

Professor MENDELSON. Yes, I do.

Professor KURLAND. Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. That was a point that troubled me. Take, for example, the Miranda case, which has the effect of excluding voluntary confessions unless the arresting officer gives certain legal advice to the suspect. Suppose that two-thirds of the States say that the Miranda case ought to be corrected in some way, by some amendment to the Constitution; but they could not agree exactly as to what the amendment should be, how it should be worded, but only that it should be amended. Would you require them to go further than to request a convention to consider an amendment changing the ruling in that case, without having a specific proposed amendment to do so?

Professor MENDELSON. I understand the problem. I have no objection either way, provided the scope of the convention is confined within reasonably narrow limits.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, it is your theory that, provided the proposition to be considered was defined clearly, that the convention could, nevertheless, be called, and that they could deliberate on the best way to deal with the question submitted to them?

Professor MENDELSON. What I am trying strongly to guard against is the very innocuous petition by a State that leads to an opening up of everything in the Constitution.

Senator TYDINGS. Suppose that the question at issue was not the Miranda case. Suppose that during the deliberations of the convention, the delegates looked at the case and felt, perhaps, they should look at one or two prior decisions on which the case rested. What is your position? Would they have the power, in addition to proposing an amendment relating specifically to the Miranda case, could they propose an amendment relating to the Miranda case or to some prior case on which the Miranda case rested?

Senator ERVIN. Pardon me for saying that Escobedo did not rest on prior cases, it was a new invention.

Senator TYDINGS. What is your thought on that?

Professor MENDELSON. As I say, my only problem is that of the innocuous amendment petition. I think that this legislation ought to speak very clearly on just exactly how this petition problem should be handled. It should be done in such a way as not to justify the fears of those people who are afraid of a wide-open convention.

Senator ERVIN. I think that is a very real threat, the situation that you described in Tennessee. I know that, as it exists in my State, the State legislature has been thoroughly liberal in submitting specific amendments to the people, but it has refused on many occasions to call a general constitutional convention. It is a very real threat. This bill does attempt to impose limitations. Of course, this bill has to be constitutional under article V to be valid. This bill also provides for some review by the Congress after the convention has met and has submitted its proposals. I just wonder whether article V should be interpreted to permit this. Under the language of article V on this alternative method, would not the convention itself have the constitutional power to submit its proposals directly to the States, subject, of course, to the power of the Congress to say whether ratification shall be by convention or by the legislature?

Professor MENDELSON. I have a great deal of difficulty with that. My position is that the Constitutional Convention of 1787 brought forth the Constitution, and it did not go to the States until the Congress had approved it.

Senator ERVIN. Of course, they were called to amend the Articles of Confederation; but they rewrote the entire Constitution.

Professor MENDELSON. In other words, both the convention and the Congress violated a specific limitation.

Senator ERVIN. They really assumed authority that they did not have. It was sanctioned by the people later by ratification, of course.

Professor MENDELSON. But implicit in the approval of the Congress was the power to disapprove in that case.

Senator ERVIN. I am just wondering, taking article V literally, suppose two-thirds of the State legislatures ask the Congress to call a convention for proposing specific amendments, and Congress calls for the convention and the convention meets and proposes amendments in conformity with the designated purpose; then, does Congress have any other power than the power to say whether or not those amendments should be voted on by the States through the agency of conventions or through the agency of the State legislatures?

Professor MENDELSON. According to my position, it does; it has the power to judge whether the convention acted within the scope of its authority.

Senator ERVIN. You conceive that being a political question for the Congress rather than a judicial question for the courts?

Professor MENDELSON. I think that the Congress has treated it in that way in this bill.

Senator ERVIN. The bill does that. I am wondering whether those provisions are within the power of Congress. Thank you very much. You have suggested some very intriguing aspects of this question.

Senator TYDINGS. I have some questions.

Do you feel that there is a need for legislation of this type?

Professor MENDELSON. I suppose that the absence of legislation of this type works against the convention method, the convention type of amendment. I suppose that in fairness, we ought to have legislation to facilitate the calling of conventions but not to open the doors of Pandora's box to constitutional revision.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, one area which you and Senator Ervin covered was the area of proposing an amendment of a particular nature. How far would you go in the legislation itself in trying to limit specific proposals that could be acted upon? We got into the question of daylight savings time as an example. Suppose you had 30 petitions regarding daylight savings time on file and you had four in favor of going on eastern standard time for the whole Nation. Would that be sufficient?

Professor MENDELSON. I would have no difficulty with that. To me, the whole sense of the petition approach is that States want a remedy against a specific grievance. I would be inclined to limit the States' petitions in view of that. Thus, the States' petitions should not be counted unless they take a particular view on a particular subject.

Senator TYDINGS. Could you suggest at a later time language, that is, specific language for the bill?

Professor MENDELSON. Yes. I would be willing to do that.

Senator TYDINGS. We dealt before with the problem of a petition from a malapportioned State convention to make legal their illegal apportionment, and the issue was whether or not the Congress should be able to determine whether or not such a petition was proper and valid. I wonder if you would comment on that. Also, suppose a given legislature were under a court order to reapportion at the time that they passed this petition to the Congress to bring about a constitutional amendment?

Professor MENDELSON. The way out of the dilemma, I suppose, would be this: You must accept the petition, if it meets all of the formalities. One of the formalities would be: Is there a court order which, in any way, specifically limits what this legislature can do in its present unapportioned status? Certainly, a court order limiting what it can do ought to be taken into account.

Senator TYDINGS. The court order requiring a legislature to fairly apportion, would that be enough?

Professor MENDELSON. I suppose that alone would not be enough.

Those court orders, I think, very frequently have in them additional limitations; for example, the unapportioned legislature may not call a State constitutional convention, may not propose that.

Senator TYDINGS. We have had a couple of decisions on that.

Professor MENDELSON. Yes.

Senator TYDINGS. If you will turn to page 2 of the proposed bill, section 3(a):

> For the purpose of adopting or rescinding a resolution pursuant to section 2, the State legislature shall adopt its own rules of procedure.

And it continues:

> (b) Questions concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this act shall be determinable by the State legislature and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts, and the Congress of the United States.

What is your feeling about that?

Professor MENDELSON. I have a great deal of trouble with that. I find it unacceptable. Certainly, the State courts ought to have something to say about the propriety of such a petition, and I would think that the Congress ought to have something to say.

Senator TYDINGS. What is that?

Professor MENDELSON. I think that both the State courts and the Congress at the very minimum ought to have something to say about it.

Senator TYDINGS. Turn to page 3, section 5(a) which has to do with applications. I wonder whether you would comment on what you feel would be a fair period of validity for the application?

Professor MENDELSON. Well, the Congress, of course, has taken the position on several occasions that 7 years is a proper period of time. This is a debatable thing, obviously. The bill states a 6-year period of time. Yesterday, a 4-year period of time was urged. I, certainly, would not want to go beyond 7 years. I see no great objection to the 6 years, although my own inclination would be to cut it down somewhat.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, as to procedure for calling the Constitutional convention which is covered in another section, do you feel that the procedure of a simple concurrent resolution of the Congress by majority vote would be all right, or do you feel that it should be a two-thirds vote with Presidential approval?

Professor MENDELSON. Well, as to Presidential approval, I am simply saying that this is a choice that could be made by the Congress. It seems to me that the literal terms of the Constitution would permit Congress to bring the President into this, by virtue of this bill, but I think that tradition has, perhaps, modified the literal language of the Constitution. It seems to me to be a fair choice for the Congress to do it either way, with justification.

Senator TYDINGS. Do you think that it should be a two-thirds or majority vote of both Houses?

Professor MENDELSON. Well, I would say that it ought to depend, in part, upon what the vote in the Convention is going to be.

If you were going to require a two-thirds vote per capita in the Convention, I would be satisfied to let the Congress act by a simple majority vote in each House.

On the other hand, if it is going to be a simple majority vote in the Convention, and, certainly, if it is going to be on the State basis, I would very much want to have the two-thirds vote in both Houses of the Congress.

Senator TYDINGS. As the bill is drafted, in section 6(a), it provides for an almost automatic adoption of the resolution unless, as I read it, the House in which the petition is received determines that the recitation contained in the report is not really the same subject as the petition itself.

Have you examined that language in section 6(a)?

Professor MENDELSON. I did not get the question.

Senator TYDINGS. Have you examined that language in section 6(a)?

Professor MENDELSON. Yes, I have looked at it.

Senator TYDINGS. How do you interpret the procedure to be followed by the Houses of Congress receiving the petition? Just what happens under this proposed language?

Professor MENDELSON. Just relying on my memory without reading it again, it seems to me that the bill puts each House somewhat at the mercy of its secretary or clerk.

It seems to me that, if my memory is correct on this, each House ought to act on its own responsibility, not simply in terms of taking the recitation or taking the view of the Secretary or Clerk. I think it does not give the Congress itself great enough responsibility.

Senator TYDINGS. How would you suggest that it be amended?

Professor MENDELSON. I might like to take a little time on that.

Senator TYDINGS. All right. I will be interested in getting your views on that.

Now, turning to section 7(a). I think it is clear from your testimony that you feel that the representation within the convention itself should be representative of the people rather than representative of the States.

Turning to page 8, section 9, dealing with the convention, subsection (c), it states:

The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting, unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

How do you interpret that, so far as congressional control of the convention is concerned?

If the Congress decided not to extend the convention time, would the convention automatically die—would the Congress be obligated to extend the time of the convention, or what?

Professor MENDELSON. I notice on the margin of my copy of the bill my notation that this might improperly constitute a veto by the Congress. This, perhaps, would give the Congress a veto, in a sense.

Senator TYDINGS. Over the proceedings of the convention.

Professor MENDELSON. Yes.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, turning to section 10(a), on page 9, it provides that the amendment may be proposed by a majority of the total votes cast on the question.

What is your feeling on that?

Professor MENDELSON. My difficulty is this: In the first place, there is nothing said about a quorum. I think there certainly ought to be. And for me, personally, it would be simply unacceptable for 26 States to be able to propose an amendment. Itis for that reason that I would urge that this be done on a per capita population basis, and since a two-thirds vote is required for a proposal by the Congress, I would be inclined toward that in this analogous situation.

Senator TYDINGS. Two-thirds of the delegates?

Professor MENDELSON. Yes.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, to get back to the original problem. In subsection (b), it states:

No convention called under this act may propose any amendment or amendments of a general nature different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention.

Do you think that that language should be tighter?

Professor MENDELSON. I do.

Senator TYDINGS. And you are going to suggest something?

Professor MENDELSON. I will try.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, as to section 11(e), on page 10, it says:

. . . submit such proposed amendments to the Administrator of General Services for submission to the states, but only if prior to the expiration of such period the Congress has not adopted a concurrent resolution disapproving the submission of the proposed amendment to the states on the ground that its general nature is different from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention.

What is your comment there?

Professor MENDELSON. I do not like that. I do not like the 3 months' limitation. I think that the language ought to be turned around. In my view, the bill should allow a much longer period of time, and then, turning the rest of the language around, should require affirmative action by the Congress to send a proposal to the States.

Senator TYDINGS. What sort of a vote do you think we ought to take, a majority vote of the Congress or a two-thirds vote?

Professor MENDELSON. Well, again, that would depend on what the requirements for the vote were in the convention.

Senator TYDINGS. Assuming the requirement for the convention was two-thirds vote based on population.

Professor MENDELSON. Then, I would be satisfied with a majority vote here.

Senator TYDINGS. Section 12, on page 10 provides, as to the concurrent resolution of the Congress, that the Congress shall provide the manner for the ratification or proposed amendments. Do you feel that the Congress can provide in that manner the ratification, or should each State ratify as it had done in the past, according to their own procedure, in their own constitution?

Professor MENDELSON. I would prefer to have section 12 once and for all send all of these amendments to the properly elected State convention.

Senator TYDINGS. Rather than the State legislature?

Professor MENDELSON. Right.

Senator TYDINGS. That is actually the way the specification is.

Professor MENDELSON. No, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. If you did that, that would alleviate the necessity of section 13 which goes to whether or not a Governor would try to veto it, et cetera.

Now, if you did not support the proposal for the ratification to be by the properly elected State convention, and you gave the ratification function to the State legislature, do you think that the Governor would have any right to veto it?

Professor MENDELSON. I have some difficulty with that. I think that a State, perhaps, could by law bring the Governor into the process. It is not clear to me, that the Congress could bring the Governor into the process.

Senator TYDINGS. It would be up to the State?

Professor MENDELSON. Without examining it further, that would be my impression.

Senator TYDINGS. That is all. Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. I am having a little trouble with this.

As I understand it, the courts have held that the President has no proper role in the constitutional amendment process. If the Congress undertook to give the President this role, we would add something that is not in the Constitution. I do not think that the Congress can add anything to the Constitution or subtract anything from the Constitution. That is my own opinion. I think that the President is deliberately left out, because he might be the one man out of the entire Nation that could arbitrarily throw a monkey wrench into the whole amendatory process.

Professor MENDELSON. Well, I would grant that, but I think that the Constitution literally does bring the President into this, not in article V but in article I, section 7, that every order, resolution or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and the House may be necessary shall be presented to the President of the United States. I do not see how you can escape that language, though tradition has modified this, I agree. But there was some discussion yesterday about being very literal about what the Constitution says. I cannot easily escape the literal meaning of article I, section 7.

Senator ERVIN. Under your interpretation, the Congress has to have a two-thirds majority to submit a constitutional amendment, and if the President is permitted to disapprove it, that interpretation would be ignoring the fact that the constitutional amendment itself has to be submitted by a vote sufficient to take care of overriding the President's veto.

Moreover, article V merely requires an action that is not really part of the legislative process. It says Congress shall "call" a convention. Article I, on the other hand, deals with the legislative powers of Congress. It does not deal at all with constitutional amendments. It deals with the legislative power of the Congress.

Professor MENDELSON. On the other hand, the language is quite plain. It says every "order"—not necessarily legislation—every "resolution"—not necessarily legislation—every "vote," which is not necessarily legislation.

Senator ERVIN. If you take that interpretation, you would have to modify article V to permit a majority of each House to take action, as article I provides, although there is not a single thing in article I that deals with the power of Congress to amend the Constitution. Under article I, a majority can do business. Under article V it cannot. Two-thirds concurrence is required. So I think that you will get into inconsistencies if you try to apply section 7 of article I to article V. I think that the two deal with two entirely different subjects. But it is an interesting and intriguing question for discussion.

Professor KURLAND. It seems to me that under article V there is one point which is quite clear, and that is the proposition that the Congress should specify the mode of ratification of the amendments proposed by the convention. The method of ratification is to be specified as one of these two choices and the States must abide by the legislative proposition. And so far as that is provided for in this bill, you cannot take exception to it. Is that not right?

Earlier in your testimony you suggested that the mode of ratification that you would prefer would be by State convention rather than by State legislative action. It has been suggested to me that a problem has been revealed when a State refuses to convene a convention for purposes of passing on a ratification issue. Do you think it would be necessary to make a provision to take care of that problem in the event that Congress should specify the convention process for ratification?

Professor MENDELSON. Well, you might have the same problem if the Congress sent it to the legislature. They may refuse to consider the issue.

Professor KURLAND. But I take it that if the legislature refused to act that is in effect a negative vote, whereas the failure to call a convention would preclude the possibility of either an affirmative or a negative vote.

The argument has been made that a Presidential veto is not relevant to a proposition by the Congress for amending the Constitution because there is a requirement for a two-thirds vote in both Houses in any event. But this is to suggest, I take it, that a Presidential veto could not, in any way, effect a change in a vote of the legislature. I think that we have agreed that that is not a practical approach.

Professor MENDELSON. Yes, I think so.

Professor KURLAND. So that, dispensing with the Presidential veto with regard to the congressional action does suggest a precedent for eliminating the Presidential veto with regard to the convention.

Professor MENDELSON. Yes.

Professor KURLAND. Let me turn to a fairly broad question now.

Suppose that the requisite number of States suggested a general constitutional convention. None of us sitting in this room apparently cares for the prospect of a general overhaul of the Constitution of the United States. And I agree with you that the history of article V suggests what the convention was expected to do, that it was to clear up specific defects in the existing Constitution. I will put a hypothetical question to you. Suppose that two-thirds of the State legislatures were dissatisfied with the Constitution as a whole. Could they, by a broad resolution asking for a general constitutional convention, satisfy the requirements of article V?

Professor MENDELSON. I suppose that they could, really. And it is exactly for that reason that I would want to emphasize the manner in which the national convention would operate, by two-thirds vote on a per capita, that is, population basis and by popularly elected State conventions. This would certainly be the ultimate guard against that kind of thing.

Professor KURLAND. Let me turn to something then that we were talking about before. The proportion of the vote required. It has been suggested that instead of a concurrent resolution we require two-thirds vote of the Congress to call the convention or to approve the action of the convention. Does not this, in effect, limit the method of amendment to the first process contained in article V—that is, amendments proposed by Congress?

Professor MENDELSON. It certainly is approaching that.

Professor KURLAND. Is not this the legislative history of article V in broad delineation? It started with the Virginia plan, that Congress should have no role whatsoever in the amending process. The second stage was a suggestion that the Congress should have the only role in the amending process. And the typical 1787 answer to the problem was that parallel roles be created so that the Congress could propose corrections of those evils that the States were involved in, and the States could suggest corrections where they thought that the National Government was unduly using its powers. Am I correct in that?

Professor MENDELSON. Yes, that is my understanding.

Professor KURLAND. So that what we have in terms of the 1787 convention is what, maybe, we do not like; but in terms of what article V seems to contain, the suggestion is that there were to be two roads to constitutional amendments, each one parallel with the other. Does it not suggest that?

Professor MENDELSON. Well, going back to your response to me, you said that if the President does have a veto that will automatically make a difference in how the Congress votes. Now, I am suggesting that if the States do propose an amendment, that in itself would affect the congressional attitude. The 16th and 17th amendments, as I understand it, in fact, both were instigated in Congress as the result of State petitions. The Congress used the other vehicle for amendment, but it acted, in large part, in response to the State petitions.

Professor KURLAND. But you do not suggest that this is the only way?

Professor MENDELSON. No, no.

Professor KURLAND. I have no more questions, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you very much, Professor Mendelson.

Professor MENDELSON. I thank you.

Senator ERVIN. You have made a very interesting presentation. I think that your statements have been very valuable to all of us.

Our next witness is Prof. Alexander M. Bickel.

Professor Bickel is Chancellor Kent professor of law and legal history at Yale University. He received his B.S. degree from the City College of New York in 1947, and his LL.B. degree from Harvard University in 1949.

He served as law clerk to both Mr. Justice Frankfurter, U.S. Supreme Court, in 1952–53, and to Chief Judge Calvert Magruder, U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, 1949–50.

Prior to going to Yale in 1956, he was special assistant to the director of the policy planning staff of the Department of State, and served that Department as a law officer in Frankfurt, Germany. He also was a member of the European Defense Community observer delegation to Paris in 1952–53.

He is the author of "The Unpublished Opinions of Mr. Justice "Brandeis—the Supreme Court at Work" (1957); "The Least Dangerous Branch—the Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics" (1962); and "Politics and the Warren Court" (1965).

Professor Bickel has just recently consented to become a consultant to the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, and will give as much time to the subcommittee's studies as his busy schedule will permit. We feel that we are most fortunate to have Professor Bickel as a consultant and to have him here to testify today.

STATEMENT OF ALEXANDER M. BICKEL, CHANCELLOR KENT PROFESSOR OF LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY, YALE UNIVERSITY

Professor BICKEL. Thank you, Senator.

I think, in all candor, it is necessary to concede that in some measure one's attitude toward ease or difficulty of constitutional amendment is decisive at many points in the consideration of S. 2307. A lot of the provisions make sense if one wishes the amendment process to be easy, but seem undesirable if one's inclination is toward a more difficult process. And I ought to make it clear that on the whole, within permissible limits established by article V, my inclination is toward a difficult amending process.

I ran across a statement the other day which I will quote for you, if I may, which I think is as sound an expression of a fundamental and timeless constitutional conservatism as I know of, and I quote:

> Occasionally, there is agitation for amending the Constitution * * *. The Constitution is not cast in a small mold where matters are treated in a particular way. On the contrary, it is couched in a general language * * *. The idea that the Constitution must be amended and treated as if it were a rubber ball so that each succeeding child may play with it according to varying inclinations is not admissible from any angle. What we need is to have the Constitution better understood * * *.

I agree with that statement.

It was made by the late Mr. Justice Van Devanter shortly after he retired from the Court, addressing, I think it was, the Colorado Bar Association in September 1937, and I agree with the sentiment expressed in it.

The amendments that were being proposed in his day were, if I may be permitted the loose usage, generally of a liberal cast. I think I would have favored most of them on the merits, and still not have favored initiating the amending process. Most of the amendments now being proposed are generally seen, in the same loose usage, as having a more conservative coloration. It so happens that on the merits I think I would favor one or two of them, particularly one or two of the proposal on the reapportionment issue, and yet I would rather take my chances in arriving at a more satisfactory result through the judicial process—which has not heard the last of that issue; there is a census every 10 years, and we remain a nation of nomads, so that apportionment is a problem that recurs every decade—I would rather take my chances through judicial processes than open a Pandora's box of constitutional amendments.

I fear that with constitutions, as has happened in many of our States, familiarity of amendment will breed a species of contempt.

Having unveiled for the subcommittee my general attitude, the presuppositions with which I started, let me now come to some more concrete issues.

I have absolutely no doubt that Congress has authority to legislate on the process of amendment by convention and to settle every point not actually settled by article V of the Constitution itself. Obviously, the 50 State legislatures cannot do it. The constitutional convention cannot do it; it must first be brought into being. All that is left, therefore, is the Congress. And, in any event, with respect to all issues not specifically settled or relegated for decision elsewhere by the Constitution, Congress has the residual power to legislate.

I do not think that article V envisions only a convention charged with writing a wholly new Constitution.

On the other hand, I think that article V should be taken to mean that while the legislatures of two-thirds of the States may impose upon Congress the obligation to call a convention which shall consider amendments, they have no authority to require the Congress to call such a convention for the purpose of considering a particular amendment only. In this respect, I agree essentially with the view of my colleague Charles L. Black, Jr., as expressed in his article, "The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster," in volume 72 of the Yale Law Journal, 1963. Somewhere between the general constitutional convention, on the one hand, which many justly fear, and, on the other hand, the convention restricted to the consideration of one amendment only—somewhere in between these two extremes is a middle ground which I think a wise bill should seek to occupy.

Now, for a moment, may I review some of the considerations that argue against the single-amendment, restricted convention?

Article V authorizes the Congress to propose "amendments," in the plural, and then authorizes two-thirds of the States to call a convention "for proposing amendments," again in the plural. I do not wish to make too much of the language, but it is suggestive. Plainly, Congress, under this language, may, at any time, propose one or seven or 17 amendments. By the same token, a fair reading of the language would seem to indicate that the other body authorized by article V to propose amendments—and that other body is the convention convened by the States, not the States—that other body, the convention, is also free to propose one or seven or 17 amendments.

Nothing, as I read it, in the 85th Federalist is to the contrary. Hamilton, it seems to me, there addresses himself to two objections that were made to the proposed Constitution. One was that it would be impossible to change, because, in order to change it, it would have to be entirely rewritten, by as laborious and difficult a process as the framers had just experienced in Philadelphia. To this Hamilton answered that amendments to the Constitution might be brought forward singly, as plainly they might, by Congress and possibly by a convention. The second objection was that the National Government, that is, Congress, would generally be disinclined to offer amendments. And to this, Hamilton answered that there is another route available; namely, by convention called at the behest of the States. This was not subject to that objection. I do not read him as arguing that conventions are to be restricted to proposing single amendments. I only read him as saying, with his customary eminently sound political sense, that single amendments will be more easy to bring forward.

That is so, surely, and that brings me to a point of substance which it seems to me ought to guide us through the uncertainties of language and of history.

On principle, it appears to me that the point is that no constitutional changes should go forward to ratification without having first undergone examination and debate in a national forum, whether it be Congress or a convention. The nature and scope of the debate and examination, in such a national forum, must not be predetermined by the separate decisions of the States. Quite clearly, therefore, the States should have no authority to require Congress to submit a given text of a proposed constitutional amendment to a convention to be voted up or down.

Equally clearly, the States may not require Congress to submit a single narrow subject, demanding action one way or the other on it alone. For it is surely a basic fact of politics in all its forms, that consideration and debate of a political subject can be full and real only if there is opportunity for compromise and give and take. Such opportunity requires that the decisionmaking body have authority to consider more than a single, closely defined subject, so that concessions from one side on one matter can be matched by concessions from another on a perhaps seemingly discrete matter, to the end that a final package acceptable to all may emerge. That was how the original Constitutional Convention itself worked. Any other conditions threaten either breakdown or rigid ideological decisions. He, moreover, who has the power to frame an issue and isolate it for decision will often have the power, in consequence, to predetermine the decision. If, then, the State legislatures could restrict a convention to consideration of a single, narrow subject only, they might be in a position effectively to insure that a given result was reached. The validity of this observation may be verified in States in which the Governor has power to prescribe the only subject or subjects to be considered in special sessions of the legislature called by him. These are sessions that tend to be controlled by the Governor. The consequence, if this were allowed, would be that, in some measure, a constitutional change would go forward to ratification which had not received full or even meaningful consideration and debate in any national forum, but had, in some measure, been predetermined in the separate legislative forums of the States; and that, in turn, it seems to me, would be a situation plainly contrary to the purpose which informs article V.

Coming to the specific provisions of the bill, first, section 3(b): I see no reason for explicitly and absolutely disabling Congress from reviewing any and all possible procedures adopted by State legislatures in calling for constitutional conventions. In general, of course, State legislatures ought to be masters of their own procedures, but no one can now foresee all possible wrinkles of the procedural problem, and I should think it much better to say nothing about the power of Congress to review State legislative procedures in respect to the calling of a constitutional convention. The situation then would be that Congress would presumably retain some power, rarely to be exercised, and indeterminate and unforeseeable in nature.

I would specifically require that resolutions calling for a constitutional convention be submitted to Governors for approval or veto in accordance with procedures followed in other legislative matters in the State concerned. There is nothing that particularly qualifies legislatures as such to call for constitutional conventions. What we are in search of here is the will of the people of the State, and that will ought to be expressed, in this instance above all perhaps, in a way in which, under the constitution of a State, it is normally expressed on matters of importance, since, presumably, it is the judgment of the State that that is how the will of the people is best and most reliably expressed.

When article V refers to legislatures, we know, because there are other references in the text couched in the same terms, that that may mean to include the Governor in the process or it may mean to exclude him. So article V tells us neither one way or the other, and the Congress it seems to me is free to make a choice, and I am urging the choice that the Governor be included. I urge that, because it seems to me that we are in search here ultimately of the will of the people of the States concerned.

Senator ERVIN. I think that my State is the only State in the Union in which the Governor does not have the power to veto.

Professor BICKEL. At all?

Senator ERVIN. At all.

Professor BICKEL. I did not know that. Have you been getting along all right?

Senator ERVIN. Yes, we believe so; we have been getting along pretty well.

Professor BICKEL. I did not know that your Governor has no veto power whatever.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, we have a complete separation of the legislative and executive branches.

Professor BICKEL. That is a theory of separation, all right.

It might be well, it seems to me, to say something at this point in the bill on a question that is much mooted; namely, whether a legislature that has been held to be malapportioned, or that is under a decree requiring it to reapportion and, perhaps, qualifying its powers in some measure before reapportionment, can validly pass a resolution for a constitutional convention. I should think, in general, it could, unless an outstanding decree forbids it either specifically or by mentioning some analogous forbidden function, but I should think it would be well to be clear on this point. And I think that Congress has the power to settle the point.

Coming to section 5(a), I think that the 6-year period provided in that section is too long. The Constitution contemplates a concurrent desire on the part of the legislatures of a sufficient number of States, and such a concurrent desire can scarcely be said to exist or to reflect in each State the will of the people if too long a period of time has passed from the date of enactment of the first resolution to the date of enactment of the last. True enough, legislatures are free to change their minds, but the passage of a repealer is a different and more difficult political act than the defeat, starting fresh, of a resolution calling for a constitutional convention. The fact, therefore, that a legislature has not repealed a resolution calling for a convention is an insufficient indication that the State in question, after the passage of as long as 6 years, still favors the calling of a convention. The life of a single Congress may be too short a time limit to impose, but anything over 4 years seems to me too long.

Section 6(a) seems to me too restrictive as it involves Congress. It is a matter of drafting really, but I should suppose that Congress must retain the power to determine not only whether the recitation of the clerk that the requisite number of applications have been made is, in fact, correct, but also the power to determine from time to time, on the basis of considerations that cannot all now be foreseeable, whether all of the applications are valid.

Coming to section 7(a), I should think that the national interest, the welfare of the entire Nation, is too closely affected to permit the States to decide, each for itself, how the delegates to a national constitutional convention shall be elected, or, indeed, appointed. I should think it would be wise to provide that all delegates must be elected by the same constituency that elects the States' representatives in Congress, and to provide further that a certain proportion of the delegates may be elected from districts and that, depending on the size of the State, no fewer than a certain number and no more than a third shall be elected at large. Only thus, it seems to me, can all the interests in a State, the particular and the general, find adequate representation. I say nothing for the moment about the problem of apportioning districts for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, except to remark that it seems to me that Congress ought to have the power to say, at least in an extreme case, that the districts from which a State elected its delegates were invidiously malapportioned, and that an election of delegates is therefore invalid.

I have made it clear at the beginning that I think that the provision in section 8(a), that each delegate must agree not to change or alter any part of the Constitution which has not been specified in the resolution calling for the convention is quite wrong.

Section 9(a). I see no reason for following the precedent of the original convention, by giving each State one vote. The framers, in adopting such a procedure for themselves, worked against the background of the Congress of the Confederation in which the States voted as equal units, and they feared to break this precedent, because if they had tried to do so, they might have made the very constitutional convention impossible. But perhaps their chief purpose in framing the new Constitution was, for the future, to break away from this stultifying precedent. Why should we now return to it, after nearly 200 years in which we have been accustomed in our national institutions—except on the one occasion when the House elected a President—to a different, and, of course, more democratic method? Besides, whatever the convention does is to be ratified by the States, and, in ratifying, the States do vote as units, Alaska being equal to New York. Is that not sufficient?

One final point, if I may, Mr. Chairman: I see no reason why any and all actions to be taken by Congress pursuant to this bill with respect to constitutional conventions should be anything but subject, in the ordinary way, to Presidential approval under article I, section 7, clause 3, of the Constitution In this respect, I also agree with the view of my colleague Charles L. Black, Jr., expressed in the article cited above. I know there is a precedent to the contrary, but I think it is a restricted precedent, not on all fours, and not a terribly strong one anyway, and not, to me, a persuasive one. I think that the situation we are in on the present issue is a different one, so that the precedent does not bind even those who think it a strong one.

Thank you.

Senator ERVIN. How should the President participate?

Professor BICKEL. Well, I think that he ought to be given his normal veto power which in practice would mean that, instead of standing aloof from the whole process, he would be engaged in it from the beginning. I do not think that one should conceive of a veto power as coming into play merely at the point of the exercise of the veto, when a two-thirds vote is needed to override it. To give the President his veto power is to give him the power to engage in the entire process.

The way our Government is organized now, it represents the Nation through the Executive, and the same Nation, but sliced into different constituencies, through the Congress. That is how we achieve full representation of all interests. I believe that on almost all matters, except housekeeping matters for Congress, the President and the Congress should act together, and should do so from the beginning.

Of course, when the President's veto power is maintained, that follows. For that reason, I would suggest it remain here, and in this instance, as in normal legislation, the actual exercise of the veto would be the rare exception.

Senator ERVIN. The President, would have no voice in what the convention proposes, the proposals that the convention makes, would he? You would leave entirely to the convention the provisions which the convention would submit as desirable?

Professor BICKEL. I am bound as to that. If I had an article V to write, I would provide that the constitutional convention when convened, would vote on all matters by majority, subject to Presidential veto, which can be overridden by two-thirds vote. But, as it is, article V is binding. It does not bind me when it comes to the authority of the Congress to act, and its relationship with the President.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, your position is that, where the words of the fifth amendment are plain, the Congress can do nothing which is inconsistent with those words. It may only provide the machinery where there are not sufficient words to control the action of the Congress.

Professor BICKEL. Precisely so, although article V, like some of the rest of the Constitution, is couched in majestic language that came from the 18th century and leaves a lot of room for manueuver in the present day.

Senator ERVIN. You undoubtedly heard what Professor Mendelson stated, the suggestion that the bill should require more than a majority vote in the State legislatures. Do you have any observations on that point?

Professor BICKEL. I do not agree with him on that. It seems to me that it is a matter of degree. You are edging away from Congress exercising a necessary authority with regard to these things, to regulate the procedures—edging from that toward an action by Congress that hobbles the legislative action of the States. And, of course, the purpose of this alternate amendment route was to give the States an opportunity.

I would think that for the Congress to state, say, that the State legislatures have to be unanimous, I think we would agree, is unconstitutional. The object would be to prevent the States from ever acting. Edging in that direction, I would have trouble with a two-thirds proviso. I have no such problem with the Congress setting forth the procedures, making choices where no man can say that doing it this way makes it obviously much more difficult than doing it the other way. There is the choice of procedures, and there are other more restrictive things.

Senator ERVIN. With regard to that suggestion of Dr. Mendelson, it is my opinion that the history of article V shows that the Founding Fathers did not intend constitutional amendments to be made lightly. They wanted them to be made very seriously. And so they included the requirement for a two-thirds vote of the Congress, by the one method; but it seems to me that they merely intended that two-thirds of the States must petition for a convention, without attempting to say what vote is required within the State legislatures—they left that to the general principle of law that, in the absence of specific provisions to the contrary, the majority can act.

Professor BICKEL. I agree. That is the essential symmetry of the article.

Senator ERVIN. Undoubtedly, the Constitution makes it possible to amend the Constitution piecemeal or generally where Congress itself takes the initiative. It is not quite so clear with respect to the States. But it is conceivable that the States might get so dissatisfied with the Constitution that they might want to have a general overhaul. And your suggestion, as I understand it, is that there is nothing in the fifth article which prevents the States from calling a convention for a general overhaul of the Constitution?

Professor BICKEL. Indeed, there is nothing to prevent that.

To the contrary, as I was trying to say, it seems to me that there is a hint, at least, in the language, and a much stronger suggestion on principle, tending in the other direction. It seems to me we cannot take a provision that says that the States may convene a convention on proposed amendments, and rewrite it to mean that the States may propose an amendment which a convention will ratify, and then send back to the States to ratify again. If the States can say, we want daylight saving time to start on May 21, and send that to the convention, and the convention has to vote that up or down, then it is the States that are proposing the amendment and the convention that is ratifying it, except that there is yet an additional ratifying process. That is not what article V foresees.

Senator ERVIN. Assuming that two-thirds of the States call for a convention for the purpose of submitting amendments, do you think that it is mandatory or discretionary with Congress whether it would then call the convention?

Professor BICKEL. I am afraid that, despite my horror at the prospect and despite my willingness at every juncture where the possibility is available to make that prospect improbable, to make things difficult, I am afraid that I cannot see how the Congress, faced with 34 valid petitions, can do anything but act.

Senator ERVIN. And it seems to me that the Founding Fathers inserted this alternative method in the Constitution in order to allow the people to amend the Constitution where Congress refused to submit the amendment, and if the Congress has any discretionary power to refuse to call the convention, that interpretation would permit the Congress to circumvent the very provisions of the Constitution that were put in there for use where the Congress refused to act.

Professor BICKEL. That is quite true. That would destroy the symmetry of article V by collapsing its two halves into one. The only possibility of amendment would be the first one.

Senator ERVIN. Do you not believe that if the States petitioned to call a convention to vote on a specific question, for example, the question of reapportionment or daylight saving time, and the Congress refused to call the convention, do you not believe that would have a tendency to tempt the States to demand a general convention?

Professor BICKEL. It might very well tempt some to do so. But the Congress is sworn to support the Constitution. And it is one thing for the Congress to alter the Constitution by refusing to do what is its duty under article V. It is quite another thing for the Congress, when asked to present a single amendment to a convention, to say: "We do not believe that article V intended that; therefore, we will not do that, because it is not constitutional in our view for us to do that." When there is no other guidance and, perhaps, even when there is other guidance, Congress must make its own judgment on a constitutional question.

Senator ERVIN. The Constitution provides that every Member of Congress shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution. And article V provides that, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, Congress shall propose amendments to the Constitution or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, Congress shall call a convention for proposing amendments.

Senator TYDINGS. What you are saying is that, in view of the specific terms of article V, you cannot call a Federal constitutional convention for the purpose of passing on one proposal?

Professor BICKEL. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. But Congress has only the right to call a constitutional convention for any and all proposals under article V. You say, therefore, on the specific reapportionment petition, for example, that there would be a constitutional argument saying that you could not call a convention and limit it to that?

Professor BICKEL. I entirely agree with that. I have only one qualification, that is, I would hope that there is a middle ground.

Senator TYDINGS. That is the purpose of this bill.

Professor BICKEL. I think there is enough by way of suggestion in the history of article V that would enable the States to call a convention to deal with a fairly general subject, or to call a convention to deal with several subjects. And the Congress, I think, should respond to such a request.

What I object to is so hobbling the convention that it is transformed from a deliberative constitutional convention into a ratifying body that votes up or down something that has been put before it. I object to that on the basis of the language of the amendment, because the amendment speaks of a convention for proposing amendments. It is not the States that are to propose amendments. It is the convention. And I object to it, secondly, on the grounds of principle that I tried to make clear.

Senator ERVIN. The bill tries to find a middle ground on this point. I think that article V clearly contemplates that the convention is to be as deliberative a body as possible, and not a body to count noses in favor of some specific proposition submitted to it by somebody else. I think the convention has the authority to propose amendments, not the States.

Professor BICKEL. On the question that Senator Tydings is raising, if I may say so, you can look to the 32 resolutions that are now before the Congress, and some are couched in quite specific language, some name the subject. The question, even under this bill as it stands, and certainly under this bill as I would loosen the language a little bit on that point, would be whether some of the legislatures proposing specific language knew what they were doing, and the issue before the Congress would be whether those resolutions are invalid and should be returned to those legislatures for them to act again, with a proper understanding of what the Constitution demands of them.

Senator TYDINGS. Some other legislature may have passed them under the assumption that the convention should be limited to that narrow issue.

Professor BICKEL. Exactly. One cannot presume that a legislature that was willing to put to a convention a specific bit of language would also have been willing to convene a convention that would be free to act on other matters as well.

Senator ERVIN. They do call for a convention—all of these resolutions call for a convention. Some of them suggest a specific phraseology for the proposed amendment; but the authority they are acting under is the authority to call the convention, which would then have the authority to propose the amendments.

Professor BICKEL. It seems to me, obviously, that there cannot be anything more important than the constitutive process. I was saying that if a legislature, acting under what turns out was a misapprehension of its constitutional function—acting under such a misapprehension, asked the Congress to call a convention to vote up or down a specific text of an amendment—such a legislature cannot be assumed to have also been willing to convene a convention which was not bound to this specific language or to that single narrow subject. And it seems to me that the least that one could do, having regard for the solemnity of the process, and in order to obtain the kind of deliberation that would be desirable, would be for the Congress to make clear its view of what power lodges in the legislatures under article V, and to return their resolutions for reconsideration to those legislatures which have acted under a misapprehension.

Senator ERVIN. On the other hand, they would have a subsequent opportunity to ratify or reject the action of the convention.

Professor BICKEL. To be sure; yes.

Senator ERVIN. Of course, the original Constitution was written by a body of men which was not called together primarily to write a Constitution—it was authorized merely to make amendments to the Articles of Confederation.

Professor BICKEL. I think it is the common understanding that what went on in Philadelphia in that hot summer was partly a legal proceeding, and partly a small revolution, at least in the minds of men.

Mr. WOODARD. Professor Bickel, in the present situation, a number of States apparently are trying to obtain a convention to propose an amendment on the reapportionment problem. Under your reasoning, how could these legislatures properly petition the Congress to achieve that result? What language would you suggest that they use, to be constitutional and within the meaning of article V?

Professor BICKEL. I would suggest that what we are seeking is a middle ground. Suppose that we wrote into this bill language that says that, as Congress views the Constitution, what the legislatures are permitted to do under article V is either to petition for a general constitutional convention or one on specific general subjects, or some specific general aspects of the Constitution. How would I interpret that? Let us say that the Legislature of Nebraska forwards a resolution asking for a convention to consider the problem of representation in the electoral process of the United States—something as broad as that. Suppose there are other similar resolutions, but couched in different language, in different phrases, from other legislatures. So long as I thought that they were all in the same ball park, I would put the 34 of them together and convene the convention.

It is a more dangerous thing, perhaps, than the single shot convention. I venture to think that it is, also, a more difficult one, that the legislatures would hesitate when required to open up broad subjects—that a lot more public opinion would come into play.

We must face the danger, which also exists, of a general convention. I do not see how we can avoid it. We do have article V.

Mr. WOODARD. But, under your view, the convention could be confined at least to the fairly limited ball park you have described.

Professor BICKEL. I would hope so. It does seem historically that there was an intention to give the States the opportunity to convene a convention which did not have to rewrite the entire Constitution.

Mr. WOODARD. You do not believe, then, that under article V a State legislature can properly petition the Congress to call a constitutional convention to consider the advisability of proposing a constitutional amendment to reserve to the States the power, if they wish to do so, to apportion one house of their legislature on some basis other than population.

Professor BICKEL. I think that would transform the convention for proposing amendments into a convention to ratify amendments. I do not think that is the meaning, or at least I do not think that ought to be the meaning of article V.

Senator ERVIN. I just wonder if your interpretation does not defeat the purpose of article V. Dr. Mendelson said the States ought to be able to submit a specific proposal, or at least a specific subject. On the other hand, you say they may suggest only a general subject. Do you not think that we ought to look at the substance of the State's request, rather than dwelling on the form of the resolution?

In other words, it seems to me that if the States petition the Congress for a constitutional convention to consider the reapportionment question, they are not hobbling the convention. The convention may propose any one of several amendments to accomplish that purpose. The substance of that request is for a constitutional convention free to consider many proposals rather than to say that we do or do not want this specific amendment.

Professor BICKEL. I agree with that. I am not urging a "picky" attitude. As things now stand, I do not think that the Congress would be free to call a convention in response to a lot of these resolutions, because it is quite plain on the face of them that the legislatures that passed them acted under a misapprehension of what their constitutional function was, and that is not a matter of form. We are all searching for a real concurrent desire on the part of the country to have a convention. We have to search for that in earnest, without, on the one hand, being picky about language, but without, on the other hand, taking a resolution as saying one thing when on its face it says another because it was passed under a misapprehension.

Senator ERVIN. I am accused of being a conservative, but I have taken a rather liberal attitude toward this problem. How can we require the State legislatures similarly to construe constitutional provisions when the Supreme Court has not been able to agree on them? In other words, how can we get 34 States of the Union to agree on the meaning of a constitutional provision when the Supreme Court divides 5 to 4 regularly on constitutional construction?

Professor BICKEL. Once Congress settles the issue, the legislatures will know what to do. That is why I am in favor of having a bill now. I think it is time to have a bill on this subject. Things are relatively calm. I think it is a good idea for the Congress to make clear to the States what they can or cannot do under article V.

Senator TYDINGS. On the point of the validity of the petitions, how far would Congress be able to look into the validity or the legality of the petitions from the States, for example, as to the question of reapportionment. You heard my question directed to Professor Mendelson, specifically, where a legislature was under a court order to reapportion—should the Congress take into account that order regarding the validity of a legislature's petition to call the constitutional convention, to legalize the illegal reapportioning?

Professor BICKEL. There are two aspects to that, as I see it. One is the power of the Congress—the function of the Congress, and the other is one's preference about what the policy of the Congress should be. I am clear that the Congress may not say, "We do not like this kind of an amendment—we do not think that this sort of subject ought to be put to a constitutional convention." The Congress cannot vote on the basis of its own view on the merits of what the State wants. That is one thing I am quite clear on.

I am clear, secondly, that if the States act unconstitutionally in some manner, for example, 34 petitions ask the Congress that the Constitution be amended so as to deprive the smaller States of equal representation in the Senate, article V says you cannot do that. So the Congress can say, "That is unconstitutional. We will not do that." It can go into the merits to that extent.

Third, it can go into the merits to the extent necessary to examine any other constitutional issue which is not plain on the face of the Constitution, but where a constitutional judgment is required. That is what I was referring to a moment ago. You need broad resolutions or narrow resolutions, what have you.

Fourth, I think that the Congress is free under article V to inquire, for example, whether the legislature was corrupt. When, for example, Senators were elected by State legislatures, the Congress could inquire whether a legislature that elected a Senator was corrupt. I do not see why Congress cannot inquire into that in this instance. I think it should. The rule that the Court should not do so is based on different considerations, it seems to me, and should not bind the Congress. Congress is free to ask, it seems to me, whether the legislature is properly constituted, whether the legislature is, indeed, malapportioned.

Senator ERVIN. If I may interrupt at that point, I would like to point out that under article I, the Congress has specific constitutional authority to inquire into the qualifications of its Members. It has no such specific authority under article V. Moreover, how do you deal with the principle that a de facto State officer can act routinely with complete validity?

Professor BICKEL. I was coming to that. We are speaking here of a matter of policy. This is in the broad procedural area that is subject to congressional consideration. On the merits, however, it seems to me quite clear that a legislature, malapportioned or not—even a legislature under a decree of reapportionment—is a de facto legislature and is authorized to do everything that a de facto legislature can do; and I see no reason why it does not include this.

Now, if the decree under which that legislature operates specifically forbids it to do this, or forbids it to do something quite analogous to this—as, for example, to call a State constitutional convention—then I think that we are in a difficult area. My inclination would be to say that the Congress ought to abide by the decree in that case. I do not think the Congress is entirely bound by it. Not every provision of an equity decree is in itself a constitutional limitation. The district court, when it says a legislature may not submit a constitutional amendment to the people, is not construing the Federal Constitution. It is acting as an equity court. It is exercising the equity power, which is subject to regulation by the Congress.

Even though there is a decree outstanding saying that a legislature may not call a constitutional convention, nevertheless, the Congress could constitutionally accept the resolution from that legislature. I think, however, that the Congress would be well advised in such an event to abide by the decree of the Court.

Senator ERVIN. As I understand the law of de facto officers, if a person is elected to a public office and assumes to exercise that public office, his acts are binding up to the time that the law under which he was elected is adjudged to be unconstitutional. And I think that the Congress, in the adoption of any contrary theory, would entirely destroy article V, and destroy the right of the States to initiate amendments under article V. I have read some of the malapportionment cases many times and I do not know exactly what they mean yet. I think it would be most improper to apply those vague cases retroactively to invalidate the acts of de facto State legislatures. It would produce utter chaos.

Professor BICKEL. I agree that the Congress would be well advised to accept the actions of de facto State legislatures. But I think also that in general the Congress ought to abide by the decree of the Federal courts.

Senator ERVIN. Under the de facto situation, if there had been a definite adjudication of malapportionment by the Court, the questions then become more difficult to resolve.

Professor BICKEL. Right. But I think it is a matter for the Congress. The Congress is authorized to accept a resolution from a malapportioned legislature, if it wishes to do so, and it is authorized to refuse to accept it.

Senator ERVIN. I am personally very reluctant to allow Congress too much room for judgment in this matter, because I have found that when we go into court, we have certain principles of law that must be allowed to prevail; but individual Congressmen are like Josh Billings says, "They do not kick according to any rule whatsoever, except their own political notions." If given any leeway, some Members might use it to vote against any convention if they did not approve, on the merits, of the constitutional amendment likely to be proposed.

Professor KURLAND. As I understand this discussion, you say that the Congress has the power to specify the purposes for calling a convention, but once Congress has called it, there is no way of restricting it. Is that right?

Professor BICKEL. Well, the Congress is free to make rules for their convenience.

Professor KURLAND. Let us turn, if you will, to the question of the form of the application. I do not think there was any quarrel about the proposition that the application cannot specify the amendments to be adopted. I think that everybody is in agreement on that. Are you suggesting that if you get 34 applications to deal with a reapportionment problem in those general terms, that the convention is free to do something else?

Professor BICKEL. I have great difficulty here. I would hope that by one of those practical compromises that do not stand very well in the eyes of some, that one might find an acceptable interpretation of article V to the effect that the convention can be resricted to dealing with broad, fairly broad, subjects, so that it can have enough room for maneuver and can truly study and consider constitutional amendments, rather than be a body merely ratifying proposals made by the States. And I would hope that one could so phrase it—the reapportionment problem as to pass that kind of test.

What would happen if a convention went wild—if it attached amendments on certain other things? Does Congress then have the constitutional power to submit for ratification only the amendment dealing with the reapportionment problem, and not submit any other amendments the convention has produced? I do not know what I would say to that. I have difficulty in answering whether Congress has the right to restrict.

Professor KURLAND. It has been stated that the application must state the subject, but that the subject matter is not binding on the convention—that the statement of the subject matter is irrelevant.

Professor BICKEL. I am certainly not saying that the application must state the subject matter. The application must call for a convention. If it is going to be a general convention, all 34 applications must call for that. If it is to be a more narrow convention, all 34 applications must call for that. There, the problem is to know what a State legislature has wanted, and whether 34 legislatures are all asking for the same thing.

Professor KURLAND. My problem is this: Suppose that the States do call for a convention to deal with the reapportionment problem, with language broad enough to satisfy you of the possibility of give and take on that subject; is it your proposition that the convention is not limited to that subject?

Professor BICKEL. My position is that I do not know what I would say. If the convention then went wild and did something else, and the thing came back to the Congress, and the Congress is the only body left to make the decision, you would be up against deciding whether it may decline to submit one or more of the amendments that the convention adopted, and I do not know what I would think at that point.

Professor KURLAND. In terms of limiting the convention to the subject matter that was called for by the States?

Professor BICKEL. I think that if I were voting on a bill, I would somehow force myself to vote that way, but I would have some question.

Professor KURLAND. You would not say that the bill, as drawn, necessarily requires the States to specify the language of the amendment they desire?

Professor BICKEL. Well, I would think that this bill, as now drawn, goes much farther—it limits the subject, or at least, it is quite restrictive on the subject matter. It attempts to restrict the convention within the terms of the State resolutions which it is willing to accept quite narrowly drawn. It then purports to put limitations upon the convention to abide by those resolutions. As I tried to explain, the nearer you get to a convention that is narrowly restricted to voting something up or down, the greater are my difficulties. What I am trying to do is to edge away from that. I do not know precisely where my edging leads to—where precisely my difficulty disappears.

Professor KURLAND. The difficulty in drafting legislation is that you have to find that edging point, I assume.

Professor BICKEL. Yes.

Professor KURLAND. If 13 states suggested the need for an amendment with reference to the Escobedo matter, and 13 others called for amendment on the separation of state and church, and whatever additional number would be necessary asked for an amendment as to reapportionment, would the Congress be required to call a convention?

Professor BICKEL. Certainly not. These States have not asked for the same thing.

Professor KURLAND. My difficulty with your logic is that the convention could not be limited by subject matter, yet you are saying that conventions cannot be called except in terms of specified subject matter set forth in the State applications.

Professor BICKEL. Oh, no; no. The convention can be called generally. The problem——

Professor KURLAND. The applications must state some subject matter, because they will be added up according to subject matter; is that right?

Professor BICKEL. Or no subject matter at all.

Professor KURLAND. A general convention?

Professor BICKEL. Yes.

Professor KURLAND. But what are the reasons for considering the specification of subject matter in the applications, if the convention is not going to be bound by that in its activities? Does it have to stay within that subject matter?

Professor BICKEL. I tried to explain my difficulty with binding the convention. We are now taking the assumption that at some point you can bind the convention.

For example, take a resolution calling for consideration of the Miranda case and the Escobedo case. The resolution, we will suppose, says that the problem of Federal control over criminal processes of the States should be reexamined, and we will assume that the language is broad enough, although I am not saying it is; but, let us say it is broad enough. We are now taking the assumption that a convention can be bound that way. If I take that assumption, then the next question, quite a separate one, is what kind of convention have a sufficient number of States called for. If I had 13 States that called for a criminal process convention and 13 States that called for a first amendment convention, and another 13 States, or whatever number, that called for something else again, then I would not have 34 State legislatures that wanted the same kind of convention. Then I have to go back to the legislatures and find out whether the ones that wanted the Escobedo convention also want a first amendment convention, and so forth, and if not, we do not have the 34 States.

Professor KURLAND. Let us get back to the background of the problem initiated in congressional talk on the subject. Some applications deal with reapportionment of State legislatures. Is that a broad enough coverage?

Professor BICKEL. I would think not.

Professor KURLAND. Why not?

Professor BICKEL. Because the legislature that now asks for reconsideration of the reapportionment process is—construing that language realistically—intelligently asking for reconsideration of the reapportionment cases, and that seems to me a very narrow thing which is no different from proposing some language to be voted up or down. It is not enough. A convention has to have a substantial subject within which there is room to maneuver.

Professor KURLAND. That is not the way the amendment process works in terms of congressional initiation.

Professor BICKEL. Congress is a national forum.

Professor KURLAND. We are going to provide a national forum—the convention will provide a national forum for discussion of particular issues, as the bill is drafted. There is no dispute that the language contained in the State applications cannot confine the convention to that language. What we are talking about is the question of whether the convention will be limited to a particular subject matter. If you look at the 11th amendment, the income tax amendment, the right of women to vote, they were discussed in a national forum. And now the parallel that I suggested—the parallel that I think is intended by Article V—is that we do have to provide the States with a means for initiating a forum for dealing with a particular problem.

Professor BICKEL. I am not arguing that a convention may not propose single amendments. I am arguing that the States cannot hobble it to acting on a single proposition only. Never, in the course of action on the amendment you mentioned, was the Congress restricted to doing that, and that alone. It was never restricted in what constitutional amendments it proposed, and it was never restricted in anything else. If you read through the record of the 39th Congress, as I once did, you see the Congress acting as a full-blooded total legislative body. Everything comes in. They deal with the problems of the 14th amendment. Somebody suggests a constitutional amendment. Somebody brings in some other problem. Somebody brings in the problem of citizenship. How did the 14th amendment evolve? It started with the single issue of Negro rights: What are we to do with these Negroes in the South? And then it developed into what we now see, because a full-bodied, full-blooded legislative process was at work. That seems to me to be real consideration in a national forum.

If the Congress had been hobbled by being restricted to dealing with some single aspect of the Negro problem only, Lord knows what we would have got, if anything at all.

Professor KURLAND. We are often in disagreement on constitutional history. In terms of the subject matter for appropriate discussion in the national convention, the authority is not given to the national convention, but to the States. There is nothing restricting the number of applications or the number of subjects that may be contained in the applications; is that correct?

Professor BICKEL. Article V says that it takes two-thirds of the States to call a constitutional convention for proposing amendments, keeping it clear on the one hand that it is the convention, not the States, that proposes amendments, and keeping it clear, on the other hand, that it is up to Congress to determine whether two-thirds of the States have concurred at a given moment in a desire for a constitutional change. If the resolutions go in every direction, you cannot tell whether they concur in the same idea.

Senator ERVIN. In my opinion, if one-third of the 34 States wanted to amend the first amendment, and one-third of them wanted to amend the fifth amendment, and the other one-third wanted to amend the sixth amendment, and they asked the Congress to call the convention, setting forth no specific amendments, Congress would be obligated to call a convention.

Professor BICKEL. If I get, over a period of 3 or 4 years, 13 resolutions on Miranda and another 13 on the latest desegregation case in Georgia, or wherever it is, feeling as I do that this thing ought not to be lightly done, I would say that it is jumping to a conclusion that each of these States would be willing to have that convention, even though they knew that it would deal not only with Miranda but with the desegregation problem, and vice versa and also with other problems. And if I were the Congress at that point, I would send the resolutions back to each of these legislatures and ask, "Do you want this? This is the kind of convention you are dealing with. Do you still want it?

And I would venture to say that some legislatures that might have wanted a convention about Miranda would say, "If this is going to be a convention on segregation, too, better call it off. We will concede on Miranda, if they will concede on desegregation." I read article V to mean that this momentous occasion could only occur after the most careful deliberations and only when everybody knew exactly what they were doing, and I would say that in our hypothetical situation, it could not be said that everybody knew exactly what they were doing. There would be a chance that we could slide into a constitutional convention sort of by happenstance, without everybody being quite aware of what was going on. The thing being as momentous as it was, I think that good policy would be for the Congress to take pause and to ask everybody, "Is this what you mean?"

Senator ERVIN. I think that the States have the option of calling for the convention or not. What amendments will be proposed will be up to the convention. The States can refuse to ratify the proposals, the States have that protection.

Professor BICKEL. I agree. In my judgment, I am making sure that the States really want it, and want it, really, with full knowledge of what it is all about. After that, the convention is theirs.

Professor KURLAND. Let me ask just one more question. If the emphasis is on a consensus of the States, and their desires, putting aside the problem that has been brought out by the Senator, do you have any question at all that the State legislatures, on reapportionment, have no problem with the consensus question? Aren't they all talking about the same problem, but suggesting different solutions?

Professor BICKEL. They are talking about the same problem, which is very narrow. They want a convention to overrule the one-man, one-vote decision.

Professor KURLAND. As I understood the recent colloquy between you and Senator Ervin, you were both in agreement that the States cannot limit the subject matter that is presented at all?

Professor BICKEL. Yes.

Professor KURLAND. If I may quote the Senator, the convention is to be the master of the subject matter, rather than the State legislatures.

Professor BICKEL. Well, yes; but I do not think that Senator Ervin suggested that the convention would only be a runaway general constitutional convention.

Professor KURLAND. That is the difficulty with the logic of your position; it requires a consensus among the State applications as to the appropriate subject matter for calling the convention, but then it recognizes that the convention is not restricted to that subject matter.

Professor BICKEL. You do not allow me a retreat in some measure from the position that only a general convention is permissible. I think that somewhere there is a middle ground; namely, a convention restricted—and hopefully we can make that restriction stick—to some fairly general subject, a subject, for example, of the size of that of the 14th amendment. Once you agree with that, the Senator and I were discussing a very different point; namely, the problem that the Congress would have in determining that a legislature that called for a convention knew what it was calling for, and that all called for the same thing and were aware of what everybody else was calling for.

If you received a resolution which asked for something to be overruled, and 4 years later received another resolution that asked for something else to be overruled, then these two legislatures cannot be assumed to have been addressing themselves to the same kind of a convention. You cannot assume that they both knew that a convention when convened could do both things, and we cannot assume that if they knew that, they would still want a convention.

Professor KURLAND. Let me put this question, which bothers me: Why are you saying, in the terms of the reapportionment matter, that it was too narrow? Because they are talking only of the reapportionment of State legislatures? Are you demanding a general reconsideration of the processes for electing representative officers?

Professor BICKEL. I think that the only way that that problem could be broadened sufficiently, so as to bring it to the point where I would hope that you could restrict the convention to dealing with it only, would be to consider that it was as broad as the problem of the allocation of political power in organs of government, State and Federal, or the entire electoral process.

Short of that, it seems to me that you are too near to the other end of the spectrum; namely, the end where you are putting a one-shot question to a convention and demanding that it answer "Yes," or "No." That is the end of the spectrum that we are obliged to try to avoid. The other end of the spectrum, the general constitutional convention, we are obliged, by policy considerations that I think we all share, to avoid, because it is a horror to contemplate. We are trying to find a middle ground.

59-609 O - 80 - 68

I know that it is getting late. But let me back up a little, because I think that I may have created some confusion. I am talking about two separate problems.

One is the problem, the congressional problem, of making sure that the States have all done together a thing that is within their power and have not acted under a misapprehension of what it is that they can do or what it was that other States want to do. Congress must make sure that there really is a concurrence of two-thirds of the States to call a convention permissible under article V.

That is one problem; really a problem of the relationship between the Congress and the State legislatures.

The other, quite separate problem, which the Congress has to resolve, and we hope that this bill resolves, is what is the constitutional power of the States under article V? What kind of convention can be called? What kind may not be called? We have two ends of a spectrum. At one end is the narrow, one-shot convention, which I think is improper. At the other end is the general constitutional convention which the States may call, but we hope they will not. We hope that we can find some middle ground, which is broad enough to avoid one end of the spectrum, and not so broad as to arouse all of the fears at the other end.

We decide, let us say, with respect to apportionment, that the subject is broad enough; or we decide that any convention that is being asked to deal with three separate issues has enough business there to be able to act like a deliberative political body. Well, having decided that, we than go back and look at the resolutions we have, and we now face the other quite separate problem—what did these legislatures ask for? Did they understand what they were asking for in the resolutions that are now before the Congress, for example? As to those, the answer would be "No" in many cases.

I think that if we have three disparate kinds of requests, the answer to all of these ought to be "No," because we cannot assume that a legislature that is asking for a particular kind of convention knew that the convention would also deal with other things. You just could not assume that.

I think the value of this bill, the value of your initiative, Senator Ervin, is that the Congress has now an opportunity to make clear to the States what it is that their powers are under article V. Then, if a bill is passed, when the States act, we will be able to make much sounder assumptions about their understanding of what it was that they were doing, and anyway, solve this problem of the relationship between the Congress and the State legislatures.

But there are two separate problems. And I think that I caused some confusion earlier this morning by speaking of them as interwoven, without making that distinction.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you very much. It has been an interesting discussion. Very informative. This is an intriguing question, particularly because we have so few precedents by which to chart our course.

I will ask the reporter to insert at this point in the record the reported decision in the case of Fortson v. Toombs, 379 U.S. 621 (1965). I think the case has been misconstrued by some who have referred to it in these hearings.

(The document above referred to follows:)

(379 U.S. 621)

BEN W. FORTSON, JR., AS SECRETARY OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA, ET AL., APPELLANTS, v.

HENRY J. TOOMBS ET AL.

No. 300.—Argued Nov. 18, 19, 1964. Decided Jan. 18, 1965.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia.

E. Freeman Leverett, Atlanta, Ga., for appellants.

Francis Shackelford, Atlanta, Ga., for appellees.

Per curiam

The District Court, having held that the Georgia Legislature was malapportioned (Toombs v. Fortson, 205 F. Supp. 248), enjoined appellants, election officials, "from placing on the ballot to be used in the General Election to be held on November 3, 1964, or at any subsequent election until the General Assembly is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards, the question whether a constitutional amendment purporting to amend the present state constitution by substituting an entirely new constitution therefore shall be adopted."* Appellants challenge that provision on the merits. Appellees, while defending it on the merits, suggest alternatively that the issue has become moot.

The situation has changed somewhat since the 1964 election, as both the Senate and the House have new members, and appellees, for whose benefit the challenged provision was added, say it is now highly speculative as to what the 1965 legislature will do and suggest the paragraph in question be vacated as moot.

We vacate this part of the decree and remand to the District Court, to whom we give a wide range in moulding a decree (United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U.S. 173, 185, 65 S. Ct. 254, 260, 89 L. Ed. 160; International Boxing Club of New York v. United States, 358 U.S. 242, 253, 79 S. Ct. 245, 251, 3 L. Ed. 2d 270), for reconsideration of the desirability and need for the on-going injunction in light of the results of the 1964 election and the representations of appellees. It is so ordered.

Decree vacated in part and case remanded.

Mr. Justice Clark, concurring.

"Although I would prefer to declare this litigation moot and vacate the judgment below, I am joining the opinion and judgment of the Court solely on the basis that it is not reaching the merits regarding the propriety of the order fashioned by the three-judge District Court. In my view, the Court is simply vacating and remanding in order to give the District Court an opportunity to reconsider its order in light of the change in circumstances which has occurred since judgment was entered."

Mr. Justice Harlan, with whom Mr. Justice Stewart joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

"This is the first time that the Court, after plenary briefing and argument, has been called on to consider the propriety of interim arrangements prescribed by a district court pending the effectuation of its decision requiring reapportionment of a branch of a state legislature.

"After holding that the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Georgia was unconstitutionally composed, a decision which is not called into question on this appeal, the three-judge District Court ordered: (1) that the election in 1964 of the legislature to serve in 1965 (the 1965 legislature) might

---

*The entire paragraph reads as follows:

"The defendants are hereby enjoined from placing on the ballot to be used in the General Election to be held on November 3, 1964, or at any subsequent election until the General Assembly is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards, the question whether a constitutional amendment purporting to amend the present state constitution by substituting an entirely new constitution therefor shall be adopted; provided, however, nothing in this order shall prevent the submission of amendments to the Constitution of the State of Georgia which are separate as to subject matter, in accordance with Article XIII, Section I, Article 1, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia, 1945. (See Hammond v. Clarke, 136 Ga. 313 [71 S.E. 479, 38 L.R.A.,N.S., 77] for a discussion by the Georgia Supreme Court of what constitutes separate amendments.) Nor shall anything in this order prevent the calling by the General Assembly of a 'convention of the people to revise, amend, or change the constitution' if the representation 'in the convention is based on population as near as practicable' with the members being elected by the people (see Article XIII, Section I, Article 2). Constitution of the State of Georgia, 1945."

proceed under the State's existing methods of apportionment; (2) that until a properly apportioned legislature took office no other legislature could propose to the electorate, except through the calling of a convention of popularly elected delegates, the adoption of a new state constitution; and (3) that (except for reapportionment legislation) the 1965 House should be 'limited,' notwithstanding any provision of state law, 'to the enactment of such legislation as shall properly come before the said Legislature during the regular 1965 45-day session' provided by Georgia law. After the State's appeal, was filed in this Court this last provision was in effect abrogated by the District Court with the approval of the parties."[1]

This appeal draws in question the validity of items (2) and (3) above, similarly numbered in the District Court's order. It is contended by the appellees, however, that both these issues have now become moot.

I.

The Court's disposition of this case, of course, involves a holding that at least as to item (2) the case is not moot. For, contrary to what my Brother GOLDBERG says in his dissenting opinion (post, pp. 636–638) and as my Brother CLARK seems to recognize (ante), the Court does not remand the case to the District Court for a determination on the issue of mootness, but only to decide whether any injunctive relief is now appropriate in light of what has transpired since such relief was first granted.

While it may be that the Court's implicit holding on mootness does not reach beyond the portion of the District Court's decree that goes to the submission of a proposed new state constitution (par. (2) of the decree). I would also hold not moot the pronouncement of that decree placing limitations on the functioning of the 1965 State Legislature (original par. (3) of the decree).

As to paragraph (2), it is sufficient to say that the injunction has continuing effect, not only with respect to the 1965 legislature, but also as to any successor legislature if it is found to be "malapportioned." Any alleged "speculativeness" as to whether a new state constitution may be proposed to the electorate before a "constitutional" legislature comes into being, goes no to mootness but only to the question whether the District Court (assuming is power in the premises, see below) should have granted any relief on this score.[2] So far as original paragraph (3) of the decree is concerned (limiting the activities of the 1965 legislature) it was not rendered moot by the District Court's modification after the case had been taken for review by this Court. Analytically, the situation is tantamount to a confession of error at this level, at most relieving this Court of the necessity of making a definitive exposition of its views on this subject (compare the suggestion of my Brother GOLDBERG, post, pp. 638–639), but not depriving the question of the attribute of justiciability. Cf. Young v. United States, 315 U.S. 257, 258–259.

The position adopted by the Court is that although the case is not moot, at least as to the "constitution-submission" issue, decision of that question could be avoided if the District Court chose to vacate that part of its injuncion in light of the change in circumstance which has made the need for such relief speculative: the Court therefore remands the case to afford the District Court that opportunity. I do not think that such avoidance as to either question is called for in this case. The Court's reapportionment decisions have pressed district courts onto an uncharted and highly sensitive field of federal-state relations with little more to guide them than the elusive "one-person-one-vote" aphorism. District courts, as courts of first instance, must necessarily fashion remedies for themselves, and the passage of time and the variety of remedies chosen by them may ultimately help this Court to wend its way through this treacherous constitutional terrain. But it is essential that the lower courts at least be launched in the right general direction and not allowed to range so far afield as to ham-string state legislatures and deprive States of effective legislative government. Paragraphs (2) and (3) of the injunction involved in this case do range that far afield. Absent disapproval by this Court, the decision below, rendered by a distinguished panel, cannot fail to furnish a strong practical, if not legal, precedent for other district courts. I do not think this should be allowed to happen.

[1] The full text of the District Court's order and the amendment of item 3 are printed in the dissenting opinion of MR. JUSTICE GOLDBERG as Appendices A and B, respectively. Post, pp. 639, 641.

[2] See Labor Board v. Pennsylvania Greyhound Lines, Inc., 303 U.S. 261, 271; Southern Pac. Terminal Co. v. Interstate Commerce Comm'n, 219 U.S. 498, 514–515.

II.

I would hold the decree below improvident in both the aspects before us.

As to the provision forbidding submission to the electorate of a legislatively proposed new state constitution, I can find nothing in the Fourteenth Amendment, elsewhere in the Constitution, or in any decision of this Court which requires a State to initiate complete or partial constitutional change only by some method in which every voice in the voting population is given an opportunity to express itself. Can there be the slightest constitutional doubt that a State may lodge the power to initiate constitutional changes in any select body it pleases, such as a committee of the legislature, a group of constitutional lawyers, or even a "malapportioned" legislature—particularly one whose composition was considered, prior to this Court's reapportionment pronouncements of June 15, 1964, to be entirely and solely a matter of state concern? [3]

Similarly as to the provision of the lower court's original decree limiting the functions of the 1965 legislature, it seems scarcely open to serious doubt that so long as the federal courts allow this Georgia Legislature to sit, it must be regarded as the de facto legislature of the State, possessing the full panoply of legislative powers accorded by Georgia law.

I think that the State of Georgia is entitled to a clear-cut pronouncement from this Court that nothing in its reapportionment decisions contemplated such unheard-of federal court intrusion into state political affairs as the decree before us evinces. Beyond that, for this Court to temporize with important interstitial matters of this kind, deeply affecting the even course of federal-state relations, can only serve to aggravate the confusion which last June's reapportionment cases have left in their wake.[4]

I would modify the decree below by striking therefrom paragraph (2) and approving the substitute for original paragraph (3) as framed by the District Court.

Mr. JUSTICE GOLDBERG, dissenting.

I dissent from the Court's disposition of this case. By remanding, the Court is, in effect, asking the District Court to decide whether this appeal, which is pending before us and with respect to which we noted probable jurisdiction and heard argument, should be dismissed as moot due to events occurring after the appeal had been perfected in this Court. Mootness, in my view, is a question which, under these circumstances, this Court has the responsibility to decide. The facts relevant to this issue are undisputed. The District Court is in no better position to resolve the issue of mootness than we. No legitimate purpose is served by asking it to determine a question which is properly before us and which a long line of unbroken precedents would have us decide.[1] Moreover, if the case is moot, as I believe, there is no need for a further time-consuming hearing below and a possible future second appeal to this Court. Surely both the District Court and this Court have enough to do without this Court creating unnecessary work for both. I would simply vacate the injunction order and dismiss this appeal as moot.

That this case is in fact moot becomes apparent from a consideration of the history of this litigation.

The appeal calls into question the validity of portions of an injunction issued by a three-judge District Court involving the reapportionment of the Georgia House of Representatives. The District Court entered an order on June 30, 1964, holding that the Georgia House of Representatives was unconstitutionally apportioned under the Federal Constitution and declaring invalid state constitutional and statutory apportionment provisions. The court's order allowed the November 1964 elections for the House of Representatives to take place under

---

[3] If, as I believe, a State is not federally restricted in its choice of means for initiating constitutional change, the question of whether, under Georgia law, the proposed new Georgia Constitution should have been initiated by a popularly elected convention instead of by the legislature is not a matter for federal cognizance.

[4] To hold as I think the Court should on these issues would not in any way impair the federal courts' ability to prevent frustration of their reapportionment decrees.

[1] See, e.g., San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 116 U.S. 138; United States v. Alaska S. S. Co., 253 U.S. 113; Bus Employees v. Wisconsin Board, 340 U.S. 416; Oil Workers Unions v. Missouri, 361 U.S. 363, and the numerous cases cited at 368, n. 7 therein.

the then-existing constitutional and statutory provisions, but it required that new elections be held in 1965 in time for a properly apportioned legislature to take office no later than "the second Monday in January, 1966." Paragraph (2) of the court's order further enjoined appellants, state election officials, from placing on the November 1964 election ballot a new state constitution proposed by the then-existing unconstitutionally apportioned legislature, and it also enjoined the submission of a wholly new constitution to the voters by the legislature "at any subsequent election until the [legislature] . . . is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards." Paragraph (3) of the District Court's order limited the power of the 1965 legislature to enacting "such legislation as shall properly come before [it] . . . during the regular 1965 45-day session." Appellants' motion for a stay of the District Court's order was denied by MR. JUSTICE BLACK on July 6, 1964.[2]

Appellants appealed to this Court. In their jurisdictional statement they did not contest the basic holding that the House of Representatives was unconstitutionally apportioned. They challenged the validity of portions of paragraphs (2) and (3) of the District Court's order.[3] Appellees moved to affirm on the ground that the order was in all respects valid. We noted probable jurisdiction, 379 U.S. 809, and granted appellants' motion to advance the cause for oral argument.

Shortly prior to argument, appellees moved that this appeal be dismissed because events supervening since the entry of the District Court's order rendered this appeal moot. Appellants opposed this motion. Consideration of appellees' motion to dismiss was postponed until the hearing.

Upon argument of this case it appeared without dispute that, since the entry of the order below, the parties had agreed upon modifications which eliminated appellants' objections to paragraph (3) of the District Court's order and that the District Court, on November 3, 1964, had entered an order embodying the agreed-upon modifications.[4] It likewise was agreed at the argument that the new constitution proposed by the legislature was not submitted to the voters in November 1964 and that under Georgia law it has lapsed and cannot be resubmitted. Thus the only issue remaining in this case is the validity of that portion of the District Court's order which prevents the newly elected or any future unconstitutionally apportioned legislature from proposing and submitting to the voters a wholly new state constitution.

Appellees in their motion to dismiss and at the argument stated that although they originally sought affirmance of the portion of the District Court's order now under consideration, they no longer do so because, due to supervening events, it is now "highly speculative" as to whether the newly elected legislatture[5] or any future unconstitutionally apportioned legislature will ever submit another wholly new constitution to the voters. Appellees state that consequently they no longer need the protection given them by the District Court's prohibition of such a submission, and that "this appeal presents only an abstract, hypothetical controversy in which the 'lively conflict between antagonistic demands, actively pressed, which make resolution of the controverted issue a practical necessity' is lacking."[6] They suggest that for these reasons controversy over this portion of the order has now become moot and urge that the appeal be dismissed and that this portion of the order be vacated. Appellants resist the motion

---

[2] The District Court's order of June 30, 1964, is printed as Appendix A.

[3] Appellants interpreted paragraph (3) of the order to mean that the 1965 legislature could only deal with what was legally considered to be "legislation." They feared that the legislature would be unable to conduct investigations, vote pardons, or perform other similar duties. They also were concerned that under the terms of the District Court's order the 1965 legislature might be unable to meet in special session if such a session proved necessary.

[4] This order is printed here as Appendix B.

[5] Appellees pointed out at the argument that in the new legislatutre which will meet in 1965, 20 of the 54 Senators and 67 of the 205 Representatives will have been newly elected at the November 1964 election.

[6] In their Motion to Dismiss at p. 5, appellees state:

"Before the proposed new constitution can be placed on the ballot for ratification in any future general election, it must again be submitted to the General Assembly and passed by an affirmative two-thirds vote of both houses. This Court has repeatedly admonished that 'constitutional questions are not to be dealt with abstractly.' The mere possibility that a similar constitutional proposal may be passed by the General Assembly at some future time is an insufficient basis for invoking the awesome responsibility of constitutional adjudication by this Court. Without further legislative action, this appeal presents only an abstract, hypothetical controversy in which the 'lively conflict between antagonistic demands, actively pressed, which make resolution of the controverted issue a practical necessity' is lacking." (Citations omitted.)

to dismiss on grounds of mootness. They contend that this Court should reach the merits and reverse the basic determination of the District Court that under the Federal Constitution a malaportioned legislature is without power to propose a new constitution to the voters.[7] They argue that a decision on the merits is called for because the issuance of the prior opinion of the District Court granting the injunction will have a precedential and deterrent effect, notwithstanding the vacation of the injunction order.

As this history shows, the appeal, in its present posture, is plainly moot under long-established principles and precedents. The question appellants would have us decide is one of grave import involving the power under the Federal Constitution of a malapportioned legislature to submit a state constitution to a popular vote—a question which necessarily involves a consideration of the varying systems used in different States for proposing constitutional amendments. The doctrine of "mootness," like the related doctrine of "ripeness," has been evolved by this Court so that it will not have to pass upon this type of question except upon the urging of one who is harmed or is currently threatened with harm caused by the allegedly unconstitutional action. See Stearns v. Wood, 236 U.S. 75. While this Court cannot and will not avoid its constitutional responsibility to decide apportionment cases arising when justiciable problems are presented and pressed for decision by litigants claiming an abridgment of their constitutional rights,[8] it should not, in apportionment cases, as in other areas, decide moot issues, volunteer judgments or seek out questions which have ceased to be ripe for adjudication[9] and are no longer presented in the context of an actual pending controversy.[10] I strongly, albeit respectfully, disagree with my Brother HARLAN'S intimation, grounded on his basic view that the Court should never have entered into reapportionment matters at all, that now that it has been decided that such issues are justiciable, this Court should be more willing in this "sensitive" area than in other areas, to give opinions of an advisory nature, so that "the lower courts [will] at least be launched in the right general direction and not allowed to range so far afield." Opinion of MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, ante, p. 625. Moreover, it has already been demonstrated, as was easily predictable from the history of other constitutional issues of a "sensitive" nature, that there is in this area ample opportunity to guide the lower courts within the traditional bounds of concrete, live controversies, actively pressed by real adverse parties. See Fortson v. Dorsey, ante, p. 433; Scranton v. Drew, ante, p. 40.

This Court does not pass upon constitutional questions unless it is necessary to do so to preserve the rights of the parties. See Liverpool, N.Y. & P.S.S. Co. v. Commissioners, 113 U.S. 33, 39; Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U.S. 288, 341, 345–348 (concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis); Coffman v. Breeze Corps., 323 U.S. 316, 325. Nor does it decide abstract questions merely because of the effect such judgments might have upon future actions in similar circumstances. Little v. Bowers, 134 U.S. 547, 558; California v. San Pablo & T. R. Co., 149 U.S. 308, 314; Kimball v. Kimball, 174 U.S. 158. In the present case we are told by the proponents of the injunction that there exists only a remote possibility that the newly elected legislature or some future one will submit a wholly new constitution to the voters. Cf: Bus Employees v. Missouri, 374 U.S. 74, 78. If the question of the legislature's power to propose such a constitution were being submitted to a court as an initial matter, the speculativeness of the legislature's future conduct would undoubtedly render this issue unripe for adjudication. See New Jersey v. Sargent, 269 U.S. 328; Ariona v. California, 283 U.S. 423; Electric Bond & Share Co. v. SEC, 303 U.S. 419, 443; Alabama State Federation of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U.S. 450, 471; United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612. The speculativeness, which has arisen in this case since the order was entered, makes the issue in this appeal, in my view, similarly unsuitable for adjudication. United States v. Alaska S.S. Co., 253 U.S. 113.

The appellees themselves, in whose favor the judgment below has run, do not assert the need for the protection of the District Court's order against future

---

[7] This portion of the District Court's order also rested upon a determination that under Georgia law the legislature could not submit to the voters a wholly new constitution in the form of an amendment to the existing constitution. Questions are raised as to the correctness of this determination and the propriety of the District Court's having made it. See Louisiana Power & Light Co. v. Thibodaux, 360 U.S. 25. In light of my resolution of this case, I would not reach these questions.

[8] See Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186; Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, and companion cases.

[9] See United States v. Alaska S. S. Co., 253 U.S. 113.

[10] See San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 116 U.S. 138; Mills v. Green, 159 U.S. 651; Jones v. Montague, 194 U.S. 147; Harris v. Battle, 348 U.S. 803.

submission of a new constitution; they deem the possibility of such a submission too remote. They therefore are agreeable to the vacation of the injunction which they sought and obtained. This obviously will relieve appellants of any burden which the injunction imposes upon them. It also will remove any precedential effect of the opinion of the District Court on this issue. United States v. Munsingwear, 340 U.S. 36, 39–41; Note, 103 U. Pa. L. Rev. 772, 794. Appellants would have the injunction reversed on the merits as improperly issued rather than vacated as appellees desire. Although there is this difference as to the proper disposition of this case, the net result is that no party wishes the injunction to remain in effect. In the present posture of the case, the conclusion which emerges is that although the parties differ with respect to the abstract legal question of the validity of the order, there is no longer present here that "real, earnest and vital controversy between individuals" which assures us that a cause is in a "real sense adversary."[11] Chicago & Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U.S. 339, 345; United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 302, 305. Appellants' argument that the order, though vacated, will have an inhibitory effect upon the legislature's activity is but a way of saying that appellants desire to know for their own purposes, as a guide to future conduct, what this Court would have said on the merits, had the issue remained embedded in a real and substantial controversy. Without such a controversy currently existing between those who appear as adverse parties, this Court should not give an opinion upon questions of law "which a party desires to know for . . . his own purposes."[12] Cleveland v. Chamberlain, 1 Black 419, 426; see Woodpaper Co. v. Heft, 8 Wall. 333; South Spring Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Amador Medean Gold Mining Co., 145 U.S. 300.

The situation in this case is a far cry from that presented in Bus Employees v. Missouri, supra, where an "existing unresolved dispute" made the likelihood of repetition of the conduct in question much greater than the mere "speculative" possibility existing here. Id., at 78. Nor do other decisions[13] relied upon by appellants support their position. In none of these cases was there any assertion, as here, by the party for whose benefit the injunction order was issued, that it had become highly problematical that the conduct which underlay the controversy would be repeated. In Federal Trade Comm'n v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 304 U.S. 257; J. I. Case Co. v. Labor Board, 321 U.S. 332, relied upon by appellants, the party supporting the validity of the order called into question contended that the order was necessary and its validity should be reviewed. In the instant case whether or not the legislature, while still malapportioned, will submit a wholly new constitution to the voters is highly problematical, and the parties supporting the correctness of the injunction themselves feel that it should be vacated since they see no threat that the legislature will repeat conduct they consider illegal. The base is, therefore, much more closely analogous to United States v. Alaska S. S. Co., supra, in which this Court refused to review the question of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to require carriers to comply with an ICC order perscribing certain bills of lading. A three-judge District Court had found the Commission had no such power and had enjoined the Commission from ever issuing such an order. Before argument in this Court, however, it became clear that provisions in the bills of lading prescribed by the Commission conflicted with provisions contained in new legislation passed by Congress after the Dstrict Court's decision. Since the particular bills of lading prescribed would have to be withdrawn by the Commission in view of this legislation, and because of the uncertainty as to whether the Commission would prescribe new bills of lading or the form they would take, this Court refused to decide the issue of whether the Commission had the power to prescribe any bills of lading. The Court stated, "However convenient it might be to have decided the question of the power of the Commission to require the carriers to comply with an order prescribing bills of lading, this court 'is not empowered to decide

---

[11] Since their motion to dismiss was reserved until the hearing, appellees have conscientiously argued the merits. However, we cannot ignore the basic fact that they are not pressing for a decision on the merits since they believe they no longer need the protection of the injunction.

[12] That appellants' argument does not show that this Court should reach the merits here is further demonstrated by the fact that any inhibitory effect produced by the District Court's injunction at issue here would also be produced by that part of the injunction prohibiting submission of a new constitution only at the 1964 election. Yet appellants concede, as they must, that this Court would not now review that part of the injunction concerned only with the November 1964 election which has already taken place since the new constitution was not submitted to the voters in November 1964 and under Georgia law it has lapsed and cannot be resubmitted. See Mills v. Green, supra.

[13] Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. ICC, 219 U.S. 498; Federal Trade Comm'n v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 304 U.S. 257; J. I. Case Co. v. Labor Board, 321 U.S. 332.

moot questions or abstract propositions, or to declare, for the government of future cases, principles or rules of law which cannot affect the result as to the thing in issue in the case before it.'" 253 U.S., at 116. The Court reversed the District Court's order and remanded the case to the District Court "with directions to dismiss the petition . . . without prejudice to the right of the complainants to assail in the future any order of the Commission prescribing bills of lading after the enactement of the new legislation." Id., at 116–117. Unless Alaska S. S. Co., is to be overruled or ignored, the Court should act similarly here.

Finally, I find the Court's disposition of this case mystifying, for I cannot understand what the District Court is to do upon remand. Since the District Court's order has been vacated, no injunction will be in effect. Presumably the District Court will have before it two groups of parties, one group urging that no order be entered and the other group claiming that no order is necessary because the likelihood of the legislature's resubmitting a new constitution is too remote. It is inconceivable to me that the District Court would be warranted in reinstating its injunction under the present facts. Of course, if circumstances changed, and there was a real, rather than a tenuous threat of further legislative action of the type originally complained of, the District Court, which has retained jurisdiction of this case, would be empowered to entertain an application for appropriate injunctive relief. However, I cannot understand the logic of the Court's decision in asking the District Court now to make a determination which, under the present circumstances, is rightfully our responsibility.

My Brother HARLAN suggests that, contrary to my view, "the Court does not remand the case to the District Court for a determination on the issue of mootness, but only to decide whether any injunctive relief is now appropriate in light of what has transpired since such relief was first granted." Ante, p. 624. But with due respect, I suggest that his interpretation of the Court's opinion is not justified by what the Court says or does. The Court explicitly sets forth appellees' contention that the case is moot because "[t]he situation has changed somewhat since the 1964 election," and "it is now highly speculative as to what the 1965 legislature will do" (ante, p. 622), and then the Court remands the case for reconsideration of the desirability of and need for the injunction in terms of the contentions raised by appellees, i.e., "in light of the results of the 1964 election and the representations of appellees." Ibid. This surely must mean that the Court is asking the District Court to consider appellees' contentions that the case is moot. Further, I might better understand my Brother HARLAN's general distinction between determining whether a case is moot and whether an injunction is still appropriate if there were some issue in this case other than the power of the District Court to issue the injunction. But the only issue presented for decision on the merits is whether the District Court validly issued this type of injunction; thus to decide here whether, in light of the changed circumstances and the parties' present desires, continuance of the injunction is still appropriate is to decide the identical question as to whether, in light of these changed circumstances and the present contentions of the parties, the case has become moot. Determining the issue of mootness and deciding "whether any injunctive relief is now appropriate in light of what has transpired since such relief was first granted," both come down to the same thing—the question is whether, at this juncture, as appellees contend, "this appeal presents only an abstract, hypothetical controversy in which the 'lively conflict between antagonistic demands, actively pressed, which make resolution of the controverted issue a practical necessity' is lacking." The question is one for this Court to decide.

I believe that the proper result in this case would be to sustain the appellees' motion to dismiss for mootness and to enter an order vacating paragraph (2) of the District Court's order of June 30, 1964, prohibiting submission of a wholly new constitution to the voters by the legislature at the 1964 election or "at any subsequent election until [it] . . . is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards." Thus this portion of the slate would be wiped clean. United States v. Munsingwear, supra, without any necessity for further proceedings below to try the mootness issue. In view of the parties' stipulations before this Court that they accept the modifications entered by the District Court on November 3, 1964, I believe that the Court is correct in not passing upon the validity of paragraph (3) of the District Court's order of June 30, 1964—that portion of the order which appellants took as limiting the powers of the 1965 legislature. However, because of doubts expressed as to the jurisdiction of the District Court to enter its modified order while appeal is pending in this Court, see Schenipp v. School District, 184 F. Supp. 381 (D. C. E. D. Pa.), the Court ought also to vacate paragraph (3) of the June 30, 1964, order on the assumption that the District Court will re-enter its modified order of November 3, 1964, in accordance with the agreement of the parties.

The federal district courts have enough to do in deciding ripe reapportionment cases without our requiring them to decide stale ones.

APPENDIX A TO OPINION OF MR. JUSTICE GOLDBERG, DISSENTING

FINAL ORDER OF THE COURT OF JUNE 30, 1964

Revised Order

All parties having consented thereto, the order of the Court dated June 24, 1964, is hereby revised to read as follows:

It is now Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed as follows:

(1) Article III, Section III, Paragraph I (Code Section 2–1501) of the Constitution of Georgia of 1945, is hereby declared to be null, void and inoperative, as being in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Section 47–101 of the Code of Georgia, as amended, is hereby declared to be prospectively null, void and inoperative, as being in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, for elections to the House of Representatives after the General Election to be held in November of 1964.

(2) The defendants are hereby enjoined from placing on the ballot to be used in the General Election to be held on November 3, 1964, or at any subsequent election until the General Assembly is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards, the question whether a constitutional amendment purporting to amend the present state constitution by substituting an entirely new constitution therefor shall be adopted; provided, however, nothing in this order shall prevent the submission of amendments to the Constitution of the State of Georgia which are separate as to subject matter, in accordance with Article XIII, Section I, Article 1, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia, 1945. (See Hammond v. Clarke, 136 Ga. 313, for a discussion by the Georgia Supreme Court of what constitutes separate amendments). Nor shall anything in this order prevent the calling by the General Assembly of a "convention of the people to revise, amend or change the constitution" if the representation "in the convention is based on population as near as practicable" with the members being elected by the people (see Article XIII, Section I, Article 2). Constitution of the State of Georgia, 1945.

(3) The motion of the plaintiffs for further injunctive relief prior to the conduct of the party primaries or conventions and the General Election of November 3, 1964, is hereby denied at this time, provided, however, that notwithstanding anything in Article III, Section IV, Paragraph I (Code Section 2–1601) of the Constitution of Georgia of 1945 to the contrary, the service of the members of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia to be elected at the General Election in November, 1964, shall be limited to the enactment of such legislation as shall properly come before the said Legislature during the regular 1965 45-day session, as provided in the Georgia Constitution, including such legislation as may be necessary for the General Assembly to be reapportioned in accordance with constitutional requirements and as may be necessary to permit the holding of elections to the newly constituted General Assembly, said elections to be held at such times as may be necessary to permit the Members of such General Assembly to take office as soon as practicable, but in no event later than the second Monday in January, 1966.

APPENDIX B TO OPINION OF MR. JUSTICE GOLDBERG, DISSENTING

ORDER OF THE DISTRICT COURT OF NOVEMBER 3, 1964

Both parties agree that the motion for alternative relief should be granted. Therefore, paragraph 3 of the order of June 30, 1964, is hereby stricken and the following paragraph 3 is substituted in lieu thereof:

"(3) The motion of the plaintiffs for further injunctive relief prior to the conduct of the party primaries or conventions and the General Election of November 3, 1964, is hereby denied at this time, provided, however, that, notwithstanding anything in Article III, Section IV, Paragraph I (Code Section 2–1601) of the Constitution of Georgia of 1945 to the contrary, the service of the members of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia to be elected at the General Election in November, 1964, shall be limited to a term of one year's duration and provided further that the plaintiffs shall have the right to reapply to this Court for further relief should the General Assembly, which convenes in January, 1965, fail to enact, during the regular 1965 45-day session, as provided in the Georgia Constitution, such legislation as may be necessary for the General Assembly to be reapportioned in accordance with Constitutional requirements and as may be necessary to permit the holding of elections to the newly constituted General Assembly during the calendar year 1965, which elections are to be held at such time as may be necessary to permit the members of such newly constituted General Assembly to take office no later than the second Monday in January, 1966. To the extent that state statutory and constitutional provisions might otherwise conflict with such legislative reapportionment, they are hereby declared to be void and of no effect."

This 3rd day of November, 1964.

Senator ERVIN. The subcommittee will recess subject to the call of the Chair.

(Whereupon, at 1 p.m., the subcommittee adjourned, to reconvene at the call of the Chair.)

APPENDIX

THE FEDERALIST No. 43 [42] [1]

JAMES MADISON

January 23, 1788

To the People of the State of New York.

THE fourth class comprises the following miscellaneous powers.

1. A power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for a limited time, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right, to their respective writings and discoveries."

The utility of this power will scarcely be questioned. The copy right of authors has been solemnly adjudged in Great Britain to be a right at common law. The right to useful inventions, seems with equal reason to belong to the inventors. The public good fully coincides in both cases, with the claims of individuals. The States cannot separately make effectual provision for either of the cases, and most of them have anticipated the decision of this point, by laws passed at the instance of Congress.

2. "To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the States, in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards and other needful buildings."

The indispensible necessity of compleat authority at the seat of Government carries its own evidence with it. It is a power exercised by every Legislature of the Union, I might say of the world, by virtue of its general supremacy. Without it, not only the public authority might be insulted and its proceedings be interrupted, with impunity; but a dependence of the members of the general Government, on the State comprehending the seat of the Government for protection in the exercise of their duty, might bring on the national councils an imputation of awe or influence, equally dishonorable to the Government, and dissatisfactory to the other members of the confederacy. This consideration has the more weight as the gradual accumulation of public improvements at the stationary residence of the Government, would be both too great a public pledge to be left in the hands of a single State; and would create so many obstacles to a removal of the Government, as still further to abridge its necessary independence. The extent of this federal district is sufficiently circumscribed to satisfy every jealousy of an opposite nature. And as it is to be appropriated to this use with the consent of the State ceding it; as the State will no doubt provide in the compact for the rights, and the consent of the citizens inhabiting it; as the inhabitants will find sufficient inducements of interest to become willing parties to the cession; as they will have had their voice in the election of the Government which is to exercise authority over them; as a municipal Legislature for local purposes, derived from their own suffrages, will of course be allowed them; and as the authority of the Legislature of the State, and of the inhabitants of the ceded part of it, to concur in the cession, will be derived from the whole people of the State, in their adoption of the Constitution, every imaginable objection seems to be obviated.

The necessity of a like authority over forts, magazines &c. established by the general Government is not less evident. The public money expended on such places, and the public property deposited in them, require that they should be exempted from the authority of the particular State. Nor would it be proper for the places on which the security of the entire Union may depend, to be in any degree dependent on a particular member of it. All objections and scruples are here also obviated by requiring the concurrence of the States concerned, in every such establishment.

[1] From The Independent Journal, January 23, 1788. This essay appeared on January 25 in both The New-York Packet and The Daily Advertiser. It was numbered 43 in the McLean edition and 42 in the newspapers.

3. "To declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted."

As treason may be committed against the United States, the authority of the United States ought to be enabled to punish it. But as new-fangled and artificial treasons, have been the great engines, by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free Governments, have usually wrecked their alternate malignity on each other, the Convention have with great judgment opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger, by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it, and restraining the Congress, even in punishing it, from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author.

4. "To admit new States into the Union; but no new State, shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

In the articles of confederation no provision is found on this important subject. Canada was to be admitted of right on her joining in the measures of the United States; and the other colonies, by which were evidently meant, the other British colonies, at the discretion of nine States. The eventual establishment of new States, seems to have been overlooked by the compilers of that instrument. We have seen the inconvenience of this omission, and the assumption of power into which Congress have been led by it. With great propriety therefore has the new system supplied the defect. The general precaution that no new States shall be formed without the concurrence of the federal authority and that of the States concerned, is consonant to the principles which ought to govern such transactions. The particular precaution against the erection of new States, by the partition of a State without its consent, quiets the jealously of the larger States; as that of the smaller is quieted by a like precaution against a junction of States without their consent.

5. "To dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with a proviso that nothing in the Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

This is a power of very great importance, and required by considerations similar to those which shew the propriety of the former. The proviso annexed is proper in itself, and was probably rendered absolute necessary, by jealousies and questions concerning the Western territory, sufficiently known to the public.

6. "To guarantee to every state in the Union a Republican form of Government; to protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature; or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

In a confederacy founded on republican principles, and composed of republican members, the superintending government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a Union may be, the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other; and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into, should be substantially maintained. But a right implies a remedy: and where else could the remedy be deposited, than where it is deposited by the Constitution? Governments of dissimilar principles and forms have been found less adapated to a federal coalition of any sort, than those of a kindred nature. "As the confederate republic of Germany," says Montesquieu, "consists of free cities and petty states subject to different Princes, experience shews us that it is more imperfect than that of Holland and Switzerland." "Greece was undone" he added, "as soon as the King of Macedon obtained a seat among the Amphyctions." In the latter case, no doubt, the disproportionate force, as well as the monarchical form of the new confederate, had its share of influence on the events. It may possibly be asked what need there could be of such a precaution, and whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the state governments, without the concurrence of the states themselves. These questions admit of ready answers. If the interposition of the general government should not be needed, the provision for such an event will be a harmless superfluity only in the Constitution. But who can say what experiments may be produced by the caprice of particular states, by the ambition of enterprizing leaders, or by the intrigues and influences of foreign powers? To the second question it may be answered, that if the general government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no farther than to a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a pre-existing government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long therefore as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the states may chuse to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so, and to claim the federal guaranty for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is, that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican Constitutions; a restriction which it is presumed will hardly be considered as a grievance.

A protection against invasion is due from every society to the parts composing it. The latitude of the expression here used, seems to secure each state not only against foreign hostillty, but against ambitious or vindictive enterprise of its more powerful neighbours. The history both of ancient and modern confederacies, proves that the weaker members of the Union ought not to be insensible to the policy of this article.

Protection against domestic violence is added with equal propriety. It has been remarked[2] that even among the Swiss Cantons, which properly speaking are not under one government, provision is made for this object; and the history of that league informs us, that mutual aid is frequently claimed and afforded; and as well by the most democratic, as the other Cantons. A recent and well known event among ourselves, has warned us to be prepared for emergencies of a like nature.[3]

At first view it might seem not to square with the republican theory, to suppose either that a majority have not the right, or that a minority will have the force to subvert a government; and consequently that the federal interposition can never be required but when it would be improper. But theoretic reasoning in this, as in most other cases, must be qualified by the lessons of practice. Why may not illicit combinations for purposes of violence be formed as well by a majority of a State, especially a small State, as by a majority of a county or a district of the same State; and if the authority of the State ought in the latter case to protect the local magistracy, ought not the federal authority in the former to support the State authority? Besides, there are certain parts of the State Constitutions which are so interwoven with the Federal Constitution, that a violent blow cannot be given to the one without communicating the wound to the other. Insurrections in a State will rarely induce a federal interposition, unless the number concerned in them, bear some proportion to the friends of government. It will be much better that the violence in such cases should be repressed by the Superintending power, than that the majority should be left to maintain their cause by a bloody and obstinate contest. The existence of a right to interpose will generally prevent the necessity of exerting it.

Is it true that force and right are necessarily on the same side in republican governments? May not the minor party possess such a superiority of pecuniary resources, of military talents and experience, or of secret succours from foreign powers, as will render it superior also in an appeal to the sword? May not a more compact and advantageous position turn the scale on the same side against a superior number so situated as to be less capable of a prompt and collected exertion of its strength? Nothing can be more chimerical than to imagine that in a trial of actual force, victory may be calculated by the rules which prevail in a census of the inhabitants, or which determine the event of an election! May it not happen in fine that the minority of CITIZENS may become a majority of PERSONS, by the accession of alien residents, of a casual concourse of adventurers, or of those whom the Constitution of the State has not admitted to the rights of suffrage? I take no notice of an unhappy species of population abounding in some of the States, who during the calm of regular government are sunk below the level of men; but who in the tempestuous scenes of civil violence may emerge into the human character, and give a superiority of strength to any party with which they may associate themselves.

In cases where it may be doubtful on which side justice lies, what better umpires could be desired by two violent factions, flying to arms and tearing a State to pieces, than the representatives of confederate States not heated by the local flame? To the impartiality of Judges they would unite the affection of friends. Happy would it be if such a remedy for its infirmities, could be enjoyed by all

---

[2] See Essay 19. (Editor)
[3] The reference is to Shays' Rebellion. (Editor)

free governments; if a project equally effectual could be established for the universal peace of mankind.

Should it be asked what is to be the redress for an insurrection pervading all the States, and comprizing a superiority of the entire force, though not a constitutional right; the answer must be, that such a case, as it would be without the compass of human remedies, so it is fortunately not within the compass of human probability; and that it is a sufficient recommendation of the Federal Constitution, that it diminishes the risk of a calamity, for which no possible constitution can provide a cure.

Among the advantages of a confederate republic enumerated by Montesquieu, an important one is, "that should a popular insurrection happen in one of the States, the others are able to quell it. Should abuses creep into one part, they are reformed by those that remain sound."

7. "To consider all debts contracted and enagements entered into, before the adoption of this Constitution, as being no less valid against the United States under this Constitution, than under the Confederation."

This can only be considered as a declaratory proposition; and may have been inserted, among other reasons, for the satisfaction of the foreign creditors of the United States, who cannot be strangers to the pretended doctrine that a change in the political form of civil society, has the magical effect of dissolving its moral obligations.

Among the lesser criticisms which have been exercised on the Constitution, it has been remarked that the validity of engagements ought to have been asserted in favour of the United States, as well as against them; and in the spirit which usually characterizes little critics, the omission has been transformed and magnified into a plot against the national rights. The authors of this discovery may be told, what few others need be informed of, that as engagements are in their nature reciprocal, an assertion of their validity on one side necessarily involves a validity on the other side; and that as the article is merely declaratory, the establishment of the principle in one case is sufficient for every case. They may be further told that every Constitution must limit its precautions to dangers that are not altogether imaginary; and that no real danger can exist that the government would DARE, with or even without this Constitutional declaration before it, to remit the debts justly due to the public, on the pretext here condemned.

8. "To provide for amendments to be ratified by three-fourths of the States, under two exceptions only."

That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the general and the state governments to originate the amendments of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other. The exception in favour of the equality of suffrage in the Senate was probably meant as a palladium to the residuary sovereignty of the States, implied and secured by that principle of representation in one branch of the Legislature; and was probably insisted on by the States particularly attached to that equality. The other exception must have been admitted on the same considerations which produced the privilege defended by it.

9. "The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States ratifying the same."

This article speaks for itself. The express authority of the people alone could give due validity to the Constitution. To have required the unanimous ratification of the thirteen States, would have subjected the essential interests of the whole to the caprice or corruption of a single member. It would have marked a want of foresight in the Convention, which our own experience would have rendered inexcusable.

Two questions of a very delicate nature present themselves on this occasion. 1. On what principle the confederation, which stands in the solemn form of a compact among the States, can be superceded without the unanimous consent of the parties to it? 2. What relation is to subsist between the nine or more States ratifying the Constitution, and the remaining few who do not become parties to it.

The first question is answered at once by recurring to the absolute necessity of the case; to the great principle of self-preservation; to the transcendent law of nature and of nature's God, which declares that the safety and happiness of society are the objects at which all political institutions aim, and to which all such institutions must be sacrificed. PERHAPS also an answer may be found without searching beyond the principles of the compact itself. It has been heretofore noted among the defects of the Confederation, that in many of the States, it had received no higher sanction than a mere legislative ratification.[4] The principle of reciprocality seems to require, that its obligation on the other States should be reduced to the same standard. A compact between independent sovereigns, founded on ordinary acts of legislative authority, can pretend to no higher validity than a league or treaty between the parties. It is an established doctrine on the subject of treaties, that all the articles are mutually conditions of each other; that a breach of any one article is a breach of the whole treaty; and that a breach committed by either of the parties absolves the others; and authorizes them, if they please, to pronounce the treaty violated and void. Should it unhappily be necessary to appeal to these delicate truths for a justification for dispensing with the consent of particular States to a dissolution of the federal pact, will not the complaining parties find it a difficult task to answer the MULTIPLIED and IMPORTANT infractions with which they may be confronted? The time has been when it was incumbent on us all to veil the ideas which this paragraph exhibits. The scene is now changed, and with it, the part which the same motives dictate.

The second question is not less delicate; and the flattering prospect of its being merely hypothetical, forbids an overcurious discussion of it. It is one of those cases which must be left to provide for itself. In general it may be observed, that although no political relation can subsist between the assenting and dissenting States, yet the moral relations will remain uncancelled. The claims of justice, both on one side and on the other, will be in force, and must be fulfilled; the rights of humanity must in all cases be duly and mutually respected; whilst considerations of a common interest, and above all the remembrance of the endearing scenes which are past, and the anticipation of a speedy triumph over the obstacles to re-union, will, it is hoped, not urge in vain MODERATION on one side, and PRUDENCE on the other.

PUBLIUS.

THE FEDERALIST No. 85[1]

ALEXANDER HAMILTON

MAY 28, 1788.

According to the formal division of the subject of these papers, announced in my first number, there would appear still to remain for discussion, two points, "the analogy of the proposed government to your own state constitution," and "the additional security, which its adoption will afford to republican government, to liberty and to property." But these heads have been so fully anticipated and exhausted in the progress of the work, that it would now scarcely be possible to do any thing more than repeat, in a more dilated form, what has been heretofore said; which the advanced stage of the question, and the time already spent upon it conspire to forbid.

It is remarkable, that the resemblance of the plan of the convention to the act which organizes the government of this state holds, not less with regard to many of the supposed defects, than to the real excellencies of the former. Among the pretended defects, are the re-eligibility of the executive, the want of a council, the omission of a formal bill of rights, the omission of a provision respecting the liberty of the press: These and several others, which have been noted in the course of our inquiries, are as much chargeable on the existing constitution of this state, as on the one proposed for the Union. And a man must have slender pretensions to consistency, who can rail at the latter for imperfections which he finds no difficulty in excusing in the former. Nor indeed can there be a better proof of the insincerity and affectation of some of the zealous adversaries of the plan of the convention among us, who profess to be the devoted admirers of the government under which they live, than the fury with which they have attacked that plan, for matters in regard to which our own constitution is equally, or perhaps more vulnerable.

---

[4] See Essay 22. (Editor).

[1] From J. and A. McLean, The Federalist, II, 357–365, where this essay was first published on May 28, 1788, and numbered 85. It was begun on August 13 and concluded on August 16 in The Independent Journal where it was numbered 84, and appeared on August 15 in The New-York Packet where it was numbered 85.

The additional securities to republican government, to liberty and to property, to be derived from the adoption of the plan under consideration, consist chiefly in the restraints which the preservation of the union will impose on local factions and insurrections, and on the ambition of powerful individuals in single states, who might acquire credit and influence enough, from leaders and favorites, to become the despots of the people; in the diminution of the opportunities to foreign intrigue, which the dissolution of the confederacy would invite and facilitate; in the prevention of extensive military establishments, which could not fail to grow out of wars between the states in a disunited situation; in the express guarantee of a republican form of government to each; in the absolute and universal exclusion of titles of nobility; and in the precautions against the repetition of those practices on the part of the state governments, which have undermined the foundations of property and credit, have planted mutual distrust in the breasts of all classes of citizens, and have occasioned an almost universal prostration of morals.

Thus have I, my fellow citizens, executed the task I had assigned to myself; with what success, your conduct must determine. I trust at least you will admit, that I have not failed in the assurance I gave you respecting the spirit with which my endeavours should be conducted. I have addressed myself purely to your judgments, and have studiously avoided those asperities which are too apt to disgrace political disputants of all parties, and which have been not a little provoked by the language and conduct of the opponents of the constitution. The charge of a conspiracy against the liberties of the people, which has been indiscriminately brought against the advocates of the plan, has something in it too wanton and too malignant not to incite the indignation of every man who feels in his own bosom a refutation of the calumny. The perpetual charges which have been rung upon the wealthy, the well-born and the great, have been such as to inspire the disgust of all sensible men. And the unwarrantable concealments and misrepresentations which have been in various ways practiced to keep the truth from the public eye, have been of a nature to demand the reprobation of all honest men. It is not impossible that these circumstances may have occasionally betrayed me into intemperances of expression which I did not intend: It is certain that I have frequently felt a struggle between sensibility and moderation, and if the former has in some instances prevailed, it must be my excuse that it has been neither often nor much.

Let us now pause and ask ourselves whether, in the course of these papers, the proposed constitution has not been satisfactorily vindicated from the aspersions thrown upon it, and whether it has not been shewn to be worthy of the public approbation, and necessary to the public safety and prosperity. Every man is bound to answer these questions to himself, according to the best of his conscience and understanding, and to act agreeably to the genuine and sober dictates of his judgment. This is a duty, from which nothing can give him a dispensation. 'Tis one that he is called upon, nay, constrained by all the obligations that form the bands of society, to discharge sincerely and honestly. No partial motive, no particular interest, no pride of opinion, no temporary passion or prejudice, will justify to himself, to his country or to his posterity, an improper election of the part he is to act. Let him beware of an obstinate adherence to party. Let him reflect that the object upon which he is to decide is not a particular interest of the community, but the very existence of the nation. And let him remember that a majority of America has already given its sanction to the plan, which he is to approve or reject.

I shall not dissemble, that I feel an intire confidence in the arguments, which recommend the proposed system to your adoption: and that I am unable to discern any real force in those by which it has been opposed. I am persuaded, that it is the best which our political situation, habits and opinions will admit, and superior to any the revolution has produced.

Concessions on the part of the friends of the plan, that it has not a claim to absolute perfection, have afforded matter of no small triumph to its enemies. Why, say they, should we adopt an imperfect thing? Why not amend it, and make it perfect before it is irrevocably established? This may be plausible enough, but it is only plausible. In the first place, I remark, that the extent of these concessions has been greatly exaggerated. They have been stated as amounting to an admission, that the plan is radically defective: and that, without material alterations, the rights and the interests of the community cannot be safely confided to it. This, as far as I have understood the meaning of those who make the concessions, is an entire perversion of their sense. No advocate of the measure can be found who will not declare as his sentiment, that the system, though it may not be perfect in every part, is upon the whole a good one, is the best that the present views and circumstances of the country will permit, and is such an one as promises every species of security which a reasonable people can desire.

I answer in the next place, that I should esteem it the extreme of imprudence to prolong the precarious state of our national affairs, and to expose the union to the jeopardy of successive experiments, in the chimerical pursuit of a perfect plan. I never expect to see a perfect work from imperfect man. The result of the deliberations of all collective bodies must necessarily be a compound as well of the errors and prejudices, as of the good sense and wisdom of the individuals of whom they are composed. The compacts which are to embrace thirteen distinct states, in a common bond of amity and union, must as necessarily be a compromise of as many dissimilar interests and inclinations. How can perfection spring from such materials?

The reasons assigned in an excellent little pamphlet lately published in this city[2] are unanswerable to shew the utter improbability of assembling a new convention, under circumstances in any degree so favourable to a happy issue, as those in which the late convention met, deliberated and concluded. I will not repeat the arguments there used, as I presume the production itself has had an extensive circulation. It is certainly well worth the perusal of every friend to his country. There is however one point of light in which the subject of amendments still remains to be considered; and in which it has not yet been exhibited to public view. I cannot resolve to conclude, without first taking a survey of it in this aspect.

It appears to me susceptible of absolute demonstration, that it will be far more easy to obtain subsequent than previous amendments to the constitution. The moment an alteration is made in the present plan, it becomes, to the purpose of adoption, a new one, and must undergo a new decision of each state. To its complete establishment throughout the union, it will therefore require the concurrence of thirteen states. If, on the contrary, the constitution proposed should once be ratified by all the states as it stands, alterations in it may at any time be effected by nine states. Here then the chances are as thirteen to nine[3] in favour of subsequent amendments, rather than of the original adoption of an intire system.

This is not all. Every constitution for the United States must inevitably consist of a great variety of particulars, in which thirteen independent states are to be accommodated in their interests or opinions of interest. We may of course expect to see, in any body of men charged with its original formation, very different combinations of the parts upon different points. Many of those who form the majority on one question may become the minority on a second, and an association dissimilar to either may constitute the majority on a third. Hence the necessity of moulding and arranging all the particulars which are to compose the whole in such a manner as to satisfy all the parties to the compact; and hence also an immense multiplication of difficulties and casualties in obtaining the collective assent to a final act. The degree of that multiplication must evidently be in a ratio to the number of particulars and the number of parties.

But every amendment to the constitution, if once established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise, in relation to any other point, no giving nor taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently whenever nine[3] or rather ten states, were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place. There can therefore be no comparison between the facility of effecting an amendment, and that of establishing in the first instance a complete constitution.

In opposition to the probability of subsequent amendments it has been urged, that the persons delegated to the administration of the national government, will always be disinclined to yield up any portion of the authority of which they were once possessed. For my own part I acknowledge a thorough conviction that any amendments which may, upon mature consideration, be thought useful, will be applicable to the organization of the government, not to the mass of its powers; and on this account alone, I think there is no weight in the observation just stated. I also think there is little weight in it on another account. The

[2] Intitled "An Address to the people of the state of New-York." (Publius.) Written by John Jay, the pamphlet was published first in April and reprinted in The American Museum for June, 1788. (Editor.)

[3] It may rather be said TEN, for though two-thirds may set on foot the measure, three-fourths must ratify. (Publius.)

intrinsic difficulty of governing thirteen States at any rate, independent of calculations upon an ordinary degree of public spirit and integrity, will, in my opinion, constantly impose on the national rules the necessity of a spirit of accommodation to the reasonable expectations of their constituents. But there is yet a further consideration, which proves beyond the possibility of doubt, that the observation is futile. It is this, that the national rulers, whenever nine states concur, will have no option upon the subject. By the fifth article of the plan the congress will be obliged, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, (which at present amounts to nine) to call a convention for proposing amendments, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof." The words of this article are peremptory. The congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence all the declamation about their disinclination to a change, vanishes in air. Nor however difficult it may be supposed to unite two-thirds or three-fourths of the state legislatures, in amendments which may affect local interests, can there be any room to apprehend any such difficulty in a union on points which are merely relative to the general liberty or security of the people. We may safely rely on the disposition of the state legislatures to erect barriers against the encroachments of the national authority.

If the foregoing argument is a fallacy, certain it is that I am myself deceived by it; for it is, in my conception, one of those rare instances in which a political truth can be brought to the test of mathematical demonstration. Those who see the matter in the same light with me, however zealous they may be for amendments, must agree in the propriety of a previous adoption, as the most direct road to their own object.

The zeal for attempts to amend, prior to the establishment of the constitution, must abate in every man, who, is ready to accede to the truth of the following observations of a writer, equally solid and ingenious: "To balance a large state or society (says he) whether monarchial or republican, on general laws, is a work of so great difficulty, that no human genius, however comprehensive, is able by the mere dint of reason and reflection, to effect it. The judgments of many must unite in the work: Experience must guide their labour: Time must bring it to perfection: And the feeling of inconveniences must correct the mistakes which they inevitably fall into, in their first trials and experiments." * These judicious reflections contain a lesson of moderation to all the sincere lovers of the union, and ought to put them upon their guard against hazarding anarchy, civil war, a perpetual alienation of the states from each other, and perhaps the military despotism of a victorious demagogue, in the pursuit of what they are not likely to obtain, but from time and experience. It may be in me a defect of political fortitude, but I acknowledge, that I cannot entertain an equal tranquillity with those who affect to treat the dangers of a longer continuance in our present situation as imaginary. A nation without a national government is, in my view, an awful spectacle. The establishment of a constitution, in time of profound peace, by the voluntary consent of a whole people, is a prodigy, to the completion of which I look forward with trembling anxiety. I can reconcile it to no rules of prudence to let go the hold we now have, in so arduous an enterprise, upon seven out of the thirteen states; and after having passed over so considerable a part of the ground to recommence the course. I dread the more the consequences of new attempts, because I know that powerful individuals, in this and in other states, are enemies to a general national government, in every possible shape.

PUBLIUS.

EXCERPTS FROM FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION (1937 ED.) AND OTHER SOURCES

(Submitted as Appendix to Memorandum on S. 2307, prepared by Prof. Philip B. Kurland.)

[Ed. Note: Footnotes are from Farrand, 1937 edition, and retain numbering of the source.]

The history of the amendment provision in the Constitutional Convention begins with John Randolph's resolutions (The Virginia Plan Resolution 13, according to Madison, reads as follows:

---

* Hume's Essays, vol. I, page 128.—The rise of arts and sciences. (Publius.)

"13. Resd. that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto."

Patterson's record of the Randolph provision was more succinct: "4. Provision that the Articles of national Union should be amended—"

The issue was not quickly resolved. The Journal of the Convention reveals that on 5 June 1787, the question was deferred:

"It was then moved and seconded to postpone the consideration of the 13th resolution submitted by Mr. Randolph and the question to postpone it passed in the affirmative"

Madison's notes fill in some of the details of this postponement:

"(propos: 13.) "that provision ought to be made for (hereafter) amending the system now to be established, without requiring the assent of the Natl. Legislature." (being taken up.)

Mr. Pinkey doubted the propriety or necessity of it.

Mr. Gerry favored it. The novelty & difficulty of the experiment requires periodical revision. The prospect of such a revision would also give intermediate stability to the Govt. Nothing had yet happened in the States where this provision existed to prove its impropriety.—The Proposition was postponed for further consideration: (the votes being: Mas: Con. N.Y. Pa. Del. Ma. N.C.—ay

"Virga. S.C. Geo: no)[20]

[20] "Madison originally recorded that this provision was "postponed nem. con.," but later substituted this vote from Journal. His original record was doubtless correct as there is no apparent reason for ascribing this vote to this question."

On June 11, the Journal again reveals postponement:

"It was agreed to postpone the following clause in the 13th resolution submitted by Mr. Randolph namely " 'and that the assent of the national legislature ought not to be required thereto' "

And Madison's notes again records the substance of the positions taken at this time; suggesting that the principle of amendment was agreed to, but the exclusion of the National Legislature from the process was at issue:

"(Resolution 13.) for amending the national Constitution hereafter without consent of Natl. Legislature (being) considered, several members did not see the necessity of the (Resolution) at all, nor the propriety of making the consent of the Natl. Legisl. unnecessary.

Col. Mason urged the necessity of such a provision. The plan now to be formed will certainly be defective, as the Confederation has been found on trial to be. Amendments therefore will be necessary, and it will be better to provide for them, in an easy, regular and Constitutional way than to trust to chance and violence. It would be improper to require the consent of the Natl. Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their consent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse, may be the fault of the Constitution calling for amendment.

Mr. Randolph (enforced) these arguments.

The words, "without requiring the consent of the Natl. Legislature" were postponed. The other provision in the clause passed nem. con.

Yates' notes confirm Madison on the June 11 session:

"13th Resolve—the first part agreed to.

"14th Resolve—taken into consideration."

The Journal records for June 13, Randolph's later resolution on the question:

"Resolved that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the articles of union whensoever it shall seem necessary."

A second set of Randolph's resolutions for the same date was recorded in the Journal thus:

"17. Resolved, that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the articles of Union, whensoever it shall seem necessary."

And Madison's notes confirm these recordings in the Journal:

"17. Resd. that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary."

Madison, according to Yates, had this comment to make on June 29 about the difficulties of Constitutional amendments:

"The difficulty of getting its defects amended are great and sometimes insurmountable. The Virginia state government was the first which was made, and though its defects are evident to every person, we cannot get it amended. The Dutch have made four several attempts to amend their system without success. The few alterations made in it were by tumult and faction, and for the worse."

King's notes confirm this statement by Madison.

The principle of providing for amendment was again confirmed on 23 July 1787. The Journal records the following:

On the question to agree to the 17th resolution, as reported from the Committee of the whole House, namely

"That provision ought to be made for the amendment of "the articles of union, whensoever it shall seem necessary" it passes unanimously in the affirmative.

Madison records no debate on the question:

"Resoln: 17. that provision ought to be made for future amendments of the articles of Union. Agreed to nem. con."

Thereupon the Committee of Detail's draft of the Randolph Resolution was as follows: "Resolved That Provision ought to be made for the Amendment of the Articles of Union, whensoever it shall seem necessary."

The Wilson papers include this provision in the outline of the New Jersey Plan, also reported to the Committee of Detail: "23. The assent of the Legislature of States shall be sufficient to invent future additional Powers in U.S. in C. ass. and shall bind the whole Confederacy."

In Federalist No. 43, Madison wrote of the amending provisions:

That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite, therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility, which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty, which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It, moreover, equally enables the general and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side, or on the other. The exception in favor of the equality of suffrage in the Senate, was probably meant as a palladium to the residuary sovereignty of the States, implied and secured by that principle of representation in one branch of the legislature; and was probably insisted on by the States particularly attached to that equality. The other exception must have been admitted on the same considerations which produced the privilege defended by it.

That Madison was not prone to see his handiword referred for popular revision is revealed in Federalist No. 49, where he rejects a Jeffersonian proposal for resort to the people to resolve conflicts among the three branches of government.

The George Mason papers include the following proposal in the handwriting of Edmund Randolph with amendments by John Rutledge indicated here by brackets. Italics indicate changes in Randolph's hand:

4. The ratification of the reform is—After the approbation of congress—to be made by a special convention [in each State] recommended by the assembly to be chosen for the express purpose of considering and approving or rejecting it in toto:

and this recommendation may be used from time to time.

5. (An alteration may be effected in the articles of union, on the application of two thirds nine [⅔d] of the state legislatures [by a Convn.] [on appln. of ⅔ds of the State Legislatures to the Natl. Leg. they call a Convn. to revise or alter ye Articles of Union]

3. Qu. whether any Thing should be said as to the Amendment by the States

Again, among the Wilson papers was found the following:

This Constitution ought to be amended whenever such Amendment shall become necessary; and on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that Purpose.

The following provision was also found among the Wilson papers:

This Constitution ought to be amended whenever such amendment shall become necessary; and on the Application of (two thirds) the Legislatures of two thirds of the States of the Union, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that Purpose.

Madison's notes for 6 Aug. 1787, include the following provision:

"XIX [XVIII] On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose.

Its approval by the Convention in this form on August 30 was recorded by Madison: "On the question to agree to the 19 article as reported it passed in the affirmative."

He also recorded on that date no debate on the question: "Art: XIX taken up."

The proposition for participation by the National Legislature in the amendment process was first recorded in the Journal for 10 September 1787:

"It was moved and seconded to reconsider the 19th article which passed in the affirmative [Ayes—9; noes—1; divided—1.]

It was moved and seconded to amend the 19 article by adding the following clause.

Or the Legislature may propose amendments to the several States, for their approbation, but no amendments shall be binding, until consented to by the several States.

It was moved and seconded to insert the words "two thirds of" before the words "the several States" which passed in the negative [Ayes—5; noes—6.] It was moved and seconded to insert the words "three fourths" which passed in the affirmative. ["unanimous"]

It was moved and seconded to postpone the consideration of the amendment in order to take up the following.

'The Legislature of the United States, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the United States: Provided that no amendments which may be made prior to the year 1808, shall in any manner affect the 4th and 5th Sections of article the 7th"

On the question to postpone it passed in the affirmative

On the question to agree to the last amendment it passed in the affirmative [Ayes—9; noes—1; divided—1.]"

Madison's notes reveal the origin of the change and some of the discussion:

Mr. Gerry moved to reconsider art XIX, viz. "On the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the U.S. shall call a Convention for that purpose." (see Aug." 6.)

This Constitution he said is to be paramount to the State Constitutions. It follows, hence, from this article that two thirds of the States may obtain a Convention, a majority of which can bind the Union to innovations that may subvert the State-Constitutions altogether. He asked whether this was a situation proper to be run into—

Mr. Hamilton 2ded. the motion, but he said with a different view from Mr. Gerry—He did not object to the consequences stated by Mr. Gerry—There was no greater evil in subjecting the people of a particular State—It has been wished by many and was much to have been desired that an easier mode for introducing amendments had been provided by the articles of Confederation. It was equally desirable now that an easy mode should be established for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new System. The mode proposed was not adequate. The State Legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers—The National Legislature will be the first to perceive and will be most sensible to the necessity of amendments, and ought also to be empowered, whenever two thirds of each branch should concur to call a Convention—There could be no danger in giving this power, as the people would finally decide in the case.

Mr. Madison remarked on the vagueness of the terms, "call a Convention for the purpose," as sufficient reason for reconsidering the article. How was a Convention to be formed? by what rule decide? what the force of its acts?

On the motion of Mr. Gerry to reconsider.

N.H. divd. Mas. ae—Ct. ay, N.J.—, Pa. ay. Del. ay. Md. ay. Va. ay. N—C. ay. S.C. ay. Geo . ay. [Ayes—9; noes—1; divided—1.]

Mr. Sherman moved to add to the article "or the Legislature may propose amendments to the several States for their approbation, but no amendments shall be binding until consented to be the several States"

Mr. Gerry 2ded. the motion.

Mr. Wilson moved to insert "two thirds of" before the words "several States"—on which amendment to the motion of Mr. Sherman.

N.H. ay. Mas. (no) Ct. no. N.J. (no) Pa. ay—Del—ay Md. ay. Va. ay. N.C. no. S.C. no. Geo no [Ayes—5; noes—6] [2]

[2] Madison originally recorded both Massachusetts and New Jersey as voting "ay." This made the total vote on the question affirmative. Later he revised his record to conform to Journal.

Mr. Wilson then moved to insert "three fourths of" before "the several Sts" which was agreed to nem: con:

Mr. Madison moved to postpone the consideration of the amended proposition in order to take up the following,

"The Legislature of the U.S. whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two third of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U.S.'

Mr. Hamilton 2ded. the motion.

Mr. Rutledge said he never could agree to give a power by which the articles relating to slaves might be altered by the States not interested in that property and prejudiced against it. In order to obvaite this objection, these words were added to the proposition: "provided that no amendments which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the 4 & 5 sections of the VII article" The postponement being agreed to,

On the question On the proposition of Mr. Madison & Mr. Hamilton as amended.

N.H. div. Mas. ay. Ct. ay. N.J. ay. Pa. ay. Del. no. Md. ay. Va. ay. N.C. ay S.C. ay Geo. ay. [Ayes—9; noes 1; divided—1.]

The Committee of style thereafter brought in the following draft of Article V:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem necessary or on the application of two-thirds [25] of the legislatures of the several states, shall propose amendments to this constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of [26] of the legislatures [27] of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 hall in any manner affect the—and [28]—sections of [29] article—

[25] "of two-thirds" crossed out by Madison, and inserted again after "legislatures."
[26] "three-fourths at least of" crossed out by Madison.
[27] "of three-fourths" inserted by Madison.
[28] "and" crossed out, and "1. & 4 clauses in the 9" inserted by Madison.
[29] "the first" interlined by Madison.

Madison's notes of September 15 offer the discussion on the proposed Article V: "Art—V. 'The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the (1 & 4 clauses in the 9.) section of article 1.'

Mr. Sherman expressed his fears that three fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether or depriving them of their equality in the Senate. He thought it reasonable that the proviso in favor of the States importing slaves should be extended so as to provide that no State should be affected in its internal police, or deprived of its equality in the Senate.

Col: Mason thought the plan of amending the Constitution exceptionable & dangerous. As the proposing of amendments is in both the modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second, ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the Government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case.[8]

[8] In the margins of his copy of the draft of September 12, Mason had written: "Article 5th—By this article Congress only have the power of proposing amendments at any future time to this constitution, and should it prove ever so oppressive, the whole people of America can't make, or even propose alterations to it; a doctrine utterly subversive of the fundamental principles of the rights and liberties of the people."

Mr. Govr. Morris & Mr. Gerry moved to amend the article so as to require a Convention on application of ⅔ of the Sts

Mr. Madison did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application. He saw no objection however against providing for a Convention for the purpose of amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum &c. which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided.

The motion of Mr. Govr Morris and Mr. Gerry was agreed to nem: con (see: the first part of the article as finally past)

Mr. Sherman moved to strike out of art. V. after "legislatures" the words "of three fourths" and so after the word "Conventions" leaving future Conventions to act in this matter, like the present Conventions according to circumstances.

On this motion

NH divd. Mas—ay—Ct ay. NJ.—ay Pa no. Del—no. Md no. Va. no. N.C. no. SC. no. Geo—no. [Ayes—3; noes—7; divided—1]

Mr. Gerry moved to strike out the words "or by Conventions in three fourths thereof"

On this motion

NH—no. Mas. no—Ct. ay. NJ. no. Pa no—Del no. Md no. Va. no. NC. no. S.C. no—Geo no. [Ayes—1; noes—10.]

M—Sherman moved according to his idea above expressed to annex to the end of the article for a further proviso "that no State shall without its consent be affected in its internal police, or deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate,"

Mr. Madison. Begins with these special provisos, and every State will insist on them, for their boundaries; exports &c.

On the motion of Mr. Sherman

N.H—no. Mas. no. Ct. ay. N.J. ay—Pa no. Del—ay. Md. no. Va. no N.C. no. Geo. no. [Ayes—3; noes—8.]

Mr. Sherman then moved to strike out art V altogether.

Mr. Brearley 2ded. the motion, on which

N.H. no. Mas. no. Ct. ay. N.J. ay. Pa. no. Del. divd. Md. no. Va. no. N.C. no. S.C. no. Geo. no [Ayes—2; noes—8; divided—1.]

Mr. Govr. Morris moved to annex a further proviso—"that no State, without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate"

This motion being dictated by the circulating murmurs of the small States was agreed to without debate, no one opposing it, or on the question, saying no.

Col: Mason expressing his discontent at the power given to Congress by a bare majority to pass navigation acts, which he said would not only enhance the freight, a consequence he did not so much regard—but would enable a few rich merchants in Philada N. York & Boston, to monopolize the Staples of the Southern States & reduce their value perhaps 50 Per Ct—moved a further proviso "that no law in nature of a navigation act be passed before the year 1808, without the consent of ⅔ of each branch of the Legislature.

On this motion

N.H. no. Mas no. Ct. no. NJ. no—Pa no. Del. no. Md. ay. Va. ay. N.C abst S.C. no—Geo ay. [Ayes—3; noes—7; absent—1.]

Charles Pinckney's recorded views on the need for alteration of the Constitution by less than unanimous state action were as follows:

The 16th article proposes to declare, that if it should hereafter appear necessary to the United States to recommend that Grant of any additional Powers, that the assent of a given number of the States shall be sufficient to invest them and bind the Union as fully as if they had been confirmed by the Legislatures of all the States. The principles of this, and the article which provides for the future alteration of the Constitution by its being first agreed to in Congress, and ratified by a certain proportion of the Legislatures, are precisely the same; they both go to destroy that unanimity which upon these occasions the present System has unfortunately made necessary—the propriety of this alteration has been so frequently suggested, that I shall only observe that it is to this unanimous consent, the depressed situation of the Union is undoubtedly owing. Had the measures recommended by Congress and assented to, some of them by eleven and others by twelve of the States, been carried into execution, how different would have been the complexion of Public Affairs? To this weak, this absurd part of the Government, may all our distresses be fairly attributed.

If the States were equal in size and importance, a majority of the Legislatures might be sufficient for the grant of any new Powers; but disproportioned as they are and must continue for a time; a larger number may now in prudence to required—but I trust no Government will ever again be adopted in this Country, whose Alteration cannot be effected but by the assent of all its Members. The hazardous situation the United Netherlands are frequently placed in on this account, as well as our own mortifying experience, are sufficient to warn us from a danger which has already nearly proved fatal. It is difficult to form a Government so perfect as to render alterations unnecessary; we must expect and provide for them:—But difficult as the forming a perfect Government would be, it is scarcely more so, than to induce Thirteen separate Legislatures, to think and act alike upon one subject—the alterations that nine think necessary, ought not to be impeded by four—a minority so inconsiderable should be obliged to yield. Upon this principle the present articles are formed, and are in my judgment so obviously proper, that I think it unnecessary to remark further upon them.

Edmund Randolph in a letter to the speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates, explaining his refusal to sign the Constitution as submitted for ratification, wrote as follows:

5. I was afraid that if the constitution was to be submitted to the people, to be wholly adopted or wholly rejected by them, they would not only reject it, but bid a lasting farewell to the union. This formidable event I wished to avert, by keeping myself free to propose amendments, and thus, if possible, to remove the obstacles to an effectual government. But it will be asked, whether all these arguments, were not be well weighed in convention. They were, sir, with great candor. Nay, when I called to mind the respectability of those, with whom I was associated, I should cheerfully have yielded to a majority; on this the fate of thousands yet unborn, enjoined me not to yield until I was convinced.

Again, may I be asked, why the mode pointed out in the constitution for its amendment, may not be a sufficient security against its imperfections, without now arresting it in its progress? My answers are—1. That it is better to amend, while we have the constitution in our power, while the passions of designing men are not yet enlisted, and while a bare majority of the States may amend than to wait for the uncertain assent of three fourths of the States. 2. That a bad feature in government, becomes more and more fixed every day. 3. That frequent changes of a constitution, even if practicable, ought not to be wished, but avoided as much as possible. And 4. That in the present case, it may be questionable, whether, after the particular advantages of its operation shall be discerned, three fourths of the States can be induced. . . .

George Mason, according to Jefferson, reported the following history of Article V's origins:

"Anecdote. the constn as agreed at first was that amendments might be proposed either by Congr. or the legislatures a commee was appointed to digest & redraw. Gov. Morris & King were of the commee. one morng. Gov. M. moved an instrn for certain alterns (not ½ of the members yet come in) in a hurry & without understanding it was agreed to. the Commee reported so that Congr. shd have the exclusive. power of proposg. amendments. G. Mason observed it on the report & opposed it. King denied the constrn. Mason demonstrated it, & asked the Commee by what authority they had varied what had been agreed. G. Morris then impudently got up & said by authority of the convention & produced the blind instruction beforementd. which was unknown by ½ of the house & not till then understood by the other. they then restored it as it stood originally.

From the Annals of Congress, 8th Cong., 1st Sess., comes this remark by Pierce Butler who had been a member of the Convention: "It never was intended by the Constitution that the Vice President should have a vote in altering the Constitution."

In his The Framing of the Constitution of the United States (1913) Farrand recapitulates the history of Article V thusly:

The attempt to obtain amendments to the articles of confederation had taught by bitter experience that the objection of a single state was sufficient to block the will of all the others. It was evidently necessary, then, that provision should be made for amendments to the new constitution with the consent of less than the whole number of states. It was also felt that this same principle ought to be applied in the modifications proposed in the existing instrument, and those who were in favor of a government acting directly upon the people advocated as a first step in this process that the changes to be made in the constitution should be ratified by the people rather than by state legislatures.

The provision for future amendments was adopted, except that the clause rendering unnecessary the assent of the national legislature was dropped. There was a little discussion as to the propriety or desirability of referring the changes to be proposed by the convention to popularly chosen conventions in each state. Madison and Wilson favored it on fundamental grounds, King as a matter of expediency. Sherman and Gerry opposed it, the former considering the state legislatures competent, the latter distrusting the people. Wilson and Pinckney suggested also ratification by less than the whole number of states. The question of popular ratification was once postponed, but the final vote was in favor of it and it was so ordered.

The only important action taken on Monday related to future amendments of the constitution. The provision in the draft reported by the committee of detail—that on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, congress should call a convention for that purpose—had been unanimously adopted by the convention. Gerry now asked and obtained consent to have this reconsidered, because he thought two-thirds of the states could thus commit the whole union to dangerous innovations. This move was taken advantage of by those who desired an easier method of amendment, to render it possible for congress to inaugurate amendments whenever two-thirds of both houses should think it necessary. Gerry evidently wished to require the consent of all the states to adopt an amendment, but Wilson proposed to require the approval of only two-thirds. When the latter motion was defeated by a majority of one, Wilson immediately suggested three-fourths and the convention adopted it unanimously. The proviso was then added, at the insistance of the extreme southern states, that no amendments should be made prior to 1808 that would interfere with the slave trade.

Gerry next moved to amend another section previously agreed to, so that the approval of congress would be essential to the adoption of the new plan. Though supported by Hamilton and others, the amendment was defeated. Randolph having previously expressed his doubts concerning the new plan now came out flatly against it. He wanted the new constitution to be transmitted through the medium of congress and state legislatures to state conventions. Then another general convention was to be held with full power to adopt or reject such amendments as might be proposed by the various state conventions. His motion embodying these proposals was laid on the table and the convention adjourned after instructing the committee of style to prepare an address to accompany the constitution.

Some slight changes were made in the method of amending the constitution, with an idea of making that process easier, but they have proven to be of no importance, because of the difficulty in overcoming the fundamental requirement of obtaining the ratification of three-fourths of the states. It was also feared that congress might refuse to act and so congress was required to call a convention on the application of two-thirds of the states. Some further suggestions were made by Sherman, Gerry, and Brearley regarding amendments which were all voted down. But with the idea of conciliation in mind Gouverneur Morris made a motion which was 'dictated by the circulating murmurs of the small States . . . that no State, without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.'

P.B.K.

[THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE]

PROCEDURES FOR AMENDING THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

(By Norman J. Small, Legislative Attorney, American Law Division, January 15, 1965)

Article V[1] of the Constitution now provides two methods for effecting alterations and additions to the provisions thereof:

(1) Amendment procedure originating with, or initiated by Congress; (2) Amendment procedure originating with the States. Only the former has been used thus far.

(a) Amendment procedure originating with, or initiated by, Congress

A resolution proposing a constitutional amendment may be introduced in either the House or the Senate (H.J. Res. ——; S.J. Res. ——;) and upon being approved by a vote of two-thirds in each House, a quorum being present, the proposed amendment is submitted to the States for ratification.

(i) Exclusion of the executive from the amending process

Neither the President nor the governors of the States are accorded any participation in the amending process. Upon approval by the two Houses of Congress, a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution is submitted directly to the States for ratification. Unlike ordinary legislative proposals, such a resolution is not submitted to the President for his signature or veto. Likewise, at the State level, the governor is not accorded the privilege of either signature or veto of a resolution adopted by the State legislature recording its approval or rejection of a proposed amendment submitted by the Congress for ratification (Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378 (1798)). Moreover, when Congress designates State legislatures as the ratifying agency, the legislatures must discharge this responsibility directly and are not at liberty to rest their ultimate decision on the vote of the people recorded via referral of the issue of ratification or rejection to the electorate by way of referendum (Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221 (1920)).

(ii) Two methods available for effecting ratification of a proposed amendment originating with the Congress

By terms of Article V, Congress is empowered to stipulate that ratifications of a submitted amendment shall be effected either by State legislatures, or by conventions in the States selected for the performance of the sole function of recording a State's approval or rejection of the amendment proposed by the Congress. When three-fourths of the State legislatures, or conventions, are recorded as approving (or 38 out of the present 50 states) the proposed amendment becomes effective as a part of the Constitution. On only one occasion, however, has the Congress specified conventions rather than State legislatures as the ratifying agency, namely, when it submitted the Twenty-First amendment for approval repealing the Eighteenth (Prohibition) Amendment.

(b) Amendment procedure originating with the States

When, by the terms of Article V, the legislatures of two-thirds of the States (or now 34 out of the present 50), petition Congress to call a convention "for proposing Amendments", presumably Congress is obligated to provide by law for such a convention whose recommendations, in the form of proposed constitutional amendments, do not become operative as part of the Constitution until approved by legislatures or conventions in three-fourths of the States, with the right reserved to Congress to designate "one or the other mode of ratification."

Hitherto, none of the petitions for the calling of such a convention have received the requisite vote of approval of two-thirds of the State legislatures; and consequently, Congress has never been confronted with the necessity of enacting legislation providing for the holding of a convention and the submission of its proposals for constitutional amendment. Therefore, a number of questions relevant to the composition, functioning and disposition of the conclusions of such a convention have never been authoritatively resolved.

---

[1] See the Appendix for the text of Article V.

As a prelude to consideration of many of these issues, a distinction should be made between "memorials" and petitions (or "applications") adopted by State legislatures.[2] The former are merely exhortations to the Congress to exercise its power to originate, approve, and submit for ratification a specific proposal as an amendment to the Constitution. As an exhortation, such memorials are deemed to give rise to no more than a moral obligation on the part of Congress to respond affirmatively thereto when tendered by a substantial number, or even by as many as two-thirds, of the States (74 Cong. Rec. 2024, 2026; 17 A.B.A.J. 143 (1931)). Whether, on the other hand, petitions for calling a constitutional convention addressed to Congress by a like number of States are possessed of greater significance or of binding legal effect presents a question which also has never been definitely resolved. At least two subsidiary issues are embraced within the question whether Congress is legally obligated, or is amenable to judicial proceedings to compel it, to adopt legislation calling a constitutional convention into being.

1. To merit counting, for purposes of determining when the requisite two-thirds of the States have acted, must the petitions tendered by the States be received within a specific time limit?

2. To merit counting, for purposes of determining that two-thirds of the States have acted, must the petitions be identical as to content: that is, must they request Congress to call a convention limited solely to the consideration of one, two, or three specific amendments, the draft of which has been set forth in identical language in each of the petitions tendered; or is it sufficient that the petitions, however disparate as to content, reflect merely a widely entertained desire for substantial revision of the Constitution to be effected, in whole or in part, by congressional provision for bringing a convention into being?

As to the first question, a substantial number of commentators are agreed that Congress is not obligated to act in response to petitions unless they are "reasonably contemporaneous with one another" and are "expressive of similar views respecting the nature of amendments to be sought." Moreover, they are able to cite one instance in which Congress ignored a reminder from one State that more than the requisite two-thirds of the States had submitted applications, albeit disparate as to content, for the convening of a constitutional convention.

"It appears from Madison's Journal that the framers intended this provision for the calling of a convention to be mandatory. Conceding that proposition, there remains a question as to when the condition on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States shall be deemed to have been fulfilled. In 1929 the Legislature of Wisconsin reminded Congress that 35 States had filed applications for a constitutional convention and called upon it to 'perform the mandatory duty . . . and forthwith call a convention to propose amendments to the Constitution' [71 Cong. Rec. 3369]. The 35 States listed in this memorial included every State but one which had ever petitioned Congress to call a convention for any purpose—even Virginia, Alabama, and Georgia, which had filed no such applications since 1788, 1832 and 1833, respectively. This resolution was ignored, no doubt on the theory approved in Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 374 (1921), that the successive steps in the process of constitutional amendment should not be widely separated in time, (Edward S. Corwin and Louise Ramsey. "The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment," 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 195–196 (1951). In accord is Lester B. Orfield, "The Amending of the Federal Constitution," pp. 41–43 (1942), as well as Wayne B. Wheeler, "Is a Constitutional Convention Impending," 21 Ill. L. Rev. 782, 792–795 (1927)).

In formulating answers to the second question, pertaining to the form that the petitions must take in order to merit counting, the commentators are not in agreement. According to Orfield, "when one legislature desires a convention for one purpose, as to prohibit polygamy, another legislature for another purpose, as to adopt the initiative and referendum, and a third legislature for a general purpose, there is some doubt whether the prerequisite for a call has been met." Not entirely in harmony with this underscored conclusion is his own suggestion that "the better view would seem to be that the ground of the applications would be immaterial, and that a demand by two-thirds of the states would conclusively show a widespread desire for constitutional changes" (op. cit., p. 42). In an unpublished thesis, entitled The Application Clause of the Amending Provision, p. 155 (1951), William R. Pullen, Documents Librarian at the University of North Carolina, also considered it "'logical' that a petition setting forth one amendment should be included for the purposes of calling a convention with those containing diverse proposals."

[2] Article V reads, in pertinent part: "The Congress, . . . or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments. . . ."

In a Staff Report submitted to the House Committee on the Judiciary in 1952, the last-mentioned conclusions were rejected as unsound. "To argue that Congress must launch the cumbersome, costly, and confusing proceedings of a national convention whenever [34] . . . States fortuitously submit resolutions requesting a convention for one purpose or another does not seem sound when viewed from a realistic standpoint. In the first place, should there be a widespread demand for substantial revision existing in the several States, there is nothing to prevent the State legislatures from submitting petitions requesting that a general convention be invoked by the Congress. But to transform every petition asking for a specific remedial amendment into a request for a general convention by classifying it with every other application asking for constitutional change would constitute a strained interpretation of Article V wholly at variance with the present needs and desires of the States.

"Perhaps the framers themselves envisioned that nothing but general conventions would be summoned pursuant to Article V. At any rate, the first two calls for a convention, which were contained in applications made in 1788 and 1789 by the States of Virginia and New York . . .. were demands for a convention of a general nature. The paucity of petitions, as well as the contents of succeeding applications, submitted to Congress during the first century of our Government indicates that the application process was originally regarded as a grave and serious procedure, to be employed only for significant and large scale overhaulings of the Constitution.

"But latterly, general satisfaction with our fundamental document has led petitions to contain enumerated grievances for which concrete relief through specific constitutional amendment is sought. Since 1899, there have been comparatively few applications for a general convention, with a preponderant number of petitions requesting a convention to propose only amendments frequently set forth verbatim in the text of the application itself. More and more the application process has been utilized either to prod a reluctant Congress into proposing amendments itself or to relieve abuses through the enactment of remedial legislation.

"In view of the transformation of applications from general requests, which were familiar to the framers in 1787, to those now most frequently submitted asking only for a limited reformation, there would seem to be no logical reason whatever for overlooking the language contained in the petitions of the States and forcing a general convention upon those States requesting nothing more than a single amendment to the Constitution. A contrary determination would oftentimes be at variance with the very wishes of those States submitting applications to the Congress as well as constitute a very narrow and restrictive interpretation of Article V itself. The provision would be reduced almost to the point of absurdity if Congress were forced to call a general convention to revise the entire Constitution upon the application of 10 States seeking a limit on taxes, 12 States a limit on wives, and [12] . . . more States a limit on the number of new States to be admitted to the Union.

"Accordingly, the views of Corwin and Ramsey with respect to the subject matter of petitions seems much preferable to those of the writers cited previously. These authors have suggested a sensible rule-of-thumb guide as follows:

" 'To be obligatory upon Congress, the applications of the states should be reasonably contemporaneous with one another, for only then would they be persuasive of a real consensus of opinion throughout the nation for holding a convention, and by the same token, they ought to be expressive of similar views respecting the nature of the amendments to be sought.' " (emphasis supplied) (26 Notre Dame Lawyer 195–196).

"Conversely, in accordance with the above rule, there appears no valid reason to suppose that the language of the amendments requested in State applications must be identical with one another in wording. It should be enough that the suggested amendments be of the same general subject matter in order to be included in a congressional count of applications for a constitutional convention, bearing in mind, of course, that any or all of the States may at any time request a general convention should strong sentiment for such proceedings prevail" (Problems relating to state applications for a convention to propose constitutional limitations on federal tax rates. House Committee on the Judiciary, 82d Congress, 2d session, House Committee Print, pp. 11–12 (1952)).

By way of concluding the aspect of constitutional revision considered in the preceding paragraph, it may be helpful to note that the following view has been informally advanced at academic meetings. It is contended that the two procedures for amending the Constitution set forth in Article V were intended to subserve different purposes; namely, piecemeal amendment on the initiative of Congress, and substantial revision by recourse to constitutional convention; and that Congress accordingly is relieved of any legal obligation to take affirmative action when in receipt of State applications which uniformly embody the draft of a single proposed amendment or group of amendments. Were Congress to call a convention in response to applications in such form, the result, it is asserted, would be to rob the convention of the deliberative functions normally exercisable by such an agency and reduce it to the status of a messenger boy with but one duty to perform; specifically, to take a single vote approving the draft contained in the applications, coupled, perhaps, with a request that Congress submit the same for ratifications; and thereafter promptly adjourn. That States hitherto have intended to limit a convention called in obedience to their petitions is borne out by the terms of applications previously forwarded to Congress. Thus, in 1903 California included within its application a stipulation to the effect that the convention assembled in response thereto be "limited to the consideration and adoption of such amendments to said Constitution as herein mentioned and no other" (Cal. Stat. 1903, p. 683; Orfield, op. cit., p. 45 n. 18; 21 Ill. L. Rev. 794 n. 20).

Although Constitutional conventions, as used by the States, generally have been reserved for wholesale, as distinguished from piecemeal, constitutional revision, there is nothing in the record of the debates at the Philadelphia Convention which discloses any comparable intention on the part of the framers. On the contrary, the latter refrained from any evaluation or differentiation of the two procedures for amendment incorporated into Article V: and tended to view the convention merely as an alternative safeguard available to the States whenever Congress ceased to be responsive to popular will and persisted in a refusal to originate and submit constitutional amendments for ratification. Thus, the record is devoid of any evidence of an intention to preclude the use of conventions for effecting a specific alteration of the Constitution (Cyril F. Brickfield, State applications asking Congress to call a Federal constitutional convention, House Committee on the Judiciary, Committee print, p. 7, 86th Congress, 1st Session, 1959; John A. Jameson, The Constitutional Convention, § 540 (1873); Walter K. Tuller, A convention to amend the Constitution—why needed—how it may be obtained, 193 No. Amer. Rev. 369, 375–378 (1911)).

3. If applications are tendered by two-thirds of the States within a reasonable interval of time and Congress fails to act, is judicial relief to correct such inaction available?

Although it is conceded "that the framers intended this provision for the calling of a convention to be mandatory," most commentators are convinced that the Supreme Court would dismiss as judicially unenforceable a petition for mandamus or mandatory injunction. According to the late Professor Walter F. Dodd, "there is no compulsion upon Congress to call a convention" (Judicially unenforceable provisions of Constitutions, 80 U. Pa. L. Rev. 54, 82 (1932)). "Since Congress is one of the three coordinate branches of the government, there would seem to be no valid method of coercing it to make the call" (Orfield, op. cit., p. 41; citing Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 454–456, 457, 459 (1939)). "Nothing in the debates in the Convention that framed the Constitution throws any light on the views of the members on the details of the operation of the plan to adopt amendments by the convention method . . . The most serious objection offered to . . . article [V] as it was finally adopted was that both methods [of amendment] . . . required the assent of Congress and that at any time Congress, by inaction, might defeat the wishes of the States" (Wheeler, op. cit., pp. 785–792). In accord are Brickfield, op. cit., p. 4; Joint Economic Committee, The proposed 23d Amendment to the Constitution to repeal the 16th Amendment to the Constitution, S. Doc. No. 5, 87th Congress, 1st Session, pp. 22–24 (1961); and Westel W. Willoughby, Constitutional Law of the United States (2d ed., 1929), Vol. I, p. 597. To the contrary, however, is Tuller, op. cit., pp. 378–383, who believed that the duty imposed upon Congress being "purely ministerial . . . the form of remedy for compelling Congress to act would seem clearly to be a writ of mandamus."

4. If, in response to applications received from the requisite two thirds of the States, Congress brings a constitutional convention into being, is the latter bound to consider and approve, if at all, only those proposals for constitutional change as are embraced in such State applications and reiterated in congressional enactments providing for such an assemblage?

Manifestly, if the convention, of its own volition, chooses to confine its deliberations to a consideration of only those proposals contained in State applications, a controversy scarcely would arise. However, according to the great weight of authority, constitutional conventions once created, become relatively free agents whose final determinations are constitutionally tenable as long as they fall within the scope of the power conferred on such conventions by Article V. Consistently with such a view a convention could not be restricted as to the subjects of its deliberations by instructions emanating either from the States or from Congress.

"On general principles it would seem that it is not within the power of state legislatures to limit the action of a federal constitutional convention . . . The nature of the right conferred upon the state legislatures in requesting Congress to call a constitutional convention is nothing more or less than the right of petition. The statements of the purposes and objects underlying the petition would have no legal effect except as they indicated to any convention assembled the wishes of the people in regard to proposed changes. . . .

"Congress [also] would have no authority to restrict the subjects of the amendments proposed by the convention. Congress is the judge of the nature and text of the amendment submitted in the usual way, by resolution. The state legislatures must either ratify such amendment or ignore it. They cannot change its context. The alternative convention method was intended, apparently, to provide a method of securing amendments in a form or upon subjects which Congress might not approve. The only limitation to such a convention would be those imposed by the Constitution itself, such as the one in article V that no state shall be deprived of equal suffrage in the Senate (Wheeler, op. cit., pp. 793–796; accord: Tuller, p. 384; William A. Platz, Article Five of the Federal Constitution, 3 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 17, 45–46 (1934); Orfield, op. cit., pp. 44–45).

"The earliest view seems to have been that a convention was absolute (Walter F. Dodd, The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions, ch. 3 (1910)). The convention was sovereign and subject to no restraint. On the other hand, Jameson, whose views have been most frequently cited in decisions, viewed a convention as a body with strictly limited powers, and subject to the restrictions imposed on it by the legislative call (Jameson, op. cit., §§ 382–389). A third and intermediate view is that urged by [Walter F.] Dodd—that a convention, though not sovereign, is a body independent of the legislature; it is bound by the existing constitution, but not by the acts of the legislature, as to the extent of its constituent power (Dodd, op. cit., pp. 73, 77–80). This view has become increasingly prevalent in the state decisions. Accepting this view, it would seem that no restrictions can be placed on the scope of its constituent activity. * * *" (Orfield, op. cit., pp. 45–46).

Relying largely on the opinion of four Supreme Court Justices in Coleman v. Miller (supra, p. 459), that all controversies arising out of the amending process are political and nonlitigious, and that "undivided control of that [amending] process has been given by the Article [V] exclusively and completely to Congress," the staff of the House Committee on the Judiciary in the report, previously cited herein, which was prepared in 1952, adopted a contrary conclusion to the effect that "it would appear consonant with the duty imposed upon Congress to call a convention, that it have a hand in determining within what area its deliberations shall be confined.

"* * * To hold Congress strictly to the perfunctory duties of issuing a call for a constitutional convention while at the same time encumbering it with all of the onerous burdens inherent in making final decisions governing the remainder of the amending process is an inconsistent concept of congressional control over the amending process under Article V. * * * It is obvious that if the States request a general convention in their applications, it is incumbent upon Congress under Article V to convene such a gathering. But if the States themselves seek in their petitions only a specific amendment, it would certainly appear anomalous were Congress powerless to limit the scope of proceedings to the general subject matter in the text of the applications received from the legislatures of the several States" (Problems relating to state applications for a convention to propose constitutional limitations on federal tax rates, op. cit., pp. 15–16).

Upon appraisal of these two conflicting views of congressional power, it would seem that any restraints which Congress might attempt to impose on a convention with reference to amendments to be considered could be effectuated obliquely rather than directly. Insofar as the Supreme Court remains disposed to view controversies arising from the amending process as presenting nonlitigious, political questions, Congress thereby would be enabled to have its own views prevail by recourse to the expedient of refusing to submit to the States for ratification any amendment drafted by the convention contrary to its wishes. Thus, if Congress directed a convention to consider only proposals A and B, and the convention concluded its deliberations by recommending additional proposals C, D, and E, Congress merely would refrain from submitting the latter for ratification. Of course, if the convention incorporated all five proposals in a single package or draft, inaction by the Congress manifestly would have the effect of nullifying in its entirety the endeavors of the convention. However, as long as the Court chooses not to entertain controversies originating in the amending process, such inaction could be remedied or corrected only at the ballot box. This conclusion rests on a premise supported by Article V; namely, that a constitutional convention is without the power to submit its recommendations directly to the States for approval or rejection, but is dependent upon the intervention of Congress to effect the latter result (Orfield, op. cit., p. 46).

5. Questions relating to the selection of delegates to, and the internal organization of, a constitutional convention.

If Congress issues a call for a convention, "a number of issues would still remain unsettled. When and where could the convention meet? How would the delegates be elected? Would they represent the states or the people as an aggregate? The debates of the Constitutional Convention throw no light on these problems. Logically it would seem that Congress could regulate all these matters . . . It might reasonably be argued that under its power to call a convention it has implied authority to fix the time and place of meetings, the number, manner, and date of the election of delegates, and that it also may determine whether the delegates shall represent the states or the nation at large. If the precedent of the Constitutional Convention were followed, the call would be addressed to the states; and would leave to them the method of selecting delegates, and the convention would vote by states" (Orfield, op. cit., pp. 43–44).

Speculating further on the latter problem, another commentator concluded that "it would be possible for Congress to disregard the states entirely and have the delegates apportioned on the basis of population. The Constitution guarantees to each State equal suffrage in the Senate so that in the adoption of amendments through congressional resolutions submitted to the states the small states have an equal or greater voice in making constitutional changes than the larger and more populous states. If, however, Congress by the convention method could fix the basis of apportionment of delegates for the constitutional convention on the ratio of population, an entirely different situation would result in the initiation of amendments. . . .

"Two factors would operate to prevent Congress from attempting to apportion delegates on the basis of population: the senators from small states would be unlikely to vote for a resolution which would deprive their states of the power they hold under the Constitution, and the influence of precedent. In the Convention of 1787 . . . the delegates were elected by states and voted by states. This precedent would probably be followed in a future constitutional convention if one should be held. As a matter of political expediency, a convention call would probably be addressed to the states and leave to them the method of selecting delegates" (Wheeler, op. cit., pp. 798–799; Tuller, op. cit., p. 386).

As to its internal functioning, the convention presumably would be free of domination either by the Congress or the States in the matter of "selecting its own officers, fixing its own rules of procedure, passing on the qualification and election of its members, and from proposing any alterations it chooses. While it is in existence it is a separate arm of the nation, coordinate with Congress in its sphere" (Orfield, op. cit., p. 47). Being "independent of Congress in all respects," the convention, according to another commentator, would have inherent power to appropriate funds for its own subsistence in the event Congress failed to make available moneys for the performance of its duties (Platz, op. cit., p. 47; Orfield, op. cit., p. 46).

6. Scope of a convention's power to revise the existing Constitution

Absent any refusal on the part of Congress to submit for ratification the proposals emanating from a convention or reluctance on the part of legislatures or specially chosen conventions, of three-fourths of the States to approve the same, a convention called into being by Congress potentially is capable of rewriting the existing Constitution or of supplanting it with an entirely new one. If the procedural requirements of Article V for effecting constitutional change are faithfully observed, then any reform which emerges from a convention and is duly approved becomes a valid part of the Constitution. Since the Constitution is the supreme law of the land (Article VI), any addition thereto or revision thereof, if adopted in conformity with its terms, also partakes of the attributes of supreme law.

To be sure, if, for example, the clause of Article V, stipulating that "no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of equal Suffrage in the Senate," were to be deleted by a duly approved amendment, a radical alteration of our Federal system will have been effected; but the latter fact, it may fairly be argued, scarcely can detract from the validity of the amendment whereby such deletion was consummated. Can there be such a thing as an unconstitutional constitutional amendment? Would not this be a contradiction in terms? Questions such as these have of course never been resolved.

Moreover, as long as the Supreme Court regards the written Constitution as the supreme law of the land, it is hardly likely that it would deign to hold invalid a duly approved constitutional amendment. The Court did of course pass on the merits of contentions challenging the validity of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Amendments, but only to the extent of rejecting such contentions summarily (United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931); Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922)). These decisions are viewed by Westel W. Willoughby as definitively disposing of the notion "that there are inherent limitations upon the amending power [or] that there are some matters which cannot legally be justified even by a constitutional amendment" (Fundamental Concepts of Public Law, pp. 250–251 (1931)). Elsewhere the latter author concluded that "the fundamental error of all those who have sought to place inherent limitations upon the amending power . . . is that they necessarily start with the assumption that the Constitution is in the nature of an agreement or compact between the States, or that it implies an understanding between them, or between them and the National Government, that the allocation of powers as provided for in the original instrument shall not be changed in any of its more important or essential features. It is surprising to this writer that this theory which, since the Civil War, has been so decisively rejected by the American people and by the courts, should again be brought forward to support a constitutional argument" (The Constitutional Law of the United States, Vol. I, p. 600 (2d ed., 1929); accord, Wheeler, op. cit., p. 801; Platz, op. cit., pp. 25, n. 41, 26).

A model bill establishing the procedure for calling a constitutional convention and regulating the composition thereof is contained in Problems relating to state applications for a convention to propose constitutional limitations on federal tax rates, op. cit., pp. 21–24.

Appendix

United States Constitution, Article V

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

[AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE]

Special Analysis

(June 1967)

A CONVENTION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION?

(Questions Involved In Calling A Convention Upon Applications By State Legislatures)

INTRODUCTION

Genesis of Article

Shortly before the closing session of the Federal Convention of 1787, George Mason of Virginia addressed himself to a proposal by James Madison to provide a method for amending the Constitution. This proposal, reported out of the Committee on Style and Revision as Article V, "left proposed amendments entirely in the hands of the National Legislature. . . ." [1] The proposal as it stands, Mason said, is "exceptional and dangerous." If the proposing of amendments depends ultimately upon Congress, he continued, then "no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the government should become oppressive, as he verily believed would be the case." [2]

Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania then proposed that the article be amended to require Congress to call a convention to propose amendments upon application of two-thirds of the states. His proposal was seconded by Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, and adopted.[3] Thus Article V provides that amendments may be proposed (1) by the Congress, or (2) by a convention upon application of two-thirds (34) of the state legislatures.

Article V provides, in pertinent part, that:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode or Ratification may be proposed by the Congress. . . .

Twenty-five amendments to the Constitution have been proposed by the Congress and ratified by the states since the Convention of 1787. The alternate route of amending the Constitution—proposed amendments hammered out by delegates in convention assembled and submitted to the states for ratification—has never been followed, and there are few signposts to guide those states attempting to travel this path.

Reaction to Report on State Applications

On March 18, 1967, Fred P. Graham, of the New York Times, reported that "A campaign for a constitutional convention to modify the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote rule is nearing success . . ." and that "most of official Washington has been caught by surprise." [4] "The Legislatures of Illinois and Colorado," wrote Graham, "formally asked Congress this week to call a constitutional convention, bringing to 32 the number of states that have taken this step." [5]

Reaction to Graham's story was immediate. "At no time has Congress or the country been willing to open the basic structure of our Government and the character of our liberties to the unpredictable whims of a new convention," editorialized the Washington Post. "It is difficult to believe that well-informed legislators will risk such hazards to our constitutional underpinnings if they know what they are doing. This back-door assault on the Constitution should be stopped." [6]

The League of Women Voters charged that "Blitz methods" had been used in securing the petitions, and that "at least 24 of the 32 legislatures were malapportioned at the time they passed the resolutions." [7]

Then, on March 21, 1967, Senator Everett Dirksen (R. Ill.) was interviewed by reporters. "We are working on five" legislatures, Dirksen stated, and predicted the number of petitions "will shortly go up to 33 and then 34." [8] Continuing, he stated that the matter "would have the highest privilege" and would go directly before the Senate. In that event, observed the Washington Evening Star, "we will be in for one of the wildest, most emotional and most confusing battles royal of this or any other Congress—with a full-fledged liberal filibuster very possibly tossed in for good measure." [9] Dirksen said a filibuster could be overcome.

Objecting to charges that the movement for a convention had been a "back-door assault," Senator Dirksen said, "Why, this has been an open and above-board matter in every legislature." [10]

---

[1] Brickfield, Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention, House Committee on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 5 (Comm. Print 1957) (hereinafter cited as Brickfield).
[2] Madison, Journal of the Federal Convention, p. 737 (Scott ed. 1893).
[3] Ibid.
[4] New York Times, March 18, 1967, p. 1, col. 6 (city ed.).
[5] Ibid.
[6] The Washington Post, March 21, 1967, Editorial.
[7] New York Times, March 22, 1967, p. 21, col. 2 (city ed.).
[8] New York Times March 23, 1967, p. 23, col. 2 (city ed.).
[9] The Washington Evening Star, April 2, 1967, Editorial.
[10] The Washington Post, March 22, 1967, p. A21.

On March 22, 1967, Senators Joseph D. Tydings (D. Md.) and William Proxmire (D. Wisc.) addressed the Senate in opposition to a constitutional convention. Describing the efforts of proponents of a constitutional convention as closely resembling "an assault by the Marx Brothers on Fort Knox," [1] Tydings stated that:

> . . . despite any impressive totals of the number of State legislatures which have asked Congress for some kind of action regarding State legislature apportionment, the number of States which have at any time asked Congress for a convention to propose a malapportionment amendment is at least four and probably seven States short of the necessary 34. And of the 30 memorials which apparently have been enacted asking for such a convention, 24 are certainly void, because they were enacted by legislatures which were themselves unconstitutionally malapportioned at the time. . . .[2]

Senator Proxmire also questioned the validity of many of the petitions, stating that he had > . . . received a study from the Library of Congress that indicates all but six of the 32 legislatures calling for a constitutional convention on apportionment were illegally constituted at the time they approved the memorials to Congress calling for such a convention. . . .[3]

Reaction of the press to the prospects of a constitutional convention appear to be about evenly divided. The Washington Post, in a second editorial, urged the states "not to put themselves in the posture of trying to tear the Union to pieces," [4] and noted with approval that a bill had been introduced in the Maryland legislature to rescind its petition.[5] Commenting on the speeches of Senators Proxmire and Tydings, the Post stated that they "may not be on solid ground in urging Congress to reject the resolution because 26 of the 32 legislatures passing it were improperly apportioned, but that is certainly a good reason for the states themselves to reconsider their rash action." [6]

A brief comment in National Review observed that "The sudden prospect of a convention has made flocks of liberal editorialists unhappy—or, perhaps, embarrassed that the thing is going to happen despite their vigorous efforts to ignore it for three years. Really, could 32 state legislatures have acted in secret, or did the press decide that what we didn't know couldn't hurt us?" [7]

David Lawrence summed up what is perhaps the unstated fear of some when he wrote that > . . . Congress probably would much rather have action on a single amendment involving the reapportionment problem than to have a whole gamut of issues opened up for constitutional amendment . . . there are no limits on the questions that a constitutional convention can consider.

>
> The delegates to the convention from the several states could take action to prevent the federal government from using public funds as a means of interfering in activities which are explicitly reserved to the states by the Constitution. There are, in fact, opportunities for a complete shift of power from the federal government back to the states if the device of a national constitutional convention now is put into operation.[8]

Some of the questions that have arisen—and will continue to arise—in connection with the current movement by the states to invoke the constitutional convention provision of Article V are discussed in the sections that follow.

EFFORTS TO INVOKE THE CONVENTION PROVISION PRIOR TO THE 88TH CONGRESS

As pointed out in a House Judiciary Committee staff report, it is "a far from easy task" to obtain an accurate tabulation of the total number of petitions requesting a constitutional convention.[9] The present practice is for the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate to refer such petitions to a congressional committee.[10] Most petitions appear to be referred to the House and Senate

---

[1] 113 Congressional Record, S4231, March 22, 1967 (daily ed.).
[2] Ibid.
[3] 113 Congressional Record, S4209, March 22, 1967 (daily ed.).
[4] The Washington Post, March 24, 1967, Editorial.
[5] The bill failed to pass.
[6] The Washington Post, March 24, 1967, Editorial.
[7] 19 National Review (April 11, 1967), p. 1.
[8] The Washington Evening Star, "Constitutional Rebellion Looms," (March 22, 1967).
[9] Staff of House Committee on the Judiciary, 82nd Cong., 2d Sess., Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates, p. 5 (Comm. Print 1952).
[10] Ibid. But see Proposed Legislation, p. 48, infra.

Judiciary Committees, although a few applications seeking a convention to limit federal income taxing powers have been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, and to the Committee on Finance of the Senate. The Judiciary Committee staff report concluded that locating the text of state applications for constitutional conventions in public records depends "less upon diligence than on chance." If a petition is properly transmitted, its receipt is noted in the Congressional Record. But the staff report observed that "the index to the Congressional Record is indeed weak stratum upon which to base a call for a Federal convention. . . ."[1]

More than 200 Applications for Conventions

Fred P. Graham, former Chief Counsel of the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, and currently New York Times Washington correspondent, writing in the December, 1963, issue of the American Bar Association Journal, lists 206 petitions applying for a constitutional convention.[2] These were filed prior to 1963. These petitions have covered many subjects: direct election of Senators, limitation on federal taxing power, prohibition of polygamy, general revision of the Constitution, world federal government, repeal of the 18th Amendment, Presidential tenure, treaty-making, taxation of federal and state securities, protective tariffs, wages and hours, gasoline tax, tidelands problem, control of trusts, grants-in-aid, popular ratification of amendments, constitutionality of state enactments, revision of Article V, and the Townsend plan.[3]

It is interesting to note that only "10 petitions constituted the entire output for the first hundred years of our Federal Government under the United States Constitution."[4] Between 1893 and 1911, however, 31 state legislatures adopted a total of 73 petitions relating to the election of Senators. This is the largest number of petitions calling for a convention on a particular subject.[5]

Writing in 1957, Brickfield stated that:

> . . . The second largest number concerned the Federal power over the taxation of incomes on which 32 applications have been submitted by 27 States. Beginning with New York in 1906, 27 States have petitioned for a convention on the subject of prohibiting polygamy, and 29 petitions from 22 States have sought a general revision of the Constitution without specifying a particular subject. These are the four subjects on which the greatest number of petitions have been received.
>
> From 1 to 8 petitions have been presented to Congress on a wide variety of subjects including world federal government, limitation of Presidential tenure, repeal of the 18th amendment, taxation of tax-exempt securities, regulation of hours of labor and minimum wages by Congress, treatymaking, and methods of apportionment. In all, there have been over 195 petitions in the last 60 years—as distinguished from 10 in the first 100 years—of our Nation. However, many of the petitions adopted since the turn of this century represent second and third petitions from several of the State legislatures, and some legislatures have rescinded their earlier actions.[6]

Since 1957, however, the number of applications calling for a convention on the subject of state legislature reapportionment has greatly increased, and that subject now ranks well within the top four subjects on which the greatest number of petitions have been received.

It should be pointed out that there is considerable disagreement on what constitutes a valid effective petition and how petitions are to be counted. If Article V "requires merely that two-thirds of the States submit applications, a convention has long been overdue."[7]

As Graham has pointed out, analysis of state applications submitted to Congress "reveals that, although most amounted to little more than a political gesture and a waste of time, some of them did contribute directly to the eventual adoption of an amendment,"[8] the most notable example being the 17th Amendment providing for election of senators by the people.

---

[1] Ibid.
[2] Graham, "The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments," 49 A.B.A.J., pp. 1175, 1179–83 (December, 1963b).
[3] See Brickfield, p. 74.
[4] Ibid., p. 7.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid., pp. 7–8.
[7] Ibid.
[8] Graham, "The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments," op. cit., p. 1176.

EFFORTS TO INVOKE THE CONVENTION PROVISION BEGINNING WITH THE 88TH CONGRESS

Background—The Reapportionment Decisions

On March 26, 1962, the United States Supreme Court, in the landmark case of Baker v. Carr,[1] made the field of state legislative apportionment subject to federal judicial review. Dissenting, Mr. Justice Frankfurter said that the Court reversed "a uniform course of decision" and that the decision was "a massive repudiation of the experience of our whole past."

Prior to Baker, the courts held that suits to compel legislative reapportionment were political in nature, and thus nonjusticiable in federal courts.[2] Rejecting this argument when raised in Baker, Mr. Justice Brennan, writing for the Court, stated:

> . . . it is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States, which gives rise to the "political question."[3]

Mr. Justice Frankfurter, perhaps anticipating public response to the Baker decision, wrote:

> . . . The Court's authority—possessed of neither the purse nor the sword—ultimately rests on sustained public confidence in its moral sanction. Such feeling must be nourished by the Court's complete detachment, in fact and in appearance, from political entanglements and by abstention from injecting itself into the clash of political forces in political settlements.[4]

Having held that the federal courts have jurisdiction in apportionment cases, the Court remanded the case to the lower court for further proceedings.

In December, 1962, the 16th Biennial General Assembly of the States[5] endorsed three proposed amendments to the Constitution, and recommended that the states petition Congress for a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing these amendments. Two of the proposed amendments are outside the scope of this Analysis,[6] the third sought to nullify the holding of Baker v. Carr, supra, by limiting the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary so as to exclude suits involving state legislative apportionment. Response to the General Assembly's proposed amendments was contagious: during the first eight months of the First Session of the Eighty-eighth Congress (1963) the legislatures of eighteen states submitted to Congress thirty-eight applications calling for a constitutional convention to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States. This was almost four times as many applications as were submitted to Congress in the first century of the Constitution, and by far the largest number to be adopted in any one year. Twelve of these applications for a constitutional convention dealt with apportionment of state legislatures.

After this initial activity on the part of the states, the controversy surrounding apportionment of state legislatures shifted temporarily to the law reviews.[7] The quiet was to be short-lived however, for on June 15, 1964, the Supreme Court handed down a decision which went beyond its assertion of jurisdiction in Baker v. Carr, supra. In the case of Reynolds v. Sims,[8] the Court held that, "as a basic constitutional standard, the Equal Protection Clause requires that both houses of a bicameral state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis."[9] Explaining the reasoning of the Court, Chief Justice Warren wrote:

---

[1] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[2] See, e.g., Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1964).

[3] Baker v. Carr, op. cit., p. 210.

[4] Baker v. Carr, op. cit., p. 301 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting), emphasis added.

[5] See, e.g., Dixon, "Apportionment Standards and Judicial Power," 38 Notre Dame Law, 367 (1963); Hanson, "Courts in the Thicket: The Problem of Judicial Standards in Apportionment Cases," 12 Am U. L. Rev. 51 (1963); Lucas, "Legislative Apportionment and Representative Government: The Meaning of Baker v. Carr," 61 Mich. L. Rev. 645 (1963); McKay, "The Federal Analogy and State Apportionment Standards," 38 Notre Dame Law. 387 (1963); and Weaver & Hess, "A Procedure for Non-Partisan Districting: Development of Computer Techniques," 73 Yale L.J. 288 (1963).

[6] Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

[7] The Council of State Governments, a joint governmental agency of the states, supported by appropriations of the state legislatures, holds a General Assembly of the states biennially.

[8] See Shanahan, "Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Will Strengthen Federal-State Relations," 49 A.B.A.J. 631 (July, 1963) for a general discussion of these proposed amendments. But see Black, "Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Would Return Us to Confederacy," 49 A.B.A.J. 687 (July, 1963) for a different interpretation of how these proposals would affect federal-state relations.

[9] Ibid., p. 568.

> Legislators represent people, not trees or acres. Legislators are elected by voters, not farms or cities or economic interests. As long as ours is a representative form of government, and our legislatures are those instruments of government elected directly by and directly representative of the people, the right to elect legislators in a free and unimpaired fashion is a bedrock of our political system.[1]

The Chief Justice also argued:

> . . . The right of a citizen to equal representation and to have his vote weighted equally with those of all other citizens in the election of members of one house of a bicameral state legislature would amount to little if States could effectively submerge the equal-population principle in the apportionment of seats in the other house. If such a scheme were permissible, an individual citizen's ability to exercise an effective voice in the only instrument of state government directly representative of the people might be almost as effectively thwarted as if neither house were apportioned on a population basis. Deadlock between the two bodies might result in compromise and concession on some issues. But in all too many cases the more probable result would be frustration of the majority will through minority veto in the house not apportioned on a population basis, stemming directly from the failure to accord adequate overall legislative representation to all of the State's citizens on a nondiscriminatory basis. In summary, we can perceive no constitutional difference, with respect to the geographical distribution of state legislative representation, between the two houses of a bicameral state legislature.[2]

Dissenting, Justice Harlan wrote:

> The Court's elaboration of its new "constitutional" doctrine indicates how far—and how unwisely—it has strayed from the appropriate bounds of its authority. The consequence of today's decision is that in all but the handful of States which may already satisfy the new requirements the local District Court or, it may be, the state courts, are given blanket authority and the constitutional duty to supervise apportionment of the State Legislaures. It is difficult to imagine a more intolerable and inappropriate interference by the judiciary with the independent legislatures of the States.[3]

The immediate effect of Reynolds v. Sims was to nullify apportionment provisions in the constitutions and laws of six states.[4] The long-range effect, however, was the rekindling of a controversy that remains unabated. Efforts to permit the states to consider factors other than population in apportioning their legislatures took two forms: (1) Attempts were made in Congress to curb the effects of the Court's ruling. They were unsuccessful.[5] (2) Meeting in Chicago, in December, 1964, the 17th Biennial General Assembly of the States proposed that the states petition Congress to convene a constitutional convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution for consideration by the states.

Unlike an amendment proposed two years earlier by the 16th General Assembly, the 1964 version did not refer to removal of jurisdiction of apportionment cases from the federal judiciary, but instead followed basically the language of an amendment proposed by Senator Dirksen in the 89th Congress.[6]

SURVEY OF APPLICATIONS FOR A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION TO PROPOSE AN AMENDMENT DEALING WITH APPORTIONMENT

Summary

Since 1963, petitions from at least twenty-eight states have been received by Congress requesting that body to call a constitutional convention to deal—in one fashion or another—with state legislative apportionment.

---

[1] Ibid., p. 562.
[2] Ibid., p. 576.
[3] Ibid., p. 615 (Harlan, J., dissenting).
[4] Alabama, Colorado, Delaware, Maryland, New York, and Virginia.
[5] The House of Representatives, on August 19, 1964, passed H.R. 11926, introduced by Rep. William M. Tuck (D., Va.) which would have taken jurisdiction over state apportionment cases away from the federal district courts, and appellate jurisdiction over such cases away from the Supreme Court. The Senate, after a filibuster, passed a "sense of Congress" resolution that the federal courts should give the state legislatures ample time within which to apportion, but this was rejected by the House, and the 88th Congress adjourned.
During the 89th Congress, a majority of the Senate voted to propose a constitutional amendment introduced by Senator Dirksen that would permit a state to apportion one house of a bicameral legislature on factors other than population, but the votes were seven short of the required two-thirds. The votes were: 57 to 39 in 1965 and 55 to 38 in 1966.
[6] See preceding footnote.

It also appears that four other states have adopted such petitions. However, the records of the congressional committees to which they are usually referred indicate that they have not been received. These petitions and the questions raised as to their status are discussed on pages 15 through 17.

The amendments described in the twenty-eight petitions now on file in the House and Senate Judiciary Committees are of three general types, with one minor exception.

First are those petitions seeking consideration of an amendment that would abolish federal judicial review of state legislative apportionment and thus set aside the rule announced in Baker v. Carr. State petitions falling within this category are Nevada, Washington, and Wyoming. Three states then, have petitions on file seeking an amendment to abolish federal judicial review of state legislative apportionment.[1]

Petitions in the second category seek a convention to propose an amendment to set aside the rule in Reynolds v. Sims that both houses of a bicameral state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis. These seek consideration of an amendment to allow one house to be apportioned on factors other than population. In addition, the amendment described in these petitions would permit a state to make its own determination of how membership of governing bodies of its cities and other governmental units would be apportioned.

Twenty-two states have filed petitions calling for a convention for the purpose of proposing such an amendment. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Arizona, Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

The petitions of Illinois and North Dakota comprise the third category. Unlike the other petitions, these do not include the language of the amendment they wish considered. They call for a convention for the purpose of submitting an amendment which:

> . . . will secure to the people the right of some choice in the method of apportionment of one house of the State legislature on a basis other than population alone. . . .

One of the petitions on file, from Nebraska, employs the same language as that found in the first sections of the petitions proposing amendments to abolish federal judicial review over state apportionment schemes, but does not contain the second section that specifically states that "the judicial power of the United States shall not extend . . . to any controversy relating to apportionment . . . in a State legislature."

The four states whose petitions were not accounted for in the Judiciary Committee files are New Hampshire, Colorado, Utah, and Georgia.

Petitions Submitted to the 88th Congress

Congress received petitions calling for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment dealing with apportionment from 11 states during the first session (1963) of the 88th Congress; one during the second session (1964).

In 1963, Arkansas (H.J.R. 4), Idaho (S.J.M. 4), Kansas (S.C.R. 4), Missouri (H.C.R. 4), Montana (S.J.R. 15), Nevada (S.J.R. 2), South Carolina (H.C.R.), South Dakota (S.J.R. 2), Texas (H.C.R. 22), Washington (H.J.M. 1), and Wyoming (E.J.M. 14) submitted applications for a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing the following amendment, or a slight variation thereof:

> SECTION 1. No provision of this Constitution, or any amendment thereto, shall restrict or limit any State in the apportionment of representation in its legislature.
>
> SEC. 2. The judicial power of the United States shall not extend to any suit in law or equity, or to any controversy relating to apportionment of representation in a State legislature.
>
> SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislature of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission. . . .

Virginia followed suit in 1964, and submitted H.J.R. 90. These petitions were found in the files in both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees, with the exception of the petition from South Carolina, and Committee records indicate that the South Carolina petition was referred to the Committee on June 11, 1963.

[1] Nine other states have filed applications of this type. However, later they filed applications in a different form.

Petitions Submitted to the 89th Congress

Twenty-two states submitted constitutional convention petitions to Congress during the 89th Congress. Of these 22 petitions, 21 proposed the following amendment, or a slight variation thereof:

> SECTION 1. Nothing in this Constitution shall prohibit any State which shall have a bicameral legislature from apportioning the membership of one house of such legislature on factors other than population, provided that the plan of such apportionment shall have been submitted to and approved by a vote of the electorate of that State.
>
> SEC. 2. Nothing in this Constitution shall restrict or limit a State in its determination of how membership of governing bodies of its subordinate units shall be apportioned.
>
> SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress.

These states were Alabama (S.J.R. 3), Arkansas (H.J.R. 1), Arizona (H.C.M. 1), Florida (H.M. 2433), Idaho (S.J.M. 1), Kansas (S.C.R. 1), Kentucky (S.R. 8), Louisiana (S.C.R. 25), Maryland (S.J.R. 1), Minnesota (R. 5), Mississippi (S.C.R. 101), Missouri (H.C.R. 2), Montana (S.J.R. 5), New Mexico (S.J.R. 2), North Carolina (R. 60), Oklahoma (E.S.C.R 3), South Carolina (C.R.), South Dakota (S.J.R. 1), Tennessee (H.J.R. 34), Texas (S.C.R. 24), and Virginia (H.J.R. 13).

The 22nd state, Nebraska, submitted Legislative Resolution 14, which requested a convention to propose the following amendment:

> SEC. 1. No provision of this Constitution, or any amendment thereto, shall restrict or limit any State in the apportionment of representation in its legislature.
>
> SEC. 2. [Provides that article shall be inoperative unless ratified by legislatures of three-fourths of the States within seven years.]

It should be noted that the language of section one of the Nebraska resolution is identical to the language of the proposed amendment contained in the petitions submitted to the 88th Congress. The second section of the proposed amendment contained in the petitions submitted to the 88th Congress—"the judicial power of the United States shall not extend to any suit in law or equity, or to any controversy relating to apportionment of representation in a State Legislature"—is not included in the Nebraska petition.

Of the 22 states to petition the 89th Congress for a constitutional convention, nine had submitted an earlier call for a convention to the 88th Congress. They were: Arkansas; Idaho, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas and Virginia.

These 22 petitions were found in the files of both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees, with the exception of the petition from Oklahoma, which was not in the files of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Committee records indicate, however, that the petition was referred on January 22, 1965.

Petitions Submitted to the 90th Congress

Four petitions calling for a constitutional convention have been received thus far by the 90th Congress, and have been recorded in both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees.

These petitions are from Illinois (H.J.R. 32), Indiana (H.E.C.R. 58), Nevada (S.J.R. 2), and North Dakota (HCKI–1).

The Illinois and North Dakota petitions call for a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment which:

> . . . will secure to the people the right of some choice in the method of apportionment of one house of a state legislature on a basis other than population alone. . . .

The Indiana petition, H.E.C.R. 58, is substantially identical in language to the petitions filed with the 89th Congress, and Nevada's S.J.R. 2 is identical—in fact, is the same petition—that was submitted to the 88th Congress. Correspondence indicates that it was re-submitted in March, 1967.

Status of Four Other Petitions

In addition to the 28 states listed above, four others have adopted such petitions. The states in this group are New Hampshire, Colorado, Utah, and Georgia; and these petitions are discussed below:

New Hampshire. According to the Clerk of the New Hampshire House of Representatives, the legislature of that state approved an application for a convention on apportionment on April 8, 1965 and "the petition was transmitted to the Congress immediately after its adoption."[1] The resolution containing the application directed that copies be "immediately transmitted" to the Clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives, the Secretary of the U.S. Senate, and to each member of Congress from New Hampshire.[2] The office of the Clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives is unable to find any record of receiving this petition and it was not received by the Judiciary Committees, to which such petitions are referred, according to Committee records. However, on June 8, 1965, Rep. Cleveland, of New Hampshire, announced that the petition had been adopted by the legislature of his state and the text of the petition appears in the Congressional Record with his remarks on the floor of the House.[3]

The New Hampshire application called for a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to permit a state with a bicameral legislature to apportion one house thereof on factors other than population provided the plan is approved by a vote of the electorate of the state. Also, this amendment would cover apportionment of subordinate units of government.

Colorado's application does not appear in the files of the Judiciary Committees presumably because it was transmitted to the individual members of Congress from that state instead of the Speaker (or the Clerk) of the House and the President (or the Secretary) of the Senate.

A copy of the Colorado application, furnished AEI by the office of the Governor, is identical to the applications from Illinois and North Dakota described above.[4]

Utah. The text of the petition from Utah (S.J.R. 3) appears in the Congressional Record of March 8, 1965, following a statement by Senator Bennett of Utah on the subject of apportionment.[5] Copies have not been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House or Senate, according to the records of those Committees.

Georgia. According to evidence received from the Lieutenant Governor of Georgia, the legislature of that state adopted its petition (S.R. 14) on April 9, 1965. The Georgia petition is substantially identical to 21 petitions submitted to the 89th Congress. (See p. 13) AEI has been unable to find a record of the Georgia petition in the Congressional Record or the files of the Judiciary Committees. In August, 1965, the Legislative Reference Service reported that no record could be found of a petition from Georgia having been communicated to either House of Congress.[6]

HOW MANY PETITIONS CAN BE COUNTED AS "APPLICATIONS" TO "THE CONGRESS"?

Aside from claims that some of the petitions are invalid and unacceptable, some opponents of the proposed convention contend that four of the petitions claimed by Senator Dirksen have not been received by the Congress and, therefore, cannot be counted. They point out that Article V states that a convention shall be called upon "application" to the "Congress" by two-thirds of the state legislatures and they argue that a petition must be transmitted to and received by both houses of the Congress in order to constitute an "application" to the Congress. Presumably, this means that a verified copy of the application must be submitted to the Speaker (or the Clerk) of the House and the President (or the Secretary) of the Senate. It follows, opponents say, that four petitions—from New Hampshire, Colorado, Utah, and the petition adopted by Georgia—cannot be counted as "applications" for a convention.

On the other hand, it can be argued that such a literal reading of Article V would frustrate its purpose and thwart the will of the four legislatures mentioned above on the basis of inadvertence, or at most, a harmless procedural error. Apparently, opponents of a convention do not seriously dispute the claim that [1] Letter to AEI from Francis W. Tolman, Clerk of the House, New Hampshire General Court, dated May 9, 1967, enclosing a copy of the application.

[2] Ibid.
[3] 111 Congressional Record, p. 12397, June 8, 1965 (daily ed.).
[4] AEI was advised by John W. Patterson, Special Assistant to the Governor of Colorado, in a letter dated May 12, 1967, that copies of the Colorado petition (S.J. Memorial No. 5) "were transmitted to the Colorado Congressmen on March 28, 1967."
[5] 111 Congressional Record, p. 4210, Mar. 8, 1965.
[6] Yndlosky, State Petitions and Memorials to Congress on the Subject of Apportionment of State Legislatures iv, Library of Congress Legislative Reference Service Report JK140C—32/205R.

the legislatures of New Hampshire, Colorado, and Utah have adopted resolutions petitioning Congress to call a constitutional convention. As noted above, copies of the petitions from New Hampshire and Utah have been published in the Congressional Record and copies of the Colorado petition were transmitted to the members of Congress from that state, according to the office of the Governor.

Advocates of the proposed convention point out that Congress has not enacted any law for the guidance of state legislatures in communicating applications for a convention to the Congress; that the adoption of such applications is a matter of public record, and that the essential question is not whether copies were submitted to the proper officers of the Congress, but whether they were in fact adopted.

Students of congressional procedure point out that the Congress can take action on the basis of known official state actions although copies of formal certifications of such actions have not been received and recorded by the proper congressional authorities. For example, newly elected members of the House have been permitted to take the oath of office "in cases where the credentials are delayed or lost and there is no doubt of the election, or where the governor of a state has declined to give credentials to a person whose election was undoubted and uncontested."[1]

If the petitions of New Hampshire, Colorado, Utah, and Georgia are recognized as valid "applications," 32 of the required 34 applications can be counted—two short of the required two-thirds.

OTHER QUESTIONS INVOLVED IN CALLING A CONVENTION

What happens if the 34th state calls for a convention? Since Article V provides that "Congress . . . shall call a convention. . . ." may the Congress exercise any discretion in the matter? No legislation exists concerning the scope of this section of Article V; no procedures have been devised that may be instituted under it.[2] As early as 1965, the then Senator Paul Douglas (D. Ill.), remarked:

> In my opinion, and that of other observers, there is little real expectation that the Congress will call a convention even if two-thirds of the State legislatures pass the applications. It cannot, I believe, be forced to do so.[3]

David Lawrence has commented on this point as follows:

> Within the last few days certain senators in their speeches have come up with the amazing idea that the Constitution doesn't really mean what it says and that a constitutional convention cannot be called to consider amendments unless Congress first examines those proposals and agrees to permit such a convention to be held.
>
> This would be a defiance of the Constitution itself. The document says plainly that Congress, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments." The Constitution doesn't say that Congress "may" call a convention, but declares explicitly that it "shall" call a convention. The provision is mandatory and not discretionary. It doesn't matter if different states give one or more reasons. The simple fact remains that the states merely present their "applications" for a constitutional convention, and Congress is obliged to honor it.
>
> Recent statements by senators, however, assert that Congress need not call a convention if it thinks the kind of amendments proposed are going to be unpalatable. These same senators are contending that Congress may refuse to call such a convention if "for any reason" the resolutions passed by the legislatures "appear to be invalid."[4]

Some of the questions that may soon have to be answered include:

Must the language of amendments proposed in state petitions be identical?

How long does a state petition requesting a constitutional convention remain valid?

Is a petition from a malapportioned state legislature valid?

---

[1] Rules and Manual of the House of Representatives, House Document 459, 86th Congress, 2d session, p. 80, § 236.

[2] See draft proposals to provide such procedures beginning at page 48.

[3] Douglas, Statement before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, U.S. Senate, Mar. 4, 1965. (Mimeo.)

[4] Lawrence, "Constitution Specific on Convention," Washington Evening Star (Apr. 21, 1967).

May a state rescind a petition calling for a convention?

Does Congress have power to restrict the scope of a convention's deliberations?

Do State applications control the subjects considered in a convention?

Does Congress have the power to refuse to call a constitutional convention?

The language of Article V, writes Brickfield, "is silent as to how and when conventions are to be convened and . . . does not state how conventions are to be formed or what rules of procedure are to govern their acts." [1] The debates of the Convention of 1787, while raising many questions concerning a convention, leave them unanswered. "Court decisions furnish little more than signpost assistance . . . [and] have relegated the matter of constitutional amendment to that area of constitutional law known as political questions." [2] The ultimate effect is that the courts will not attempt to resolve "many of the significant questions that will arise in the present attempt to propose amendments to our fundamental law by convention . . ." [3] and, consequently, the decisions of the Congress "will be final and conclusive on the courts." [4]

Legislative Proposals to Implement Article V

A draft bill to provide a permanent procedure for calling constitutional conventions and a resolution to provide for processing state applications are reproduced in this publication beginning at page 54. An analysis of these proposals is reproduced beginning at page 48. These proposals and the analysis thereof were drafted by Dr. Brickfield in 1957 for the use of the House Committee on the Judiciary.

How Congress will ultimately resolve the many questions raised by Article V's constitutional convention provision remains to be seen. Various theories, however, have been advanced over the years, and some of these are discussed below.

MUST THE LANGUAGE OF AMENDMENTS PROPOSED IN STATE PETITIONS BE IDENTICAL?

In the past, when states have submitted applications asking for a constitutional convention, most of them have sought a convention to propose amendments on a particular subject matter. Of the more than 200 petitions on file calling for a convention, less than 40 seek a general revision of the Constitution.

The question has been raised, in the debates over the current apportionment petitions, whether a convention can "be convened on the basis of widely differing application seeking consideration of disparate issues." [5]

As noted above, of the 28 petitions received by the Committees on the Judiciary, 22 propose a specific amendment permitting one house of a bicameral legislature to be apportioned on factors other than population; three seek to abrogate the power of the federal judiciary to deal with apportionment; two, Illinois and North Dakota, do not call for a specific amendment, and the Nebraska petition is hybrid in nature. [6]

"We are told that these . . . groups of resolutions can be linked together," Senator Robert Kennedy (D. N.Y.) recently stated, "but certainly that cannot be." [7] Continuing, he argued:

> . . . One group wants the judiciary stripped of jurisdiction and left without power to deal with malapportionment in either chamber of a State legislature. There is no basis on which Congress can conclude that that group also wants an amendment which leaves power in the courts and sanctions malapportionment in only one house of a bicameral legislature. Those legislatures which may have believed it wrong for the Federal courts to enter the "political thicket" at all may not have wanted to guarantee the right of each State to malapportion one branch of its legislature. A request to shift power from one level to another in the Federal system is not the same as a request for permission to deny majority rule in a State legislature. . . . [8]

---

[1] Brickfield, p. 68.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Bonfield, "Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems," 39 Notre Dame Law. 659 (1964) (hereinafter cited as Bonfield).
[4] Ibid., pp. 659–660.
[5] 113 Congressional Record S5455, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.)
[6] The Nebraska petition sets forth an amendment that is identical, in its first section, to those amendments submitted to the 88th Congress but fails to add the second section that specifically abrogates Federal jurisdiction over apportionment cases.
[7] 113 Congressional Record S5455, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).
[8] Ibid.

Lending support to Senator Kennedy's argument is a recent law review article by Professor Charles L. Black,[1] wherein he stated:

> Assuming these "applications" are not within article V, it may still be suggested that a sort of "reformation" might be applied—that Congress, even if not persuaded that the present applications asked for the thing contemplated by article V, ought to call such convention as it thinks it would have been obliged to call if the applications had been of the right sort. This seems clearly wrong, for several reasons. Generally, a high degree of adherence to exact form, at least in matters of importance, is desirable in this ultimate legitimating process; a constitutional amendment ought to go through a process unequivocally binding on all. Congress is given no power to call a constitutional convention when it wants to, or thinks that on the general equities perhaps it should; if Congress desires an amendment, article V very clearly tells how that desire is to be made known. Congress' power as to conventions is not discretionary but strictly conditional, and if the condition is not met Congress not only need not but may not call a valid convention.
>
> It is, moreover, illegitimate to infer, from a state's having asked for a "convention" to vote a textually-given amendment up or down, that it desires some other sort of convention. It is not for Congress to guess whether a state which asks for the one kind of "convention" wants the other as a second choice. Altogether different political considerations might govern.[2]

Senator Dirksen, on the other hand, disagrees with the above conclusions, stating:

> It has been said that some of the applications are not valid as to form and substance. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States is completely silent on that point. Since State legislatures must initiate, under article V, that is a matter for them to determine. All that is needed, by a rule of reason, is a clear expression of intent by the legislatures. So what difference does it make in what form the application for a convention is made?[3]

Substantial authority exists to support this point of view. For example, Wheeler, in a University of Illinois law review article,[4] feels that conventions must be general in scope and that a state petition calling for a specific amendment could have no legal or binding effect on a convention, but that such petition could be counted in determining whether the requisite number of petitions had been submitted for calling a convention.[5]

And Brickfield writes:

> . . . It would be the duty of Congress to promulgate rules for counting the applications and determining the kind of convention to be convened. Congress would have to determine whether the language of State applications seeking an amendment on a specific subject should be identical in their texts, or whether applications using varying language but appertaining to the same subject matter generally would be acceptable. Clearly the latter method is preferable. . . .[6]

HOW LONG DOES A STATE PETITION REQUESTING A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION REMAIN VALID?

Recent Senate debates on the current movement by the states to seek a constitutional convention through the application process have raised the question of timing. "Is the 90th Congress required to recognize resolutions sent to the 89th Congress?" asked Senator Jacob Javits (R. N.Y.). "Are state resolutions passed more than two years ago . . . still valid?"[7]

Senator Robert Kennedy also questioned whether the petitions were "sufficiently contemporaneous to be treated as a valid reflection of the will of the people at any one time."[8]

---

[1] Black, "The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster," 72 Yale L.J. 957 (1963).
[2] Ibid. at 963–64.
[3] 113 Congressional Record S8463, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).
[4] Wheeler, "Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?" 21 Ill. L. Rev. 782 (1927).
[5] Ibid., p. 795.
[6] Brickfield, p. 20, citing Corwin and Ramsey, "The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment," 26 Notre Dame Law. 185 (1951).
[7] 113 Congressional Record S5029, Apr. 13, 1967 (daily ed.).
[8] 113 Congressional Record S8455, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).

The amending article is silent on the subject of what force or effect the lapse of time will have on an application. The Supreme Court dealt with an analogous situation concerning the length of pendency of an amendment proposed by the Congress to the States for ratification in the case of Dillon v. Gloss[1] and thought that amendments ought not be left open for all time:

> We do not find anything in the article which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the States may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective. We do find that which strongly suggests the contrary.[2]

In the Dillon case, Congress proposed to the States for ratification a resolution which resulted in the 18th amendment. In the resolution, Congress fixed a period of 7 years within which three-fourths of the States had to ratify or else the resolution would have been lost. In upholding this action on the part of Congress, the Court announced (1) that Congress could fix a reasonable time within which proposed amendments had to be ratified, and (2) that 7 years was without question a reasonable time. The Court also noted that the proposal of an amendment and its ratification were not unrelated events:

> First, proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, it is only when there is deemed to be a necessity therefor that amendments are to be proposed, the reasonable implication being that when proposed they are to be considered and disposed of presently. Thirdly, as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do.[3]

In passing on this case the Court enunciated the so-called "contemporaneous" test and it would seem logical to apply this same interpretive technique in dealing with state applications for constitutional conventions. There is nothing in Article V which suggests that an application of a state, once made, is to be valid for all time or that the application of one state may be separated from those of other states by many years and still be effective. Using the same reasoning which the Court employed in Dillon v. Gloss, quoted above, and employing it by way of analogy, it would appear, first, that state applications and the calling of a convention are not unrelated acts but are succeeding steps in a single endeavor, not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, since it is only when legislatures deem amendments to be necessary that applications for a convention are made to the Congress, a reasonable inference is that such a convention is needed to "presently" dispose of the needs of the people. Thirdly, since an application is made in response to popular demand and is effective when made by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, "there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people, in all sections at relatively the same period" which applications "scattered through a long series of years would not do." From this the conclusion may be drawn that an application should have force for a reasonable time only.

The question then arises, what constitutes a "reasonable time"? One student of the subject believes "the maximum life of a request should not be more than a generation."[4] On the other hand, another suggests that Congress count only those petitions submitted during its life.[5]

Bonfield disagrees with both theories:

> . . . no measure of the precise length of a generation is provided: nor is any satisfactory rationale offered to justify Congress' counting applications together that have been tendered over such an appreciable time period.[6]

Bonfield argues that the suggestion that applications expire at the end of each Congress is equally impracticable because:

> . . . In the first place, ten applications tendered the last day of one Congress, and thirty submitted the first day of the following one would be insufficient even though they may have been submitted only three months apart.

---

[1] Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
[2] Ibid., p. 374.
[3] Ibid., pp. 374–75.
[4] Orfield, Amending the Federal Constitution 42 (1942).
[5] Sprague, "Shall We Have a Federal Convention, and What Shall It Do?" 3 Maine L. Rev. 115, 128 (1910).
[6] Bonfield, op cit., p. 668.

Additionally, it should be recalled that the state legislatures do not address their applications to any specific Congress. . . .[1]

Advocating a middle ground, Bonfield suggests:

. . . In counting applications for an Article V convention, Congress should properly consider only those tendered in that period, prior to the most recent application, during which all of the state legislatures have had an opportunity to consider the question at a full regular session. That is, the maximum time between those applications that can be counted together should not exceed that period during which all state legislatures have met once for a full regular session. In no case could the time period involved exceed about two and a half years.

The advantage of this approach seems evident. The burden should always be on those who invoke this process to demonstrate clearly by sufficient contemporaneity of their applications that there is a present agreement among two-thirds of the states as to the desirability of a constitutional convention. Such a present consensus can only be realistically demonstrated by limiting the count of such applications to those made during the most recent period during which all state legislatures have had a reasonable opportunity to consider the question. Only applications filed during this period would accurately represent the results of the most recent poll that could reasonably be taken on the subject.[2]

The cases of Coleman v. Miller[3] and Wise v. Chandler[4] before the state courts of Kansas and Kentucky presented for judicial determination, among other things, the question of what is a reasonable time under Article V. Both cases involved the question of the validity of a state's purported ratification of the proposed child-labor amendment more than 12 years after it was proposed by Congress.[5] The United States Supreme Court, in Dillon v. Gloss,[6] had earlier held that Congress, in proposing an amendment, could fix a reasonable time for ratification and that the 7 years it had prescribed for the adoption of the 18th amendment was, without question, a reasonable time.[7] The Kansas and Kentucky cases offered an opportunity for a further judicial decision on whether a reasonable time had been exceeded in those instances.

The state courts reached opposite results, the Kansas court holding that despite the lapse of 12 years the proposed amendment still reflected the "felt needs of the day" and was, therefore, still open to ratification;[8] the Kentucky court, on the other hand, holding that a reasonable period during which the state might have acted had expired, and that a resubmission of the proposed amendment by Congress was necessary if further action was to be taken on it.[9]

However, the Supreme Court, in Coleman v. Miller, decided the question by concluding that it was essentially political and not subject to judicial determination. In so deciding, the Court reasoned that, inasmuch as the Constitution set forth no satisfactory criteria for judicial determination of the question, and since a decision would involve an appraisal of a great variety of political, social, and economic conditions, the question was more appropriately one for congressional than for judicial determination.

The Court distinguished Dillon v. Gloss[10] on the ground that Congress had set a definite time within which the proposed amendment had to be ratified. It did not follow, as the Court pointed out, that when Congress has not set a time limitation, the courts had to take on the responsibility of deciding what constitutes a reasonable time.

When a proposed amendment is based upon the needs, economic or otherwise, of the Nation, it seems necessary to consider, in determining what is a reasonable time, the conditions then prevailing throughout the country, and whether they had so far changed since the submission of the proposed amendment as to make the proposal no longer responsive to the conception which inspired it. As the Supreme Court stated (p. 453):

---

[1] Ibid.
[2] Bonfield, op. cit., pp. 668–60.
[3] 146 Kan. 390 (1937), aff'd. 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
[4] 270 Ky. 1 (1937), aff'd. 271 Ky. 252 (1937), dis'd 307 U.S. 474 (1939).
[5] 43 Stat. 670 (1924).
[6] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).
[7] Ibid., 376.
[8] 146 Kan. 390 (1937).
[9] 270 Ky. 1 (1937), aff'd. 271 Ky. 252 (1937), dis'd 307 U.S. 474 (1939).
[10] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

> In short, the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as in this case it does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social, and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the National Legislature of the political, social, and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment.

It must be conceded that what is a reasonable time in one situation will not necessarily be reasonable in another. To illustrate: A comparatively short time could probably be held reasonable in the case of an amendment necessitated by the exigencies of a national emergency such as a war or an economic crisis, whereas a much longer period would conceivably be reasonable in the case of an amendment changing the term of office of the President. The suggested test laid down by Jameson, and cited with approval in Dillon v. Gloss, which seems to be a workable one is that a proposed amendment—

> . . . has relation to the sentiment and felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while the sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist it ought to be regarded as waived. . . .

Such a test sets up no rigid rule which will result in a similar time limitation being applied to every case. It only prescribes that an independent judgment should be used in each particular case in deciding whether sufficient time has elapsed to render the passage of an amendment unnecessary from a practical standpoint and unsupported by general public sentiment.

Relating this test to the reapportionment petitions, Senator Robert Kennedy stated:

> . . . How long the States have collectively to propose or ratify specific constitutional change has always been a matter of congressional judgment. In deciding that question, Congress must determine when the identical acts of various States will cease to be collectively responsive to a continuing public interest. In this particular case, over two-thirds of the enacting legislatures were faced with reapportionment at the time they acted and most of these legislatures have since changed in composition and outlook.[1] and he concluded:

> . . . Therefore it seems to me that Congress is justified in this case in setting a very short time period—certainly of no more than 2 or 3 years.[2]

In rebuttal, Senator Dirksen stated:

> The point has been made here this morning that these applications are invalid, because they date back, in some instances, to 1963. I think the Supreme Court demolished that argument pretty well in connection with the 17th amendment, in the case of Dillon against Gloss. That is the amendment that provided for the direct election of Senators. It was attacked because of section 3 in the amendment, which allowed 7 years for ratification.
>
> Oh, the great to-do, the hue and cry that was made, that that was out of all reason. But when the Supreme Court got through, they said 7 years was a reasonable time.
>
> If 7 years is reasonable for ratification, is 4 years an unreasonable time in which to initiate, by State application, a convention for the purpose of amending the same Constitution to which they have 7 years to approve an amendment? I submit that the rule of reason applies in every case.[3]

IS A PETITION FROM A MALAPPORTIONED STATE LEGISLATURE VALID?

A recent survey found that of the 32 states[4] calling for a convention on apportionment, 26 states were under federal court order to reapportion at the time the petitions were passed.[5] "For Congress to accept such positions," Senator Proxmire stated, "would be like permitting all Democrats to have two votes in a referendum to determine whether or not Democrats should have two votes."[6]

---

[1] 113 Congressional Record S5455, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid., S5463.
[4] The question of whether these petitions had to be received by Congress to be valid was not discussed in the report.
[5] Killian, Memorials to Congress on Constitutional Convention, Library of Congress Legislative Reference Service (Mar. 21, 1967).
[6] 113 Congressional Record S4209, Mar. 22, 1967 (daily ed.).

Senator Tydings agreed with Senator Proxmire, and in a lengthy floor speech, urged Congress to disregard—as invalid—petitions from malapportioned legislatures. "Every first year law student," Tydings said, "knows the basic principle of equity that a claimant 'must come into court with clean hands' . . . In my judgment, no illegally apportioned legislature has 'clean hands' in calling for a constitutional convention to legitimize its own illegality." [1]

In reply, Senator Dirksen stated, "I defy Senators to find anywhere, in any decision, the word 'illegal.' The court has never said that a malapportioned legislature is an illegal legislature." [2]

Continuing, Dirksen added:

> It has been said that some of the legislatures passed these resolutions when they were malapportioned. If that made this action invalid, then why not apply the same rule to everything that those legislatures did from the time they were malapportioned? Why not strike down the appropriations, strike down the validation of nominations to State courts and to State offices, strike down all the policy legislation and statutes they may have passed?
>
> Besides that, 25 of those States which are alleged to have been malapportioned approved 25 amendments to the Constitution, and we still accept them as valid.

In the case of Ryan v. Tinsley,[3] the court held that to rule invalid all legislative acts—or even those acts which appeared to favor over-represented interests—passed by malapportioned legislatures "would produce chaos." [4]

Agreeing with the Ryan case, Senator Tydings stated:

> In certain circumstances, however, malapportioned legislatures can take action which flagrantly violates the citizens' right to equal representation and which even after reapportionment cannot readily be corrected. The courts have recognized this problem, and have acted to protect the rights of State citizens to equal representation by forbidding such action by malapportioned legislatures.[5]

The Senator relied on the case of Toombs v. Fortson[6] for illustration saying:

> In Toombs against Fortson, a three-judge Federal court enjoined the Georgia General Assembly from calling a constitutional convention to revise the State constitution "until the general assembly is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards." In its order, the court stated:
>
> > We do not feel that it would be proper to permit such new constitution as may be proposed to be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection when it is, as is the case here, proposed under conditions of doubtful legality by a malapportioned legislative body. (Order dated June 24, 1964, Civil Action No. 7883.)
>
> As this order was being appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, a new election was held in Georgia. The Supreme Court remanded the case for a determination whether, in view of the new elections, the order was still necessary. (379 U.S. 621 (1965).) As Mr. Justice Harlan pointed out in his dissenting opinion, this disposition clearly indicated that the lower court could properly issue the injunction.[7]

On the other hand, legal analysts point out that in this case the lower court did not enjoin the General Assembly from "calling a convention to revise the State constitution" and that the Supreme Court did not rule on whether a malapportioned legislature can call such a convention. In fact, the order of the lower court stated explicitly that it did not prevent the calling of a "convention of the people to revise, amend or change the constitution," the delegates being elected and apportioned "based on population as near as practicable." The court order involved in the Toombs case was directed against submission of a new constitution drafted by the legislature itself, but it left no doubt that the legislature could call a convention to draft such amendments.

---

[1] 133 Congressional Record S5451–52, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).
[2] Ibid., S5643.
[3] Ryan v. Tinsley, 316 F. 2d 430 (10th Cir. 1963).
[4] Ibid., p. 432.
[5] 113 Congressional Record S5451, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).
[6] 205 F. Supp. 248.
[7] 113 Congressional Record S5451, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).

The Supreme Court sent the case back "for reconsideration of the desirability and need for the on-going injunction." The constitutional amendment drafted by the legislature was not placed on the ballot, a new legislature had been elected, and the Court was told that to assume that the new legislature would revive the proposal was "highly speculative."

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice Stewart, felt that the Supreme Court should have passed on the issue and should have upheld the power of a legislature—"even a malapportioned legislature"—to propose and submit constitutional amendments. The Harlan-Stewart dissent includes the following views:

> . . . I can find nothing in the Fourteenth Amendment, elsewhere in the Constitution, or in any decision of this Court which requires a State to initiate complete or partial constitutional change only by some method in which every voice in the voting population is given an opportunity to express itself. Can there be the slightest constitutional doubt that a State may lodge the power to initiate constitutional changes in any select body it pleases, such as a committee of the legislature, a group of constitutional lawyers, or even a "malapportioned" legislature—particularly one whose composition was considered, prior to this Court's reapportionment pronouncements of June 15, 1964, to be entirely and solely a matter of state concern?[1]

MAY A STATE RESCIND A PETITION CALLING FOR A CONVENTION?

In a recent editorial, the Washington Post suggested that:

> A second line of defense is to launch rescission movements in states which have given their approval. We are glad to note that such a bill has been introduced in Maryland. It should be passed despite the adjournment rush. Indeed, every state which rushed this resolution through a malapportioned legislature should take a second look at it. Senators Proxmire and Tydings may not be on solid ground in urging Congress to reject the resolution because 26 of the 32 legislatures passing it were improperly apportioned, but that is certainly a good reason for the states themselves to reconsider their rash action.[2]

May a state, once having made application for the call of a constitutional convention, withdraw or rescind its application? Some writers[3] on the subject believe that the legislatures may do so; at least one does not.[4]

The Supreme Court, in Coleman v. Miller,[5] on the question of whether a state could withdraw or rescind its prior rejection of a proposed amendment to the Constitution, stated that the matter concerned a political question over which Congress had the ultimate power of decision. Congress, with respect to the 14th amendment, did not permit the states of Ohio and New Jersey to rescind their ratifications of that amendment. It has taken no position with respect to the withdrawal of state applications.

If precedent of the ratification process is followed, then it would seem that legislatures could not withdraw their applications. However, the wisdom of applying such similar reasoning may well be questioned.

The present attitude among legislators seems to be that withdrawal is a permissible procedure. The application process is, of course, distinguishable from the ratifying of proposed amendments. In the one instance, in a state application only an initiating action is sought with no one finally committed to the substantive proposition contained in the application, not even the state which submits it. In the other instance, Congress has completed its work and is committed to the position outlined in the proposed amendment. Since this question is a political one, Congress, notwithstanding its earlier decision on ratifications, can permit the states to withdraw their applications.

DOES CONGRESS HAVE POWER TO RESTRICT THE SCOPE OF A CONVENTION'S DELIBERATIONS?

In November, 1965, Senator Dirksen, addressing the National Grange in Topeka, Kansas, stated:

---

[1] Fortson v. Toombs, 379 U.S. 621, 626 (1965).

[2] The Washington Post, Mar. 24, 1967, editorial. As noted previously, p. 3, the Maryland bill failed of passage in the adjournment rush.

[3] Cuvillier, "Shall We Revise the Constitution," 77 Forum, pp. 321, 325 (1927); Tuller, "A Convention To Amend the Constitution—Why Needed—How May It Be Obtained," 193, North American Review, pp. 383–84 (1911).

[4] See Packard, F. F., "Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions," 30 Chi-Kent Law Rev. 339 (1952).

[5] 307 U.S. 433, 448–49 (1939).

There can be and is a genuine fear of a constitutional convention on the part of many thoughtful people who urgently are working toward enactment of a constitutional amendment.

The fear is simple. There has never been a constitutional convention since these United States become a nation. There is strong legal opinion that once the states have mandated a convention, the courts nor the executive can control it, gulde it, or establish the matters with which it would deal.

A constitutional convention, many sincere people believe, would, once unlocked, spread in every direction.[1]

In the recent Senate debates over a constitutional convention, the following colloquy occurred between Senator Dirksen and Senator Proxmire:

Mr. PROXMIRE. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois if he still feels that sincere and thoughtful people feel that way, or whether he would disagree that sincere and thoughtful people feel that way.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, I never disagree with sincere people, but I call attention to the fact that I set up some premises and then proceeded to knock them down.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Would the Senator concede, as he said 2 years ago, that there is strong legal opinion that once the States have mandated a convention, the courts, as well as the executive, could not guide or control such a convention?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Exactly; and for what reason? If the courts or the executive could guide and control a convention, why have article V? That is what Hamilton was pointing out in his papers when he spoke about a hostile government that would not give ear to the people. So here we have the power of the people, and it is provided for in article V.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So the Senator is not only saying that if this convention is called it can go in any direction, but is he now adding that in his judgment this is the way a constitutional convention of the people should develop?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right, and the States upon their applications have indicated an interest in one thing, which is the question of apportionment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Then, the Senator would entertain only those petitions which would specify they are interested in apportionment; others would be considered invalid?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not run the convention.

Mr. PROXMIRE. No, but the Senator from Illinois is one of the most influential Members of this body and the principal proponent of a constitutional convention. He would certainly have a major influence on what the petitions acceptable by the Congress should contain and what Congress should consider in giving force to the applications. The Senator is taking the position that only those petitions which would seek to overturn the one-man, one-vote principle would be entertained.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is the only thing that the legislatures have asked for.

Mr. PROXMIRE. There are a number of States that have asked for a convention that would restrain the powers of the courts over some legislatures.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The fear is expressed that the legislatures would run hog wild. Apparently the Senator has no confidence in his State legislature.[2]

Assuming the right of the Congress to call a convention into being, has it the further right to impose restrictions upon its actions, to dictate to the convention its organization and modes of procedure; in short to subject it to the restraints of legislative law?

Those who deny that Cougress has the power to bind a convention rely heavily on the so-called doctrine of "conventional sovereignty." According to this theory, a convention is, in effect, a premier assembly of the people, a representative body charged by the people with the duty of framing the basic law of the land, for which purpose there devolves upon it all the power which the people themselves possess. In short, that for the particular business of amending and revising our Constitution, the convention is possessed of sovereign power and therefore is supreme to all other government branches or agencies.

For those who hold that such a convention would be a "premier assembly" of the people embodying their sovereign powers and would be unlimited and absolute, the following apt description was made in 1847, in connection with the

[1] Edwards, "Resist Constitutional Convention Plan," Chicago Tribune (Mar. 27, 1967).
[2] 113 Congressional Record S5462, Apr. 19, 1967 (daily ed.).

Illinois State Constitutional Convention (and it is pertinent to a Federal convention):

> We are here, the sovereignty of the state. We are what the people of the state would be if they were congregated here in one mass meeting. We are what Louis XIV said he was—"We are the State". We can trample the constitution under our feet as waste paper, and, no one can call us to an account save the people. . . .[1]

Sixty years later, a similar view was expressed by Senator Heyburn in the United States Senate:

> When the people of the United States meet in a constitutional convention there is no power to limit their action. They are greater than the Constitution, and they can repeal the provision that limits the right of amendment. They can repeal every section of it, because they are the peers of the people who made it.[2]

On the other hand, those who assert the right of the Congress to bind a convention contend that the convention is, in no proper sense of the term, a sovereign. It is, they argue, but an agency employed by the people to institute or revise fundamental law. The argument continues as follows: While there may be a special dignity attaching to a convention by reason of its framing fundamental law, no such dignity or power should attach which would invest it with a primacy over other branches of government having equally responsible functions. A constitutional convention has the general characteristics of a legislature but with the functions and organization only of a committee. Since its assembling is infrequent and dependent, for the most part upon considerations of expediency, it follows that the Congress, whose function it would be to declare and enforce the expediency, would be the proper body to determine the time and conditions for its assembling and to announce the will of the people in relation to the scope of the business committed to the convention.

Before considering the power and scope of a constitutional convention, it is important to distinguish between a revolutionary convention and a constitutional convention. The revolutionary convention, as its name implies, is part of the apparatus of a revolution. Jameson says it consists of those bodies of men who, in times of political crisis, assume or have cast upon them, provisionally, the function of government.[3] They either supplant or supplement the existing governmental organization.[4]

A constitutional convention, on the other hand as its name implies, is constitutional; not simply having for its object the framing or amending of constitutions, but as being within rather than without the pale of fundamental law. It is, says Jameson, "ancillary and subservient and not hostile and paramount to" the government then existing.[5]

A constitutional convention appointed under law and the Constitution, which presumes to overpass the limits imposed upon it by its creators, and seeks to do acts requiring the exercise of revolutionary powers, ceases to be a constitutional convention and becomes in the eye of law an extralegal or revolutionary convention.[6]

It might be well to note at this point that while the constitutional convention of 1787 acted beyond the scope of its authority, the Congress itself ratified and consented to the action of the convention and, in fact, transmitted its proposals to the states for their ratification. At no time did the convention seek to bypass or overrule the Congress; rather it submitted the draft Constitution to the Congress for its consideration and approval.[7]

Many authorities agree that a constitutional convention, once convened, would be limited by Article V. The real area of disagreement is whether a convention

---

[1] Illinois, Constitutional Convention (1847), debates p. 27.
[2] 46 Congressional Record 2769, Feb. 17, 1911.
[3] Jameson, Constitutional Conventions (4th ed.; 1887), p. 6; see also 35 Michigan Law Review, pp. 284–85.
[4] Ibid., p. 6.
[5] Ibid., p. 10.
[6] Behout and Kass, "How Can New Jersey Get a New Constitution," 6 University of Newark Law Review (1941) pp. 7–8; Stephens, Constitutional Convention Report, Georgia Bar Association (1931) p. 219.
[7] J. M. Beck, The Constitution of the United States (New York: Oxford University Press, 1924), p. 173 et seq.

would be further limited by the conditions set forth in a congressional act calling it together.

For example, Senator Jacob Javits (R. N.Y.) recently stated:

> I doubt very much that the Congress of the United States can limit such a constitutional convention when it passes a measure of implementation concerning what is requested by the States.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> A constitutional convention, even if elected under a congressional mandate that it could deal with only one subject, could run away. After all, it would be a duly created constitutional convention, and it could propose any amendments which it decided it wished to propose, subject to ratification.[1]

Those who do not think a convention would be limited, point out that a convention ought to be independent of Congress—free, even to alter the powers of Congress itself under the Constitution. They offer the argument that it was fear of this contention which caused the Congress, after much pressure had been brought to bear on it for a constitutional convention, to adopt instead, under the first method, the proposal which resulted in the 17th amendment to the Constitution on the popular election of Senators. Many argue that if Jameson's theory of an ancillary and subservient convention was valid, the Congress would have had no need to fear the then proposed constitutional convention in that Congress could have restricted the convention in its work and, among other things, prohibited it from dealing with the question of senatorial elections (Art. I, Sec. 3). In adopting the first alternative method in the amending process, they argue that the Congress, in fact, conceded it could not control the scope of a convention's proceedings.

This whole matter, of course, can be dismissed as being more argumentative than decisive. The Senate took the easy way out and avoided the issue. Whatever its merits, it can hardly be said that the Congress, in proposing the 17th Amendment to the states, decided this all-important issue.

While this question, then, has never been directly decided by Congress or by the courts, it has been argued that the whole scheme, history, and development of our government, its laws and institutions, require the control of any convention and the most logical place for exercising that control would be in the enabling act convening it, or in some other federal statutory law.

Dodd has no doubt on this question. He points out that a convention does not supersede the existing government; it "is bound by all restrictions either expressly or impliedly placed upon its actions by the Constitution in force at the time."[2] In the case of our federal Constitution, a new Constitution as proposed by a convention certainly could not become effective until promulgated and, in accordance with Article V (which permits Congress to select the mode of notification), ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. A convention then is an instrument of government and acts properly only when it stays within the orbit of its powers. Since the Congress is the branch of the federal government which has the duty of calling the convention, and since it acts at the requests of the states, and since both, in the final analysis, represent the people, the ultimate source of all power, a federal constitutional convention, to act validly, would necessarily have to stay within the designated limits of the congressional act which called it into being.

Inherent in all questions concerning constitutional law is one relating to the effect various articles of the Constitution have on each other. Article V is no exception and must be read and viewed in the light of all the other provisions of the Constitution.

In connection with congressional power, a provision which affects substantially all provisions is the so-called necessary and proper clause.[3] It reads:

> [The Congress shall have Power] . . . to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing powers, and all other Powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

By its terms there is conferred upon Congress:

> (1) the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers which had previously been conferred and, in addition, (2) all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States. . . .[4]

---

[1] 113 Congressional Record 85458, April 19, 1967 (daily ed.).
[2] Dodd, The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions, p. 93 (1910).
[3] U.S. Constitution, Art. I, Sec. 8, cl. 18.
[4] Watson, The Constitution of the United States, I, 701 (1910).

In addition, Bonfield would argue that an additional reason exists for not counting the present petitions as "applications" for an Article V convention. He writes:

> Article V clearly specified that Congress "shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." The process of proposing amendments contemplates a conscious weighing and evaluation of various alternative solutions to the problems perceived.
>
> If Article V contemplates this kind of a "Convention . . . for proposing Amendments," the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments should be deemed insufficient applications within the meaning of that provision. Instead of requesting a deliberative convention with full power to propose to the states any amendments dealing with the subject in question that it thinks proper, these resolutions demand "a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States." As a result, the resolutions in issue really call for a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove in a mechanical way the text of specific amendments that have already been "proposed" elsewhere. In this sense, the proponents of these resolutions seek to make the "Convention" part of the ratifying process, rather than part of the deliberative process for "proposing" constitutional amendment. Consequently, the resolutions in question should not empower Congress to call a convention authorized to submit amendments to the states for ratification. They are not "Application[s for a] Convention . . . for proposing amendments" as Article V demands; rather, they are applications for a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove the submission to the states of particular amendments "proposed" elsewhere.
>
> Furthermore, Congress has no authority to treat the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments as applications for the kind of convention Article V does contemplate. It cannot be inferred from these resolutions requesting a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove particular amendments for submission to the states, that the state legislatures tendering them would be satisfied or willing to have a plenary convention consider the problems at which these amendments were directed, and submit to the states the solutions to those problems that the convention deems best.[1]

Dr. Brickfield points out, however, that:

> Under article V, Congress calls the convention after the required number of states have submitted petitions. It has the duty to announce the will of the State legislatures in relation to the scope of the convention's business and, under the necessary and proper clause, it may set up the procedures and conditions so that the convention may not only function, but that it may control the convention's actions to make certain that it conforms to the mandates and directives of the Congress, the State legislatures, and ultimately the people. This does not mean that the convention may not exercise its free will on the substantive matters before it; it means simply that its will shall be exercised within the framework set by the congressional act calling it into being.[2]

If Brickfield's contentions be accepted, state applications may be considered as mandates to the Congress, not only to call the convention, but also to specify the scope and limit of a convention's deliberations in accordance with state directives. In 1957, the State of Indiana in five separate applications calling for conventions to consider five different subjects set forth the above theory in the following language in its resolution:

> For the reason that the power of the sovereign States to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States by convention under article V has never been exercised and no precedent exists for the calling or holding of such convention, the State of Indiana hereby declares the following basic principles with respect thereto: that the power of the sovereign States to amend the Constitution of the United States under article V is absolute; that the power of the sovereign States to propose amendments to the Constitution by convention under article V is absolute; that the power of the sovereign States extends over such convention and the scope and control thereof and that it is within their sovereign power to prescribe whether such

[1] Bonfield, pp. 662–63.
[2] Brickfield, p. 18. (Emphasis added.)

This clause has been declared to be an enlargement of the powers granted to Congress and enables it to select the means necessary [1] to effectuate those powers. Thus since Congress, under Article V must call the convention, it of necessity must have the power to fix the date and place of meeting. Further, since Article V places on Congress the function of selecting the method of state ratification, it must legislate into law a set of federal rules governing the process.[2] There is then a close relationship between the principal congressional power conferred under Article V and the supporting or ancillary powers, conferred under the necessary and proper clause, to carry the principal power into execution. Without the supporting power, the principal power would cease to exist.[3]

These powers apply not only to procedural functions such as convening the convention and adopting the mode of ratification, but they also apply to the vital issue of declaring whether the convention shall consider either a single subject, a limited number of subjects, or a large scale overhauling of the Constitution. As will be discussed below, Congress, acting on the applications and at the request of the state legislatures, may limit the scope of such conventions and as a corollary it follows that Congress may adopt the means necessary to invoke such limitation upon the convention.

DO STATE APPLICATIONS CONTROL THE SUBJECTS CONSIDERED IN A CONVENTION?

Arguments in recent years have sought to shift some of the emphasis on control over federal conventions from the Congress to the state legislatures. In support of this position of state legislative control, the State of Georgia, in an application for a federal constitutional convention which would have taken up the problem of revising the constitution generally, declared in its resolution that the federal convention was to amend the Constitution:

> . . . in the particulars herein enumerated and in such others as the people of the other States many deem needful of amendment.[4]

New York, in 1931, in declaring its right to control the scope of federal conventions, made application for a convention to propose an amendment to repeal the 18th Amendment "and no other article of the Constitution." [5]

In recent years, many States have expressly cited in their petitions the particular subject matter they intended that the convention should consider.

In fact, of the 32 apportionment petitions currently under consideration, 29 include the exact wording of the amendment to be considered and proposed by the convention.

Professor Bonfield argues, however, that:

> The notion that state applications can limit a convention called pursuant thereto solely to a consideration of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that contained in those applications is not widely accepted. It has been insisted that "the nature of the right conferred upon the state legislatures in requesting Congress to call a constitutional convention is nothing more or less than the right of petition." The Convention itself is a Federal instrumentality set up by Congress under powers granted to it by the Constitution. Since Article V directs Congress to call the convention, and is silent as to the details of such a body, Congress is the only authority entitled to specify those details. Consequently, if any power can limit such a convention to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same subject matter as that contained in the state applications, it can only be Congress. "State legislatures . . . have no authority to limit an instrumentality set up under the federal Constitution. . . . The right of the legislatures is confined to applying for a convention, and any statement of purposes in their petition would be irrelevant as to the scope of powers of the convention." [6]

---

[1] McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (U.S. 1819); U.S. Congress, Senate, 82d Cong., 2d sess., 1952, Senate Doc. 170, Constitution of the United States of America (1952), 307.

[2] Rottschaeffer, Handbook on American Constitutional Law 887 (1939).

[3] Tucker, Constitution of the United States (1899), I. 368, but see Tucker, Ibid., p. 365. The "necessary and proper" clause stated to be unnecessary since Congress, having been granted a principal power, by implication may adopt the means necessary to execute the power.

[4] U.S. Congress, Senate, 71st Cong., 2d Sess., 1930, Senate Doc. 78, p. 25.

[5] 75 Congressional Record 48.

[6] Bonfield, pp. 677–78.

convention shall be general or shall be limited to the proposal of a specified amendment or of amendments in a specified field; that the exercise by the sovereign States of their power to require the calling of such convention contemplates that the applications of the several States for such convention shall prescribe the scope thereof and the essential provisions for holding the same; that the scope of such convention and the provisions for holding the same are established in and by the applications therefor by the legislatures of the two-thirds majority of the several States required by article V to call the same, and that it is the duty of the Congress to call such convention in conformity therewith; that such convention is without power to transcend, and the delegates to such convention are without power to act except within, the limitations and provisions so prescribed.

Brickfield has summarized his findings in this regard as follows:

> Just how far States may go in imposing their wills on conventions is a matter on which the Founding Fathers failed to define the limits in article V. It is evident, however, that together, the Congress and the State legislatures play the dominant roles. Together they not only initiate but also finally approve the work of any convention. With this ultimate power at their command, they may fence off the boundaries of power within which a convention must operate.
>
> While both have important roles, the greater and final power . . . lies in the Congress of the United States, not so much because of the express provisions of article V which creates the power, but by reason of the article's failure to place sanctions on the Congress and for its failure to provide for review of congressional action.[1]

DOES CONGRESS HAVE THE POWER TO REFUSE TO CALL A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION?

May Congress refuse to call a convention should the requisite number of states comply? The Founding Fathers included the Convention provision in Article V as a remedy for the states to bring about constitutional reform in the event the federal government refused to do so.[2] It was certainly their intention that Congress should have no discretion in the matter of calling a convention once two-thirds of the states applied.[3]

Madison, on the question, stated:

> It is to be observed however that the question concerning a general convention will not belong to the Federal Legislature. If two-thirds of the States apply for one, Congress cannot refuse to call it: if not, the other mode of amendments must be pursued.[4]

James Iredell, before the North Carolina ratifying convention, also stated:

> . . . that it was very evident that it (the proposal of amendments) did not depend on the will of Congress; for that the legislatures of two-thirds of the States were authorized to make application for calling a convention to propose amendments, and, on such application, it is provided that Congress shall call such convention, so that they will have no option. (Emphasis in original.)[5]

In addition to the above statements made contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution as to its true intent, there are the express words of Article V that Congress "shall call a convention." But suppose the Congress refuses? Is there any process or machinery under our constitutional system by which the Congress could be compelled to perform this duty? It is argued by some that the congressional act being ministerial, the courts could compel the legislative branch to act by way of mandamus, otherwise the whole intention of the framers would be nullified.[6]

---

[1] Brickfield, pp. 25–26.

[2] I Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, 203 (Rev. ed. 1937).

[3] See excerpts from the constitutional debates, W. K. Tuller, "A Convention To Amend the Constitution," quoting from Elliott's Debates, 193, N. Amer. Rev. 375–78 (1911).

[4] Documentary History of the Constitution, V, 141, 143, citing Madison's letter to Mr. Eve, Jan. 2, 1789.

[5] Elliott's Debates (2d ed.: 1937), IV, p. 178. But see Walter F. Dodd, "Judicially Non-Enforceable Provisions of Constitution," 80 University of Pennsylvania Law Review, p. 82 (1931), "In general, a constitutional provision which states that a legislature 'shall' perform a duty is equivalent to a statement that it 'may' or 'shall have power.'"

[6] Tuller, "A Convention To Amend the Constitution," 193 North American Review, pp. 379–81 (1911).; Cuvillier, "Shall We Revise the Constitution?" (1927), 77 Forum, pp. 323–25; F. E. Packard, "Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program," 30 Chi-Kent Law Rev. 128 (1952).

Both Dr. Brickfield and Professor Bonfield take issue with this argument. Brickfield states:[1]

> It seems more likely, however, that the courts would refuse to issue such a writ for the same reasons that they have refused to issue writs on the President of the United States, namely the doctrine of separation of powers which proscribes action by one branch of our Government against another.

In Mississippi v. Johnson, the Supreme Court, among other things, pointed out that:

> The Congress is the legislative branch of the Government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department; though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance.[2]

Agreeing with Brickfield's statement, Bonfield notes that:

> . . . the courts have never issued an injunction or writ of mandamus directly against the President or Congress because of the doctrine of separation of powers embodied in our National Constitution, and the consequent obligation of respect owed co-equal branches of the National Government by the Federal judiciary. To do so here would reflect a "lack of respect" for the actions of a coordinate branch of the Federal Government in regard to a subject that may even textually be exclusively committed to its judgment by the Constitution. Therefore, aside from the very practical inability of the courts adequately to enforce any decree directing Congress to call such a convention, sound reasons and well-established precedent dictate the correctness of the assumption that it lacks the authority to do so.[3]

Do recent cases, such as Baker v. Carr, supra, and Westberry v. Sanders,[4] indicate that the Court might be more willing to enter the political thicket? Senator Hruska clearly believes that these cases would support Supreme Court intervention, reasoning:

> The Court has had no difficulty in recent cases involving the legislatures. Granted they are State legislatures, but the principle remains the same. The Court secured compliance with its orders even though the action involved was to a certain extent legislative whereas in our case it clearly is not. These cases involved apportionment, beginning with Baker against Carr and more recently Reynolds against Sims, and related cases. In those instances, where a legislature refused to obey an order to redistrict, the Court developed its own districting plan and directed elections to be held. It is really not arguable that the right of two-thirds of the State legislatures for a Constitutional Convention clearly provided by article V is less a right than that of the people of Tennessee to have reapportionment of their State legislature.
>
> Should the Congress fail to respond affirmatively to the applications of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States for a Constitutional Convention, it would appear that the Supreme Court could enforce this right, and that precedent for it to do so exists. Should the Congress refuse to comply with the writ, the Court, in enforcing this right, could itself order the Convention. Some State legislatures, I would be certain, would pursue this form of remedy should the Congress fail to act.[5]

Bonfield, on the other hand, argues convincingly that these cases are inapposite. He writes:

> Recent cases holding that the courts can force the states to reapportion their legislatures conformably to equal protection, or that the courts can force state legislatures to draw congressional districts so that they are as nearly equal in population as practicable are inapposite here. The reason for this is that "it is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government, and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States which gives rise to the 'political question.'" That is, "the nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers." Judicial review on the merits of state legislative apportionment or the drawing of congressional districts by the states only involves federal judicial superintendence of state action or inaction; but

---

[1] Brickfield, p. 27.
[2] Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475, 500 (U.S. 1866).
[3] Bonfield, pp. 672–73.
[4] Westberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1 (1964).
[5] 113 Congressional Record S6654–55, May 10, 1967 (daily ed.).

judicial review of Congress' failure to call an Article V convention directly involves the federal courts in an effort to force its co-equal branch of government to perform a duty exclusively entrusted to it by the Constitution.[1]

From a legal standpoint, Brickfield concludes, the same situation exists "as arose from the failure of Congress to reapportion the number of Representatives in the House of Representatives, which article I, section 2, clause 3, requires it to do every 10 years, but which in 1920 Congress failed to do. Thus while Congress has the mandate to perform, its failure or refusal to do so apparently gives rise to no enforcible cause of action. In line with this point, it may be observed that court orders, even if it could be argued that the States had a right to bring legal actions in the courts against an unwilling Congress to call a convention, would have little meaning or effect since the courts lack the necessary tools to enforce their decisions against the Congress."[2]

As a consequence, it would seem, public opinion and, ultimately, the ballot box,[3] are the only realistic means by which Congress can be persuaded to act. A federal statute containing provisions for convening a convention might go a long way in easing the road to congressional action. A proposed statute for this purpose is discussed in this analysis beginning at p. 48.

PROPOSALS TO PROVIDE PROCEDURES FOR CALLING CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

Draft proposals have been prepared by Dr. Cyril Brickfield which would set up a framework for giving effect to the application procedure under Article V of the Constitution. The first is a draft bill to decide various questions relating to state petitions for constitutional conventions and the problems involved in convening conventions. The second is a draft resolution to amend the rules of the House of Representatives (minor modifications would be needed to provide for Senate procedure) for processing such petitions. Dr. Brickfield's drafts and his analysis of them are reproduced below.

Analysis of Draft Bill For Calling A Constitutional Convention

Applications for a convention may request either a general convention or a convention to propose specific amendments (sec. 2).

The form of our government warrants a general revision of the Constitution if the people so wish it. In fact, the first two petitions submitted within two years after the Constitution's adoption were petitions calling for a general revision of the Constitution. Specific amendment is also authorized and the history of petitions submitted in the last fifty years clearly indicates a recognition of this form of amendment by a convention.

State legislatures will determine all questions connected with the adoption of State applications (sec. 3(b)).

Parliamentary precedents and court decisions recognize the rule that legislative bodies should have control over their own proceedings.

Approval of governor is not to be required in application process (sec. 3(c)).

Court decisions indicate, and the history of amendments to the Constitution show, that the action of the executive power is not required in the amending process.

Applications must contain certain basic data including the exact text of the State resolution (sec. 4(a)).

In order that amendments may be properly classified and counted, it is proposed that the exact text of the State petitions be submitted so that the subject matter of each petition may be authoritatively established, and also to make certain that applications meet the procedural requirements set out in this draft legislation. It is not the underlying intention of this provision, however, to require that the text of applications be identical to be classified together. If they relate generally to the same subject they are to be classified together, since a convention, if called, would be free to adopt its own language in drafting a proposal on the subject.

An application, once submitted, shall remain valid for 15 years and for such longer time as Congress deems necessary if two-thirds of the States have submitted application on the same subject (sec. 5(a)).

In line with court decisions that proposals should not remain everlastingly alive, but must be "contemporaneous," a 15-year cutoff date was inserted. The

---

[1] Bonfield, p. 673.
[2] Brickfield, pp. 27–28.
[3] See Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549, 556 (1946).

same time limitation has been adopted in recent House resolutions and in some State petitions calling for the revision of article V itself.

State may rescind their applications at any time except when two-thirds of the States have valid applications pending on the same subject (sec. 5(b)).

While Congress has never allowed a State, once having ratified, to withdraw its ratification of an amendment, it is believed that because of the present-day means of speedy communications and the distinguishing features between applications for conventions and ratifications of amendments, withdrawals should be permitted.

Congress, when the requisite number of applications have been received, shall call a constitutional convention (sec. 6(a)), and the Chief Justice of the United States shall preside until the convention is organized (sec. 8).

The first part of this provision repeats the mandate of article V of the Constitution. Further, a high Government official would seem to be the most appropriate person to initiate the tremendously important task of actually calling a convention to order, and it is believed that the office of Chief Justice of the United States, who is to act as a temporary chairman only, is sufficiently removed from active politics to avoid criticism.

Delegates are to be elected in accordance with State law (sec. 7(a)), and each State shall have as many delegates as it has Representatives in Congress (sec. 7(a)).

This provision places election procedures in the States, in line with the practice approved by Congress when it proposed the 20th amendment to the Constitution. In providing that delegates should be chosen on the same geographical basis as Congressmen, it is felt that this method, on a national basis, is the most representative and best proportioned.

Each State is to have one vote to be cast as the majority of its delegates decide (sec. 9(a)).

Section 7 provides for representation on a proportional basis; this section gives each State equal suffrage. This procedure is in line with the 12th amendment and article 2, section 1, clause 3, of the United States Constitution which directs the House of Representatives in cases of tie in the electoral votes for President to vote by States, each having one vote.

The convention will be limited to the consideration of those subjects set out in the congressional resolution calling the convention into being (sec. 8).

The purpose of this provision is to give Congress and the States control over the scope and work of constitutional conventions, and to prevent so-called runaway, extra-legal, or revolutionary conventions.

The convention will be in session not more than one year (sec. 9(c)), and its proposals will be transmitted through Congress to the States for ratification (sec. 11).

To limit the time of the convention and also to provide for congressional control and approval of the convention's work. This procedure was used by the Constitutional Convention of 1787.

The presiding officers in Congress must transmit a convention's proposals to the States within three months of their receipt but only if Congress does not by affirmative action disapprove the proposals (sec. 12(a)).

This procedural provision follows the method adopted by Congress in considering reorganization acts. The burden is placed on the Congress to take action. If it does not the measure is automatically processed by the presiding officers.

Amendments proposed by the convention must be ratified by the States within the time set by Congress for ratification (sec. 13(a)).

Under the provision Congress may set up a reasonable time limitation. It has limited the time for ratifying in the adoption of the 18th, 20th, 21st, and 22d amendments to the Constitution.

Congress may not recall a proposed amendment (sec. 12(b)).

Jameson states that the power to submit proposals to the States does not include the power to recall them; otherwise, in recalling proposals, Congress would also have the power to definitely reject such proposals.

Gubernatorial action is removed from the ratification process (sec. 14(b)), and States may rescind their action at any time prior to the ratification by three-fourths of the States (sec. 16(a)). A State may also ratify an amendment it has previously rejected (sec. 16(b)).

As previously noted, and in line with court decisions and the practice adopted with other amendments, executive action is not requisite in the amending process. Since the exact status of proposed amendments may now be easily and quickly ascertained, it is no longer necessary to hold States bound to their ratifications unless three-fourths of the States have also ratified the same proposal. Rejection of an amendment presents no real problem since Congress, in the past, has permitted States who have rejected an amendment to later ratify the same.

Congress will determine all questions relating to ratification (sec. 16(c)), and the Administration of General Services, when the requisite number of States have ratified, will officially proclaim the new amendment to be part of the Constitution (sec. 17).

This provision concerns a "political question" and it is generally recognized that Congress has the power to decide all questions relating to ratification. Official proclamation by the Administrator of General Services is a procedural provision and follows the present law relating to amendments.

Analysis of Draft Resolution Amending Rules of the House of Representatives for Processing of State Applications Seeking Constitutional Conventions

The Speaker is to refer all State applications for a constitutional convention to the House Judiciary Committee (sec. 1 (a)).

This provision follows the present practice for referral of State applications to a congressional committee.

Within 60 days after the beginning of each session of Congress, the Judiciary Committee must report to the House the number of petitions, according to subject matter, which have been received during the preceding 15 years (sec. 1 (b)), together with the number of States which have rescinded their applications (sec. 1 (b)).

The 60-day provision is to prevent delay or deferring of action by a committee of Congress. The remainder of the section carries out the provision of sections 4 and 5 of the draft bill.

If, during a 15-year period, two-thirds of the States have submitted applications on a particular subject, a resolution must be introduced in the House calling for a convention within two years for the purpose set forth in the State applications (sec. 2).

An enabling provision to initiate action by a House of Congress once the formal requirements outlined in the draft bill have been met.

The resolution is to be referred to the Judiciary Committee which must report back to the House within 30 days or be automatically discharged (sec. 3 (a)).

To give preference to this legislation over other matters pending in committee and to provide for not only immediate consideration of the measure by the committee, but also to require the committee to take final action without delay. Consideration was given to setting up a joint committee of the House and Senate; also to a separate commission. However, since applications only trickle in over the years there would be very little work to justify the existence of a joint committee or a commission. The judiciary committees of the Congress are ideally set up to handle the work involved in State applications.

The resolution is to be considered immediately by the House (sec. 3 (b)), and may be passed by a simple majority vote (sec. 4).

To give measure highest priority on floor of the House, and at the same time require only a simple majority vote of the members present at time measure is considered.

If, prior to taking action on a House resolution, the Senate passes a similar resolution, the House will nevertheless consider the House resolution, and, if acted upon favorably, shall then constitute the House resolution for the Senate resolution and adopt the same (sec. 5).

This provision is similar to the present Rules of the House of Representatives with regard to separate but similar measures which are considered on the floors of both Houses of Congress at the same time or approximately the same time.

In the absence of a House resolution, a Senate resolution shall be processed in the same manner as though it had been introduced as a House resolution (sec. 6).

Follows present House rules with regard to a measure which has passed the Senate and on which there is similar measure pending in the House.

A Congressman may, at any time, inquire whether a sufficient number of applications have been submitted requiring the calling of a convention (sec. 7).

137

To authorize Members of Congress to require an accounting by the Judiciary Committee if there is doubt concerning the present status of applications.[1]

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL

A BILL To Provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Constitutional Convention Act."

ACTION OF STATE LEGISLATURES

SEC. 2. The legislature of a State, in making application for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States, shall, after adopting a resolution pursuant to this Act, petition the Congress stating, in substance, that the legislature favors the calling of a constitutional convention for the purpose of—

(a) proposing a general revision of the Constitution of the United States; or

(b) proposing one or more amendments of a particular nature to the Constitution of the United States stating the specific nature of the amendments to be proposed.

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting a resolution pursuant to section 2, the State legislature shall adopt its own rules of procedure.

(b) Questions concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act are determinable by the State legislature and its decisions thereon are binding on all others, including State and Federal courts, and the Congress of the United States.

(c) A State resolution adopted pursuant to this Act is effective without regard to whether it is approved or disapproved by the Governor of the State.

SEC. 4 (a) Within 60 days after a resolution is adopted by the legislature of the State, the secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House.

(b) Each copy of the application shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution,

(2) the exact text of the resolution, signed by the presiding officer of each House of the legislature, and

(3) the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution, and shall be accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution.

SEC. 5. (a) An application submitted to the Congress pursuant to this Act, unless sooner rescinded by the State legislature, shall remain effective for 15 calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, unless two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same subject, in which event the application shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 8, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State, upon notification to the Congress in accordance with section 4, may rescind its application calling for a Constitutional Convention except that no State may rescind when two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same subject.

(c) The Congress of the United States has the sole power of determining whether a State's action to rescind its application has been timely made.

COMPOSITION AND PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONVENTION

SEC. 6. (a) Congress, under such rules as it may deem necessary, shall adopt concurrent resolutions calling for the convening of a Federal Constitutional

---

[1] Cyril Brickfield, Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention, House Committee on the Judiciary, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. (Committee Print, 1957), p. 75.

Convention. It may, in such resolution designate the place and time of meeting and it shall set forth therein the particular subjects which the convention is to consider.

(b) When no place or time is specified in the concurrent resolution calling the convention, the convention shall be held in the District of Columbia not later than two years after the adoption of the resolution.

SEC. 7. (a) A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Representatives in Congress. Each delegate is to be elected or appointed in the manner provided by State law. Alternate delegates, in the number established by State law, shall be elected or appointed at the same time and in the same manner. Any vacancy occurring in the State delegation shall be filled by appointment of one of the alternate delegates in the manner provided at the time of his election or appointment as an alternate delegate. No alternate delegate shall take part in the proceedings of the convention unless he is appointed a delegate.

(b) The Secretary of State of each State, or, if there be no such officer the person charged by State law to perform such function, shall certify to the Chief Justice of the United States the name of each delegate and alternate delegate appointed or elected pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(d) Each delegate shall receive compensation at the rate of $50 per day for each day of service and shall be compensated for traveling and related expenses in accordance with the Travel Expense Act of 1949, as amended. The convention shall decide the compensation of alternate delegates and employees of the convention.

(e) The Congress shall appropriate moneys for the payment of all expenses of the convention.

SEC. 8. (a) The Chief Justice of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office to the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe an oath not to attempt to change or alter any section, clause or article of the Constitution or propose additions thereto which have not been proposed or fixed by the resolution calling the convention. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as it may adopt.

(b) The performance of the duties required of the Chief Justice of the United States under this Act, shall not be deemed to disqualify him from participating in any case or controversy before the United States Supreme Court.

SEC. 9. (a) Each State shall have one vote. The vote of each State shall be cast on any question before the convention as the majority of the delegates from that State, present at the time, shall agree. If the delegates from any State present are evenly divided on any question before the convention, the vote of that State shall not be cast on the question.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily record of its proceedings and publish the same. The votes of the States on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

SEC. 10. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a majority of the total vote cast on the question.

(b) No convention called under this Act to propose an amendent of a limited nature may propose any amendment or amendments, the general nature of which differs from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. All controversies arising under this subsection shall not be justiciable but shall be determined by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 11. The presiding officer of the convention, within 1 month after the termination of its proceedings, shall submit the exact text of the amendments agreed upon at the convention to the Congress for approval and transmission to the several States for their ratification.

139

TRANSMITTAL OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. (a) The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit the proposed amendments to the Constitution to the Administrator of General Services for submission to the States upon the expiration of the first period of 3 months of continuous session of the Congress following the date on which such proposals are received, but only if prior to the expiration of such period Congress has not adopted a resolution disapproving the submission of the proposed amendments to the States.

(b) Whenever the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives have jointly transmitted proposed amendments to the Administrator of General Services, the Administrator shall forthwith transmit, with his certification thereof, exact copies of the proposed amendments to the legislatures of the several States.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 13. (a) Amendments proposed by the convention pursuant to and in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourth of the States. Congress, in the resolution adopting the proposal, may set the time within which the proposal shall be inoperative unless ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

(b) Congress may not recall a proposed amendment after it has been submitted to the States by the Administrator of the General Services Administration.

SEC. 14. (a) For the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments pursuant to this Act the State legislatures shall adopt their own rules of procedure except that the acts of ratification shall be by convention or by State legislative action as the Congress may direct. All questions concerning the validity of State legislative procedure shall be determined by the legislatures and their decisions shall be binding on all others.

(b) Any State resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be valid without regard to whether it has been assented to by the Governor of the State.

SEC. 15. The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State resolution ratifying the proposed amendment or amendments to the Administrator of General Services.

SEC. 16. (a) Any state may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment except that no state may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it had previously rejected the same proposal.

(c) The Congress of the United States shall have the sole power of determining all questions relating to the ratification, rescission, or rejection of amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 17. The Administrator of General Services when three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States have adopted a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation proclaiming the amendment to be a part of the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 18. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date on which the legislature of the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the legislatures of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL

HOUSE RESOLUTION To provide for the processing of State applications for a Federal Constitutional Convention in the House of Representatives

Be it resolved in the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That—

(a) The Speaker of the House of Representatives shall refer each application submitted, pursuant to the Federal Constitutional Convention Act, to the House Committee on the Judiciary.

(b) Within sixty days after the commencement of each regular session of the Congress of the United States, the House Committee on the Judiciary shall report to the House concerning the applications received pursuant to the Federal Constitutional Convention Act during the preceding fifteen calendar years. The reports shall be printed in the Congressional Record and shall state—

(1) the total number of applications calling for a convention to propose a general revision of the Constitution,

(2) the total number of applications calling for conventions to propose specific amendments of a limited nature to the Constitution, together with the total number received with respect to each such amendment,

(3) the date of receipt of each application,

(4) the particular State applications, if any, on which states have taken rescinding action, and

(5) such other information as the committee considers appropriate.

SEC. 2. If, during a fifteen year period, applications are received from the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States and

(a) each application seeks the calling of a convention to propose an amendment generally revising the Constitution of the United States, or

(b) each application seeks the calling of a convention to propose an amendment of the same general nature as each other application, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives shall, and any other Member may, introduce a concurrent resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention within two years for the purpose sought in the applications.

SEC. 3. (a) Concurrent resolutions calling a convention shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee shall report on the resolution within thirty calendar days after its introduction. If it does not report the resolution before the expiration of thirty calendar days after is introduction, the committee shall be automatically discharged from all further consideration of the measure.

(b) When the committee has reported or has been discharged from further consideration of such a concurrent resolution, it shall, at any time thereafter, be in order for a Member to move to proceed for the immediate consideration of such resolution.

SEC. 4. (a) A concurrent resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention may be adopted by the affirmative vote of a majority of those present and voting.

(b) Except as otherwise provided in this resolution, the rules of the House of Representatives shall govern the conduct of the proceedings hereunder.

SEC. 5. If, prior to the passage by it of a concurrent resolution, the House of Representatives receives from the Senate a resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention for proposing the same amendment, it shall proceed to consider its own resolution and, if favorably acted upon, shall substitute and adopt the resolution of the Senate therefor with such amendment as it deems necessary to reflect its own action.

SEC. 6. Where no similar resolution with respect to such amendment as shall be received from the Senate has been introduced or referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the resolution from the Senate shall be treated in the same manner as concurrent resolutions under section 3.

SEC. 7. Any Member may introduce a resolution to determine—

(a) whether the rescinding action of a State legislature has been timely made or is otherwise entitled to recognition under the provisions of the Federal Constitution Convention Act, and

(b) whether a sufficient number of applications have been submitted as to require the introduction of a resolution calling for a constitutional convention.

[26 Notre Dame Lawyer 185 (1951)]

THE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS*

During the five year period following V–J Day, more than 150 resolutions were introduced in Congress calling for the amendment of the Federal Constitution.

*This is the second article dealing with the amending process under Article V of the Constitution. The previous article, The Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution by Paul J. Scheips can be found at p. 46 in the Fall issue of this volume. [Editor's note.]

In 1947, an amendment limiting the tenure of the president was submitted to the states and has now been ratified by 24 of them.[1] A proposal for changing the method of electing the president was adopted by the Senate early in 1950,[2] but was defeated in the House of Representatives.[3] All of this agitation for a change in the fundamental law has stimulated a renewed interest in the interpretation of the amending clause itself.[4] Numerous disputes have arisen, many of which are still unresolved, as to the nature and scope of the amending power, the procedure by which amendments are proposed, and the entire process by which the assent of the states is given.

Prior to 1939 these questions were usually determined by the judiciary. In Coleman v. Miller,[5] decided in that year, the Supreme Court indicated that most, if not all, of such controversies will be left to Congress in the future. That decision probably will have little effect on those phases of the process which are the immediate responsibility of Congress—that is to say, the content of amendments and the procedure for proposing them—but it may enhance the importance of technical objections to methods of ratification followed in various states. Such objections will afford an opportunity to reconsider, and an excuse to kill, any change proposed by an earlier Congress.

I.

Content of Amendments

Controversy over the permissible content of amendments began in the Constitutional Convention itself. Madison's Journal discloses that during the debate on Article V, "Mr. Sherman expressed his fears that three fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States . . . " and moved to add a proviso "that no State shall without its consent be affected in its internal police, or deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." This motion was defeated but immediately thereafter the Convention adopted the second part of it.[6] Persistence of the fears expressed by Sherman prompted Congress, in 1861, to propose, and three states to ratify, an amendment barring any future changes which would "interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State."[7]

The defeat of Sherman's motion, the adoption of an express restriction on change of representation in the Senate, and general acquiescence in the substantial curtailment of state powers effected by the Civil War amendments, would seem to have established beyond challenge that the amending clause is not to be narrowed by implied limitations.[8] Nevertheless, many years after the Civil War, George Tichnor Curtis found in the Ninth and Tenth Amendments a basis for the argument that the power to amend is confined to changes in the manner of executing the existing powers of the national government and does not "enable three fourths of the states to grasp new power at the expense of any unwilling state."[9]

---

[1] 61 STAT. 959 (1947).
[2] 96 Cong. Rec. 1307 (Feb. 1, 1950).
[3] Id., at 10587 (July 17, 1950).
[4] Article V reads: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate."
[5] 307 U.S. 433, 59 S. Ct. 972, 83 L. Ed. 1385 (1939).
[6] MADISON, THE DEBATES IN THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787 WHICH FRAMED THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 573 (Hunt and Scott ed. 1920).
[7] AMES, PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 196 (1897).
[8] In Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 42 S. Ct. 217, 66 L. Ed. 505 (1922) the Supreme Court refused to consider the argument that the Nineteenth Amendment was invalid, because by enlarging the electorate without the consent of the states which did not ratify it, it destroyed their autonomy as political bodies. Noting that this Amendment was similar in character and phraseology in the Fifteenth and that both had been adopted by the same procedure, it dismissed the objection with this observation: "That the 15th is valid, although rejected by six states including Maryland, has been recognized and acted on for half a century." Id., 258 U.S. at 136.
[9] 2 CURTIS, CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES 161 (Clayton ed. 1896).

With the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment, this debate was carried into the courts. Claiming that the Amendment was void because of its substance, its opponents argued that the framers used the term "amend" in the sense attached to it by the common law; that "amendment" embraced only a correction of errors in the existing constitution not an addition or supplement to it. They complained that the Eighteenth Amendment was "legislative" in that it laid down a rule for the conduct of individuals without implementing legislation by Congress or the states; that it regulated vested rights, and infringed "fundamental and unamendable" principles protective of the powers of the states in the field of local government and individual rights. Whence they concluded that this Amendment was contrary to the spirit and intent and implied limitations of the amending power. The Supreme Court was not impressed by this labored reasoning. Without refuting the arguments in detail, it simply announced that the subject matter of the Eighteenth Amendment was within the power to amend reserved by Article V of the Constitution.[10]

Far-fetched as much of the argumentation obviously was, underlying it was a fundamental question of constitutional theory regarding the nature of the power with which Article V deals. This question may be put as follows: Is it the purpose and result of Article V to delegate a certain power of constitutional amendment to the agencies designated by it, or is it merely to provide a method for the more convenient future use of an already existing power of the people? In a sense, the direct prohibition in Article V of any amendment to deprive a state of its equal representation in the Senate contradicts both the theory that the power to amend springs from the same source as the Constitution itself, and the contention that it is subject to implied limitations. If the amending power is the same power which ordained and established the original Charter, any limitation on it must be considered as having only such force and validity as the amending power itself may at any time choose to accord it—it has the moral force of a promise given more than one hundred sixty years ago. On the other hand, the very presence of this specifically stated limitation may be taken as an indication that no other restrictions of the same nature were intended. It is not, however, inconsistent with a concept of the term "amendment" which would restrict it to a modification of the existing instrument rather than an addition to it.

In the First Congress, Sherman suggested that there was a difference between the authority upon which the Constitution rested and that upon which amendments would rest, the former being the "act of the people"; the latter, "the act of the State Governments."[11] The theory stated by the Supreme Court shortly before the Civil War in the case of Dodge v. Woolsey[12] seems to be much the same. The view set forth in Justice Wayne's opinion is that since the power to amend the Constitution is one to be exercised by agents, it must be treated as a delegated power and so a constitutionally limited power. But is this the theory of the Court today? On the strength of much that it has said in the cases arising out of the Eighteenth Amendment, the question must be answered in the negative. In Dillon v. Gloss we find Justice Van Devanter speaking for a unanimous Court as follows:[13]

> Thus the people of the United States, by whom the Constitution was ordained and established, have made it a condition to amending that instrument that the amendment be submitted to representative assemblies in the several States and be ratified in three-fourths of them. The plain meaning of this is (a) that all amendments must have the sanction of the people of the United States, the original fountain of power, acting through representative assemblies, and (b) that ratification by these assemblies in three-fourths of the States shall be taken as a decisive expression of the people's will and be binding on all.

Nothing apparently could be plainer; the authority by which amendments to the Constitution are made is that by which the Constitution itself was ordained—it is the supreme authority of the people of the United States. To be sure, it can be exercised in accordance with the Constitution only through

---

[10] National Prohibition Cases (Rhode Island v. Palmer) 253 U.S. 350, 40 S. Ct. 486, 64 L. Ed. 946 (1920).
[11] 1 ANNALS OF CONG. 708 (1789).
[12] 18 How. 331, 15 L. Ed. 401 (U.S. 1856).
[13] 256 U.S. 368, 374, 41 S. Ct. 510, 65 L. Ed. 994 (1921).

certain "delegated agents"; but the essential question is what authority it is that such delegates are at any time exercising. The answer of the Court seems to be that the power thus exerted in amending the Constitution is the ultimate right of the people in the choice of their political institutions.

Nor can the people of any state, by any provision in their state constitution, disable themselves or their representatives from exercising this right. The constitution adopted by Missouri in 1875 declared that "the Legislature is not authorized to adopt, nor will the people of this State ever assent to any amendment of change of the Constitution of the United States which may in anywise impair the right of local self-government belonging to the people of this State." On the strength of this provision, the right of the Missouri Legislature to ratify the Nineteenth Amendment was assailed in Leser v. Garnett,[14] The limitation was held to be ineffective and the ratification valid, the Court saying that[15]

> . . . the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed Amendment to the Federal Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing the amendment, is a federal function, derived from the Federal Constitution; and it transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a State.

II.

Submission of Amendments

The first question to arise respecting amendments to the Constitution was as to the form they should take. On June 8, 1789, James Madison, in fulfillment of the informal understanding upon which the Constitution had been ratified in some of the states, laid before the House of Representatives certain proposals of amendment which he planned to have inserted in the text of the Constitution at appropriate places.[16] When, however, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the proposed additions, Roger Sherman at once entered a protest against the idea of interweaving amendments with the original Constitution, urging that the latter sprang from a higher authority than the amending power.[17] He thereupon moved that the suggested amendments be proposed as supplementary to the Constitution. Other members supported the motion, one offering the singular argument that to connive in any alteration of the text of the Constitution would be a violation of the oath of members to support it;[18] while a third contended that if amendments were incorporated in the body of the Constitution "it will appear, unless we refer to the archives of Congress, that George Washington and the other worthy characters who composed the Convention, signed an instrument which they never had in contemplation."[19] Although rejected at the outset.[20] Sherman's proposal eventually prevailed and the precedent thus created has been followed ever since; even the Twelfth Amendment, which definitely supersedes a part of the text of Article II, appears as a supplement to the original document.

On the same occasion the suggestion was offered that before either House could properly deliberate upon specific amendments, both Houses must pass resolutions by the required two-thirds vote affirming the necessity for amendment.[21] No attention was paid to the suggestion, and in the National Prohibition Cases[22] the Court ruled, very sensibly, that the Houses, by proposing an amendment, indicate that they deem it necessary. From another angle, nevertheless, the phrase has significance. It discredits entirely the argument offered in support of the Eighteenth Amendment while it was pending in Congress, that the question of the desirability of a proposed amendment was one for the state ratifying bodies rather than for the proposing body.[23] There is, to be sure, a certain ambiguity in the word "necessary." It may be surmised that when two-thirds of the Senate voted to submit the Seventeenth Amendment to the States, they were prompted by the belief that submission of the Amendment was unavoidable, not that the proposed change in the Constitution was desirable.

---

[14] 258 U.S. 130, 42 S. Ct. 217, 66 L. Ed. 505 (1922).
[15] Id., 258 U.S. at 137.
[16] 1 ANNALS OF CONG. 433–6 (1789).
[17] Id. at 707.
[18] Id. at 709.
[19] Id. at 710.
[20] Id. at 717.
[21] Id. at 430.
[22] 253 U.S. 350, 386, 40 S. Ct. 486, 64 L. Ed. 946 (1920).
[23] 56 CONG. REC. 438 (1917).

By the precedent set in 1789 and followed ever since, the requirement that "two-thirds of both Houses" vote to submit a proposed amendment applies only to the final vote of proposal in each House; all preliminary votes may be by a simple majority.[24] What, however, is the meaning of the word "Houses" in this context? Does it mean the total membership thereof, or simply the members present, there being a quorum of these? For all legislative purposes, it means the latter, and in 1789 it was assumed that the same word is used in the same sense in Article V.[25] This view was confirmed by the Supreme Court in the National Prohibition Cases.

An interesting question has been raised concerning the submission of the pending amendment to limit the tenure of the president. The original resolution adopted by the House of Representatives was amended by the Senate. As thus modified, the proposed amendment was approved in the lower House by a vote of 81 to 29.[26] Since the membership of that House is 435, 218 members constitute a quorum. Hence it has been argued that at least 146 votes, being two-thirds of 218, were necessary for adoption of the resolution in its final form.[27] Support for this contention is found in the Prohibition Cases, where, in rejecting the argument that two-thirds of the entire membership must concur in proposing an amendment, Justice Van Devanter said: "The two-thirds vote in each House which is required in proposing an amendment is a vote of two-thirds of the members present,—assuming the presence of a quorum,—and not a vote of two-thirds of the entire membership, present and absent."[28] Similar expressions are to be found in other judicial utterances and in legislative rulings, which, however, were addressed to situations where the affirmative votes equalled the required majority of a quorum.[29]

The final vote for submission of the amendment was sufficient under Rule XV of the House of Representatives. As interpreted by that rule, the requirement of a quorum applies only to the number of members who must be present in order for the House to have authority to transact business; it does not require that any minimum number of members vote upon a particular proposition. In 1898 a dispute arose over the vote necessary for the adoption of a resolution proposing an amendment for the popular election of Senators. Speaker Reed made the following ruling:[30]

> The provision of the Constitution says "two-thirds of both Houses." What constitutes a House? A quorum of the membership, a majority, one-half and one more. That is all that is necessary to constitute a House to do all the business that comes before the House. Among the business that comes before the House . . . is a proposed amendment to the Constitution; and the practice is uniform . . . that if a quorum of the House is present the House is constituted and two-thirds of those voting are sufficient in order to accomplish the object.

The Congressional Record discloses that after the vote on the motion to concur in the Senate amendments had been taken, a member made and then withdrew the point of order that a quorum was not present.[31] Accordingly, it is to be presumed that a quorum was present at that time.[32]

A further question arises whether a proposed amendment has to be laid before the president for his approval. In view of the sweeping language of Article I, Section 7, it would seem so, especially as the "Houses" therein mentioned are the same "Houses" which function under Article V. But the First Congress transmitted the proposed Bill of Rights to the states, via the president

---

[24] 1 ANNALS OF CONG. 717 (1789).

[25] The resolution proposing the amendments submitted to the states in 1789 was adopted in the House with "two-thirds of the members present concurring," JOURNAL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 1st and 2nd Congress 85, 86 (1789–93); similarly, the Senate Resolution approving (with some exceptions) the amendments proposed by the House, contains the phrase "two-thirds of the Senators present concurring." JOURNAL OF THE SENATE, 1st and 2nd Congress 77 (1789–93).

[26] 93 CONG. REC. 2392 (1947).

[27] N.Y. Times, April 3, 1947, p. 24, col. 6.

[28] 253 U.S. 350, 386, 40 S. Ct. 486, 64 L. Ed. 946 (1920).

[29] Missouri P. Ry. v. Kansas, 248 U.S. 276, 284, 39 S. Ct. 93, 63 L. Ed. 239 (1919); United States v. Ballin, Joseph & Co., 144 U.S. 1, 6, 12 S. Ct. 507, 36 L. Ed. 321 (1892); 8 CANNON, PRECEDENTS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES § 3503 (1936); 5 HINDS, PRECEDENTS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES § 7028 (1907).

[30] 5 HINDS, op. cit. supra note 29, § 7027.

[31] 93 CONG. REC. 2392 (1947).

[32] 6 CANNON, op. cit. supra note 29, §§ 565, 565a, 624.

without asking or suggesting that he approve it.[33] Here again, what was done in 1789 has determined subsequent practice, having, indeed, been approved by the Supreme Court as early as 1798.[34]

An alternative method of proposing amendments is by a convention which Congress "shall" call upon the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. The first petitions for a convention were filed in 1788 and 1789 by Virginia and New York, respectively. The next occurred in 1832 and 1833 and came from Georgia and Alabama. In the sessions of Congress just prior to the Civil War petitions were received from the legislatures of six states, praying that a drafting convention be summoned. On several occasions during that era various members of Congress also offered resolutions for that purpose.[35] The greatest sustained effort to set in motion this machinery for proposing a change in the Constitution was made between 1895 and 1913, during which period 33 states filed applications, the great majority of which were in furtherance of an amendment providing for the popular election of Senators, others of which had an anti-polygamy amendment as their objective, and only a few of which suggested a convention of indefinite powers.[36] Within the past decade a number of state legislatures have formally petitioned Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to limit the rate of federal income taxation.[37]

It appears from Madison's Journal that the framers intended this provision for the calling of a convention to be mandatory.[38] Conceding that proposition, there remains a question as to when the condition "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states" shall be deemed to have been fulfilled. In 1929 the Legislature of Wisconsin reminded Congress that 35 states had filed applications for a constitutional convention and called upon it to "perform the mandatory duty . . . and forthwith call a convention to propose amendments to the constitution of the United States."[39] The 35 states listed in this memorial included every state but one which had ever petitioned Congress to call a convention for any purpose—even Virginia, Alabama and Georgia, which had filed no such applications since 1788, 1832 and 1833, respectively. This resolution was ignored, no doubt on the theory subsequently approved in Dillon v. Gloss that the successive steps in the process of constitutional amendment should not be widely separated in time.[40] To be obligatory upon Congress, the applications of the states should be reasonably contemporaneous with one another, for only then would they be persuasive of a real consensus of opinion throughout the nation for holding a convention, and by the same token, they ought also to be expressive of similar views respecting the nature of the amendments to be sought.

Although no convention has ever been held, the provision has not been entirely ineffective. The petitions just mentioned, asking for a convention to propose an amendment for the popular election of Senators, undoubtedly were instrumental in bringing about the submission by Congress itself of the Seventeenth Amendment, a reform which the Senate had long resisted.

But is it essential that two-thirds of the state legislatures, or any number thereof, should make application to Congress, for a convention in order to enable Congress to call one; why may not Congress summon a convention on its own initiative? No such call has ever been made, but if we assume that the machinery which is perscribed by Article V for amending the Constitution is a particular organization of the inherent power of the people of the United States to determine their political institutions, then it would seem that Congress's obligation to call a convention upon the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States was not thought to exhaust its power in this respect, but was intended merely to specify a contingency in which it would be under the moral necessity of exercising it. If, however, the powers of Congress under Article V represent something less than this plenary power of the people, then its obligation to call a convention in the contingency of a demand upon it to do so by the legislatures of two-thirds of the States may very well comprise its full power in the premises.

---

[33] 1 ANNALS OF CONG. 913–4 (1789).
[34] Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378, 1 L. Ed. 644 (U.S. 1798).
[35] AMES, op. cit. supra note 7, at 282, 311, 345, 356–64.
[36] Federal Constitutional Convention, SEN. DOC. No. 78, 71st Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1930).
[37] 90 CONG. REC. A3969 (1944).
[38] MADISON, op. cit. supra note 6, at 574.
[39] 71 CONG. REC. 3369 (1929).
[40] 256 U.S. 368, 374, 41 S. Ct. 510, 65 L. Ed. 994 (1921).

However an amendment is proposed, Congress must decide whether it shall be ratified by state legislatures or by conventions in the states. In United States v. Sprague[41] it was argued that by the Tenth Amendment "the people reserved to themselves powers over their own personal liberty, and that the legislatures are not competent to enlarge the powers of the federal government in that behalf . . . the people never delegated to the Congress the unrestricted power of choosing the mode of ratification of a proposed amendment;"[42] that the Eighteenth Amendment was of the latter character; and hence, having been ratified only by the state legislatures, was invalid. The district court, ignoring this argument, substituted one of its own which led to the same practical result. Judge Clark was willing to concede that Congress originally had possessed the right to choose between the two types of referendum, but concluded that the subsequent progress of political science had established the constitutional convention as the appropriate instrumentality for effecting constitutional changes of major importance.[43] The Supreme Court rejected both arguments. It found the language of Article V to be too entirely free from ambiguity to admit of reading into it the teachings of political science or other outside considerations. Furthermore, it pointed out, Congress had never resorted to conventions up to that time, notwithstanding the fact that the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth and Nineteenth Amendments "touch rights of the citizens" at vital points.[44]

What did the framers have in mind when they referred to conventions in the states? No doubt much the same type of bodies as those to which they themselves referred the original Constitution, namely, bodies which would be created ad hoc for the sole purpose of passing upon certain amendments referred to them, and which, once they had done so, would be functus officio. How, then, are such bodies to be summoned into existence? The conventions which ratified the original Constitution assembled upon the "recommendation" of the several state legislatures. But the whole process by which the Constitution was established was so exceptional that it contributes little to the solution of the present problem. The power seems clearly to belong to Congress in its legislative capacity, as auxiliary to the power delegated to it by Article V in the submission of amendments. Serious practical difficulties would, of course, be encountered if Congress decided to proceed without the co-operation of state legislatures. In addition to determining the make-up of the convention and who might vote for delegates thereto, the federal lawmakers would have to set up the machinery for conducting the election and provide funds both for the election and for the functioning of the conventions.

When the Twenty-first Amendment was under consideration, A. Mitchell Palmer, who had been Attorney General during Wilson's administration, brought forward a plan designed to by-pass the state legislatures.[45] It would have authorized the governor of each state to call an election for delegates to a convention. The election was to be state-wide for a panel of delegates representing each side of the question and was to be held in accordance with the election laws of such state. The voters were to be electors qualified under the respective state laws. The expenses of the election were to be met by a national appropriation. In the end Congress decided to leave the matter to the state legislatures, and the expediency of this course was vindicated by the fact that ratification was consummated in less than a year. Only five states failed to take steps for the holding of a convention. Forty-three enacted the necessary enabling legislation. In North Carolina the electorate voted against holding a convention after the legislature had made provision for calling one.[46]

Having submitted an amendment to the states, may Congress thereafter withdraw it? Some commentators have expressed the opinion that this cannot be done.[47] However, much that Chief Justice Hughes said in Coleman v. Miller

---

[41] 282 U.S. 716, 51 S. Ct. 220, 75 L. Ed. 640 (1931).
[42] Id., 282 U.S. at 733.
[43] 44 F (2d) 967, 981 (D. N.J. 1930).
[44] 282 U.S. 716, 734, 51 S. Ct. 220, 75 L. Ed. 640 (1931).
[45] 76 CONG. REC. 130 (1932).
[46] Myers, The Process of Constitutional Amendment, SEN. Doc. No. 314, 76th Cong., 3d Sess. 23 n. 62 (1940). In three States the scheduled conventions did not assemble because ratification was completed before the date appointed for their meeting. Ibid. For a valuable article on the whole story see Brown, The Ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment, 29 AM. POL. SCI. REV. 1005 (1935).
[47] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. 1477, 1479 (1870) (argument of Roscoe Conkling); JAMESON, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS § 585 (4th ed. 1887).

concerning the factors which would have to be considered in determining what was a reasonable time for ratification could also be urged in support of an affirmative answer to this question. He wrote: [48]

> When a proposed amendment springs from a conception of economic needs, it would be necessary, in determining whether a reasonable time had elapsed since its submission, to consider the economic conditions prevailing in the country, whether these had so far changed since the submission as to make the proposal no longer responsive to the conception which inspired it or whether conditions were such as to intensify the feeling of need and the appropriateness of the proposed remedial action. . . . [These questions] can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment.

If, as the concurring Justices argued in this case, all questions concerning the submission of amendments are for Congress alone to decide, the right of formal withdrawal is of little moment; the lawmakers almost certainly could find some pretext to inter an amendment believed to be no longer desirable.

III

Ratification of Amendments

After an amendment which is within the power reserved by Article V has been lawfully proposed, further questions arise concerning the action of the states in giving or withholding their assent to it. These problems fall into two categories—those relating to the right of the state legislature to act upon the proposition at the time it undertakes to do so, and those dealing with the procedure whereby it shall express its will.

When May a State Act?

The debate as to when a state is at liberty to ratify or reject a proposed amendment has been directed to three subsidiary inquiries: How long after its submission does an amendment remain open for ratification? When is action by a state legislature foreclosed by its own prior acceptance or rejection of the proposal? May postponement of consideration be required by a state constitution or statute?

Four amendments submitted prior to the Civil War—two of the twelve proposed in 1789, one proposed in 1810 and one in 1861—have never been ratified. The same is true of the Child Labor Amendment proposed in 1924. Are these amendments still to be regarded as pending? As a matter of fact, the Ohio Legislature adopted a resolution in 1873 purporting to ratify one of the 1789 proposals.[49] Perhaps it was with this circumstance in mind that Congress added a third "section" to the Eighteenth Amendment which provided that ratification must take place in seven years. This was an obviously futile proceeding. As part of an unratified amendment, the provision was inoperative, and if ratification had taken place after the prescribed date it would still have been inoperative unless the ratification was valid in spite of it! In Dillon v. Gloss the Supreme Court properly treated the so-called "section" as a part, not of the amendment itself, but of the resolution of proposal, and sustained it on the ground that it gave effect to the implications of Article V that ratification "must be sufficiently contemporaneous . . . to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period. . . ." [50]

In this same case Justice Van Devanter intimated that the four proposals which antedate 1900 were no longer open to ratification.[51] But when asked to hold that the Child Labor Amendment could not be ratified thirteen years after its submission, the Court refused to decide the issue, saying that this was a political ques-

---

[48] 307 U.S. 433, 453, 59 S. Ct. 972, 83 L. Ed. 1385 (1939).

[49] Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 372, 41 S. Ct. 510, 65 L. Ed. 994 (1921).

[50] Id., 256 U.S. at 375. In 1930 Fiorella La Guardia, then a member of the House of Representatives, made an ingenious argument that the effect of Section three was to limit the duration of the Eighteenth Amendment to a period of seven years after ratification unless it was reratified by three-fourths of the states within that period. His reasoning was that the section could not have applied to the original ratification because it was not then a part of the Constitution; therefore it must be interpreted to operate prospectively after the original ratification of the amendment made it a part of the Constitution. 72 CONG. REC. 1898 (1930).

[51] 256 U.S. 368, 375, 41 S. Ct. 510, 65 L. Ed. 994 (1921).

tion which should be left for the determination of Congress in the event three-fourths of the state ever gave their assent to the proposal.[52]

Does a state legislature exhaust its power to act on an amendment by the adoption of a resolution accepting or rejecting it? In Coleman v. Miller, Chief Justice Hughes reviewed the events leading up to the proclamation that the Fourteenth Amendment had been ratified and concluded that "the political departments of the Government dealt with the effect both of previous rejection and of attempted withdrawal and determined that both were ineffectual in the presence of an actual ratification." [53] This proposition rests upon a concurrent resolution adopted by Congress in 1868, declaring the Fourteenth Amendment operative as a part of the Constitution. That resolution included in the list of states which had ratified the Amendment the names of three—Louisiana, North Carolina and South Carolina—which first rejected and later ratified the proposal, and of two—New Jersey and Ohio—which had attempted to withdraw their earlier ratifications.[54]

Upon closer examination this legislative precedent is found to be less conclusive than the opinion of the Chief Justice indicated. There was another, quite distinct, issue involved in the dispute as to whether the Fourteenth Amendment had been duly ratified; namely, whether the seceding states should be counted in ascertaining the number of states necessary for ratification. On January 11, 1868, before any state had attempted to change its mind, either by ratifying after rejection, or by retracting its previous consent, Senator Sumner of Massachusetts introduced a joint resolution which recited that twenty-two states had ratified the Fourteenth Amendment and declared that it was to all intents and purposes a part of the Constitution.[55] A similar resolution was offered in the House of Representatives by Representative Bingham on January 13th.[56] Two days later, the Ohio Legislature voted to revoke its assent which previously had been certified to the Secretary of State. On January 31st, Sumner expressed the opinion that the attempted withdrawal of Ohio's ratification was ineffective. After stating that the "assent of the State once given is final," he went on to say that the action of Ohio was a nullity because the Amendment was already a part of the Constitution. He declared: [57]

> This amendment was originally proposed by a vote of two-thirds of Congress, composed of the representatives of the loyal States. It has now been ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the loyal States, being the same States which originally proposed it, through their representatives in Congress. The States that are competent to propose a constitutional amendment are competent to adopt it. Both things have been done. The required majority in Congress have proposed it: the required majority of States have adopted it. Therefore I say this resolution of the Legislature of Ohio is brutum fulmen—impotent as words without force.

In a brief exchange with Sumner, Reverdy Johnson of Maryland voiced the tentative impression that assent could be withdrawn at any time before ratification was complete. Said he: [58]

> . . . supposing the amendment not to have been adopted . . . my impression is that they can withdraw; . . . I look upon what the States do preliminary to a decision of a majority which, when made, makes the amendment proposed a part of the Constitution as a mere promise or undertaking that each will assent when the others are ready to assent, but that the day after the assent is given, or at any period subsequent to the giving of the assent, if the State assenting thinks that it has made a mistake, and that the Constitution should not be amended in the way proposed, it may withdraw its assent.

In the Senate, the Ohio resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which also had Sumner's original motion under consideration.[59] No further action was taken by that House until July 9th, when it called upon the [52] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 454, 59 S. Ct. 972, 83 L. Ed. 1385 (1939).

---

[53] Id., 307 U.S. at 449.
[54] 15 STAT. 709 (1868).
[55] CONG. GLOBE, 40th Cong., 2d Sess. 453 (1868).
[56] Id. at 475.
[57] Id. at 877.
[58] Id. at 878.
[59] Id. at 453, 878.

Secretary of State for a list of the states which had ratified the amendment.[60] By that time the New Jersey Legislature also had voted to revoke its ratification and six additional states, including Louisiana, North Carolina and South Carolina, had ratified. On July 18th, Sherman introduced a new resolution declaring the amendment effective; this also was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary,[61] which was discharged from consideration thereof on July 20th.[62] The following day, after being changed to a concurrent resolution, it was approved in the Senate without debate and without a record vote. It was rushed to the House of Representatives which promptly concurred, also without debate, but by a yea-and-nay vote.[63] In this resolution, the 29 states named as having given their assent, including the five which had changed their minds, were referred to as "being three fourths and more of the several States of the Union."[64]

Inasmuch as Congress did not take this action until additional ratifications had been certified, it is plausible to infer that a majority did not support the view of Sumner and Bingham that the Amendment had become effective before the further ratifications or attempted withdrawals were made. The resolution adopted was not, however, inconsistent with their thesis. It also can be supported by Johnson's tentative opinion that a state's assent could be revoked at any time before ratification was complete. In the absence of committee reports or recorded debate, it is impossible to find in this legislative history an endorsement of either of the two theories advanced for declaring the amendment adopted.

In any event, the inclusion in this list of Louisiana, North Carolina and South Carolina is not decisive as to the effect of a rejection by a legislature which is admittedly competent to act on a constitutional amendment. At the time they expressed their dissent, these states were treated by Congress as being still in a state of rebellion; they were required to adopt new constitutions and to ratify the pending amendment before they could obtain readmission to the Union.[65]

That the resolution declaring the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment was not regarded as a determination of the effect either of rejection or withdrawal was demonstrated by events attending the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment. Again, Ohio reversed itself, this time by approving the Amendment after first voting against it,[66] while New York repudiated its earlier assent.[67] In discussing these developments on the floor of the Senate, Roscoe Conkling of New York took the position that a ratification was irrevocable but that a rejection had no legal effect whatsoever.[68] Davis of Kentucky argued that a vote by a state legislature either to reject or to ratify was final and conclusive.[69] Significantly, neither mentioned the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment or the resolution of Congress declaring it to be in effect.

Not until two additional states had ratified, thus making it unimportant whether New York and Ohio were counted, did the Secretary of State proclaim the adoption of the amendment. His proclamation listed these two states among those which had ratified, but it also recited without comment that the New York Legislature had passed resolutions "claiming to withdraw" its ratification. Ohio's previous rejection was not mentioned.[70] Prior to the issuance of this proclamation, a resolution similar to that adopted with reference to the Fourteenth Amendment had been introduced in the Senate to confirm the Fifteenth, but it never came to a vote.[71] Without qualification, it named New York and Ohio as having ratified the latter Amendment.

The persistence of sharp disagreement as to the correct interpretation of Article V is reflected in the unsuccessful effort made at this time to pass a bill declaring that any attempted revocation of a State's consent to an amendment

---

[60] Id. at 3857.
[61] Id. at 4197.
[62] Id. at 4230.
[63] Id. at 4296.
[64] Id. at 4266. Emphasis supplied.
[65] 15 STAT. 2 (1867); 15 STAT. 73 (1868).
[66] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. 110 (1869); Id. at 918 (1870).
[67] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. 377 (1870).
[68] Id. at 1477.
[69] Id. at 1479. Both Conkling and Davis argued from the premise that ratification by a state legislature had the same effect as would ratification by a convention in case that method were chosen by Congress. Both assumed that ratification by a convention would be final. Davis made the further assumption that rejection by a convention would exhaust the power of a state to act on an amendment. Conkling did not meet this issue squarely.
[70] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. 2290 (1870).
[71] Id. at 1444, 2738, 3142.

should be treated as null and void. The House approved such a measure,[72] which, however, died on the Senate Calendar after being reported adversely by the Judiciary Committee.[73] Earlier in the session the upper House had voted to postpone indefinitely a joint resolution of similar tenor.[74]

Looking to the merits of the issue, there appears to be nothing in the language or policy of Article V to preclude ratification at any time, irrespective of prior disapproval. The Constitution speaks only of ratification by the states: there is no reason why an unfavorable vote by one legislature should bar contrary action by its successors. The teaching of Dillon v. Gloss that ratification should "reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period . . ." lends support to the view that later retraction should also be taken into account. Likewise, if change of public sentiment is relevant, the formal action of a state withdrawing its prior consent is pertinent. What weight should be given this relevant fact would, however, be for Congress to determine.

A long-mooted question concerning the right of a state to require that action on a proposed amendment be delayed until a new legislature has been elected was answered in Leser v. Garnett.[75] The fact that the Constitution of Tennessee required such postponement was cited in support of the argument that the purported ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment by the Legislature of that State was a nullity. Instead, the Supreme Court held that this constitutional provision was of no effect, since the power to act on a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution is derived from the latter document.

Procedure for Ratification

When a constitutional amendment is before a state for consideration, who constitutes the "legislature" by which its will is to be expressed, and what rules govern the proceedings? It was decided in Hawke v. Smith[76] that the term "legislatures" as used in Article V still means, as it did in 1789, "the representative bod[ies] which . . . [make] the laws of the people."[77] It therefore does not include the electorate in states where the popular referendum has become a part of the legislative process, and approval by the people on a referendum vote cannot be made a condition of ratification. Similarly, it has been established by practice, with the implied approval of the Supreme Court, that legislative resolutions ratifying proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution are not subject to gubernatorial veto. In Lesser v. Garnet, it appeared that the Governor of Tennessee had not certified the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment to the Secretary of State. The Supreme Court held, nevertheless, that the Amendment had been validly ratified, saying "As the legislatures of Tennessee and of West Virginia had power to adopt the resolutions of ratification, official notice to the Secretary, duly authenticated, that they had done so, was conclusive upon him. . . ."[78]

The Constitution is silent concerning the procedures to be followed by state legislatures in acting on proposed constitutional amendments, and Congress has never undertaken to supply the omission. In 1869, to be sure, joint resolutions for this purpose were presented in both Houses of Congress but did not pass in either.[79] The resolution introduced into the House of Representatives would have required each branch of a state legislature to proceed to a consideration of a

---

[72] Id. at 5356.

[73] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 3d Sess. 1381 (1871).

[74] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. (1869); id. at 3971 (1870).

[75] 258 U.S. 130, 137, 42 S. Ct. 217, 66 L. Ed. 505 (1922). Massachusetts passed a law in 1920 which declared it "to be the policy of the commonwealth that the general court, when called upon to act upon a proposed amendment to the federal constitution, should defer action until the opinion of the voters of the commonwealth has been taken . . ." It provided further that if an amendment is not ratified by the session of the general court to which it is first submitted, it shall be submitted to the people at the following state election. MASS. ANN. LAWS c. 53, § 18 (1946).

[76] 253 U.S. 221, 40 S. Ct. 495, 64 L. Ed. 871 (1920).

[77] Id., 253 U.S. at 227.

[78] 258 U.S. 130, 137, 42 S. St. 217, 66 L. Ed. 505 (1922). The effect of a gubernatorial veto was called into question in connection with the adoption of the Twelfth Amendment. The Governor of New Hampshire vetoed the resolution of that State's Legislature to ratify the proposal. If effective, ratification by New Hampshire would have brought the total of consenting states to the necessary three-fourths. The amendment was not proclaimed, however, until another state had ratified, and the proclamation did not include New Hampshire as one of the ratifying states. Myers, op. cit. supra note 46, at 34.

[79] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 1st Sess. 75, 102, 334 (1869). The House resolution bore a strong resemblance to the act passed in 1866 (14 STAT. 243) requiring state legislatures to meet at an appointed day and to proceed as therein directed to elect a United States Senator.

pending amendment on the sixth day of any regular or special session, and to continue to meet until final action was taken on the amendment. A proposed change was to be deemed ratified if it received the vote of a majority of the members elected to each house. Whether such a measure is within the power of Congress incident to the submission of amendments is doubtful.

A still unsettled question which has arisen from time to time is whether provisions of state constitutions defining a quorum, prescribing the majority necessary for the enactment of legislation, or regulating the conduct of legislative business are applicable to ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution. In 1871, the Indiana Senate voted to rescind that State's "pretended ratification" of the Fifteenth Amendment, on the ground, among others that this action had been taken by less than a quorum of each house of the state legislature as defined by the state constitution.[80] More recently, the purported ratification of the Child Labor Amendment by at least two states was clouded by uncertainty as to the effect of state constitutional provisions governing the passage of a local law. The Governor of Illinois certified to the Secretary of State that this Amendment had been ratified by the Illinois Legislature, although the resolution to that effect had been adopted in the Senate by less than a majority of all members elected thereto, as required for the enactment of legislation.[81] On the other hand, the ratification of this proposal by Kansas was valid only if the provision of the state constitution authorizing the Lieutenant Governor to cast a deciding vote applied to the ratification of an amendment.[82]

Since proposed amendments are submitted to the state legislatures and not to the people it would seem, on principle, that restrictions imposed by the people, in the state constitution, on the adoption of legislation, should not be binding with respect to the performance of this federal function if the legislature chooses to adopt other rules. But in the absence of special rules sanctioning a different procedure, by what authority can it be said that proceedings which do not conform to the requirements for ordinary legislation constitute the action of the state legislature within the sense of Article V?

As long as the Supreme Court adhered to the position taken in Leser v. Garnett that official notice to the Secretary of State that a State had ratified an amendment "was conclusive upon him, and, being certified to by his proclamation, is conclusive upon the courts," [83] questions as to the regularity of state action were of little more than academic interest. But in Coleman v. Miller and Chandler v. Wise [84] the Court, in effect, closed the door to judicial determination of these issues. In the former it held that the legal consequences of a previous rejection of an amendment by a state legislature, and of the lapse of time since the submission of the proposal, were political questions which should be resolved by Congress rather than by the courts. Being equally divided on the point, it did not decide whether the right of a Lieutenant Governor to cast a deciding vote was a justiciable issue. Although this case left open the possibility that some questions might still be found to be justiciable at some stage, the opinion in Chandler v. Wise indicates that even those questions might cease to be cognizable by a court before it had an opportunity to pass upon them. There citizens and taxpayers sued to restrain the Governor of Kentucky from certifying an allegedly void resolution of the state legislature purporting to ratify the Child Labor Amendment. Before being served with summons in this suit, the Governor forwarded a certified copy of the resolution to the Secretary of State by mail. The Supreme Court dismissed a writ of certiorari on the ground that while the state court had jurisdiction in limine, after the Governor had transmitted the notice of ratification. "there was no longer a controversy susceptible of judicial determination." [85]

In a concurring opinion in the Coleman case, four justices expressed the view that the process of amendment "is 'political' in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point." [86] Even without this invitation, the uncertainty as to what, if any, questions the courts would entertain in the future would constitute a strong inducement to Congress to occupy the whole

---

[80] CONG. GLOBE, 41st Cong., 3d Sess. 1250 (1871).
[81] JOURNAL OF THE ILLINOIS STATE SENATE, 58th General Assembly 1751 (1933).
[82] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 446, 59 S. Ct. 972, 83 L. Ed. 1385 (1939).
[83] Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137, 42 S. Ct. 217, L. Ed. 505 (1922).
[84] 307 U.S. 474, 59 S. Ct. 992, 83 L. Ed. 1407 (1939).
[85] Id., 307 U.S. at 478.
[86] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 459, 59 S. Ct. 972, 83 L. Ed. 1385 (1939).

field. And once it has done so, it is extremely improbable that the Supreme Court would undertake to eject it.

Nor is it likely that Congress would exhibit the same reluctance to examine the regularity of state action as has the Court. Moreover, there appears to be no reason why all decisions concerning the ratification of an amendment could not be taken by a simple majority vote. Since such votes would, on the surface at least, relate merely to questions of fact and of law raised by objections to the validity of purported ratification, rather than to the wisdom of the amendment, it would be straining a point to say that they were governed by he phrase "whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem necessary." No other provision of the Constitution would require more than a simple majority in this situation. The only legislative precedent is the resolution adopted in 1868 declaring the Fourteenth Amendment to be a part of the Constitution. In the House of Representatives, 127 members voted in the affirmative, 33 in the negative, with 55 not voting.[87] The yeas and nays were not taken in the Senate. The Congressional Globe simply recites: "The resolution was adopted."[88]

IV.

Conclusion

No amendment to the Constitution has been adopted since Coleman v. Miller was decided. Any estimate of its practical results lies, therefore, entirely in the realm of speculation. Where an amendment is sharply controversial, there is a strong possibility that the issue will be fought out all over again in the Halls of Congress after three-fourths of the states have given their assent. To this extent the process of changing the Constitution may become still more difficult than it has been in the past. In view of the decision in Dillon v. Gloss that an amendment takes effect on the date of the final ratification required for its adoption, rather than on the date when it is proclaimed,[89] there is a further possibility of a period of serious confusion and uncertainty while the validity of ratification is being determined.

To leave the way open for Congress to bury a proposed amendment even after three-fourths of the states have approved it seems to be consonant with the purpose of the framers to permit changes in the fundamental law only when there is a strong preponderance of contemporaneous opinion in favor of it. If a majority of both Houses of Congress felt compelled for any reason to declare that a proposed amendment had not been duly ratified, that action would raise grave doubts as to whether the amendment had the requisite support in public opinion at that time. But if the lawmakers are to exercise this function some way must be found to minimize the confusion until the issue is decided. The ruling that an amendment becomes effective the moment the thirty-second state ratifies it should be repudiated. And provision should be made for determining when Congress has said its final word on the subject. Although it has been suggested that in proclaiming an amendment, the Secretary of State speaks with the authority of Congress, no one can say whether such a proclamation would preclude subsequent inquiry into the validity of ratification, or if not, whether there is any time limit on the power of Congress to reopen the matter. In 1930, eleven years after the Eighteenth Amendment was ratified, Representative La Guardia of New York offered a joint resolution to declare that amendment inoperative on the ground that ratification of the original resolution was ineffective to make the amendment a permanent part of the Constitution.[90] But as this resolution was never acted upon the question remains unanswered.

One method of handling the problem might be for Congress to repeal the present statute authorizing the Secretary of State to proclaim the adoption of an amendment immediately upon receipts of official notice of the requisite ratifications. Instead, he might be directed to transmit such evidence to Congress when three-fourths of the states have purported to ratify. To avoid a stalemate, it might be desirable to provide that unless Congress directs otherwise with a designated period, the Secretary should issue, at the end of such period, a

---

[87] CONG. GLOBE, 40th Cong., 2d Sess. 4206 (1868).
[88] Id. at 4266.
[89] 256 U.S. 368, 376, 41 S. Ct. 510, 65 L. Ed. 994 (1921).
[90] 72 CONG. REC. 1761 (1930). This resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and was never reported. For a statement of the author's reasoning, see note 50 supra.

proclamation, which should be deemed conclusive, declaring that the amendment had been adopted. In any event, having been given virtually complete responsibility in the premises, it is up to Congress to provide some procedure for a prompt definitive decision as to the validity of the ratification of any amendments it proposes.

Edward S. Corwin
Mary Louise Ramsey

[72 Yale Law Journal 957 (1963)]

The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster

(By Charles L. Black, Jr.†)

Three proposals for amending the Constitution have recently come from the Council of State Governments, and are being propelled down the never before used alternative route of article V—the route via state applications to Congress for the calling of a convention.[1] Of the three, one (which would establish a Court of the Union, composed of the state Chief Justices in all their multitude, to meet on extraordinary occasions to review judgments of the Supreme Court)[2] is so patently absurd that it will probably sink without trace. Another, eradicating[3] Baker v. Carr[4] concerns a special subject, and hence does not generally affect the federal power or the whole shape of the Union. The third is of supreme interest to students of constitutional law. Its adoption would effect a constitutional change of a higher order of importance than any since 1787—if one excepts (and that only doubtfully) the de facto change implicit in the result of the Civil War.

It is wonderful that this proposal—which has already commended itself to a number of state legislatures[5]—has been so little noticed. This is doubtless because the proposed change is in procedure. But a change in the procedure of constitutional amendment—unless it is purely formal, and this one is not—is a change in the distribution of ultimate power. The proposed article V, if adopted, would make it easily possible for a proportion of the American people no greater than that which supported Landon in 1936 to impose on the rest of the country any alteration whatever in the Constitution. The people who could do this would be, by and large, those inhabitants of the less populous states who reside in the districts that are over-represented in their own state legislatures. "Unto him that hath it shall be given." This component of the population—to which we are all accustomed to conceding a veto power on constitutional amendment, as on many other matters—would under the proposed plan have something very different from a veto power. It would have the affirmative power of forcing its will on the majority, as to anything which may be the subject of constitutional amendment—that is to say, as to everything. Such a proposal ought to be scrutinized with the very greatest care, and the same careful scrutiny should be given to the method by which its proponents hope to coerce its submission to the state legislatures for ratification as an amendment.

THE PROPOSED NEW ARTICLE V

If this proposal were to win its way through, article V would read as follows:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states. Whenever applications from the Legislatures of

---

†Henry R. Luce, Professor of Jurisprudence, Yale Law School.

[1] All are set out in full, with an account of their espousal by the Council, in Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 36 State Gov't 10 (1963).

[2] Id. at 13–14.

[3] By abolishing all substantive federal guarantees against malapportionment, thus making action by Congress as well as by Court impossible, and by withdrawing the subject entirely from federal judicial power. 36 State Gov't at 12.

[4] 369 U.S. 186 (1962) (fourteenth amendment claim against state legislative malapportionment held within federal judicial jurisdiction).

[5] According to information informally received, the legislatures of Arkansas, Florida, Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Wyoming have already passed the Resolution set out in text accompanying note 13 infra. In about an equal number of states, one house has passed it.

two-thirds of the total number of states of the United States shall contain identical texts of an amendment to be proposed, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall so certify, and the amendment as contained in the application shall be deemed to have been proposed, without further action by Congress. No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."[6]

It may be convenient to the reader to have set out the text of the present article V:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate."[7]

The proposed plan, it will be seen, abolishes the (never used) "convention" way of amendment, and put in its place a method wholly under the control, as to substance and procedure, of the state legislatures. It does this by making it mandatory that Congress submit for ratification any amendment called for by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states, and by simultaneously taking away Congress' power to elect the state convention mode of ratification.

At present an amendment may be passed (and all have actually passed in this way) if two-thirds of each national house wants it, and if it is ratified by three-fourths of the states in the manner chosen by Congress. One might also pass if (on proper application of two-thirds of the states) a convention, summoned by Congress and having such structure as Congress thought wise to give it, proposed the amendment, and if it were then ratified in the manner chosen by Congress.

Along the new route opened by the proposed article V, Congress would control neither substance nor procedure. Three-fourths of the state legislatures, without the consent of any other body, could change the presidency to a committee of three, hobble the treaty power, make the federal judiciary elective, repeal the fourth amendment, make Catholics ineligible for public office, and move the national capital to Topeka. These are (in part at least) cartoon illustrations. But the cartoon accurately renders the de jure picture, and seems exaggerated only because we now conceive that at least some of these actions have no appeal to anybody. Some amendments—e.g., something like the Bricker Amendment—would be very likely of early passage. At present the main dangers would be to civil and political rights, to national conduct of foreign relations, and to the federal taxing power. But (particularly since the proposed change would be absolutely irreversible, thirteen states being enough to block it reversal) the cartoon does not exaggerate the possibilities of the long future. A country in which the large majority would have to dread and sometimes submit to constitutional innovations appealing only to a minority could not call itself, even poetically, a democracy, and the possible tensions between consensus and Constitution would be dangerous in the extreme.

At present when an amendment passes the House and the Senate by two-thirds there is fair ground for the inference that there is national consensus upon it; at least the means of ascertaining that crucial fact, though rough, are fairly well adapted to the end. If the national convention method, under the present article V, were ever to be used, Congress, in setting up the convention, could ensure that it be so representative as to be likely to express a national consensus. Congress even retains control over the ratification process; if the state legislatures were in its view to come to be dangerously unrepresentative, Congress could provide for ratification by state conventions so chosen as accuratedly to reflect the views of each state's people. Properly used, the present article V can ensure that no constitutional change be effected which is disliked, deplored, or detested by a distinct majority of the American people.

What is the situation under the proposed new article V? Here one must talk numbers—even statistics of a rough kind. Let us note first that the thirty-eight least populous states, whose legislatures could under the proposed article V repeal the full faith and credit clause, contain about 40 percent of the country's population.[8] That really ought to be enough. That these particular people should, in the name of federalism, have a veto power, is acceptable; at least it is accepted beyond change. What rational ground could there be for giving them, in addition, the power affirmatively to govern the rest of the people?

[6] 36 STATE GOV'T 11-12 (1963); see text accompanying note 13 infra.
[7] U.S. CONST. art. V.

But of course one cannot stop there. The power given by the new article V is not in the states but in their legislatures. It cannot be too strongly stressed that one need not approve of Baker v. Carr[9] in order to accept the fact, as a fact, that the state legislatures do not accurately represent the people of their states—that a majority in each house of most state legislatures can be made up of votes representing a distinct minority of the state's people. This situation may have a certain romantic appeal;[10] even if one does not appreciate its beauty, one may not think the remedying of it a fit job for the federal courts. But neither of these judgments supports the conclusion that the uncontrolled power of federal constitutional amendment should be turned over to bodies so constituted.

So back to numbers: In the best table accessible,[11] relevant data are given for thirty-four of the thirty-eight least populous states of the Union. On the average it takes 38 per cent of the people in one of these states to form the constituencies of enough state senators or representatives to pass a measure through the more accurately representative house of the state legislature. Taking this figure as good enough for present purposes, if the proposed article V were in force, the income tax could be abolished, by repeal of the sixteenth amendment, if about 15 per cent of the American People were represented by legislators who desired that result.[12]

Now of course it can be replied that such a coalition cannot be formed without the implication that a good many other people are like-minded with it. Granted, But the margin is enormous. If the right 30 per cent of the people favored some amendment, its chance of passage would be very great indeed, whatever the other 70 per cent might think. And it is very important that the distortion is not random but systematic—it is a distortion operating steadily in favor of rural districts and small towns. It is not too much to say that the proposed article V would enable the inhabitants of such districts to effect any change they persistently wanted in the Constitution of the United States. They may be better and wiser than the rest of us; perceptive fiction and the exacter sociology are not clear on this, but let us assume it is so. Does that justify turning the Constitution over to them, affirmatively and negatively, to keep or to change as they will.

Reference was made above to the result of the Civil War. The proposed article V rests on the theory, at least in part, that that result ought to be revised. The several states now have a crucial part in the process of constitutional amendment; the new proposal would (as far as one alternative method is concerned) give it entirely into their hands, setting at nothing the concept of national consensus among the American people considered as a whole people. It is a proposal for state rule only, on the basis of state-by-state count only and through state institution only, with the popular and national principles altogether submerged. If history has any lessons, our history teaches that such a location of ultimate power would put us in mortal danger.

It should only be added that this proposal, as a corollary to its discard of the concept of national consensus as a prerequistite to amendment, does away with national consideration and debate as a part of the amendment process. Under the present article V, any amendment must be examined and considered in a fully national forum—whether Congress or Convention—before it goes out to the several states. Such debate focusses national attention on something which is above all of national concern. Under the proposal, the only public debate would be in fifty separate state legislatures; the rest of the process would be ministerial only. This short-circuiting of national deliberation is actually one of the most offensive features of the plan.

The mode of proposal

The plan of the proponents of this amendment is to see it introduced into each of the state legislatures, in the form of a resolution in the following terms:

---

[8] Calculated from the 1960 Census, 1963 WORLD ALMANAC 255. The author is ill at reckoning, but the figures given here are not far off.

[9] 359 U.S. 185 (1952).

[10] See Perrin, In Defense of Country Votes, 52 YALE REV. 16 (1962), especially at 24.

[11] Compiled by The National Municipal League, N.Y. Times, Mar. 28, 1962, p. 22, col. 3.

[12] This figure is arrived at by taking 38% (the percentage of people in the relevant states necessary, on the average, to control the legislature) of 40% (the percentage of the American people residing in the thirty-eight least populous states).

"A (JOINT) RESOLUTION*

*[This resolution should be in whatever technical form the state employs for a single resolution of both houses of the legislature which does not require the Governor to approve or veto.[13]]

Memorializing Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to Article V thereof.

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring, that this Legislature respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"'ARTICLE ——

"'Section 1. Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states. Whenever applications from the Legislatures of two-thirds of the total number of states of the United States shall contain identical texts of an amendment to be proposed, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall so certify, and the amendment as contained in the application shall be deemed to have been proposed, without further action by Congress. No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

"'Section 2. This Article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states within seven years from the date of its submission.'

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that if Congress shall have proposed an amendment to the Constitution identical with that contained in this resolution prior to January 1, 1965, this application for a convention shall no longer be of any force or effect.

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each member of the Congress from this State."

The hope is that, if two-thirds of the legislatures submit a petition, Congress will consider itself bound, under the present article V, to call the "convention" requested.

Questions presented

A number of questions arise; some of these will be considered here—not as judicial questions, but as questions sure to come into the mind of any Congressman or Senator conscientiously seeking to do his duty.

Is the Document Quoted Above an "Application" Within the Meaning of Article V?

Article V lays down that Congress shall "call a Convention for proposing Amendments," on "Application" of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. The "Application" which can raise a conscientious obligation on Congress' part must be one that asks it to "call a Convention for proposing Amendment." (Emphasis added). A good case can be made for the proposition that the quoted document is not such an "Application," but an application for something quite different—for a "Convention" to consider whether an amendment already proposed shall be voted up or down.[14]

The process of "proposal" by Congress, contained in the first alternative of article V, obviously includes the process of plenary deliberation upon the whole problem to which the amendment is to address itself. It entails choice among the whole range of alternatives, as to substance and wording. It is "proposal" in the most fully substantial sense, where the proposer controls and works out the content and form of the proposition. It is very doubtful whether the same word two lines later, in the description of the second alternative, ought to be taken to [13] 36 STATE GOV'T 11–12 (1963).

[14] Even this much is more than the Resolution literally allows; it asks for a convention "for the purpose of proposing" the amendment set out. Is it possible that the sponsors think the convention's role can be made ministerial?

denote a mechanical take-it-or-leave-it process. Under the procedure followed by the draftsmen and proponents of the present "application," the "convention" would be in true function a part of the process of ratification.

This doubt is reinforced by the fact that the delegates who approved this language at Philadelphia were just completing the work of a "convention" of their own. It is not likely that to them the phrase "convention for proposing amendments" meant a convention with a mandate somewhat like the one under which they had worked—a mandate to consider a set of problems and seek solutions?

The difference here is not merely formal, but sounds the deeps of political wisdom. The issue is whether it is contemplated that measures dominantly of national interest should be malleable under debate and deliberation at a national level, before going out to the several states. Such a conception of the "convention" contemplated by article V makes the second route to amendment symmetrical with the first, in the vital respect that, under both, the national problem must be considered as a problem, with a wide range of possible solutions and an opportunity to raise and discuss them all in a body with national responsibility and adequately flexible power. The Congressman or Senator persuaded by this distinction would be justified in concluding that the present "applications," even if two-thirds of the states joined, was not of the sort that obligated Congress to call a convention.[15]

Assuming these "applications" are not within article V, it may still be suggested that a sort of "reformation" might be applied—that Congress, even if not persuaded that the present applications asked for the thing contemplated by article V, ought to call such convention as it thinks it would have been obliged to call if the applications had been of the right sort. This seems clearly wrong, for several reasons. Generally, a high degree of adherence to exact form, at least in matters of importance, is desirable in this ultimate legitimating process; a constitutional amendment ought to go through a process unequivocally binding on all. Congress is given no power to call a constitutional convention when it wants to, or thinks that on the general equities perhaps it should; if Congress desires an amendment, article V very clearly tells how that desire is to be made know. Congress' power as to conventions is not discretionary but strictly conditional, and if the condition is not met Congress not only need not but may not call a valid convention.

It is, moreover, illegitimate to infer, from a state's having asked for a "convention" to vote a textually-given amendment up or down, that it desires some other sort of convention. It is not for Congress to guess whether a state which asks for the one kind of "convention" wants the other as a second choice. Altogether different political considerations might govern.

On the whole, then, no member of Congress could be held to have disregarded a conscientious obligation if he took the view that the "application" quoted above, even if sponsored by two-thirds of the state legislatures, did not make obligatory a convention call. Indeed, he might conclude that Congress would be exceeding its powers in calling such a "convention," the condition to such a call, on a fair construction of article V, not having been met.

If Congress Is Obligated To Call a Convention, What Sort Must It Call?

The short fact here is that neither text nor history give any real help. When and if the article V condition is met, Congress "shall call a Convention . . ."; that is all we know. Fortunately, that is all we need to know, for the "necessary and proper" clause[16] and the common sense of McCulloch v. Maryland,[17] give all the constitutional guidance required. Since Congress is to call the convention and since no specifications are given, and since no convention can be called [15] It should be noted that another and quite independent defect might be thought to vitiate these "applications." They demand the calling of a convention "for the purpose of proposing" an amendment which is, by its own text, to be ratified by the state legislatures; Congress can be under a duty to comply with these applications, then, only if such applications in sufficient number can place it under a duty to abdicate its own discretionary function, as clear as anything in the Constitution, of choosing between the modes of ratification, whatever may have been the mode of proposal. It is certain, on the fact of Article V, that no applications from any number of state legislatures can put Congress under a moral or legal obligation to do that. This quite patent error ought to lead to some suspicion of the whole theory on which these applications are drawn—the theory that Congress and the desired "convention" can be very narrowly confined in function, and that their work can be done for them in advance by the state legislatures.

---

[16] U.S. Const. art. I, § 8.

[17] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).

without specifications of constituency, mode of election, mandate, majority necessary to "propose," and so on, then Congress obviously may and must specify on these and other necessary matters as its wisdom guides it. (It may be noted that continuing control by Congress of the amendment process must have been contemplated, for Congress is given, under article V, the option between modes of ratification, no matter what the method of proposal.)

If this is accepted, then no Senator or Representative is bound to vote for a convention call which in its form fails to safeguard what he believes to be vital national interests. Specifically, insistence would be thoroughly justified on the allocation of voting power by population rather than by states, on the election at large of a state's delegation or its choice in fairly apportioned districts, and on federal conduct of the election of delegates, to prevent racial and other discrimination. Provision for a "two-thirds" rule might well be thought wise, in order to ensure the same kind of consensus on this branch of article V as on the other. Since the adoption of this proposed amendement would make easily possible the future amendment of the Constitution without anything like popular consent, it is thoroughly reasonable for Congress to insist that this surrender be fully voluntary for at least this generation, unless (as is not true) some positive constitutional command to the contrary prevents.

It will probably be argued that the voting in any convention must be by states, since the voting in the original Constitutional Convention was by states. On this point, the anology is not persuasive. The states then were in a position of at least nominal sovereignty, and were considering whether to unite. The result of the Convention would have bound no dissenting state or its people; the same was true of the acceptance of the new Constitution by the requisite nine. All these conditions are now reversed. We are already in an indissoluable union; there is a whole American people. The question in an amending convention now would be whether innovations, binding on dissenters, were to be offered for ratification. The propriety of a vote by states in the one convention surely cannot settle its rightness in the other.

Has the President a Part in the Convention Call Process?

Article I, section 7, clause 3 is as plain as language can be:

"Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill."

Clearly, this language literally applies to actions of Congress taken under article V.

In Hollingsworth v. Virginia,[18] it was contended that the eleventh amendment had not been validly proposed, since the resolution proposing it had not been sent to the President. Against this and other arguments, the Court, in a brief opinion not touching substance, upheld the amendment. In the course of argument, Justice Chase remarked: "The negative of the president applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation; he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the constitution." [19]

Since that time, the practice has been not to send amendment proposals to the President. These precedents apply, of course, only to the first method prescribed by article V, since that is the only method that has been used. Hollingsworth v. Virginia is inherently weak, as the unreasoned decision must be. It introduces an exception by fiat into the entirely clear language of article I, section 7. But it need not be unfrocked in its own parish, since it is possible that the Court may have had in mind a ground for taking the first alternative of article V out of the veto process; since the congressional proposal must be by two-thirds in each house, it may have been thought that the requirement for overriding the veto was already met. This is not perhaps a very good ground, but the point about it here is that it would not exist at all if Congress, by simple majorities, called a "convention" under article V. Unless some other ground (better than Justice Chase's mere assertion) be stated for holding the contrary, it would seem that such a congressional action would fall as clearly as may be under the terms of article I, section 7, clause 3.

[18] Id. at 380 n.a.
[19] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

If this is right, then the grounds upon which the President might exercise his veto need be no less than those proper in the case of a Congressman voting on a convention call. If the President believed the structure and mandate of the "convention" significantly wrong, and dangerous to the national well-being, he would surely be justified in vetoing the Resolution.

Summary

This proposal for amending article V is dangerous. It is to be hoped that it will be defeated in the state legislatures, but they are, after all, voting for or against increasing their own powers. If "Applications" in the form quoted above, reach Congress in sufficient number to force the issue, there is still authentic constitutional ground on which to stand. It may be that these "applications" call for something not contemplated by the second alternative in article V, and hence need be treated, at most, only as memorials to Congress to propose this amendment, a plea addressed entirely to discretion. It is as certain as any such matter can be that no Congressman or Senator is bound to vote for a convention call, even on impeccably proper application, wherein prudent conditions as to mandate, structure, constituency, voting, proper selection of delegates, and all the rest, are not met. There is no real reason why Presidential veto, on the same grounds, is not proper in this matter.

If all this terrain is fought over, then the American people will surrender this ultimate power into the hands of a minority only if they want to, and if they want to nobody can stop them.

[39 Notre Dame Lawyer 659 (1964)]

PROPOSING CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS BY CONVENTION: SOME PROBLEMS

(By Arthur Earl Bonfield*)

All of the existing amendments to the United States Constitution were proposed to the states by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress. Proponents of the three provisions under discussion here seek to avoid this procedure. They are attempting to invoke an alternative means of submitting to the states amendments to our fundamental law. In addition to the direct Congressional initiation of the amending process, Article V[1] provides that "on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states [Congress] shall call a Convention for proposing amendments." The present paper will consider some of the difficult questions raised by the current effort to utilize this particular mode of "proposing" amendments to our Constitution.

At the outset, it should be noted that many of the significant questions that will arise in the present attempt to propose amendments to our fundamental law by convention will not be resolvable in the courts.[2] Strong dicta even go so far as to insist that all questions arising in the amending process are nonjusticiable.[3] But there is evidence of a substantial nature to the contrary. It would indicate that some of the questions which may arise in this process can

---

*Assistant Professor of Law, University of Iowa College of Law; B.A., Brooklyn College; LL.B., LL.M., Yale Law School.

[1] U.S. Const. art. V.

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

[2] See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 457 (1939) (concurring opinion). Dowling, Clarifying The Amending Process, 1 WASH. & LEE L. REV. 215 (1945). In Coleman v. Miller, the Court held that the effectiveness of a state's ratification of a proposed amendment which it had previously rejected, and the period of time within which a state could validly ratify a proposed amendment, were nonjustifiable political questions within the exclusive and irrevocable determination of Congress.

[3] See id. at 457–59 (concurring opinion).

Proclamation under authority of Congress that an amendment has been ratified will carry with it a solemn assurance by the Congress that ratification has taken place as the Constitution commands. Upon this assurance a proclaimed amendment must be accepted as a part of the Constitution, leaving to the judiciary its traditional authority of interpretation. . . . Undivided control of [the amending] process has been given by the Article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is "political" in its entirety . . . and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point.

See also text accompanying note 22 infra, and Dowling, note 2 supra.

be settled on the merits by the judiciary.[4] However, those that are beyond the capacity of the courts to decide because they are nonjusticiable political questions will be resolvable solely by Congress. Its decision in such cases will be final and conclusive of the courts.[5] Nevertheless, in the exercise of that power Congress . . . is [still] governed by the Constitution."[6]

The first question raised by the current effort to propose amendments to our National Constitution via a convention concerns the sufficiency of the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments for this purpose.[7] Are they proper applications for a "Convention" within the meaning of Article V? If they are not, their adoption by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states would neither authorize nor compel Congress to summon a convention empowered to propose amendments to the Constitution. The reasons for this are several.

In the first place, the United States is a government of delegated powers. Consequently, it possesses no authority save that conferred upon it by the Constitution. Article V, the only provsion in the Constitution dealing with its amendment, must therefore be deemed exhaustive and not merely illustrative of the Federal Government's powers in this regard. That provision explicitly provides two modes for proposing constitutional amendments. Only one of these contemplates the convening of a convention empowered to propose amendments. Such a "Convention" is authorized by Article V only when two-thirds of the state legislatures have made "Applications" for one. As a result, applications within the meaning of Article V from two-thirds of the state legislatures must fairly be deemed absolute prerequisites to the summoning of such a body.[8]

There is a second reason why valid Article V applications from the requisite number of state legislatures must be deemed prior conditions to the summoning of any convention empowered to propose amendments. If these applications are not prerequisites to such a convention call, on its own say-so, a majority of Congress could validly summon such a body.[9] By the same simple majority, Congress could determine the convention's makeup and mode of operation. It could therefore provide that the convention could propose amendments to the states by a mere majority of its delegates.

But Article V insists that a two-thirds vote be required by both Houses of Congress, or that two-thirds of the state legislatures make "Application" for a "Convention," before an amendment to the Constitution may be proposed to the states. This reflects the conviction of the founding fathers that the seriousness of this kind of action demands a national consensus of the sort required to achieve such two-thirds votes. Permitting a majority of Congress, on its own say-so, to call a convention empowered to propose constitutional amendments approved by a single majority of the latter's delegates would, therefore, frustrate the well-reasoned intentions of the founding fathers in this respect; for the kind of consensus required to secure a two-thirds vote of Congress or applications for a "Convention" from two-thirds of the state legislatures would no longer be required to trigger the amending process.

There is a further reason why Congress may not call a convention empowered to propose amendments to the Constitution until it has received the kinds of applications contemplated by Article V from the requisite number of state legislatures. "A high degree of adherence to exact form . . . is desirable in this ultimate legitimating process."[10] Because of the uniquely fundamental nature

---

[4] See Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922); Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920); Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221 (1920); Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

This article will not attempt to fully explore the extent to which the Courts can or should take it upon themselves in suits properly before them to independently resolve the various questions that may arise in the amending process. On the justiciability of questions arising in the amending process see ORFIELD, AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 7–36 (1942); Clark, The Supreme Court and the Amending Process, 39 VA. L. REV. 621 (1953); Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067 (1957).

[5] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939); cf. United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

[6] Coleman v. Miller, supra, note 5, at 457 (1939).

[7] Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10 (Winter No. 1, 1963).

[8] See ORFIELD, AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 40 (1942); Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW, 185, 196 (1951); Black, The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster, 72 YALE L.J. 957, 962–64 (1963).

[9] The terms of Article V in no way suggest that Congress may not convene such a body by the usual vote required for Congressional action. Consequently, no more than a majority vote would seem to be required to "call a Convention."

[10] Black, supra note 8, at 963.

of a constitutional amendment, attempts to alter our Constitution should not be filled with highly questionable procedures which could reasonably cast doubt on the ultimate validity of the provision produced. The procedure followed in any effort to amend the Constitution should be so perfect that it renders unequivocal to all reasonable men the binding nature of the product. Consequently, Article V must insist upon a firm and unyielding adherence to the precise procedures it provides. This unusual need for certainty in the process of amending our fundamental law also lends additional force to the assumption that the precise procedures provided in Article V must be deemed exclusive.

Prior discussion demonstrates that in the process of "proposing Amendments" to the Constitution by "Convention," Congress resembles those state legislatures that are empowered to create such a body only after a demand for such action by the people at the polls.[11] That is, Congress may not call a convention empowered to "propose" amendments to the Constitution unless it receives from two-thirds of the state legislatures the kinds of applications for such action that are contemplated by Article V. As a consequence, the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments and adopted by the legislatures of several states must be carefully scrutinized in order to determine their adequacy in this respect. If these resolutions are not applications for a convention within the meaning of Article V in no case would Congress be authorized or obligated to call a "Convention" pursuant thereto.

The resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments provide as follows:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring that this Legislature respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States." [The text of one of the three desired constitutional amendments is then inserted.[12]]

It can be argued with substantial persuasiveness that these resolutions are not applications for an Article V "Convention."

Article V clearly specifies that Congress "shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." The process of proposing amendments contemplates a conscious weighing and evaluation of various alternative solutions to the problems perceived. As Professor Charles Black has noted:

"The process of 'proposal' by Congress contained in the first alternative of Article V, obviously [and necessarily] includes the process of plenary deliberation upon the whole problem to which the amendment is to address itself. It entails choice among the whole range of alternatives as to substance and wording. It is 'proposal' in the most fully substantial sense, where the proposer controls and works out the content and form of the proposition. It is very doubtful whether the same word two lines later, in the description of the second alternative, ought to be taken to denote a mechanical take-it or leave-it process."[13]

Common sense alone suggests that Article V contemplates a deliberative convention that would itself undertake fully to evaluate a problem, and propose those particular solutions that it deems desirable. The reason for this is that amendments to our National Constitution are chiefly matters of national concern. Consequently, all the alternatives should be carefully explored and debated on a national level, and the details of any proposed amendments fully worked out on a national level, before they are sent to the states for their more locally oriented action or ratification.

With this in mind, it can reasonably be assumed that the two modes provided for "proposing" amendments found in Article V were to be symmetrical. Whether "proposed" by Congress or a "Convention," the problem at which any amendment is directed is to be "considered as a problem, with [an evaluation] of a wide range of possible solutions and an opportunity to raise and discuss them all in a body with national responsibility and adequately flexible power."[14] Consequently, the "Convention," contemplated by Article V was to be a fully deliberative body—with power to propose to the states as amendments any solutions to the problem submitted to the "Convention" that it deemed best.

If Article V contemplates this kind of a "Convention . . . for proposing Amendments," the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments should be

---

[11] See Iowa Const. art. X, § 3; Nev. Const. art. XVI, § 2; N.Y. Const. art. XIX, § 1; S.D. Const. art. XXIII, § 2; Tenn. Const. art XI, § 3.

[12] Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10, 11–14 (Winter No. 1 1963).

[13] Black, supra note 8, at 962.

[14] Id., at 963 (emphasis added).

deemed insufficient applications within the meaning of that provision. Instead of requesting a deliberative convention with full power to propose to the states any amendments dealing with the subject in question that it thinks proper, these resolutions demand "a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States." [15] As a result, the resolutions in issue really call for a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove in a mechanical way the text of specific amendments that have already been "proposed" elsewhere. In this sense, the proponents of these resolutions seek to make the "Convention" part of the ratifying process, rather than part of the deliberative process for "proposing" constitutional amendment.[16] Consequently, the resolutions in question should not empower Congress to call a convention authorized to submit amendments to the states for ratification. They are not "Application[s for a] Convention . . . for proposing amendments" as Article V demands; rather, they are applications for a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove the submission to the states of particular amendments "proposed" elsewhere.

Furthermore, Congress has no authority to treat the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments as applications for the kind of convention Article V does contemplate. It cannot be inferred from these resolutions requesting a convention empowered solely to approve or disapprove particular amendments for submission to the states, that the state legislatures tendering them would be satisfied or willing to have a plenary convention consider the problems at which these amendments were directed, and submit to the states the solutions to those problems that the convention deems best. "It is not for Congress to guess whether a state which asks for one kind of a 'convention' wants the other as a second choice. Altogether different political considerations might govern." [17]

A further defect in the resolutions may preclude their characterization as valid Article V applications. The text of each of the amendments contained in the propositions sponsored by the Council of State Governments specifies that it is to be ratified by "the state legislatures." [18] Article V clearly indicates that regardless of the mode of an amendment's proposal, Congress is to decide whether it shall be ratified by three-fourths of the state legislatures or three-fourths of special ratifying conventions held in each state.[19] As a result, the resolutions in question may also be deemed insufficient as Article V applications because they are attempting to achieve an illegitimate end. They seek to deny Congress the discretion to choose the mode whereby the states might ratify any product of the convention they seek.

Prior discussion should demonstrate that Congress could not legitimately treat the resolutions in questions as valid applications for an Article V convention. Consequently, it should have no authority to call such a "Convention for proposing Amendments" to the Constitution pursuant thereto. Since precedent does exist for the proposition that courts will review the validity of a constitutional amendment on the merits in light of some procedural defects that may have vitiated its proper proposal or adoption,[20] there is a possibility that amendments proposed by any convention called pursuant to these resolutions would be held invalid in an appropriate judicial proceeding. Indeed, at the behest of a proper litigant a court might even enjoin the election of delegates to any convention called on the basis of such inadequate Article V applications.

However, it can be argued with great force that the sufficiency for Article V purposes of the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments is a nonjusticiable political question,[21] whose resolution is committed exclusively and finally to Congress. While these is no case directly on point, the dicta of four Justices of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Coleman v.

---

[15] See text accompanying note 12, supra.

[16] Shanahan, Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Will Strengthen Federal-State Relations, 49 A.B.A.J. 631, 633 (1963). He specifically notes that the purpose of including the actual text amendments was to insure that the "applicants" for a convention retained control over the amendments ultimately proposed.

[17] Black, supra note 8, at 964.

[18] Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10, 11–14 (Winter No. 1 1963).

[19] United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

[20] The courts will adjudicate on the merits the validity of a constitutional amendment in light of any alleged procedural defects that may have vitiated its proper proposal or adoption. See Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921); National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350 (1920); Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221 (1920); Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

[21] See Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending? 21 Ill. L. Rev. 782, 791–92 (1927); Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 1067, 1071 (1957).

Miller [23] should be recalled. "Undivided control of [the amending] process has been given by . . . Article [V] exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is 'political' in its entirety from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point." [24]

Furthermore, there may be a "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the [particular] issue to a coordinate political department." [25] That is, since Congress is to call the Article V convention on receipt of applications from the proper number of states requesting such a body, Congress alone may be empowered to decide whether those applications tendered are sufficient. By the same token it can be argued that the validity of these resolutions as applications for an Article V convention is nonjusticiable because of "the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution [of the question] without expressing lack of respect due coordinate branches of government." [26] If this is true, and the validity of these resolutions are applications for an Article V convention is "not meet for judicial determination," the decision of Congress on this question, whatever it is, will be conclusive on the courts for all purposes.

II

The next question presented by the current effort to propose amendments to the Constitution by convention concerns the role of state governors in the application process. Must applications for an Article V convention be approved by the legislatures and the governors of two-thirds of the states to be effective? Or, is legislative approval of these applications by the required number of states alone sufficient to empower Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments?

It should be noted that the Council of State Governments specifies that the resolution it sponsors "should be in whatever technical form the state employs for a single resolution of both houses of the legislature which does not require the Governor to approve or veto." [28] The correctness of the approach taken by the Council of State Governments in this respect depends on whether the term "legislature" in the application provision of Article V means the whole legislative process of the state—as defined in the state constitution—or only its representative lawmaking body. As we will see, close analogies suggest that this is a justiciable question.

The 1920 case of Hawke v. Smith, No. 1 [27] interpreted "legislatures" in the ratification clauses of Article V to mean the representative lawmaking body only, since "ratification by a State of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word." [28] If the term "legislature" is interpreted to mean only the state's representative lawmaking body in the ratification clauses of Article V, it should bear the same meaning in the application clauses of that provision. There would seem to be no valid reason for according a different meaning to the one term in these two different clauses of the same constitutional provision.

Further support for the view that the governor of a state need not sign its application for an Article V convention can be gleaned from the case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia. [29] In that suit counsel argued that the Eleventh Amendment was invalid because after it had been approved for proposal to the states by a two-thirds vote of Congress, it had not been tendered to the President for his signature. On this basis it was asserted that the Amendment had never been properly submitted to the states for their ratification. Mr.

---

[23] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939).
[24] Id. at 459 (1939) (concurring opinion).
[25] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).
[26] Id. at 217.
[27] Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System, 19 State Government 10, 11 (Winter No. 1 1963).
[27] 253 U.S. 221 (1920). That case held that a state could not restrict the ratifying power of its legislature by providing for a binding popular referendum on the question.
[28] Id. at 229. As a result, the Court held that a state constitutional provision that provided for a referendum on the action of the General Assembly in ratifying any proposed amendment to the United States Constitution was in conflict with Article V. Contra, State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 107 Wash. 167, 181 Pac. 920 (1919). An approach similar to that of Hawke v. Smith, No. 1 has been taken by state courts with regard to state constitutional amendments. See Mitchell v. Hopper, 153 Ark. 515, 241 S.W. 10 (1922); Larkin v. Gronna, 69 N.D. 234, 285 N.W. 59 (1939).
[29] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

Justice Chase answered this contention by asserting that "the negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation; he has nothing to do with the proposition, or adoption, of amendments to the Constitution." [80]

It is easy to apply this reasoning to the powers of state governors and conclude similarly that the executive of the state has no function to perform in the application process under Article V. The governor's approval of such an application for a convention is unnecessary; and an executive veto may be disregarded. Consequently effective applications for an Article V convention need only be approved by a state's legislature [81]—and in this respect, the theory upon which the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments is predicated is correct.

III

The current effort to seek a constitutional convention through the application process also raises a question of timing. That is, in order to be effective, within what period must the resolutions be adopted by two-thirds of the state legislatures? There would seem little doubt that Congress would neither be empowered nor under a duty to call an Article V convention unless it receives "relatively contemporaneously," proper applications from the required number of state legislature.[82] The reason for this is that each step in the amending process is meant to demonstrate significant agreement among the people of this country—at one time—that changes in some particular part or the whole of our fundamental law are desirable. Nothing less would seem acceptable in a process of such significance and lasting impact.

The case of Dillon v. Gloss [83] lends support to the assumption that a convention can properly be called pursuant to applications for an Article V convention only if they are made relatively contemporaneously by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. In that suit the United States Supreme Court sustained the power of Congress to fix the time period during which ratification of a pending amendment could be effective. After noting that Article V was silent on this question, the Court commented as follows:

"What then is the reasonable inference or implication? It is that ratification may be had at any time as within a few years, a century or even a longer period; or what it must be had within some reasonable period which Congress is left free to define?" [84]

After admitting that neither the debates in the Federal Convention nor those in the state conventions ratifying the Constitution shed any light on this question, the Court concluded that "the fair inference or implication from Article V is

---

[80] Id. at 381. "The most reasonable view would seem to be that the signature of the chief executive of a state is no more essential to complete the action of the legislature upon an amendment to the Federal Constitution than is that of the President of the United States to complete the action of Congress in proposing such an amendment." Ames, The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the U.S. During the First Century of Its History, H.R. Doc. No. 353, pt. 2, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 298 (1897).

[81] See STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82ND CONG., 2D SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS ON FEDERAL TAX RATES 7–8 (Comm. Print 1952); Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1075 (1957).

[82] Additionally, Congress may not properly call an Article V Convention unless a sufficient number of timely applications also agree on the problem of general subject matter that such a body should consider. But they need not be otherwise identical. That is, it is sufficient if the specific constitutional changes suggested by each application concern the same general subject matter; it is not necessary that each application propose the same changes in that subject matter. See STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82ND CONG. 2D SESS., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL TAX RATES 15 (Comm. Print 1952); Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW, 185, 195–96 (1951); Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067 (1957). But see OBFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 42; Wheeler, Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?, 21 ILL. L. REV. 782, 795 (1927).

The prior position seems correct for many of the same reasons that such applications must be reasonably contemporaneous to be effective. Sufficient national agreement to warrant the calling of an Article V Convention is evidenced only if the legislatures of two-thirds of the states agree that a convention is needed to deal with the same general problem or subject matter. Consequently, applications for a convention dealing with divergent subjects such as some dealing with the treaty power, some dealing with the taxing power, and some desiring a general constitutional revision, should not be counted together. The problem of whether heterogeneous applications should be considered together does not really arise in the present case since the Council of State Governments proposes that two-thirds of the states adopt identical resolutions. Twelve states have already adopted one of these resolutions. Graham, The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments, 49 A.B.A.J. 1175, 1182–83 (1963).

[83] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[84] Id. at 371.

that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal, which Congress is free to fix." [35] The Court's rationale was:

"As ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do." [36]

This logic would seem equally compelling in regard to the process of proposing amendments to the Constitution. Article V is silent as to how long applications for a convention are to retain their vitality. But to exhibit any significant or meaningful agreement as to the desirability of such a convention, applications from two-thirds of the states must be "sufficiently contemporaneous . . . to reflect the will of the people in . . . [different] sections at relatively the same period." That is, "to be obligatory upon Congress, the applications of the states should be reasonably contemporaneous with one another, for only then, would they be persuasive of a real consensus of opinion throughout the nation for holding a convention, and by the same token, they ought also to be expressive of similar views respecting the . . . [subject matter] of the amendment sought." [37]

While Dillon v. Gloss [38] seems to establish the authority of Congress to fix reasonable time limitations for the application as well as the amending process, it does not solve the problem as to what would be considered sufficient contemporaneity in absence of such a stipulation. The case of Coleman v. Miller [39] is relevant to this inquiry, since it held that the period of time within which the states could validly ratify a proposed amendment was a nonjusticiable political question. That is, in the absence of any edification from Congress as to what constitutes a reasonable time in the ratification process, the Court refused to make such a determination. Its rationale was that—

". . . the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve . . . an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of the Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment." [40]

While the previous discussion only directly considers the role of the judiciary in defining time limits in the ratification process, it probably also means that the courts will not independently determine whether applications from two-thirds of the states for an Article V convention have been tendered to Congress with sufficient contemporaniety. Coleman v. Miller would seem to indicate that this question is solely for Congress and its decision on the matter will be binding on the judiciary for all purposes.

How, then, should Congress determine whether tendered applications are sufficiently contemporaneous to be counted together? It has been suggested that the current Congress might only consider those applications submitted during its tenure.[41] That is, in order to ascertain whether it is empowered or under an obligation to call an Article V convention, each Congress need only look to those applications tendered during its life. The 88th Congress need not consider any applications tendered during the 87th Congress, since the life of an application is only as long as the particular Congress to which it is tendered.

This standard of contemporaneity seems unacceptable for a variety of reasons. In the first place, ten applications tendered the last day of one Congress, and

---

[35] Id. at 375.

[36] Id. at 375. The Court quotes JAMESON, CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS § 585 (4th ed. 1887) at this point to the effect that: "an alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon unless a second time proposed by Congress."

[37] Corwin & Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of a Constitutional Amendment, 26 NOTRE DAME LAW. 185, 195–98 (1951).

[38] 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[39] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[40] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 453–54 (1939).

[41] Sprague, Shall We Have a Federal Constitutional Convention, and What Shall It Do?, 3 MAINE L. REV. 115, 123 (1910). The author admits that as a practical matter, such a requirement of contemporaneity would render the application process incapable of fulfillment.

thirty submitted the first day of the following one would be insufficient even though they may have been submitted only three months apart. Additionally, it should be recalled that the state legislatures do not address their applications to any specific Congress.

It has also been suggested that at maximum only those applications tendered within the last generation be counted with each other; that is, that the effective life of an application not exceed a generation.[42] However, no measure of the precise length of a generation is provided; nor is any satisfactory rationale offered to justify Congress' counting applications together that have been tendered over such an appreciable time period.

Congress might determine the effective life of an application, and therefore whether it can properly be counted with later applications on the same subject, by engaging in a full analysis of the application itself and all surrounding circumstances. This was at least suggested in Coleman v. Miller.[43] Among the factors that could be considered in determining the continuing vitality of an application might be the political tenor of the times, then and now; intervening or changing circumstances relevant to the subject matter of the application since its filing; the transitory or long-term nature of the problem to which the application for a convention addresses itself; whether the problem is still considered grave by most Americans; and so on. The difficulty with this approach is that it requires Congress to make a determination with regard to many variables that are unusually difficult if not impossible for even that politically oriented body properly to evaluate or handle.

A more persuasive and perhaps more sensible approach to the question of reasonable contemporaneity can be devised than any of the prior possibilities. In counting applications for an Article V convention, Congress should properly consider only those tendered in that period, prior to the most recent application, during which all of the legislatures have had an opportunity to consider the question at a full regular session. That is, the maximum time between those applications that can be counted together should not exceed that period during which all state legislatures have met once for a full regular session. In no case could the time period involved exceed about two and a half years.[44]

The advantage of this approach seems evident. The burden should always be on those who invoke this process to demonstrate clearly by sufficient contemporaneity of their applications that there is a present agreement among two-thirds of the states as to the desirability of a constitutional convention. Such a present consensus can only be realistically demonstrated by limiting the count of such applications to those made during the most recent period during which all state legislatures have had a reasonable opportunity to consider the question. Only applications filed during this period would accurately represent the results of the most recent poll that could reasonably be taken on the subject.

There are other advantages to limiting the life of an application to that period during which all other state legislatures have had a subsequent opportunity to consider similar action during a full regular session. Once applications for a convention are filed, attempts to withdraw them are not likely to be strenuously pressed. This is true even though the legislature may have changed its mind—or would no longer make such an application as a de novo proposition.[45] The requirement suggested here would cure this by forcing a reasonably frequent reconsideration of the desirability of such a convention in each state that had previously applied for one. Some assurance is thereby provided that such an extraordinary body will be convened only if applications from two-thirds of the states clearly demonstrate by the most recent, hence most reliable poll practicable, a present agreement on the subject.

---

[42] ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 42.

[43] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[44] If legislature A made such an application at the very start of its session, say in February 1962, its application would retain its validity until the end of the next full regular session of all the state legislatures. Since many states meet only every other year, and one of those might make such an application at the end of its session, for example, as late as June or July 1964, a period of two and a half years may elapse between the first and last applications that may be counted together.

[45] But note that in a good number of cases, states have attempted to rescind applications for an Article V Convention that they had previously tendered. 49 A.B.A.J. 1181–82 (1963).

The suggested requirement is neither unduly onerous, nor necessarily destructive of the "Application" process. States generally will not act alone in such matters. Indeed, the founding fathers probably contemplated some concert of action in such attempts to obtain a convention. The present effort is an excellent example. Furthermore, once a state legislature tenders such an application it can continually renew that application in its subsequent sessions. If there really is substantial agreement on the desirability of such a convention, debate on subsequent renewals of such applications should be relatively perfunctory, and the renewals easy to obtain.

The precise formulation that is offered for measuring the required contemporaneity of the applications may be fruitfully tested against the treatment of the same problem in the ratification process. The two situations seem closely analogous and probably would be treated similarly by Congress.[46]

In four of the last seven amendments that Congress proposed to the states it specified that the latter were to have up to seven years to effectively ratify them.[47] Congress has also deemed all of the twenty-four amendments to the Constitution properly ratified within a time period sufficiently short to demonstrate a contemporaneous agreement among the people in three-fourths of the states, despite the fact that one took as long as four years from the date of its submission and another three and a half years.[48]

So far, Congress has therefore rejected any test of contemporaneity as stringent as that suggested here. However, on the basis of its express action in four of the last seven amendments it submitted to the states, Congress may be inclined to consider seven years the absolute maximum period allowable to demonstrate a "current" agreement among the people in all sections of the country in respect to any question dealing with amendments to the Constitution. If this is so, proponents of the three "states' rights" amendments will have to secure the endorsement of their resolutions by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states within that period of time.

Congress could, of course, greatly reduce this period and quite reasonably choose to ignore any applications submitted prior to that most recent period during which all state legislatures had an opportunity to consider the question during a full regular session. But it seems rather unlikely that Congress would adopt a standard of contemporaneity in the "Application" process so much stricter than that which it has recently used in the ratification process.

IV

The next major issue likely to arise in the current effort to convene a constitutional convention is the right of states tendering such applications to withdraw them. Coleman v. Miller[49] held that "the efficacy of ratifications by state legislatures, in light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal, should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments, with the ultimate authority in Congress."[50] It is likely that the courts would treat the closely analogous question of the effect of a state's "withdrawal" of its application for an Article V convention in a similar way. If this is true, the judiciary will refuse independently to resolve the question, feeling itself conclusively bound by Congress' decision in the matter.

How should Congress handle this problem? It has been argued that under Article V only forward steps can be taken and therefore a state cannot effectively withdraw an application for a convention.[51] This view seems entirely erroneous and untenable. It would base the presence of a sufficient number of applications solely upon a mechanical process of addition and ignore the extent to which each application reflects the existence of the required contemporaneous

[46] It might be contended that applications for a convention need not be made contemporaneously to be effective because the calling of a convention empowered only to propose amendments is far less significant than ratification. But this notion should be rejected. All parts of the amending process are too important to demand anything less than the kind of contemporaneous agreement suggested here.

[47] U.S. CONST. amend. XXII; U.S. CONST. amend. XXI; U.S. CONST. amend. XX; U.S. CONST. amend. XVIII; see also Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921).

[48] The Constitution of the United States of America 47–48, 54 (Corwin ed. 1952). The 16th Amendment was proposed July 12, 1909, and ratification was completed on February 3, 1913, while the 22d Amendment was proposed on March 24, 1947, and ratification was completed on February 27, 1951.

[49] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[50] Id. at 450 (1939).

[51] See Note, Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions, 30 CHI.-KENT. L. REV. 339 (1952).

agreement that an Article V convention is desired. Consequently, in determining whether two-thirds of the states have applied for a convention, applications which have been rescinded should be disregarded;[52] for they no longer evidence any present agreement that a convention should be called.

Any precedent that may exist for denying states the right to rescind their ratifications of interstate compacts[53] or constitutional amendments[54] is not apposite here. Ratification is the "final act by which sovereign bodies confirm a legal or political agreement arrived at by their agents."[55] Applications for a constitutional convention, however, are merely "formal requests" by state legislatures to Congress, requesting the latter to "call a Convention for proposing Amendments" because there is a present consensus that such action is desirable. Consequently, they do not share the same dignity or finality as ratifications which might justify the latter's irrevocable nature.[56]

V

Assuming that the resolutions in question are deemed to be valid Article V applications and are tendered to Congress by two-thirds of the states within a "reasonable" time of each other, is Congress under a duty to call a constitutional convention? Or, does it have discretion to use its judgment as to whether such a convention is really desirable or necessary? The former conclusion seems most plausible.

Article V states: "On the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States [Congress] shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." From this language alone it would seem clear that Congress was to be under a firm and nondiscretionary obligation to call a Convention when sufficient applications from two-thirds of the states are tendered. The word "shall" as used in Article V is clearly mandatory.

More, however, is available than the bare language itself to support this conclusion. The debates of the Constitutional Convention indicate that in providing for the proposal of amendments by convention the founding fathers intended to furnish a method by which the Constitution could be altered even though Congress was opposed.[57] Further support for the mandatory and nondiscretionary nature of Congress' duty to call a convention when the prerequisites are met can be found in the Federalist Papers. In paper No. 85 Hamilton insisted:

"By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obligated 'on application of the legislatures of two thirds of the states . . . to call a Convention for proposing amendments . . .' The words of this article are preemptory. The Congress 'shall call a convention.' Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."[58] It therefore seems clear that if Congress receives applications for an

---

[52] Fensterwald, Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process—a Reply, 46 A.B.A.J. 717, 719 (1960); Grinnel, Petitioning Congress for a Convention: Cannot a State Change Its Mind? 45 A.B.A.J. 1165 (1959); Note, Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Amendment, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1071 (1957). Contra, Packard, Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process, 45 A.B.A.J. 161 (1959).

[53] See West Virginia v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22 (1950).

[54] There is precedent for Congressional refusal to permit a state to withdraw its ratification. Congress did so during Reconstruction when several states attempted to withdraw their ratification of the post-Civil War amendments. The decision of Congress in that case seems clearly wrong. Its action may be attributed to the unusual temper of the times. See Clark, The Supreme Court and the Amending Process, 39 VA. L. REV. 621, 624–26 (1953); Grinnel, supra note 52, at 1165.

[55] Fensterwald, supra note 52, at 719.

[56] The common sense of Article V, however, would seem to be that ratification can also be effectively rescinded anytime before three-fourths of the states lend their assent to the proposed amendment. But see note 54 supra.

[57] When final debate on Article V began in the Constitutional Convention the draft being considered provided that "the Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the applications of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States shall propose amendments to this Constitution . . ." 2 FARRAND, THE RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 629 (1911).

"Col. Mason thought the plan of amending the Constitution exceptionable and dangerous. As the proposing of amendment is in both the modes to depend, in the first immediately, and in the second, ultimately, on Congress, no amendments of the proper kind would ever be obtained by the people, if the national government should become oppressive . . ." 2 FARRAND, op. cit. supra, at 629. As a result, Mr. Gouverneur Morris and Mr. Gerry moved to amend the article to require a convention or application of two-thirds of the states. 2 FARRAND, op. cit. supra, at 629. "Mr. Madison did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two-thirds of the States as to call a call (sic) a convention on the like application." 2 FARRAND, op. cit. supra, at 629–30.

[58] THE FEDERALIST No. 85, at 546 (Wright ed 1961) (Hamilton).

Articles V convention, from two-thirds of the state legislatures within a "reasonable time period," it is absolutely bound to convene such a body.[59]

However, it should be relatively clear that the courts would never attempt to force Congress to call such a convention [60] since the latter's decision as to whether many of the prerequisites to such a call have been met will probably be conclusively binding on the former. For example, prior discussion demonstrates that the intrinsic adequacy as applications for an Article V convention of any resolutions tendered to Congress, their timeliness, and their continuing validity in light of attempts to withdraw them, are all likely to be considered by the judiciary as nonjusticable political questions. If this is so, Congress' decision on these matters will conclusively bind the courts, and necessarily disable the latter from playing any positive role in forcing a convention call.

It should also be noted that the courts have never issued an injunction or writ of mandamus directly against the President or Congress because of the doctrine of separation of powers embodied in our National Constitution, and the consequent obligation of respect owed co-equal branches of the National Government by the federal judiciary.[61] To do so here would reflect a "lack of respect" for the actions of a coordinate branch of the Federal Government in regard to a subject that may even textually be exclusively committed to its judgment by the Constitution.[62] Therefore, aside from the very practical inability of the courts adequately to enforce any decree directing Congress to call such a convention, [63] sound reasons and well-established precedent dictate the correctness of the assumption that it lacks the authority to do so.

Recent cases holding that the courts can force the states to reapportion their legislatures conformably to equal protection,[64] or that the courts can force state legislatures to draw congressional districts so that they are as nearly equal in population as practicable [65] are inapposite here. The reason for this is that "it is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government, and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States which gives rise to the 'political question.'" [66] That is, "the nonjusticability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers." [67] Judicial review on the merits of state legislative apportionment or the drawing of congressional districts by the states only involves federal judicial superintendence of state action or inaction; but judicial review of Congress' failure to call an Article V convention directly involves the federal courts in an effort to force its co-equal branch of government to perform a duty exclusively entrusted to it by the Constitution.

VI

What is the President's role in the calling of an Article V convention? Does the call for a convention, like any ordinary piece of legislation, require his signature or a two-thirds vote of Congress for it to be valid?

The previously discussed case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia [68] would seem to indicate that the need for Presidential concurrence in any convention call is justifiable, but that his signature is never required for the valid issuance of such a call. Consequently, the President's failure to join in the Congressional summons of such a convention would in no way impair the validity of any amendment

---

[59] See 1 WILLOUGHBY, THE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF THE UNITED STATES § 331 (2d ed. 1929); Packard, Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program, 30 CHI.-KENT L. REV. 128, 133-34 (1952); Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067 (1957). Contra, Platz, Article V of the Federal Constitution, 3 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 17, 44 (1934).

[60] See 1 WILLOUGHBY, op. cit. supra note 59, § 331; Fensterwald, supra note 52, at 720. Contra, Packard, supra note 52, at 196.

[61] In Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1866), the Supreme Court unanimously held that the President himself is not accountable to any court save that of impeachment either for the nonperformance of his constitutional duties or for the exceeding of his constitutional powers.

"The Congress is the legislative branch of the Government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department; though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance." Mississippi v. Johnson, supra at 500.

[62] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).

[63] How could the courts force Congress to call a convention when all the details of such a body seem to be left to thhe unreviewable discretion of Congress? Would a court call one itself if Congress failed to follow a court decree directing it to do so?

[64] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

[65] Westberry v. Sanders, 84 S. Ct. 526 (1964).

[66] Baker v. Carr, supra note 64, at 210. (Emphasis added.)

[67] Id. at 210.

[68] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).

the latter body proposed. The language of Article V directly supports this conclusion since it asserts that "the Congress" is to call a "Convention for proposing Amendments" on the Application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states."

However, a contrary argument of substantial weight has been made.[69] Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution provides that—" . . . every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary . . . shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the case of a Bill."

Hollingsworth v. Virginia carved an exception to this rule as far as Congress' proposal of Constitutional Amendments was concerned. But it can be argued that this mode of proposing constitutional amendments was taken out of the veto process by the Supreme Court in that case solely because "the congressional proposal must be by two-thirds in each house [and] it (therefore) may have been thought that the requirement for overriding the veto was already met."[70] This ground would not exist if Congress called a constitutional convention to propose amendments by a simple majority vote.

As a result, it can be argued that the commands of Article I, Section 7, apply to the convention call since it is an "Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives [are] . . . necessary." If this is true, the President must sign any call by Congress for a constitutional convention and if he vetoes it, Congress can override him only by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

Further support for this point of view can be gleaned from the fact—to be shortly noted—that Congress can specify how the convention is to be chosen, its organization, rules, etc. This being so, Congress must necessarily make more than a mere call for a convention. Such a call would be meaningless without the inclusion of the specific terms upon which such a body is to be constituted, organized, and conducted. These terms to be spelled out by Congress would appear similar to the general kinds of legislation with which Congress normally deals. Consequently, no reason or logic dictates its different treatment in respect to the need for Presidential approval.

This conclusion is bolstered by the desirability of such a requirement. The President is the only official who is elected by and responsible to the American people as a whole. His concurrence in the summoning of such a convention that would intimately affect the concerns of all individual Americans, and our Nation as a whole, therefore seems most logical and desirable.

The President's duty in such a case would be the same as that of Congress; to participate in such a call only if, in good conscience, he deems the requisites for such a convention to have been properly met. If Article V demands Presidential concurrence in such a call, the refusal of the chief executive to act, like that of Congress, would probably be conclusive on the courts[71] subject however to the right of Congress to override his judgment by a two-thirds vote. However, it should be reiterated that the need for Presidential concurrence in any congressional convention call might well be decided otherwise on the basis of Article V's specific language directing "The Congress" to call a convention, and the analogous case of Hollingsworth v. Virginia.[72]

VII

If Congress does call an Article V convention pursuant to the resolutions in question here, on what terms may it do so? How would such a convention be constituted, how would it operate, and what would be the scope of its authority? The terms of Article V give us little help. Indeed, Madison worried about these questions at the Convention of 1789. "He saw no objection . . . against providing for a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments, except only that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum, etc."[73]

Since Article V empowers "Congress" to call the "Convention" when the requisites for the summoning of such a body are met, and Article V does not indicate

---

[69] See Black, supra note 8, at 965.
[70] Id. at 965.
[71] See note 61 supra and the text accompanying that note.
[72] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798).
[73] 2 FARRAND, supra note 57, at 630.

the terms upon which such a convention is to be constituted, organized, or operated. Congress must be authorized to decide such questions. Under its power to call a convention, Congress therefore has implied authority to fix the time and place of meeting, the number of delegates, the manner and date of their election, whether representation shall be by states or by population, whether voting shall be by number of delegates or by states, and the vote in convention required to validly propose an amendment to the states.[74]

If the broad dictum of Coleman v. Miller[75] is any guide to present judicial conviction Congress' determination in the above matters may be conclusive on the courts for all purposes. Such a refusal by the courts to review on the merits the propriety of the organizational ground rules imposed by Congress on an Article V convention might be defensible on the assumption that in Article V there is a "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of th[is] issue to a coordinate political department."[76] Even if the courts are conclusively bound for all purposes by the congressional specifications regarding the terms upon which such a convention must be constituted, organized and operated, Congress will still be bound in its action on these questions by the Constituntion and its judgment of the popular will. However, here as in most places in the amending process, the only available remedy for Congressional abuse may be political—resting with the electorate at the polls.

In calling an Article V convention Congress would not be justified in following by analogy the Constitutional Convention of 1787 where representation and voting were by states.[77] Nothing in the terms of Article V requires representation or voting in such a body to be on that basis. Furthermore, at the time of the 1787 Constitutional Convention the states—

". . . were in a position of at least nominal sovereignty, and were considering whether to unite. The result of the Convention would have bound no dissenting state or its people; the same was true of the acceptance of a new Constitution by the requisite nine. All these conditions are now reversed. We are already in an indissoluble union; there is a whole American people. The question is an amending convention now would [only] be whether innovations, binding on dissenters, were to be offered for ratification."[78]

As a result, the propriety of a vote or representation by states in the 1787 Convention cannot settle the propriety of similar action in a convention today.

More appropriate than representation or voting by states in any Article V convention would be an apportionment of the delegates and voting power in such a body on the basis of population alone. Such an approach makes good sense not only because it would conduce to the most accurate expression of the national will, but also because regional interests are more than adequately weighted at the ratification stage where each state is given an equal voice. Congress should therefore, provide that delegates to any Article V convention be elected from districts of equal population, and that each delegate have one vote.

Congress should also provide that an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the delegates would be required to propose any given amendment to the states. In this way it would assure a symmetry of concurrence in the bodies empowered to propose constitutional amendments—whether the body was Congress or a convention. Such symmetry is desirable because it would assure the same kind of overwhelming consensus in one route to proposal as the other, thereby avoiding possible forum shopping. A two-thirds requirement in such a convention would also guarantee that no amendment, regardless of its means of proposal, is ever submitted to the states before an overwhelming consensus as to its desirability is evidenced in a nationally oriented body.

From all of the above, it would seem clear that "no Senator or Representative [or the President if his concurrence is required]is bound to vote for a convention call which in its form fails to safeguard what he believes to be vital national

---

[74] See ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 43–44; Black, supra note 8, at 959; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1075–76 (1957). This continuing hand of Congress in the convention process need not appear unduly strange since Article V explicitly gives it the power to decide between modes of ratification regardless of the mode of proposing the amendment to the states.

[75] 307 U.S. 433 (1939).

[76] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962). However, a good argument can be made to the contrary.

[77] FARRAND, THE FRAMING OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 57 (1962).

[78] Black, supra note 8, at 964–65.

interests." [79] And as noted previously, their decision in this regard would seem to be unreviewable in the courts. That is, the sole remedy available to check an abuse of Congress' judgment in this matter may be at the polls.

A further question is raised by the current effort to propose amendments to the Constitution by convention. Can either the states or Congress limit the scope of such a convention's authority in any way? It should be recalled that the resolutions sponsored by the Council of State Governments avowedly attempt to restrict the convention to the approval or rejection of the precise amendments contained in those resolutions. Prior discussion has already demonstrated that an Article V convention is to be a fully deliberative body empowered to propose those solutions to a problem that it deems best. Consequently, such a convention cannot be limited by the state applications upon which it is predicated to the approval or rejection of the text of any particular amendments contained therein. By the same token, Congress may not limit such a convention to the approval or rejection of any particular amendments.[80]

While neither the states nor Congress may limit an Article V convention to the consideration of the terms of any particular provision, they should be able to restrict such a body to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that contained in the applications upon which the convention is predicated. Indeed, of their own force, the state applications should limit any convention called by Congress to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that requested in those applications. The reason for this is as follows:

An agreement is required among two-thirds of the state legislatures that a Convention ought to be held before Congress is empowered to convene such a body. No Article V convention may be called in absence of such a consensus. If the agreement is that a convention is desired only to deal with a certain subject matter, as opposed to constitutional revision generally, then the convention must logically be limited to that subject matter. To permit such a body to propose amendments on any other subject would be to recognize the convention's right to go beyond that consensus which is an absolute prerequisite for its creation and legitimate action.

If the prior conclusion is correct, and the state applications of their own force can bind any convention called pursuant thereto solely to a consideration of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter requested in those applications, then Congress should disregard any amendment proposed by such a body which is outside of that subject matter. Here, as elsewhere, the courts will be bound by Congress' decision on the question if the issue is nonjusticiable. This, regardless of whether Congress deems a proposed amendment ineffective because it is beyond the scope of the convention's authority, or effective because it is within the scope of the convention's authority. On the other hand, if this question is justiciable, the courts may independently determine whether an amendment proposed by such a convention is beyond the general subject matter requested by the state applications. If such an amendment is outside that subject matter the courts might enjoin its ratification, or set the amendment aside afterwards because it was never properly proposed.

The notion that state applications can limit a convention called pursuant thereto solely to a consideration of amendments dealing with the same general subject matter as that contained in those applications is not widely accepted. It has been insisted that "the nature of the right conferred upon the state legislatures in requesting Congress to call a constitutional convention is nothing more or less than the right of petition.[81] The Convention itself is a Federal instrumentality set up by Congress under powers granted to it by the Constitution. Since Article V directs Congress to call the convention, and is silent as to the details of such a body, Congress is the only authority entitled to specify those details. Consequently, if any power can limit such a convention to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same subject matter as that contained in the

---

[79] Id. at 964.

[80] There is another reason why Congress cannot properly limit a convention to the approval or rejection of the text of any particular amendment. The framers of the Constitution probably intended the convention method of proposing amendments to be as free as possible from Congressional interference so that the "Convention" could propose any amendments it deemed desirable in spite of any Congressional objections to the provision. See note 57 supra.

[81] Wheeler, supra note 21, at 795.

state applications, it can only be Congress.[82] "State legislatures . . . have no authority to limit an instrumentality set up under the federal Constitution. . . . The right of the legislatures is confined to applying for a convention, and any statement of purposes in their petition would be irrelevant as to the scope of powers of the convention." [83]

If this is true, and the state applications cannot themselves bind a convention to a consideration of only the same subject matter requested in those applications, then Congress should be able to do so pursuant to its implied power to fix the terms upon which such a body shall operate.[84] A convention called pursuant to the resolutions in question here, for example, should not be permitted to propose amendments concerning the treaty power.[85] The reason for this is that the applications specifically request a convention for another purpose. A constitutional change should never be proposed by a convention unless two-thirds of the states have previously agreed that an amendment dealing with the particular subject matter involved is desirable, or that a convention was needed to consider a general constitutional revision. For this reason, it would seem anomalous were Congress powerless to limit the scope of a convention's authority to the general subject matter requested in the text of the applications upon which it is predicated. Certainly it would be under a duty to call a general convention if two-thirds of the state legislatures properly ask for one. Equally obvious should be its right and obligation to limit the scope of a convention to the same subject matter requested by the state applications.

Some authority for Congressional power in this respect can be gleaned from those state cases insisting that state constitutional conventions are subject to the restrictions contained in the call for the convention. The theory is that the legislatures call is a law and the delegates are elected under the terms of that law.[86] Consequently, they can exercise no powers beyond that conferred by such a statute or the Constitution itself.

Prior discussion should demonstrate that at least Congress can limit the scope of any Article V convention to the "subject matter" or "problem" at which the state applications were directed. Clearly, Congress is at least morally bound to do so. And in any subsequent litigation, the courts should respect such a limitation imposed by Congress and disregard any provisions proposed by a convention that were beyond the latter's authority as so limited. Of course, the notion that the state applications can themselves limit the scope of a convention's authority solely to a consideration of the same subject matter as that contained in those applications should not be ignored. However, if that theory is rejected, the people of the United States will have to rely on Congress to expressly limit any Article V convention it calls to the proposal of amendments dealing with the same subject matter as that contained in the state applications.

VIII

If the amendments sponsored by the Council of State Governments were proposed by a validly convened and constituted convention, the states would still need to ratify them. As previously noted, the terms of the three "states rights" amendments specify that they are to be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. Even if these precise amendments could be validly proposed by a convention called pursuant to the resolutions in question here, Congress would not be bound in this respect. Article V clearly empowers Congress to determine in its sole discretion which of the two modes of ratifica-

---

[82] STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82D CONG., 2d Sess., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL TAX RATES 15 (Comm. Print 1952).

[83] ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 45.

[84] Contra, 46 Cong. Rec. 2769 (1911) (remarks of Senator Heyburn), ORFIELD, op. cit. supra note 8, at 45; Wheeler, supra note 21, at 796; Note, 70 HARV. L. REV. 1067, 1076 (1957).

[85] See STAFF OF HOUSE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 82ND CONG., 2d Sess., PROBLEMS RELATING TO STATE APPLICATIONS FOR A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL TAX RATES 15 (Comm. Print 1952)); JAMESON, A TREATISE OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS; THEIR HISTORY, POWERS AND MODES OF PROCEEDING 10, 11, 493 (4th ed. 1887).

[86] See Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 51 (1874). But see Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 49, 53 (1858) (dictum). For debate on both sides of this question, see 1 DEBATES OF THE CONVENTION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA 1872–73, 52–61 (1873).

tion specified in that provision shall be utilized:[57] this regardless of the method of the particular amendment's proposal. Consequently, that decision would still rest with Congress in the case at hand, and the courts would be bound in all respects by its choice in the matter. Congress could, therefore, choose to have any amendment proposed by such a convention "ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof. . . ."

HOLLINGSWORTH v. VIRGINIA.

[3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798)]

Suits against a state.—Constitutional law.

The 11th amendment to the constitution having deprived the supreme court of jurisdiction over suits against a state, by a citizen of another state, pending actions could be no further prosecuted.

An amendment to the constitution need not be presented to the president for his approval.

The decision of the court, in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dall 419), produced a proposition in congress, for amending the constitution of the United States, according to the following terms:

"The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law and equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States, by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state."

The proposition being now adopted by the constitutional number of states, Lee, Attorney-General, submitted this question to the court—whether the amendment did, or did not, supersede all suits depending, as well as prevent the institution of new suits, against any one of the United States, by citizens of another state?

W. Tilghman and Rawle argued in the negative, contending, that the jurisdiction of the court was unimpaired, in relation to all suits instituted, previously to the adoption of the amendment. They premised, that it would be a great hardship, that persons legally suing, should be deprived of a right of action, or be condemned to the payment of costs,[1] by an amendment of the constitution, ex post facto; 4 Bac. Abr. 636–7, pl. 5. And that the jurisdiction being before regularly established, the amendment, notwithstanding the words "shall not be construed," &c., must be considered, in fact, as introductory of a new system of judicial authority. There are, however, two objections to be discussed.

*The amendment has not been proposed in the form prescribed by the constitution, and therefore, it is void. Upon an inspection of the [*379 original roll, it appears, that the amendment was never submitted to the president for his approbation. The constitution declare, that "every order, resolution or vote, to which the concurrence of the senate and house of representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment), shall be presented to the president of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the senate and house of representatives, &c." Art. I. § 7. Now, the constitution likewise declares, that the concurrence of both houses shall be necessary to a proposition for amendments. Art. V. And it is no answer to the objection, to observe, that as two-thirds of both houses are required to originate the proposition, it would be nugatory to return it president for his approbation. The constitution declares, that " every order, with the president's negative, to be repassed by the same number; since the reasons assigned for his disapprobation might be so satisfactory as to reduce the majority below the constitutional proportion. The concurrence of the president is required in matters of infinitely less importance; and whether on subjects of ordinary legislation, or of constitutional amendments, the expression is the same, and equally applies to the act of both houses of congress.

2d. The second objection arises from the terms of the amendment itself. The words, "commenced or prosecuted," are properly in the past time; but it is clear, that they ought not to be so grammatically restricted; for then a citizen need only discontinue his present suit, and commence another, in order to give the court cognisance of the cause. To avoid this evident absurdity, the words must be construed to apply only to suits to be "commenced and prosecuted." The spirit of the constitution is opposed to everything in the nature of an ex post facto law, or retrospective regulation. No ex post facto law can be passed by congress. Const. Art. I. § 9. No ex post facto law can be passed by the legislature of any individual state. Ibid. § 10. It is true, that an amendment to the constitution cannot be controlled by those provisions; and if the words were explicit and positive, to produce the retrospective effect contended for, they must prevail. But the words are doubtful; and therefore, they ought to be so con-

---

[57] U.S. v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716 (1931).

[1] See Walker v. Smith, 1 W.C.C. 202.

*380] strued as to conform to the general principle of the constitution. (a) In *4 Bac. Abr. 650, pl. 64, it is stated, that "a statute shall never have an equitable construction, in order to overthrow an estate;" but if the opposite doctrine prevails, it is obvious, that many vested rights will be affected, many estates will be overthrown. For instance, Georgia has made and unmade grants of land, and to compel a resort to her courts, is, in effect, overthrowing the estate of the grantees. So, in the same book (p. 652, pl. 91, 92), it is said, that "a statute ought to be so construed, that no man, who is innocent, be punished or endamaged;" and "no statute shall be construed in such manner, as to be inconvenient or against reason:" whereas, the proposed construction of the amendment would be highly injurious to innocent persons; and driving them from the jurisdiction of this court, saddled with costs, is against every principle of justice, reason and convenience. Presuming, then, that there will be a disposition to support any rational exposition, which avoids such mischievous consequences, it is to be observed, that the words "commenced and prosecuted" are synonymous. There was no necessity for using the word "commenced," as it is implied and included in the word "prosecuted;" and admitting this glossary, the amendment will only affect the future jurisdiction of the court. It may be said, however, that the word "commenced" is used in relation to future suits, and that the word "prosecuted" is applied to suits previously instituted. But it will be sufficient to answer in favor of the benign construction for which the plaintiffs contend, that the word "commenced" may, on this ground, be confined to actions originally instituted here, and the word "prosecuted" to suits brought hither by writ of error or appeal. For it is to be shown, that a state may be sued originally, and yet not in the supreme court, though the supreme court will have an appellate jurisdiction; as, where laws of the state authorize such suits in her own courts, and there is drawn in question the validity of a treaty, or statute of, or authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity. (1 U.S. Stat. 80, § 13; Id 85, § 25.) Upon the whole, the words of the amendment are ambiguous and obscure; but as they are susceptible of an interpretation, which will prevent the mischief of an ex post facto construction (worse than an ex post facto law, inasmuch as it is not so easily rescinded or repealed), that interpretation ought to be preferred.

(a) CHASE, Justice.—The words "commenced and prosecuted," standing alone, would embrace cases both past and future.

W. Tilghman.—But if the court can construe them, so as to confine their operation to future cases, they will do it, in order to avoid the effect of an ex post facto law, which is evidently contrary to the spirit of the constitution.

Lee. Attorney-General.—The case before the court is that of a suit against a state, in which the defendant has never entered an appearance; but the amendment is equally operative in all the cases against states, where there has been an appearance, or even where there have been a trial and judgment.

An amendment *of the constitution, and the repeal of a law, are not, [*381 manifestly, on the same footing; nor can explanatory law be expounded by foreign matter. The amendment, in the present instance, is merely explanatory, in substance, as well as language. From the moment those who gave the power to sue a state, revoked and annulled it, the power ceased to be a part of the constitution; and if it does not exist there, it cannot in any degree be found or exercised elsewhere. The policy and rules which, in relation to ordinary acts of legislation, declare that no ex post facto law shall be passed, do not apply to the formation or amendment of a constitution. The people limit and restrain the power of the legislature, acting under a delegated authority; but they impose no restrain on themselves. They could have said, by an amendment to the constitution, that no judicial authority should be exercised, in any case, under the United States; and if they had said so, could a court be held, or a judge proceed, on any judicial business, past or future, from the moment of adopting the amendment? On general grounds, then, it was in the power of the people, to annihilate the whole, and the question is, whether they have annihilated a part of the judicial authority of the United States? Two objections are made: 1st. That the amendment has not been proposed in due form. But has not the same course been pursued relative to all the other amendments that have been adopted?(a) And the case of amendments is evidently a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of investing the president with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of congress. 2d. That the amendment itself only applies to future suits. But whatever force there may be in the rules for construing statutes, they cannot be applied to the present case. It was the policy of the people, to cut off that branch of the judicial power, which had been supposed to authorize suits by individuals against states; and the words being so extended as to support that policy, will equally apply to the past and to the future. A law, however, cannot be denominated retrospective, or ex post facto, which merely changes the remedy, but does not affect the right; in all the states, in some form or other, a remedy is furnished for the fair claims of individuals against the respective governments. The amendment is paramount to all the laws of the Union; and if any part of the judicial act is in opposition to it, that part must be ex-*382] punged. There can be no amendment of the constitution, indeed, which may not, in some respect, be called ex post facto; but the moment it is adopted the power that it gives, or takes away, begins to operate, or ceases to exist.

THE COURT, on the day succeeding the argument, delivered a unanimous opinion, that the amendment being constitutionally adopted, there could not be exercised any jurisdiction, in any case, past or future, in which a state was sued by the citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.

(a) CHASE, Justice.—There can, surely be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the president applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation: he has nothing to do with the propostion or adoption of amendments to the constitution.

HAWKE v. SMITH, SECRETARY OF STATE OF OHIO. (No. 1.)

[253 U.S. 221 (1920)]

ERROR TO THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF OHIO

No. 582. Argued April 23, 1920—Decided June 1, 1920

Under the Constitution, Art. V, a proposed amendment can be ratified by two methods only—by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions in three-fourths of the States, the choice of method being left to Congress. P. 226.

The term "legislatures" as used here and elsewhere in the Constitution, means the deliberative, representative bodies that make the laws for the people of the respective States; the Constitution makes no provision for action upon such proposals by the people directly. P. 227.

The function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing such amendments, is a federal function, derived not from the people of that State but from the Constitution, P. 230.

The ratification of a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution by the legislature of a State is not an act of legislation, in the proper sense of the word; it is but the expression of the assent of the State to the proposed amendment. P. 229. Davis v. Hildebrant, 241 U.S. 565, distinguished.

The action of the General Assembly of Ohio ratifying the proposed Eighteenth Amendment cannot be referred to the electors of the State, the provisions of the state constitution requiring such a referendum being inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. P. 231.

100 Ohio St. 385, reversed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Frank Hanly, with whom Mr. George S. Hawke, Mr. Arthur Hellen, Mr. Charles B. Smith, Mr. James Bingham and Mr. Remster A. Bingham were on the brief, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Lawrence Maxwell, with whom Mr. John G. Price, Attorney General of the State of Ohio, Mr. Judson Harmon and Mr. B. W. Gearhcart were on the brief, for defendant in error:

The Constitution of the United States does not require that the States shall have any particular form of legislature. The people of the States have the power to abolish their general assemblies and to take into their own hands all matters of legislation. They have the power to provide that no legislation shall be enacted by the general assembly without being first submitted to the people for approval. And they have the power to do, as they have in fact done, in all referendum States, namely, to provide that all, or any particular class, of legislative acts shall stand suspended for a specified time after adjournment of the general assembly, and if, during that time a referendum is duly ordered, that the legislation shall remain suspended and inoperative until the next general election and take effect or not according to the result of the popular vote thereon. They may also provide, as has been done in two of the States, that no legislature or convention shall act upon any proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, except a legislature or convention elected after such amendment is submitted. Constitution, Tennessee, 1870, Art II, § 32; Florida, 1885, Art. XVI, § 19.

The Federal Constitution confers no power upon the state legislature. It gets all of its power from the people of the State. Such authority as the legislatures have to ratify amendments to the Federal Constitution is not mandatory but permissive. Congress merely proposes amendments and it is provided that if they shall be ratified by the "legislatures" of a sufficient number of the States, they become part of the Federal Constitution. Such amendments are submitted to the legislative or lawmaking power of each State whatever its form or constitution, as distinguished from its executive or judicial power. If a State should abolish its general assembly and resort to direct legislation in all instances, it would thereby, according to the opposing argument, deprive itself of the power to act upon proposed constitutional amendments. If more than one-fourth of the States should adopt that policy there would not then remain three-fourths of the several States capable of ratifying a federal amendment.

But if we assume, for the sake of discussion, that the general assembly of the State must have the final word in ratifying amendments to the Federal Constitution in cases where the State ratifies, it must be admitted that it speaks, not for itself, but for the people of the State, and it follows that the people, in their state constitutions, may provide that the action of the general assembly shall be conditional upon popular rejection or approval at the polls.

In such a case the action of the general assembly, if approved by referendum, is a ratification by the "legislature." If rejected, there is no ratification by the legislature of that State. No expressed prohibition of such a form of state government is found in the Federal Constitution and none should be inferred. Citing: Davis v. Hildebrant, 94 Ohio St. 154; aff'd 241 U.S. 565; Hawke v. Smith, 100 Ohio St. 385; State v. Howell, 107 Washington, 167.

Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler and Mr. James A. White, by leave of court, filed a brief as amici curiae.

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the court.

Plaintiff in error (plaintiff below) filed a petition for an injunction in the Court of Common Pleas of Franklin County, Ohio, seeking to enjoin the Secretary of State of Ohio from spending the public money in preparing and printing forms of ballot for submission of a referendum to the electors of that State on the question of the ratification which the General Asssembly had made of the proposed Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. A demurer to the petition was sustained in the Court of Common Pleas. Its judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of Franklin County, which judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Ohio, and the case was brought here.

A joint resolution proposing to the States this Amendment to the Constitution of the United States was adopted on the third day of December, 1917. The Amendment prohibits the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes. The several States were given concurrent power to enforce the Amendment by appropriate legislation. The resolution provided that the Amendment should be inoperative unless ratified as an Amendment of the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission thereof to the States. The Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Ohio adopted a resolution ratifying the proposed Amendment by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, and ordered that certified copies of the joint resolution of ratification be forwarded by the Governor to the Secretary of State at Washington and to the presiding officer of each house of Congress. This resolution was adopted on January 7, 1919; on January 27, 1919, the Governor of Ohio complied with the resolution. On January 29, 1919, the Secretary of State of the United States proclaimed the ratification of the Amendment, naming thirty-six States as having ratified the same, among them the State of Ohio.

The question for our consideration is: Whether the provision of the Ohio constitution, adopted at the general election, November, 1918, extending the referendum to the ratification by the General Assembly of proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution is in conflict with Article V of the Constitution of the United States. The Amendment of 1918 provides: "The people also reserve to themselves the legislative power of the referendum on the action of the general assembly ratifying any proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States." Article V of the Federal Constitution provides: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall proposed amendments to this Constitution or on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

The Constitution of the United States was ordained by the people, and, when duly ratified, it became the Constitution of the people of the United States. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 402. The States surrendered to the general government the powers specifically conferred upon the Nation, and the Constitution and the laws of the United States are the supreme law of the land.

The framers of the Constitution realized that it might in the progress of time and the development of new conditions require changes, and they intended to provide an orderly manner in which these could be accomplished; to that end they adopted the Fifth Article.

This article makes provision for the proposal of amendments either by two-thirds of both houses of Congress, or on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States; thus securing deliberation and consideration before any change can be proposed. The proposed change can only become effective by the ratification of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or by conventions in a like number of States. The method of ratification is left to the choice of Congress. Both methods of ratification, by legislatures or conventions, call for action by deliberative assemblages representative of the people, which it was assumed would voice the will of the people.

The Fifth Article is a grant of authority by the people to Congress. The determination of the method of ratification is the exercise of a national power specifically granted by the Constitution; that power is conferred upon Congress, and is limited to two methods, by action of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or conventions in a like number of States. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331, 348. The framers of the Constitution might have adopted a different method. Ratification might have been left to a vote of the people, or to some authority of government other than that selected. The language of the article is plain, and admits of no doubt in its interpretation. It is not the function of courts or legislative bodies, national or state, to alter the method which the Constitution has fixed.

All of the amendments to the Constitution have been submitted with a requirement for legislative ratification; by this method all of them have been adopted.

The only question really for determination is: What did the framers of the Constitution mean in requiring ratification by "Legislatures"? That was not a term of uncertain meaning when incorporated into the Constitution. What is meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation. A Legislature was then the representative body which made the laws of the people. The term is often used in the Constitution with this evident meaning. Article I, § 2, prescribes the qualifications of electors of Congressmen as those "requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature." Article I, § 3, provided that senators shall be chosen in each State by the legislature thereof, and this was the method of choosing senators until the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment which made provision for the election of senators by vote of the people, the electors to have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature. That Congress and the States understood that this election by the people was entirely distinct from legislative action is shown by the provision of the amendment giving the legislature of any State the power to authorize the Executive to make temporary appointments until the people shall fill the vacancies by election. It was never suggested, so far as we are aware, that the purpose of making the office of Senator elective by the people could be accomplished by a referendum vote. The necessity of the amendment to accomplish the purpose of popular election is shown in the adoption of the amendment. In Article IV the United States is required to protect every State against domestic violence upon application of the legislature, or of the Executive when the legislature cannot be convened. Article VI requires the members of the several legislatures to be bound by oath, or affirmation, to support the Constitution of the United States. By Article I, § 8, Congress is given exclusive jurisdiction over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be. Article IV, § 3, provides that no new States shall be carved out of old States without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned.

There can be no question that the framers of the Constitution clearly understood and carefully used the terms in which that instrument referred to the action of the legislatures of the States. When they intended that direct action by the people should be had they were no less accurate in the use of apt phraseology to carry out such purpose. The members of the House of Representatives were required to be chosen by the people of the several States. Article I, § 2.

The constitution of Ohio in its present form, although making provision for a referendum, vests the legislative power primarily in a General Assembly consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives. Article II, § 1, provides:

"The legislative power of the state shall be vested in a general assembly consisting of a senate and house of representatives, but the people shall reserve to themselves the power to propose to the general assembly laws and amendments to the constitution, and to adopt or reject the same at the polls on a referendum vote as hereinafter provided."

The argument to support the power of the State to require the approval by the people of the State of the ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution through the medium of a referendum rests upon the proposition that the Federal Constitution requires ratification by the legislative action of the States through the medium provided at the time of the proposed approval of an amendment. This argument is fallacious in this—ratification by a State of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word. It is but the expression of the assent of the State to a proposed amendment.

At an early day this court settled that the submission of a constitutional amendment did not require the action of the President. The question arose over the adoption of the Eleventh Amendment. Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378. In that case it was contended that the amendment had not been proposed in the manner provided in the Constitution as an inspection of the original roll showed that it had never been submitted to the President for his approval in accordance with Article I, § 7, of the Constitution. The Attorney General answered that the case of the amendments is a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of the Constitution investing the President with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of Congress. In a foot-note to this argument of the Attorney General, Justice Chase said: "There can, surely, be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation: He has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the constitution." The court by a unanimous judgment held that the amendment was constitutionally adopted.

It is true that the power to legislate in the enactment of the laws of a State is derived from the people of the State. But the power to ratify a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution has its source in the Federal Constitution. The act of ratification by the State derives its authority from the Federal Constitution to which the State and its people have alike assented.

This view of the provision for amendment is confirmed in the history of its adoption found in 2 Watson on the Constitution, 1301 et seq. Any other view might lead to endless confusion in the manner of ratification of federal amendments. The choice of means of ratification was wisely withheld from conflicting action in the several States.

But it is said this view runs counter to the decision of this court in Davis v. Hildebrant, 241 U.S. 565. But that case is inapposite. It dealt with Article I, § 4, of the Constitution, which provides that the times, places and manners of holding elections for Senators and Representatives in each State shall be determined by the respective legislatures thereof, but that Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations, except as to the place for choosing Senators. As shown in the opinion in that case, Congress had itself recognized the referendum as part of the legislative authority of the State for the purpose stated. It was held, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio, that the referendum provision of the state constitution when applied to a law redistricting the State with a view to representation in Congress was not unconstitutional. Article I, § 4, plainly gives authority to the State to legislate within the limitations therein named. Such legislative action is entirely different from the requirement of the Constitution as to the expression of assent or dissent to a proposed amendment to the Constitution. In such expression no legislative action is authorized or required.

It follows that the court erred in holding that the State had authority to require the submission of the ratification to a referendum under the state constitution, and its judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

LESER ET AL v. GARNETT ET AL

[258 U.S. 130 (1922)]

ERROR AND CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND

No. 553. Argued January 23, 24, 1922.—Decided February 27, 1922

1. A suit by qualified voters of Maryland to require the Maryland Board of Registry to strike the names of women from the register of voters upon the grounds that the state constitution limits the suffrage to men and that the Nineteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution was not validly adopted, is maintainable under the Maryland law and raises the question whether the Nineteenth Amendment has become a part of the Constitution. P. 136.
2. The objection that a great addition to the electorate, made without a State's consent, destroys its political autonomy and therefore exceeds the amending power, applies no more to the Nineteenth Amendment than to the Fifteenth Amendment, which is valid beyond question. P. 136.
3. The Fifteenth Amendment does not owe its validity to adoption as a war measure and acquiescence. P. 136.
4. The function of a state legislature in passing on a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, is federal, and not subject to limitation by the people of the State. P. 137. Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 231.
5. Official notice from a state legislature to the Secretary of State, duly authenticated, of its adoption of a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, is conclusive upon him, and, when certified to by his proclamation, is conclusive upon the courts. P. 137. Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 672, 673.

139 Md. 46, affirmed.

CERTIORARI to a decree of the court below affirming a decision of the state trial court dismissing a petition by which the plaintiffs in error sought to require the members of the Maryland Board of Registry to strike the names of specified woman voters from the registration list.

Mr. Thomas F. Cadwalader and Mr. William L. Marbury, with whom Mr. George Arnold Frick was on the briefs, for plaintiffs in error and petitioners.

The only power to amend the Constitution is contained in Article V, and is a delegated power. Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 227; Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 348. It is a power to "amend," granted in general terms.

In a series of decisions rendered soon after the Civil War, this court established the doctrine propounded by Mr. Lincoln in his first inaugural address, that the Union was intended to be a perpetual Union,—"an indestructible Union of indestructible States,"—and that no power was conferred upon any of the agencies of government provided for in the instrument to defeat that intention,—that "great and leading intent" of the people, Ex parte Yerger, 8 Wall.

85, 101,—by destroying any of the States, by taking away in whole or in part any one of the "functions essential to their separate and independent existence" as States. Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall. 71; Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700, 724–725. Obviously Article V must be so construed as not to defeat the main purpose of the Constitution itself.

A "State" within the meaning of the Constitution is not merely a piece of territory, or a mere collection of people. It is, as this court has said, "a political community." Who constitute the State in that sense? Clearly the people who exercise the political power. That is to say, the electorate and those whom the electors of a State choose to clothe with the governmental power of the State. When an amendment is adopted, therefore, which changes the electorate, the original State is destroyed and a new State created.

Questions of power do not depend upon degree. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 439; Keller v. United States, 213 U.S. 138, 148.

The power to amend is granted in no broader language than that in which the taxing power is granted in § 8, Art. I. Yet this court held, in Collector v. Day, 11 Wall. 113, that it would not construe that language, broad as it was, as sufficient to authorize Congress to levy a tax upon the salary of a state judge, for the same reason we urge here. If the power to maintain a judiciary whose salaries shall be exempt from taxation by Congress be one of the "functions essential to the existence" of a State of the Union, a power without which it would not be an indestructible State, surely the power to determine for itself, by the voice of its own voters, who shall and who shall not vote in the election of that judiciary is not less so.

It is argued that there is no provision in the Constitution forbidding the submission or the ratification of such an amendment. But even so, as said in Collector v. Day, exemption from such an amendment "rests upon necessary implication, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation."

It may be argued, perhaps, that the fact that there are two express limitations upon the amending power contained in Article V indicates that that power was intended to be unlimited in other respects. It might be a sufficient answer to that contention to say that the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius, while sometimes very persuasive, is never conclusive as a rule of interpretation, and that, before adopting it in so doubtful a matter as this, the courts would certainly look to the consequences which might follow such an interpretation. Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 78. But perhaps a more conclusive answer will be found in the fact that the same argument was rejected as applied to the taxing clause. Collector v. Day, supra; Evans v. Gore, 253 U.S. 245.

The decision of this court in the National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350, constitutes no precedent for holding valid the Nineteenth Amendment. The Eighteenth Amendment did not attack or interfere with the government of the State—"the structure of the state government"—or deprive it of any function "essential to its separate and independent existence."

The prohibition against the adoption of any amendment whereby a State is deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent involves two things—first, that if the State chooses to consent it may be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate; and, second, that it may not by any amendment be deprived of its power to give or refuse its consent.

It is easy to see that, if any inteference with the electorate of a State be permitted, its power to refuse its consent to any amendment which may hereafter be proposed, including an amendment reducing the number of its Senators, may be taken away.

The consent of the State cannot be given or refused except by the will expressed either directly or indirectly of the State's own voters. Therefore it follows necessarily that the right of the State's own electorate to vote is a right reserved and withheld from the scope and operation of the amending power altogether. Hamilton, The Federalist, No. 59, pp. 238, 239.

The various cases decided by this court since the Civil War, including Myers v. Anderson, 238 U.S. 368, in which, without going at all into the question of the scope and limits of the amending power granted in Article V, this court nevertheless then recognized the Fifteenth Amendment as being in effect valid as a part of the Constitution, constitute no precedents for holding the Nineteenth Amendment valid, for the reason that any amendment, however radical, which has received the unanimous assent of the States—has been, in fact, consented to, however reluctantly, by each and all of them,—is valid, and must be accepted by this court as being valid when the question of its validity was arised for the first time, forty-five years after its adoption, no State nor any citizens of any State having ever disputed its validity prior to that case.

While it may be true that no formal treaty of peace was entered into by the Government of the United States and the Confederate States, or any of them, the substance of a treaty was enacted in the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 67, 71.

It may be true that this involves the contention that the effect of war and the necessity of taking measures to prevent the recurrence of war expands the amending power, but it is submitted that there is nothing unreasonable in that contention. The same effect would undoubtedly be produced by the same causes upon the treaty-making power.

If, after the expiration of a period of forty-five years, the validity of a treaty, by which this country made the best terms it could to end a disastrous war, were called in question as the validity of the Fifteenth Amendment was called in question for the first time in Myers v. Anderson, would not this court deal with the objections to its validity in the same way in which it dealt with the objections urged against the validity of the Fifteenth Amendment in that case, viz: ignore them altogether and decide all other questions raised with the tacit assumption that the treaty was valid?

After the Fifteenth Amendment had been proclaimed, the States which had refused ratification, and their people, evidenced their consent and acquiescence in the clearest possible way, by not only refraining from challenging its validity for forty-five years, but in passing laws either for the enforcement of the amendment or in recognition of its validity.

The Nineteenth Amendment has never been legally ratified by the requisite number of States. Tennessee and West Virginia, both of which must be counted to make the requisite three-fourths, in fact refused to ratify the Amendment. The votes upon which the certifications were based were illegal under the local law. The proceedings are subject to judicial injury under that law, and by this court.

The legislatures of five States, Missouri, Tennessee, West Virginia, Texas and Rhode Island, were, by the provisions of their respective state constitutions, expressly forbidden to adopt amendments of the character of the Nineteenth, and were therefore incompetent to ratify that amendment.

Mr. Alexander Armstrong, Attorney General of the State of Maryland, with whom Mr. Lindsay C. Spencer was on the briefs, for defendants in error and respondents.

Mr. George M. Brady, with whom Mr. Roger Howell and Mr. Jacob M. Moses were on the brief, for Caroline Roberts et al., defendants in error and respondents.

Mr. Solicitor General Beck, by leave of court, filed a brief as amicus curiae on behalf of the United States.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the court.

On October 12, 1920, Cecilia Streett Waters and Mary D. Randolph, citizens of Maryland, applied for and were granted registration as qualified voters in Baltimore City. To have their names stricken from the list Oscar Leser and others brought this suit in the court of Common Pleas. The only ground of disqualification alleged was that the applicants for registration were women, whereas the constitution of Maryland limits the suffrage to men. Ratification of the proposed Amendment to the Federal Constitution, now known as the Nineteenth, 41 Stat. 362, had been proclaimed on August 26, 1920, 41 Stat. 1823, pursuant to Rev. Stats. § 205. The Legislature of Maryland had refused to ratify it. The petitioners contended, on several grounds, that the Amendment had not become part of the Federal Constitution. The trial court overruled the contentions and dismissed the petition. Its judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of the State, 139 Md. 46; and the case comes here on writ of error. That writ must be dismissed; but the petition for a writ of certiorari, also duly filed, is granted. The laws of Maryland authorized such a suit by a qualified voter against the Board of Registry. Whether the Nineteenth Amendment has become part of the Federal Constitution is the question presented for decision.

The first contention is that the power of amendment conferred by the Federal Constitution and sought to be exercised does not extend to this Amendment, because of its character. The argument is that so great an addition to the electorate, if made without the State's consent, destroys is autonomy as a political body. This Amendment is in character and phraseology precisely similar to the Fifteenth. For each the same method of adoption was pursued. One cannot be valid and the other invalid. That the Fifteenth is valid, although rejected by six States including Maryland, has been recognized and acted on for half a century. See United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U.S. 370; Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347; Myers v. Anderson, 238 U.S. 368. The suggestion that the Fifteenth was incorporated in the Constitution, not in accordance with law, but practically as a war measure which has been validated by acquiescence, cannot be entertained.

The second contention is that in the constitutions of several of the thirty-six States named in the proclamation of the Secretary of State there are provisions which render inoperative the alleged ratifications by their legislatures. The argument is that by reason of these specific provisions the legislatures were without power to ratify. But the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing the amendment, is a federal function derived from the Federal Constitution; and it transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a State. Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221; Hawke v. Smith, No. 2, 253 U.S. 231; National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350, 386.

The remaining contention is that the ratifying resolutions of Tennessee and of West Virginia are inoperative, because adopted in violation of the rules of legislative procedure prevailing in the respective States. The question raised may have been rendered immaterial by the fact that since the proclamation the legislatures of two other States—Connecticut and Vermont—have adopted resolutions of ratification. But a broader answer should be given to the contention. The proclamation by the Secretary certified that from official documents on file in the Department of State it appeared that the proposed Amendment was ratified by the legislatures of thirty-six States, and that it "has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States." As the legislatures of Tennessee and of West Virginia had power to adopt the resolutions of ratification, official notice to the Secretary, duly authenticated, that they had done so was conclusive upon him, and, being certified to by his proclamation, is conclusive upon the courts. The rule declared in Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 669–673, is applicable here. See also Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U.S. 547, 562.

Affirmed.

DILLON v. GLOSS, DEPUTY COLLECTOR OF UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE

[256 U.S. 368 (1921)]

APPEAL FROM THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

No. 251. Argued March 22, 1921.—Decided May 16, 1921.

1. Article V of the Constitution implies that amendments submitted thereunder must be ratified, if at all, within some reasonable time after their proposal. Pp. 371, 374.
2. Under this Article, Congress, in proposing an amendment, may fix a reasonable time for ratification. P. 375.
3. The period of seven years, fixed by Congress in the resolution proposing the Eighteenth Amendment, was reasonable. P. 376.
4. The Eighteenth Amendment became a part of the Constitution on January 16, 1919, when, as the court notices judicially, its ratification in the state legislatures was consummated; not on January 29, 1919, when the ratification was proclaimed by the Secretary of State. P. 376.
5. As this Amendment, by its own terms, was to go into effect one year after being ratified, §§ 3 and 26, Title II, of the National Prohibition Act, which by § 21, Title III, were to be in force from and after the effective date of the Amendment, were in force on January 16, 1920. P. 376.

262 Fed. Rep. 563, affirmed.

THE case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Levi Cooke, with whom Mr. Theodore A. Bell and Mr. George R. Beneman were on the brief, for appellant:

The Eighteenth Amendment is invalid because of the extra-constitutional provision of the third section. Congress has no power to limit the time of deliberation or otherwise control what the legislatures of the States shall do in their deliberation. Any attempt to limit voids the proposal.

The legislative history of the Amendment shows that without § 3 the proposal would not have passed the Senate. Cong. Rec., 65th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 5648–5666; Cong. Rec., 65th Cong., 2d sess., p. 477.

The same taint attended the passage of the amendment in the House, because there what is now § 3 was considered and the limitation changed from six to seven years, and it is impossible to say now that without the attempted time limitation upon the States two-thirds of the House would have assented to the proposal of the amendment.

The fact that thirty-six States thus ratified within the time emphasizes the evil that was accomplished by the limitation, and can in no way be invoked to suggest that the third section became surplusage in view of this result attained so well within the seven-year limitation attempted to be set by Congress. On the contrary, the fact of there being a time limitation tended to destroy any deliberation by the States and to enable the faction which was pressing for ratification of the amendment to urge immediate indeliberate action in order to avoid the possibility of the time limitation expiring without thirty-six States having made ratification.

The history of the times discloses, if the court may take judicial notice thereof, that legislators elected prior to the submission by Congress were urged to act forthwith, without awaiting the election of legislators by an electorate aware of the pendency of the congressional proposal, and that in some legislatures ratification was secured without debate in the precipitate action urged by the faction advocating the amendment. The speed with which the amendment was disposed of by the state legislatures tends to establish the absence of deliberation; and in any view the fact stands that the States were acting in the presence of a limitation fixed by Congress, violative of Art. V, in terms unheard of in the history of the country, and contrary to any procedure sanctioned by the organic law, with the very nature and structure of which both the Congress and the state legislatures were dealing. See 2 Story, Const., 3d ed., § 1830.

The National Prohibition Act should be found to have become effective, if at all, January 29, 1920, a year after ratification of the amendment was proclaimed and made known to the public. The proclamation of the Secretary of State must be treated as the publication of the fact of ratification; under Rev. Stats., § 205, of which all persons may be considered to be charged with knowledge.

Mrs. Annette Abbott Adams, Assistant Attorney General, for appellee.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order denying a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. 262 Fed. Rep. 563. The petitioner was in custody under § 26 of Title II of the National Prohibition Act, c. 85, 41 Stat. 305, on a charge of transporting intoxicating liquor in violation of § 3 of that title, and by his petition sought to be discharged on several grounds, all but two of which were abandoned after the decision in National Prohibition Cases, 253 U.S. 350. The remaining grounds are, first, that the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, to enforce which Title II of the act was adopted, is invalid because the congressional resolution, 40 Stat. 1050, proposing the Amendment, declared that it should be inoperative unless ratified within seven years; and, secondly, that, in any event, the provisions of the act which the petitioner was charged with violating, and under which he was arrested, had not gone into effect at the time of the asserted violation nor at the time of the arrest.

The power to amend the Constitution and the mode of exerting it are dealt with in Article V, which reads:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

It will be seen that this article says nothing about the time within which ratification may be had—neither that it shall be unlimited nor that it shall be fixed by Congress. What then is the reasonable inference or implication? Is it that ratification may be had at any time, as within a few years, a century or even a longer period; or that it must be had within some reasonable period which Congress is left free to define? Neither the debates in the federal convention which framed the Constitution nor those in the state conventions which ratified it shed any light on the question.

The proposal for the Eighteenth Amendment is the first in which a definite period for ratification was fixed.[1] Theretofore twenty-one amendments had been proposed by Congress and seventeen of these had been ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States—some within a single year after their proposal and all within four years. Each of the remaining four had been ratified in some of the States, but not in a sufficient number.[2] Eighty years after the partial ratification of one an effort was made to complete its ratification and the legislature of Ohio passed a joint resolution to that end,[3] after which the effort was abandoned. Two, after ratification in one less than the required number of States, had lain dormant for a century.[4] The other, proposed March 2, 1861, declared: "No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State."[5] Its principal purpose was to protect slavery and at the time of its proposal and partial ratification it was a subject of absorbing interest, but after the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment it was generally forgotten. Whether an amendment proposed without fixing any time for ratification, and which after favorable action in less than the required number of States had lain dormant for many years, could be resurrected and its ratification completed had been mooted on several occasions, but was still an open question.

These were the circumstances in the light of which Congress in proposing the Eighteenth Amendment fixed seven years as the period for ratification. Whether this could be done was questioned at the time and debated at length, but the prevailing view in both houses was that some limitation was intended and that seven years was a reasonable period.[6]

That the Constitution contains no express provision on the subject is not in itself controlling; for with the Constitution, as with a statute or other written instrument, what is reasonably implied is as much a part of it as what is expressed.[7] An examination of Article V discloses that it is intended to invest Congress with a wide range of power in proposing amendments. Passing a provision long since expired,[8] it subjects this power to only two restrictions: one that the proposal shall have the approval of two-thirds of both houses, and the other excluding any amendment which will deprive any State, without its consent, of its equal suffrage in the Senate.[9] A further mode of proposal—as yet never invoked—is provided, which is, that on the application of two-thirds of the States Congress shall call a convention for the purpose. When proposed in either mode amendments to be effective must be ratified by the legislatures, or by conventions, in three-fourths of the States, "as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress." Thus the people of the United States, by whom the

---

[1] Some consideration had been given to the subject before, but without any definite action. Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st sess., 2771; 40th Cong., 3d sess., 912, 1040, 1309–1314.

[2] Watson on the Constitution, vol. 2, pp. 1676–1679; House Doc., 54th Cong., 2d sess., No. 353, pt. 2, p. 300.

[3] House Doc., 54th Cong., 2d sess., No. 353, pt. 2, p. 317 (No. 243); Ohio Senate Journal, 1873, pp. 590, 666–667, 678; Ohio House Journal, 1873, pp. 848, 849. A committee charged with the preliminary consideration of the joint resolution reported that they were divided in opinion on the question of the validity of a ratification after so great a lapse of time.

[4] House Doc., 54th Cong., 2d sess., No. 353, pt. 2, pp. 300, 320 (No. 295), 329 (No. 399).

[5] 12 Stat. 251; House Doc., 54th Cong., 2d sess., No. 353, pt. 2, pp. 195–197, 363 (No. 931), 369 (No. 1025).

[6] Cong. Rec., 65th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 5648–5651, 5652–5653, 5658–5661; 2d sess., pp. 423–425, 428, 436, 443, 444, 445–446, 463, 469, 477–478.

[7] United States v. Babbit, 1 Black, 55, 61; Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651, 658; McHenry v. Alford, 168 U.S. 651, 672; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 451; Luria v. United States, 231 U.S. 9, 24; The Pesaro, 255 U.S. 216.

[8] Article V, as before shown, contained a provision that "No amendment which shall be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article." One of the clauses named covered the migration and importation of slaves and the other deals with direct taxes.

[9] When the federal convention adopted Article V a motion to include another restriction forbidding any amendment whereby a State, without its consent, would "be affected in its internal police" was decisively voted down. The vote was: yeas 3—Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware; nays 8—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia. Elliot's Debates, vol. 5, pp. 551, 552.

Constitution was ordained and established, have made it a condition to amending that instrument that the amendment be submitted to representative assemblies in the several States and be ratified in three-fourths of them. The plain meaning of this is (a) that all amendments must have the sanction of the people of the United States, the original fountain of power, acting through representative assemblies, and (b) that ratification by these assemblies in three-fourths of the States shall be taken as a decisive expression of the people's will and be binding on all.[1]

We do not find anything in the Article which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the States may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective. We do find that which strongly suggests the contrary. First, proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, it is only when there is deemed to be a necessity therefor that amendments are to be proposed, the reasonable implication being that when proposed they are to be considered and disposed of presently. Thirdly, as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do. These considerations and the general purport and spirit of the Article lead to the conclusion expressed by Judge Jameson[2] "that an alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed by Congress." That this is the better conclusion becomes even more manifest when what is comprehended in the other view is considered; for, according to it, four amendments proposed long ago—two in 1789, one in 1810 and one in 1861—are still pending and in a situation where their ratification in some of the States many years since by representatives of generations now largely forgotten may be effectively supplemented in enough more States to make three-fourths by representatives of the present or some future generation. To that view few would be able to subscribe, and in our opinion it is quite untenable. We conclude that the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after the proposal.

Of the power of Congress, keeping within reasonable limits, to fix a definite period for the ratification we entertain no doubt. As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal with subsidiary matters of detail as the public interests and changing conditions may require;[3] and Article V is no exception to the rule. Whether a definite period for ratification shall be fixed so that all may know what it is and speculation on what is a reasonable time may be avoided, is, in our opinion, a matter of detail which Congress may determine as an incident of its power to designate the mode of ratification. It is not questioned that seven years, the period fixed in this instance, was reasonable, if power existed to fix a definite time; nor could it well be questioned considering the periods within which prior amendments were ratified.

The provisions of the act which the petitioner was charged with violating and under which he was arrested (Title II, §§ 3, 26) were by the terms of the act (Title III, § 21) to be in force from and after the date when the Eighteenth Amendment should go into effect, and the latter by its own terms was to go into effect one year after being ratified. Its ratification, of which we take judicial notice, was consummated January 16, 1919.[4] That the Secretary of State did not proclaim its ratification until January 29, 1919,[5] is not material, for the date of its consummation, and not that on which it is proclaimed, controls. It follows that the provisions of the act with which the petitioner is concerned went into effect

---

[1] See Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat, 304, 324–325; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat, 316, 402–404; Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 413–414; Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331, 347–348; Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221; Story on the Constitution, 5th ed., §§ 362–363, 463–465.

[2] Jameson on Constitutional Conventions, 4th ed., § 585.

[3] Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat, 304, 326; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat, 316, 407.

[4] Sen. Doc. No. 169, 66th Cong., 2d sess.; Ark. Gen. Acts, 1919 p. 512; Ark. House Journal 1919 p. 10; Ark. Sen. Journal 1919, p. 16; Wyo. Sen. Journal, 1919, pp. 26–27; Wyo. House Journal 1919, pp. 27–28; Mo. Sen. Journal, 1919, pp. 17–18; Mo. House Journal, 1919, p. 40.

[5] 40 Stat. 1941.

January 16, 1920. His alleged offense and his arrest were on the following day; so his claim that those provisions had not gone into effect at the time is not well grounded.

Final order affirmed.

COLEMAN ET AL. v. MILLER, SECRETARY OF THE SENATE OF THE STATE OF KANSAS, ET AL

[307 U.S. 433 (1939)]

CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS.

No. 7. Argued October 10, 1938. Reargued April 17, 18, 1939.—Decided June 5, 1939.

1. Upon submission of a resolution for ratification of a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, known as the Child Labor Amendment, twenty of the forty senators of the State of Kansas voted in favor of its adoption and twenty voted against it. The Lieutenant Governor, the presiding officer of the Senate, then cast his vote in favor of the resolution, and later it was adopted by the other house of the legislature on a vote of a majority of its members. The twenty senators who had voted against ratification, challenging the right of the Lieutenant Governor to cast the deciding vote in the Senate, and alleging that the proposed amendment had lost its vitality because of previous rejection by Kansas and other States and failure of ratification within a reasonable time, sought a writ of mandamus to compel the Secretary of the Senate to erase an endorsement on the resolution, to the effect that it had been adopted by the Senate, and to endorse thereon the words "was not passed," and to restrain the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives from signing the resolution and the Secretary of State of Kansas from authenticating it and delivering it to the Governor. The State entered its appearance and the State Supreme Court entertained the action, sustained the right of the plaintiffs to maintain it, but overruled their contentions, upheld the ratification, and denied the writ. Held:

(1) The questions decided were federal questions, arising under Article V of the Constitution. P. 437.

(2) The complaining senators, whose votes against ratification have been overridden and virtually held for naught, although if they are right in their contentions their votes would have been sufficient to defeat ratification, have a plain, direct and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes. They have set up and claimed a right and privilege under the Constitution of the United States to have their votes given effect and the state court has denied that right and privilege. P. 438.

(3) This Court has jurisdiction to review the decision of the state court by certiorari, under Jud. Code § 237(b). P. 438.

2. The Court being equally divided in opinion as to whether the question presents a justiciable controversy, or is a political question, expresses no opinion upon a contention that the Lieutenant Governor of Kansas was not a part of the "legislature," and under Article V of the Federal Constitution could not be permitted a deciding vote on the ratification of the proposed amendment. P. 446.

3. In accordance with the precedent of the Fourteenth Amendment, the efficacy of ratification of a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution by a state legislature which had previously rejected the proposal, is held a question for the political departments, with the ultimate authority in the Congress in the exercise of its control over the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment. P. 447.

4. The legislature of Kansas having actually ratified the proposed Child Labor Amendment, this Court should not restrain the state officers from certifying the ratification to the Secretary of State, because of an earlier rejection, and thus prevent the question from coming before the political departments. There is found no basis in either Constitution or statute for such judicial action. P. 450.

5. R.S. § 205; 5 U.S.C. 160, presupposes official notice to the Secretary of State when a state legislature has adopted a resolution of ratification. No warrant is seen for judicial interference with the performance of that duty. P. 450.

6. The Congress in controlling the promulgation of the adoption of a constitutional amendment has the final determination of the question whether by lapse of time its proposal of the amendment had lost its vitality before being adopted by the requisite number of legislatures. P. 451.

7. In determining whether a question falls within the category of political, non-justiciable questions, the appropriateness under our system of government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments, and also the lack of satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination, are dominant considerations. P. 454. 146 Kan. 390; 71 P. 2d 518, reversed.

CERTIORARI, 303 U.S. 632, to review a judgment of the Supreme Court of Kansas denying a writ of mandamus, applied for in that court by senators of the State and members of its House of Representatives for the purpose of compelling the Secretary of the Senate to erase an endorsement purporting to show that a resolution for the ratification of a proposal to amend the Federal Constitution had passed the Senate, and to restrain the officers of the Senate and the other house of the legislature from signing the resolution and the Secretary of State of Kansas from authenticating it and delivering it to the Governor.

Messrs. Robert Stone and Rolla W. Coleman, on the reargument and on the original argument, for petitioners.

Mr. Clarence V. Beck on the reargument, and with Mr. E. R. Sloan on the original argument, for respondents.

By special leave of court, Solicitor General Jackson, with whom Mr. Paul A. Freund was on the brief, argued the case on behalf of the United States, as amicus curiae, urging affirmance.

By leave of Court, Messrs. Orland S. Loomis, Attorney General of Wisconsin, Mortimer Levitan and Newell S. Boardman, Assistant Attorneys General, filed a brief on behalf of that State, as amicus curiae, urging affirmance.

Opinion of the Court by MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES, announced by MR. JUSTICE STONE.

In June, 1924, the Congress proposed an amendment to the Constitution, known as the Child Labor Amendment.[1] In January, 1925, the Legislature of Kansas adopted a resolution rejecting the proposed amendment and a certified copy of the resolution was sent to the Secretary of State of the United States. In January, 1937, a resolution known as "Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 3" was introduced in the Senate of Kansas ratifying the proposed amendment. There were forty senators. When the resolution came up for consideration, twenty senators voted in favor of its adoption and twenty voted against it. The Lieutenant Governor, the presiding officer of the Senate, then cast his vote in favor of the resolution. The resolution was later adopted by the House of Representatives on the vote of a majority of its members.

This original proceeding in mandamus was then brought in the Supreme Court of Kansas by twenty-one members of the Senate, including the twenty senators who had voted against the resolution, and three members of the House of Representatives, to compel the Secretary of the Senate to erase an endorsement on the resolution to the effect that it had been adopted by the Senate and to endorse thereon the words "was not passed," and to restrain the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives from signing the resolution and the Secretary of State of Kansas from authenticating it and delivering it to the Governor. The petition challenged the right of the Lieutenant Governor to cast the deciding vote in the Senate. The petition also set forth the prior rejection of the proposed amendment and alleged that in the period from June, 1924, to March, 1927, the amendment had been rejected by both houses of the legislatures of twenty-six States, and had been ratified in only five States, and that by reason of that rejection and the failure of ratification within a reasonable time the proposed amendment had lost its vitality.

An alternative writ was issued. Later the Senate passed a resolution directing the Attorney General to enter the appearance of the State and to represent the State as its interests might appear. Answers were filed on behalf of the defendants other than the State and plaintiffs made their reply.

The Supreme Court found no dispute as to the facts. The court entertained the action and held that the Lieutenant Governor was authorized to cast the deciding vote, that the proposed amendment retained its original vitality, and that the resolution "having duly passed the house of representatives and the senate, the act of ratification of the proposed amendment by the legislature of Kansas was

---

[1] The text of the proposed amendment is as follows (43 Stat. 670):

"Section 1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age.

"Sec. 2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by the Congress."

final and complete." The writ of mandamus was accordingly denied. 146 Kan. 390; 71 P. 2d 518. This Court granted certiorari. 303 U.S. 632.

First. The jurisdiction of this Court.—Our authority to issue the writ of certiorari is challenged upon the ground that petitioners have no standing to seek to have the judgment of the state court reviewed, and hence it is urged that the writ of certiorari should be dismissed. We are unable to accept that view.

The state court held that it had jurisdiction; that "the right of the parties to maintain the action is beyond question."[1] The state court thus determined in substance that members of the legislature had standing to seek, and the court had jurisdiction to grant, mandamus to compel a proper record of legislative action. Had the questions been solely state questions, the matter would have ended there. But the questions raised in the instant case arose under the Federal Constitution and these questions were entertained and decided by the state court. They arose under Article V of the Constitution which alone conferred the power to amend and determined the manner in which that power could be exercised. Hawke v. Smith (No. 1), 253 U.S. 221, 227; Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137. Whether any or all of the questions thus raised and decided are deemed to be justiciable or political, they are exclusively federal questions and not state questions.

We find the cases cited in support of the contention, that petitioners lack an adequate interest to invoke our jurisdiction to review, to be inapplicable.[2] Here, the plaintiffs include twenty senators, whose votes against ratification have been overridden and virtually held for naught although if they are right in their contentions their votes would have been sufficient to defeat ratification. We think that these senators have a plain, direct and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes. Petitioners come directly within the provisions of the statute governing our appellate jurisdiction. They have set up and claimed a right and privilege under the Constitution of the United States to have their votes given effect and the state court has denied that right and privilege. As the validity of a state statute was not assailed, the remedy by appeal was not available (Jud. Code, § 237 (a); 28 U.S.C. 344 (a)) and the appropriate remedy was by writ of certiorari which we granted. Jud. Code, § 237 (b); 28 U.S.C. 344 (b).

The contention to the contrary is answered by our decisions in Hawke v. Smith, supra, and Leser v. Garnett, supra. In Hawke v. Smith, the plaintiff in error, suing as a "citizen and elector of the State of Ohio, and as a taxpayer and elector of the County of Hamilton," on behalf of himself and others similarly situated, filed a petition for an injunction in the state court to restrain the Secretary of State from spending the public money in preparing and printing ballots for submission of a referendum to the electors on the question of the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. A demurrer to the petition was sustained in the lower court and its judgment was affirmed by the intermediate appellate court and the Supreme Court of the State. This Court entertained jurisdiction and, holding that the state court had erred in deciding that the State had authority to require the submission of the ratification to a referendum, reversed the judgment.

In Leser v. Garnett, qualified voters in the State of Maryland brought suit in the state court to have the names of certain women stricken from the list of qualified voters on the ground that the constitution of Maryland limited suffrage to men and that the Nineteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution has not been validly ratified. The state court took jurisdiction and the Court of Appeals of the State affirmed the judgment dismissing the petition. We granted certiorari. On the question of our jurisdiction we said:

"The petitioners contended, on several grounds, that the Amendment had not become part of the Federal Constitution. The trial court overruled the conten-

---

[1] The state court said on this point:

"At the threshold we are confronted with the question raised by the defendants as to the right of the plaintiffs to maintain this action. It appears that on March 30, 1937, the state senate adopted a resolution directing the attorney general to appear for the state of Kansas in this action. It further appears that on April 8, 1937, on application of the attorney general, an order was entered making the state of Kansas a party defendant. The state being a party to the proceedings, we think the right of the parties to maintain the action is beyond question. (G.S. 1935 75–702; State, ex rel. v. Public Service Comn., 135 Kan. 491, 11 P. 2d 999.)" tions and dismissed the petition. Its judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of the State, 139 Md. 46; and the case comes here on writ of error. That writ must be dismissed; but the petition for a writ of certiorari, also duly filed, is granted. The laws of Maryland authorized such a suit by a qualified voter against the Board of Registry. Whether the Nineteenth Amendment has become part of the Federal Constitution is the question presented for decision."

[2] See Caffrey v. Oklahoma Territory, 177 U.S. 346; Smith v. Indiana, 191 U.S. 138; Braxton County Court v. West Virginia, 208 U.S. 192; Marshall v. Dye, 231 U.S. 250; Stewart v. Kansas City, 239 U.S. 14; Columbus & Greenville Ry. Co. v. Miller, 283 U.S. 96.

And holding that the official notice to the Secretary of State, duly authenticated, of the action of the legislatures of the States, whose alleged ratifications were assailed, was conclusive upon the Secretary of State and that his proclamation accordingly of ratification was conclusive upon the courts, we affirmed the judgment of the state court.

That the question of our jurisdiction in Leser v. Garnett was decided upon deliberate consideration is sufficiently shown by the fact that there was a motion to dismiss the writ of error for the want of jurisdiction and opposition to the grant of certiorari. The decision is the more striking because on the same day, in an opinion immediately preceding which was prepared for the Court by the same Justice,[4] jurisdiction had been denied to a federal court (the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia) of a suit by citizens of the United States, taxpayers and members of a voluntary association organized to support the Constitution, in which it was sought to have the Nineteenth Amendment declared unconstitutional and to enjoin the Secretary of State from proclaiming its ratification and the Attorney General from taking steps to enforce it. Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126. The Court held that the plaintiffs' alleged interest in the question submitted was not such as to afford a basis for the proceeding; that the plaintiffs had only the right possessed by every citizen "to require that the Government be administered according to law and that the public moneys be not wasted" and that this general right did not entitle a private citizen to bring such a suit as the one in question in the federal courts.[5] It would be difficult to imagine a situation in which the adequacy of the petitioners' interest to invoke our appellate jurisdiction in Leser v. Garnett could have been more sharply presented.

The effort to distinguish that case on the ground that the plaintiffs were qualified voters in Maryland, and hence could complain of the admission to the registry of those alleged not to be qualified, is futile. The interest of the plaintiffs in Leser v. Garnett as merely qualified voters at general elections is certainly much less impressive than the interest of the twenty senators in the instant case. This is not a mere intra-parliamentary controversy but the question relates to legislative action deriving its force solely from the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and the twenty senators were not only qualified to vote on the question of ratification but their votes, if the Lieutenant Governor were excluded as not being a part of the legislature for that purpose, would have been decisive in defeating the ratifying resolution.

We are of the opinion that Hawke v. Smith and Leser v. Garnett are controlling authorities, but in view of the wide range the discussion has taken we may refer to some other instances in which the question of what constitutes a sufficient interest to enable one to invoke our appellate jurisdiction has been involved. The principle that the applicant must show a legal interest in the controversy has been maintained. It has been applied repeatedly in cases where municipal corporations have challenged state legislation affecting their alleged rights and obligations. Being but creatures of the State, municipal corporations have no standing to invoke the contract clause or the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution in opposition to the will of their creator.[6] But there has been recognition of the legitimate interest of public officials and administrative commissions, federal and state, to resist the endeavor to prevent the enforcement of statutes in relation to which they have official duties. Under the Urgent Deficiencies Act,[7] the Interstate Commerce Commission, and commissions representing interested States which have intervened, are entitled as "aggrieved parties" to an appeal to this Court from a decree setting aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, though the United States refuses to join in the appeal. Interstate Commerce Comm'n v. Oregon-

[4] Mr. Justice Brandeis.
[5] Id., pp. 129, 130. See, also, Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 480, 486, 487.
[6] Pawhuska v. Pawhuska Oil Co. 250 U.S. 394; Trenton v. New Jersey, 262 U.S. 182; Risty v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 270 U.S. 378; Williams v. Mayor, 289 U.S. 36.
[7] Act of October 22, 1913, 38 Stat. 219; 28 U.S.C. 47, 47a, 345.

Washington R. & N. Co., 288 U.S. 14. So, this Court may grant certiorari, on the application of the Federal Trade Commission, to review decisions setting aside its orders.[8] Federal Trade Comm'n v. Curtis Publishing Co., 260 U.S. 568. Analogous provisions authorize certiorari to review decisions against the National Labor Relations Board.[9] National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Corp., 301 U.S. 1. Under § 266 of the Judicial Code (28 U.S.C. 380), where an injunction is sought to restrain the enforcement of a statute of a State or an order of its administrative board or commission, upon the ground of invalidity under the Federal Constitution, the right of direct appeal to this Court from the decree of the required three judges is accorded whether the injunction be granted or denied. Hence, in case the injunction is granted, the state board is entitled to appeal. See, for example, South Carolina Highway Dept. v. Barnwell Brothers, 303 U.S. 177.

The question of our authority to grant certiorari, on the application of state officers, to review decisions of state courts declaring state statutes, which these officers seek to enforce, to be repugnant to the Federal Constitution, has been carefully considered and our jurisdiction in that class of cases has been sustained. The original Judiciary Act of 1789 provided in § 25[10] for the review by this Court of a judgment of a state court "where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favour of such their validity"; that is, where the claim of federal right had been denied. By the Act of December 23, 1914,[11] it was provided that this Court may review on certiorari decisions of state courts sustaining a federal right. The present statute governing our jurisdiction on certiorari contains the corresponding provision that this Court may exercise that jurisdiction "as well where the federal claim is sustained as where it is denied." Jud. Code, § 237(b); 28 U.S.C. 344(b). The plain purpose was to provide an opportunity, deemed to be important and appropriate, for the review of the decisions of state courts on constitutional questions however the state court might decide them. Accordingly where the claim of a complainant that a state officer be restrained from enforcing a state statute because of constitutional invalidity is sustained by the state court, the statute enables the state officer to seek a reversal by this Court of that decision.

In Blodgett v. Silberman, 277 U.S. 1, 7, the Court granted certiorari on the application of the State Tax Commissioner of Connecticut who sought review of the decision of the Supreme Court of Errors of the State so far as it denied the right created by its statute to tax the transfer of certain securities, which had been placed for safekeeping in New York, on the ground that they were not within the taxing jurisdiction of Connecticut. Entertaining jurisdiction, this Court reversed the judgment in that respect. Id., p. 18.

The question received most careful consideration in the case of Boynton v. Hutchinson Gas Co., 291, U.S. 656, where the Supreme Court of Kansas had held a state statute to be repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and the Attorney General of the State applied for certiorari. His application was opposed upon the ground that he had merely an official interest in the controversy and the decisions were invoked upon which the Government relies in challenging our jurisdiction in the instant case.[12] Because of its importance, and contrary to our usual practice, the Court directed oral argument on the question whether certiorari should be granted, and after that argument, upon mature deliberation, granted the writ. The writ was subsequently dismissed but only because of a failure of the record to show service of summons and severance upon the appellees in the state court who were not parties to the proceedings here. 292 U.S. 601. This decision with respect to the scope of our jurisdiction has been followed in later cases. In Morehead v. New York ex. rel. Tipaldo, 298 U.S. 587, we granted certiorari on an application by the warden of a city prison to review the decision of the Court of Appeals of the State on habeas corpus, ruling that the minimum wage law of the State violated the Federal Constitution. This Court decided the case on the merits. In Kelly v. Washington ex

---

[8] 15 U.S.C. 45; 28 U.S.C. 848.
[9] 29 U.S.C. 160(e). See, also, as to orders of Federal Communications Commission, 47 U.S.C. 402(e).
[10] 1 Stat. 73, 85, 86.
[11] 38 Stat. 790; see, also Act of September 6, 1916, 39 Stat. 726.
[12] See cases cited in Note 8.

rel. Foss Co., 302 U.S. 1, we granted certiorari, on the application of the state authorities charged with the enforcement of the state law relating to the inspection and regulation of vessels, to review the decision of the state court holding the statute invalid in its application to navigable waters. We concluded that the state act had a permissible field of operation and the decision of the state court in holding the statute completely unenforceable in deference to federal law was reversed.

This class of cases in which we have exercised our appellate jurisdiction on the application of state officers may be said to recognize that they have an adequate interest in the controversy by reason of their duty to enforce the state statutes the validity of which has been drawn in question. In none of these cases could it be said that the State officers invoking our jurisdiction were sustaining any "private damage."

While one who asserts the mere right of a citizen and taxpayer of the United States to complain of the alleged invalid outlay of public moneys has no standing to invoke the jurisdiction of the federal courts (Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 480, 486, 487), the Court has sustained the more immediate and substantial right of a resident taxpayer to invoke the interposition of a court of equity to enjoin an illegal use of moneys by a municipal corporation. Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U.S. 601, 609; Frothingham v. Mellon, supra. In Heim v. McCall, 239 U.S. 175, we took jurisdiction on a writ of error sued out by a property owner and taxpayer, who had been given standing in the state court, for the purpose of reviewing its decision sustaining the validity under the Federal Constitution, of a state statute as applied to contracts for the construction of public works in the City of New York, the enforcement of which was alleged to involve irreparable loss to the city and hence to be inimical to the interests of the taxpayer.

In Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, we granted certiorari on the application of one who was an "elector," as well as a "citizen" and "taxpayer," and who assailed under the Federal Constitution a state statute establishing congressional districts. Passing upon the merits we held that the function of a state legislature in prescribing the time, place and manner of holding elections for representatives in Congress under Article I, § 4, was a law-making function in which the veto power of the state governor participates, if under the state constitution the governor has that power in the course of the making of state laws, and accordingly reversed the judgment of the state court. We took jurisdiction on certiorari in a similar case from New York where the petitioners were "citizens and voters of the State" who had sought a mandamus to compel the Secretary of State of New York to certify that representatives in Congress were to be elected in the congressional districts as defined by a concurrent resolution of the Senate and Assembly of the legislature. There the state court, construing the provision of the Federal Constitution as contemplating the exercise of the law-making power, had sustained the defense that the concurrent resolution was ineffective as it had not been submitted to the Governor for approval, and refused the writ of mandamus. We affirmed the judgment. Koenig v. Flynn, 285 U.S. 375.

In the light of this course of decisions, we find no departure from principle in recognizing in the instant case that at least the twenty senators whose votes, if their contention were sustained, would have been sufficient to defeat the resolution ratifying the proposed constitutional amendment, have an interest in the controversy which, treated by the state court as a basis for entertaining and deciding the federal questions, is sufficient to give the Court jurisdiction to review that decision.

Second. The participation of the Lieutenant Governor.—Petitioners contend that, in the light of the powers and duties of the Lieutenant Governor and his relation to the Senate under the state constitution, as construed by the supreme court of the state, the Lieutenant Governor was not a part of the "legislature" so that under Article V of the Federal Constitution, he could be permitted to have a deciding vote on the ratification of the proposed amendment, when the senate was equally divided.

Whether this contention presents a justiciable controversy, or a question which is political in its nature and hence not justiciable, is a question upon which the Court is equally divided and therefore the Court expresses no opinion upon that point.

Third. The effect of the previous rejection of the amendment and of the lapse of time since its submission.

1. The state court adopted the view expressed by textwriters that a state legislature which has rejected an amendment proposed by the Congress may later ratify.[13] The argument in support of that view is that Article V says nothing of rejection but speaks only of ratification and provides that a proposed amendment shall be valid as part of the Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the States; that the power to ratify is thus conferred upon the State by the Constitution and, as a ratifying power, persists despite a previous rejection. The opposing view proceeds on an assumption that if ratification by "Conventions" were prescribed by the Congress, a convention could not reject and, having adjourned sine die, be reassembled and ratify. It is also premised, in accordance with views expressed by text-writers,[14] that ratification if once given cannot afterwards be rescinded and the amendment rejected, and it is urged that the same effect in the exhaustion of the State's power to act should be ascribed to rejection; that a State can act "but once, either by convention or through its legislature."

Historic instances are cited. In 1865, the Thirteenth Amendment was rejected by the legislature of New Jersey which subsequently ratified it, but the question did not become important as ratification by the requisite number of States had already been proclaimed.[15] The question did arise in connection with the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. The legislatures of Georgia, North Carolina and South Carolina had rejected the amendment in November and December, 1866.[16] New governments were erected in those States (and in others) under the direction of Congress.[17] The new legislatures ratified the amendment, that of North Carolina on July 4, 1868, that of South Carolina on July 9, 1868, and that of Georgia on July 21, 1868.[18] Ohio and New Jersey first ratified and then passed resolutions withdrawing their consent.[19] As there were then thirty-seven States, twenty-eight were needed to constitute the requisite three-fourths. On July 9, 1868, the Congress adopted a resolution requesting the Secretary of State to communicate "a list of the States of the Union whose legislatures have ratified the fourteenth article of amendment,"[20] and in Secretary Seward's report attention was called to the action of Ohio and New Jersey.[21] On July 20th Secretary Seward issued a proclamation reciting the ratification by twenty-eight States, including North Carolina, South Carolina, Ohio and New Jersey, and stating that it appeared that Ohio and New Jersey had since passed resolutions withdrawing their consent and that "it is deemed a matter of doubt and uncertainty whether such resolutions are not irregular, invalid and therefore ineffectual." The Secretary certified that if the ratifying resolutions of Ohio and New Jersey were still in full force and effect, notwithstanding the attempted withdrawal, the amendment had become a part of the Constitution.[22] On the following day the Congress adopted a concurrent resolution which, reciting that three-fourths of the States having ratified (the list including North Carolina, South Carolina, Ohio and New Jersey),[23] declared the Fourteenth Amendment to be a part of the Constitution and that it should be duly promulgated as such by the Secretary of State. Accordingly, Secretary Seward, on July 28th, issued his proclamation embracing the States mentioned in the congressional resolution and adding Georgia.[24]

Thus the political departments of the Government dealt with the effect both of previous rejection and of attempted withdrawal and determined that both were ineffectual in the presence of an actual ratification.[25] While there were special circumstances, because of the action of the Congress in relation to the governments of the rejecting States (North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia), these circumstances were not recited in proclaiming ratification and the previous rejections by the respective legislatures. This decision by the political departments of the Government as to the validity of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment has been accepted.

---

[13] Jameson on Constitutional Conventions §§ 576–581; Willoughby on the Constitution § 329a.

[14] Jameson, op. cit., §§ 582–584; Willoughby, op. cit., § 329a; Ames, "Proposed Amendments to the Constitution," House Doc. No. 353, Pt. 2, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 299, 300.

[15] 13 Stat. 774, 775; Jameson, op. cit., § 576; Ames, op. cit., p. 300.

[16] 15 Stat. 710.

[17] Act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat., p. 428. See White v. Hart, 13 Wall. 646, 652.

[18] 15 Stat. 710.

[19] 15 Stat. 707.

[20] Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 3857.

[21] Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 4070.

[22] 15 Stat. 706, 707.

[23] 15 Stat. 709, 710.

[24] 15 Stat. 710, 711; Ames, op. cit., App. No. 1140, p. 377.

[25] The legislature of New York which had ratified the Fifteenth Amendment in 1869 attempted, in January, 1870, to withdraw its ratification, and while this fact was stated in the proclamation by Secretary Fish of the ratification of the amendment, and New York was not needed to make up the required three-fourths, that State was included in the list of ratifying States. 16 Stat. 1131; Ames, op. cit., App. No. 1284, p. 388.

We think that in accordance with this historic precedent the question of the efficacy of ratifications by state legislatures in the light of previous rejection or attempted withdrawal, should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments, with the ultimate authority in the Congress in the exercise of its control over the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment.

The precise question as now raised is whether, when the legislature of the State, as we have found, has actually ratified the proposed amendment, the Court should restrain the state officers from certifying the ratification to the Secretary of State, because of an earlier rejection, and thus prevent the question from coming before the political departments. We find no basis in either Constitution or statute for such judicial action. Article V, speaking solely of ratification, contains no provision as to rejection.[26] Nor has the Congress enacted a statute relating to rejections. The statutory provision with respect to constitutional amendments is as follows:

"Whenever official notice is received at the Department of State that any amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States has been adopted, according to the provisions of the Constitution, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause the amendment to be published, with this certificate specifying the States by which the same may have been adopted, and that the same has become valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the Constitution of the United States." [27]

The statute presupposes official notice to the Secretary of State when a state legislature has adopted a resolution of ratification. We see no warrant for judicial interference with the performance of that duty. See Leser v. Garnett, supra, p. 137.

2. The more serious question is whether the proposal by the Congress of the amendment had lost its vitality through lapse of time and hence it could not be ratified by the Kansas legislature in 1937. The argument of petitioners stresses the fact that nearly thirteen years elapsed between the proposal in 1924 and the ratification in question. It is said that when the amendment was proposed there was a definitely adverse popular sentiment and that at the end of 1925 there had been rejection by both houses of the legislatures of sixteen States and ratification by only four States, and that it was not until about 1933 that an aggressive campaign was started in favor of the amendment. In reply, it is urged that Congress did not fix a limit of time for ratification and that an unreasonably long time had not elapsed since the submission; that the conditions which gave rise to the amendment had not been eliminated; that the prevalence of child labor, the diversity of state laws and the disparity in their administration, with the resulting competitive inequalities continued to exist. Reference is also made to the fact that a number of the States have treated the amendment as still pending and that in the proceedings of the national government there have been indications of the same view.[28] It is said that there were fourteen ratifications in 1933, four in 1935, one in 1936, and three in 1937.

We have held that the Congress in proposing an amendment may fix a reasonable time for ratification. Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368. There we sustained the action of the Congress in providing in the propsed Eighteenth Amendment that it should be inoperative unless ratified within seven years.[29] No limitation of time for ratification is provided in the instant case either in the proposed amendment or in the resolution of submission. But petitioners contend that, in the absence of a limitation by the Congress, the Court can and should decide what is a reasonable period within which ratification may be had. We are unable to agree with that contention.

It is true that in Dillon v. Gloss the Court said that nothing was found in Article V which suggested that an amendment once proposed was to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some States might be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective; that there was a strong suggestion to the contrary in that proposal and ratification were but succeeding steps in a single endeavor; that as amendments were deemed to be prompted

---

[26] Compare Article VII.

[27] 5 U.S.C. 160. From Act of April 20, 1818, § 2; 3 Stat. 439; R. S. § 205.

[28] Sen. Rep. 726, 75th Cong., 1st Sess.; Sen. Rep. 788, 75th Cong., 1st Sess.; Letter of the President on January 8, 1937, to the Governors of nineteen non-ratifying States whose legislatures were to meet in that year, urging them to press for ratification. New York Times, January 9, 1937, p. 5.

[29] 40 Stat. 1050. A similar provision was inserted in the Twenty-first Amendment. United States v. Chambers, 291 U.S. 217, 222.

by necessity, they should be considered and disposed of presently; and that there is a fair implication that ratification must be sufficiently contemporaneous in the required number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period; and hence that ratification must be within some reasonable time after the proposal. These considerations were cogent reasons for the decision in Dillon v. Gloss that the Congress had the power to fix a reasonable time for ratification. But it does not follow that, whenever Congress has not exercised that power, the Court should take upon itself the responsibility of deciding what constitutes a reasonable time and determine accordingly the validity of ratification. That question was not involved in Dillon v. Gloss and, in accordance with familar principle, what was there said must be read in the light of the point decided.

Where are to be found the criteria for such a judicial determination? None are to be found in Constitution or statute. In their endeavor to answer this question petitioners' counsel have suggested that at least two years should be allowed; that six years would not seem to be unreasonably long; that seven years had been used by the Congress as a reasonable period; that one year, six months and thirteen days was the average time used in passing upon amendments which have been ratified since the first ten amendments; that three years, six months and twenty-five days has been the longest time used in ratifying. To this list of variables, counsel add that "the nature and extent of publicity and the activity of the public and of the legislatures of the several States in relation to any particular proposal should be taken into consideration." That statement is pertinent, but there are additional matters to be examined and weighed. When a proposed amendment springs from a conception of economic needs, it would be necessary, in determining whether a reasonable time had elasped since its submission, to consider the economic conditions prevailing in the country, whether these had so far changed since the submission as to make the proposal no longer responsive to the conception which inspired it or whether conditions were such as to intensify the feeling of need and the appropriateness of the proposed remedial action. In short, the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as in this case it does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of the Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment.

Our decision that the Congress has the power under Article V to fix a reasonable limit of time for ratification in proposing an amendment proceeds upon the assumption that the question, what is a reasonable time, lies within the congressional province. If it be deemed that such a question is an open one when the limit has not been fixed in advance, we think that it should also be regarded as an open one for the consideration of the Congress when, in the presence of certified ratifications by three-fourths of the States, the time arrives for the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment. The decision by the Congress, in its control of the action of the Secretary of State, of the question whether the amendment had been adopted within a reasonable time would not be subject to review by the courts.

It would unduly lengthen this opinion to attempt to review our decisions as to the class of questions deemed to be political and not justiciable. In determining whether a question falls within that category, the appropriateness under our system of government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments and also the lack of satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination are dominant considerations.[80] There are many illustrations in the field of our conduct of foreign relations, where there are "considerations of policy, considerations of extreme magnitude, and certainly, entirely incompetent to the examination and decision of a court of justice." Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199, 260.[81]

[80] See Willoughby, op. cit., pp. 1326, et seq.; Oliver P. Field, "The Doctrine of Political Questions in the Federal Courts," 8 Minnesota Law Review, 485; Melville Fuller Weston, "Political Questions," 38 Harvard Law Review, 296.

[81] See, also, United States v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. 610, 634; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 309; Doe v. Braden, 16 How. 635, 657; Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 288.

Questions involving similar considerations are found in the government of our internal affairs. Thus, under Article IV, § 4, of the Constitution, providing that the United States "shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government," we have held that it rests with the Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State and whether or not it is republican in form. Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 42. In that case Chief Justice Taney observed that "when the senators and representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal." So, it was held in the same case that under the provision of the same Article for the protection of each of the States "against domestic violence" it rested with the Congress "to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfil this guarantee." Id., p. 43. So, in Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118, we considered that questions arising under the guaranty of a republican form of government had long since been "definitely determined to be political and governmental" and hence that the question whether the government of Oregon had ceased to be republican in form because of a constitutional amendment by which the people reserved to themselves power to propose and enact laws independently of the legislative assembly and also to approve or reject any act of that body, was a question for the determination of the Congress. It would be finally settled when the Congress admitted the senators and representatives of the State.

For the reasons we have stated, which we think to be as compelling as those which underlay the cited decisions, we think that the Congress in controlling the promulgation of the adoption of a constitutional amendment has the final determination of the question whether by lapse of time its proposal of the amendment had lost its vitality prior to the required ratifications. The state officials should not be restrained from certifying to the Secretary of State the adoption by the legislature of Kansas of the resolution of ratification.

As we find no reason for disturbing the decision of the Supreme Court of Kansas in denying the mandamus sought by petitioners, its judgment is affirmed but upon the grounds stated in this opinion.

Affirmed.

Concurring opinion by MR. JUSTICE BLACK, in which MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS, MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER and MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS join.

Although, for reasons to be stated by MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, we believe this cause should be dismissed, the ruling of the Court just announced removes from the case the question of petitioners' standing to sue. Under the compulsion of that ruling,[1] MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS, MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS and I have participated in the discussion of other questions considered by the Court and we concur in the result reached, but for somewhat different reasons.

The Constitution grants Congress exclusive power to control submission of constitutional amendments. Final determination by Congress that ratification by three-fourths of the States has taken place "is conclusive upon the courts."[2] In the exercise of that power, Congress, of course, is governed by the Constitution. However, whether submission, intervening procedure or Congressional determination of ratification conforms to the commands of the Constitution, calls for decisions by a "political department" of questions of a type which this Court has frequently designated "political." And decision of a "political question" by the "political department" to which the Constitution has committed it "conclusively binds the judges, as well as all other officers, citizens and subjects of . . . government."[3]

---

[1] Cf., Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 19, 639–40.

[2] Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137.

[3] Jones v. United States, 137 U.S. 202, 212; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 309, 314; Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 42; In re Cooper, 143 U.S. 472, 503; Pacific States Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118; Davis v. Ohio, 241 U.S. 565, 569. "And in this view, it is not material to inquire, nor is it the province of the court to determine, whether the executive ["political department"] be right or wrong. It is enough to know that in the exercise of his constitutional functions, he had decided the question. Having done this, under the responsibilities which belong to him, it is obligatory on the people and government of the Union. . . . this court have laid down the rule, that the action of the political branches of the government in a matter that belongs to them, is conclusive." Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 13 Pet. 415, 420.

Proclamation under authority of Congress that an amendment has been ratified will carry with it a solemn assurance by the Congress that ratification has taken place as the Constitution commands. Upon this assurance a proclaimed amendment must be accepted as a part of the Constitution, leaving to the judiciary its traditional authority of interpretation.[4] To the extent that the Court's opinion in the present case even impliedly assumes a power to make judicial interpretation of the exclusive constitutional authority of Congress over submission and ratification of amendments, we are unable to agree.

The state court below assumed jurisdiction to determine whether the proper procedure is being followed between submission and final adoption. However, it is apparent that judicial review of or pronouncements upon a supposed limitation of a "reasonable time" within which Congress may accept ratification: as to whether duly authorized state officials have proceeded properly in ratifying or voting for ratification; or whether a State may reverse its action once taken upon a proposed amendment; and kindred questions, are all consistent only with an ultimate control over the amending process in the courts. And this must inevitably embarrass the course of amendment by subjecting to judicial interference matters that we believe were intrusted by the Constitution solely to the political branch of government.

The Court here treats the amending process of the Constitution in some respects as subject to judicial construction, in others as subject to the final authority of the Congress. There is no disapproval of the conclusion arrived at in Dillon v. Gloss,[5] that the Constitution impliedly requires that a properly submitted amendment must die unless ratified within a "reasonable time." Nor does the Court now disapprove its prior assumption of power to make such a pronouncement. And it is not made clear that only Congress has constitutional power to determine if there is any such implication in Article V of the Constitution. On the other hand, the Court's opinion declares that Congress has the exclusive power to decide the "political questions" of whether a State whose legislature has once acted upon a proposed amendment may subsequently reverse its position, and whether, in the circumstances of such a case as this, an amendment is dead because an "unreasonable" time has elapsed. No such division between the political and judicial branches of the government is made by Article V which grants power over the amending of the Constitution to Congress alone. Undivided control of that process has been given by the Article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is "political" in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control or interference at any point.

Since Congress has sole and complete control over the amending process, subject to no judicial review, the views of any court upon this process cannot be binding upon Congress, and insofar as Dillon v. Gloss attempts judicially to impose a limitation upon the right of Congress to determine final adoption of an amendment, it should be disapproved. If Congressional determination that an amendment has been completed and become a part of the Constitution is final and removed from examination by the courts, as the Court's present opinion recognizes, surely the steps leading to that condition must be subject to the scrutiny, control and appraisal of none save the Congress, the body having exclusive power to make that final determination.

Congress, possessing exclusive power over the amending process, cannot be bound by and is under no duty to accept the pronouncements upon that exclusive power by this Court or by the Kansas courts. Neither state nor federal courts can review that power. Therefore, any judicial expression amounting to more than mere acknowledgment of exclusive Congressional power over the political process of amendment is a mere admonition to the Congress in the nature of an advisory opinion, given wholly without constitutional authority.

Opinion of MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER.

It is the view of MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS, MR. JUSTICE BLACK, MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS and myself that the petitioners have no standing in this Court.

In endowing this Court with "judicial Power" the Constitution presupposed an historic content for that phrase and relied on assumption by the judiciary of authority only over issues which are appropriate for disposition by judges. The Constitution further explicitly indicated the limited area within which judicial action was to move—however far-reaching the consequences of action within that area—by extending "judicial Power" only to "Cases" and "Controversies." Both by what they said and by what they implied, the framers of the Judiciary Article gave merely the outlines of what were to them the familiar operations of the English judicial system and its manifestations on this side of the ocean before the Union. Judicial power could come into play only in matters that were the traditional concern of the courts at Westminster and only if they arose in ways that to the expert feel of lawyers constituted "Cases" or "Controversies." It was not for courts to meddle with matters that required no subtlety to be identified as political issues.[1] And even as to the kinds of questions which were the staple of judicial business, it was not for courts to pass upon them as abstract, intellectual problems but only if a concrete, living contest between adversaries called for the arbitrament of law. Compare Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346; Tutun v. United States, 270 U.S. 568; Willing v. Chicago Auditorium Assn., 277 U.S. 274; Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Wallace, 288 U.S. 249.

[4] Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 672.
[5] 256 U.S. 368; 375.

As abstractions, these generalities represent common ground among judges. Since, however, considerations governing the exercise of judicial power are not mechanical criteria but derive from conceptions regarding the distribution of governmental powers in their manifold, changing guises, differences in the application of canons of jurisdiction have arisen from the beginning of the Court's history.[2] Conscious or unconscious leanings toward the serviceability of the judicial process in the adjustment of public controversies clothed in the form of private litigation inevitably affect decisions. For they influence awareness in recognizing the relevance of conceded doctrines of judicial self-limitation and rigor in enforcing them.

Of all this, the present controversy furnishes abundant illustration. Twenty-one members of the Kansas Senate and three members of its House of Representatives brought an original mandamus proceeding in the Supreme Court of that State to compel the Secretary of its Senate to erase an endorsement on Kansas "Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 3" of January 1937, to the effect that it had been passed by the Senate, and instead to endorse thereon the words "not passed." They also sought to restrain the officers of both Senate and House from authenticating and delivering it to the Governor of the State for transmission to the Secretary of State of the United States. These Kansas legislators resorted to their Supreme Court claiming that there was no longer an amendment open for ratification by Kansas and that, in any event, it had not been ratified by the "legislature" of Kansas, the constitutional organ for such ratification. See Article V of the Constitution of the United States. The Kansas Supreme Court held that the Kansas legislators had a right to its judgment on these claims, but on the merits decided against them and denied a writ of mandamus. Urging that such denial was in derogation of their rights under the Federal Constitution, the legislators, having been granted certiorari to review the Kansas judgment, 303 U.S. 632, ask this Court to reverse it.

Our power to do so is explicitly challenged by the United States as amicus curiae, but would in any event have to be faced. See Mansfield, C. & L. M. Ry. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 382. To whom and for what causes the courts of Kansas are open are matters for Kansas to determine.[3] But Kansas can not define the contours of the authority of the federal courts, and more particularly of this Court. It is our ultimate responsibility to determine who may invoke our judgment and under what circumstances. Are these members of the Kansas legislature, therefore, entitled to ask us to adjudicate the grievances of which they complain?

It is not our function, and it is beyond our power, to write legal essays or to give legal opinions, however solemnly requested and however great the national emergency. See the correspondence between Secretary of State Jefferson and Chief Justice Jay, 3 Johnson, Correspondence and Public Papers of John Jay, 486–89. Unlike the role allowed to judges in a few state courts and

---

[1] For an early instance of the abstention of the King's Justices from matters political, see the Duke of York's Claim to the Crown, House of Lords, 1460, 5 Rot. Parl. 375, reprinted in Wambaugh, Cases on Constitutional Law, 1.

[2] See e. g. the opinion of Mr. Justice Iredell in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, 429; concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Johnson in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 143; and the cases collected in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U.S. 288, 341.

[3] This is subject to some narrow exceptions not here relevant. See, e. g., McKnett v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., 292 U.S. 230.

to the Supreme Court of Canada, our exclusive business is litigation.[4] The requisites of litigation are not satisfied when questions of constitutionality though conveyed through the outward forms of a conventional court proceeding do not bear special relation to a particular litigant. The scope and consequences of our doctrine of judicial review over executive and legislative action should make us observe fastidiously the bounds of the litigious process within which we are confined.[5] No matter how seriously infringement of the Constitution may be called into question, this is not the tribunal for its challenge except by those who have some specialized interest of their own to vindicate, apart from a political concern which belongs to all. Stearns v. Wood, 236 U.S. 75; Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126.

In the familiar language of jurisdiction, these Kansas legislators must have standing in this Court. What is their distinctive claim to be here, not possessed by every Kansan? What is it that they complain of, which could not be complained of here by all their fellow citizens? The answer requires analysis of the grievances which they urge.

They say that it was beyond the power of the Kansas legislature, no matter who voted or how, to ratify the Child Labor Amendment because for Kansas there was no Child Labor Amendment to ratify. Assuming that an amendment proposed by the Congress dies of inanition after what is to be deemed a "reasonable" time, they claim that, having been submitted in 1924, the proposed Child Labor Amendment was no longer alive in 1937. Or, if alive, it was no longer so for Kansas because, by a prior resolution of rejection in 1925, Kansas had exhausted her power. In no respect, however, do these objections relate to any secular interest that pertains to these Kansas legislators apart from interests that belong to the entire commonalty of Kansas. The fact that these legislators are part of the ratifying mechanism while the ordinary citizen of Kansas is not, is wholly irrelevant to this issue. On this aspect of the case the problem would be exactly the same if all but one legislator had voted for ratification.

Indeed the claim that the Amendment was dead or that it was no longer open to Kansas to ratify, is not only not an interest which belongs uniquely to these Kansas legislators; it is not even an interest special to Kansas. For it is the common concern of every citizen of the United States whether the Amendment is still alive, or whether Kansas could be included among the necessary "three-fourths of the several States."

These legislators have no more standing on these claims of unconstitutionality to attack "Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 3" than they would have standing here to attack some Kansas statute claimed by them to offend the Commerce Clause. By as much right could a member of the Congress who had voted against the passage of a bill because moved by constitutional scruples urge before this Court our duty to consider his arguments of unconstitutionality.

---

[4] As to advisory opinions in use in a few of the state courts, see J. B. Thayer, Advisory Opinions, reprinted in Legal Essays by J. B. Thayer, at 42 et seq.; article on "Advisory Opinions," 1 Enc. Soc. Sci. 475. As to advisory opinions in Canada, see Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada [1912] A. C. 571. Speaking of the Canadian system, Lord Chancellor Haldane, in Attorney General for British Columbia v. Attorney General for Canada [1914] A. C. 153, 162, said: "It is at times attended with inconveniences, and it is not surprising that the Supreme Court of the United States should have steadily refused to adopt a similar procedure, and should have confined itself to adjudication on the legal rights of litigants in actual controversies." For further animadversions on advisory pronouncements by judges, see Lord Chancellor Sankey in In re The Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada [1932] A. C. 54, 66: "We sympathise with the view expressed at length by Newcombe, J., which was concurred in by the Chief Justice, [of Canada] as to the difficulty which the Court must experience in endeavoring to answer questions put to it in this way."

Australia followed our Constitutional practice in restricting her courts to litigious business. The experience of English history which lay behind it was thus put in the Australian Constitutional Convention by Mr. (later Mr. Justice) Higgins: "I feel strongly that it is most inexpedient to break in on the established practice of the English law, and secure decisions on facts which have not arisen yet. Of course, it is a matter that lawyers have experience of every day, that a judge does not give the same attention, he can not give that same attention, to a suppositious case as when he feels the pressure of the consequences to a litigant before him. . . . But here is an attempt to allow this High Court, before cases have arisen, to make a pronouncement upon the law that will be binding. I think the imagination of judges, like that of other persons, is limited, and they are not able to put before their minds all the complex circumstances which may arise and which they ought to have in their minds when giving a decision. If there is one thing more than another which is recognized in British jurisprudence it is that a judge never gives a decision until the facts necessary for that decision have arisen." Rep. Nat. Austral. Conv. Deb. (1897) 966–67.

[5] See the series of cases beginning with Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409, through United States v. West Virginia, 295 U.S. 463.

Clearly a Kansan legislator would have no standing had he brought suit in a federal court. Can the Kansas Supreme Court transmute the general interest in these constitutional claims into the individualized legal interest indispensable here? No doubt the bounds of such legal interest have a penumbra which gives some freedom in judging fulfilment of our jurisdictional requirements. The doctrines affecting standing to sue in the federal courts will not be treated as mechanical yardsticks in assessing state court ascertainments of legal interest brought here for review. For the creation of a vast domain of legal interests is in the keeping of the states, and from time to time state courts and legislators give legal protection to new individual interests. Thus, while the ordinary state taxpayer's suit is not recognized in the federal courts, it affords adequate standing for review of state decisions when so recognized by state courts. Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559; Heim v. McCall, 239 U.S. 175.

But it by no means follows that a state court ruling on the adequacy of legal interest is binding here. Thus, in Tyler v. Judges, 179 U.S. 405, the notion was rejected that merely because the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts found an interest of sufficient legal significance for assailing a statute, this Court must consider such claim. Again, this Court has consistently held that the interest of a state official in vindicating the Constitution of the United States gives him no legal standing here to attack the constitutionality of a state statute in order to avoid compliance with it. Smith v. Indiana, 191 U.S. 138; Braxon County Court v. West Virginia, 208 U.S. 192; Marshall v. Dye, 231 U.S. 250; Stewart v. Kansas City, 239 U.S. 14. Nor can recognition by a state court of such an undifferentiated, general interest confer jurisdiction on us. Columbus & Greenville Ry Co. v. Miller, 283 U.S. 96, reversing Miller v. Columbus & Greenville Ry., 154 Miss. 317; 122 So. 366. Contrariwise, of course, an official has a legally recognized duty to enforce a statute which he is charged with enforcing. And so, an official who is obstructed in the performance of his duty under a state statute because his state court found a violation of the United States Constitution may, since the Act of December 23, 1914, 38 Stat. 790, ask this Court to remove the fetters against enforcement of his duty imposed by the state court because of an asserted misconception of the Constitution. Such a situation is represented by Blodgett v. Silberman, 277 U.S. 1, and satisfied the requirement of legal interest in Boynton v. Hutcheson, 291 U.S. 656, certiorari dismissed on another ground in 292 U.S. 601.[*]

---

[*] A quick summary of the jurisdiction of this Court over state court decisions leaves no room for doubt that the fact that the present case is here on certiorari is wholly irrelevant to our assumption of jurisdiction. Section 25 of the First Judiciary Act gave reviewing power to this Court only over state court decisions denying a claim of federal right. This restriction was, of course, born of fear of disobedience by the state judiciaries of national authority. The Act of September 6, 1916, 39 Stat. 726, withdrew from this obligatory jurisdiction cases where the state decision was against a "title, right, privilege, or immunity" claimed to exist under the Constitution, laws, treaties or authorities of the United States. This change, which was inspired mainly by a desire to eliminate from review as of right cases arising under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, left such review only in cases where the validity of a treaty, statute or authority of the United States was drawn into question and the decision was against the validity, and in cases where the validity of a statute of a state or a state authority was drawn into question on the grounds of conflict with federal law and the decision was in favor of its validity. The Act of February 13, 1925, 43 Stat. 936, 937, extended this process of restricting our obligatory jurisdiction by transferring to review by certiorari cases in which the state court had held invalid an "authority," claimed to be exercised under the laws of the United States or in which it had upheld, against claims of invalidity on federal grounds, an "authority" exercised under the laws of the states. Neither the terms of these two restrictions nor the controlling comments in committee reports or by members of this Court who had a special share in promoting the Acts of 1916 and 1925, give any support for believing that by contracting the range of obligatory jurisdiction over state adjudications Congress enlarged the jurisdiction of the Court by removing the established requirement of legal interest as a threshold condition to being here.

Nor does the Act of December 23, 1914, 38 Stat. 790, touch the present problem. By that Act, Congress for the first time gave this Court power to review state court decisions sustaining a federal right. For this purpose it made certiorari available. The Committee reports and the debates on this Act prove that its purpose was merely to remove the unilateral quality of Supreme Court review of state court decisions on constitutional questions as to which this Court has the ultimate say. The Act did not create a new legal interest as a basis of review here; it built on the settled doctrine that an official has a legally recognizable duty to carry out a statute which he is supposed to enforce.

Thus, prior to the Act of 1914, the Kentucky case, post, p. 474, could not have come here at all, and prior to 1916, the Kansas case would have come here, if at all, by writ of error. By allowing cases from state courts which previously could not have come here at all to come here on certiorari the Act of 1914 merely lifted the previous bar—that a federal claim had been sustained—but left every other requisite of jurisdiction unchanged. Similarly, no change in these requisites was affected by the Acts of 1916 and 1925 in confining certain categories of litigation from the state courts to our discretionary instead of obligatory reviewing power.

We can only adjudicate an issue as to which there is a claimant before us who has a special, individualized stake on it. One who is merely the self-constituted spokesman of a constitutional point of view can not ask us to pass on it. The Kansas legislators could not bring suit explicitly on behalf of the people of the United States to determine whether Kansas could still vote for the Child Labor Amendment. They can not gain standing here by having brought such a suit in their own names. Therefore, none of the petitioners can here raise questions concerning the power of the Kansas legislature to ratify the Amendment.

This disposes of the standing of the three members of the lower house who seek to invoke the jurisdiction of this Court. They have no standing here. Equally without litigious standing is the member of the Kansas Senate who voted for "Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 3." He cannot claim that his vote was denied any parliamentary efficacy to which it was entitled. There remains for consideration only the claim of the twenty nay-voting senators that the Lieutenant-Governor of Kansas, the presiding officer of its Senate, had, under the Kansas Constitution, no power to break the tie in the senatorial vote on the Amendment, thereby depriving their votes of the effect of creating such a tie. Whether this is the tribunal before which such a question can be raised by these senators must be determined even before considering whether the issue which they pose is justiciable. For the latter involves questions affecting the distribution of constitutional power which should be postponed to preliminary questions of legal standing to sue.

The right of the Kansas senators to be here is rested on recognition by Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, of a voter's right to protect his franchise. The historic source of this doctrine and the reasons for it were explained in Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U.S. 536, 540. That was an action for $5,000 damages against the Judges of Elections for refusing to permit the plaintiff to vote at a primary election in Texas. In disposing of the objection that the plaintiff had no cause of action because the subject matter of the suit was political, Mr. Justice Holmes thus spoke for the Court: "Of course the petition concerns political action but it alleges and seeks to recover for private damage. That private damage may be caused by such political action and may be recovered for in a suit at law hardly has been doubted for over two hundred years, since Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 3 id. 320, and has been recognized by this Court." "Private damage" is the clue to the famous ruling in Ashby v. White, supra, and determines its scope as well as that of cases in this Court of which it is the justification. The judgment of Lord Holt is permeated with the conception that a voter's franchise is a personal right, assessable in money damages, of which the exact amount "is peculiarly appropriate for the determination of a jury," see Wiley v. Sinkler, 179 U.S. 58, 65, and for which there is no remedy outside the law courts. "Although this matter relates to the parliament," said Lord Holt, "yet it is an injury precedaneous to the parliament, as my Lord Hale said in the case of Bernardiston v. Soame, 2 Lev. 114, 116. The parliament cannot judge of this injury, nor give damage to the plaintiff for it: they cannot make him a recompense." 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 958.

The reasoning of Ashby v. White and the practice which has followed it leave intra-parliamentary controversies to parliaments and outside the scrutiny of law courts. The procedures for voting in legislative assemblies—who are members, how and when they should vote, what is the requisite number of votes for different phases of legislative activity, what votes were cast and how they were counted—surely are matters that not merely concern political action but are of the very essence of political action, if "political" has any connotation at all. Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 670, et seq.; Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137. In no sense are they matters of "private damage." They pertain to legislators not as individuals but as political representatives executing the legislative process. To open the law courts to such controversies is to have courts sit in judgment on the manifold disputes engendered by procedures for voting in legislative assemblies. If the doctrine of Ashby v. White vindicating the private rights of a voting citizen has not been doubted for over two hundred years, it is equally significant that for over two hundred years Ashby v. White has not been sought to be put to purposes like the present. In seeking redress here these Kansas senators have wholly misconceived the functions of this Court. The writ of ceriorari to the Kansas Suprme Court should therefore be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER, dissenting.

The Child Labor Amendment was proposed in 1924; more than 13 years elapsed before the Kansas legislature voted, as the decision just announced holds, to ratify it. Petitioners insist that more than a reasonable time had elapsed and that, therefore, the action of the state legislature is without force. But this Court now holds that the question is not justiciable, relegates it to the "consideration of the Congress when, in the presence of certified ratifications by three-fourths of the States the time arrives for the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment" and declares that the decision by Congress would not be subject to review by the courts.

In Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U. S. 368, one imprisoned for transportation of intoxicating liquor in violation of § 3 of the National Prohibition Act, instituted habeas corpus proceedings to obtain the release on the ground that the Eighteenth Amendment was invalid because the resolution proposing it declared that it should not be operative unless ratified within seven years. The Amendment was ratified in less than a year and a half. We definitely held that Article V impliedly requires amendments submitted to be ratified within a reasonable time after proposal; that Congress may fix a reasonable time for ratification, and that the period of seven years fixed by the Congress was reasonable.

We said:

"It will be seen that this article says nothing about the time within which ratification may be had—neither that it shall be unlimited nor that it shall be fixed by Congress. What, then, is the reasonable inference or implication? Is it that ratification may be had at any time as within a few years, a century or even a longer period; or that it must be had within some reasonable period which Congress is left free to define?

"We do not find anything in the Article which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the States may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective. We do find that which strongly suggests the contrary. First, proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts, but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, it is only when there is deemed to be a necessity therefore that amendments are to be proposed, the reasonable implication being that when proposed, they are to be considered and disposed of presently. Thirdly, as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do. These considerations and the general purport and spirit of the Article lead to the conclusion expressed by Judge Jameson [in his Constitutional Conventions, 4th ed. § 585] that an alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed by Congress.' That this is the better conclusion becomes even more manifest when what is comprehended in the other view is considered; for according to it, four amendments proposed long ago—two in 1789, one in 1810, and one in 1861—are still pending and in a situation where their ratification in some of the States many years since by representatives of generations now largely forgotten may be effectively supplemented in enough more States to make three-fourths by representatives of the present or some future generation. To that view few would be able to subscribe, and in our opinion it is quite untenable. We conclude that the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after the proposal.

"Of the power of Congress, keeping within reasonable limits, to fix a definite period for the ratification we entertain no doubt. . . . Whether a definite period for ratification shall be fixed so that all may know what it is and speculation on what is a reasonable time may be avoided, is in our opinion, a matter of detail which Congress may determine as an incident of its power to designate the mode of ratification. It is not questioned that seven years, the period fixed in this instance, was reasonable, if power existed to fix a definite time; nor could it well be questioned considering the periods within which prior amendments were ratified."

Upon the reasoning of our opinion in that case, I would hold that more than a reasonable time had elapsed* and that the judgment of the Kansas supreme court should be reversed.

The point that the question—whether more than a reasonable time had elapsed—is not justifiable but one for Congress after attempted ratification by the requisite number of States, was not raised by the parties or by the United States appearing as amicus curiae; it was not suggested by us when ordering reargument. As the Court, in the Dillon case, did directly decide upon the reasonableness of the seven years fixed by the Congress, it ought not now, without hearing argument upon the point, hold itself to lack power to decide whether more than 13 years between proposal by Congress and attempted ratification by Kansas is reasonable.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS joins in this opinion.

[From the Congressional Record, April 19, 1967]

VALIDITY OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PETITIONS REGARDING REAPPORTIONMENT

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, several weeks ago the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] and I called attention, on the floor of the Senate, to the clear possibility that we are approaching another chapter in the battle against malapportioned State legislatures. We noted that 32 State legislatures had, at that time, apparently petitioned Congress to call a convention to propose specific amendments to the Constitution dealing with legislative apportionment.

If two more State legislatures petition Congress for a convention dealing with any aspect of legislative apportionment, I expect that the same forces which were defeated twice during the 89th Congress in their attempts to authorize legislative malapportionment will rush back to the floor of the Senate demanding that Congress immediately call a constitutional convention. Their arguments, no doubt, will be deceptively simple. They will cite article V of the Constitution:

"The Congress . . . on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments."

They will contend that 34 valid petitions had been received, and that Congress must immediately call a convention.

---

*CHRONOLOGY OF CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT

[A State is said to have "rejected" when both Houses of its legislature passed resolutions of rejection, and to have "refused to ratify" when both Houses defeated resolution for ratification.]

June 2, 1924, Joint Resolution deposited in State Department. In that year, Arkansas ratified; North Carolina rejected. Ratification, 1; rejection, 1.

1925, Arizona, California and Wisconsin ratified; Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, and Vermont rejected; Connecticut, Delaware and South Dakota refused to ratify. Ratification, 4; rejections, 16; refusals to ratify, 3.

1926, Kentucky and Virginia rejected. Ratifications, 4; rejections, 18; refusals to ratify, 3.

1927, Montana, ratified; Maryland rejected. Ratifications, 6; rejections, 19; refusals to ratify, 3.

1931, Colorado ratified. Ratifications, 6; rejections, 19; refusals to ratify, 3.

1933, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Washington and West Virginia ratified as did also Maine, Minnesota, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania, which had rejected in 1925. Ratifications, 20; rejections, (eliminating States subsequently ratifying) 15; refusals to ratify, 3.

1935, Idaho and Wyoming ratified, as did Utah and Indiana, which had rejected in 1925. As in 1925, Connecticut refused to ratify. Ratifications, 24; rejections, 13; refusals to ratify, 3.

1936, Kentucky, which had rejected in 1926, ratified. Ratifications, 25; rejections, 12; refusals to ratify, 3.

1937, Nevada and New Mexico ratified, as did Kansas, which had rejected in 1925. Massachusetts, which had rejected in 1925, refused to ratify. Ratifications, 28; rejections, 11; refusals to ratify, 3.

Six States are not included in this list: Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Nebraska, New York and Rhode Island. It appears that there has never been a vote in Alabama or Rhode Island. Louisiana house of representatives has three times (1924, 1934 and 1936) defeated resolutions for ratification. In Mississippi, the Senate adopted resolution for ratification in 1934, but in 1936 another Senate resolution for ratification was adversely reported. In Nebraska, the House defeated ratification resolutions in 1927 and 1935, but the Senate passed such a resolution in 1929. In New York, ratification was defeated in the House in 1935 and 1937, and in the latter year, the Senate passed such a resolution.

Mr. President, we in Congress must be prepared for this new assault on the principle of one-man, one-vote. These latest tactics present gravely disturbing questions which have potential impact far beyond the apportionment issue itself. I should like to explore these questions today—before any resolution is before us in Congress—so that we might calmly examine the merits of the possible demands for a convention before the proponents attempt to stampede us into convening an ill-considered constitutional convention.

I wish to discuss two questions today. These are not the only questions regarding the validity or meaning of the petitions now before Congress, but I believe these questions have particular importance. The first question I wish to discuss today is, Should Congress regard as invalid petitions from malapportioned legislatures calling for a constitutional amendment to authorize malapportionment? In my judgment, the answer is "Yes." Both the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin and I took this position on the Senate floor several weeks ago. Today I shall spell out in somewhat greater detail my justification for this position.

I begin with the premise that a malapportioned State legislature abridges the fundamental rights of citizens living in more populous, under-represented districts. As the Supreme Court stated, in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 567 (1964):

"To the extent that a citizen's right to vote is debased, he is that much less a citizen."

Malapportioned legislatures brought a vast number of political injustices to citizens in under-represented districts, both through legislation favoring over-represented interests and through failing to enact legislation on behalf of under-represented interests. But these injustices cannot, as a practical matter be erased by a stroke of the pen—either in the courts, or in Congress. As a Federal court of appeals has stated, to rule invalid all legislative acts—or even those acts which appeared to favor over-represented interests—passed by malapportioned legislatures "would produce chaos." Ryan v. Tinsley, 316 F. 2d 430, 432 (11th Cir. 1963). Moreover, it is not necessary to resort to this extreme step. The many injustices of malapportionment can, I believe, in most cases be substantially corrected simply by election of new State legislatures under constitutionally sanctioned apportionment.

In certain circumstances, however, malapportioned legislatures can take action which flagrantly violates the citizens' right to equal representation and which even after reapportionment cannot readily be corrected. The courts have recognized this problem, and have acted to protect the rights of State citizens to equal representation by forbidding such action by malapportioned legislatures.

A Georgia case illustrates this. In Toombs against Fortson, a three-judge Federal court enjoined the Georgia General Assembly from calling a constitutional convention to revise the State constitution "until the general assembly is reapportioned in accordance with constitutional standards." In its order, the court stated:

"We do not feel that it would be proper to permit such new constitution as may be proposed to be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection when it is, as is the case here, proposed under conditions of doubtful legality by a malapportioned legislative body. (Order dated June 24, 1964, Civil Action No. 7883.)"

As this order was being appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, a new election was held in Georgia. The Supreme Court remanded the case for a determination whether, in view of the new elections, the order was still necessary. (379 U.S. 621 (1965).) As Mr. Justice Harlan pointed out in his dissenting opinion, this disposition clearly indicated that the lower court could properly issue the injunction.

Action by a malapportioned legislature to undermine the constitutional principle of one-man, one-vote is, of course, the most direct and flagrant abridgement of this constitutional right. Every first year law student knows the basic principle of equity that a claimant "must come into court with clean hands" before the court will hear his claim. In my judgment, no illegally apportioned legislature has "clean hands" in calling for a constitutional convention to legitimize its own illegality. A malapportioned legislature may be competent, pending its reapportionment, to pass legislation generally. But such a legislature has no competence to initiate amendments to the Constitution to make legal its own illegality. A three-judge Federal court in Utah has clearly recognized this principle. In Petuskey v. Rampton, 234 F. Supp. 365, 373 (1965), the Court stated:

"Well-known general principles of equity require that the [malapportioned] legislature not consider or vote upon any proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States on the subject of legislative reapportionment."

Accordingly, Congress should refuse to accept from a malapportioned legislature "any proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States on the subject of legislative reapportionment."

The Petuskey case reveals the strategy followed by proponents of a constitutional convention for adoption of a malapportionment amendment and provides an additional argument for holding convention petitions invalid. In 1964, the court observed the following, regarding the State legislature:

"We note here the somewhat widespread public statements of some persons who are, or may be, charged with the responsibility of law-making that reapportionment is a subject upon which they are 'willing to drag their feet' or to 'await potential changes in the federal law or Constitution.'"

A year later, when the State legislature remained malapportioned, the court stated:

"For a very long period of time all efforts to obtain a constitutionally apportioned legislature in this State have been frustrated."

The court then observed, in a footnote:

"It is interesting to note the speed by which the last State legislature memorialized Congress to call a constitutional convention to provide for reapportionment 'on factors other than population' . . . compared to the Legislature's hesitancy to properly reapportion under the mandate of this court."

This pattern of hostility to court orders for reapportionment, attempts to delay implementation of those orders, and feverish activity to force a constitutional amendment legitimizing malapportionment was repeated in other State legislatures across the country, including my own. Of the 29 State legislatures which have petitioned for a convention to propose a constitutional amendment to authorize apportionment on "factors other than population," 23 were unconstitutionally apportioned at the time the petition was approved; 13 of those 23 legislatures were under court orders to reapportion, and litigation was pending in the other 10. Moreover, 24 of these 29 petitions were passed in the same year, 1965, in legislative sessions immediately following the Supreme Court's decision in Reynolds against Sims which elucidated the one-man, one-vote principle. These petitions were passed in haste, without the measured deliberativeness which should accompany the weighty responsibility of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

We must not forget that, although the reapportionment decisions were welcomed by the great majority of citizens in this country, those decisions were most unpopular among the defeated litigants—the malapportioned State legislatures themselves. These defeated litigants had many reasons to resent and to oppose the reapportionment orders. For many rural legislators, the orders meant that they would lose their jobs. For many who might expect to be reelected in a constitutionally apportioned legislature, reapportionment nevertheless meant the disappearance of the old coalitions of overrepresented interests which give them effective power. In addition, many court orders required special sessions of State legislatures to adopt reapportionment plans. As we in this Chamber know, special sessions are not particularly popular among legislatures. Petitions to legitimize malapportionment which were approved under these circumstances were, in truth, little more than sullen gestures of annoyance, and defiance. These petitions were passed without the calm, unhurried exploration of merits and demerits which should properly accompany the proposal of a convention to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Because of the circumstances in which most of these petitions were approved, I believe that the Congress should disregard them. Because most of these petitions were approved by unconstitutionally apportioned legislatures, in flagrant disregard of the rights of all citizens within the States for equal representation, I believe that the Congress must disregard them.

There is an additional, compelling reason that Congress should disregard petitions submitted by malapportioned legislatures. In judging the validity of petitions for constitutional convention, submitted by State legislatures under article V, Congress clearly has the authority to rule out petitions on the ground that circumstances which led to their submission have materially changed. This authority is precisely analogous to Congress power, upheld by the Supreme Court, to disregard the ratification by the Kansas Legislature of a constitutional amendment—dealing with child labor laws—after circumstances which had led to the proposal of the amendment had materially changed. Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, speaking for the Court in Coleman v. Miller (307 U.S. 433, 453 (1939)) stated:

"When a proposed amendment springs from a conception of economic needs, it would be necessary to consider the economic conditions prevailing in the country, [and] whether these had so far changed since the submission as to make the proposal no longer responsive to the conception which inspired it . . . This question can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment."

I submit Mr. President, that the reapportionment of State legislatures which had submitted petitions to avoid such reapportionment is a political and social condition which has "so far changed since the submission—of the petitions—as to make the proposal no longer responsive to the conception which inspired it." These petitions must be disregarded because the State legislatures which approved them no longer exist. Of the 23 malapportioned legislatures which approved "factors other than population" petitions, 19 are now constitutionally apportioned and elections under the new apportionment have been held. In two other States, elections are soon to be held. If a convention to change the present constitutional principles of apportionment is to be proposed by any of these states, the reapportioned legislatures shall consider the question.

The decision of the Supreme Court in Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368 (1921) is also directly in point. In that case, which upheld Congress' power to place a specific limit on the time permitted for State legislatures to ratify the 18th amendment, the Court stated at p. 375—

"An alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of today, and . . . , if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed by Congress."

In that case, the time limit was 7 years. Here most State legislatures have petitioned Congress within the past 2 or 3 years. But the principle still applies to invalidate these petitions. It is not the lapse of time, but rather the lapse of the malapportioned legislatures themselves which clearly indicated that the same "sentiment" in the newly apportioned legislatures may not "fairly be supposed to exist." These petitions, therefore, "ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed" by a constitutionally apportioned State legislature.

Based on the considerations I have discussed, which in my view demonstrate the manifest invalidity of petitions dealing with reapportionment submitted by malapportioned legislatures, at the present time the Congress has before it only six valid petitions from State legislatures for a convention to propose an amendment authorizing apportionment on factors other than population and no valid petitions whatsoever for a convention to propose an amendment depriving Federal courts of jurisdiction regarding legislative apportionment. Thirty-four valid petitions—two-thirds of the several States—are, of course, required before Congress must consider calling a convention. At the present time, we are a long way from that number.

Mr. President, the second question I want to discuss today is—even assuming the validity of all 32 of the pending petitions dealing with legislative apportionment, must the Congress call a constitutional convention if two more States submit petitions on this subject? In my judgment, the answer to this question is "No." It appears that if two more legislatures act, 34 of the State legislatures at some time will have called for conventions dealing in some manner with legislative apportionment. But the convention calls now before the Congress differ in crucial respects. Twenty-nine of those petitions call for a convention to propose a specific amendment—detailed in the petitions—to permit one house of a State legislature to be apportioned on the basis of "factors other than population." Three of those petitions call for another fundamentally different amendment, one which would deprive the Federal courts of any jurisdiction regarding apportionment of State legislatures. I do not think the Congress would be justified in considering these two different types of petitions as calling for the same constitutional convention.

It is not correct to assert that all 32 State legislatures which have thus far submitted petitions want a constitutional convention dealing generally with the subject of legislative apportionment. The State legislatures have not said this. Some have called for a convention to propose one specific amendment; others want a convention to propose another specific amendment. I do not think we can assume that a legislature which called for an amendment to keep the courts out of apportionment cases would be just as happy to have an amendment which keeps the courts in those cases, but alters the apportionment standards applied by the courts.

Even more importantly, the question whether Congress could place any limitation on the powers of a constitutional convention would be dangerously complicated if Congress were to lump together two different kinds of calls for conventions. The most troublesome unanswered question in article V of the Constitution is whether Congress can limit the powers of a convention called to propose amendments. I believe that the Congress, if it calls a constitutional convention in response to the present petitions, must narrowly and clearly circumscribe the powers of that convention to insure that the whole fabric of our framework of government is not brought into issue. Unless the Congress can call a convention with powers strictly limited to those specifically requested by two-thirds of the State legislatures, then I believe the convention could too easily view its power as unlimited, and could too easily justify ignoring Congress express limitations.

There is little precedent to guide us on the question whether Congress can limit the power of article V constitutional conventions since none has been called since the first convention which drafted the Constitution itself. Every other amendment to our Constitution, including the cherished Bill of Rights, has been first deliberated and approved in the Congress before being proposed to the States for ratification. The proponents of the malapportionment amendments have resorted to attempting a constitutional convention because the Congress deliberated on the proposed amendments, saw the clear dangers in them, and rejected them.

The Congress, in deliberating on those amendments, also saw quite clearly certain forces which, behind the scenes, were among the most ardent advocates for malapportionment—the far right-wing, anti-civil rights, and special interest big business groups which have for years controlled the rotten borough legislatures for their own profits and the public's loss. There is danger, I think, that those groups would attempt to dominate a constitutional convention called to consider malapportionment amendments. And I shudder at the prospect that a constitutional convention, thus dominated, would be free to reopen every sentence and paragraph of the U.S. Constitution.

The reasons for the uncertainty in article V regarding whether Congress can limit the powers of a constitutional convention arise from the history which preceded the calling of the first Constitutional Convention, and the debates at the Convention itself regarding article V. After 1780, the weaknesses of the Articles of Confederation as an instrument of government quickly became apparent—in particular, the lack of authority in the central government to raise revenue, to regulate interstate commerce, or to exercise general coercive powers to enforce its laws. Moreover, the veto power which the Articles placed in any single State made amendment impossible. By the end of 1786, all States but Rhode Island had petitioned the Congress to call a convention to re-examine generally the structure of Government established by the Articles. The Congress in February 1787, refused to issue such a general convention call, but called a convention for the "sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation" and reporting back to the Congress—Pritchett, "The American Constitution," page 14. 1959. The Constitutional Convention which met in May 1787, ignored this limitation and considered itself, as the Preamble to the Constitution indicates to speak for "we the people of the United States."

In the convention debates on article V, there is some evidence that constitutional conventions provided for by that article, could also ignore the limitations placed on it by Congress and instead purport to speak for "the people." The first draft of the constitutional provision dealing with the amending power stated that, when two-thirds of the State legislatures applied for an amendment, the Congress "shall call a convention for that purpose." Madison's notes of the Convention record that he was disturbed by this provision. "How," he asked, "was a convention to be formed? by what rule decide? What the force of its acts?"—2 Farrand, "The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787," at 558. Madison moved successfully for reconsideration of the provision.

The second draft gave the Congress exclusive power to propose constitutional amendments, with no provision for conventions. Colonel Mason, of Virginia, opposed vesting exclusive power to propose amendments in the Congress. Mason's marginal notes on his copy of the draft of the Constitution provide his reasoning:

"By this article, Congress only [would] have the power of proposing amendments at any future time to this constitution and should it ever prove so oppressive, the whole people of America can't make or even propose alterations to it: a doctrine utterly subversive of the fundamental principles of the rights and liberties of the people. (2 Farrand, op. cit., at 629 n. 8)"

Mason stated these objections, and Madison reiterated his concerns about the form of such conventions and his preference for clearly leaving the function of proposing amendments with the Congress. Madison was, however, willing to have Congress "bound to propose amendments applied for by two-thirds of the States" —2 Farrand, op. cit. at 629–30. From this debate, the draft of article V was changed to its present form so that either the Congress or a convention called by Congress, on application of the States, could propose constitutional amendments.

Article V thus appears to be a compromise between Mason's view, that a convention must be free to speak for "the whole people of America" and bypass the Congress altogether in the amending process, and Madison's view that the Congress should retain a clear role in proposing amendments. On the basis of this constitutional history, however, the question whether Congress could validly restrict the powers of a constitutional convention is not free from doubt. I might note that the distinguished minority leader, Senator DIRKSEN, has expressed similar views. The Chicago Tribune of Monday, March 27, 1965, reported that in an address 2 years ago to the National Grange, Senator DIRKSEN made the following remarks:

"There can be and is a genuine fear of a constitutional convention on the part of many thoughtful people who urgently are working toward enactment of a constitutional amendment. The fear is simple. There has never been a constitutional convention since these United States became a nation. There is strong legal opinion that once the states have mandated a convention, the courts nor the executive can control it, guide it, or establish the matters with which it would deal. A constitutional convention, many sincere people believe, would, once unlocked, spread in every direction."

I think all of us in the Congress would readily agree—no matter what our views on the apportionment issue—that the Constitution as a whole, and our framework of government under it, should not be freely tampered with by a constitutional convention called by this Congress. As I have stated, there are grave doubts that Congress could validly limit a convention called under article V. But if there is ever a remote possibility that a convention could be limited, Congress would justify imposing a limitation only if it counts together, for purposes of aggregating the necessary two-thirds, petitions from State legislatures which request conventions for exactly—to the letter—the same purposes. At the present time, Congress has received no more than 29 petitions calling for a convention dealing with the same specific aspect of the reapportionment issue. We must therefore conclude that, even assuming the validity of these 29 petitions, at least five more State legislatures must petition the Congress before any issue regarding a convention call is properly before us.

[From the Congressional Record, Apr. 19, 1967]

VALIDITY OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PETITIONS REGARDING REAPPORTIONMENT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on June 15, 1964, when the Supreme Court in its decision in the case of Reynolds against Sims handed down what has become quite a celebrated one-man, one-vote decision, I took immediate exception, and in January of 1965. I introduced the first resolution for a constitutional amendment to preserve in the States the right to determine their own destinies, as far as their legislatures were concerned. I was in pretty good company because over a period of time no less a person than Justice Frankfurter took the position that that was a legal thicket, or a political thicket, into which the Court should not venture.

Mr. President, once more I wish to reemphasize what the primary issue is. It is not one-man, one-vote, as such. It is the right of a State legislature to determine the complexion of at least one of its branches on a basis other than population. That basis can be geography; it can be economic interest; it can be one of a dozen things; but it does preserve in the States the right to make that self-determination.

I am afraid those fearsome persons in this body, who so freely express their fears, evidently have no trust in the people. That is another issue. I trust the people. We trust the people who send us here. I know of no good reason why we should not trust them to exercise a very clearly defined constitutional power, which is lodged in them by virtue of article V of the Constitution.

I call attention to the fact that when we were under the Articles of Confederation, there was a provision in article 13 to the effect that those Articles of Confederation could not be amended unless every State—every State, Mr. President—approvingly ratified the amendment. The result was a stalemate in our Government. Rhode Island blocked a very important amendment all by its little lonesome self. Others have blocked amendments that were deemed to be quite necessary for the functioning of those articles.

The framers of the Constitution saw that difficulty when the first call went out. Interestingly enough, Mr. President, the call did not go out to gather in Annapolis or Philadelphia for the purpose of framing a constitution. The call indicated that they were going to revise the Articles of Confederation.

There were timid souls then, who said, "Oh, don't touch this holy document." Why, there had been people in those days who said, "Don't get into difficulty with King George and his Ministers. Let things stand as they are."

Of course, the law of life is either to change or decay, and change is eternal. That is one thing in this universe you can bet on, and bet everything you have, because change is eternal.

Now, they finally fabricated the Constitution, but that Constitution had to be sold to the people. The three great salesmen were John Jay, James Madison, and Alexander Hamilton. Of all the papers that were written to sell that document to the people, those written by Alexander Hamilton were by far the most prolific.

There are 85 papers or articles in the Federalist Papers, and Hamilton wrote 51 of the 85. In No. 85 he dealt with the question of amending the Constitution of the United States. He did it in a very forthright fashion. Hamilton was aware that things are not static, and that there come times when the people may want to have their Constitution amended, for after all, this is a government of the people.

The Constitution, in the Preamble, recites:

"We the people of the United States, * * * do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Today timid voices are raised, "Oh, don't touch the Constitution." We have heard that before and it has been amended more than a score of times to indicate that it cannot remain static when the need arises.

When I introduced that joint resolution for a constitutional proposal to take care of this decision by the Supreme Court and leave the complexion of at least one branch of the legislature in the hands of the people of the State, we foresaw at that time the difficulties that were going to arise. I mentioned it in this Chamber at the time when I warned the Senate: Watch out, because this is dynamite. It is proving now to be dynamite. Much of the argument that has been made is quite irrelevant to the issue. I pointed out at that time that every elective body might be subject to the one-man, one-vote principle.

Yesterday that question arose in the Supreme Court, because I have here an article entitled "High Court Ponders One-Vote Issue." What is involved? There is involved a city council, a park district, a county board, and particularly, the Houston County Board of Revenue and Control in Alabama.

In the course of the argument before the Court, one of the attorneys gave his opinion that about 20,000 of the Nation's 90,000 local bodies would be affected.

Let me just recite the last paragraph and then I shall insert the entire article in the Record.

"But Truman Hobbs, lawyer for the Houston County board, insisted that most of the board's work was administering 1000 miles of rural roads. He said the city 'couldn't care less' about county roads and rural residents would suffer if the city dominated the county board."

That could apply, they say, to some 20,000 communities. It is no surprise that the Honorable Thurgood Marshall, the Solicitor for the Department of Justice, went before that court in March and filed his memorandum his notice that the Department of Justice intended to intervene.

It is beginning. Here is the clarion call. Let us wait and see what is going to happen because we have taken away from the States the right to make that determination and, in so doing, I think that we have violated that first sacred clause of the Preamble which states, "In order to form a more perfect Union."

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. The Senator properly points out that with respect to the one-man, one-vote rule the effort is being made to apply it not only to State legislatures but also to the local political subdivisions which, in every case, are the creatures of the legislature.

Is it not true that there are also advocates of the proposition that the one-man, one-vote rule should apply to the very body which is housed in this Chamber so that there will not be two Senators to each State but representation by population of the States in this body?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Indeed so. When this matter was before the Legislature of the State of Illinois, there were a number of persons who went before that legislature to testify. I quote from an article published in the Chicago Tribune of March 9, 1967:

"One of the chief lobbyists for organized labor today may have aided the movement toward a national convention. He is John Alesia, legislative spokesman for years for the United Steel Workers and brother-in-law of Josephy Germano, midwest regional director of the USW.

"WILLING TO CHANGE SENATE

"Sen. Everett E. Laughlin [R., Freeport] asked Alesia, a witness before the senate sitting as a committee of the whole, whether his AFL-CIO organization would pursue its 'one man, one vote' theories to the point that each state would not be entitled to two United States senators.

" 'We'll accept the United States Senate on a population basis,' Alesia replied."

Mr. President, well, how many Senators for New York? How many for Rhode Island? How many for Wisconsin? How many for California? How many for Ilinois? How many for Arizona?

Well, Mr. President, you figure out the mathematics of the thing. But here is a spokesman for labor who said, "We will accept the U.S. Senate on a population basis."

What a body this will be.

Blow out the walls and enlarge this place because we will never be able to hold them now. It will take a lot more than that to people this hall, if this ever comes to pass. But there, he states it before a legislative body that "We will accept the U.S. Senate on a population basis."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this article printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, as well as "High Court Ponders One-Vote Issue," previously referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Gladly.

Mr. HRUSKA. In answer to the contention that an effort is being made to put this body on a one-man, one-vote basis, often resort is had to that part of article V of the Constitution which states:

"That no State without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate."

That particular article was adopted as part of the Constitution proper in 1789.

It was the 14th amendment, was it not, which was the basis of the Supreme Court's, one-man, one-vote decision. The 14th amendment was adopted in 1867.

The fond hope of men such as those who testified before the Legislature of the State of Illinois is that the Supreme Court, following this reasoning, ultimately will conclude that since the 14th amendment followed in time, it supersedes article V in the body of the Constitution.

Mr. DIRKSON. Precisely so.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Maryland says, "I am afraid." Afraid of what? The people?

The distinguished Senator from New York says, "I am afraid."

Afraid of what? The people?

Well, Alexander Hamilton was quite aware of these things when he wrote Federalist Paper No. 85. The people were a little afraid at that time about this Constitution and what should they do if they had an abdurate Congress with which they could not deal. They would want an amendment to that Constitution as first proposed—and there were quite a number of proposals by Charles Pinckney and others on amendments—but they finally adopted article V so that the Congress could initiate a constitutional amendment and send it to the States for ratification. Then, they provided that the people, through their legislatures, could initiate a constitutional connection to propose amendments if Congress refused or failed to do so.

Fancy a hostile Congress that would not do anything about a resolution which came down here.

Well, they had to sell the people on that idea. So, let me read to the Senate what Mr. Hamilton had to say:

"By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obliged, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States which at present amounts to nine, to call a convention for proposing amendments which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof."

Hamilton continued:

"The words of this article are peremptory."

Well, what does peremptory mean?

Peremptory is absolute. There is no escaping it. That is what Hamilton said, in order to mollify the fears of the people.

Then he went on:

"Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body—"

Meaning Congress.

I read that glorious sentence again:

"Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body."

Yes; Mr. President, they were wise men, those framers. They had all this in mind.

Hamilton continued:

"And of consequence, all the declamation about the disinclination to a change vanishes in the air."

That is Alexander Hamilton speaking, addressed to the people of the 13 States, to be able to say to them, "Fear not. We have put a power in your hands. The Congress cannot thwart you because it is peremptory. We have left no discretion in congressional hands."

Now there is one thing about it, although they have been declaiming on this subject, they have forgotten one thing about a constitutional convention. They have forgotten that a constitutional convention cannot amend the Constitution.

What it can do is to propose an amendment, and nothing more.

That proposal must then go to the country, and the country will then determine whether to ratify or not. It takes three-fourths of the States to ratify. Thus, a constitutional convention itself could consider a host of things. Not a comma or a period could be inserted in the Constitution until three-fourths of the States had solemnly ratified everything that was proposed.

I have no fear of the people. I do not understand these apprehensions and these ghosts under the bed that are seen by those who are now trying to scale down and undo, if they could, what has been built up in securing the applications of 32 States.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Maryland had your State of Alaska on the phone a good many times—so did I—talking to the leaders of both houses of Alaska. The proposal went through one house in Alaska. It failed in the other house by three votes. I am inclined to feel that it was because there was a little political intrusion in it that it failed; but that is a personal opinion of mine.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. Does not article V further provide that ratification can be had by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions in three-fourths of the States?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Indeed, it does.

Mr. HRUSKA. Is it not the intention of the Senator from Illinois, and would it be his thinking, that there would be submitted an act to implement the calling of a constitutional convention. It would provide for the selection of conventions within the States for the purpose of considering ratification of any proposal by the convention to amend the Constitution?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Absolutely so.

Mr. HRUSKA. We find evidence in the statements of those who oppose the submission of an amendment of a complete lack of trust and confidence in the competence of the people to govern themselves. It is a rejection of our republican form of government and our democratic form of government.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let us make up our minds whether this is a government of the people and by the people or not. Abraham Lincoln, standing at that holy spot in Gettysburg, uttered the prayer, as it were, that government of the people and by the people shall not perish from the earth. That has been the great philosophy of our party, and I adhere to it as firmly now as the Great Emancipator did when he uttered those deathless words.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. May I ask the Senator from Illinois if he still takes the position which he took 2 years ago, and I would like to quote very briefly from what he said——

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator does not have to quote me. It has already been quoted.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand, but, to frame the question appropriately, I would like to quote what he said.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would like to ask the Senator, Where is the whole speech?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is here. He can supply the context. This is what he said 2 years ago in that speech:

"There can be and is a genuine fear of a constitutional convention on the part of many thoughtful people who urgently are working toward enactment of a constitutional amendment. The fear is simple. There has never been a constitutional convention since these United States became a nation. There is strong legal opinion that once the states have mandated a convention, the courts nor the executive can control it, guide it, or establish the matters with which it would deal. A constitutional convention, many sincere people believe, would, once unlocked, spread in every direction."

I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois if he still feels that sincere and thoughtful people feel that way, or whether he would disagree that sincere and thoughtful people feel that way.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, I never disagree with sincere people, but I call attention to the fact that I set up some premises and then proceeded to knock them down.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Would the Senator concede, as he said 2 years ago, that there is strong legal opinion that once the States have mandated a convention, the courts, as well as the executive, could not guide or control such a convention?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Exactly; and for what reason? If the courts or the executive could guide and control a convention, why have article V? That is what Hamilton was pointing out in his papers when he spoke about a hostile government that would not give ear to the people. So here we have the power of the people, and it is provided for in article V.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So the Senator is not only saying that if this convention is called it can go in any direction, but is he now adding that in his judgment that is the way a constitutional convention of the people should develop?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right, and the States upon their applications have indicated an interest in one thing, which is the question of apportionment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Then, the Senator would entertain only those petitions which would specify they are interested in apportionment; others would be considered invalid?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not run the convention.

Mr. PROXMIRE. No, but the Senator from Illinois is one of the most influential Members of this body and the principal proponent of a constitutional convention. He would certainly have a major influence on what the petitions acceptable by the Congress should contain and what Congress should consider in giving force to the applications. The Senator is taking the position that only those petitions which would seek to overturn the one-man, one-vote principle would be entertained.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is the only thing that the legislatures have asked for.

Mr. PROXMIRE. There are a number of States that have asked for a convention that would restrain the powers of the courts over some legislatures.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The fear is expressed that the legislatures would run hog wild. Apparently the Senator has no confidence in his State legislature.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Maybe a little less confidence in a Republican controlled one than I would have in a Democratic one.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Before the control went into Republican hands, the Senator from Wisconsin uttered the same fear, because this goes back to 1964.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I may mention to the Senator from Illinois that the Wisconsin legislature is now considering this matter. The majority leader of the State senate has specified that no convention would be called, but that this would bring to the attention of the people that a State should have a right to apportion the membership of one house on a basis other than population. He says this Wisconsin petition is not going to result in a convention, contrary to what the Senator from Illinois said 2 years ago.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the Senator is quoting, perhaps the rest of the quotation can be supplied. The expectation is that a convention would be called. If a correspondent was quoting the gentleman, I do not think it is correct, because he was referring to a convention to consider this question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am quoting the reporter who gave the position of Senator Robert Knowles as being that it was his belief that a convention would not be called. He said Congress would get some indication of the unrest of the people. He said that is the object of the petition. His view is that a convention is not going to be held. He is the majority leader of the State senate, and the prime proponent of the petition. His view that the petition would simply bring to the attention of the Congress of the United States the unrest brought about by the failure of the Senator from Illinois to write an amendment and to get congressional approval for it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. He is giving his belief that Congress should act.

Mr. PROXMIRE. He said it would not act, that there would not be a constitutional convention. He does not want it, apparently.

Mr. DIRKSEN. He must have been misquoted, because in that resolution there is a statement of intention if Congress did not submit an amendment before the 30th of June, the convention is to be called. If Congress acted, a convention would become moot.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. Is that not exactly what happened when the 17th amendment was proposed?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Exactly.

Mr. HRUSKA. The same condition was expressed—that if it was not done by the Congress it should be done through a Constitutional Convention—and the Congress saw the handwriting on the wall and proposed the 17th amendment, and it was ratified.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think this debate is very helpful. The Senator is saying that the purpose of this procedure in the State legislatures all over the country is to put Congress in such a mood as to act on the Dirksen amendment of last year; it is not to call a Constitutional Convention, which the distinguished Senator from Nebraska as well as the great and distinguished Senator from Illinois, who are conservatives in the best sense, must know could radically and tragically change our Constitution.

Mr. HRUSKA. Why does not this Congress amend in every conceivable manner the Constitution of the United States? It can propose amendments all over the place if it wants to. Why does not this Congress run away in its effort to amend the Constitution? Common-sense and good faith restrains it. For the same reason I would be very confident and extend every good faith to the representatives in a national convention. As the Senator from Wisconsin will surely concede, all wisdom does not abide in the 100 Members of this body. Surely those selected to the high honor and heavy responsibility of representing the people in a national convention can be given the confidence of possessing good faith and good judgment.

They cannot run away, because it would take 38 State legislatures or constitutional conventions to adopt and ratify their amendments. And, Mr. President, if that is accomplished, who shall deny them the right to exercise the constitutional prerogatives contained in article V? Who is to say? These people representing temporarily the States of the Union?

The significant point in this whole matter is the effort to permit the people to speak. If the amendment is ultimately adopted, it would be a plan which would be approved by the legislatures of the States, calling for representation on a basis other than population in one of the bodies of the legislature, subject to one thing, Mr. President, and that is a popular vote of the people on that issue. Not only once, but every 10 years.

If it is not a proposition of being afraid to trust the people, and of lack of confidence in their ability, to oppose that kind of a proposition, then I do not recognize the breed of the animal.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, once more, here is the box we are putting ourselves into: the State legislatures are deeper concerned because under the Court's ruling, they must apportion both Houses on the basis of population. They feel very strongly on this particular issue. They have petitioned for a constitutional convention to act on the issue.

Nevertheless, article V is very clear; and it seems to me, if I understand anything the Senator from Illinois has said this morning, that his view is that a constitutional convention could not be bound, and he says it should not be bound. They do not have to confine themselves simply to apportionment. They can repeal the first ten amendments of the Constitution, if they wish to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And what is the answer of Senators DIRKSEN and HRUSKA to this "Pandora's box" nightmare? The Senator from Nebraska supplied it when he asked what is wrong with relying, number one, on a vote of the people who were elected by all the people to take part in this constitutional convention. with the double check that it would have to go through three-quarters of the legislatures or three-quarters of the States having conventions in order to be ratified.

The answer to the Senator is that those of us who have had experience with State legislatures know that a proposal as extreme as abolishing the Federal income tax—the primary basis for supporting our Government has passed a shocking large number of our State legislatures.

State legislatures have far less knowledge of Federal problems and little or no responsibility for them.

Frankly if the Congress should call a constitution convention, I would expect a number of extreme amendments to be offered and adopted by three-quarters of our State legislatures.

Mr. HRUSKA. The same article would allow them to reconsider, would it not?

Mr. PROXMIRE. What I am trying to get at is that we have had, for the 180 years of our Republic's history, amendments acted, with Congress originating them, never calling a constitutional convention. Members of Congress responsible for Federal law and experience in Federal law making have had and should have the principle voice in acting on constitutional amendments. I think those 180 years represent some accumulated wisdom. We should recognize that once you call a convention of this kind, of people who is most cases have not had experience in Federal office, as Members of Congress have had, of people who have not had the kind of seasoning in working with legislation that Members of Congress have had, almost anything could happen.

Mr. HRUSKA. Exactly.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And three-quarters of the legislatures could act under those circumstances.

Mr. HRUSKA. That is what the Constitution provides.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It is not a matter of not trusting the people. None of us would be here is we did not trust the people. It is a matter of recognizing we have established a good practice, in the past, in accordance with the first provision of article V, and that it could be most unfortunate if we now turn to an untried method which could result in many radical changes in our form of government.

Mr. HRUSKA. The Senator is using words of tact, and they are quite blandishing, but the substance of what he is saying is this: "I do not think the people are competent to govern themselves and make this decision for themselves." That is the plain import of the Senator's statement.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I must remind my friend from Wisconsin all over again that a constitutional convention could propose an amendment to adopt the metric system in the United States; but he forgets that it has got to go back and receive the approval of three-fourths of the States before it ever gets within the four corners of the Constitution of the United States.

The point has been made here this morning that these applications are invalid, because they date back, in some instances, to 1963. I think the Supreme Court demolished that argument pretty well in connection with the 17th amendment, in the case of Dillon against Glass. That is the amendment that provided for the direct election of Senators. It was attacked because of Section 3 in the amendment, which allowed 7 years for ratification.

Oh, the great to-do, the hue and cry that was made, that that was out of all reason. But when the Supreme Court got through, they said 7 years was a reasonable time.

If 7 years is reasonable for ratification, is 4 years an unreasonable time in which to initiate, by State application, a convention for the purpose of amending the same Constitution to which they have 7 years to approve an amendment? I submit that the rule of reason applies in every case.

It has been said that some of the applications are not valid as to form and substance. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States is completely silent on that point. Since State legislaures must initiate, under article V, that is a matter for them to determine. All that is needed, by a rule of reason, is a clear expression of intent by the legislatures. So what differences does it make in what form the application for a convention is made?

It has been said that some of the legislatures passed these resolutions when they were malapportioned. If that made this action invalid, then why not apply the same rule to everything that those legislatures did from the time they were malapportioned? Why not strike down the appropriation, strike down the validation of nominations to State courts and to State offices, strike down all the policy legislation and statutes they may have passed?

Besides that, 25 of those States which are alleged to have been malapportioned approved 25 amendments to the Constitution, and we still accept them as valid.

I defy Senators to find anywhere, in any decision, the word "illegal." The court has never said that a malapportioned legislature is an illegal legislature. They have been accepted in due course.

Can Congress limit or control the convention? One of the reasons Alexander Hamilton wrote that article 85 in the Federalist was to make clear to people that no hostile Congress could thwart the will of the people, if they wanted to amend their own organic law. That makes good sense.

Now comes the great expression of fear that people are going to run hogwild, that a convention will run hogwild. Well, you would have to have either the legislatures or the conventions in three-quarters of the States also run hogwild before you could add one word or one syllable to the Constitution.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I am so glad that the distinguished Senator is making this speech, and particularly that he refers to the fact that 25 amendments to the Constitution have been adopted by legislatures which under the present law would have been held to be malapportioned.

I recall many Supreme Court decisions in which these amendments have been followed, approved, and interpreted. As late as the time of the Virginia poll tax decision, the Court found occasion to approve and to comment upon the 24th amendment, which was ratified prior to the amendment most recently adopted.

I wonder with the adoption of the 25th amendment, if on any occasion when it is exercised—and I hope there will not be any occasion—somebody will raise the question that the Vice President who happens to come into office or the President, as the result of the functioning of the 25th amendment is not really the President because a malapportioned legislature, or several of them, happened to be among the 38 States that adopted that amendment.

The whole argument seems to me to be completely fallacious. I am glad that the Senator is exposing it.

I hope that the Senator is successful in his effort to have the legislatures, speaking for the people of the State more clearly than any other groups can speak, demand action in this field.

We have recently had a horrible example in my State of Florida of what happens when the court reapportions. I think our people are sick of it. For instance, we have the coupling of Broward County, the county of Port Lauderdale, in a circuitous route with Monroe County, which is almost an independent principality for the selection of senators, so that all three State senators allowed in that widely extended district have now been named by Broward County. That is a situation in which a citizen from Key West has to come 109 miles to Miami, plus the 28 or 30 miles to Fort Lauderdale, before he can find a State senator to discuss special or local legislation which vitally affects him and his county. There is no State senator who knows what happens in his particular county of Monroe.

I hope the Senator from Illinois will continue to pursue this course of action with the perseverence which has marked his activity in the past. I hope that he will be successful in his course of action. So far as the senior Senator from Florida is concerned, he proposes to cooperate with him to the fullest possible extent in any way in which he can cooperate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I remind the distinguished Senator from Florida of the Supreme Court case in which argument was finished yesterday. It involved local districts, like towns and cities. In the case of Houston County, Ala., the board of revenue and control administers 1,000 miles of highway dominated by the city. As the attorney said before the Court, the city could not care less about country roads.

This is already simmering down. It was estimated yesterday before the Court that as many as 20,000 local political subdivisions might be affected. They would consist of school boards, park boards, drainage districts, cities, and counties. You name it, and it will come within the purview. However, the Court is trying to find out where to draw the line, now that the damage has been done.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if I may revert again to the case I just mentioned, which is only one of the horrible situations resulting in my State from a court reapportionment, I can say from some knowledge that many of the questions that will come up on a local basis in Monroe County—the county of Key West—have to do with marine or maritime matters—for instance, the stone crab, which the distinguished Senator knows of and loves so well as a table delicacy. Shrimp are found there in great profusion, as well as sea turtles and other sea creatures which are harvested from the gulf or the Atlantic at or near Key West.

Is it not rather ridiculous to have a local legislator address himself to the handling of problems such as these which are decided in the Florida Senate by three State senators from Broward County, on the mainland of the Atlantic coast, where none of these problems exists? They have to handle matters concerning which they have no knowledge, matters like the Key West crawfish, which are of vital importance to the people in that far-off area which happens to belong to the suzerainty of three Senators who live up in the Fort Lauderdale area. There could not be any more ridiculous situation than to expect those three State senators to know, understand, and be able to deal with the local problems affecting Key West, or Monroe County.

I cite that as an illustration of where we can go when we try to operate on an arbitrary one-man, one-vote basis, particularly when we place jurisdiction and authority in the courts, and have cases decided by men who have life tenure, who do not care whether the people like it or not, who do not care whether it suits the desires of the people or not but simply decide questions on a mathematical basis by a circuitous route, taking a course such as was adopted in that case, by which they linked Key West, through the little west coast county of Collier, with the great county of Broward, so that Broward, with its 10-to-1 voting strength over both those counties—can dominate the entire delegation.

It is not right. It is not democratic. It is not sound. It ought to be corrected, and I hope the Senator from Illinois will presevere in his effort to have such situations corrected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I say to my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from Florida, that we have persevered, and we shall continue to do so.

The votes of only seven other Senators were necessary to adopt the resolution that I offered in January 1965, to provide the constitutional two-thirds. Only seven other votes were needed. The vote was 57 to 39, and we fell just a few votes short.

The Senate should have passed that resolution, and the House should pass it. Then, let it go to the people and see what they have to say. However, here we have the expression: "I am afraid of the people."

All I can say, as was written on the ancient parchment long ago: "O, ye of little faith."

I think that is a good place to stop, and we will join in combat at some time later. So, I leave it at that for the moment.

I shall fervently hope that, in a number of States where this resolution is under consideration, they will see fit to approve it.

When we get the necessary 34—and we require only two additional States—I shall march in here, because this is a matter of the highest privilege, with a concurrent resolution and ask that it go to the calendar so that it can be considered in due course.

Mr. President, I believe that will be the end of the discussion for the moment. There is much that I could add, but I shall do that on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

EXHIBIT 1

[From the Chicago Tribune, Mar. 9, 1967]

STATE SET TO JOIN ONE-MAN, ONE-VOTE FIGHT—SENATE EXPECTED TO APPROVE DIRKSEN PLAN

(By George Tagge)

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., March 8—Joining a revolt against the "one-man, one vote" dictation by the United States Supreme court, the Illinois legislature today prepared to join the legislatures of 27 other states in demanding a national convention to revise the federal Constitution.

The Illinois Senate gave every sign that next week it will adopt a resolution to put Illinois on record in the march toward action by 34 states to achieve the national constitutional convention.

SUGGESTED BY DIRKSEN

Last week the Illinois House adopted the resolution and sent it to the Senate, as suggested by United States Senate Minority Leader Dirksen [R., Ill.]. Dirksen for years has been seeking means of restoring the right of states to follow the federal system in setting up legislatures if their voters want it.

Until the Supreme court several years ago upset the traditional rights of states in this field, most of them followed the system of having one legislative body based on population, and the other chamber based also on other factors.

WOULD ELECT JUSTICES

Illinois voters in 1954 overwhelmingly adopted the federal system but they were overruled by the supreme court headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren, former governor of California.

The anti-supreme court trend was sparked here yesterday by introduction of a Senate resolution aiming at election of justices of the United States Supreme court. This would also be the subject of a national convention obtained by the same method as the one on legislative apportionment.

The move toward abolishing Presidential appointment of Supreme court members was proposed by a freshman Republican, Sen. Joseph J. Krasowski of Chicago's southwest side.

An ultra-liberal Democrat, Sen. Paul Simon of Troy, sought to get a promise of delay beyond next week from Sen. Hudson Sours [R., Peoria], chief sponsor of the Dirksen plan resolution.

CITES 14TH AMENDMENT SPEED

Sours replied that the 14th amendment to the United States Constitution, on which the Supreme court based its 'one man, one vote' rulings, was created in less time than is being taken in Springfield to try to modify just one effect.

Sen. Robert McCarthy [D., Decatur] objected that the League of Women Voters favors the pronouncements of the Supreme court and has not had a chance to go into action since the revolt started here last week.

One of the chief lobbyists for organized labor today may have aided the movement toward a national convention. He is John Alesia, legislative spokesman for years for the United Steel Workers and brother-in-law of Joseph Germano, mid-west regional director of the USW.

WILLING TO CHANGE SENATE

Sen. Everett E. Laughlin [R., Freeport] asked Alesia, a witness before the senate sitting as a committee of the whole, whether his AFL–CIO organization would pursue its "one man, one vote" theories to the point that each state would not be entitled to two United States senators.

"We'll accept the United States Senate on a population basis," Alesia replied.

Surprised by the union lobbyist's answer, other senators asked him similar questions and obtained similar replies.

"We would support reapportionment of the United States Senate on a population basis," was Alesia's final version.

STATES CAN FORCE ACTION

Article 5 of the Constitution provides that a convention to revise this basic law may be had if two-thirds of the state agrees on this goal.

Simple majorities are sufficient to adopt the national constitutional resolution.

In contrast, two-thirds majorities in the Senate and House here are needed to adopt a pending resolution for a state convention to revise the Illinois constitution of 1870.

[From the Washington Post]

HIGH COURT PONDERS ONE-VOTE ISSUE

(By John P. MacKenzie)

The Supreme Court searched yesterday for a place to draw the line on the "one person, one vote" principle for local government.

The Justices completed two days of oral argument in four local reapportionment cases. They heard warnings of a "political thicket" more dangerous than State legislative reapportionment, and complaints of a continuing 'rural stranglehold' on cities at the level of county government.

They were assured by lawyers for city dwellers that the problem was manageable despite the number and variety of county and city governing units. One lawyer said that about 20,000 of the Nation's 90,000 local bodies would be affected.

ONLY 20,000?

"Only 20,000?" asked Justice Byron R. White. "That's a lot more than 50," Justice William J. Brennan Jr. added, referring to the number of state legislatures governed by the 1964 equal-population decision.

Justice Abe Fortas said the problem was: "What is local government?" He demanded in each case to know the specific governmental powers the State had delegated to local political units. In no case could opposing counsel agree.

Justice Department Attorney Francis X Beytagh, supporting extension of the equal-population rule, said Fortas's functional approach would bog the Court down in details not involved in the four cases. He said the rule should apply whenever the State provides for elections by districts to a body with any governmental powers.

At issue are the election processes for these political units:

The school board of Kent County, Mich. Grand Rapids has more than half the County's population, but its school district is only one of 21 in the County, each district having a vote in the annual selection of school board members.

The Board of Revenue and Control of Houston County, Ala. The City of Dothan, which has more than half the County's voters, is outnumbered by four rural districts.

The Board of Supervisors of Suffolk County, Long Island. The County is composed of 10 towns ranging in population from 1300 to 172,000 but each town is entitled to one Board member.

The City Council of Virginia Beach, Va. All its 11 members are elected at large, but seven must reside in each of seven boroughs that vary in population from 733 to 20,000.

MOST DIFFICULT CASE

Beytagh conceded that the Michigan case was "the most difficult" of the four because the school board is not elected directly by the people. But he said most school boards are popularly elected and should be covered by any equal population ruling.

School board attorney Paul O. Strawbecker insisted that in Michigan, "education has never been a part of local self-government." He insisted that fairly apportioned state legislatures were "more competent than any court" to distribute political power below the state level.

Washington attorney Charles S. Rhyne, who argued in the breakthrough 1962 case of Baker vs. Carr, urged the Justices to extend the rule because "it's a principle that you just can't carve up."

But Truman Hobbs, lawyer for the Houston County board, insisted that most of the board's work was administering 1000 miles of rural roads. He said the city "couldn't care less" about county roads and rural residents would suffer if the city dominated the county board.

[From the Congressional Record, May 10, 1967]

THE REAPPORTIONMENT CRISIS

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I want to address myself this afternoon to an analysis of the constitutional question posed to Congress by the petitions for a Constitutional Convention by the States—the most important Constitutional question to confront the country since the convening of the original Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia on May 14, 1787.

The men who assembled in Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia May 14, 1787, in order to form a more perfect Union, probably are unmatched by any single group in history for their reasoned grasp of the tenets essential to a government of the people and for their unquenchable thirst for freedom.

The Constitution which they wrought with brilliance and fervent devotion to freedom under law, I believe, stands high above the achievement of the Magna Carta, obtained as Hamilton described it "by the barons, sword in hand, from King John." It stands high above such landmark documents, too, as the Petition of Right assented to by Charles I, or the Declaration of Right presented to the Prince of Orange and afterwards formed into an act by Parliament called the Bill of Rights.

The Constitution of the United States proposed by that inspired body meeting in Convention Hall in Philadelphia was the product of free men—forging freedom by choice. It was not the grudging gift of some despot brought to terms by force of arms or that of some benevolent monarch.

"We the People of the United States, to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

"To secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity . . ."

We, today, are that posterity. Does the light of liberty burn within us as an all-consuming, living, breathing precept as it did with those who so magnificently forged our Constitution? Does the rule of reason, the passion for government by law, stir our souls to the degree required to protect our precious constitutional heritage? I believe so.

I would not so believe, however, if I thought we might heed the dismaying clamor pealing from the confines of mind of a few willful men intent on tailoring the fabric of our Constitution for purposes other than it was devised.

A CONVENTION GUIDELINE

For the first time since the adoption of the Constitution on September 17, 1787, this Nation may be on the verge of convening another constitutional convention. It behooves us in this light to examine the cause and to study the purpose of that first Convention when it created the constitutional procedure for convening a future convention.

In this way, I believe, we can better bring logic to our discussion and develop a guideline to the constitutional ground on which we tread.

While the points which I wish to raise are designed to clarify the procedures inherent in a constitutional convention, I would point out that the Congress, in view of the nature of the petitions from the States for a convention before it, may resolve the issue itself by proposing the requested amendment to the Constitution to the States for ratification. It has an alternative.

I would prefer to see this alternative course pursued.

I have no fear of the will of the people of these United States however if the Congress, in its wisdom or obstinacy, prefers the convening of a Convention. To vote otherwise, in my mind, would be to violate my oath of office to uphold the Constitution by which this Nation is governed.

Much in the manner of Chicken Little skittering to and fro telling all who would listen the sky is falling, much alarm has been expressed at what a Constitutional Convention might do. "The Bill of Rights will be repealed," "the Supreme Court will be abolished," are just two of the more irrational alarms being trumpeted from the rooftops by some who have felt compelled to exclaim rather than reason.

Fears of this kind have no foundation in reason, logic, or experience. They should be dismissed.

WHAT A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION CAN DO

I think it is more important to recognize a Constitutional Convention for what it is and what it can do. First, it is a perfectly valid method of proposing amendments to the Constitution. It is a right reserved to the States and guaranteed by article V of the Constitution. The fact that we have never had one does no diminish the right of the people to have one if they wish.

As to what a Constitutional Convention might do to existing rights or to governmental structure, it could do nothing more than what the Congress has authority to do—it can propose amendments to the Constitution. Alone, it can make no change in the Constitution; it can change no rights. In the final analysis, three-fourths of the States, a total of 38, either by legislative action or by State convention, must ratify any amendment the Convention might propose before it becomes a part of the Constitution. Precisely the same procedure that applies to amendments proposed by the Congress must be observed so far as ratification is concerned.

In our examination of the facts it is reasonable, I believe, to read article V, to see what it says, look at the background, refresh our memory on why it was made a part of the Constitution, and analyze the legal aspects surrounding it:

ARTICLE V

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem is necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress . . ."

THE GENESIS OF ARTICLE V

Let us look for a moment at the genesis of article V. Why did the delegates to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia insert this provision for a future Constitutional Convention into their handiwork? The answer is not difficult to determine. One of the great fears of the delegates was a balky future Congress, a Congress that might prove unresponsive to the wishes of the States, and more importantly, to the wishes of the people in those States.

A great weakness in the Articles of Confederation with which the delegates to the Philadelphia Convention were wrestling was the difficulty of amending the articles. Amendments to become binding required ratification by the legislatures of all of the States. It is for this reason without question that the delegates to Philadelphia early realized the impracticability of merely amending the Articles of Confederation even though every delegate, with the possible exception of those from New Jersey, who were operating under somewhat broader authority than their confreres, was under instruction to do no more than propose amendments to the Articles of Confederation.

Shortly after it became apparent that more than the mere amendment of articles would take place and that a new Constitution would be submitted, the problem of providing for subsequent amendments to the proposed Constitution was considered. Four separate proposals were submitted. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an exhibit which contains the text of proposals by Pinckney, Randolph, and Mason, and documentary references and commentary upon them, be printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks. The Hamilton proposal I shall speak of later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

221

FEAR OF AN UNRESPONSIVE CONGRESS

Mr. HRUSKA. It seems clear from the debates that what was foremost in the minds of the delegates in regard to amending the Constitution was the fear that, among other things, there would be at some future date a Congress unresponsive to the wishes of the State. Initially the sentiment of the delegates, as shown by the journals and diaries, seemed to be that of denying to the Congress any voice in the process of amending the Constitution. The debates convinced a sufficient number of delegates that Congress should at least have an opportunity to propose amendments with the final approval left to the States. As a result, Congress was only given authority to propose amendments. The States, through their legislatures, retained the authority to initiate a Convention. The safeguard of a Convention was specifically provided so that Congress could not thwart the wishes of two-thirds of the States by refusing to submit amendments desired by the States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to put this in proper context. Those men at that convention had just finished a long war against King George III of England, and a situation existed of refusal on the part of the Government to permit people to have their wishes. They wanted to guard against such refusals. They did it in many ways. One was the safeguard that was put into the Constitution in article V, which allowed for the States and for the people of the States an opportunity to combat tyranny—the tyranny of either the executive, of the Congress, or of the central national government—by having a convention to consider amendments to the Constitution.

This safeguard for the calling of a Convention upon application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States seem to be perfectly clear in intent. In fact, it would appear that the Congress by refusing to call a Convention upon application, would, in such instance, be setting itself up as being above the Constitution. For instance, the States might decide that a Convention was necessary in order to limit the power of Congress—could Congress refuse to call a Convention in such instance? A situation very nearly like this occurred when the 17th amendment—direct election of Senators—was proposed—it can hardly be argued that this amendment was "necessary"; rather, it is apparent that Congress acted in order to avoid a Convention.

The Federalist Papers give clear insight as to what the framers of the Constitution had in mind with the adoption of article V. Alexander Hamilton, in Federalist Paper No. 85, made the point that the people were a little afraid at that time about the proposed Constitution and what they should do if they had a balky Congress with which they could not deal. Pointing out they would want to amend the Constitution and to insure this right article V was approved.

HAMILTON

Hamilton said:

"By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obligated, 'on the application of the legislature of two-thirds of the States' which at present amounts to nine, to call a Convention for proposing amendments which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof. The words of this article are peremptory "The Congress shall call a Convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence all the declaration about their disinclination to a change, vanishes in the air. Nor however difficult it may be supposed to unite two-thirds or three-fourths of the state legislatures, in amendments which may affect local interests, can there be any room to apprehend any such difficulty in a Union on points which are merely relative to the general liberty or security of the people. We may safety rely on the disposition of the State legislatures to erect barriers against the encroachments of the national authority."

THE SITUATION TODAY

In can be seen then that the situation confronting this Congress is precisely that visualized by the delegates to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia in 1787 when they made provision that a Constitutional Convention must be called upon application of two-thirds of the States. At this time in our history, two-thirds of the States of the Union number 34. As of this moment, 32 States have petitioned this Congress to call a Constitutional Convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the States for ratification which would permit the States a degree of flexibility in the apportionment of one House of their State legislatures. It should come as no surprise to the Members of Congress that the States have so petitioned.

In 1963, as the first implications of Baker v. Carr—March 26, 1962, 369 U.S. 186—became evident, several States petitioned Congress to call a convention or to take action.

In 1964, Congress again failed to take action and additional States added their petitions to the roll before us.

In 1965, the process was repeated.

Again in 1966, the number of States petitioning for action increased.

So far this year 1967, four additional States have petitioned, bringing the total number of petitions before us, as I have said, to 32. I predict that the number will reach 34, and quite possibly more. The reason is that Congress has refused to act in keeping with the expressed, deeply felt wishes of the States in connection with this vital constitutional question. Therefore, as Hamilton foresaw in making provision for a call of a Constitutional Convention in the face of an obdurate Congress, the States are following the petition route.

It is important, moreover it is essential, it seems to me, in view of this demand by the States for a Convention that certain facts be clearly enunciated.

1. ARE THE PETITIONS FROM THE STATES INVALID HAVING BEEN ADOPTED OVER A PERIOD TO DATE, OF FOUR YEARS?

Article V is silent as to the period of time in which applications must be received in order to be valid and as to the period of time in which ratification must occur in order for a proposed amendment to become valid as a part of the Constitution.

A time limit in which ratification must take place was imposed by the Congress in the submission of the 18th amendment. This marked the first instance of such a time limitation. In the third section of that amendment the 7-year period for ratification was expressed. The validity of this amendment was challenged because of the alleged "extra-constitutional provision of the third section" in Dillon v. Glass, Deputy Collector of the United States Internal Revenue, 256 U.S. at 368.

The court ruled that the fair inference from article V is that ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal of the amendment and that 7 years, as determined by Congress, was reasonable. The opinion pointed out that the Constitution's lack of express provision on the subject is not in itself controlling, because with the Constitution, as with a statute or other written instrument, what is reasonably implied is as much a part of it as what is expressed. The following cases were cited: United States v. Babbit, 1 Black, 55, 61; Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651, 658; McHenry v. Alford, 168 U.S. 651, 672; South Carolina v. United States 199 U.S. 437, 451; Luria v. United States, 231 U.S. 9, 24; The Pesaro, 255 U.S. 216.

An examination of article V, the court said, discloses that it is intended to invest Congress with a wide range of power in proposing amendments. The opinion also reads:

"We do not find anything in the Article which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the States may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective. We do find that which strongly suggest the contrary. First, proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, it is only when there is deemed to be a necessity therefore that amendments are to be proposed, the reasonable implication being that when proposed they are to be considered and disposed of presently. Thirdly, as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do.

"We conclude that the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after proposal.

"Of the power of Congress, keeping within reasonable limits to fix a definite period for the ratification we entertain no doubt. As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal with subsidiary matters of detail as the public interests and changing conditions may require [1]; and Article V is no exception to the rule. Whether a definite period for ratification shall be fixed so that all may know what it is and speculation on what is a reasonable time may be avoided, is, in our opinion, a matter of detail which Congress may determine as an incident of its power to designate the mode of ratification. It is not questioned that seven years, the period fixed in this instance, was reasonable, if power existed to fix a definite time; nor could it well be questioned considering the periods within which prior amendments were ratified."

Applying the reasoning of the court in Dillon against Glass to the problem at hand it is clear that applications for a Convention would certainly be valid if received within a 7-year or possibly a longer period, since this period was established by the Congress and approved by the courts, and action pursuant thereto constituted valid ratification. The argument that applications, to be valid must be received in the life of one Congress is about as illogical as saying that ratification must take place in the life of one Congress or that failure of a proposed amendment in one Congress would forever foreclose subsequent Congresses from attempting to propose similar amendments.

2. ARE THE APPLICATIONS VALID AS TO FORM AND SUBJECT MATTER?

In determining whether the applications are in proper form, it should be recalled in the first place that article V makes no reference to form. Congress might, although this is a doubtful power, prescribe a form to be used for this purpose but it has not done so. It seems strange, then, for Congress now to contend that the applications are in improper form. More logical, it would seem would be the view that since the State legislatures, and they alone, have the authority to initiate a Convention, their decision as to form should be binding, and the form used by one legislature would not preclude the use of a different style form by another legislature in making application to the Congress for a Convention. What really seems to be important or controlling is the substance, purpose, and intent of the applications.

Each of the 32 applications presently before us specifically requests that a Constitutional Convention be called. They assign various reasons for their request by using one or more "whereas" clauses, all of which, however, relate to apportionment. These clauses are not a part of the resolving clause and in no way limit its effect. Some legislatures have proposed in their applications actual language for an amendment but in so doing they have not destroyed the effectiveness of their applications for a Constitutinal Convention. Such language could only be regarded at most as surplusage intended to convey to the Congress an idea as to the wording of the amendment that either the Congress or a Convention could propose for ratification. The applications, as previously noted, do give to Congress the alternative to calling a Constitutinal Convention; that alternative being the submission of amendment by the Congress.

Some of the States have in their applications, attempted to establish the method of ratification. No reason is given for this action, but it can be presumed that it was done so as to foreclose any possibility that the Congress might refuse to provide a method of ratification. In any event the inclusion of this extraneous material could not conceivably invalidate the application for a Constitutional Convention.

In fact, the situation existing now is almost precisely that envisioned by the delegates at Philadelphia. The alternative that the delegates provided, the calling of a Constitutional Convention, was designed to meet the very situation where Congress would not act.

3. DOES THE FACT THAT SOME OF THE LEGISLATURES WERE MALAPPORTIONED AT THE TIME THE APPLICATIONS WERE ADOPTED AFFECT THE VALIDITY OF THE APPLICATIONS?

During the period of time covered by these applications—1963–67—application for a Convention has been made by legislatures apportioned on the basis of population alone. Other legislatures that were under court order to reapportion also made application for a Convention, and, finally, State legislatures that were malapportioned to some extent according to the principle of Reynolds against Sims, but had not been found to be malapportioned by any court, also approved applications for a Constitutional Convention. The question has been raised as to whether these two latter groups could make a valid application for a Convention so as to permit apportionment of one House on the basis of factors other than population alone.

[1] Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304, 326; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 407.

Part of the argument being made in support of the premise that a malapportioned legislature could not make a valid application for such a Convention is based on the premise that such action was self-serving and would tend to make that legislature "pure." This line of argument falls of its own weight. In the first place, no such application could stay court action requiring apportionment based on the principle of Reynolds against Sims; namely, population alone. So that those legislatures under court order had no alternative but to reapportion, and they did. Obviously, any such application could not have been self-serving so far as preserving the apportionment of that legislature was concerned. Those legislatures that were in fact malapportioned, but under no court order could hardly expect to maintain their status quo by the act of approving an application for a Convention. Only an amendment to the Constitution could help them, and the undisputed fact is that there was not sufficient time to propose a constitutional amendment and obtain ratification so as to help this group.

As to the patently absurd argument that these applications cannot be counted because they were approved by a malapportioned legislature, it can be disposed of with the observation that if such argument is true, then every act of that legislature and preceding ones are invalid and with them quite likely most every act of the Congress because every State having more than one Representative in Congress would have had its congressional districts determined by an invalid legislature. Also, the validity of all amendments to the Federal Constitution subsequent to the 14th will be brought into question because with only one exception, the 21st article of amendment, they have been ratified by malapportioned legislatures. What a paradox it would be to hold valid the ratification of an amendment by a legislature as provided in article V and to hold invalid the petition for a Constitutional Convention by the same legislature as also provided in article V.

Fortunately, we have some guidance from the Supreme Court on this problem. The question arose in Texas v. White (1868) 7 Wall (74 U.S.) 700.

U.S. SUPREME COURT RULING ON THIS POINT

Texas v. White—74 U.S. Reports 700 (1868). The Supreme Court in this case was confronted with a situation based on certain acts of the Civil War Legislature of the State of Texas. It held that—

"Considered as transactions under the Constitution, the ordinance of secession, adopted by the Texas convention, and ratified by a majority of the citizens of Texas, and all acts of her legislature intended to give effect to that ordinance were absolutely null. They were utterly without operation in law."

But, the Court stated, the State did not cease to be a State, nor her citizens to be citizens of the Union. The insurgent legislature could not be regarded in the courts of the United States as a lawful legislature, or its acts as lawful acts. Yet that legislature and its government were the only actual government Texas had. It constituted a de facto government "and its acts during the period of its existence as such would be effectual and in almost all respects valid." Such validity, however, did not extend to a contract in aid of the rebellion, which was a treasonable act. On this point the Court held:

"Exact definitions, within which the acts of a State government, organized in hostility to the Constitution and government of the United States, must be treated as valid or invalid, need not be attempted. It may be said, however, that acts necessary to peace and good order among citizens, such, for example, as acts sanctioning and protecting marriage and the domestic relations, governing the course of descents, regulating the conveyance and transfer of property, real and personal, and providing remedies for injuries to persons and estate, and other similar acts, which would be valid if emanating from a lawful government, must be regarded in general as valid when proceeding from an actual, though unlawful government; and that acts in furtherance or support of rebellion against the United States, or intended to defeat the just rights of citizens and other acts of like nature, must, in general be regarded as invalid and void."

No one would seriously contend that these State legislatures who have made application for a Constitutional Convention were "illegal governments" by virtue of the fact that they were malapportioned. It certainly cannot be said that an application for a Constitutional Convention constitutes "rebellious" or "treasonable" actions of that legislature.

At the time the petition for a Convention was adopted, the very least that can be said that such legislature was a part of a de facto government and its acts would be effectual in such matters as this. This is clear under the decision in Texas against White.

But the uniform holdings of the courts have been that otherwise valid enactments of legislatures will not be set aside as unconstitutional by reason of their passage by a malapportioned legislature. See Dawson v. Bomar, 322 Fed. (2d) 445 (1963), Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals (certiorari denied, 376 U.S. 732).

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that portions of that opinion be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, portions of the opinion was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

"As indicated by the petitioner's failure to cite authority in support of his contention, the courts have uniformly held that otherwise valid enactments of legislatures will not be set aside as unconstitutional by reason of their passage by a malapportioned legislature. This conclusion is reached upon one or more of three judicially recognized doctrines: (1) the de jure doctrine which recognizes that a legislative body created by a state constitution has a de jure existence which is not destroyed by an failure to redistrict in accordance with the constitutional mandate; (2) the de facto doctrine which recognizes that the legislative offices created by the state constitution were de jure and the incumbents, even though elected under an invalid districting act, were at least de facto members of the legislature and their acts as valid as the acts of the de jure officers; (3) the doctrine of avoidance of chaos and confusion which recognizes the common sense principle that courts, upon balancing the equities between the individual complainant and the public at large, will not declare acts of a malapportioned legislature invalid where to do so would create a state of chaos and confusion.

"For the Court to select any particular category of laws and separate them from other laws for the purpose of applying either the de facto doctrine or the doctrine of avoidance of chaos and confusion would in fact circumvent legal principles in order to substitute the Court's opinion as to the wisdom, morality, or appropriateness of such laws."

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, in the case of Ryan v. Tinsley, 316 Fed. (2d) 430 U.S. Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, April 22, 1963, the court held:

"If the petitioner's contentions are to be accepted, a malapportioned legislature could not pass a valid act of reapportionment."

4. CAN THE CONGRESS OR THE STATES LIMIT THE ACTION OF A CONVENTION?

In providing an answer to this question two principles must be kept in mind. First, is that whatever the Congress does, it can only do as a result of authority delegated to it in the Constitution. Second, Congress in proposing amendments or calling a Constitutional Convention is not exercising a legislative function. This latter matter was thoroughly discussed and disposed of by the Court in Hollingsworth v. Virginia (1798) Dallas 378. In that case the following argument was made:

"The amendment has not been proposed in the form prescribed by the constitution, and therefore, it is void. Upon an inspection of the original roll, it appears, that the amendment was never submitted to the president for his approbation. The constitution declares, that every order, resolution or vote, to which the concurrence of the senate and house of representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment), shall be presented to the president of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the senate and house of representatives &c. Art. 8 S 7. Now, the constitution likewise declares, that the concurrence of both houses shall be necessary to a proposition for amendments. Art. V. and it is no answer to the objection, to observe, that as two-thirds of both houses are required to originate the proposition, it would be nugatory to return it with the president's negative, to be repassed by the same number; since the reasons assigned for his disapproba-tion might be so satisfactory as to reduce the majority below the constitutional proportion. The concurrence of the president is required in matters of infinitely less importance; and whether on subjects of ordinary legislation, or of constitutional amendments, the expression is the same, and equally applies to the act of both houses of congress."

In response the Attorney General stated:

"Two objections are made. 1st. That the amendment has not been proposed in due form. But has not the same course been pursued relative to all the other amendments that have been adopted? (a) And the case of amendments is evidently a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of investing the president with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of congress."

The Court on the day succeeding the arguments unanimously held that the amendment was constitutionally adopted, and this decision has been uniformly observed, establishing the fact that the amending process is not a legislative function.

As to the question of a delegation of power to the Congress to limit the action of a Convention, nowhere in the Constitution can such a delegation of authority be found. Such a delegation would negate the very authority reserved to the States. What purpose would be served by allowing the States to initiate a Convention and leave the authority in the Congress to say what the Convention could do? If a Convention can in fact be limited, it would seem that only the States who possess the sole authority to initiate it could control it. In this connection I would point out that all 32 petitions under discussion request action only in respect to reapportionment. In fact, also, further and ultimate control does rest in the States for not until three-fourths of them have ratified, could any amendment proposed by a Convention have effect.

In further considering this point, it is necessary to examine the precise nature of the acts involved in calling a Constitutional Convention. The Congress, as has been discussed does not have the initiating authority in this instance, it can act, only in response to applications from at least two-thirds of the State legislatures, and, upon receipt of the necessary number must call such a Convention. Since the Congress is without authority of its own to call a Convention, it is possessed at most with authority only over routine housekeeping functions. These functions would provide for the place, date, presumably the duration, financing, voting, and other similar functions of the Convention .

Since article V gives to the States sole authority to determine whether or not there shall be a Constitutional Convention and since someone must say where, when, and so forth, Congress obviously has this limited authority. It can be argued that the States could include these items in a uniform manner in their applications, but since they did not do so it would seem that this function is left to the Congress.

Wherein lies any safeguard against a "wide open" Convention? First in the good faith, judgment, and responsibility of its delegates. Second, in the requirement that any proposals of the Convention must be ratified by three-fourths of the States—38 of them—before becoming effective.

5. CAN A STATE LEGISLATURE RESCIND AN APPLICATION FOR A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION?

Attempts to rescind the application for a Constitutional Convention made by an earlier legislature have occurred at least in four State legislatures. An instance where this occurred is in Maryland. The 1965 Legislature of Maryland, found by the Court to be malapportioned, adopted a resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention. The legislature was reapportioned according to population. In its 1967 session, a resolution rescinding the earlier application was introduced but rejected. No legislature has rescinded an application for a Constitutional Convention on reapportionment of State legislatures. The question then is whether or not such an act of recission would have effect.

The Supreme Court has been confronted with cases on ratification that shed some light on this question. The Court has held that the function of a State legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing the amendment is a Federal function derived from the Federal Constitution; and it transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a State. Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221; Hawke v. Smith, No. 2, 253 U.S. 231; National Prohibition cases, 253 U.S. 350, 386.

It also appears that ratification of a proposed amendment, when once acceded to by a State legislature would seem to exhaust its authority to act and preclude a reconsideration. Coleman v. Miller 307 U.S. 433.

The Court has also held that certification to the Secretary of State—now Administrator GSA—by the legislature of its act of ratification is binding upon him. In Lester v. Garnett 258 U.S. 130, the Court held:

"The remaining contention is that the ratifying resolutions of Tennessee and of West Virginia are inoperative, because adopted in violation of the rules of legislative procedure prevailing in the respective States. The question raised may have been rendered immaterial by the fact that since the proclamation the legislatures of two other States—Connecticut and Vermont—have adopted resolutions of ratification. But a broader answer should be given to the contention. The proclamation by the Secretary certified that from official documents on file in the Department of State it appeared that the proposed Amendment was ratified by the legislatures of thirty-six States, and that it 'has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States.' As the legislatures of Tennessee and of West Virginia had power to adopt the resolutions of ratification, official notice to the Secretary, duly authenticated, that they had done so was conclusive upon him, and, being certified to by his proclamation, is conclusive upon the source. The rule declared in Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 669–673, is applicable here. See also Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U.S. 547, 562."

Since the act of a State legislature in making an application to Congress for a Constitutional Convention and its act of ratifying a proposed amendment are quite similar and relating the court's holdings in the former to the latter it is apparent that: First, both are Federal functions; second, neither can be rescinded; and, third, each would be binding, the one upon the Congress, the other on the Administrator of GSA and both upon the courts. The rule of reasonableness, such as the Court used in the National Prohibition cases, where it held 7 years to be a reasonable time in which to effect ratification, could be applied so as to prevent the cumulative effect of applications spread over a number of years and on various subjects. Any attempt to rescind during this 7-year period would be a nullity, and after the lapse of 7 years during which time the necessary two-thirds had not been achieved the applications would lose their effect.

Additionally, once applications from two-thirds of the legislatures have been received by the Congress we are confronted with what might be termed an act of finality. Any attempted act of recision of its application by a State legislature would have no more meaning then than would an attempt to rescind a sufficient number of acts of ratification so as to repeal an article of amendment that had previously been ratified by three-fourths of the States.

6. MUST THE CONGRESS CALL A CONVENTION UPON APPLICATION OF TWO-THIRDS OF THE LEGISLATURES OF THE STATES?

The Federalist Papers give clear insight as to what the framers of the Constitution had in mind in article V. I have quoted Alexander Hamilton in Federalist Paper No. 85 in this respect, where Hamilton makes it clear the Congress has no option.

The duty of Congress under article V is quite clear. In the syllabus of United States v. Sprague et al., 282 U.S. 715, it is noted that:

". . . 2. Article V, in its provision that proposed amendments shall become part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, 'as the one of the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress,' plainly and without ambiguity places the choice between these two modes in the sole discretion of Congress, and cannot by construction be read as requiring that changes detracting from the liberty of the citizens, distinguished from changes in the character of federal means or machinery, shall be referred to conventions, p. 730.

"3. The Constitution was written to be understood by the voters; its words and phrases were used in their normal and ordinary as distinguished from technical meaning; where the intention is clear there is no room for construction and no excuse for interpolation or addition, p. 731.

"4. The fact that an instrument drawn with such meticulous care, and by men who so well understood how to make language fit their thought does not contain any phrase limiting the exercise of discretion by the Congress in choosing one or the other alternative modes of ratification, is persuasive evidence that no qualification was intended. p. 732."

Applying this interpretation to the instant case it would appear that the Congress is left without authority to determine the wisdom, propriety or desirability of the applications and their purposes. Certainly it would not be a decision for the Congress to make as to whether or not there should be a Constitutional Convention this decision has already been made by the States, assuming 34 applications. Only when an amendment or amendments as had been requested had been proposed by Congress for ratification could the Congress constitutionally ignore the mandate of the State legislatures calling for a Convention. The action of Congress in this instance would seem to be purely and simply ministerial. To reinforce this view, if indeed reinforcement is needed, is the unquestionable fact that the Constitutional Convention of 1787 adopted the Convention clause of article V because of fear, a fear it appears that demonstrates no little foresight, that an oppressive Federal administration might refuse to yield to the demands of the States for a change in the fundamental law.

ENFORCEMENT BY COURT ORDER

Since the action required of Congress in calling a Constitutional Convention is purely ministerial in fact not even legislative, can it be compelled to do so against its wishes, by court order? Recognizing the doctrine of separation of powers and the somewhat battered principle of political question, it appears that a recalcitrant Congress can be compelled to act.

It is a well-established principle of law that the courts will compel the doing of purely ministerial acts. This is normally accomplished by mandamus and is frequently referred to as a writ commanding the performance of a particular duty which results from the official station of the one to whom it is directed.

In one of its very early decisions, Marbury v. Madison (February 1803) 1 Cranch 137, the Supreme Court clearly established the principle that the Court can command the performance of a purely ministerial act by an official of a coequal branch of Government, the Executive. Some excerpts from that opinion are particularly applicable. On page 103, the Court said:

"The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of man. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right."

On page 166:

"But where a specific duty is assigned by law, and individual rights depend upon the performance of that duty, it seems equally clear that the individual who considers himself injured, has a right to resort to the laws of this country for a remedy."

On page 170:

"What is there in the exalted station of the officer, which shall bar a citizen from asserting, in a court of Justice, his legal rights, or shall forbid a court to listen to the claim, or to issue a mandamus, directing the performance of a duty, not depending on executive discretion, but on particular acts of Congress and the general principles of law?"

And on page 179:

"From these, and many other selections which might be made, it is apparent that the Framers of the Constitution contemplated that instrument as a rule for the government of courts as well as of the legislature."

Applying the reasoning of the Court in that landmark case to the problem at hand can it earnestly be contended that the people, through their representatives in the State legislature can be denied by the Congress one of the most fundamental rights they possess, that of altering the basic document under which the whole process of government operates, the Constitution, and that the Court is without authority to enforce this right? If this be true, that the right of two-thirds of the States to secure a Constitutional Convention upon application to Congress is a nonenforceable right, then we have ceased to be a Government of laws. Indeed, for the Court to refuse to enforce this right it would have to cast aside a whole series of decisions, not the least of which would be those affirming the validity and propriety of several articles of amendment. But, more importantly, the people's sovereignty would once and for all have been destroyed.

The Court has had no difficulty in recent cases involving the legislatures. Granted they are State legislatures, but the principle remains the same. The Court secured compliance with its orders even though the action involved was to a certain extent legislative whereas in our case it clearly is not. These cases involved apportionment, beginning with Baker against Carr and more recently Reynolds against Sims, and related cases. In those instances, where a legislature refused to obey an order to redistrict, the Court developed its own districting plan and directed elections to be held. It is really not arguable that the right of two-thirds of the State legislatures for a Constitutional Convention clearly provided by article V is less a right than that of the people of Tennessee to have reapportionment of their State legislature.

Should the Congress fail to respond affirmatively to the applications of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States for a Constitutional Convention, it would appear that the Supreme Court could enforce this right, and that precedent for it to do so exists. Should the Congress refuse to comply with the writ, the Court, in enforcing this right, could itself order the Convention. Some State legislatures, I would be certain, would pursue this form of remedy should the Congress fail to act.

I trust in this somewhat lengthy presentation a base has been provided for rational discussion of the issue before us. It would have been far simpler to engage in a bit of rhetoric rather than citing the ample precedent, intent and law which prevails. However, it is my observation that this deliberative body, now engaged in a considerable constitutional discussion, prefers fact to fun in reaching its conclusions.

For myself, as I have stated, should this body, through inaction in proposing a reapportionment constitutional amendment, vote the mandatory alternative of a Convention, I have no more fear of the outcome than did the delegates to Philadelphia in 1787, when they provided this course of action for the situation they could foresee which now has arisen.

If there are those among my colleagues who are fearful of a Convention, I suggest they respond now to the call of the States by proposing the necessary amendment to the States for ratification or rejection.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

There are several elements which I believe should be included in the proposed constitutional amendment:

First. The proposal should be entirely permissive in nature. Each State could make its own determination whether or not it wishes to make use of provisions for constituting one house of its legislature on the basis of factors other than population or constituting both houses on the basis of population.

Second. Reapportionment would be mandatory every 10 years.

Third. Any State electing to constitute one house of its legislature on the basis of factors other than population would be required to submit alternate plans to the electorate for approval or rejection—one plan for population only in both houses, the other a little Federal plan.

Fourth. A section should be considered protecting the right of the States to determine the composition of the subdivisions of State government—county boards of supervisors, school districts, city councils, and so on.

Fifth. A section reasserting the right of every State to two U.S. Senators, and providing that States cannot be combined for purposes of membership in the U.S. Senate.

Sixth. A section reasserting the right of every State to proportionate membership in the House of Representatives, with no State having less than one member, and a stipulation that State boundaries cannot be crossed in the composition of congressional districts.

The voice of the people has been made abundantly clear on this issue. Now it is up to us to let the people decide—either through a Convention called for that purpose or a proposed constitutional amendment by this Congress. For the life of me, I can find no rationale for denying the people of this country the right to decide—which they now request. If we, the Congress, cannot trust the people, we have no right to be here. Frankly, no amount of verbal obfuscation can hide the fact that this is the real issue up for decision.

EXHIBIT 1

The four proposals as to methods of future amendments of the Constitution which were submitted in the Constitutional Convention, were as follows. One by Charles Pinckney, on May 29; one by Edmund Randolph on that same day; the third by William Patterson on June 15; and the fourth by Alexander Hamilton on June 18.

PINCKNEY

Mr. Pinckney proposed the following:

"If two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States apply for the same, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution; or, should Congress, with the consent of two-thirds of each House, propose to the States amendments to the same, the agreement of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States shall be sufficient to make the said amendments parts of the Constitution."

As Pinkney explained it, this article:[1]

". . . proposes to declare, that if it should hereafter appear necessary to the United States to recommend the Grant of any additional Powers, that the assent of a given number of the States shall be sufficient to invest them and bind the Union as fully as if they had been confirmed by the Legislatures of all the States."

Pinckney feared the requirement of unanimous consent to any change, as found in the Articles, because "it is to this unanimous consent the depressed situation of the Union is undoubtedly owing . . ."[2]

RANDOLPH

Randolph proposed the following language:

"Resolved that provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union, whensoever it shall seem necessary; and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto."

MASON

Mason, on June 11, in defending the proposal for providing some means of amendment said that it would:

". . . be better to provide for them in an easy, regular and constitutional way, than to trust to chance and violence. It would be improper to require the consent of the National Legislature, because they may abuse their power, and refuse their assent on that very account. The opportunity for such an abuse may be the fault of the Constitution calling for an amendment."

As various details of what is now Article V were discussed and agreed to, a motion was made by Governors Morris and Gerry to amend proposed Article V, so that the Convention clause might be inserted providing that a Convention for proposing amendments would be called on application of two-thirds of the States. Madison, however, "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments applied for by two-thirds of the States as to call a Convention on the like application."[3] He had no objection to providing for a Convention, as he had previously indicated, but did foresee "that difficulties might arise as to the form, the quorum, etc., which in Constitutional regulations ought to be as much as possible avoided."[4] The motion to amend so as to require a Convention was approved without dissent and was worded in such a fashion as to make it mandatory that Congress call a Convention upon application by two-thirds of the States.

YALE LAW SCHOOL,
New Haven Conn., October 2, 1967.

Prof. PHILIP B. KURLAND,
Chief Consultant, Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, U.S. Senate, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR PHIL: This is in reply to your request for comment on Senator Ervin's bill, S. 2307. You may make such use as you wish of this letter, including publishing it in the Subcommittee's record of hearings. I will give you my views more or less seriatim, following the arrangement of the bill, and in rather summary fashion.

I have absolutely no doubt that Congress has the authority to legislate about the process of amendment by convention, and to settle every point not actually

---

[1] The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 120 (Farrand ed. 1937). Farrand indicates that Pinckney's explanation of this Article XVI was made on May 28, the day before he presented it to the Convention.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Madison, Journal of the Federal Constitution (Scott ed. 1908). Note 13 at 737.

[4] (Ed. Omitted in original).

settled by Article V of the Constitution itself. Obviously the fifty state legislatures cannot themselves legislate on this subject. The constitutional convention cannot do so for it must first be brought into being. All that is left, therefore, is Congress, which in any event, in respect of other issues not specifically settled by the Constitution, as well, has the residual power to legislate on matters that require uniform settlement.

I do not think that Article V foresees only a convention charged with writing a wholly new constitution. On the other hand—and this is the important point— I fully agree with the view of my colleague Charles L. Black, Jr. (see "The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster," 72 Yale Law Journal 878, 962 et seq. [1963] that the language of Article V means that while the legislatures of two-thirds of the states may impose upon Congress the obligation to call a convention which shall consider amendments to the constitution, the legislatures have no authority to require Congress to call a convention to consider a particular amendment or even a particular issue, or even just a set of particular amendments. In other words, a convention need not be called to write a new constitution, but nobody can restrict it to the consideration of certain topics only, and forbid it to consider other ones, or forbid it, in other words, to write a new constitution if it chooses. This would seem to be the thrust of the language of Article V, which says that "on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, [Congress] shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments." A convention for proposing, as Mr. Black points out, not for ratifying either a text or an idea submitted by the legislatures, nor even for considering such a text or such an idea, but for proposing, which means freedom to canvass matters afresh and to weigh all possibilities and alternatives. And for proposing Amendments, which suggests, in the plural, canvassing possibilities for improving the Constitution, not ratifying or considering a single possibility.

On principle, the point is that no constitutional change should go forward to ratification separately by the states without having first undergone examination and debate in a national forum, whether it be Congress or a convention, and that the nature and scope of the debate and examination in such a national forum must not be predetermined by the separate decisions of the states. Quite clearly, therefore, the states have no authority to require Congress to submit a given text of a proposed constitutional amendment to a convention, to be voted up or down. Equally clearly, the states may not require Congress to submit a single subject, demanding action one way or the other on it alone, for it is surely a basic fact of politics in all its forms that consideration and debate of a political subject can be full and real only if there is opportunity for compromise and give-and-take. Such opportunity requires that the decision-making body have authority to consider more than a single, closely-defined subject, so that concessions from one side on one matter can be matched by concession from another on a perhaps seemingly discreet matter, to the end that a final package acceptable to all may emerge. That was how the original constitutional convention itself worked. Any other conditions threaten either breakdown, or rigid ideological decisions. He, moreover, who has the power to frame an issue and isolate it for decision will often have the power, in consequence, to predetermine the decision. If, then, the state legislatures could restrict the convention to consideration of a single, narrow subject only, they might be in a position effectively to ensure that a given result was reached. (The validity of this observation may be verified in states in which the governor has power to prescribe the only subject or subjects to be considered in special sessions of the legislature called by him.) The consequence, if this were allowed, would be that, in some measure, a constitutional change would go forward to ratification which had not received full or even meaningful consideration and debate in any national forum, but had, in some measure, been predetermined in the separate legislative forums of the states. That, in turn, it seems to me, would be a situation plainly contrary to the purpose which informs Article V.

I see no reason for explicitly and absolutely disabling Congress from reviewing any and all possible procedures adopted by state legislatures in calling for constitutional conventions. In general, of course, state legislatures ought to be masters of their own procedure, but no one can now foresee all possible wrinkles of the procedural problem, and I should think it much better to say nothing about the power of Congress to review state legislative procedures in respect of the calling of a constitutional convention. The situation then would be that Congress would presumably retain some power, rarely to be exercised, and indeterminate and unforeseeable in nature.

I would specifically require that resolutions calling for a constitutional convention be submitted to governors for approval or veto in accordance with procedures followed in other legislative matters in the state concerned. There is nothing that particularly qualifies legislatures as such to call for constitutional conventions. What we are in search of here is the will of the people of the state, and that will ought to be expressed, in this instance above all, perhaps, in the way in which, under the constitution of a state, it is normally expressed on matters of importance, since presumably it is the judgment of the state that that is how the will of the people is best and most reliably expressed.

It might be well to say something at this point in the bill on a question that is much mooted, namely whether a legislature that has been held to be malapportioned, or that is under a decree requiring it to reapportion and perhaps qualify its powers in some measure before reapportionment, can validly pass a resolution for a constitutional convention. I should think in general it could, unless an outstanding decree forbids, either specifically or by mentioning some analogous forbidden function, but I should think it would be well to be clear on this point.

I should think the six-year—and quite possibly longer—period provided for in Section 5(a) of the bill is too long. The Constitution contemplates a concurrent desire on the part of the legislatures of a sufficient number of states, and such a concurrent desire can scarcely be said to exist, or to reflect in each state the will of the people, if too long a period of time has passed from the date of enactment of the first resolution to the date of enactment of the last. True enough, legislatures are free to change their minds, but the passage of a repealer is a different and more difficult political act than the defeat, starting fresh, of a resolution calling for a constitutional convention. The fact, therefore, that a legislature has not repealed a resolution calling for a convention is an insufficient indication that the state in question, after the passage of as long as six years, still favors the calling of a convention. The life of a single Congress may be too short a time limit to impose, but anything over four years seems to me too long.

Section 6(a) seems to me too restrictive of the power of Congress. It is a matter of drafting, really, but I should suppose that Congress must retain the power to determine not only whether the recitation of the Clerk that the requisite number of applications have been made and are in effect is correct, but also a power to determine from time to time, on the basis of questions that cannot all now be foreseeable, whether all the applications are valid. Again, I see no reason to decide now that all amendments proposed by a convention shall be ratified by legislatures rather than by conventions in the several states. On the contrary, I should think there would be good reason to provide for ratification by conventions, since the legislatures have already—as is not true when Congress proposes an amendment—been involved in the amending process. At any rate, it should be left open to future Congresses to decide from time to time whether they want ratification by legislatures or by conventions in the states.

I should think the national interest, the welfare of the entire nation, is too closely affected to permit the states to decide, each for itself, how the delegates to a national constitutional convention shall be elected or, indeed, appointed. I should think it would be wise to provide that all delegates must be elected by the same constituency that elects the states' representatives in Congress, and to provide further that a certain proportion of the delegates may be elected from districts, and that, depending on the size of the state, no fewer than a certain number and no more than a third should be elected at large. Only thus, it seems to me, can all the interests in a state, the particular ones and the general ones, find adequate representation. I say nothing for the moment about the problem of apportioning districts for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, except to remark that it seems to me Congress ought to have the power to say, at least in an extreme case, that the districts from which a state elected delegates were invidiously malapportioned, and that an election of delegates is therefore invalid.

I have made it clear at the beginning that I think the provision in Section 8(a) that each delegate must agree not to change or alter any part of the Constitution which has not been specified in the resolution calling the convention is quite wrong.

I see no reason for following the precedent of the original convention by giving each state one vote. The framers, in adopting such a procedure for themselves, worked against the background of the Congress of the confederation, in which the states voted as equal units, and they feared to break this precedent, because if they had tried to do so, they might have made the very constitutional convention impossible. But perhaps their chief purpose in framing the new constitution was, for the future, to break away from this stultifying precedent. Why should we now return to it, after nearly two hundred years in which we have been accustomed in our national institutions—except on the one occasion when the House elected a President—to a different and of course more democratic method? Besides, whatever the convention does is to be ratified by the states, and in ratifying the states do vote as units, Alaska being equal to New York. It that not sufficient?

Again, I have indicated at the beginning my disagreement with Section 10(b) of the bill. The point again arises in the last few lines of Section 11(b).

I see by Section 13(a) that Congress is meant to retain the option of submitting amendments to ratification by conventions in the states rather than by legislatures. So the provision, on which I commented earlier, in Section 6(a), on page 5, line 24, and page 6, line 1, which seems to indicate that Congress may submit for ratification only by legislatures must be a mistake of drafting.

One final point. I see no reason why any and all actions to be taken by Congress pursuant to this bill with respect to constitutional conventions should be anything but subject, in the ordinary way, to Presidential approval under Article I, Section 7, Clause 3 of the Constitution. In this respect also I agree with the views of my colleague Charles L. Black, Jr., expressed in the article cited above (see 72 Yale L.J. at 965). Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378 (1798), is to the contrary so far as the function of Congress in proposing amendments is concerned. but, as Mr. Black says, this precedent "is inherently weak." (C. F. Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355 [1932]).

Sincerely,

Alexander M. Bickel,

[Consultant, Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, U.S. Senate].

[MEMORANDUM]

Re: S. 2307

To: Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., Chairman, Subcommittee on Separation of Powers.

From: Philip B. Kurland, Chief Consultant Subcommittee on Separation of Powers.

At the outset it should be noted that this bill can be drawn so as to place as many hurdles as possible in the way of effective use of the process of Constitutional amendment in response to a call by state legislatures for a convention to propose amendments. Or it can be drawn in a manner that will make such process a possible, however improbable, method of effecting constitutional change. I have assumed that it is the Committee's desire to take the second road. The first objective might better be served by the absence of law specifying appropriate procedures.

1. Perhaps the primary and most difficult issue raised by the bill is the question of the propriety of limiting the scope and authority of a convention called in response to the appropriate applications from the States. You have already received Professor Alexander Bickel's opinion that the subject matter of the convention action is not subject to limitation. I am in agreement with his statement that "the states have no authority to require Congress to submit a given text of a proposed constitutional amendment, to be voted up or down." I disagree, however, that "the states may not require Congress to submit a single subject, demanding action . . . on it alone." It is the latter for which this bill provides and, I am confident, that this is in keeping with the intent and function of Article V.

Let me concede at the outset that a literal reading of the words of Article V, removed from the context of their promulgation and their history, would provide a base for Professor Bickel's position and that of the authority he cites, Professor Charles Black. I do not believe, however, that their reading is either necessary or appropriate to the document under consideration.

The history of Article V at the Convention is set out for your study in the appendix hereto.* The appendix consists of materials derived from Farrand's

*The material referred to appears at p. 96.

The Records of the Federal Convention (1937 ed.). I have also appended Professor Farrand's own reading of these materials as revealed in his The Framing of the Constitution of the United States (1913).

My own reading of these materials is this. First, the founders were concerned lest they place the new government in the same strait-jacket that inhibited the Confederation, unable to change fundamental law without the consent of every state. The amendment process, rather a novelty for the time, was therefore included in the Constitution itself. Second, the forces at the convention that sought to limit the power of originating amendments to the States were at first dominant. The forces that would limit the power of the origination of amendments to the national legislature then became prevalent. The argument on each side was persuasive, i.e., that the improprieties or excesses of power in the national government would not likely be corrected except by State initiative, while improprieties by the State governments or deficiencies in national power would not likely be corrected except by national initiative. In the spirit that typified the 1787 convention, the result was to make provision for recognizing both claims. Neither method was expected to be superior to or easier of accomplishment than the other. It certainly was not intended that the national legislature promote individual amendments while the state legislatures were to be concerned with more extensive revisions.

It seems to me, that what the members of the convention were concerned with, in both cases, was the power to make specific amendments. They did not appear to anticipate a need for a general revision of the Constitution. And certainly this was understandable, in light of the difficulties that they had in finding the compromises to satisfy the divergent interests needed for ratification of their efforts. Provision for two exceptions to the amendment power underlines the notion that the convention anticipated specific amendment or amendments rather than general revision. For it is doubtful that the exceptions in Article V could have been expected to control a later general revision.

My construction of Article V, with reference to the initiation of the amendment procedure by the State legislatures, is certainly not inconsistent with the literal language of the Article. As I see it, Article V anticipated that the role of the States in filing their applications would be to identify the problem or problems that they believed to call for constitutional resolution by way of Amendment. The role of the convention that would be called by reason of such action by the States would then be to decide whether the problem called for correction by constitutional amendment and, if so, to propose, i.e., to frame, the amendment itself, for ratification as provided in Article V. To my mind, the language of the bill under consideration fully accords with the mandate of Article V.

I would suggest, moreover, that the reading given by Professor Bickel is neither a practicable nor a desirable one. If the subject matter of amendments were to be left entirely to the convention, it would be hard to expect the States to call for a convention in the absence of a general discontent with the existing construction of the Constitution. This construction limits the States to call for conventions where there is a need for a general revision rather than specific revision. Alternatively, under the Bickel construction, applications for a convention deriving in some States from a dissatisfaction with the School Desegregation Cases, in others because of the School Prayer Cases, and in still others by reason of objection to the Miranda rule, could all be combined to make up the requisite two-thirds of the States needed to meet the requirements of Article V. I find it hard to believe that this is the type of consensus that was thought to be appropriate to calling for a convention. For if such disparate demands were sufficient, all the applications to date should be added up—and there are a large number of them—to see whether, in what is considered an appropriate span of time, two-thirds of the States have made demands for a constitutional convention to propose amendments, no matter the cause for applications or the specifications therein.

The intention of Article V was clearly to place the power of initiation of amendments in the State legislatures. The function of the convention was to provide a mechanism for effectuating this initiative. The bill carries out this intention in keeping not only with the letter but also with the spirit of Article V.

2. On the question whether Presidential approval is required by Article I, § 7, for Congressional provision for a convention it is clear that the literal interpretation given by Professor Bickel, in reliance on Professor Black, has long since been rejected by American history. Professor Corwin pointed out in his annotation to Article I, § 7:

The sweeping nature of this obviously ill-considered provision is emphasized by the single exception specified to its operation. Actually, it was impossible from the first to give it any such scope. Otherwise the intermediate stages of the legislative process would have been bogged down hopelessly, not to mention other highly undesirable results. In a report rendered by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1897 it was shown that the word "necessary" in the clause had come in practice to refer "to the necessity occasioned by the requirement of other provisions of the Constitution, whereby every exercise of 'legislative powers' involves the concurrence of the two Houses"; or more briefly, "necessary" here means necessary if an "order, resolution, or vote" is to have the force of law. Such resolutions have come to be termed "joint resolutions" and stand on a level with "bills," which if "enacted" becomes Statutes. But "votes" taken in either House preliminary to the final passage of legislation need not be submitted to the President, nor resolutions passed by the Houses concurrently with a view to expressing an opinion or to devising a common program of action (e.g., the concurrent resolutions by which during the fight over Reconstruction the Southern States were excluded from representation in the House and Senate, the Joint Committee on Reconstruction containing members from both Houses were created, etc.), or to directing the expenditure of money appropriated to the use of the two Houses.[17] Within recent years the concurrent resolution has been put to a new use—the termination of powers delegated to the Chief Executive, or the disapproval of particular exercises of power by him. Most of the important legislation enacted for the prosecution of World War II provided that the powers granted to the President should come to an end upon adoption of concurrent resolutions to that effect.[18] Similarly, measures authorizing the President to reorganize executive agencies have provided that a Reorganization Plan promulgated by him should be reported to Congress and should not become effective if one [19] or both [20] Houses adopted a resolution disapproving it. Also, it was settled as early as 1789 that resolutions of Congress proposing amendments to the Constitution need not be submitted to the President, the Bill of Rights having been referred to the States without being laid before President Washington for his approval—a procedure which the Court ratified in due course.

---

[17] 54th Cong., 2d Sess., S. Rept. 1335; 4 Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives, § 3483 (1907).

[18] See e.g., Lend Lease Act of March 11, 1941 (55 Stat. 31); First War Powers Act of December 18, 1941 (55 Stat. 838); Emergency Price Control Act of January 30, 1942 (56 Stat. 23); Stabilization Act of October 2, 1942 (56 Stat. 765); War Labor Disputes Act of June 25, 1943 (57 Stat. 163).

[19] Reorganization Act of June 20, 1949 (63 Stat. 203).

[20] Reorganization Act of April 3, 1939 (53 Stat. 561).

(The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation 135–36 [S. Doc. No. 39, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., 1964 ed.]).

Moreover, with reference to the specific practice concerning proposals of constitutional amendments, the case is, as Corwin indicated, far stronger than the suggestion of the isolated opinions of Hollingsworth v. Virginia (3 Dall. 378 [1798]). No successful proposed amendment, starting with the First, has ever required the signature of the President. And Professor Black to the contrary notwithstanding, the authorities were pretty well agreed—before the suggestion of reapportionment amendments—to the propriety of dispensing with such approval.

Thus, Professor Andrew C. McLaughlin, writing about the amendment to abolish slavery, wrote:

> After the election of Lincoln in the autumn of 1864, and after a summer of success accompanied by horrible slaughter on the battlefronts, the amendment came once more before the House. It was carried by a vote of 119 to 53—an astonishing result on the whole: after nearly four years of civil strife, a shifting of three votes to the negative would have prevented its passage. It was submitted to the President and signed by him; but such signature, it may be noticed, was unnecessary, if not actually improper. Senator Trumbull immediately proposed and the Senate passed a resolution stating that the approval was unnecessary and should not be taken as a precedent.

(McLaughlin, A Constitutional History of the United States 635 [1935]).

And Professor Orfield summarized the authorities and reached the same conclusion:

> In spite of the early decision of the point, there seem to have been some doubts as to the necessity of the President's approval. Jameson, Constitutional Conventions, 4th ed. (1887) §§ 556–561. In 1803 a motion in the Senate to submit the Twelfth Amendment to the President was defeated. In 1861 the President signed the Corwin amendment without anyone's protesting. President Lincoln inadvertently signed the Thirteenth Amendment, but immediately notified Congress, and the Senate adopted a motion that his approval was unnecessary and not a precedent. In submitting the Fourteenth Amendment to the states, President Johnson informed Congress that he was acting in a purely ministerial capacity. The President has signed no subsequent amendments. President John Quincy Adams was of the view that the President should not even suggest amendments to Congress. At present resolutions of amendment are printed in the statutes as signed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, and attested to by the clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate.
>
> Some state decisions have distinguished between the proposal and the submission of an amendment, and assert that the governor must approve the latter. Hatch v. Stoneman, (1885) 66 Cal. 632, 6 P. 734. This has not been the practice of Congress, which has always performed both acts in a single resolution. Jameson is of the view that both the submission of a state amendment and the call of a state convention are legislative. Jameson, Constitutional Conventions, 4th ed. (1887) 567. But it seems doubtful that the President's approval would be required if Congress were to call a convention, particularly as the call arises at the application of the state legislatures. The same reasoning would seem to apply to an attempted distinction between the proposal and the selection of the mode of ratification, whether by legislatures or conventions.

(Orfield, Amending the Federal Constitution 50 n. 30 [1942]).

The requirement of Presidential approval would mean that, although the States had properly called for a convention to sponsor amendments and although Congress had provided appropriate machinery, the Congressional provision would require a two-thirds majority if the President did not cotton to the idea of the amendments proposed. With such a majority behind a proposed constitutional amendment, there would be no need for State initiative at all.

The Constitution made the amendment process difficult. It certainly was not the intention of the original Convention to make it impossible. Nor is it possible to attribute to the founders the concept that amendments originating in the States should have so much harder a time of it than those proposed by Congress. That issue was fought out in the 1789 convention and resolved in favor of two originating sources, not one, as the materials collected in the appendix hereto amply demonstrate.

I respectfully submit that Presidential acquiescence in all but the ministerial role of Congress in providing for a convention is not required by the Constitution. Indeed, a strong case could be made out that the Constitution, construed throughout our history, precludes such participation by the executive in the amendment process.

3. So, too, I am in disagreement with Professor Bickel on the desirability or need for submitting the application of state legislatures to the possibility of gubernatorial veto. We do not have here any question about the exercise of the lawmaking process by a state legislature in combination with whatever executive participation might be called for by state law. We have here rather a question, as Professor Bickel recognizes, of heeding the voice of the people of a State in expressing the possible need for a change in the fundamental document. It seems clear to me that the founders saw the state legislatures in the proper role of the representative of the people. The executive veto, a carryover from the requirement of royal assent, was not regarded as the expression of popular opinion at the time of the 1787 convention. And, to retort to the kind of literalism invoked by others as appropriate for construction of other provisions of Article V, and of Article I, § 7, the language of Article V definitely asserts that the appropriate applications are to come from "the Legislatures."

4. My final point of substantial disagreement with Professor Bickel relates to the appropriate period of time within which the applications of the state legislatures must be filed. I have already pointed out that I do not think that applications for a convention based on disparate subjects should be added together for purposes of determining the existence of a number sufficient to require the call of a convention. The issue then is what is an appropriate time for 50 legislatures, many with biennial session, to give adequate consideration to, and take appropriate action on, a problem that must be resolved, if it is to be resolved at all, by constitutional amendment. For a long time now it has apparently been the view of Congress that a seven-year period is the appropriate time limit within which States must act if they are to ratify a constitutional amendment proposed by Congress. The very factors that are relevant to the ratification process are also relevant to the application process. The period must be short enough so that the actions of the States really represent a concurrent consensus. On the other hand, the period must be long enough to overcome the difficulties of securing the views of fifty legislatures. I do not find any magic in the number seven but any period substantially less than that seems to me to fail to take account of the practical difficulties involved in securing action by state legislatures.

5. Having spent my time to this point in disagreement with Professor Bickel, I would now underline some of the points of agreement between us.

a. I have no doubt about the power and desirability of the Congress to make provision for appropriate processes for effectuating the terms of Article V.

b. I tend to agree, with less certainty, that there should be no provision "disabling Congress from reviewing . . . procedures adopted by state legislatures in calling for constitutional conventions."

c. I wholeheartedly agree that a "malapportioned legislature" can validly make application for a constitutional convention. To open the question of the propriety of legislative composition would be to open a Pandora's box and might raise constitutional doubts about the validity even of the Fourteenth Amendment itself.

d. I would agree that provision should be made for the method of selection of delegates to the convention. Professor Bickel's proposal on this score commends itself to me.

e. Finally, I would agree that the vote at the convention ought to be on a per capita basis rather than by States. As Professor Bickel points out, the ratification process will necessarily be in terms of State votes. It seems appropriate—and in keeping with the spirit of the 1787 convention—to recognize the interests of majority rule in the method for proposing the amendments.

I would end this memorandum where I began it, by pointing out that the essential issues are not to be found in the details for the bill under consideration but rather in the question of whether you want to destroy this means of constitutional amendment or effectuate it.

Memorandum

By Robert G. McCloskey, Consultant, Subcommittee on Separation of Powers

Re S. 2307 Proposed constitutional convention bill.

Herewith some reflections on, and suggestions about, S. 2307. I regret that I was unable to attend the hearings on October 31. It is possible that some of my thoughts overlap those expressed by Professors Bickel and Mendelson on that day.

Leaving aside matters of minor detail, it seems to me that there are three constitutional or policy problems posed by the bill: One, the question whether it is desirable to enact such a law at all in advance; Two, the question of Congress' constitutional power—and elbow-room—in dealing with this subject; Three, the question of what form the legislation, if enacted, should take. Obviously the answer to the third question will depend in part on the answers to the first two.

One. I will not pause long over this question, though I had some doubts about it when I first heard of the proposal. It is not easy to anticipate all the problems that may present themselves in a procedure like this, nor to deal with those problems wisely in the abstract. On consideration, I do think that a bill on the subject should be passed in order to avoid what might well be an unseemly and chaotic imbroglio if the question of procedure were to arise simultaneously with the presentation of a substantive issue by two-thirds of the state legislatures. But while I do believe that a law should be enacted, I also believe that framers of such a law should be extremely careful to close as few doors as possible. This will be what might be called "quasi-organic" legislation. That is, it relates not merely to a current policy question but to the basis on which our whole governmental system rests; in England it would be recognized as a constitutional statute. When dealing with such a measure, it is best to bear in mind Marshall's well-worn aphorism that it is a constitution we are expounding, and not get involved in "an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must [be] seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur".

Two. I have no doubt that Article V. is, as Hamilton said, "peremptory"; that Congress is honor-bound to call a convention when two-thirds of the states apply for one, if it is satisfied that the applications are in order. However I equally have no doubt that Congress has full authority to prescribe and determine what a valid application shall be; and is further authorized to provide as it chooses for the selection of delegates and the procedures that will govern the convention's operations, As to the first point, Congress is made the agency for calling the convention, and it is hard to see why Congress should have been brought into the matter at all unless it was expected to determine when sufficient appropriate applications had been received. As to the second point, the same argument strikes me as compelling: if Congress was not expected to provide for the selection and procedures of the convention, why were no provisions made for those matters in Article V, itself? It would be perfectly simple for the Article to provide for delegation of those arrangements to the states. When we add to this argument the weight of the "necessary and proper clause" and the authority of Coleman v. Miller for the proposition that the amending process is in the congressional domain, the conclusion seems inescapable. Congress has plenary power to provide for the selection and procedures of the convention. Nor do I think Congress is trammeled here by the provisions of Article V. relating to ratification. The states as states must give approval to proposed amendments, because that is what Article V. says. But the Article says nothing at all about how the convention shall be chosen or operate; and I think for the reasons given that that omission leaves decision on those matters in Congress' hands.

Three. This brings me to the question of the form the legislation should take. The answer depends in part on constitutional considerations, which I have touched on above. It also depends in part on the policy premises we start with. The general policy issues raised by the proposed legislation are, I think, two, which can be framed as queries: should the law aim to make the amendment process difficult or easy? Should it lean toward majority-controlled or minority-controlled arrangements? Plainly there is some relationship between these issues. I suppose that the smaller the minority that exercises effective control over the proposing process, the greater would the ease of getting that minority's proposals through. On the other hand the same minority would presumably have a veto on majority proposals. So an arrangement that emphasized minority control (e.g. each state having one vote in the convention) would make the amending process easier for the minority and harder for the majority.

My own view, to be as brief as I can about it, is that the amending process should be made as difficult as the language and intent of the Constitution will permit. We have the oldest stable constitutional system in the world; and I think its stability is related to its immutability, or relative immutability. Even the alterations that the Supreme Court has brought about have been, until lately, gradual and "Burkean". I don't think we should loosen up the whole amending process simply because the judicial amending process has been used a bit too cavalierly in recent years.

It is partly because I would prefer to keep the amending process difficult that I would also lean toward the majority principle in shaping convention procedures. As I have suggested, the minority-rule procedures that are built into the bill as it stands would make amendment easier, and I object to them on that ground. But there are other reasons for believing that the procedures should give more weight to majority rule. I am quite aware that the Framers were not simple majoritarians, and I am not one myself. As a matter of taste and political theory, I think there is a lot to be said for giving the minority a voice and some control in the governmental process. But I do not think that my taste and the expectations of the American people necessarily coincide. I believe that, in spite of the constitutional departures from the majority principle in such institutions as the Electoral College and the Senate, the nation as a whole has come to think of majoritarianism as a normative standard and would be shocked and unsettled by an organic measure that was not enacted by a popular majority. Indeed I would be most apprehensive about the political peace of the nation if, because of the fortuities of the Electoral College, a presidential candidate with substantially fewer popular votes than an opponent won the office. The reaction to the election of 1876 is not reassuring, and I suspect that the popular commitment to majoritarianism has hardened considerably since then.

In short, within the limits imposed by the Constitution, I would seek to make the amending process more rather than less difficult; and would lean toward the majority principle in the arrangements that were prescribed.

Now let me turn to the specific provisions and language of the bill. My conclusions about this are based on the judgments just set forth.

A. p. 2, Sec. 3. (b). I would revise as follows:

Questions concerning the validity of State legislative procedure and of the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act shall be determinable by the Congress of the United States, and its decisions thereon shall be binding on all others, including State and Federal courts.

(I would keep this procedural check in Congress' hands in pursuance of my belief that the amendment process should not be made too easy, and because questions of irregularity and bad faith might, quite conceivably, arise. My trust in the incorruptibility and fairness of state legislatures is not overwhelming. It would be politically unhealthy if it could be plausibly charged that a constitutional amendment had come into being with the help of irregular state procedures.)

B. p. 2, Sec. 3. (c). I would strike this paragraph.

(It is clear that the Governor's approval is not required for legislative ratifications, and I would suppose that it is not required for legislative applications either, i.e. that Article V. uses "legislatures" in the same sense in both instances. But so far as I know the question has never been authoritatively decided, and I see no reason to emphasize the departure from majority control by giving this point up in advance.)

C. pp. 3–4, Sec. 5 (a). In line 3, p. 4 I would insert the words "a valid" after "Submitted", striking "an". In line 13, p. 4 I would insert "valid" after "have".

(This is in line with my conviction that Congress should determine the validity of an application on the basis of its judgment about the regularity of the legislative procedures. However, even in terms of the assumptions of the bill as it stands, the revision in line 13 would seem necessary in order to clarify what "pending" means. That is, I take it that Congress must determine whether all applications do concern the same subject, and that the prohibition against rescissions does not go into effect until that determination has been made with respect to thirty-four applications.)

D. p. 5, Sec. 6 (a). In line 14, p. 5 I would insert "valid" after "effect".

(Same reasons as above.)

E. p. 6, Sec. 7. (a). In line 16, p. 6 I would strike "or appointed". In line 20 I would strike "or appointment".

(The possibility of appointment needlessly qualifies the principle of popular control of these procedures)

F. p. 8, Sec. 9. (a). I would strike this whole paragraph and substitute:

"In voting on any question before the convention each delegate shall have one vote. Any final amendment proposal must receive the approval of two-thirds of the delegates."

(I realize that the Convention of 1787 voted by states and that a majority of state votes decided all interim questions. But the final draft of the proposed Constitution was approved "by the Unanimous Consent of the states present"—i.e. eleven states, Rhode Island being unrepresented and New York lacking a quorum; and an overwhelming majority of the individual delegates—thirty-nine out of forty-two—signed that final draft. It is most unlikely that the Constitution would have been presented to the states, or could have been ratified, if only a bare majority of either the state delegations or the individual delegates had approved it. Add to this the fact that Article V. requires a two-thirds vote of Congress to propose amendments, and I think there is little doubt that Congress may constitutionally impose a similar requirement on the convention. That it should impose such a requirement is suggested to me by my belief that the amending process should not be easy.

As for the rule that delegates vote as individuals, this strikes me as a prudent concession to the principle of popular control, for reasons already discussed. I think it falls well within Congress' plenary power over convention procedures)

G. p. 9, Sec. 10. (a). I would strike this subsection and begin Sec. 10 with present subsection (b).

H. p. 10, Sec. 11 (b). Beginning with the word "not" in line 8, I would strike the rest of that line and the whole of lines 9 through 12. I would substitute:

"adopted a concurrent resolution approving the submission of the proposed amendment to the states."

(Even in terms of the bill as it stands, I see no reason for limiting the possibility of disapproval to the ground that the proposal's general nature is different from that stated in the concurrent resolution. Suppose, for example, the convention had failed to abide by the procedures set up in Sec. 9. Would the Congress be obliged by Sec. 11 (b) to approve the proposals anyway? But my more general reason for suggesting this alteration is that I do not think we can anticipate the possibilities for procedural irregularities and disputes, and I therefore do not think Congress should surrender in advance its last opportunity to take a hand in this amending process. I assume, as I have all along, that Congress could not withhold approval merely because it objected to the policy of a proposal, but the line between policy and procedure can be fuzzy and unpredictable, and I would feel easier if Congress were left to determine it as the issue arises, rather than by a prospective disclaimer of this sort.)

Now for a final observation. The more I think about this bill as it stands, the more it seems to me to facilitate amendment proposals by minority political forces. But I think that those who feel a grievance because minority claims are currently being overridden should reflect that "facilitation" (if there is such a barbarous word) is a two-edged sword. By making it easier to embody minority views in constitutional amendments they also make the amendment process easier for an overweening majority to exploit. The elimination of the Governor from the application process, the provision for decision by a simple majority in the convention, the surrender of all but the narrowest congressional control, the whole imperative, automatic spirit of the bill would set a precedent for a majority to follow in working its will on minorities in the future. The only provision that looks the other way is the present provision for one-state-one-vote in the convention, and that could be wiped out in five minutes. What would remain would be a congressionally-established precedent for relatively easy constitutional amendment. As a believer in minority rights, I would think twice before setting such a precedent.

Bibliography

Calling of a Federal Constitutional Convention by State Petition

Selected References

Black, "The Proposed Amendment of Article V: A Threatened Disaster," 72 Yale Law Journal 957 (1963).

Black, "Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Would Return Us to Confederacy," 49 American Bar Association Journal 637 (1963).

Bonfield, "Proposing Constitutional Amendments by Convention: Some Problems," 39 Notre Dame Lawyer 659 (1964).

Brickfield, Cyril F., Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention, (Doc. Dis., George Washington University School of Law), published as a committee print, Committee on the Judiciary, United States House of Representatives, 85th Congress, 1st Session, (1957).

Caldwell, Freund, Bernard, "Debate of Three Proposed Constitutional Amendments," 53 Illinois Bar Journal 1040 (1965).

A Convention to Amend the Constitution?—Questions Involved in Calling a Convention upon Application by State Legislatures, American Enterprise Institute, Special Analysis No. 5, 90th Congress, June 16, 1967.

Corwin and Ramsey, "The Constitutional Law of a Constitutional Amendment," 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 185 (1951).

"Rewrite the U.S. Constitution? Interview With Senator Everett Dirksen," 62 United States News and World Report 63 (June 5, 1967).

Ervin, "Federal Constitutional Convention Act," Congressional Record (Daily Edition, August 17, 1967), pp. S11757–59.

Federal Constitutional Convention, Senate Document No. 78, 71st Congress, 2nd Session (1930).

Fennell, "States Rights Amendments—Debates of the 'Founding Fathers' Cast Doubts on Current Proposals," 35 New York State Bar Journal 465 (1963).

Fensterwald, "Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process—A Reply," 46 American Bar Association Journal 717 (1960).

Forkosch, "Alternative Amending Clauses in Article V: Reflections and Suggestions," 51 Minnesota Law Review 1053 (1967).

Graham, "The Role of the States in Proposing Constitutional Amendments," 49 American Bar Association Journal 1175 (1963).

Grinnel, "Petitioning Congress for a Convention: Cannot a State Change Its Mind?" 45 American Bar Association Journal 1165 (1959).

Hruska, "The Reapportionment Crisis," Congressional Record (Daily Edition, May 10, 1967) pp. S6650–55.

Hurst, "Memorandum Regarding Pending Proposals to Amend the United States Constitution," 36 Wisconsin Bar Bulletin 7 (1963).

Jameson, John A., A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions—Their History, Powers and Modes of Proceeding, (4th Ed., 1887).

Jenner, "Observations on the Proposed Alteration of the Constitutional Amendatory Procedure," 39 Notre Dame Lawyer 625 (1964).

McGovern, "Confederation vs. Union," 9 South Dakota Law Review 1 (1964).

Martig, "Amending the Constitution Article V: The Keystone of the Arch," 35 Michigan Law Review 1253 (1937).

Martin, "The Amending Power: The Ebinger Proposal," 40 American Bar Association Journal 767 (1954).

Monroe, "To Preserve the United States: A Brief for the Negative on Three Current Plans to Amend the Constitution," 8 St. Louis University Law Journal 533 (1964).

Note, "Proposed Constitutional Amendments: A New Definition of Federalism," 12 Journal of Public Law 448 (1963).

Note, "Proposing Amendments to the United States Constitution by Convention," 70 Harvard Law Review 1067 (1957).

Note, "Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions," 30 Chi-Kent Law Review 339 (1952).

Orfield, Lester B. Amending the Constitution (Ann Arbor: 1942).

Packard, "Constitutional Law: The States and the Amending Process," 45 American Bar Association Journal 161 (1959).

Packard, "The Inherent Safety in Calling a Convention for the Purpose of Proposing Amendments to the Constitution of the United States," 56 Dickinson Law Review 373 (1952); 13 Alabama Lawyer 141 (1952).

Packard, "Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program," 30 Chi-Kent Law Review 128 (1952).

Packard, "A Study in the Invalidity of Memorialization Rescission Resolution," 13 Alamaba Lawyer 309 (1952); 34 Chicago Bar Review 31 (1952); 30 Chi-Kent Law Review 339 (1952); 57 Dickinson Law Review 86 (1952).

Platz, "Article V of the Federal Constitution," 3 George Washington Law Review 17 (1934).

Proxmire, "One-Man, 10-Vote Advocates Beating Dead Horse," Cong. Rec. (Daily Edition, March 22, 1967), pp. S4209–10.

Pullen, "The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution," (Unpub. Dissertation, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1951).

Rhoads, "Three Proposed Amendments to the United States Constitution—A Challenge to Our Form of Government," 35 Pennsylvania Bar Association Quarterly 8 (1963).

Scheips, "The Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution," 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 46 (1950).

Shanahan, "Proposed Constitutional Amendments: They Will Strengthen Federal-State Relations," 49 American Bar Association Journal 631 (1963).

Simon, "Quiet Campaign: One State's Story," 50 Saturday Review 20 (July 15, 1967).

Sorenson, "Quiet Campaign to Rewrite the Constitution," 50 Saturday Review 17 (July 15, 1967).

Sprague, "Shall We Have a Federal Constitutional Convention, and What Shall It Do?" 3 Maine Law Review 115 (1910).

Swindler, "Current Challenge to Federalism; The Confederating Proposals," 52 Georgetown Law Journal 1 (1963).
Tuller, "A Convention to Amend the Constitution—Why Needed—How May It Be Obtained?" 11 North American Review 369 (1911).
Tydings, "Constitutional Convention—False Alarm," Congressional Record (Daily Edition, March 22, 1967) pp. S4231–43.
Tydings, "Speaking Out: They Want to Tamper with the Constitution; States Calling for a National Constitutional Convention," 240 Saturday Evening Post 10 (July 17, 1967).
Tydings, "Validity of Constitutional Convention Petitions Regarding Reapportionment," Congressional Record (Daily Edition, April 19, 1967) pp. S5451.
Tydings, "Who Wants a Constitutional Convention?" Congressional Record (Daily Edition, May 10, 1967) pp. S6655–57.
United States Congress. Joint Committee on the Economic Report and the Select Committee on Small Business of the House of Representatives, Constitutional Limitations on Federal Income, Estate, and Gift Tax Rates (Comm. Print), 82nd Congress, 2nd Session, 1952.
United States House of Representatives, Committee on the Judiciary, Hearings before Subcommittee No. 3, Amending the Constitution Relative to Taxes on Incomes, Inheritances and Gifts, 85th Congress, 1st Session, 1958.
United States House of Representatives, Committee on the Judiciary, Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates (Comm. Print), 82nd Congress, 2nd Session, 1952.
United States House of Representatives, Committee on the Judiciary, State Applications Asking Congress to Call a Federal Constitutional Convention (Comm. Print), 86th Congress, 1st Session, 1959.
United States House of Representatives, Committee on the Judiciary, State Applications Asking Congress to Call a Federal Constitutional Convention (Comm. Print), 87th Congress, 1st Session, 1961 [NOTE: Both this and the preceding item are summaries and updating of the Brickfield item, op. cit.]
United States Senate, Committee on the Judiciary, Hearings before a Subcommittee on S. J. Res. 23, Proposing an Amendment to the Constitution of the United States Relative to Taxes on Incomes, Inheritances, and Gifts. 83rd Congress, 2nd Session, 1954.
Wheeler, "Is a Constitutional Convention Impending?" 21 Illinois Law Review 782 (1927).
"Amending the Constitution to Strengthen the States in the Federal System," 19 State Government 10 (Winter No. 1, 1963).
"Hearings Scheduled on Bill Implementing Article V," 25 Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report 2179 (Oct. 27 1967).
"Reapportionment Convention Call Issued by 32 States," Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, pp. 439–40 (March 24, 1967).

○

Calendar No. 332

92D CONGRESS 1st Session | SENATE | REPORT No. 92-336

FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION PROCEDURES ACT

JULY 31, 1971.—Ordered to be printed

Mr. ERVIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following REPORT

together with

SEPARATE VIEWS

[To accompany S. 215]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 215) to provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution, reports favorably thereon with one amendment and recommends that the bill as amended do pass.

EXPLANATION OF THE AMENDMENT

The committee has adopted the following amendment to S. 215:

In section 5(a), on line 10, strike "8" and insert "6".

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The purpose of this bill is to provide the procedural machinery necessary to effectuate that part of article V of the Constitution of the United States which authorizes a convention called by the States to propose specific amendments to the Constitution. The bill does not purport to deal with the situation in which the States have issued a call for a convention to propose a general revision of the Constitution. This limited purpose of the bill derives from two considerations. First, American history since shortly after the adoption of the Constitution reveals no expression of a desire on the part of the American people for any general constitutional revision. It does reveal sporadic expressions by the people of the States of a desire to provide limited changes in the Constitution. Second, it is the committee's opinion that the machinery appropriate for a convention undertaking a complete rewriting of the Constitution calls for a greatly different procedure from that which would be appropriate for a convention called for the more limited purposes contemplated by this bill. The committee is of the opinion that a call from the States for a general constitutional convention is so remote that there is no need, at this time, for providing the machinery for such a convention. It is the committee's view that a convention call for proposing specific amendments has from time to time, and especially recently, come near enough to fruition to make it appropriate for the provision of the necessary machinery in order to avoid the chaos that would result in the event that the call came and the procedures were not spelled out in advance.

The bill offered here is not intended to effectuate or preclude the proposing for submission to the States of any particular amendment that may, at the moment, be the subject of debate. Although the impetus for this legislation was initially provided by the public concern over accumulating petitions for a convention to consider an amendment regarding reapportionment, the committee has not considered the legislation in the narrow light of any single issue. The committee believes that the responsibility of Congress under the Constitution is to enact legislation which makes article V meaningful. This responsibility dictates that legislation implementing the article should not be formulated with the objective of making the Convention route a dead letter by placing insurmountable procedural obstacles in its way. Nor on the other hand should Congress, in the guise of implementing legislation, create procedures designed to facilitate the adoption of any particular constitutional change.

In recommending S. 215 to give effect to article V, the committee has been deeply conscious that this is "constitutional legislation" which will have to meet the unforeseen circumstances of our country's future. Its concern has been with the long-term needs of America.

The committee urges passage of this bill now in order to avoid what might well be an unseemly and chaotic imbroglio if the question of procedure were to arise simultaneously with the presentation of a substantive issue by two-thirds of the State legislatures. Should article V be invoked in the absence of this legislation, it is not improbable that the country will be faced with a constitutional crisis the dimensions of which have rarely been matched in our history.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

This legislation was first introduced by Senator Ervin, Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, on August 17, 1967. Hearings on the bill, S. 2307 of the 90th Congress, first session, were held by the subcommittee on October 30 and 31, 1967, and subsequently published. Thereafter the bill was revised and reintroduced in the 91st Congress, first session, as S. 623: the Subcommittee reported S. 623 to the full Committee on the Judiciary on June 19, 1969, where no action was taken on the measure during the 91st Congress. The legislation was reintroduced in the 92d Congress on January 26, 1971, as S. 215. On April 27, 1971, the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers reported the measure to the full Committee on the Judiciary.

Article V

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

BACKGROUND OF ARTICLE V

Because so much confusion has been disseminated about the origins of article V, it is not inappropriate to set forth here, in capsule form, the development in the Convention of 1787 of the provisions of article V. In the words of Philip B. Kurland:

> However natural it may now seem for the Constitution to provide for its own amendment, we should remember Holmes's warning against confusing the familiar with the necessary. There are other, more recent, national constitutions that make no such provision. The nature of the political compromises that resulted from the 1787 Convention was reason enough for those present not to tolerate a ready method of undoing what they had done. Article V, like most of the important provisions of the Constitution, must be attributed more to the prevailing spirit of compromise that dominated the Convention than to dedication to principle.
>
> Although the original Virginia plan provided for a method of amendment, the first essential question resolved by the Convention was whether any method of amendment should be provided. Despite strong opposition from men such as Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, the Convention soon agreed in principle to the desirability of specifying a mode for amendment, with Mason, Randolph, and Madison of Virginia, Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, and Hamilton of New York leading the Convention toward accepting the necessity of such a provision.
>
> The Virginia plan not only specified an amendment process but provided also that the National Legislature be excluded from participation in that process. And it was on the question of the proper role of Congress that the second major conflict was fought. When first reported by the Committee of Detail, the provision called for amendment by a convention to be called—apparently as a ministerial action—by the National > Legislature on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States. Although this plan was first approved, the issue was again raised on Gerry's motion for reconsideration, seconded by Hamilton, and supported by Madison. On reconsideration, Sherman of Connecticut sought to have the power given to the National Legislature to propose amendments to the States for their approval. Wilson of Pennsylvania suggested that the approval of two-thirds of the States should be sufficient, and when this proposal was lost he was able to secure consent to a requirement of three-fourths of the States. At this point Madison offered what was in effect a substitute for the Committee of Detail's amended recommendation. It read, as the final draft was to read, in terms of alternative methods. Two-thirds of each House of Congress or two-thirds of the State legislatures could propose amendments. The amendments were to be ratified when approved either by three-fourths of the State legislatures or by conventions in three-fourths of the States. This compromise eventually overcame the second difficulty. By providing for alternative methods of procedure, the Madison proposal also made possible the compromise between those who would, from fear of the reticence of the National Legislature to correct its own abuses, utilize the convention as the means of initiating change, and those who, like Mason, wanted the National Legislature to be the sole sponsor of amendments * * *

>
> Article V, which resulted from these deliberations, must be attributed largely to Madison, with the obvious active participation of Hamilton * * * ("Article V and the Amending Process," by Philip B. Kurland, in 1, An American Primer 130–131 edited by Daniel J. Boorstin (1966)).

Although constitutional conventions, as used by the States, generally have been reserved for wholesale, as distinguished from piecemeal constitutional revision, there is nothing in the record of the debates at the Philadelphia Convention which discloses any comparable intention on the part of the Framers. On the contrary, the latter refrained from any evaluation or differentiation of the two procedures for amendment incorporated into article V; they tended to view the convention merely as an alternative safeguard available to the States whenever Congress ceased to be responsive to popular will and persisted in a refusal to originate and submit constitutional amendments for ratification.

The history of the use of the amendments process was also shortly stated by Professor Kurland:

> Although the Constitution has been the subject of 24 * different amendments, resort has never once been made to a national convention to initiate the process. And only once, in the case of the 21st amendment, was the State-convention process utilized for purposes of ratifying an amendment.
>
> For the most part, the amendments have been minor rather than major rearrangements of the constitutional plan. The first 10 amendments, the Bill of Rights, came so hard on the heels of the original document that they must be treated, for almost all purposes, as part of it. The only truly basic changes came in the Civil War amendments, the 13th, 14th, and 15th. Although intended primarily for the benefit of the Negroes, who ultimately were the beneficiaries, the amendments have proved to be the essential vehicles for the tranfer to power from the States to the National Government and, within the National Government, to the Supreme Court, which has since exercised a veto power over the actions of the State legislatures, executives, and judiciaries * * * [T]here can be little doubt of the truth of Felix Frankfurter's observation that there has been throughout our history an "absence of any widespread or sustained demand for a general revision of the Constitution."

* Now 26.

On the other hand, it should be noted that some of the amendments have been attributable solely to the need to correct a Supreme Court construction of the Constitution. Thus, the 11th amendment was promulgated to overrule the case of Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419 (1793), in which the Court held that sovereign immunity was not available as a defense to suit by a citizen of one State against another State. The necessity for the Civil War amendments derived in no small measure from the awful case of Dred Scott v. Stanford, 19 How. 393 (1857). The 16th amendment, authorizing the income tax, was a direct consequence of the Court's highly dubious decisions in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895), 158 U.S. 601 (1895).

The other major category of amendments includes those relating to the mechanics of the National Government itself. These are due, first, to the need to eliminate ambiguities that became apparent through experience and, second, to the tendency toward extension of the franchise, a movement notable in all democratic countries during the 19th and 20th centuries. In the first group fall the 12th amendment, made necessary by the tied vote for Jefferson and Burr in the 1800 election; the 20th amendment, a response to the increased efficiency of communications and transportation that made it possible to provide for the succession of the newly elected government at a date much closer to the election, as well as to the need to eliminate the ambiguities about filling a presidential vacancy; the 22d amendment, which adopted George Washington's notion that two terms were enough for any man to occupy the Presidency, an unwritten constitutional tradition broken by Franklin Delano Roosevelt's election to the office for four successive terms. In the second category, the amendments that enhance popular sovereignty, fall the 17th, providing for popular election of Senators; the 19th, providing for women's suffrage; the 23d, giving a voice to citizens of the District of Columbia in the election of the President; and the 24th* eliminating the poll tax as a requirement for voting in national elections.

*The 25th amendment, providing for the filling of a vacancy in the offices of President or Vice President; and the 26th, providing for the "18-year-old vote", were adopted subsequent to the writing of the work quoted.

The only two other amendments are concrete evidence of the undesirability of promulgating a minority's notions of morality as part of the Nation's fundamental law. The 18th amendment, the prohibition amendment, was a ban on commerce in intoxicating liquors. The horrible results of the "noble experiment" that led an entire nation into a lawlessness from which it has never recovered caused the repeal of the 18th amendment by the 21st amendment.

Perhaps the primary importance of article V may be found in the in terrorem effect of an ultimate appeal to the people for the correction of the abuses of their government. But it is not a weapon ready for use and its cumbersome method is both its virtue and its vice. (Kurland, op. cit. supra, at 132–134.)

Although the convention route has never been used as a means of proposing amendments, its usefulness has been demonstrated. The campaign for direct elections of Senators was stymied for decades by the understandable reluctance of the Senate to propose an amendment which jeopardized the tenure of many of its Members. Frustrated by the Senate, the reform movement shifted to the States, and a series of petitions seeking to invoke the convention process were submitted to Congress. Rather than risk its fate at the hands of a convention, the Senate then relented and approved the proposed amendment, which was speedily ratified. The history of the 17th amendment illustrates the usefulness of having a viable method by which a recalcitrant Congress can be bypassed when it stands in the way of the desires of the country for constitutional change.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

At the outset it should be noted that this bill could have been drawn to place such hurdles in the path of the process that it could never effectively be used. And there are proponents of such an approach. On the other hand, it could have been drawn in such a manner as to make easy this means of constitutional amendment. There are proponents of this attitude as well. This committee regards both approaches as inconsistent with the purpose and function of article V, which it is the committee's intention to effectuate in this bill. The bill is drawn in such a manner as to make possible, however improbable, the constitutional convention method of amendment, as it was clearly the intent of the drafters of the Constitution to provide. There is no evidence whasoever that the Framers did not regard this means to be as desirable and as viable as that which allows for constitutional amendment at the initiation of Congress. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the Framers did not, with regard to either process, anticipate either frequent or easy use of article V to bring about changes in the Constitution. The effort of the committee, therefore, has been to seek a solution between that which would in fact preclude the States from initiating constitutional amendments and that which would afford a Pandora's box too easily opened.

AUTHORITY OF CONGRESS TO SPECIFY PROCEDURES FOR A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION CALLED BY THE STATES

It is the opinion of the committee that Congress unquestionably has the authority to legislate about the process of amendment by convention, and to settle every point not actually settled by article V of the Constitution itself. This is implicit in article V. Obviously the 50 State legislatures cannot themselves legislate on this subject. The constitutional convention cannot do so for it must first be brought into being. All this is left, therefore, to Congress, which in any event, in respect to other issues not specifically settled by the Constitution, has the residual power to legislate on matters that require uniform settlement.

Congress has full authority to prescribe and determine what a valid application shall be and is further authorized to provide as it chooses for the selection of delegates and the procedures that will govern the convention's operations. As to the first point, Congress is made the agency for calling the convention, and it is hard to see why Congress should have been brought into the matter at all unless it were expected to determine when sufficient appropriate applications had been received. As to the second point, the same argument is compelling; if Congress were not expected to provide for the selection and procedures of the convention, why were no provisions made for those matters in article V itself? It would have been perfectly simple for the article to have provided for delegation of those arrangements to the States. When we add to this argument the weight of the necessary and proper clause and the authority of Coleman v. Miller for the proposition that the amending process is in the congressional domain, the conclusion is inescapable. Congress has plenary power to provide for the selection and procedures of the convention. Nor is Congress hampered here by the provisions of article V relating to ratification. The States as States must give approval to proposed amendments, because that is what article V says. But the article says nothing at all about how the convention shall be chosen or operate; and, for the reasons given, that omission leaves decision on those matters in the hands of Congress.

As Mr. Theodore Sorenson said in his testimony before the subcommittee:

> The constitutional authority of Congress to establish rules and procedures regularizing the use or application of principles set forth in the Constitution has been too frequently exercised to be doubted today. Moreover, because State legislatures in proposing amendments via the convention route are performing a Federal function derived from the Federal Constitution, they could not be heard in court to complain about the imposition of reasonable standards and procedures by the Federal Congress, so long as their fundamental right to amend the Constitution is not thereby impaired. * * *
>
> In short, I fully concur with Chairman Ervin that Congress has both the power and the duty to implement article V, to prevent the crisis and chaos that would otherwise result and to restrict any such convention to those topics that are specified in the applications of State legislatures. (Hearings, before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, 90th Congress, 1st Session, on S. 2307, p. 36.)

LIMITATION OF SUBJECT MATTER TO BE CONSIDERED BY CONVENTION

Probably the most vexing question presented to the committee was whether Congress could provide for the limitation of the subject matter to be treated by a convention called pursuant to article V. The committee is of the opinion that a failure to provide for such limitation would be inconsistent with the purposes of article V and, indeed, would destroy the possibility of the use of the convention method for proposing amendments.

As may readily be seen from the history of article V, it was intended to afford the States an opportunity for the introduction of specific amendments to the Constitution that was to parallel the opportunity of Congress to put forth such amendments. Thus, Madison, addressing himself to the subject in Federalist No. 43, wrote:

> That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen. It was requisite therefore that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the General and the State Governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other.

And, in further explication of the amendment power and its exercise, Hamilton stated in No. 85:

> Every amendment to the Constitution, if one established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise in relation to any other point—no giving or taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And consequently, whenever nine, or rather 10 States, were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place. There can, therefore, be no comparison between the facility of affecting an amendment and that of establishing, in the first instance, a complete Constitution.

Apart from being inconsistent with the language and history of article V, the contention that any constitutional convention must be "wide open" is neither practicable nor desirable. If the subject matter of amendments were to be left entirely to the convention, it would be hard to expect the States to call for a convention in the absence of a general discontent with the existing constitutional system. This construction would effectively destroy the power of the States to originate the amendment of errors pointed out by experience, as Madison expected them to do. To suggest that the States could not propose specific amendments without risking a general constitutional convention is, in fact, in the committee's view, to destroy the desire and therefore the power of the States to initiate specific amendments by the convention process. Congress is not required to run such risks in the amendments that it would originate. There is little reason to believe that the States should be expected to do so.

The argument that the convention must have general power is also unsound from another point of view. If the convention were to be general, then it would seem that appropriate applications for a limited convention deriving in some States from a dissatisfaction with the school desegregation cases, in others from the school prayer cases, and in still others by reason of objections to the Miranda rule, or because of a desire for reapportionment, revenue sharing by the States, tax relief, or for other reasons, should all be combined to make up the requisite two-thirds of the States needed to meet the requirements of article V. The committee does not believe that this is the type of consensus among the States that the Founders thought to be appropriate to calling for a convention. For if such disparate demands were sufficient, all the applications to date—and there are a large number of them—should be added up to see whether, in what is considered an appropriate span of time, two-thirds of the States have made demands for a constitutional convention to propose amendments, no matter the cause for applications or the specifications contained in them. Indeed, under this theory a convention is long overdue. Since the committee believes that State applications should not be treated as a call for a convention unless they deal with the same subject—a conclusion supported by two centuries of practice—it is unreasonable to suggest that the convention resulting from 34 applications on a single subject is nonetheless free to roam at will in offering changes to the Constitution.

The attempted analogy sometimes made to the example of the Philadelphia Convention is not persuasive. First, the Articles of Confederation did not contain any effective means of amendment, as does the Constitution. Second, many of the delegates to that assembly were given credentials expressly limiting their authority to proposing individual amendments to the Articles. The Convention's decision to propose an entirely new charter was ultra vires and, in effect, "unconstitutional." Third, the Congress and the States retroactively approved the Convention's action of submitting and ratifying the new Constitution according to its own terms. Of course, a convention ostensibly acting under article V could ignore its authority, violate its oath, and propose amendments on subjects other than those specified. But the committee believes that such action would be unconstitutional; neither Congress nor the States would be under any obligation to give consideration to its proposals.

The construction of article V adopted by the committee is consistent with the literal language of the article as well as its history and is more desirable and practicable than the alternative construction. The intent of article V was to place the power to initiate amendments in the Congress and in the State legislatures. The function of the convention was to provide the States with a mechanism for effectuating this initiative. The role of the States in filing their applications would be to identify the problem or problems that they believed to call for resolution by way of amendment. The role of the convention that would be called by reason of such action by the States would then be to decide whether the problem or problems called for correction by constitutional amendment and, if so, to frame the amendment itself, and propose it for ratification as provided in article V. The bill carries out this intention in keeping not only with the letter but also with the spirit of article V.

It is the conclusion of the committee, therefore, that the bill properly limits the scope of the convention to the subject or subjects that caused the States to seek constitutional amendment in the first place. The convention would have no authority to go beyond the subjects specified.

MEASUREMENT OF REQUIRED NUMBER OF STATE APPLICATIONS

As has already been stated, applications of the States for a constitutional convention that relate to disparate subjects are not to be added together to make up the requisite two-thirds. Applications are not to be added together unless they are addressed to the solution of a common problem.

The committee is in agreement with a 1952 Report of the House Judiciary Committee which stated:

> . . . . there appears no valid reason to suppose that the language of the amendment requested in State applications must be identical with one another in wording. It should be enough that the suggested amendments be of the same general subject matter in order to be included in a congressional count of applications for a constitutional convention, bearing in mind, of course, that any or all of the States may at any time request a general convention should strong sentiment for such proceedings prevail. ("Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates," House Committee on the Judiciary, 82d Congress, second session, House committee print, page 12 (1952))

Obviously the question of whether any 34 petitions are sufficient to bring into operation article V is one for resolution by Congress. In making this determination, the 34 States could not be required to submit in their applications identical texts of an amendment. Nor could Congress define the subject so narrowly as to impose a requirement of textual uniformity which as a realistic matter could not be met by the States. It should be sufficient that the States identify a subject or problem, demanding action on it alone. The petitions should disclose a State's concern with respect to a subject and a desire for a convention to deal with the problem.

For example, the petitions could call for a convention to consider the propriety of an amendment to deal with problems raised by a series of Supreme Court decisions, or actions by the Congress or the President, defining those actions in specific terms. The convention then would be confined to a specific subject, but would be free to consider the wisdom of any proposed amendment within that subject and what form it should take. The convention could not be deprived of deliberative freedom and confined to a yes-or-no vote on any specific proposal. To illustrate, States desiring a convention to deal with the issues raised by the Escobedo-Miranda decisions could phrase their petitions with reference to those cases, or in general terms of the problem of Federal control over State criminal procedure. The convention would be confined to that subject, but would nevertheless have great deliberative freedom to consider all possible solutions and to frame whatever amendment it deemed appropriate to respond to the issues identified by the States.

TIME WITHIN WHICH THE APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION MUST BE FILED

Article V is silent on the question of how long a proposed amendment should remain available for ratification or rejection by the States. It is likewise silent on the question of how long applications for a convention should remain valid. There is general agreement that, to be meaningful, applications for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment on a single subject should be a contemporaneous recognition by the States of the need for solution of a constitutional problem. There is some difference of opinion about the time period that is an appropriate measure of this contemporaneity. In the recent past, in making provision for the ratification of amendments proposed by Congress, 7 years has been specified as the appropriate time period within which ratification should take place. The bill provides that the same period—7 years—shall be the valid period. A shorter time, for instance 1 or 2 years, would not afford the States adequate time for debate and deliberation on so fundamental a question as a proposed constitutional amendment. On the other hand, a much longer time, say 15 years, would not satisfy the reasoned desire for consensus.

OBLIGATION OF CONGRESS TO CALL A CONVENTION ON APPLICATION OF REQUISITE NUMBER OF STATES

The committee is of the view that, when the requisite number of valid applications have been filed, it is the constitutional duty of Congress to call the convention; for, as Hamilton said in Federalist No. 85:

> In opposition to the probability of subsequent amendments, it has been urged that the persons delegated to the administration of the national government will always be disinclined to yield up any portion of the authority of which they were once possessed. For my own part, I acknowledge a thorough conviction that any amendments which may, upon mature consideration, be thought useful, will be applicable to the organization of the government, not to the mass of its powers; and on this account alone I think there is no weight in the observation just stated. I also think there is little weight in it on another account. The intrinsic difficulty of governing thirteen States at any rate, independent of calculations upon an ordinary degree of public spirit and integrity will, in my opinion, constantly impose on the national rules the necessity of a spirit of accommodation to the reasonable expectations of their constituents. But there is yet a further consideration, which proves beyond the possibility of doubt that the observation is futile. It is this: that the national > rulers, whenever nine States concur, will have no option upon the subject. By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obliged, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States [which at present amounts to nine] to call a convention for proposing amendments which shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof." The words of this article are preemptory. The Congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And of consequence all the declamation about their disinclination to a change vanishes in air. (Emphasis in original.)

Hamilton reflects the record of the Convention itself. As Farrand records:

> It was also feared that Congress might refuse to act so Congress was required to call a convention on the application of two-thirds of the states. (Farrand, "Framing of the Constitution of the United States," (1913 ed.), p. 190.) (Emphasis in original.)

Concededly, the Congress cannot be forced by the courts or by the provisions of this bill to convene a convention when the constitutional prerequisites have been satisfied. And since the obligation to call the convention is given to Congress, neither the President nor the Supreme Court could act in its stead. However, every Member of Congress has taken an oath to support the Constitution and it is inconceivable that Congress would refuse to perform its duty. No adequate argument has been brought forth to suggest a different conclusion. In light of the function of the alternative methods of proposing amendments provided in article V—to assure to Congress and the States equal opportunity to do so—for Congress to veto State proposals would be an infringement on State power and a violation of the Constitution.

ROLE OF THE EXECUTIVE IN THE AMENDMENT PROCESS

After much deliberation, the committee concluded that, just as with amendments proposed by Congress, so too with those proposed by the States, neither the National Executive nor the State Executive should have a role in the amendment process. Inasmuch as the function of Congress is simply to operate the machinery to effectuate the actions of the States and the convention, there is no proper place for a Presidential role.

Moreover, article I, section 7, is not authorized for Presidential assent to the concurrent resolution calling for a convention or for the congressional action of transmitting a proposed amendment to the States for ratification. The short but sufficient answer is to be found in Professor Corwin's annotation of article I, section 7:

> The sweeping nature of this obviously ill-considered provision is emphasized by the single exception specified to its operation. Actually, it was impossible from the first to give it any such scope. Otherwise the intermediate stages of the legislative process would have been bogged down hopelessly, not to mention other highly undesirable results. In a report rendered by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1897 it was shown that the word "necessary" in the clause had come in practice to refer "to the necessity occasioned by the requirement of other provisions of the Constitution, whereby every exercise of 'legislative powers' involves the concurrence of the two Houses"; or more briefly, "necessary" here means necessary if an "order, resolution, or vote" is to have the force of law. Such resolutions have come to be termed "joint resolutions" and stand on a level with "bills", which if "enacted" become statutes. But "votes" taken in either House preliminary to the final passage of legislation need not be submitted to the President, nor resolutions passed by the House concurrently with a view to expressing an opinion or to devising a common program of action (e.g., the concurrent resolutions by which during the fight over Reconstruction the Southern States were excluded from representation in the House and Senate, the Joint Committee on Reconstruction containing members from both Houses was created, etc.), or to directing the expenditure of money appropriated to the use of the two Houses. Within recent years the concurrent resolution has been put to a new use—the termination of powers delegated to the Chief Executive, or the disapproval of particular exercises of power by him. Most of the important legislation enacted for the prosecution of World War II provided that the powers granted to the President should come to an end upon adoption of concurrent resolutions to that effect. Similarly, measures authorizing the President to reorganize executive agencies have provided that a reorganization plan promulgated by him should be reported to Congress and should not become effective if one or both Houses adopted a resolution disapproving it. Also, it was settled as early as 1789 that resolutions of Congress proposing amendments to the Constitution need not be submitted to the President, the Bill of Rights having been referred to the States without being laid before President Washington for his approval—a procedure which the Court ratified in due course. (The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation) 135–36 (S. Doc. No. 39, 88th Cong., first sess., 1964 ed.) Citations omitted.

The Constitution made the amendment process difficult. It certainly was not the intention of the original Convention to make it impossible. Nor is it possible to attribute to the Founders the concept that amendments originating in the States should have much more difficulty in passage than those proposed by Congress. That issue was fought out in the 1789 Convention and resolved in favor of two originating sources, not one.

Therefore, the committee has concluded that Presidential participation in the operation of article V is not required by the Constitution. Indeed, a strong case is made out that the Constitution, as construed throughout our history, precludes such participation by the Executive in the amendment process.

Just as the National Executive is excluded from the amendment process, so the State Executives play no role. Article V assigns to the State legislatures the duty to apply for a constitutional convention just as it authorized the legislatures to be ratifying bodies. Supreme Court decisions have interpreted the term "legislatures" in the ratification clause to mean the representative lawmaking body of the State—not including the Governor—since ratification of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation, in the proper sense of the word.[1] The term must have the same meaning in the application clause and the ratification clause of article V.

The role of the Governor is not needed for the voice of the people to be heard in the amendment process. It is heard, first, through their legislative representatives in their State governments; second, by the requirement contained in this bill for the democratic election of convention delegates; and third, in the ratification either by State ratifying convention or State legislature. To require that, in addition to an affirmative vote by two-thirds of the legislatures of the States within a period of 7 years, those votes must be by a two-thirds majority of each legislature (or by whatever other majority is needed to overcome a veto) where the Governor disapproves, is indeed "to pile Ossa on Pelion and leaf-crowned Olympus on Ossa" to create an insuperable barrier to any effective use of this method of constitutional change.

RESCISSION OF APPLICATIONS AND RATIFICATIONS

The question of whether a State may rescind an application once made has not been decided by any precedent, nor is there any authority on the question. It is one for Congress to answer. Congress previously has taken the position that having once ratified an amendment, a State may not rescind.

The committee is of the view that the former ratification rule should not control this question and, further, should be changed with respect to ratifications. Since a two-thirds consensus among the States in a given period of time is necessary to call a convention, obviously the fact that a State has changed its mind is pertinent. An application is not a final action. It merely registers the State's views. A State is always free, of course, to reject a proposed amendment. On these grounds, it is best to provide for rescission. Of course, once the constitutional requirement of petitions from two-thirds of the States has been met and the amendment machinery is set in motion, these considerations no longer hold, and rescission is no longer possible. On the basis of the same reasoning, a State should be permitted to retract its ratification, or to ratify a proposed amendment it previously rejected. Of course, once the amendment is a part of the Constitution, this power does not exist.

RESOLUTION OF QUESTIONS ARISING UNDER THIS MEASURE

The Committee takes the position that all questions to be resolved by the Congress under the provisions of this measure shall be submitted preliminarily to the Senate and House Judiciary Committees.

[1] Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U.S. 221, 229 (1920).

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS

Section 1 provides that the title of the act is the "Federal Constitutional Convention Procedures Act."

Section 2 provides that a State desiring to invoke article V to call a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution must adopt a resolution pursuant to this act requesting such a convention and stating the nature of the amendment it wishes proposed. Pursuant to the requirements of this section, the measure is prospective and not retroactive in operation.

Section 3 provides that the procedure to be used by the State in adopting or rescinding a resolution is the same as that used for enacting State laws of general application except that the approval of the Governor is not required. Any questions arising as to the adoption or rescission of resolutions are matters for determination solely by the Congress as part of its responsibility to determine whether article V has been activated. Of course, Congress has no authority to examine the action of the legislature, except to assure itself that the State has used the procedure specified in section 3.

Section 4 provides that within 30 days of the adoption of a resolution the secretary of state or the equivalent officer of the State must send two certified copies to the Congress, one addressed to the President of the Senate and the other to the Speaker of the House. Each copy must contain the title of the resolution, the date upon which it was adopted, and the exact text of the resolution signed by the presiding officers of each house of the State legislature. Within 10 days of receipt, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House must report to their respective Houses the identity of the State making application, the subject of the application and the number of States which have thus far applied with respect to that subject. If Congress is in recess or is adjourned, the announcement would be made when Congress was again in session, and as soon thereafter as possible. The two officers must cause copies of the application to be sent to the presiding officers of each of the Houses of the other States, and to each Member of Congress.

Section 5 provides that applications for the convening of a convention are effective for 7 years from date of receipt by Congress. Whenever within a 7-year period there are in effect valid applications on the same subject from two-thirds of the States all the applications remain in effect until Congress has called the convention.

States may rescind applications by adopting resolutions of recission in accordance with the procedures of sections 3 and 4. However, attempted recissions would not be effective after applications have been received by Congress from the requisite two-thirds of the States. Questions concerning the recission of applications are determined solely by Congress.

Section 6 provides that the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House shall maintain a record of the applications received upon each subject. Whenever applications upon the same subject have been received from two-thirds of the States, they must report in writing to the presiding officer of their respective Houses, and such officer shall report to that House the substance of the report. Periodic reports to each House on the nature and number of petitions received would be advisable, as well.

Each House then determines whether the recitation of the report is correct. Upon such determination it is the constitutional duty of each House under article V to agree to a concurrent resolution calling for the convening of a constitutional convention. The resolution shall set forth the nature of the amendment the convention is to consider and designate the time and place for the convention. Copies of the resolution are to be sent to the State Governors and to each House of each State legislature. The convention must be convened within 1 year of the adoption of the resolution.

Section 7 provides that each State shall elect two delegates-at-large and one additional delegate from each congressional district in the State, in accordance with its usual procedures for the election of Senators and Representatives. Vacancies are filled by appointment of the State Governor. The secretary of state of each State or equivalent officer shall certify to the Vice President of the United States the name of each delegate. Delegates will enjoy the same privileges as do members of Congress under article I, section 6. Delegates are to be compensated for service and travel and related expenses as provided for in the convening resolution.

Section 8 provides that the Vice President of the United States is to convene the convention and administer the oath of office. Each delegate is required to take an oath not to propose or vote in favor of any proposed amendment relating to a subject other than that named or described in the concurrent resolution. This is consistent with the position that the convention's authority is limited by the States' conferral of authority.

Names of the officers of the convention are to be transmitted to the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate. The convention may adopt rules of procedure not inconsistent with this act. Congress is authorized to appropriate funds for the expense of the convention; the Administrator of the General Services Administration is directed to provide the required facilities; and Congress, executive departments, and agencies are required to provide information required by the convention, except as otherwise provided by law.

Section 9 provides that each delegate to the convention has one vote. A daily verbatim record of proceedings must be kept, and the vote of each delegate must be recorded. The convention shall terminate within 1 year of the first meeting unless extended by resolution of Congress. Records of the convention's proceedings are to be transmitted to the Archives within 30 days of the termination of the convention.

Section 10 provides that amendments may be proposed by a majority of delegates to the convention. No amendments with respect to a subject different from that stated or described in the resolution calling the convention may be proposed and any questions relating to this point are to be determined solely by Congress.

Section 11 provides that within 30 days of the end of the convention the exact text of any amendments proposed by the Convention must be transmitted to Congress. Upon receipt of a valid proposed amendment, Congress must adopt a concurrent resolution directing the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate to send the proposed amendment to the Administrator of the General Services Administration. The resolution shall also prescribe the time and manner of ratification by the States. Congress may adopt a concurrent resolution disapproving the submission of the proposed amendment to the States, but only on the grounds (1) that it relates to or includes a subject different from that stated or described in the resolution calling the convention, or (2) that the procedures used by the convention were not in substantial conformity with the provisions of this act. This conforms to the fact that, under article V, Congress has no power to review or veto any action of the convention because of doubts or disapproval on the grounds of policy. Congress' sole function is ministerial. Of course, Congress is under no obligation to transmit an amendment if the convention has exceeded its authority by proposing amendments on subjects other than those designated, or if there were procedural irregularities at the convention of a substantial nature so as to make the actions of the convention ineffective.

If Congress has not adopted a concurrent resolution either transmitting or disapproving the transmission of the proposed amendment within 90 days of continuous session following its receipt, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House nonetheless are obligated to transmit the proposed amendment to the Administrator of the General Services Administration. This is to assure that Congress may not impede or block the transmittal to the States for the reasons of disapproval of the wisdom of the proposal. The Administrator of the General Services Administration must submit to the States a certified copy of the proposed amendment and any concurrent resolution adopted by Congress setting forth the time and manner for ratification along with a copy of this act.

Section 12 provides that amendments submitted in accordance with this act are valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the States within the time and according to the manner, by State legislature or State convention, as Congress directs by concurrent resolution. If the transmittal is made in the absence of a concurrent resolution, ratification is by State legislature and within 7 years of transmittal. Ratification by a State legislature shall be according to its own rules for such actions, but does not require the approval of the Governor. Certified copies of State ratifications must be sent promptly to the Administrator of the General Services Administration.

Section 13 provides that States may rescind by the same procedure as that used for ratification, but no rescission may be made after valid ratification by three-fourths of the States. States may ratify after a previous rejection. Any questions concerning ratification or rejection are determined solely by Congress.

Section 14 provides that the Administrator of the General Services Administration shall issue a proclamation that the amendment is part of the Constitution when three-fourths of the States have ratified.

Section 15 provides that the effective date of a constitutional amendment shall be that specified in the amendment or, if none, on the date of the ratification by the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the States.

SEPARATE VIEWS OF MESSRS. BAYH, BURDICK, HART, KENNEDY, AND TUNNEY

We are basically in accord with the purpose and framework of this bill, and we supported a favorable report to the Senate. We wholeheartedly agree that the groundrules for a constitutional convention should be established before a convention is called to deal with a specific topic, lest views on the substantive issue color decisions about fair procedure. We also agree with the Committee's goal of avoiding both those procedures which make constitutional change too easy and those which stifle needed reform. And we agree that the convention must not be permitted to roam the Constitution at will; it must instead be limited to considering only that constitutional issue which led to its creation.

There are two specific provisions of this bill, however, which hinder rather than further the Committee's intentions:

First, Section 10, which permits the convention to propose amendments by a bare majority vote should be amended to require a two-thirds majority. As presently written, it undermines the traditional safeguard which has protected the integrity of the Constitution since 1789. That safeguard, of course, is Article V's requirement that amendments be proposed by two-thirds of the Congress. All Senators know very well the difference between persuading half and persuading two-thirds of our colleagues of the wisdom of a course of action. Article V's requirement guarantees that a decisive majority of the members of not one but two deliberative bodies agree that the amendment is the wisest means of dealing with a fundamental national problem, and that they come to that agreement before the amendment is submitted to the States. We should require that the convention act through the same decisive majority of its delegates. Only if such a broad consensus is reached at the time the amendment is drafted—a time when viable alternative amendments are still under consideration—can we be confident that there is widespread agreement that the specific language of the amendment proposed best fulfills its purpose. By allowing a bare majority of the convention to propose an amendment, the bill opens the door to the submission of a proliferation of amendments to the States.

It is true that three-quarters of the States must ratify any proposed amendment. But during ratification the States cannot make any changes in the proposal. It is presented to them in final form on a take it or leave it basis. In each State, only a majority of the legislature need be convinced that the particular amendment proposed is better than no amendment at all. Ratification, therefore, is simply not a substitute for the reasoned deliberation and the building of a substantial consensus which ought to precede the proposal of change in the basic framework of our political system. It is for this reason, we feel, that the founding fathers wisely required in Article V a two-thirds vote by each House before the Congress could propose an amendment, even though such an amendment, too, must subsequently be ratified by three-quarters of the States. Our own constitutional history demonstrates this principle. Since 1927, 28 constitutional amendments have been voted on by one or both Houses of Congress. Of those debated, only 7 finally won support from enough members of Congress to be proposed to the States. But of those 7, not one was rejected by the States. In fact, since 1789 only 5 proposed amendments—two of them part of the original Bill of Rights—have been rejected by the States.

For these reasons, proposals should be sent to the States for ratification only if approved by two-thirds of the delegates to the convention.

Second, we believe that a State's call for a convention should not remain effective for seven years, as Section 5 of the bill now provides. The call for a convention, as Professor Paul A. Freund has said, should reflect "a contemporaneously felt need." Of course, enough time must be provided to give the State Legislatures an opportunity to consider joining the request. However, in our view, four years would be a sufficient length of time. The vast majority of the legislatures—33 at latest count—now meet annually. Even the 17 legislatures which meet only in alternate years would have two sessions in which to act.

BIRCH BAYH,
QUENTIN N. BURDICK,
PHILIP A. HART,
EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
JOHN V. TUNNEY.

O

85th Congress, 1st Session

PROBLEMS RELATING TO A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

BY

CYRIL F. BRICKFIELD

COMMITTEE PRINT

Printed for the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives

July 1, 1957

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

EMANUEL CELLER, New York, Chairman

FRANCIS E. WALTER, Pennsylvania
THOMAS J. LANE, Massachusetts
MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN, Ohio
FRANK CHELF, Kentucky
EDWIN E. WILLIS, Louisiana
JAMES B. FRAZIER, JR., Tennessee
PETER W. RODINO, JR., New Jersey
E. L. FORRESTER, Georgia
BYRON G. ROGERS, Colorado
HAROLD D. DONOHUE, Massachusetts
JACK B. BROOKS, Texas
WILLIAM M. TUCK, Virginia
ROBERT T. ASHMORE, South Carolina
CHARLES A. BOYLE, Illinois
EARL CHUDOFF, Pennsylvania
JOHN DOWDY, Texas
LESTER HOLTZMAN, New York

KENNETH B. KEATING, New York
WILLIAM M. McCULLOCH, Ohio
PATRICK J. HILLINGS, California
WILLIAM E. MILLER, New York
DEAN P. TAYLOR, New York
USHER L. BURDICK, North Dakota
LAURENCE CURTIS, Massachusetts
JOHN M. ROBSION, JR., Kentucky
DEWITT S. HYDE, Maryland
RICHARD H. POFF, Virginia
WILLIAM C. CRAMER, Florida
ARCH A. MOORE, JR., West Virginia
RUSSELL W. KEENEY, Illinois
F. JAY NIMTZ, Indiana

BESS E. DICK, Staff Director
WILLIAM R. FOLEY, General Counsel
WALTER M. BESTERMAN, Legislative Assistant
WALTER R. LEE, Legislative Assistant
CHARLES J. ZINN, Law Revision Counsel
CYRIL F. BRICKFIELD, Counsel
E. WILLOUGHBY MIDDLETON, JR., Associate Counsel

FOREWORD

This study on problems relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention was prepared by Mr. Cyril F. Brickfield of the committee staff in partial fulfillment of the requirements of the degree of Doctor of Juridical Science at the George Washington University School of Law. It discusses the legal as well as practical problems presented by a constitutional convention method of amendment and suggests means, in the form of draft bills, to dispose of these problems.

Article V of the United States Constitution provides that Congress, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, shall call a constitutional convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution. Since the Constitution's adoption, 168 years ago, there have been over 200 State applications calling for conventions to amend the Constitution on a wide variety of subjects including the direct election of Senators, Federal income taxes, prohibition of polygamy, repeal of the 18th amendment, world federal government, and the general or complete revision of the Constitution itself. Despite this number of applications, the constitutional convention method of amendment has never been employed.

Many of these applications no doubt are no longer valid. Petitions, for example, for the direct election of Senators, and the repeal of the 18th amendment, have been rendered moot by reason of the 17th and 21st amendments respectively to the Constitution. In addition, the lapse of time may well have rendered other applications invalid. In recent years, however, Congress has been in receipt of a number of petitions from various States requesting the call of a convention to amend the Constitution limiting the power of the Federal Government over the taxation of income. In 1952 the staff of this committee prepared a report on the status of State applications directed to that subject.

The problem of constitutional conventions is a matter of serious concern to the House Committee on the Judiciary since rule XXII and Rule XI, clause 12 (c), of the rules of the House of Representatives direct, among other things, that petitions for conventions be referred to this committee for appropriate action. Unfortunately there is no statutory authority to guide this committee or the Congress in classifying applications or in counting them, nor is there any statutory guidance for the calling of a convention.

Mr. Brickfield's dissertation discusses these problems and suggests procedures to be followed in processing applications and for governing the scope of a constitutional convention's deliberations. Of course, the views expressed and the conclusions reached herein are those of the author and do not necessarily represent the views of any of the members of the committee. The material, however, gives in detail the history and problems relating to the convention method of amending the Constitution, and can be of immeasurable aid to the Congress in considering possible statutory clarification of this problem and in taking positive action on a long-neglected but vital problem.

EMANUEL CELLER, Chairman.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I wish to express my appreciation to Prof. J. Forrester Davison of the George Washington University Law School who as faculty adviser patiently consulted with me during 3 trying years and gave me the benefit of his good counsel. I desire to thank Dr. Norman J. Small of the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress for his assistance in helping me rework the various tables which form part of the appendix of this dissertation.

As sources of reference in the preparation of this work I relied heavily on the prize essay of Prof. Herman V. Ames, which was published as House Document 353, part 2, 54th Congress, 2d session, entitled "The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of Its History", the unpublished thesis of William R. Pullen entitled "The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution," University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill (1951), and the committee document of the House Judiciary Committee (1952) entitled "Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention To Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Taxes," which was largely prepared by Mr. Jerrold Walden.

Acknowledgment is due the George Washington University in authorizing the use of this material for publication as a committee document.

C. F. BRICKFIELD.

PREFACE

Article V of the United States Constitution provides two methods for amending the Constitution: (1) Congress may propose amendments to the Constitution for ratification by three-fourths of the States, or (2) on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, Congress shall call a constitutional convention. Twenty-seven amendments have been referred to the States for ratification under the first method,[1] but there never has been, since the adoption of our Constitution, a constitutional convention. Because of the growing number of petitions submitted to Congress by the several States during recent years calling for a convention under the second method, and because of the complex problems involved it is the intention of the writer to direct this dissertation to the problems and issues involved in a Federal constitutional convention.

Article V is silent as to how and when conventions are to be convened and it does not state how the convention is to be formed or what rules of procedure are to guide its acts. In order to present a clear view of the general problem there follows, in outline form, several of the more obvious issues connected with calling a constitutional convention.

Article V, while providing that the States may make application to Congress for the calling of a convention, sets no requirements concerning what provisions each State application must contain or what standards each application must meet in order to be considered as validly made. One application, for instance, while it passed the State legislature, was vetoed by its governor.[2] This raises the question of whether the Constitution contemplates action solely by the houses of a State legislature or whether applications must be processed in accordance with procedures for enacting State laws which usually include action by the State's chief executive.

Another question is: When have two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States made application for the calling of a convention? Some petitions to Congress were made 168 years ago.[3] Do these petitions and others remain permanently alive or do they lapse after a reasonable period of time?

Article V is also silent on the subject matter of applications. A constitutional convention can be construed to mean that subjects on many and varied topics may be considered looking toward a general reformation of the Constitution. Yet, there are legal commentators who support the proposition that all petitions, in order to be counted, should be identical or at least relate to a single specific subject matter; for example, a proposed amendment pertaining solely to the subject of limiting the Federal Government's power over the taxation of income.

A question of importance is the power of a State to rescind its application once it has been submitted to Congress. The view has been expressed that since a State legislature is competent to make application for a constitutional convention, it is obviously competent to withdraw its application. It may be well to point out, however, that Congress refused to allow the States of Ohio and New Jersey to rescind their ratifications of the 14th amendment.[4] And conversely, Congress permitted North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Virginia which at first rejected the 14th amendment, to subsequently ratify the same.[5] Whether rescission of an application petitioning for a Federal constitutional convention should be considered in the same light as rejection in the course of ratification is, of course, another matter which adds to the complexity of the problem.

Once convened, a question which presents itself is whether the convention may discuss any and all subjects relative to the Constitution or whether Congress may restrict the scope of its deliberations to a particular subject or at least to a limited number of subjects. Many believe that once convened, a convention could rewrite the entire Constitution if it so desires. Others, however, adopt the view that Congress would have the power to determine the areas of deliberations to which the convention would be confined. This would be especially so if Congress convened the convention for the sole purpose of taking up a particular subject.

The problem is further complicated when one seeks to determine the extent to which the States themselves may control the actions of a convention.

An interesting question is how can the provisions of article V be enforced if the Congress fails or refuses to act in the event there are a sufficient number of State applications submitted?

Another question which looms large throughout the entire problem is whether many of the issues are of a justiciable nature open to determination by the courts, or whether they are political questions beyond the limits of the courts' jurisdiction and therefore subject to determination by the Congress?

It is believed that Congress can resolve and otherwise render academic many of these questions by setting up, through implementing legislation, statutory provisions containing standards and guides to govern the submission of State applications. The subject of amending the Constitution is one which has, over the years, engendered much learned comment. However, in recent years, one of the more significant happenings has been the submission of 32 applications to the Congress from 27 States all relating to the same subject matter, namely, a constitutional convention to consider the problem of limiting the power of the Federal Government in the taxation of incomes, gifts, and inheritances. It may be well at this time to look ahead and seek to provide legislation which will not only contain the answers to the legal problems involved but which will also resolve the practical ones as well.

Scope of dissertation

While this dissertation is concerned with problems relating to constitutional conventions, it may be well to note, briefly, highly publicized controversies in recent years over whether the Constitution may be amended by means other than those provided for in article V. For example, Senator John W. Bricker of Ohio feels that treaties made under authority of the United States can and do result in changing the provisions of the Constitution. Further, it has been argued that the United States Supreme Court, by judicial decisions, has also substantially changed the meaning and original intent of many of the provisions of our Constitution. This view gathered additional support as the result of the recent school segregation case.[6]

At first impression, these controversies might appear to be proper subjects for discussion here since article V is the amending article, and the underlying purpose of constitutional conventions is amendment and revision. However, amendment by treaties or by judicial decisions cover fields of constitutional law which are so broad that many learned commentaries have been written on them alone.[7] To attempt any discussion of them here may well be inappropriate. Furthermore, it is felt that such subjects are not really pertinent to this undertaking. We are here dealing with amending the Constitution by means of a constitutional convention. Whether it may be amended by constitutional means other than those expressly provided for in article V would not in any way affect amending the Constitution by means of a constitutional convention.

Basically, however, it is felt that article V provides the only methods for the Constitution's amendment. As is discussed in the following chapters, changes in our basic law can only be made in a legal or constitutional manner. Our courts have consistently recognized the principle that, aside from revolution, the only method of effecting changes is pursuant to some procedural provision of the Constitution.[8]

The framers of our Constitution gave serious consideration to the problem of providing a method of amendment. They wished the Constitution to be open to improvement as exigencies in the future should require. It was essential, in drafting a provision regulating the mode of amending the Constitution, that consideration be given to devising a practical but not too easy method of making changes. With this understanding, they adopted article V.[9] In the discussions in the constitutional convention concerning article V, not a single word was uttered to indicate that article V was not to be all embracing on the subject of amendments. Having thus provided a particular method of effecting amendments to the Constitution, the Founding Fathers certainly cannot be assumed to have left the door open to vicarious amendment—treaty or otherwise.

Five or 6 years ago, Senator Bricker started a movement in Congress to curtail the treatymaking powers upon the ground that treaties could cut across the face of, and change, the Constitution. This movement received enthusiastic support from certain segments of the American Bar Association and from leading lawyers.[10] However, the issue has become dormant. Many people who originally supported the movement have changed their positions. Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, for example, supported the movement in 1952 [11] and opposed it is 1953.[12] Originally 64 Senators joined Senator Bricker in sponsoring his legislation. Ordinarily such a manifestation of solidarity would lead one to believe that the legislation would be assured of passage in the Senate. But such was not the case and the measure was lost in the 83d Congress. Apparently, full discussion of the problem in the Senate and in legal periodicals throughout the United States helped erase the fears that treaties can change the Constitution.

Without attempting, for the reasons stated above, to discuss these issues at too great length, it may be noted that the Supreme Court has never held that a treaty or judicial decision can expand or subtract from the Constitution, nor has it ever held that the Constitution may be amended in any other way than in accordance with the amending power contained in article V.[13]

Be that as it may, there are still those who believe to the contrary. Almost without exception, the proponents of these resolutions cite the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in the Migratory Bird case.[14]

In order to evaluate this celebrated case intelligently, it is necessary to recall the factual background. In 1913 Congress enacted a law prohibiting the destruction of migratory birds.[15] Thereafter, in a criminal prosecution brought under regulations promulgated by the Department of Agriculture in pursuance to the act, the court held that migratory birds were not the property of the Government, but of the several States in their sovereign capacity. It concluded that there was no provision in the Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate or protect migratory wild game when in a State.[16]

It should be noted that this is only a lower district court case. No appeal was taken from its decision. It should also be noted that the only contention urged by the Government was that Congress had power to regulate and protect property belonging to the United States.[17] The Government did not contend that the legislation may well have been permissive under the commerce clause.[18]

There was also another district court case which handed down a similar decision and from which no appeal was taken.[19]

Thereafter, President Wilson in 1916 proclaimed a convention for the protection of migratory birds between the United States and Great Britain (on behalf of Canada), and in 1918 Congress enacted the Migratory Bird Treaty Act to implement the convention and which, in effect, was somewhat similar to the earlier enactment of Congress which the lower district courts had held unconstitutional.

A short time later, two residents of Missouri were separately indicted for violation of the Federal statute. They asked for a dismissal of the indictments on the ground that the act was unconstitutional. After the return of the indictment, the State of Missouri filed a bill in equity seeking to restrain the United States game warden, Holland, from enforcing the act in that State. The district court dismissed the bill in equity.[20]

On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the much discussed and sometimes misinterpreted opinion of the Court.[21] The Justice stated that the question involved in the case was "whether the treaty and statute are void as an interference with the rights reserved to the States." He pointed out that although the 10th amendment reserves the powers not delegated to the United States, the power to make treaties was expressly delegated. And if the treaty was valid the statute was also valid under the "necessary and proper" legislative power.

It might be well to state first that the Court upheld the treaty and the statute as valid. The Court, in so doing, decided this—and nothing more: "The treaty in question does not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution," nor was it "forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the 10th amendment."

One of the grounds advanced by those who argue that a treaty need not conform to the Constitution is that in the Migratory Bird case, Holmes is supposed to have held that article VI of the Constitution requires that statutes be "pursuant" to the Constitution, but treaties need merely be made under the "authority" of the United States. Such a holding, even if it could be interpreted as an express statement by Holmes that treaties need not conform to the Constitution, would not be controlling inasmuch as it had no bearing upon the decision in the case. The controlling rule was that the treaty in question did "not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution" and was not forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the 10th amendment. That is the entire basis of Holmes' opinion and is, of course, contrary to the holding imputed to him.

Nor has the Supreme Court considered Holmes' statement to mean that a treaty could be superior to the Constitution. Four years after the Migratory Bird case the Court cited the Migratory Bird decision as one of its authorities for the proposition that the treatymaking power is not superior to the Constitution.[22]

Another supposed holding of the case is that although Congress had no power under the Constitution to legislate on migratory birds, once a treaty was made on the subject, it could legislate to implement the treaty. Here again the argument falls short for there is no evidence in the opinion that the Supreme Court considered the congressional act unconstitutional except for the treaty. The two cases arising under the statute prior to the treaty did not reach the Supreme Court and consequently there is no holding by that Court, but only by the district courts on that statute. Holmes pointed out that "whether the two cases were decided rightly or not they cannot be accepted as a test of the treaty power." Clearly that statement cannot be construed as a holding that the prior statute was unconstitutional. Even if Holmes had stated—which he did not—that the earlier act was unconstitutional it would not have been authoritative since that statute was not involved in this case.

It may be said, in summary, that the decision did not hold that a treaty does not have to conform to the Constitution; nor that the statute enacted prior to the treaty was unconstitutional; nor that Congress could legislate in a field which prior to the treaty it could not constitutionally legislate; nor, finally, that a treaty may change the Constitution.

Probably the best way of concluding this discussion on whether a treaty may validly conflict, supersede, modify, or otherwise amend the Constitution is to quote the Supreme Court itself in a case handed down over 80 years ago. In litigation involving a treaty with the Cherokee Nation of Indians, the Court aptly stated: [23]

> It need hardly be said that a treaty cannot change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government.

No doubt as world conditions change, we may experience another cycle of events which will give cause for another reconsideration of this problem. However, as Mr. Dulles noted, the Constitution has served well over the last century and a half and there is no present need to change the amending processes of article V.[24]

CITATIONS

[1] Twenty-two amendments have been certified as part of the United States Constitution. Five amendments have been proposed by the Congress but have not been ratified by a sufficient number of States. They relate to (a) the apportionment of Representatives in the House (submitted in 1789), (b) the compensation of Senators and Representatives (submitted to the states in 1789), (c) acceptance by United States

[1] [illegible] of [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] (1861); [illegible] [illegible] submitted in 1861, [illegible] U. S., Congress, [illegible] House [illegible] [illegible]

[2] Pennsylvania, Session Laws (1943) p. 222.

[3] See states of New York and Virginia, Table I, Appendix.

[4] U. S., Statutes at Large, vol. 15, 706–710. Secretary Seward, in a communication to Congress, stated that if Ohio and New Jersey's ratifications were still effective notwithstanding their subsequent purported withdrawals, a sufficient number of States had ratified Article XIV (15 Stat. 707). Congress, citing both States in its resolution, declared the amendment adopted as having been ratified by the necessary number of States (15 Stat. 709, 710).

[5] U. S., Congress, House, Ames, The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of Its History, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 1897, House Doc. 353, Pt. 2, pp. 299–300.

[6] Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483 (1954).

[7] Zinn, Charles J., "The Exercise of the Treaty-Making Power Cannot Effect the Denial or Abridgement of Any Right Enumerated in the Constitution" (unpublished S. J. D. dissertation, Georgetown University, 1954); Allen, Florence E., The Treaty as an Instrument of Legislation (New York: Macmillan Co., 1952); Tucker, Henry St. George, Limitations on the Treaty-Making Power (Boston: Little Brown & Co., 1915); Bricker, John W., U. N. Blueprint for Tyranny, The Freeman (Jan. 28, 1952); Chafee, Zechariah, Stop Being Terrified of Treaties: Stop Being Scared of the Constitution, 38 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 731 (Sept. 1952); Holman, Frank E., Treaty Law-Making: A Blank Check for Writing a New Constitution, 36 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. (Sept. 1950).

[8] Weston, Political Questions, 38 Harvard Law Review, 296, 305 (1925).

[9] Madison, The Federalist, No. 43.

[10] U. S. Congress, Senate, 83d Cong., 1st sess., 1953, S. J. Res. 1; Holman, Treaty Law Making: A Blank Check for Writing a New Constitution, 36 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 707 (1950).

[11] Dulles, Speech at American Bar Association regional meeting, Louisville, Kentucky, April 11, 1952; Cong. Rec., May 15, 1952, Vol. 98, p. 5306 (Daily): "* * * treaty law can override the Constitution."

[12] Dulles, Testimony before Senate Subcommittee on S. J. Res. 1, 83d Cong., April 6, 1953; Department of State Bulletin, April 20, 1953, p. 591: "The Constitution, as it is, has served well in the field of foreign relations. * * * there is no present need for a Constitutional change."

[13] Zinn, Charles J. The Exercise of the Treaty-Making Power Cannot Effect the Denial or Abridgement of Any Right Enumerated in the Constitution, unpublished S. J. D. dissertation, Georgetown Univ. Washington, D. C., 1954.

[14] Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416 (1920).

[15] Act, March 4, 1913, ch. 154, 37 Stat. 828, 847. "All wild geese, wild swans, * * * and all other migratory game * * * which in their northern and southern migration pass through or do not remain permanently the entire year within the borders of any State or Territory, shall hereafter be deemed to be within the custody and protection of the Government of the United States, and shall not be destroyed or taken contrary to regulations hereinafter provided for."

[16] United States v. Shauver, 214 Fed. 154 (1914).

[17] U. S. Constitution, Art. IV, Sec. 3, cl. 2.

[18] U. S. Constitution, Art. I, Sec. 8, cl. 3. United States v. Shauver, 214 Fed. 154 (1914).

[19] United States v. McCullogh, 221 Fed. 288 (1915).

[20] United States v. Samples; United States v. DeLapp, State of Missouri v. Holland, 258 Fed. 479 (1919).

[21] 252 U. S. 416 (1920).

[22] Asakura v. Seattle, 265 U. S. 332, 341 (1924).

[23] The Cherokee Tobacco, 11 Wall. 616, 620–621 (U. S. 1870).

[24] Testimony before Senate Judiciary Committee on S. J. Res. 1, 83d Cong., April 6, 1953; see also footnote 12 above.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

APPENDIX

TABLE OF CASES

PART I

HISTORY OF AMENDING CLAUSE

CHAPTER 1 *

LAW PRIOR TO CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787

Uniqueness of amending clause

The Constitution of the United States provides for its own amendment. Article V states:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

The idea of an amending clause in the organic instrument of a sovereignty is peculiarly American. Although our States base their organic laws on English and, in some instances, continental conceptions, such is not the case in the fundamental matter of altering or amending their constitutions.[1]

England, of course, never had a written constitution. It has what is known as a cumulative constitution developed over the centuries from accumulated usages, common-law principles, decisions of its courts, compacts, and statutes.[2] Its laws are evolved gradually as the needs of national life require.

However, in America in the years preceding the Revolutionary War, the political life of the colonists was such that they were unable to develop civil institutions which could grow in an environment of normalcy reflecting the developments and customs of the colonists themselves. Instead, their institutions were subjected to, and thus reflected, the almost complete and abusive domination of England. When they did break away from the mother country, there was no time for the slow development of a form of government built on custom and usage; rather the colonies had to adopt a type of government which would give them immediate political stability. They adopted written constitutions. Jameson, in his treatise on Constitutional Conventions, was of the opinion that the most appropriate way for creating a new government, under circumstances in which our forebears found themselves, was by written constitution. He noted that when the political life of a people has been—> unpropitious for the foundation and growth of civil institutions [written constitutions] however slow, superficial, or deficient * * * give civic dignity and political consciousness to a people [and], form, in times of political apathy * * * a passage, a bridge to pass over to better times.[3]

*Footnotes are at end of each chapter.

So although the colonists were familiar with English and continental systems, they did not and, because of the exigencies of the times, could not follow them.

Since the people were sovereign, however, it followed that they could not only enact a constitution but, as a necessary corollary, they could also amend and revise it.[4] It is in this latter aspect that American constitutional systems are completely distinguishable from those of other countries. While some European countries had written codes or constitutions, none, at the time of the American Revolution, had organic laws containing express provisions providing for their own amendment or alteration. It was purely an American concept.

Interestingly enough, our Founding Fathers, in making provision for amendments, at the same time restricted the manner and mode by which changes could be made. This was done to prevent rash and impassioned attempts to bring about wholesale changes in our form of government once it had been adopted. Jameson in his treatise aptly describes the purpose: [5]

> The idea of the people thus restricting themselves in making changes in their constitutions is original, and is one of the most signal evidences that amongst us liberty means, not the giving of rein to passion or to thoughtless impulse, but the exercise of power by the people for the general good, and, therefore, always under the restraints of law.

Amending clause in early State constitutions and Articles of Confederation

The first State constitutions were the immediate results of the Revolutionary War. Soon after the Declaration of Independence the Continental Congress recommended that the people of the Colonies meet for the purpose of forming independent governments. Of the 13 constitutions which were first framed, 6 made provisions for their future revision and amendment.[6] By the time the Federal Constitutional Convention met in 1787, two additional States had express provisions in their constitutions for their amendment or revision.[7]

In Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina, use of the amending process was reserved to the legislatures.[8] In Georgia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Vermont, amendments were to be made by conventions.[9]

At the Constitutional Convention of 1787 both methods were embodied into one instrument.

Since, at the time of the Revolution, it was felt that a strong union of the States was highly desirable if not imperative, the Continental Congress adopted a plan of confederation on November 15, 1777, and submitted it to the States for ratification.[10] It became effective on March 1, 1787, and was known as the Articles of Confederation. It contained the following provisions providing for its own amendment:

ARTICLE 13

> * * * And the articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration, at any time hereafter, be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislature of every state.[11]

Thus in this first concerted effort on the part of all the States, there was set out an express provision relating to the articles' future amendment and alteration.

Our colonial States experienced growing pains and, as with other provisions of the Articles of Confederation, there were experimentations with the amendment clause. In fact, article XIII, quoted above, because of its restrictive provisions, was instrumental in defeating the purpose of the confederation. Under it, a single State could prevent any change in the confederation. Oliver Ellsworth, speaking before the Connecticut convention, clearly pointed up the difficulty:

> How contrary, then, to republican principles, how humiliating, is our present situation! A single state can rise up, and put a veto upon the most important public measures. We have seen this actually take place. A single state has controlled the general voice of the Union; a minority, a very small minority, has governed us. So far is this from being consistent with republican principles, that it is, in effect, the worst species of monarchy.[12]

CITATIONS

[1] Orfield, The Amending of the Federal Constitution (1942), p. 1.

[2] See for discussion of written and unwritten constitutions Jameson, Constitutional Conventions (4th ed., 1887), pp. 80–81; Borgeaud, Adoption and Amendment of Constitutions in Europe and America (1895), pp. xv–xvi.

[3] Jameson, Constitutional Conventions (4th ed., 1887), p. 79, quoting Lieber, Political Ethics, Pt. I, pp. 394–395.

[4] Orfield, The Amending of the Federal Constitution (1942), p. 1.

[5] Jameson, Constitutional Conventions (4th ed., 1887), p. 549.

[6] Delaware, Constitution (1776), Art. 30; Poore, United States Charters and Constitutions (2d ed.: 1878), I, 273–278; Pennsylvania, Constitution (1776), Sec. 47; Poore, ibid., II, 1540–1548; Maryland, Constitution (1776), par. LIX; Poore, ibid., I, 818–828; Georgia, Constitution (1777), Art. LXIII; Poore, ibid., I, 377–383; Vermont, Constitution (1777), Sec. XLIV; Poore, ibid, II, 1857–1865; Massachusetts, Constitution (1780), Art. VI; Poore, ibid., I, 956–972.

[7] New Hampshire, Constitution (1784); Poore, ibid., II, 1280–1293; South Carolina, Constitution (1778), par. XLIV; Poore, ibid., II, 1620–1627.

[8] Poore, ibid., I, 278, 828; Poore, ibid., II, 1627.

[9] Poore, ibid., I, 383, 972; Poore, ibid., II, 1292, 1548, 1865.

[10] Elliott's Debates (1937 facsimile of 1836 ed.), I, 79.

[11] Ibid., p. 84.

[12] Ibid., II, 197. Ellsworth was referring to Rhode Island's action in defeating amendments proposed by the Congress on February 1, 1781, and on April 18, 1783, which would have authorized Congress to levy certain import duties. Both of the amendments had been ratified by the other twelve states.

CHAPTER 2

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 AND CIRCUMSTANCES SURROUNDING ARTICLE V

In the fall of 1786, a committee from five States met at Annapolis, Md., for the purpose of adjusting certain commercial differences.[1] However, because so few States were represented, the committee did not proceed with its business but recommended that a further meeting, made up of all the States, be held in Philadelphia in May of the next year.[2] Thus was initiated the Federal Convention of 1787. On February 21, 1787, Continental Congress adopted a resolution authorizing the Convention to meet—

> for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall, when agreed to in Congress, and confirmed by the states, render the federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union.[3]

When it met in Philadelphia, the main business of the Federal Convention was first embodied in a plan on the union submitted by Edmund Randolph on behalf of the Virginia delegation.[4] Randolph's 13th resolution provided for amendment whenever it would "seem necessary" and did not require the consent of the National Legislature. As originally introduced it stated:

> provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary, and that the assent of the National Legislature ought not to be required thereto.[5]

In the Committee of the Whole, several members did not see the wisdom or propriety of making the consent of the National Legislature unnecessary. As a result, the latter part of the provision was lost,[6] and as such, was submitted to the committee on detail.[7] That committee returned what is known as the first draft of the Constitution, and in article XIX thereof provided for amendment by having the National Legislature call a convention whenever two-thirds of the State legislatures petitioned for it. Article XIX read:

> On application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States in the Union, for an amendment of this Constitution, the Legislature of the United States shall call a Convention for that purpose.[8]

The draft was printed for the delegates and was the basic instrument used in future discussions. It, together with a record of the proceedings, was referred to another committee known as the Committee on Style and Revision.[9] Two days later the committee reported back a second draft and, as it turned out, this draft was the final one on the Constitution. After further discussion and additional revision by the Committee of the Whole, the draft, as revised, was agreed to by the delegates of all the States and was signed by all but three of the delegates.

When article XIX of the first draft was discussed by the delegates, it was agreed to unanimously.[10] However, in the second draft

Mr. Gerry moved its [illegible] on the ground that, as the Federal Constitution was [illegible] State constitutions, any provision which permit[illegible] States to obtain a convention, and thus subvert and [illegible] stitutions, might not be proper.[11] Alexander Hamilton [illegible] motion, but for another reason. Hamilton objected to the present form of the article because he did not believe the proposed manner for introducing amendments was adequate. He thought there should be an additional method. The National Legislature, in his view, would be the first to perceive the necessity of amendments and should, therefore, also be empowered, when two-thirds of each branch of the National Legislature concurred, to call a convention.[12] In addition, he pointed out that it would be essential to provide an expeditious method for amending the new document and not to rely on the State application process alone to remedy defects which Hamilton thought were very soon to become evident in the fabric of the new government. He also thought that if the article was not changed "the State legislatures will not apply for alterations but with a view to increase their own powers."

The Convention proceeded to study several measures (proposed by Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, and James Wilson, of Pennsylvania) which would have injected the National Legislature into the process for proposing amendments, but discussion was postponed in order to take up a proposition moved by Madison. Madison's proposal left proposed amendments entirely in the hands of the National Legislature either (1) upon application of two-thirds of the several States or, (2) when deemed necessary by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. This proposal read:

> The Legislature of the U— S— whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on application of two-thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the Legislatures of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the U. S.[13]

The Madison proposal, except as modified by provisions added at the end thereof to pacify the protests of slavery interests, was finally accepted.[14]

The Committee on Style and Revision reported back the article as article V. It read:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three-fourths at least of the legislatures of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the and sections of article.[15]

Considerable discussion was had on the article in this form before final agreement was reached. Objections were made to the provisions which would give the Congress plenary powers over the amending procedure. On the motion of Gouverneur Morris and Elbridge Gerry, the article was amended so as to require that a convention be called upon application of two-thirds of the States.[16] This amendment was adopted over the misgivings of Madison who "did not see why Congress would not be as much bound to propose amendments

PART II

VALIDITY OF STATE APPLICATIONS REQUESTING CONGRESS TO CONVENE A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

CHAPTER 4

ACTION OF GOVERNOR ON STATE APPLICATIONS

Insistence that the convention clause of Article V is mandatory raises many questions concerning the validity of applications calling for a convention. One involves gubernatorial consent. How, for example, shall Congress classify the petition from the State of Pennsylvania which was vetoed by its Governor.[1] Article V states that Congress shall call a convention on the application of the "Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States" and there is no indication, from the language of the article, whether the term "legislature" means action solely by the legislative houses of the States or whether it includes the established channels for statutory enactments, including the assent of the governors.

In deciding whether gubernatorial action affects the validity of a State application, it is necessary to determine the meaning of the word "legislatures" as set out in article V providing that:

> The Congress * * * on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments * * *,

The word "legislature" is used 13 times in the Constitution as originally adopted and 7 times in its amendments.[2] However, the term "legislature" in different circumstances does not always imply, as noted in Smiley v. Holm,[3] the performance of the same function. Ordinarily, the legislature acts as the lawmaking body in each State government. Under the Federal Constitution, it performs additional duties. It was intended to act, as noted in the Smiley case, as an electoral body, under article I, section 3, in the choice of United States Senators, prior to the adoption of the 17th amendment; as a ratifying body, under article V, with respect to proposed amendments, and as a consenting body, with regard to the acquisition of lands by the United States under article I, section 8, clause 17.[4]

Wherever, therefore, the term "legislature" is used in the Constitution, it is necessary to consider the nature of the particular action in view. Legislatures, in calling upon Congress to convene a convention, would not seem to be acting in the exercise of a lawmaking power but as agencies of the Federal Government, discharging a particular duty in the manner which the Constitution requires.[5] The matter of a Federal constitutional convention pertains exclusively to Federal affairs—not State domestic issues—and State legislatures, in soliciting the Congress, would be acting as representatives of the people of the State under the power granted by article V. The article therefore imports a function different from that of lawmaker and renders inapplicable the conditions which usually attach to the making of State laws. Furthermore, the Constitution speaks as of the time it was adopted, and in the beginning very few of the original States granted the veto power to their governors.[6]

As further indicia that action by governors was not intended, the Constitution uses the terms "executives" and "legislatures" in its text, and both terms were well-understood expressions. Article I, section 3, clause 2 gave the "executive" of the State authority to fill, temporarily, vacancies in the office of Senator,[6a] and article IV, section 3, clause 1 forbids the formation of new States by the junction of two or more States or parts of States without the consent of the "legislatures" of the States concerned. In fact, the Constitution expressly identifies the members of State legislatures and requires members of the several State legislatures to support the Constitution.[7] Article IV, section 4, guarantees the protection of every State against domestic violence on the application of the "legislature" or of the "executive" when the legislature cannot be convened. If the framers of the Constitution had intended that "legislature" include gubernatorial action, it could have used the word "State" which could include the governor, or some other expression such as "the legislature with the approval of the executive." Both terms are in no way novel, and both are used in other provisions of the Constitution.

The functions of a legislature as contained in article V are at odds with the ordinary duties of a deliberative body in conducting its statutory business. By way of analogy, the Supreme Court, speaking of ratifications of amendments by State legislatures, stated [8] that—> * * * ratification by a State of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word. It is but the expression of the assent of the State to a proposed amendment.

By the same reasoning, it would follow that the application process, like ratification, would fall within the same category as a select proceeding under article V.

Another Supreme Court decision which would seem to remove the executive branch of the State government from participation in the application process is Hollingworth v. Virginia.[9] In that case it was argued that the 11th amendment was invalid in that the joint resolution passed by the Congress proposing the measure to the States was never submitted to the President of the United States for his approval. In a footnote to the case, Mr. Justice Chase rejected the contention that the President's approbation was necessary by stating to the Attorney General:

> There can, surely, be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation: he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution.[10]

It therefore would not be incongruous to conclude that since the President has no functions to perform in the submission of amendments to the States for ratification, the actions of State governors, similarly, are unnecessary in the application process under article V. Ames states that: [11]

> The most reasonable view would seem to be that the signature of the chief executive of a State is no more essential to complete the action of the legislature upon an amendment to the Federal Constitution than is that of the President of the United States to complete the action of Congress in proposing such an amendment.

CITATIONS

[1] Pennsylvania Session Laws (1943) p. 922; Montana's Governor vetoed a petition relating to income tax but the petition sought congressional action under the first method of amendment and not a convention. Montana House Journal (1951) pp. 596–597.

[2] U. S., Constitution, Art. I, sec. 2, cl. 1; U. S., Constitution, Art. I, sec. 3, cl. 1. U. S., Constitution, Art. I, sec. 3, cl. 2 (twice). U. S., Constitution, Art. I, sec. 4, cl. 1. U. S., Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 17. U. S., Constitution, Art. II, sec. 1, cl. 2. U. S., Constitution, Art. IV, sec. 3, cl. 1. U. S., Constitution, Art. IV, sec. 4, (twice). U. S., Constitution, Art. V, (twice). U. S., Constitution, Art. VI, cl. 3. U. S., Constitution, Art. XVII, cl. 1. U. S., Constitution, Art. XVII, cl. 2 (twice). U. S., Constitution, Art. XIV, sec. 2. U. S., Constitution, Art. XIV, sec. 3. U. S., Constitution, Art. XVIII, sec. 3. U. S., Constitution, Art. XX, sec. 6.

[3] 285 U. S. 355, 365 (1932).

[4] Smiley v. Holm, Secretary of State, 285 U. S. 355, 365–366 (1932), citing Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U. S. 221, 231 (1920); Leser v. Garnett, 258 U. S. 130, 137 (1922).

[5] Cf. Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U. S. 221, 230 (1920).

[6] Only two states had veto powers by the chief executive, Massachusetts and New York—Massachusetts, Constitution (1780), chap. 2, sec. 1, Thorpe, American Charters Constitutions and Organic Laws, III, 1909; Laws of New York (1780), chap. 11.

[6a] Clause 2 was changed by clause 2 of the 17th amendment but the term "executive" was again used.

[7] U. S., Constitution, Art. VI, cl. 3.

[8] Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U. S. 221, 229 (1920).

[9] 3 Dall. 376 (U. S. 1798).

[10] Ibid. p. 380.

[11] U. S., Congress, House, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 1897, House Doc. 353, pt. 2, p. 298 (1897), Ames, The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of its History, p. 298.

CHAPTER 5

CONGRESSIONAL POWER TO REGULATE STATE APPLICATION PROCEDURE

Another issue pertaining to State applications is whether Congress may regulate the procedures of State legislatures in proposing constitutional conventions. As noted earlier the amending power conferred by article V of the Constitution is manifestly a Federal function in which the States take part in proposing constitutional conventions and ratifying amendments.[1] At the same time, however, State legislatures are not subject to absolute congressional control. While the act of petitioning or ratifying is a Federal function, the legislature performing the act is nonetheless the State legislature and a clear distinction must be kept in mind between acts which are necessary and proper for Congress to carry out constitutional requirements, and those which in any way seek to restrict the freedom of action of State legislatures. Certainly, Congress may not dictate to the States what they may or may not suggest in proposing a constitutional convention or when they may propose it. Such action would be beyond the scope of article V, either expressed or implied.

Nor may Congress pick the legislature which is to ratify its proposals. In 1866, for example, when the 14th and 15th amendments were under consideration in the United States Senate, resolutions were offered, providing among other things, that the amendment be submitted, not to the State legislatures then in session, but to future legislatures. These proposals were defeated.[2] It was pointed out that the Constitution referred to those legislatures in existence at the time the amendment was submitted. If they failed to act upon the proposal, it was possible that future legislatures may, but Congress had no right to withdraw the power from the existing legislatures and say, that those in existence in 1869 shall not act upon it, but those of 1870 or 1872 may act.[3] While Congress may, as will be discussed later, set a reasonable time within which States must ratify amendments, it appears that it is without power to choose a future legislature or a session of a legislature. This is for the reason that article V provides generally, and without restriction, that amendments become effective when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. To permit Congress to so restrict State legislative action would be a misconstruction of article V.

When the Founding Fathers framed the Constitution of 1787, they did so against the background of State laws and legislatures and customs which were already in existence. When they wrote the Constitution they made provision for those laws and they recognized State legislatures as bodies in being. Cooley, in his book on constitutional limitations,[4] points out that when a constitution is adopted there are in existence at the time of adoption known and settled rules and usages, which form a part of the law of the State or Nation, in reference to which their constitutions are evidently framed, and where the usages and rules require the observance of certain forms and procedures, the constitution itself will also be understood or interpreted as requiring them, because in assuming their existence and being framed with reference to them, it in effect adopts them as part of its provisions as though they had been expressly incorporated therein.[4]

Where, for example, the legislative power is to be exercised by two houses, and by settled and well-understood parliamentary law, these two houses are to hold separate sessions for their deliberations, and the determination of one upon proposed legislation is to be submitted to the other for separate determination, a constitution in providing for two houses, speaks with reference to the settled custom, incorporating within it, so to speak, a rule of constitutional interpretation, so that it would require no prohibitory clause to forbid the two houses from combining in one, and, jointly enacting laws by the vote of a majority of all.[5]

In addition, the customary rules of order and routine, such as every deliberative body must have, are always understood to be under its control, and subject to change at its will. Historic precedents leave to the discretion of the legislative bodies, the choosing of their officers,[6] the determination of their rules of proceedings,[7] and the election and qualification of their members.[8] These bodies also have always had the recognized power to punish their own members for disorderly conduct and other contempts of their authority.[9]

It would seem only proper that such powers should rest with the body immediately interested, so that its members may proceed with their deliberative functions without being subject to undue delay and interruption and confusion.[10] These rights have been developed over the years through socalled "parliamentary precedents."

Legislatures, furthermore, must of necessity be allowed to proceed in their own way, without interference, in the collection of information necessary for the proper discharge of their functions.[11] When deemed desirable to examine witnesses, the legislatures must have the power and authority to seek them out. So also with regard to the voting of legislatures, otherwise Congress would be able to tailor and reorganize those bodies to its own liking, and to dictate procedure to congressional advantage.

Under the rule of Field v. Clark [12] procedural requirements in the passage of legislation are deemed to have been properly met when the legislation is certified correct by the presiding officers. Only the legislators themselves may question whether a bill has been duly enacted into law, and their acquiescence in the record of the legislative proceedings is deemed to be an acknowledgment that the legislative requirements to the passage of the act have been performed. Once performed, such action cannot be questioned even by the courts, though there may be patently an error (omission or otherwise) in the legislation itself. This is so even though the constitutional and legislative requirements are capable of judicial investigation and decision. While mindful that the courts have the duty to enforce constitutional provisions relating to the passage of laws, the United States Supreme Court in the Field case, nevertheless held that the courts should not seek to go behind enrolled acts which carry the solemn assurances of both legislative houses, through the certification of their presiding officers, and the executive, that the legislation has passed.[13]

The Court, in the Field case, classified this problem as a "political question" [14] and stated that the respect due a coordinate branch of the Government required the judiciary department to accept the assurance as evidenced by the authentication that the legislation was validly enacted into law. In engrossing the bill a clause known as section 30 relating to a rebate of taxes on tobacco, which was shown in the journals of both Houses of Congress to have been regularly passed, was omitted in the engrossed bill. This bill was signed by the presiding officers of Congress and approved by the President. In holding that it would not go in back of the enrolled bill the Court pointed out that the evils which could result from accepting an authenticated act as conclusive evidence that it was passed validly by Congress would be far less than those that would certainly result from a rule making the validity of an enactment depend upon the manner in which the journals, and other materials, are kept by legislative clerks and other subordinate officers.

While no doubt Congress could defeat the internal workings of State legislatures by simply refusing to recognize their actions if they did not comply with congressional mandates, it would be more prudent in the light of court decisions and historical precedents to recognize the established rule that deliberative bodies have the right to regulate their own proceedings and to accept State applications when certified to, as having been validly adopted.

CITATIONS

[1] Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U. S. 221, 230 (1920), chapter 4, supra.
[2] Ames, The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of its History, pp. 288–290.
[3] Cooley, A Treatise on Constitutional Limitations (8th ed.; 1927).
[4] Ibid., I, p. 267.
[5] Ibid., p. 267.
[6] In Re Speakership, 15 Col. 520 (1891).
[7] French v. Senate, 146 Calif. 604 (1905).
[8] The People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481 (1865).
[9] While many State constitutions expressly provide for such authority, such authorization is not necessary, since it is believed to exist in the legislatures whether expressly conferred or not. It is "a necessary and incidental power, to enable the house to perform its high functions, and is necessary to the safety of the State. It is a power of protection. A member may be physically, mentally, or morally wholly unfit; he may be affected by a contagious disease, or insane, or noisy, violent, and disorderly, or in the habit of using profane, obscene, and abusive language." And, "independently of parliamentary customs and usages, our legislative houses have the power to protect themselves by the punishment and expulsion of a member." (Hiss v. Bartlett, 3 Gray (Mass.), 468, 473, 475 (1855); see also French v. Senate, 146 Cal. 604, 80 Pac. 1031.)
[10] Cooley, A Treatise on Constitutional Limitations (8th edition: 1927), I, 270–271.
[11] Tillinghast and Arthur v. Carr, 4 McCord 152 (S. C. 1829).
[12] 143 U. S. 649 (1892); see also Kelley v. Marron, 153 Pac. 262 (1915).
[13] Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 671–672 (1892).
[14] See chap. 12 for a discussion of "Political Questions."

PART III

CONTROL OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

CHAPTER 6

POWER OF CONGRESS TO BIND A FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION AND TO RESTRICT THE SCOPE OF ITS DELIBERATIONS

Probably the most vital question relates to the power of the Congress to bind a constitutional convention, or, to put it another way, the power of the convention to nullify or ignore congressional acts seeking to restrict the scope of its deliberations. Assuming the right of the Congress, for example, to call a convention into being, has it the further right to impose restrictions upon its actions, to dictate to the convention its organization and modes of procedure; in short to subject it to the restraints of legislative law?

Those who deny that Congress has the power to bind a convention rely heavily on the so-called doctrine of "conventional sovereignty." According to this theory, a convention is, in effect, a premier assembly of the people, a representative body charged by the people with the duty of framing the basic law of the land, for which purpose there devolves upon it all the power which the people themselves possess. In short, that for the particular business of amending and revising our Constitution, the convention is possessed of sovereign powers and therefore is supreme to all other Government branches or agencies.[1]

On the other hand, those who assert the right of the Congress to bind a convention contend that the convention is, in no proper sense of the term, a sovereign. It is, they argue, but an agency employed by the people to institute or revise fundamental law. While there may be a special dignity attaching to a convention by reason of its framing fundamental law, no such dignity or power should attach which would invest it with a primacy over other branches of government having equally responsible functions. A constitutional convention has the general characteristics of a legislature, but with the functions and organization only of a committee. Since its assembling is infrequent and dependent, for the most part upon considerations of expediency, it follows that the Congress, whose function it would be to declare and enforce the expediency, would be the proper body to determine the time and conditions for its assembling and to announce the will of the people in relation to the scope of the business committed to the convention.

Before considering the power and scope of a constitutional convention, it is important to distinguish between a revolutionary convention and a constitutional convention. The revolutionary convention, as its name implies, is part of the apparatus of a revolution. Jameson says it consists of those bodies of men who, in times of political crisis, assume, or have cast upon them, provisionally, the function of government.[2] They either supplant or supplement the existing governmental organization:

> The principal characteristics of this species are, that they are dehors the law; that they derive their powers, if justifiable, from necessity,—the necessity, in default of the regular authorities, of protection and guidance to the commonwealth,—or, if not justifiable, from revolutionary force and violence; that they are possessed, accordingly, to an indeterminate extent, depending on the circumstances of each case, of governmental powers; finally, that they are not subaltern or ancillary to any other institution whatever, but lords paramount of the entire political domain. [Italics in original.][3]

A constitutional convention, on the other hand as its name implies, is constitutional; not simply having for its object the framing or amending of constitutions, but as being within rather than without the pale of fundamental law. It is, says Jameson, "ancillary and subservient and not hostile and paramount to" the government then existing:[4]

> Its principal feature, as contradistinguished from the revolutionary convention, is, that at very step and moment of its existence, it is subaltern,—it is evoked by the side and at the call of a government preexisting and intended to survive it, for the purpose of administering to its special needs. It never supplants the existing organization. It never governs. Though called to look into and recommend improvements in the fundamental laws, it enacts neither them nor the statute law; and it performs no act of administration.[5] (Italic in original.)

It is clear from the foregoing that conventions, whose definitions thus mutually exclude each other, cannot be the same. A constitutional convention appointed under law and the Constitution, which presumes to overpass the limits imposed upon it by its creators, and seeks to do acts requiring the exercise of revolutionary powers, ceases to be a constitutional convention and becomes in the eye of law an extralegal or revolutionary convention.[6]

It might be well to note at this point that while the constitutional convention of 1787 acted beyond the scope of its authority, the Congress itself ratified and consented to the action of the convention and, in fact, transmitted its proposals to the States for their ratification. At no time did the convention seek to bypass or overrule the Congress; rather it submitted the draft Constitution to the Congress for its consideration and approval.[7]

Most authorities agree that a constitutional convention, once convened, would be limited by article V. The real area of disagreement is whether a convention would be further limited by the conditions set forth in a congressional act calling it together. Those who do not think a convention would be limited, point out that a convention ought to be independent of Congress—free, even to alter the powers of Congress itself under the Constitution. They offer the argument that it was fear of this contention which caused the Congress, after much pressure had been brought to bear on it for a constitutional convention, to adopt instead, under the first method, the proposal which resulted in the 17th amendment to the Constitution on the popular election of Senators. Many argue that if Jameson's theory of an ancillary and subservient convention was valid, the Congress would have had no need to fear the then proposed constitutional convention in that Congress could have restricted the convention in its work and, among other things, prohibited it from dealing with the question of senatorial elections (art. I, sec. 3). In adopting the first alternative method in the amending process, they urge that the Congress, in fact, conceded it could not control the scope of a convention's proceedings.

This whole matter, of course, can be dismissed as being more argumentative than decisive. The Senate took the easy way out and avoided the issue. Whatever its merits, it can hardly be said that the Congress, in proposing the 17th amendment to the States, decided this all-important issue.

While this question, then, has never been directly decided by Congress or by the courts, it seems that the whole scheme, history, and development of our Government, its laws and institutions, require the control of any convention and the most logical place for exercising that control would be in the enabling act convening it, or in some other Federal statutory law. Under article V, Congress calls the convention after the required number of states have submitted petitions. It has the duty to announce the will of the State legislatures in relation to the scope of the convention's business and, under the necessary and proper clause, it may set up the procedures and conditions so that the convention may not only function, but that it may control the convention's actions to make certain that it conforms to the mandates and directives of the Congress, the State legislatures, and ultimately the people. This does not mean that the convention may not exercise its free will on the substantive matters before it; it means simply that its will shall be exercised within the framework set by the congressional act calling it into being.

Dodd has no doubt on this question. He points out that a convention does not supersede the existing government; it "is bound by all restrictions either expressly or impliedly placed upon its actions by the Constitution in force at the time."[8] In the case of our Federal Constitution, a new Constitution as proposed by a convention certainly could not become effective until promulgated and, in accordance with article V (which permits Congress to select the mode of notification), ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. A convention then is an instrument of government and acts properly only when it stays within the orbit of its powers. Since the Congress is the branch of the Federal Government which has the duty of calling the convention, and since it acts at the requests of the States, and since both, in the final analysis, represent the people, the ultimate source of all power, a Federal constitutional convention, to act validly, would necessarily have to stay within the designated limits of the congressional act which called it into being.

"Necessary and proper" clause

Inherent in all questions concerning constitutional law is one relating to the effect various Articles of the Constitution have on each other. Article V is no exception and must be read and viewed in the light of all the other provisions of the Constitution.

In connection with congressional power, a provision which affects substantially all provisions is the so-called necessary and proper clause.[9] It reads:

[The Congress shall have Power] * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing powers, and all other Powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

By its terms there is conferred upon Congress:

(1) the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers which had previously been conferred and, in addition, (2) all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States * * *.[10]

This clause has been declared to be an enlargement of the powers granted to Congress and enables it to select the means necessary [11] to effectuate those powers. Thus since Congress, under article V must call the convention, it of necessity must have the power to fix the date and place of meeting. Further, since article V places on Congress the function of selecting the method of State ratification, it must legislate into law a set of Federal rules governing the process.[12] There is then a close relationship between the principal congressional power conferred under article V and the supporting or ancillary powers, conferred under the necessary and proper clause, to carry the principal power into execution. Without the supporting power, the principal power would cease to exist.[13]

These powers apply not only to procedural functions such as convening the convention and adopting the mode of ratification, but they also apply to the vital issue of declaring whether the convention shall consider either a single subject, a limited number of subjects, or a large scale overhauling of the Constitution. As will be discussed below, Congress, acting on the applications and at the request of the State legislatures, may limit the scope of such conventions and as a corollary it follows that Congress may adopt the means necessary to invoke such limitation upon the convention.

General revision or specific amendment

Few States in the past, when they submitted applications asking for a constitutional convention, sought merely to have a convention convened. Many have specified the particular subject matter that the convention was to consider. The power to limit a convention to a particular subject, or to several subjects has, of course, never been officially determined. Wheeler, in a University of Illinois law review article,[14] felt that conventions must be general in scope and stated that a State application calling for a specific amendment could have no legal or binding effect on a convention, except that the petition could be counted in determining whether a requisite number of petitions had been submitted for calling a convention.[15] Other writers differ with this view, however, and in fact one has taken the position that not only may a convention be limited to the consideration of specific subjects, but under no circumstances could it be given unlimited general revisionary powers to promulgate a new constitution.[16]

Article V states that Congress shall call a convention "for proposing amendments." If these words were to be literally construed it might be argued that a convention could not create an entirely new instrument to supersede the present Constitution. Yet argument could be made that, under such language, a convention could propose what is equivalent to a new Constitution by a series of separate amendments in the form of an addendum to the present Constitution.

The kind of government which we enjoy would seem to warrant the proposition that our Constitution can be both generally revised or specifically amended if the people so wish it. The Founding Fathers had little doubt about general revisionary powers of a convention. This is reflected in the fact that the first 2 applications for a convention were submitted less than 2 years after the constitutional convention of 1787 and were petitions for a convention of a general nature.[17] Since that time there have been 29 petitions seeking a general revision of the Constitution.[17a]

At the same time, the action of the States indicates that conventions may also be of a limited nature. Beginning with the present century there have been very few applications for a general convention, and instead there has been an increasing number of petitions requesting conventions to consider specific proposals only.[18] Twenty-seven States have sought a limited convention to prohibit polygamy.[19] Twenty-seven States also wish to change the Constitution, through a convention, to limit the Federal power over the taxation of income.[19] Thirty-one States once sought a convention to deal with the subject of direct election of senators.[19] Other subjects on which applications have been made for limited conventions cover world Federal Government, repeal of the 18th amendment, limitation of presidential tenure, treaty making, taxation of Federal and State securities, protective tariff, Federal regulation of wages and hours of labor, Federal tax on gasoline, tideland boundaries, control of trusts, Federal grants-in-aid, popular ratification of amendments, constitutionality of State enactments, the Townsend plan, revision of article V, reapportionment, balancing the budget, distribution of proceeds of Federal taxes on gasoline, and State control of schools.[20]

The States, of course, are given a major role under article V both in initiating a convention movement and in finally ratifying a convention's work.[21] In addition, as we have seen, one of the major reasons for incorporating the convention method of amending the Constitution into our basic law was to create a remedy by which the States, in the event Congress was unwilling to act, could compel action. The convention method of amending the Constitution would be reduced to an unworkable absurdity both from the standpoint of the States having a voice in the convention process and from the magnitude of the operation and its ultimate effect on our Government, if only general conventions were permissible under article V.

A complete revision of our basic instrument would be the most important task any convention could be asked to undertake. In fact, in all probability, such an event could happen only once under our present Constitution since, if a complete revision were to be accomplished, the powers of amendment under our present Constitution would be superseded by provisions in the new Constitution. It would therefore seem incongruous, as has been suggested, to hold that conventions may be only general in scope and that petitions seeking specific amendments for one purpose or another, should therefore be transformed into requests for a general convention.[22]

The States, of course, ask for either a limited or general reformation of the Constitution. It would be the duty of Congress to promulgate rules for counting the applications and determining the kind of convention to be convened. Congress would have to determine whether the language of State applications seeking an amendment on a specific subject should be identical in their texts, or whether applications using varying language but appertaining to the same subject matter generally would be acceptable. Clearly the latter method is preferable and has been suggested by Corwin and Ramsey in their law review article, the Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment.[25]

CITATIONS

[1] For those who hold that such a Convention would be a "premier assembly" of the people embodying their sovereign powers and would be unlimited and absolute, the following apt description was made in 1847, in connection with the Illinois State Constitutional Convention (and it is pertinent to a Federal convention):

"We are here, the sovereignty of the state. We are what the people of the state would be if they were congregated here in one mass meeting. We are what Louis XIV said he was—'We are the State'. We can trample the constitution under our feet as waste paper, and, no one can call us to an account save the people. * * *" (Illinois, Constitutional Convention (1847), debates p. 27.)

In more recent years a similar view was expressed by Senator Heyburn in the United States Senate:

"When the people of the United States meet in a constitutional convention there is no power to limit their action. They are greater than the Constitution, and they can repeal the provision that limits the right of amendment. They can repeal every section of it, because they are the peers of the people who made it." (46 Cong. Rec. p. 2769, Feb. 17, 1911).

[2] Jameson, Constitutional Conventions (4th ed.; 1887), p. 6; see also 35 Michigan Law Review, p. 284-285.

[3] Jameson, ibid., p. 6.

[4] Ibid., p. 10.

[5] Ibid., p. 10.

[6] Behout and Kass, How Can New Jersey Get a New Constitution, 6 University of Newark Law Review (1941) pp. 7-8; Stephens, Constitutional Convention Report, Georgia Bar Association, (1931) p. 219. This issue is discussed in chapter 7 wherein state cases are cited upholding the position that conventions may not go beyond the scope of legislative acts calling them into being. See e. g. Opinion of Justices, 6 Cush. 573 (Mass. 1833); Erwin v. Nolan, 280 Mo. 401 (1920); Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39 (1874).

[7] J. M. Beck, The Constitution of the United States (New York: Oxford University Press, 1924), p. 173 et seq.

Before the convention adjourned it resolved "That the preceding Constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled." By direction of the convention, Washington sent a letter in which he said for the convention that "We have now the honor to submit to the consideration of the United States in Congress assembled that Constitution which has appeared to us the best advisable." (Charles A. Beard, The Supreme Court and the Constitution (1938).)

The Congressional resolution authorizing the transmittal of the draft Constitution reads, in part, as follows:

"That the said report, with the resolutions and the letter accompanying the same, be transmitted to the several Legislatures, in order to be submitted to a Convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, in conformity to the resolves of the Convention made and provided in that case." (Beck, Constitution of the United States, p. 176; William H. Black, Our Unknown Constitution (Real Book Co., 1933).

[8] Dodd, The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions (1910), p. 98.

[9] U. S., Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 18.

[10] Watson, The Constitution of the United States (1910), I, 701.

[11] McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (U. S. 1819); U. S. Congress, Senate, 82d Cong., 2d sess., 1952, Senate Doc. 170, Constitution of the United States of America (1952), 307.

[12] Rottschaeffer, Handbook on American Constitutional Law (1939), 367.

[13] Tucker, Constitution of the United States (1899), I, 368, but see Tucker, ibid., p. 365. The "necessary and proper" clause stated to be unnecessary since Congress, having been granted a principal power, by implication may adopt the means necessary to execute the power.

[14] Is a Constitutional Convention Impending? 21 Illinois Law Review (1927), 782, 795.

[15] Applications for different specific amendments ought not be considered as calling for a general revision of the Constitution. A more acceptable view would seem to be that several applications each concerned with a different aspect of the Constitution do not represent a general dissatisfaction with the Constitution taken as a whole.

[16] Child, Revolutionary Amendments to the Constitution, 10 Const. Rev. (1926), 27. Child argues that the phrase in Article V calling a convention "for proposing amendments" excludes the idea that a convention could promulgate a new or substantially revised Constitution. (P. 28.)

[17] New York and Virginia, See Tables I and II, appendix.

[17a] See Table 2, appendix, item 4.

[18] See Tables 1, 2, 3, appendix.

[19] See Table 2, appendix.

[20] See Table 2, appendix.

[21] U. S., Constitution, Art. V.

[22] See footnote 15 above.

[23] 26 Notre Dame Lawyer (1951), 185, 194.

CHAPTER 7

POWER OF STATES TO CONTROL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS—BOTH STATE AND FEDERAL

The issue of whether a State legislative body has the power to limit a State convention to the consideration of certain specified topics has arisen many times in connection with State constitutional conventions. While it would be difficult, because of the many situations under which State conventions may convene, to lay down a uniform rule applicable to all State constitutional conventions, it is nevertheless possible to point to certain concepts and principles which are recognized by State judicial authorities as controlling.[1]

To begin with, State legislatures do not have ultimate control over conventions; it is the people who exercise this control. Of course, the power of limiting the scope of State conventions depends, in the first instance, upon the particular provisions in each State constitution. In this connection, State constitutions may be classified into two general groups: (1) those which contain no provision for constitutional conventions, and (2) those which provide, either in elaborate detail or just generally, for conventions.[2]

In States whose constitutions make no provision for constitutional conventions, it has been generally recognized since In Re Opinion to the Governor (Rhode Island) [3] that such conventions may, with the approval of the electorate, be assembled through legislative action and further, that they may be called even though the State constitutions provide a specific method of amendment (other than by convention).

In the Rhode Island case above, the Governor of Rhode Island asked the State supreme court whether it would be a valid exercise of the power of the legislature, if the legislature should provide, by an act or resolution, for the calling of a convention to revise or amend the constitution of the State. The constitution contained no mention of a constitutional convention. It provided for constitutional change only by direct proposals made to the people by the legislature for ratification by three-fifths of the voters. In holding that the method expressly set forth in the constitution did not prohibit the legislature from providing by law for calling a constitutional convention, to be chosen by the people, for revising the constitution, the court stated that one method of amendment could not, by implication, prohibit the legislature from proposing a revision of the constitution by another method, namely, by a constitutional convention. The court pointed out that there was no inconsistence between the power of a legislature to provide for a convention to be chosen by the people, and the power, by following a prescribed procedure, to propose, directly to the people amendments to the constitution.

Argument was made that where a power is given to do a thing in a particular way, the affirmative words marking out the particular way prohibit, by implication, all other ways. In rejecting the argument the court noted that the power to provide by law for the calling of a convention, while different from the method set out in the constitution, was not an inconsistent power and relied on the rule that if two constructions of a provision are reasonably possible, one of which would diminish or restrict the right of the people, and the other of which would not do so, the latter must be adopted. The court also noted that New York in 1845 had convened a convention even though its constitution provided a different method of amendment.[3a]

Another case in point is State v. American Sugar Refining Co.[4] There the State of Louisiana moved to cancel the license of the Sugar Refining Co. to do business in that State because of the company's violation of section 190 of the 1913 constitution relating to antitrust and monopoly practices. The Sugar Refining Co. protested on the ground, among others, that section 190 of the 1913 constitution was void in that it was adopted in contravention of article 75 of the constitution of 1798 which expressly provided the only method of amending the constitution, namely, by resolution of "the general assembly at any session thereof" with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected to each House. In holding that a convention could be convened even though such a method was not one of the methods provided for by the constitution itself, the court quoted Cooley on Constitutional Limitations:

> Some of these constitutions pointed out the mode of their own modification; others were silent on that subject, but it has been assumed that in such cases the power to originate proceedings for that purpose rested with the legislature of the State, as the department most nearly representing its general sovereignty; and this is doubtless the correct view to take on this subject. Const. Lim. (7th ed.) p. 56. (p. 744).

Specific amending provisions apparently cannot, under State constitutional law, exclude the sovereign right of the people, acting through their legislatures, from making changes in fundamental law through methods other than those expressly provided for in their fundamental law.[5]

The courts also seem to agree that the powers of State constitutional conventions, however convened, may be effectively limited by the terms of the legislative act calling it into existence, the only qualification being that the approval for the limiting power be obtained from the people at an election held for that purpose. A case which clearly outlines this proposition is Cummings, Secretary of State v. Beeler.[6] There the Tennessee Legislature desired to call a convention to consider certain proposals recommended by a commission which had earlier been appointed to study changes needed in the constitution. The legislature wished to have the work of the convention restricted to amending only specified parts of the constitution, in line with the commission's recommendations. It therefore asked the State court for a declaratory judgment on whether it could propose a limited convention to the people.

The State constitution provided two methods of amendment: (1) by legislative proposal to the electorate for direct, popular approval and (2) by convention. The convention provision authorized the legislature "to submit to the people the question of calling a convention to alter, reform or abolish this constitution." The court noted that there was nothing in the constitution expressly prohibiting the legislature from submitting limited questions to the people, and that since the legislature was leaving the question of limited powers to the people for decision, it was the people and not the legislature who were limiting the work of the convention which they, as sovereign and with ultimate power, had the right to do.

A case with similar issues and reaching the same conclusions is Staples v. Gilmer.[7] Section 197 of the Virginia constitution provided that its legislature could submit to the electors the question "shall there be a convention to revise the constitution and amend the same?" The Virginia Legislature proposed to submit the above question to the electors with the added provision that the convention be limited to amendments regarding the right to vote "by members of the Armed Forces while in active service in time of war."

In holding that such a limitation could be placed upon the convention, the court said:

> If the electors vote in favor of a convention, it may amend the constitution as well as revise it, and where the legislature, in the performance of its representative function, asks the electors if they desire a convention to amend or revise a certain part of the constitution but not the whole constitution, an affirmative vote of the people on such question would have the binding effect of the people themselves limiting the scope of the convention to the very portion of the constitution suggested to them by the legislature. The wishes of the people are supreme. Some agency must ascertain the desire of the people, and the legislature, by section 197, has been selected by them to do so (p. 627).

Of special importance on this issue is the case of Wells v. Bain [8] wherein the Pennsylvania State Constitutional Convention declined to observe restrictions placed upon it by the State legislature's act. The act of 1872, under which the convention was assembled, provided that the constitution which it framed should be voted upon at an election held in the same manner as general elections, and that one-third of the members of the convention should have the power to require the separate submission to the people of any change proposed by the convention. The convention disregarded the legislative act by providing machinery of its own for the submission of the constitution to the people in the Philadelphia area, and appointed election commissioners for this special purpose. It also refused to submit an article to the proposed constitution separately although it was claimed that a third of the members of the convention had voted for a separate submission. The court granted an injunction restraining the commissioners appointed by the convention from holding an election in Philadelphia. It declared that the submission of the constitution in a manner different from that provided by law was clearly illegal. The court said that the convention had no power except that conferred by legislative act, and that any violation of that act or any action in the excess thereof would be restrained.

As noted earlier, State legislatures do not exercise ultimate control over conventions; it is the people. However, as a practical matter, the legislatures play an effective and controlling role in calling constitutional conventions. They determine if and when a convention should be had. In the legislative acts submitting the propositions for vote by the people, they determine the specific subjects which the conventions, if voted by the people, will consider. The electorate, in voting, have usually only two choices: either to vote "no," or to vote "yes" for a convention in which the legislature has already prescribed the subjects to be considered.

State power over Federal conventions

Arguments in recent years have sought to shift some of the emphasis on control over Federal conventions from the Congress to the State legislatures. In support of this position of State legislative control, the State of Georgia,[9] in its application for a Federal constitutional convention which would have taken up the problem of revising the constitution generally, declared in its resolution that the Federal convention was to amend the Constitution—> * * * in the particulars herein enumerated and in such others as the people of the other States may deem needful of amendment.

New York, in 1931, in declaring its right to control the scope of Federal conventions, made application for a convention to propose an amendment to repeal the 18th amendment "and no other article of the Constitution."[10]

In recent years, many States have expressly cited in their petitions the particular subject matter they intended that the convention should consider.[11] In fact some have included in their applications the exact wording of the amendment to be considered and proposed by the convention.[12]

In the 83d Congress, resolutions were introduced in the Congress itself which sought to amend article V itself.[13] Because Congress took no action, the substance of these measures was set out in a uniform, model resolution and sent to the leaders of State legislative bodies asking them to introduce the proposal and have their legislatures take early action. The sponsors hoped that the several States would adopt these resolutions with their uniform, identical provisions and put them in the form of petitions calling upon the Congress to convene a constitutional convention for the sole purpose of amending article V. Certainly this unified, mass action which, incidentally, has already been adopted by several of the State legislatures, supports the theory that State legislatures can limit a convention to the consideration of specific amendments.[14]

If these contentions be accepted, State applications may be considered as mandates to the Congress, not only to call the convention, but also to specify the scope and limit of a convention's deliberations in accordance with State directives. Only recently the State of Indiana in 5 separate applications [15] calling for conventions to consider 5 different subjects set forth the above theory in the following language in its resolutions:

> For the reason that the power of the sovereign States to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States by convention under article V has never been exercised and no precedent exists for the calling or holding of such convention, the State of Indiana hereby declares the following basic principles with respect thereto: that the power of the sovereign States to amend the Constitution of the United States under article V is absolute; that the power of the sovereign States to propose amendments to the Constitution by convention under article V is absolute; that the power of the sovereign States extends over such convention and the scope and control thereof and that it is within their sovereign power to prescribe whether such convention shall be general or shall be limited to the proposal of a specified amendment or of amendments in a specified field; that the exercise by the sovereign States of their power to require the calling of such convention contemplates that the applications of the several States for such convention shall prescribe the scope thereof and the essential provisions for holding the same; that the scope of such convention and the provisions for holding the same are established in and by the applications therefor by the legislatures of the two-thirds majority of the several States required by article V to call the same, and that it is the duty of the Congress to call such convention in conformity therewith; that such convention is without power to transcend, and the delegates to such convention are without power to act except within, the limitations and provisions so prescribed.

Just how far States may go in imposing their wills on conventions is a matter on which the Founding Fathers failed to define the limits in article V. It is evident, however, that together, the Congress and the State legislatures play the dominant roles. Together they not only initiate but also finally approve the work of any convention. With this ultimate power at their commend, they may fence off the boundaries of power within which a convention must operate.

While both have important roles, the greater and final power, as has been and will be further pointed out in other chapters in this thesis, lies in the Congress of the United States, not so much because of the express provisions of article V which creates the power, but by reason of the article's failure to place sanctions on the Congress and for its failure to provide for review of congressional action.

CITATIONS

[1] The power of limiting the scope of state conventions depends, in the first instance, upon the particular provisions in each state constitution. In this connection, state constitutions may be classified into two general groups:

(1) those state constitutions containing no provision for Constitutional Conventions.[a]

(2) those states providing (a) for Constitutional Conventions generally,[b] and (b) in detail what the powers and duties of the convention shall be.[c]

[a] Arkansas, Connecticut, Indiana, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Jersey, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Vermont (2 Vanderbilt Law Review 29 (1948); 21 Tennessee Law Review 867 (1950).

[b] Iowa, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, New York, New Hampshire, Ohio, Georgia, Maine.

[c] Michigan, Missouri, New York. (For clause and section citations, see chart below.)

State constitutional provisions relating to conventions

State	Clause	Section
Alabama	18	286
Arizona	21	2
Colorado	19	1
Delaware	16	2
Florida	17	2
Georgia	13	1
Idaho	20	3
Illinois	14	1
Iowa	10	3
Kansas	14	2
Kentucky		258
Maine	4	3
Maryland	14	2
Michigan	17	4
Minnesota	14	2
Missouri	15	3
New Hampshire	99
New York	14	2
Ohio	16	2

[1] See footnote 1 above.

[2] Opinion of the Court to the Governor, 55 R. I. 56, 178 Atl. 433 (1935).

[2a] See discussions of this issue, pp. 62–63, infra.

[4] 137 La. 407, 68 So. 742 (1915).

[5] Opinion of the Court to the Governor, 55 R. I. 56, 178 Atl. 433 (1935). In this case the court noted that there are three known recognized modes by which the people can give consent to an alteration of an existing lawful frame of government, viz:

(1) the mode provided in the existing constitution;

(2) a law, as the instrumental process of raising the body for revision and conveying to it the powers of the people;

(3) a revolution.

The court pointed out that the first two means are peaceful ones through which the consent of the people is obtained. If consent is not given, any change in government would be revolutionary. Irregular action whereby a convention would assume to act for the whole, the state, is revolutionary.

[6] 189 Tenn. 151 (1949).

[7] 183 Va. 613, 33 S. E. 2d 49 (1945).

[8] 75 Pa. 39 (1874).

[9] U. S. Congress, Senate, 71st Cong., 2d sess., 1930, Senate Doc. 78, p. 25.

[10] 75 Cong. Rec. 48.

[11] See appendix, Table 6.

[12] See appendix, Table 8.

[13] U. S. Congress, House, 83d Cong., 2d sess., 1954, H. J. Res. 568, 569, 40 American Bar Journal (1954), pp. 767, 974. Resolutions would add a third method of amending the Constitution. See also U. S. Congress, House, 84th Cong., 1st sess., 1955, H. J. Res. 168, H. J. Res. 169.

[14] See item 19, Table 2, appendix.

[15] Congressional Record, Daily, 1957, pp. 5761–5764, Revision of Art. V, Sec. 3, limit treaty-making power, Sec. 3, Reapportionment, Sec. 3, Limitation of Federal Taxing Power, Sec. 3, Balancing the Budget, Sec. 3; see also to similar effect, Michigan and Nebraska legislatures resolution calling for limitation of Federal taxing power, U. S. Congress, House 82d Cong., 2d Sess., 1952, House Committee on the Judiciary, Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates, pp. 26–27.

CHAPTER 8

POWER OF CONGRESS TO REFUSE TO CALL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

May Congress refuse to call a convention should the requisite number of States comply? Apparently it may, although the intent of the framers of the Constitution was otherwise. The Founding Fathers included the Convention provision in article V as a remedy for the States to bring about constitutional reform in the event the Federal Government refused to do so.[1] It was certainly their intention that Congress should have no discretion in the matter of calling a convention once two-thirds of the States applied.[2]

Madison, on the question, stated:[3]

> It is to be observed however that the question concerning a general convention will not belong to the Federal Legislature. If two-thirds of the States apply for one, Congress cannot refuse to call it: if not, the other mode of amendments must be pursued.

James Iredell, before the North Carolina ratifying convention, also stated:

> that it was very evident that it (the proposal of amendments) did not depend on the will of Congress; for that the legislatures of two-thirds of the States were authorized to make application for calling a convention to propose amendments, and, on such application, it is provided that Congress shall call such convention, so that they will have no option (italic in original).[4]

In addition to the above statements made contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution as to its true intent, there are the express words of article V that Congress "shall call a convention." It is doubtful, however, that there is any process or machinery under our constitutional system by which the Congress could be compelled to perform this duty. It is argued by some that the congressional act being ministerial, the courts could compel the legislative branch to act by way of mandamus, otherwise the whole intention of the framers would be nullified.[5] It seems more likely, however, that the courts would refuse to issue such a writ for the same reasons that they have refused to issue writs on the President of the United States, namely the doctrine of separation of powers which proscribes action by one branch of our Government against another. In Mississippi v. Johnson,[6] the Supreme Court, among other things, pointed out that:

> The Congress is the legislative branch of the Government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department; though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance.

Courts today in line with that decision, and the more recent case of Coleman v. Miller would probably rule that the question is political and therefore not justiciable.[7]

From a legal standpoint, there is the same situation as arose from the failure of Congress to reapportion the number of Representatives in the House of Representatives, which article I, section 2, clause ?, requires it to do every 10 years, but which in 1920 Congress failed to do. Thus while Congress has the mandate to perform, its failure or refusal to do so apparently gives rise to no enforcible cause of action. In line with this point, it may be observed that court orders, even if it could be argued that the States had a right to bring legal actions in the courts against an unwilling Congress to call a convention, would have little meaning or effect since the courts lack the necessary tools to enforce their decisions against the Congress.[8]

As a consequence, public opinion and, ultimately, the ballot box,[9] are the only realistic means by which the Congress can be persuaded to act. A Federal statute, as suggested in this thesis, containing the provisions for convening a Convention, could, as a practical matter, go a long way in easing the road for congressional action.

CITATIONS

[1] Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 (Rev. ed. 1937) I, 203.

[2] See excerpts from the constitutional debates, Tuller, W. K., A Convention to Amend the Constitution, quoting from Elliott's Debates, 193 N. Amer. Rev. 375-378 (1911).

[3] Documentary History of the Constitution, V, 141, 143, citing Madison's Letter to Mr. Eve, 1/2/1789.

[4] Elliott's Debates (2d ed.; 1937), IV, p. 178. But see Walter F. Dodd, Judicially Non-Enforceable Provisions of Constitution, 80 University of Pennsylvania Law Review (1931), p. 82: "In general, a constitutional provision which states that a legislature 'shall' perform a duty is equivalent to a statement that it 'may' or 'shall have power'."

[5] Tuller, A Convention to Amend the Constitution, 193. North American Review (1911), pp. 379-381; Cuvillier, Shall We Revise the Constitution (1927), 77 Forum, pp. 323-325; Packard, F. E., Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program, 30 Chi-Kent Law Rev. 128 (1952).

[6] 4 Wall. 475, 500 (U. S. 1866).

[7] 307 U. S. 433 (1939); Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States (1929), I, 597. Willoughby notes, however, that had the performance of the act of calling a convention been placed in the hands of anyone other than the Congress or the President, there is little doubt that the courts would have compelled some sort of action.

[8] Frank, John P. "Political Questions" set out in Supreme Court and Supreme Law, edited by Edmond N. Cohn, Indiana Univ. Press, Bloomington (1954), p. 39.

[9] See Colegrove v. Green, 328 U. S. 549, 556 (1946).

CHAPTER 9

RIGHT OF REVOLUTION

A theory of constitutional law being urged today by the Communist Party in America, and which is pertinent to the problems involved in this thesis, is one relating to a so-called right of revolution. According to its supporters, the right of revolution is a concept recognized by our Constitution and protected by it.

If such a theory be valid, then it could be argued, since it presupposes changing our form of government in a manner other than that provided for in article V, that a Constitutional Convention, once convened, could disregard congressional directions and article V, and adopt extra-legal means in establishing a new or revised Constitution.

It is a matter of common knowledge, of course, that today free countries with free institutions are on the defensive and, in some instances, are being destroyed by organized violence. Communistic philosophy is based in part on the principle that internal weakness is an inherent character of free institutions and that the American concept of liberty with its constitutional safeguards inhibits any defense against internal enemies.[1] In fact, members of subversive groups in America are cynically taking advantage of the protection of the very constitutional safeguards which they are seeking to destroy.

The decisions of our courts protecting the rights of individuals have been more widely publicized than those which have upheld the right of the Government to defend itself and protect itself against unlawful change. The decisions, nonetheless, have clearly outlined and upheld both kinds of rights. An outline of some of those decisions together with an historical development of this controversial political doctrine can be helpful in obtaining a clearer understanding of a government's power to protect and preserve itself.

When English colonists first migrated to America, they brought with them England's political philosophy, its government, and its law. England itself had experienced attempted unlawful change of government during the so-called English rebellion of 1688. The rule of conduct developed at that time set the standard for future conflicts. In 1688 the King of England was condemned because of his usurpation of governmental power and for tyrannical acts.[2] While it was argued by some that it was the people who, in fact, were in rebellion against their King, Parliament took the position that when the people have entrusted the powers of government to their King and the Parliament, and the King in turn usurps the legislative function and corrupts the Parliament, he is exercising power without lawful authority. In such a situation, as noted by John Locke, the renowned political philosopher of that era,[3] the people are not in rebellion but are acting in self-defense and in behalf of their own self-preservation.[4] Locke asserted that the King had to be resisted when he attempted to do that which he had no authority for doing; that which was a "breach of trust in not preserving the government agreed on."[5] A nation is ruled by, and with the consent of, the governed, and changes may be made only if the governed so wish.

Our Founding Fathers accepted this principle. Changes, in time, are inevitable and the Founding Fathers wisely made provision in the constitutional instrument to provide for such changes. The provisions, however, envision orderly and lawful change, not change, as will be discussed, by extra-legal or unconstitutional means, be the means violent or nonviolent.

The first substantial challenge to orderly and nonviolent change in this country came in 1820–30 when South Carolina asserted the "right" of a State to nullify an act of Congress. At that time, many of the States, especially those in the South, took the position that the tariff acts with their rising rates were the cause of increased poverty in the southern States. Since northern States were prospering, the tariff acts were looked upon as discriminatory and unconstitutional devices for taxing the South for the benefit of the North. John C. Calhoun, then Vice President of the United States and a South Carolinian, developed a plan to protect the peculiar interests of his and other Southern States—a plan known as the nullification movement. Simply stated, nullification was based on a two part principle: (1) that the Federal Constitution was a compact or agreement between States, and (2) that the individual States were sovereign and indestructible. As sovereign, South Carolina, and any other State for that matter, had the right to judge when its agent, the Federal Government, exceeded its powers. In 1832, after a finding that the Federal Government had exceeded its powers, the South Carolina Legislature declared the Federal tariff acts to be "null, void, and no law" not binding upon her, her officers, or citizens. It forbade Federal officials to collect customs duties within the State and threatened instant secession from the Union if the Federal Government attempted interference.[6]

President Jackson took prompt action to preserve the Union and maintain the law of the land. His position was that the United States was indivisible and that no State could revolt. He reinforced military garrisons in South Carolina and thereafter issued a proclamation stating that the nullification ordinance passed by that State was an overt act of rebellion and had no basis in constitutional law. He pointed to the paradoxical situation of South Carolina seeking to retain its place in the Union and enjoying Federal benefits, and at the same time wishing to be bound only by those laws that it chose to regard as constitutional.[7] Jackson proclaimed:

> I consider, then, the power to annul a law of the United States, assumed by one State, incompatible with the existence of the Union, contradicted expressly by the letter of the Constitution, unauthorized by its spirit, inconsistent with every principle on which it was founded, and destructive of the great object for which it was formed (pp. 483–484).

The firm stand of President Jackson won out and, while Federal tariffs were reduced somewhat as a face-saving gesture for South Carolina, its nullification ordinance was repealed. The "right" to destroy the Union by "nullification" was successfully repulsed.

The "right" to destroy the Union by "secession" was also repulsed but it took a civil war to prove it. Lincoln, of course, had long denied any constitutional right of revolution. In his first inaugural address, he summed it up this way:

Perpetuity is implied, if not expressed, in the fundamental law of all national governments. It is safe to assert that no government proper ever had a provision in its organic law for its own termination. * * * it being impossible to destroy it except by some action not provided for in the instrument itself. [Italics supplied.][7a]

We have, then, instances of the Government deciding, in a political manner, that there is no constitutional right of revolution or rebellion.[8] In another manner—that is, by judicial decision—our United States Supreme Court has also decided the question and declared that the Constitution supports no right of revolution. After the turn of the present century, world unrest and discrimination problems arising under the 14th amendment brought before our courts the whole question of constitutional rights.[9] Shortly after World War II, the Supreme Court was called upon to decide the question on the right to advocate revolution. In Gitlow v. New York,[10] Benjamin Gitlow was convicted under a New York statute which forbade the advocacy of criminal anarchy (overthrowing organized government by force or violence).[11] He published a radical journal called The Revolutionary Age and advocated, among other things, "mass action for the conquest of the power of the state." Quoting Story, the Supreme Court held that the "state may punish utterances endangering the foundations of organized government and threatening its overthrow by unlawful means." [12]

Any consideration of the right of revolution involves first of all the question of how far one may go in advocating changes in government. Criticizing one's government does not automatically constitute incitement to revolution. A distinction is to be made between mere expressions of opinion on the one hand, and urging others to some definite act of violence against the government. This distinction was brought out in Herndon v. Georgia.[13] Herndon, an organizer for the Communist Party, was found guilty, under a Georgia statute, of inciting insurrection among southern Negroes against the state because he urged them to unite against white domination. The Supreme Court, in reversing the conviction, announced the principle that it was not unconstitutional for one to express a belief in the need for a change in, even the complete conversion of, the government so long as it was accomplished by peaceful, constitutional means.

The Gitlow and Herndon cases determined in broad outline the individual's right to advocate political change by lawful means. They also established the right of a government to legislate against acts of incitement and rebellion.[14] Later cases established the right of government to outlaw organizations created for revolutionary purposes.[15] No one—be it an individual, a group, an organization, or a political party—may advocate revolution.[16] The most notable case in which this communistic doctrine was denounced is Dennis v. United States.[17] There, the petitioners, leaders of the Communist Party in the United States, were indicted under the Smith Act,[18] for conspiring to teach and advocate the overthrow and destruction of the United States by force and violence. It was argued, on behalf of the petitioners, that the people, as sovereign, have an "historically established right to advocate revolution," and that the Constitution recognized such right.[19] The Declaration of Independence was cited as proof of the Constitution's and the people's recognition of such a "right." To contend otherwise, according to the petitioners, would mean that the Government was an entity, independent of the people, endowed with the right of self-perpetuation, even if the people did not wish to perpetuate it.

Judge Learned Hand, when the case was before the court of appeals, in denying that such a right existed under the Constitution, succinctly pointed out that no government could tolerate it and exist.[20] He stated:

> The advocacy of violence may or may not, fail; but in neither case can there be any "right" to use it. Revolutions are often "right" but a "right of revolution" is a contradiction in terms, for a society which acknowledged it, could not stop at tolerating conspiracies to overthrow it, but must include their execution (p. 213).

When the case was decided in the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Vinson, writing for the majority, observed that the Constitution can only be changed by "peaceful, lawful, and constitutional means."[21] He further stated:

> Whatever theoretical merit there may be to the argument that there is a "right" to rebellion against dictatorial governments is without force where the existing structure of the government provides for peaceful and orderly change. (p. 501).

The fallacy in the Communist party theory lies in the fact that there is a natural law "right" of revolution but not a constitutional "right of revolution." Whenever any form of government becomes oppressive, or when a dictator has usurped the powers of government, there is, of course, the natural right of the people, recognized in international law, to relieve themselves of such oppression, if they are strong enough to do so, by overthrowing the government and initiating a new one.[22] The Declaration of Independence was based on this natural law concept and the American colonists invoked it in throwing off the unyielding yoke of despotism and tyranny forced upon them by England.

The Communist concept adopts this theory but such a concept is clearly to be distinguished from orderly changes in government brought about through constitutional and lawful means. Chief Justice Vinson gave the constitutional answer to this question when he stated that there was no such right "where the existing structure of government provides for peaceful and orderly change." And our Constitution so provides.

The Founding Fathers, fresh from their own revolution, did not seek, in molding the Constitution, to forge a political straitjacket on the generations which were to follow them. Instead, they foresaw that changes, in time, would be inevitable and they wrote article V into the Constitution providing for such changes.

Applying the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the Dennis and other cases to the problem at hand, and considering the political action taken by our Government to suppress rebellions, it becomes apparent that changes in our form of government can only be accomplished by peaceful, lawful, and orderly means in the manner provided for by the Constitution. A Constitutional Convention, therefore, would be bound to function within, and in accordance with, the provisions of article V and congressional enabling acts, under the "necessary and proper" clause, calling it into being.[23]

CITATIONS

[1] History has shown, unfortunately, that governments have been destroyed from within both by agents of foreign sovereigns and by corrupt or overzealous public officials and organizations.

[2] The English Law Courts at the Close of the Revolution of 1688, 15 Michigan Law Review, 529, 1912.

[3] Locke, Essay Concerning the True and Original Extent of Civil Government (J. P. Dutton, ed. 1924), pp. 224–242.

[4] Ibid., p. 240. The framers of the United States Constitution accepted this theory for their government and, in fact, invoked it when the colonies broke with England because of the oppressive and tyrannical acts of George III. The Declaration of Independence, composed in large part by Thomas Jefferson, contains phrases taken directly from Locke's treatises, and Locke's pronouncements underlying England's action in its own rebellion were recast by Jefferson to fit the American Revolution. (Hayes, Revolution as a Constitutional Right (1938), 13 Temple Law Qt. 19.)

Strangely, however, the Declaration of Independence which was used by our own nation to justify our break with the English government is relied upon by those who today insist that there is a right of revolution which must be recognized if our present Constitution is to be consistent with the ideals of our founding fathers. (Brief for Petitioners before the United States Supreme Court, p. 267, Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951).)

The founding fathers, in framing the Constitution, did not specifically mention that there was no right of revolution or rebellion. They were creating a government, not providing for its overthrow. Since the instrument was silent, it remained for the Supreme Court and the political acts of our government to define the rights of its citizens, acting either as individuals or as groups, to oppose their government. Hayes, Revolution as a Constitutional Right (1938), 13 Temple Law Qt., 19; Brief for petitioners before the United States Supreme Court, p. 267, Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951).

[5] Locke, ibid., p. 240.

[6] U. S., Congress, Senate, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 1897, Senate Doc. 353, Pt. 2, p. 282; U. S., Congress, Senate, 22d Cong., 2d Sess., 1833, Senate Journal, pp. 65–66, 83; Am. An. Reg. VIII, 297; U. S., Congress, House, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 1897, Senate Doc. 353, Pt. 2, p. 345.

[7] Morison, S. F., and Commager, H. E., The Growth of the American Republic, 3d ed., Oxford University Press (1942).

[7a] Old South Leaflets, I, Boston, containing Lincoln's Inaugurals, p. 3.

[8] The government, by political action in sustaining the doctrine that there is no constitutional "right of revolution" put down rebellious forces in the Wyoming Valley Insurrection, 1872; Shay's Rebellion, 1786–1787; The Whiskey Rebellion, 1794; Fries's Rebellion, 1842 ("Window Tax war"); Dorr's Rebellion, 1842 (Rhode Island).

[9] At the time of World War I, two decisions were handed down, upholding the right of the government to protect itself against its enemies even to the extent of providing punishment for criticising in newspaper articles the policy of the government. (Schaefer v. United States, 251 U. S. 466 (1919); Gilbert v. Minnesota, 254 U. S. 325 (1920).

[10] 268 U. S. 652 (1925).

[11] McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York, Penal Law, sections 160, 161 (1909).

[12] 268 U. S. 652, 667 (1925).

[13] 295 U. S. 441 (1935); also Herndon v. Lowry, Sheriff, 301 U. S. 242 (1937).

[14] See also Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357 (1927); DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353 (1937); Fiske v. Kansas, 274 U. S. 380 (1927).

[15] Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951); United States v. Schneiderman, 106 Fed. Supp. 906, 926 (1952); United States v. Foster, 9 F. R. D. 367, 394 (1951).

[16] Kjar v. Doak, 61 F. 2d 566 C. C. A. Ill. (1932); Gitlow v. Kiely, 44 Fed. 2d 227 D. C. N. Y. (1930).

[17] 341 U. S. 494 (1951).

[18] 54 Statutes at Large 671; 18 U. S. Code, sec. 11 et seq., (1952 ed.)

[19] Brief for petitioners before United States Supreme Court, p. 267, Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951).

[20] 183 Fed. 2d 201 (2d Cir. 1950).

[21] United States v. Dennis, 341 U. S. 494, 501 (1951).

[22] Personal Memoirs of U. S. Grant (1885) p. 786.

[23] The philosopher, John Dewey, is quoted in Sidney Hook's Heresy, Yes—Conspiracy, No as saying "The democratic idea of freedom is not the right of each individual to do as he pleases, * * *." (New York: The John Day Co., 1951, p. 15). The free expression and circulation of ideas, as guaranteed by the First Amendment to the Constitution, is not, as we all know, an absolute freedom or right. One cannot, as Justice Holmes noted, yell "fire" in a crowded theater; nor may one blast another's reputation by libelous accusation. Hook stated the governing rule: "no right is absolute when it endangers rights of equal or greater validity." (Ibid., p. 20.)

There is nothing self-contradictory in asserting that, in any society, human beings have a moral right to revolution. What is self-contradictory is the belief that one has a legal right to revolt.

As stated in Herndon v. Georgia, 295 U. S. 441 (1935), merely critizing one's government does not automatically constitute incitement to revolution. Such action is protected by the First Amendment. How far one may go in such criticism is the real problem. Congress, through legislation, sets the bounds. It has enacted laws against sabotage and subversion, and has provided severe penalties for violators of these statutes. However, prison sentences have not been a sufficient deterrent. Furthermore, sentences are usually imposed after a disastrous event has occurred.

A policy of "preventive" action, comparable by way of analogy to preventive medicine, has been developed. It is known, for example, that a few strategically placed communists in government can do incalculable harm. Witness the taking of the atom bomb secrets by Klaus Fuch, Harry Gold, etc., from the government proving grounds in New Mexico. To combat this type of danger a program has been undertaken, the purpose of which is to eliminate questionable persons from sensitive spots in government. As part of this program, Congress, in enacting the Smith Act, has outlawed not only all overt acts to overthrow the government through force and violence, but also has made punishable a conspiracy to teach any doctrine advocating such violence. In other words, mere talking about it can, under certain circumstances, be unlawful.

It may well be that, in an effort to further tighten the defense security of our nation, Congress will outlaw actions and words which years ago would have been considered proper and lawful criticism of the government. So that, while a person has a moral right, protected by the First Amendment, to criticise his government, the right is not only not absolute, but all criticism, words as well as acts, must be done within the bounds set by Congress, which today because of developments in world political conditions, seem to be narrowing.

CHAPTER 10

EXPRESS AND IMPLIED LIMITATIONS CONTAINED IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL INSTRUMENT

A question vigorously debated about the time of World War I concerned the limits—both expressed and implied—imposed by the Constitution itself upon the subject matter of proposed amendments.[1] It will be observed that, by article V, certain amendments to the Constitution were expressly prohibited, namely, (1) those relating to the slave trade, and (2) those which would deprive a State, without its consent, of equal suffrage in the Senate. Article V provides:

> * * * that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Article V thus contains two express restrictions upon things which might be accomplished by amendment. One of these restrictions expired in 1808, and the other is still in force.

In addition to the express restrictions, it has been argued by reputable writers[2] that there are further limitations implied by the very nature of the instrument itself which are intended to preserve and perpetuate our union and its republican form of political government. These implied limitations are to be found in the instrument when read as a whole and in particular in the 9th and 10th amendments which reserve to the sovereign States those powers which were not expressly delegated to the Federal Government. Police powers and the right of local self-government are cited as examples of powers forever reserved to the States.

It had been argued that the 15th amendment was unconstitutional because it attempted, against the will of the States which did not ratify it, to invade the field of local self-government and fix the composition of the several electorates.[3] Similarly it had been urged that the adoption of the 18th amendment was an unconstitutional exercise of the amending power since it sought to bring within Federal control a matter, which, under the Constitution as originally adopted, was intended never to be withdrawn from State control. The amendment, it was contended, constituted an addition to the Constitution rather than a revision of a subject already incorporated in that instrument, and such a graft upon the Constitution destroyed its essential character as it was originally agreed to.[4] The 19th amendment, on woman suffrage, was objected to upon the grounds that it expanded the proportions of the electorate of the sovereign several States, destroying their autonomy.[5]

All of these problems, of course, have long since been decided by various decisions of the United States Supreme Court.[6] It has always upheld the validity of the present amendments to the Constitution. In fact, by the time Leser v. Garnett[7] was decided (1922), the Court dismissed the argument that the character or subject matter of amendments is intrinsically limited by the Constitution itself with only summary comment. It stated:

> The first contention is that the power of amendment conferred by the Federal Constitution and sought to be exercised does not extent to this amendment, because of its character. The argument is that so great an addition to the electorate, if made without the State's consent, destroys its autonomy as a political body. This amendment is in character and phraseology precisely similar to the 15th. For each the same method of adoption was pursued. One cannot be valid and the other invalid. That the 15th is valid, although rejected by 6 States including Maryland, has been recognized and acted on for half a century. See United States v. Reese (92 U. S. 214), Neal v. Delaware (103 U. S. 370), Guinn v. United States (238 U. S. 374), Myers v. Anderson (238 U. S. 368) (p. 136).

When the United States Constitution was promulgated it was necessary, in order to create an effective central Government, that some of the powers exercised by the State governments be transferred to the central government. From the very nature of things, the central government was better suited, in certain situations, to exercise powers for all the States which the States, acting individually, could not properly do for themselves. This end could not be accomplished except by the surrender, on the part of the States, of some of their powers. The whole scheme of Government became then a distribution of powers between the central government and the States—determinations were made as to what powers were to be delegated to the Federal Government and what powers were to be reserved to the States.

It is reasonable to assume that the framers of the Constitution divided the powers of government between the States and the Federal Government in a manner they then believed to be necessary. They recognized, however, that as time went on, experience might show that the Constitution could be improved by changing the distribution of powers as then made. If it had been intended that none of the powers then reserved should ever be taken from the States, language undoubtedly would have been used to express such an intent. However, just the opposite took place. At the time article V was under consideration at the Constitutional Convention, a provision was twice proposed that no State, without its consent, should "be affected in its internal police" and it was twice rejected by the Convention.[8] Judged by both the language rejected and the language finally employed in article V, the true intent would seem to have been that there could and would be changes in the distribution of powers and therefore that consideration could be given to matters or subjects not then enumerated in the Constitution.

This conclusion is in accord with actual practice. Amendments since the adoption of the Constitution have been on many subjects. Some have taken from the States power theretofore reserved to them, while others have curtailed the power of the Federal Government. Slavery, for example, was originally a matter solely of State concern subject to the police powers of the States. The intent to continue State control was, in fact, expressly provided for in article V preserving the safeguards of this control to the States until 1808 as against any amendment which could have been made. Even after 1808, slavery continued a matter of State concern. However, when the time came that the sentiment of the people demanded that slavery should no longer exist, the desired end was accomplished through the 13th amendment.

The 14th amendment invaded previously reserved rights by divesting the States of their power to legislate with respect to the individual rights of their citizens where before they had such power. The 15th amendment infringed on State power with relation to voting, and restrains the right of States to regulate suffrage not only as to national elections, but also to internal elections. The 19th amendment on women suffrage also invaded the political autonomy of the States by increasing the number of voters by roughly 100 percent.

The process of amendment has not been a one-way street, however. Amendments have also been adopted limiting the power of the Federal Government, the most notable examples being the first 10 amendments.

In summary it may be said that because of the very nature of things, almost any amendment that could be adopted would take either from the States or from the Federal Government some of the powers belonging to them respectively under the original Constitution. In addition, there is nothing to indicate an intention that amendments should be confined to one subject matter or another. The history of the amendments already adopted and even those which were not adopted but were considered, show that all manner of subjects have been entertained.

Going from implied limitations to express limitations, it will be recalled that article V contained 2 exceptions to the amending powers; 1 was temporary (on slavery and expired in 1808), and 1 permanent (equal suffrage in the Senate). The enumeration of these exceptions in our fundamental law clearly shows that our Founding Fathers intended that the subject matter of these provisions was not to be changed.

It is, of course, a well-recognized rule of construction that an earlier legislative body cannot bind a later legislative body and, therefore, the framers of the Constitution at the Convention of 1787 could not bind the hands of the States and Congress if they called a constitutional convention today. In the light of this rule, it would seem at first blush that the Founding Fathers either wrote into article V a provision that could not be binding, or, if binding, one that could never be changed—even by the people where ultimate power lies. The answer, however, can be found in the clause itself. It does not prohibit change in the representation of a State in the Senate absolutely. It only prohibits change where the State or States concerned have not consented. It reads:

"* * * and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate."

It will be recalled that amendments to the Constitution generally need only be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. In other words, amendments, when three-fourths of the States have approved them, become part of the Constitution and bind all of the States—even those which rejected ratification. However, in connection with the subject of equal State suffrage in the Senate, the provision quoted above goes further and requires not only ratification by three-fourths of the State legislatures, but also the consent of the States concerned. It is inconceivable that any State, especially the smaller States, would ever consent to the abolition of equal suffrage in the Senate of the United States. but even if such a circumstance did come about, the present restrictive clause would not bar such a change in the Constitution once consented to by the State or States concerned. Once consented to, the prohibition would no longer exist.

CITATIONS

[1] National Prohibition Cases, 253 U. S. 350 (1920), concerning the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.
[2] See Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States (2d ed.; 1929), I, 958.
[3] Machen, Is the Fifteenth Article Void? (1910), 23 Harvard Law Review 169; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 (1880).
[4] Marbury, The limitations Upon the Amending Power (Dec. 1919), 33 Harvard Law Review, p. 223.
[5] See also, for contention that state autonomy and reserved powers may not be altered, Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States (1897), II, 160; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 403 (1819); Collector v. Day, 11 Wall. 113, 124 (1870); Gordon v. United States, 117 U. S. 697, 705 (1884).
[6] Fifteenth Amendment, by Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 (1880); Eighteenth Amendment by National Prohibition Cases, 253 U. S. 350 (1920); Nineteenth Amendment by Leser v. Garnett, 258 U. S. 130 (1922).
[7] 258 U. S. 130 (1922).
[8] Elliott's Debates (2d ed.; 1937), I, 316–317; Madison's Papers 531–532 and 551–552.

PART IV

TIME LIMITATIONS WITH RESPECT TO STATE APPLICATIONS

CHAPTER 11

LAPSE OF TIME AFFECTING APPLICATIONS

When two-thirds of the States have applied for a convention, the applications, supposedly, attain binding force. Such action, ordinarily, would preclude discretionary power or decision on the part of Congress, since article V directs that body to convene a convention. As noted in preceding chapters, however, article V provides no legal sanction for its own enforcement, and there seems to be no judicial process for enforcing its provisions.

A convention, under article V, after the requisite number of States have made application, does not automatically come into being. It must be called by the Congress. Whether Congress can be made to act has already been discussed. Whether Congress should act and when, assuming it is willing, raises still further problems. Does an application, for example, once made, remain always alive and valid, or can it become legally ineffective because of a lapse of time that may have occurred after its adoption by the State legislature and during its pendency before the Congress? Does an application lapse into a state of invalidity because, possibly, some factor intervened to shorten its life? [1]

The amending article is silent on the subject of what force or effect the lapse of time will have on an application. The Supreme Court dealt with an analogous situation concerning the length of pendency of an amendment proposed by the Congress to the States for ratification in the case of Dillon v. Gloss [2] and thought that amendments ought not be left open for all time:

> We do not find anything in the article which suggests that an amendment once proposed is to be open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the States may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective. We do find that which strongly suggests the contrary.

In the Dillon case, Congress proposed to the States for ratification a resolution which resulted in the 18th amendment. In the resolution, Congress fixed a period of 7 years within which three-fourths of the States had to ratify or else the resolution would have been lost. In upholding this action on the part of Congress, the Court announced (1) that Congress could fix a reasonable time within which proposed amendments had to be ratified, and (2) that 7 years was without question a reasonable time. The Court also noted that the proposal of an amendment and its ratification were not unrelated events:

First, proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, it is only when there is deemed to be a necessity therefor that amendments are to be proposed, the reasonable implication being that when proposed they are to be considered and disposed of presently. Thirdly, as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the States, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do.[3]

In passing on this case the Court enunciated the so-called "contemporaneous" test and it would seem logical to apply this same interpretive technique in dealing with State applications for constitutional conventions. Certainly there is nothing in article V which suggests that an application of a State, once made, is to be valid for all time or that the application of one State may be separated from those of other States by many years and still be effective. On the contrary, the implications seem to go the other way. Using the same reasoning which the Court employed in Dillon v. Gloss, quoted above, and employing it by way of analogy, it would appear, first, that State applications and the calling of a convention are not unrelated acts but are succeeding steps in a single endeavor, not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, since it is only when legislatures deem amendments to be necessary that applications for a convention are made to the Congress, a reasonable inference is that such a convention is needed to "presently" dispose of the needs of the people. Thirdly, since an application is made in response to popular demand and is effective when made by the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, "there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of States to reflect the will of the people, in all sections at relatively the same period" which applications "scattered through a long series of years would not do." From this the conclusion may be drawn that an application should have force for a reasonable time only.[4]

CITATIONS

[1] The duty of answering or developing solutions for solving these problems finally devolves on Congress. The States, in anticipation, may influence the Congress and even control its decision to some degree by submitting applications in a form and manner which they believe desirable. See ch. 7, supra.

[3] 256 U. S. 368, 374 (1921).

[3] Ibid., pp. 374–375.

[4] See also Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, noting statement in Gloss v. Dillon that amendment process is a series of related events, succeeding steps in a single endeavor which should be reasonably related in time.

CHAPTER 12

POLITICAL QUESTIONS

It is well settled that the courts will not decide "political questions." [1] The principal reason is that the duty to determine such questions is to be found in the executive or legislative branches of our Government and not in the judicial. When a case is presented involving a political question the courts will look to the so-called political branches of Government, i. e., the executive and legislative, to learn what position those departments have taken in the matter. The courts then act in conformity with it. The result of such procedure is that the merits of the case are not decided as an independent question by the courts; rather the action of the political department concerned becomes a rule of decision which the courts accept as controlling.[2]

A reading of the cases indicates that the most important facet in the development of the doctrine, insofar as it is pertinent to this thesis, was the fact that the political departments, in the normal performance of their functions, had better means and facilities available to them to determine the question involved.[3] Most questions of policy are based upon the needs and exigencies of the times in which they arise. They involve an appraisal or evaluation of economic, social, and political issues which can hardly be reduced to exact terms for admission as evidence in a court of law and of which the courts cannot reasonably take judicial notice.[4]

As a result, the courts, in developing the "political question" doctrine, have given a finality of action to the decisions of our political departments. Many illustrations are to be found in the field of foreign relations. In Doe v. Braden, for example, the courts refused to inquire into the constitutional powers of the King of Spain with whom the United States had negotiated a treaty.[5] Objection was made that the King, at the time the purchase of the territory of Florida was being considered, could not annul certain grants of land he had made earlier to Spanish citizens within the territory. The court refused to consider the objection, stating that it was for the President and the Senate of the United States to determine whether the King's powers were sufficient in this instance. Whether our Government was right or wrong in interpreting the King's power under Spanish law was not controlling. The conduct of our foreign affairs requires that the State Department have a wide latitude in determining issues in the light of our political needs. To permit others to overrule questions of policy would greatly hamper the conduct of our foreign negotiations. Chief Justice Taney stated the Court's reasoning thusly: [6]

> * * * it would be impossible for the executive department of the Government to conduct our foreign relations with any advantage to the country, and fulfill the duties which the Constitution has imposed upon it, if every court in the country was authorized to inquire and decide whether the person who ratified the treaty on behalf of a foreign nation had the power by the constitution and laws, to make the engagements into which he entered.

Whether a treaty has been broken has also been held to be a matter which the courts will not determine. In Ware v. Hylton [7] the United States Supreme Court stated:

> These are considerations of policy, considerations of extreme magnitude, and certainly, entirely incompetent to the examination and decision of a court of justice.

One of the leading cases involving political questions is that of Taylor v. Morton [8] where it was pointed out that the courts had no suitable machinery to determine such questions:

> These powers have not been confined by the people to the judiciary, which has no suitable means to exercise them; but to the executive and legislative departments of our Government. They belong to diplomacy and legislation, not to the administration of existing laws.

This view has been expressed in other cases covering many different subjects such as the beginning and ending of wars as declared by Congress and the President,[9] control of aliens,[10] guaranties of a republican form of government under the United States Constitution,[11] recognition of foreign governments,[12] domestic violences.[13] These cases all treat political questions as ones which should be properly and finally determined by the legislature or the executive.

There is no precise rule which can be cited to describe what is meant by the term "political question." As noted above it has been applied to a variety of issues. John P. Frank states that it is more amenable to description by an itemization of the subjects declared to be political by the courts than by a broad general definition.[14]

Charles Post says that the term "political questions" is a magical formula which has the practical result of relieving the courts from the necessity of further considering a particular problem.[15] It is a device, according to Post, by which the courts transfer the responsibility for deciding questions to another branch of Government.

It is evident from a review of the cases that, upon declaring an issue to be political, the courts disclaim all jurisdiction or authority over the question and accept the decision of the political departments.[16] Some of the reasons for these declarations are apparent. For example, the Constitution places the duty on Congress to detremine the qualifications of its own Members. The courts would not pass upon any issue under this provision because someone else, namely, the Congress, has the clear and unequivocal responsibility to make the particular decision.[17]

John Frank points out that, in some instances, courts declare issues political because they are reluctant to hand down orders which, due to the lack of proper tools, they are unable to enforce.[18] He notes that the judiciary, in many respects, is the weakest division of government, dependent for its effectiveness upon the acquiescence of other branches of government.

Two other categories of political questions—ones directly in point in this dissertation—concern (1) problems which are soluble only by legislative action, and (2) problems where the action involved requires information which a court cannot obtain. For example, in Coleman v. Miller,[19] the Supreme Court was asked to decide how long was a reasonable time for the pendency of a constitutional amendment before the States. In determining that the question was a political one and for the Congress to decide, the Court noted that the issue involved a variety of political, social, and economic conditions evidence on which could not be appropriately received in a court. Chief Justice Hughes stated: [20]

> * * * the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as in this case it does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of revelant conditions, political, social, and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice. * * *

Similarly, in Colegrove v. Green [21] the Court would not interfere with the reapportionment of congressional districts within a State upon the ground that the legislature was better equipped to acquire information and set up a sound districting system. So also in Chicago and Southern Airlines v. Waterman Steamship Co.,[22] the Supreme Court declined to review a decision of the Civil Aeronautics Board relating to international air transportation, because the evidence needed to make a proper determination in the case depended upon information on foreign relations unavailable to the Court.

It is probably easier to look to the effects or results which these decisions have on issues rather than try to reconcile the reasons underlying the decisions. The fact is, however, that the Supreme Court has expanded, over the years, the number of subjects which are classified "political questions." Many of today's political questions might well have been justiciable had the Court so wished to decide them. In general, it may be said the Supreme Court has found it more practical and expedient to leave the decision of certain questions to governmental bodies more appropriately adapted to decide them. And so far as the amending clause, article V, is concerned, at least four members of the Supreme Court have stated that Congress has undivided control over the process:

> Undivided control of that process has been given by the article exclusively and completely to Congress. The process itself is "political" in its entirety, from submission until an amendment becomes part of the Constitution, and is not subject to judicial guidance, control, or interference at any point.[23]

Argument may be made that where an appropriate agency of government has failed or refused to act, the courts will be unable to determine a particular issue because they will have no express view of the agency to entertain. What such an argument fails to take into account is that inaction or no action can be regarded as a positive position taken by the agency concerned.[24] All the courts need do is determine that the question is one which should be properly decided by a particular agency and leave it with the agency to decide it. Post has aptly outlined the proposition: When the Court declares a question "political" it accepts the decision of the political departments whether the decision be expressed or not expressed. He stated:

> * * * when a court declares a question to be a political question, it disclaims all jurisdiction and authority over the question and accepts the decision of the political departments, whether this decision be expressed by act of Congress, official statement or declaration, or treaty, though such decision may well be found in the absence of such expressions.[25]

The fact that the matter is left in midair, so to speak, would not seem to foreclose the courts from declaring an issue political.[26] In fact the Supreme Court, in Coleman v. Miller, has indicated that such is the case, in stating that failure on the part of Congress to set up a reasonable time limitation on ratification of amendments did not cast upon the courts the [illegible] of deciding what constitutes "reasonable time"

CITATIONS

[1] Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States (1929), III, 1326.
[2] Field, The Doctrine of Political Questions in the Federal Courts (1924), 8 Minnesota Law Review 485.
[3] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 454 (1939).
[4] Ibid., 453-454 (1939).
[5] 16 How. 635 (U. S. 1853).
[6] 16 How. 635, 657 (U. S. 1853).
[7] 3 Dall. 199, 200 (U. S. 1796).
[8] 2 Curt. 454, 461 (C. C. Mass. 1885) aff'd. 2 Black 481 (U. S. 1862).
[9] The Protector, 12 Wall. 700 (U. S. 1871); Hamilton v. Dillon, 21 Wall. 73 (U. S. 1874); United States v. 129 Packages, Fed. Case No. 15941 (1862).
[10] Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U. S. 581 (1889).
[11] Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 42 (U. S. 1849). In this case, the United States Supreme Court observed that "when the Senators and Representatives of a state are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal." See also Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118 (1912).
[12] Rose v. Himley, 4 Cranch 241 (U. S. 1808); United States v. Klintock, 5 Wheat. 144 (U. S. 1820).
[13] Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1 (U. S. 1849).
[14] Frank, John P., "Political Questions" set out in Supreme Court and Supreme Law, edited by Edmond N. Cahn, Indiana Univ. Press, Bloomington (1954).
[15] Post, Charles G., Jr., The Supreme Court and Political Questions (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1936).
[16] Post, p. 124.
[17] U. S. Constitution, Art I, sec. 5.
[18] Frank, p. 39.
[19] 307 U. S. 433 (1939).
[20] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 453-454 (1939).
[21] 328 U. S. 549 (1946).
[22] 333 U. S. 103 (1948).
[23] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S., 433, 459 (1939).
[24] A notable example is when Congress failed to reapportion Congressional districts after the 1920 census. It was clear, because of attendant publicity, that Congress, by its inaction, intended to do nothing about reapportionment.
[25] Post, p. 124.
[26] See also Frank, citing Post, p. 37.
[27] 307 U. S. 433, 452-453 (1939).

CHAPTER 13

"REASONABLE TIME" AFFECTING APPLICATIONS

The conclusion reached in chapter 11 that an application remains in force for a reasonable time raises the further question of what constitutes a "reasonable time." Orfield suggests that the maximum life of an application should not continue for more than a generation. Quite possibly a reasonable time may be measured by changes or improvements of the social or economic conditions out of which an amendatory move arises. The purpose underlying each application no doubt should also be taken into consideration.[1]

The cases of Coleman v. Miller [2] and Wise v. Chandler [3] before the State courts of Kansas and Kentucky presented for judicial determination, among other things, the question of what is a reasonable time under article V. Both cases involved the question of the validity of a State's purported ratification of the proposed child-labor amendment more than 12 years after it was proposed by Congress.[4] The United States Supreme Court, in Dillon v. Glass,[5] had earlier held that Congress, in proposing an amendment, could fix a reasonable time for ratification and that the 7 years which it had prescribed for the adoption of the 18th amendment was, without question, a reasonable time.[6] The Kansas and Kentucky cases offered an opportunity for a further judicial decision on whether a reasonable time had been exceeded in those instances.[7]

The State courts reached opposite results, the Kansas court holding that despite the lapse of 12 years the proposed amendment still reflected the "felt needs of the day" and was, therefore, still open to ratification;[8] the Kentucky court, on the other hand, holding that a reasonable period during which the State might have acted had expired, and that a resubmission of the proposed amendment by Congress was necessary if further action was to be taken on it.[9]

However, the Supreme Court, in Coleman v. Miller,[10] decided the question by concluding that it was essentially political and not subject to judicial determination. In so deciding, the Court reasoned that, inasmuch as the Constitution set forth no satisfactory criteria for judicial determination of the question, and since a decision would involve an appraisal of a great variety of political, social, and economic conditions, the question was more appropriately one for congressional than for judicial determination.

The Court distinguished Dillon v. Gloss [11] on the ground that Congress had set a definite time within which the proposed amendment had to be ratified. It did not follow, as the Court pointed out, that when Congress has not set a time limitation, the courts had to take on the responsibility of deciding what constitutes a reasonable time.[12]

When a proposed amendment is based upon the needs, economic or otherwise, of the Nation, it is necessary to consider, in determining what is a reasonable time, the conditions then prevailing throughout the country, and whether they had so far changed since the submission of the proposed amendment as to make the proposal no longer responsive to the conception which inspired it. As the Supreme Court stated (p. 453):

> In short, the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as in this case it does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social, and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by the Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the National Legislature of the political, social, and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment.

It must certainly be conceded that what is a reasonable time in one situation will not necessarily be reasonable in another. To illustrate: A comparatively short time could probably be held reasonable in the case of an amendment necessitated by the exigencies of a national emergency such as a war or an economic crisis, whereas a much longer period would conceivably be reasonable in the case of an amendment changing the term of office of the President. The suggested test laid down by Jameson [13] which seems to be a workable one is that a proposed amendment—> has relation to the sentiment and felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while the sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist it ought to be regarded as waived * * *.

Such a test certainly sets up no rigid rule which will result in a similar time limitation being applied to every case. It only prescribes that an independent judgment should be used in each particular case in deciding whether sufficient time has elapsed to render the passage of an amendment unnecessary from a practical standpoint and unsupported by general public sentiment.

CITATIONS

[1] Orfield, Lester B., The amending of the Federal Constitution (Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1942), p. 42.
[2] 146 Kan. 390 (1937), aff'd, 307 U. S. 433 (1939).
[3] 270 Ky. 1 (1937), aff'd. 271 Ky. 252 (1937), dis'd 307 U. S. 474 (1939).
[4] 43 Stat. 670 (1924).
[5] 256 U. S. 368 (1921).
[6] Ibid., 376. Congress adopted the seven year limitation provision because, at that time, several proposals which had long lain dormant were nevertheless subject to being resurrected and acted upon by several states. Between the adoption of the Constitution and 1920, twenty-one amendments had been proposed by Congress and seventeen had been ratified by the requisite three-fourths of the states—some within a single year after their proposal and all within four years (256 U. S. 372). Each of the remaining four, however, while ratified by some of the states, was not ratified by a sufficient number. Two, in fact, were missing only one state for the required ratification (U. S. Congress, House, 54th Cong., 2d sess., 1897, H. Doc. 353, pp. 300, 322). Ohio tried to ratify a long-dormant amendment, in order to defeat the slavery issue. In the light of these circumstances, Congress, in proposing the Eighteenth Amendment, fixed seven years for the period of ratification (U. S. Congress, Congressional Record, 65th Cong., 1st sess., 1918, ibid., 2d sess., 1919, pp. 423-478).
[7] As of 1940, the average time for ratification of the first twenty-one amendments has been computed to be 1 year, 6 months, 21 days; 3 years, 6 months, 25 days has been the longest time used in ratifying (Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 453 (1939)).
[8] 146 Kan. 390 (1937).
[9] 270 Ky. 1 (1937) aff'd. 271 Ky. 252 (1937), dis'd 307 U. S. 474 (1939).
[10] 307 U. S. 433 (1939); on the same day the court dismissed Chandler v. Wise, 307 U. S. 474 (1939) on the ground that the Governor's action had rendered the question moot.
[11] 256 U. S. 368 (1921).
[12] The view might be taken that as a result of the Coleman case, the issue of "reasonable time" is no longer pertinent, or necessary, that Congress, with sole authority over the amending process, can recognize state action regardless of whether the states acted within a reasonable time. As a practical matter, with legal question put aside, it would seem that Congress should use, as good procedure, the reasonable time method in considering questions relating to the [illegible]
[13] Jameson, Constitutional Conventions (4th ed., 1887), p. 630.

CHAPTER 14

WITHDRAWAL OF STATE APPLICATIONS

May a State, once having made application for the call of a constitutional convention, withdraw or rescind its application? Some writers [1] on the subject believe that the legislatures may do so; at least one does not.[2]

The Supreme Court in Coleman v. Miller,[3] on the question of whether a State could withdraw or rescind its prior rejection of a proposed amendment to the Constitution, stated that the matter concerned a political question over which Congress had the ultimate power of decision. Congress, with respect to the 14th amendment, did not permit the States of Ohio and New Jersey to rescind their ratifications of that amendment. It has taken no position with respect to the withdrawal of State applications.

If precedent of the ratification process is followed, then it would seem that legislatures could not withdraw their applications.[3a] However, the wisdom of applying such similar reasoning may well be questioned.[3a] The rescinding resolutions of Iowa [4] in 1945 and of North Carolina [5] in 1951 both point out that their applications were being withdrawn because of the change in world conditions following World War II. It would not seem politically wise for the Congress to refuse to permit withdrawal of a State application where there was good reason to believe that a proposed amendment would be undesirable and would run counter to the public interest.

The requirement, discussed in other chapters, that applications be "contemporaneous" and related, generally, in subject matter would have reduced meaning if States were not permitted to rescind their applications. Such a requirement would not, in truth and in fact be met, since the general sentiment for a convention could not be said to exist in the necessary two-thirds of the States when one or more of those States are attempting to withdraw their applications.

The present attitude among legislators seems to be that withdrawal is a permissible procedure since 12 States in the last 12 years alone have adopted resolutions rescinding their applications.[6] The application process is, of course, distinguishable from the ratifying of proposed amendments. In the one instance, in a State application only an initiating action is sought with no one finally committed to the substantive proposition contained in the application, not even the State which submits it. In the other instance, Congress has completed its work and is committed to the position outlined in the proposed amendment. Further, many States submit applications for the sole purpose of prodding Congress into taking action on a proposed amendment pending in the Congress, without ever having the slightest hope that Congress will call a convention. To hold them bound to their petitions would not be a politic or realistic approach. Since this question, like others, is a political one, Congress notwithstanding its earlier decision on the 14th amendment could very well permit the States, when it so finds it to be in the public interest, to withdraw their applications.

CITATIONS

[1] Cuvillier, Shall we Revise the Constitution (1927), 77, Forum, pp. 321, 325. Tuller, A Convention to Amend the Constitution—Why needed—How may it be obtained (1911), 193, North American Review, pp. 383–384.

[2] See Packard, F. E., Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions, 30 Chi-Kent Law Rev. 339 (1952).

[3] 307 U. S. 433, 448–449 (1939).

[3a] It should be pointed out that the 14th amendment was adopted during the reconstruction days after the Civil War. What was then the politically wise thing for Congress to do, would not necessarily be the best move today.

[4] U. S., Congress, Congressional Record, 1945, Vol. 91, p. 2383.

[5] U. S., Congress, Congressional Record, 1951, Vol. 98, p. 4641.

[6] Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Wisconsin; see Table 5, appendix.

59-609 O - 80 - 83

PART V

RATIFICATION

CHAPTER 15

REJECTION OR RATIFICATION

The question of whether a State, having once rejected, may later ratify a proposed amendment had, until Coleman v. Miller,[1] long been the subject of controversy. Several writers had taken the position that since article V in terms provides for only affirmative acts, only such acts can have any effect; rejection would be of no more consequence than complete inaction.[2] Thus it had been argued that ratification by a State which had previously rejected a proposed amendment is valid and is as complete and as binding as though there never had been any negative expression.[3] This analysis has found support in actual practice and is evidenced by the fact that several States have effectively assented to constitutional amendments after prior rejections. In the case of the 13th amendment, New Jersey first rejected the amendment in 1865, and then adopted it the following year. In respect to the 14th amendment, four States (Georgia, North Carolina, Virginia, and South Carolina) rejected it when first presented but subsequently ratified. The ratification was treated as valid in each case.[4]

So far as can be determined, in every instance where ratification was made prior to the issuance of the Federal proclamation that the amendment had been adopted, the States which first rejected and later ratified were included in the list of States designated by the Secretary of State as ratifying. It seems clear that on the basis of actual practice, a rejection may be subsequently ratified. In addition, the proposition is sound in principle. Certainly a legislature's action of rejection ought not act with the finality of an executioner's ax. Changing social conditions, or a better educated point of view, may make it more desirable for the States to reverse their vote. As Frank W. Grinnell, writing in the American Bar Association Journal, stated:[5]

> No one knows what amendments may be submitted in the future as the result of political excitement; and, if the entire national structure is to be submitted to the hasty political action of State legislatures without an opportunity for reconsideration the country may wake up and find itself in a most serious situation some day.

This important question was finally presented to the Supreme Court in the cases of Coleman v. Miller[6] and Wise v. Chandler.[7] The State courts had reached opposite conclusions. The Kansas court in Coleman v. Miller adopted the position that a legislature could validly ratify a proposed amendment even though there had been a prior rejection. The Kentucky court, on the other hand, reasoning by analogy to "offer and acceptance" in contract law, refused such a view and held that a rejection of the congressional offer to the proposed amendment, exhausted a State's power with respect to the particular amendment concerned. It also held, reasoning negatively, that a rejection by more than one-fourth of the States—(article V requires three-fourths approval)—renders an amendment null and void and thus no longer open to ratification.

However, the Supreme Court, when Coleman v. Miller [8] came before it on appeal ruled that the issue was essentially a political one which Congress should properly decide. The Court cited as reasons for its decision (1) the historical precedent in which the Congress declared abortive the attempts made by Ohio and New Jersey to withdraw their ratifications of the proposed 14th amendment,[9] and (2) the fact that there was a complete absence of any "basis in either Constitution or statute" for judicial interference.[10]

A question not raised in the Coleman case, supra, and still left without judicial determination is the converse one of what effect would a legislature's prior ratification have on its subsequent attempt to withdraw ratification? Putting the political question aside for the moment, it would seem to follow logically, that if a State can withdraw a prior rejection, it would be empowered to withdraw a ratification, at least until such time as the requisite number of States (three-fourths of the States) have ratified. However, there are those who say that such a withdrawal would be ineffective.[11] Many of these authorities, in support of their views, draw an analogy between the law of contracts and article V stating that an offer of a proposed amendment, once accepted, is irrevocable. They also point out that prior ratification, being a positive act, could not be withdrawn without considerable inconvenience and confusion. No State, for example, could know what the exact status of a proposed amendment is if another State is permitted to withdraw its approval. It would be difficult to know when three-fourths of the States had ratified.[12] Such a contention would seem to have little merit today. It would be a simple problem in this day and age to determine at any given time whether three-fourths of the States have ratified.

Congress has already been confronted with this question. The legislatures of Ohio and New Jersey first ratified the 14th amendment and then passed resolutions withdrawing their consent. In seeking to determine whether a sufficient number of States had ratified the amendment, Congress adopted a resolution requesting the Secretary of State to submit a list of the States whose "legislatures have ratified the 14th article of amendment." [13] Secretary Seward's report called attention to the action of Ohio and New Jersey [14] and stated that if their ratifications, notwithstanding their attempted withdrawals, were still in full force and effect, the amendment had become part of the Constitution.[15] Congress thereafter adopted a concurrent resolution which, after reciting that three-fourths of the States had ratified, including Ohio and New Jersey, declared the 14th amendment to be a part of the Constitution.[16]

The Supreme Court, in the Coleman case, noted, with approval, the above action by the Congress and the fact that Congress took it upon itself [17] to decide the questions. While the specific question of ratification followed by attempted withdrawal was not presented for decision, the reasoning of the Court clearly indicates that if the problem ever arises, it too will be classified as political. The Court no doubt would refuse to disturb historical precedent, but could accept as final the political interpretations of Congress. The Court stated: [18]

> We think that in accordance with this historic precedent the question of the efficacy of ratifications by State legislatures, in the light of previous rejections or attempted withdrawal, should be regarded as a political question pertaining to the political departments, with the ultimate authority in the Congress in the exercise of its control over the promulgation of the adoption of the amendment.

In the light of the Coleman case, it would seem that state court decisions and the views of law commentators on the subject have been rendered academic. Having been declared a political question, Congress, in its discretion, may permit the states to withdraw their ratifications or not, depending upon the political expediencies of the moment. As a guiding rule, Congress may well permit withdrawal of ratifications at any time prior to when three fourths of the states have applications simultaneously pending before the Congress. In this way, Congress will know what the general sentiment among the legislatures is at all times, something that a prohibition on rescinding action would not do.

CITATIONS

[1] 307 U. S. 433 (1939).
[2] Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States (2d ed.; 1929) I, 593; Jameson, Constitutional Conventions (4th ed.; 1887), 628; Orfield, Procedure of the Federal Amending Powers (1930) 25 Illinois Law Review 418.
[3] See Wise v. Chandler, 270 Ky. 1, 12 (1937), affd. 271 Ky. 252, 111 S. W. 2d 633 (1937), disd. 307 U. S. 474 (1939).
[4] 14 Statutes at Large 428 (1867); 15 Statutes at Large 706, 708 (1868); Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 448 (1939).
[5] Grinnell, Finality of State's Ratification of a Constitutional Amendment (1925) 11 American Bar Association Journal 192, 193.
[6] 146 Kan. 390, 71 P. (2d) 518 (1937), affd. 307 U. S. 433 (1939).
[7] 270 Ky. 1, 108 S. W. (2d) 1024 (1937), affd. 271 Ky. 252, 111 S. W. 2d 633 (1937), disd. 307 U. S. 474 (1939).
[8] 307 U. S. 433 (1939).
[9] Ohio, Laws of 1867, p. 330 (ratification); Ohio, Laws of 1868, p. 280 (withdrawal); New Jersey, Acts of 1868 (withdrawal); Congressional action, 15 Stat. 708 (1868).
[10] 307 U. S. 433, 450 (1939).
[11] Jameson, Constitutional Conventions, 628–633, 576–584; Watson on the Constitution, p. 1818; Ames, Proposed Amendments to the Constitution, U. S., Congress, House, 54th Cong., House Doc. 353, 299; Willis, Constitutional Law (1936), 120; Willoughby, Constitutional Law of the United States (2d ed.: 1929), I, 593–594, sec. 329a; Orfield, The Procedure of the Federal Amending Power (1930), 25 Illinois Law Review 418, 429.
[12] See Dodd, Amending the Federal Constitution, 30 Yale Law Journal 321, 346 (1921).
[13] U. S., Congress, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., 1869, Cong. Globe, p. 3857.
[14] U. S., Congress, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., 1869, Cong. Globe, p. 4070.
[15] 15 Stat. 706, 707.
[16] 15 Stat. 709, 710.
[17] 307 U. S. 433, 450 (1939).
[18] Ibid., p. 448.

CHAPTER 16

STATE RATIFYING CONVENTIONS

Problems similar to those involved in a Federal constitutional convention may be found in the makeup of State ratifying conventions called by the Congress pursuant to article V for the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments to the Constitution. Has Congress, for example, the power to prescribe the time, place, and manner of meetings, of State ratifying conventions? May it control the proceedings? In what manner and to what extent may States participate in ratifying conventions? To what extent does article V govern these proceedings?

The congressional proceedings leading to the proposal of the 21st amendment clearly show that there was considerable doubt on the question of congressional control over State ratifying conventions. Two prominent people, Representative James M. Beck and former Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, presented legal briefs expressing different opinions. Representative Beck submitted that Congress was limited to directing that ratification be by either State convention or State legislative action. He believed that the details of forming a convention had to be left to the individual State legislatures.[1]

Mr. Beck's position finds support—at least in result—in Herman V. Ames' study on the amending power under the Constitution.[2] Ames noted historic precedent for such action was to be found in the ratification action of the Constitution by the original 13 States. He pointed out that neither Madison nor any other delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 thought of the details of State ratifying conventions, which indicated to him that the matter ought to be left to the States.

Attorney General Palmer, contrary to the position taken by Representative Beck, argued that, since amending the Constitution was purely a Federal question, Congress had the mandate of setting up procedures and specifying the details of the convention.[3] He stated that Congress in calling conventions would—> * * * prescribe all the essentials necessary for the nomination and election of delegates thereto, and the time, place of meeting, and conduct of the convention (p. 134).

Attorney General Palmer, like Mr. Beck, could also turn to the legal textbooks for support of his own position. In Political Science and Comparative Constitutional Law,[4] John W. Burgess states that since the Constitution itself did not elaborate the details as to the form of the convention, "it therefore impliedly leaves that to Congress" to develop under the "necessary and proper clause of the Constitution."

Congress, at the time, however, never took a determinative position on the 21st amendment and stated only that ratification was to be by "convention in the several States."[5] No doubt Congress decided that it was the wiser approach to follow the precedent set at the time the Constitution itself was originally adopted and simply place the matter in the hands of the States. This approach not only offered an easy way out of the difficult legal problems involved, but it also permitted Congress to escape the complicated and burdensome task, in the event it decided it had such power, of setting up an elaborate procedure for establishing and controlling the conventions.

When Congress refused to decide these questions and handed the matter, carte blanche, to the States, the responsibility for determining the proper method of calling State conventions, their powers and duties, pursuant to the congressional resolution proposing the 21st amendment, was left to the courts. Several State decisions lend aid in clarifying the situation and indicate the status of State ratifying conventions. In an advisory opinion,[6] the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine decided that the State legislature had the power to call the convention and promulgate rules of procedure, but that such provisions had to be reasonable. It pointed out that a convention was to be distinguished from a legislature only in that a State convention was called for a specific purpose, while the legislature is called for general lawmaking purposes. It also stated that a convention, once organized, has the sole power to act on questions of fraud and irregularity in the election of its delegates.[7]

A question also arose in Ohio on whether State legislative action, in setting up machinery for convening a convention, is subject to a referendum to the people. The Supreme Court of Ohio, in State ex rel. Donnelly v. Myers,[8] held it was not, basing its decision on the holding of the United States Supreme Court in Hawke v. Smith.[9] Hawke v. Smith concerned an earlier Ohio case where an action was brought to restrain the Ohio secretary of state from preparing ballots for submission to the people of a referendum which, pursuant to the Ohio constitution, provided for referendum on the action of its legislature whenever it ratified an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The United States Supreme Court held that the referendum provision of the Ohio constitution was in direct conflict with article V which does not permit the people, directly, to vote on the ratification or rejectment of any amendment. In so holding, the United States Supreme Court went on to rule that ratification of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the accepted sense of that word.[10]

The Ohio Supreme Court applied the reasoning of the Hawke case, to the question of State conventions and held that State action in setting up a convention is similar to State action by its legislature in ratifying an amendment and that the legal machinery in assembling a convention could not therefore be subject to referendum.

It might be well to point out that in the Hawke case the referendum was sought after the State legislature had ratified the constitutional amendment, whereas in the Donnelly case the question was whether the State legislature's action in setting up a convention was subject to referendum. While the Donnelly case decided that no such referendum could be had, the dissenting opinion stated that the setting up of a convention through State legislative enactments could only be viewed as a State function. The opinion argued that it is as much a matter of State legislation and State cognizance as are the laws providing for the election of the members of the legislature. While such reasoning may have logic on its side, it nevertheless appears that the more generally accepted view in the cases follows the majority opinion that amending the Federal Constitution is a Federal function.[11]

Since a State may not require a referendum, it follows that it would have no right to impose, as a condition for ratification, a provision which is now found in the constitution of the State of Missouri that "the legislature is not authorized to adopt nor will the people of this State ever assent to any amendment or change of the Constitution of the United States which may in any wise impair the right of local self-government belonging to the people of the State."[12] So also, a State constitution would have no authority to impose limitations, as are now found in the constitutions of Florida and Tennessee, that no convention or legislature of the State shall act upon any amendment to the Constitution of the United States unless such convention or legislature shall have been elected after the amendment is submitted.[13]

It appears then that the people have no direct power in, and the State legislature may not seek a referendum in, the ratification of a proposed amendment either by a State legislature's action or by convention. The States, in line with historic precedent, may establish reasonable rules for calling and organizing State ratifying conventions, but the conventions once convened may promulgate, following the conclusions reached in chapter 5, rules to govern their own proceedings. Since ratifying conventions have only one duty to perform, that is, approving or disapproving a proposed amendment, the scope of their deliberations is limited to the particular subject matter presented to them for consideration and they may consider nothing else.

Finally, State conventions in ratifying proposed amendments are performing a Federal as distinguished from a State function. State constitutional and statutory provisions, insofar as they may conflict with a congressional resolution proposing the amendment, would, seemingly, be ineffective and of no moment.

CITATIONS

[1] U. S., Congress, House, 72d Cong., 2d Sess., 1933, 76 Congressional Record, pp. 2419-2420.
[2] Ames, Recent Developments of the Amending Power as Applied to the Federal Constitution, American Philosophical Society Proceedings (1933), 72, p. 93.
[3] U. S., Congress, House, 72d Cong., 2d Sess., 1932, 76 Congressional Record, p. 134.
[4] Gin & Co., Boston: (1891), I, 143-144.
[5] U. S., Constitution, Art. XXI.
[6] In re Opinion of the Justices, 132 Me. 491, 167 Atl. 176 (1933).
[7] Ibid., p. 497.
[8] State ex rel. Donnelly v. Myers, 127 Ohio 104, 186 N. E. 918 (1933).
[9] Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U. S. 221 (1920).
[10] Ibid., p. 229.
[11] Leser v. Garnett, 258 U. S. 130 (1922). The Donnelly case was also followed by the Missouri Court in State ex rel. Tate v. Sevier, 63 So. 2d 895 (1933), on the question of referendum.
[12] Missouri, Constitution (1875), Art. 2, Sec. 3.
[13] Florida, Constitution (1885), Art. 16, sec. 19, Tennessee, Constitution (1870), Art 2, sec. 32.

PART VI

ORGANIC LAWS OF FOREIGN NATIONS

CHAPTER 17

ORGANIC LAWS AND AMENDING PROVISIONS

Although the United States ranks as a relatively young nation among the family of nations, its Constitution is the oldest of all written national constitutions now in force.[1] Because of its success many nations have adopted written constitutions with provisions either identical or substantially similar to our own.

Of the total of 83 sovereign nations, 75, or approximately 90 percent, have written constitutions.[2]. In five instances, written constitutions are in the process of being promulgated.[3]

Because of the material presented in this chapter, it would be helpful, in order to properly evaluate the data, to distinguish between those nations which have federal types of governments (a central government with sovereign political subdivisions), and those having a unitary system of government (a central government with nonsovereign political subdivisions).

About 16 nations, including the United States, may be classified as having governments of the federal or confederation type. They are:

Argentina (Constitution of the Argentine Republic, art. 1).

Australia (Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia, arts. 1, 62–64, 71, 79).

Brazil (Constitution of the United States of Brazil, art. 1).

Canada (British North American Act, 1867, preamble).

Mexico (Political Constitution of the United States of Mexico, art. 40).

Netherlands (Constitution of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, art. 208).

Switzerland (Federal Constitution of the Swiss Confederation, art. 1).

U. S. S. R. (Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, art. 13).

Venezuela (Constitution of Venezuela, art. 2).

Yugoslavia (Constitution of the Federal Peoples Republic of Yugoslavia, art. 1).

India (Constitution of India (1948), Part 1).

Germany (Western Zone [art. 20] Bonn Constitution [1949]).

Pakistan (Constitution of Pakistan, Resolution, Constituent Assembly, March 7, 1949, preamble).

United States (Constitution of the United States, art. IV).

Burma (Constitution of Burma, art. 2).

Union of South Africa (Constitution of Union of South Africa, art. 4).

Most of the nations with the so-called unitory form of government bear considerable resemblance to those with federal governments, except that their political subdivisions are not free to exercise many of the prerogatives of a sovereign state.

Of the nations, both federal and unitory, which have written constitutions, 61 contain express provisions providing for the amendment and revision of their organic instruments. As will be further noted in the following pages, 5 of the nations authorize constitutional conventions, 44 nations adopt amendments through the action of their legislative assemblies (although in many instances the assemblies do not maintain absolute control over the amendment process), and 11 nations amend their organic laws by way of referendum.

The five states which recognize the convention method of amendment are Argentina, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, and the Philippines:

Argentine Constitution—adopted March 16, 1949—

ART. 21. The Constitution may be amended entirely or in any of its parts. The necessity for a reform must be declared by Congress with the vote of two-thirds of its members present, but it shall not be effected except by a convention called for the purpose.

Constitution of the Dominican Republic—adopted January 10, 1949—

TITLE XVI

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS

ART. 108. The Constitution cannot be changed except when two-thirds of the members of each chamber so agree.

ART. 109. The necessity for the reform being declared, Congress, by a law which cannot be the subject of objections by the executive power, shall order the meeting of a revisory assembly to pass upon the reform. The articles whose reform is proposed shall be inserted in the law of convocation.

ART. 110. The election of members of the revisory assembly shall be made by direct vote of the people of the provinces, in the same proportion as for the election of deputies.

No province shall have less than two representatives.

The same qualifications are necessary in order to be elected a member of the revisory assembly as for being a deputy.

Members of the Assembly shall enjoy the same immunities as the members of the two chambers.

ART. 111. The Constitution may not be so amended as to change the form of government, which must always be civil, republican, democratic, and representative.

ART. 112. Reform of the Constitution shall be made only in the manner indicated therein and it shall never be suspended or annulled by any power or authority nor by popular acclamation.

Constitution of El Salvador—adopted August 13, 1886—

TITLE XVI

REFORM OF THE CONSTITUTION AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAWS

ART. 171. The reform of the present Constitution shall be undertaken only upon a resolution passed by two-thirds of the votes of the representatives elected to the Assembly, and this resolution shall express the article or articles which shall be amended. The resolution shall be published in the official newspapers, and shall be considered again in the session of the Assembly of the following year. If ratified by the Assembly, a constitutional convention, consisting of three delegates for each department, shall be called to meet, in order to decide about the suggested reform. But it is hereby declared that in no case shall Articles 80, 81 and 82 prohibiting the reelection of the President, Vice President, and designates and concerning the duration of the presidential term be amended.

ART. 172. The laws relating to the public press, the state of siege, the writ of amparo and the general elections shall rank as constitutional statutes.

They may be amended either by the constitutional convention, or by the ordinary assembly by a two-thirds vote; but in the latter case, the reform shall have no binding force until it has been ratified by the legislative body in the ordinary session of the following year by the same number of votes.

ART. 173. Any other method of amending the Constitution or constitutional laws different from those provided for in the preceding articles shall be illegal and void.

Constitution of Guatemala—adopted March 11, 1945—

TITLE XI

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

ART. 206. Complete or partial amendment of the Constitution may be decreed only by a vote of at least two-thirds of the total number of deputies making up Congress; the vote will also indicate the article or articles to be amended.

* * * * * * *

Amendments to the Constitution may consist of modifications, suppressions, additions, substitutions or extension of Articles. * * *

ART. 207. Once the amendment is decreed, Congress will convoke elections for a Constituent Assembly which should be installed within the sixty days following the date of convocation. * * *

ART. 208. The Constituent Assembly will be composed of one representative for each forty thousand inhabitants, or fraction over twenty thousand. * * *

ART. 209. The meeting of the Constituent Assembly does not hinder the functioning of Congress.

ART. 210. Once the amendment has been decreed by the Constituent Assembly, and if there are no other constitutional decrees or laws to issue, it will dissolve itself after the promulgation.

ART. 211. This Constitution shall not lose its force or vigor even though rebellion interrupts its observance.

Constitution of the Philippines—February 8, 1935, as amended—

ARTICLE XV

AMENDMENTS

SEC. 1. The Congress in joint session assembled, by a vote of three-fourths of all the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives voting separately, may propose amendments to this Constitution or call a convention for that purpose. Such amendments shall be valid as part of this Constitution when approved by a majority of the votes cast at an election at which the amendments are submitted to the people for their ratification.

The following 44 states provide for the revision of their organic laws by action of their legislatures:

Belgium (art. 131).

Bolivia (art. 174–177).

Brazil (art. 217).

Bulgaria (art. 99).

Burma (art. 207–210).

Byelorussian S. S. R. (art. 122).

Chile (art. 108–110)—generally by legislative action only. If President and legislature cannot agree, President may submit question to a plebiscite.

Colombia (art. 218).

Costa Rica (art. 139–140)—legislature may amend constitution but only a constitutional assembly can effect a general review of the constitution.

Czechoslovakia (sec. 172).
Ecuador (arts. 189–190).
Egypt (arts. 157–158).
Finland (Diet Act art. 67).
France (arts. 90–92)—if after a second reading proposal is not adopted, then it is submitted to a referendum.
Greece (art. 108).
Haiti (arts. 145–148).
Honduras (art. 200)—total reform and the election and term of office of President can only be effected through a constitutional assembly.
Iceland (art. 79)—amendments relating to the status of the church may only be submitted to a plebiscite.
Iraq (arts. 118–119).
Italy (arts. 138–139)—under some conditions a referendum is necessary.
Jordan (art. 47).
Korea (art. 98).
Lebanon (arts. 76–77).
Luxembourg (arts. 114–115).
Mongol People's Republic (art. 95).
Mexico (art. 135).
Venezuela (arts. 248–252).
Netherlands (arts. 202–206).
Nicaragua (arts. 285–287).
Norway (art. 112).
Panama (art. 256).
Peru (art. 236).
Poland (art. 30).
Portugal (arts. 134–135)—some amendments may be submitted to a plebiscite.
Rumania (arts. 103–104).
Sweden (arts. 81–82).
Syria (art. 108).
Thailand (secs. 173–176)—plebiscite is optional with King.
Turkey (art. 102).
Ukrainian S. S. R. (art. 127).
Union of South Africa (pt. 10).
U. S. S. R. (art. 146).
Yugoslavia (art. 72).
India (Part XVI).

Ten states provide for the amendment and revision of their organic acts by referendum. They are:
Australia (art. 128).
Denmark (art. 94).
Ireland (art. 46).
Japan (art. 96).
Liberia (art. V, sec. 17).
Liechtenstein (art. 66).
Paraguay (art. 94).
Spain (Referendum Act—Oct. 22, 1945).
Switzerland (art. 118–123).
Uruguay (art. 281).

Cuba (arts. 285–286) provides for constitutional revisions in three methods—

(a) by the Congress alone;
(b) by plebiscitary assembly;
(c) by referendum.

Nepal (arts. 66–68) permitted the King to promulgate rules to implement the basic organic law until April 1, 1955. After that date, a Commission recommends to the King suggested changes.

CITATIONS

[1] Peaslee, Constitution of Nations (1950), I, 3.
[2] Ibid., p. 1. What constitutes a "nation" is the subject of much controversy; what is to be used as a yardstick for precisely determining a "nation" is also an item of great dispute. The list of nations cannot be limited to those belonging to the United Nations, nor can the list be as all inclusive as the membership of the Universal Postal Union, which in some instances includes territories and colonies. The above figure is based on Peaslee's estimate (Peaslee, Constitution of Nations, I, 3).
[3] Ibid., p. 4.

CHAPTER 18

ORGANIC LAWS CONTAINING CONVENTION PROVISIONS

As noted in chapter 17, five nations provide in their basic charters for amendment and revision by means of constitutional conventions. They are the Republic of Argentina, the Dominican Republic, the Republics of El Salvador, Guatemala, and the Philippines. Only one of these nations—Argentina—has ever amended its present constitution via the convention method.

The Philippines, since it has become an independent nation, has never sought to convene a convention; so also the Dominican Republic.

El Salvador has never had a constitutional convention. Its convention clauses, however, contain many provisions which are of interest to this thesis. Its earlier constitution, in addition to setting forth the authorization for a convention, authorized the National Assembly to prosecute delegates to the convention who were guilty of crimes.[1] The Constitution of 1950 assigns this duty to the National Assembly.[2] The official gazettes available in the Library of Congress point out that under the earlier constitution, the National Assembly, in enabling acts, provided for the number of delegates to be elected to the convention, the manner of election, their qualifications, compensation, privileges, etc. If nothing else, the above information indicates the wide control which the National Assembly exercises over a constitutional convention. The gazettes also point out that the National Assembly could establish the rules and procedures under which the convention was to operate, and it could expressly declare which articles were to be considered by the convention for amendment.[3]

The Constitution of Guatemala (1945), while expressly providing the only method by which the constitution itself could be changed, was nevertheless abrogated on August 11, 1954, by a so-called political statute which placed the nation under a council that governed by decrees. A decree[4] of September 21, 1954, ordered the election of a constituent assembly, which among other things, was to prepare a new constitution.[5] A new constitution was promulgated and became effective March 1, 1956. It is believed that the provision in the 1945 constitution setting forth the procedural pattern for amending a constitution by a convention (which was disregarded in 1945) is also embodied in the new constitution.

The Republic of Argentina has had two constitutional conventions, one in 1866 and another in 1898.

In accordance with the constitution, the senate and chamber of deputies, after declaring on June 9, 1866, that it was necessary to amend article 4 and section I of article 67 of the Argentinian Constitution, convoked a national convention for that purpose. Thereafter through a further enabling act, they set up the time and place where the convention was to be held, and prescribed the number and qualifications of the delegates, their pay, etc. The statute reads: [6]

> The Convention shall consider the reform of Article 4, and section one of Article 67 of the Constitution as declared to be necessary by Congress; the Convention shall be composed of the same number of delegates and in the proportion that is fixed by Article 38 of the Constitution; the qualifications of the delegates of the Convention shall be the same as those required by members of Congress; the Convention shall take place in the city of Santa Fe, on September 1, 1866; the election of the delegates for the Convention shall take place on July 22, 1866; the delegates shall receive a compensation of one thousand pesos and the traveling expenses paid to members of Congress; the election of delegates to the Convention shall be held in accordance with the general election laws; the counting of the votes for the election of delegates shall take place fifteen days after their election; the executive power is authorized to spend the necessary money for the enforcement of this law.

The organization and functioning of the convention in both 1866 and 1898 adhered to the following pattern. Each convention consisted of three sessions—

(1) preparatory session at which a provisional president and two committees, the committee on powers and the committee on rules, were appointed;

(2) deliberative session where the substantive merits of the proposals were debated; and

(3) final session, called the closure session, at which the final drafts and reports were approved.[7]

Article 21 of the Argentine Constitution expressly provides that it may be amended entirely or in any of its parts. The issue was raised, at the time the congressional enabling acts were being passed, as to whether the convention itself could decide on either a piecemeal or general revision or whether such power was solely within the control of the Argentine Legislature. The result of the debate on this issue (and as the enabling acts themselves clearly indicate) was that the convention may only consider those matters stated by the legislature in the enabling act. While it has the power to determine the substance of the amendments, it cannot propose any amendment, the subject matter of which was not expressly presented to it by the legislature.

It seems clear from the foregoing that the Congress in Argentina exercises almost plenary control over the constitutional convention both as to the scope of its deliberations and as to procedure. In addition, the Congress, apparently, acts in these matters without either the concurrence or disapproval of the President. When the enabling acts of 1866 and 1898 were enacted, neither was submitted to the President for his signature upon the ground that the veto power of the President applies only to ordinary legislation.[8] This conclusion is somewhat similar to and is in line with United States Supreme Court decisions holding that resolutions of Congress proposing constitutional amendments do not require Executive approval since they are not considered ordinary legislation.[9]

CITATIONS

[1] El Salvador, Constitution (1886), amended 1945, Arts. 169, 170.
[2] El Salvador, Constitution (1950), Arts. 213, 44, 45.
[3] El Salvador, Constitution (1886), amended 1945, Art. 171.
[4] Guatemala, Decree No. 86 (September 21, 1954).
[5] Guatemala, Decree No. 134 (October 25, 1954). This assembly was ordered to study and determine: (1) tenure of office of the president; (2) ratification of treaties and state contracts; (3) preparation of a new constitution.
[6] Argentina, Coleccion de Leyes Nacionales, II, 271.
[7] Argentina, Coleccion de Leyes Nacionales, XI, 339.
[8] J. Gonzales Calderon, Derecho Constitucional Argentino, III, 34.
[9] Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378 (1798); Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U. S. 221 (1920).

PART VII

HISTORICAL RÉSUMÉ OF A STATE'S CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

CHAPTER 19

NEW YORK STATE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

Shortly before the Revolutionary War, the Second Continental Congress adopted legislation urging the several Colony-States, through their "respective assemblies and conventions," to adopt such constitutional government as was necessary for their safety and protection.[1] In New York the task of drafting a constitution was delegated to and performed by "The Convention of the Representatives of the State of New York"—a provisional body.[2]

This body, unlike future New York Constitutional Conventions, engaged in the actual business of government. Due to the exigencies of war, the convention operated under the most difficult conditions. It did adopt, however, a constitution—one which was, for the most part, prepared by a single committee headed by John Jay. It is known as the constitution of 1777.

Generally, the constitution of 1777 set up a system of checks and balances by establishing separate executive, judicial, and legislative branches. Under it the legislature, unlike our National Legislature, had residual, rather than delegated, powers. A so-called council of revision had the power to veto legislative acts, however.

Voting, under the 1777 constitution, was restricted by property qualifications [2a] and the instrument contained no provision providing for its amendment or revision.[2b] The constitution became effective upon its adoption by the delegates to the convention and no opportunity was afforded the electorate to vote upon it.[3] This action was no doubt due, in large part, to the fact that part of the State was in actual control of enemy British forces, rendering a popular referendum impossible.

While the original constitution was workable, it became apparent in time that clarification and revision was necessary. A second constitutional convention was called to accomplish this purpose. Foremost among the causes which gave rise to the second convention (held in 1801) was the conflict of power between the Governor and the constitutionally established council of appointment over the nominating and appointing of persons to political office. The Governor claimed that he had the exclusive right of appointment; the council of appointment denied this and claimed concurrent jurisdiction in the matter.

When attempts to resolve this major issue failed, the legislature adopted a resolution calling, as noted above, the constitutional convention of 1801. The convention was also authorized, pursuant to a legislative resolution, to consider the advisability of reducing and limiting the number of members in the legislature (which was expanding with the population growth of the State).[4]

This the convention did, and it also adopted a provision vesting concurrent jurisdiction in the Governor and the council of appointment to make appointments to political offices.[5]

The results of this convention became effective without being submitted to the electorate for popular approval; and, like the 1777 convention, set up no provision for the constitution's future amendment.

The work of the convention in placing concurrent jurisdiction over political appointments in the council of appointment proved unfortunate. The council, it is stated, engaged to the fullest extent in the "spoils system," dispensing enormous patronage.[6]

Disappointment with the council of appointment, however, was not alone the motivating force in bringing about the third constitutional convention in 1821. A movement had been underway for some years, seeking the removal of the property qualifications on voting.[7] In addition, dissatisfaction was also expressed concerning the work of another committee—the council on revision—in its vetoing of several popular legislative enactments.[7a]

It is worthy of note that one of the revision council's last acts—vetoing an 1820 act—established a rule of conduct for subsequent constitutional conventions. It took the position that the people should have a voice in deciding whether a convention should be held. It therefore vetoed a bill which would have denied to the people the right to approve or disapprove the then proposed convention of 1821. In rejecting the measure, the council based its veto in the belief that—> it is the most wise and safe course, and most accordant with the performance of the great trust committed to the representative powers under the Constitution, that the question of a general revision of it should be submitted to the people in the first instance, to determine whether a convention ought to be convened.[8]

These views were eventually adopted by the legislature and the question of whether or not to hold a convention was put to the people in the general election in 1821, and they voted to convene a convention.[9]

The resolution calling the convention provided unlimited revisionary powers. And, in accordance with the views of the council of revision as incorporated in the resolution, the changes proposed by the convention were submitted to the people, who approved the revised constitution.

While the entire instrument was presented for approval to the people, only a few changes were actually made to the original document. The judiciary article was revised, property restrictions on voting were made lenient, and a legislative reapportionment plan adopted.

Like its predecessors, the 1821 convention made no provision in the constitution providing for another convention. A new section did, however, provide for the constitution's amendment by amendments which could automatically become part of the constitution if recommended to the people by two successive legislatures,[10] so-called amendment by legislative initiative.

In spite of this specific method set forth in the instrument for amending the constitution, the legislature in 1845 did what has been described as an extraconstitutional act when it adopted a resolution providing for a popular vote on whether or not a constitutional convention should again be held.[11] The resolution was overwhelmingly approved by the people and resulted in the constitutional convention of 1846.

While it was urged that such action by the legislature was unconstitutional, in view of the fact that the constitution expressly provided only one method for its own amendment, the legislative act was nevertheless sustained on the theory that amending the constitution by convention is a right underlying the constitution of every free people which, in this instance, had not been renounced simply by providing an additional method of amendment in 1821.[12]

While the 1846 convention was in response to demand for several constitutional reforms, the most important concerned the question of State finances. The commercial panic of 1837 resulted in the State's credit being badly impaired. There were loud voices demanding constitutional regulation of corporations, banking, and the issuing of currency.

The convention responded. Many restraints were placed upon legislative authority; the judiciary provisions were revised, with many offices being made elective instead of appointive.[13]

One of the more important provisions adopted related to the holding of future constitutional conventions. It called for a popular referendum every 20 years, and at such other times as the legislature might decide.[14]

In accordance with this constitutional mandate, a referendum was held 20 years later and the constitutional convention of 1867 was authorized.[15] As might be imagined, the motives and reasons for holding the convention at the end of a 20-year interval were much less apparent than the reasons which inspired those of 1777, 1801, 1821, and 1846. The work of the 1867 convention, with the exception of a separately submitted judiciary article, was rejected.[16]

However, an important outgrowth of the rejection was a legislative enabling act in 1869 which authorized the governor to appoint a constitutional commission of 32 members to study constitutional problems and to submit them to the legislature so that, in turn, the legislature, if it approved the recommendations, could submit them, through the method of legislative initiative, to the people for approval or disapproval. Between the years 1872–94, several constitutional alterations were brought about through this method.[17]

Twenty years later and in 1886, the question of holding a constitutional convention was again, in pursuance of article XIII, section 2, submitted to the people and the vote was in favor of it. Due, however, to a dispute between the governor and the legislature over the election of delegates, the convention was not convened until 1894.[18]

The constitution proposed by this convention and adopted by the people remained in force until 1938.[19] It expanded the convention article (art. XIV) by providing, among other things, for the election of delegates. It also set forth convention procedures. It reads:

AMENDMENT BY CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

At the general election to be held in the year one thousand nine hundred and sixteen, and every twentieth year thereafter, and also at such times as the Legislature may by law provide, the question, 'Shall there be a convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?' shall be decided by the electors of the State; and in case a majority of the electors voting thereon shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose the electors of every senate district of the State, as then organized, shall elect three delegates at the next ensuing general election at which members of the Assembly shall be chosen, and the electors of the State voting at the same election shall elect fifteen delegates at large. The delegates so elected shall convene at the capitol on the first Tuesday of April next ensuing after their election, and shall continue their session until the business of such convention shall have been completed. Every delegate shall receive for his services the same compensation and the same mileage as shall then be annually payable to the members of the Assembly. A majority of the convention shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and no amendment to the Constitution shall be submitted for approval to the electors as hereinafter provided, unless by the assent of a majority of all the delegates elected to the convention, the yeas and nays being entered on the journal to be kept. The convention shall have the power to appoint such officers, employees, and assistants as it may deem necessary, and fix their compensation and to provide for the printing of its documents, journal and proceedings. The convention shall determine the rules of its own proceedings, choose its own officers, and be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members. In case of a vacancy, by death, resignation, or other cause, of any district delegate elected to the convention, such vacancy shall be filled by the vote of the remaining delegates representing the district in which such vacancy occurs. If such vacancy occurs in the office of a delegate-at-large, such vacancy shall be filled by a vote of the remaining delegates-at-large. Any proposed constitution or constitutional amendment which shall have been adopted by such convention, shall be submitted to a vote of the electors of the State at the time and in the manner provided by such convention, at an election which shall be held not less than six weeks after the adjournment of such convention. Upon the approval of such constitution or constitutional amendments, in the manner provided in the last preceding section, such constitution or constitutional amendment, shall go into effect on the first day of January next after such approval. (Art. XIV, sec. 2, Constitution of 1894.)[20]

A reading of the above article indicates that once the question of holding a constitutional convention has been decided upon, the constitution intends that the procedures relating to the convention—indeed the work of the convention itself—should be self executing and free from legislative control. This was, of course, a complete change from the conduct attendant with earlier conventions.

The above article has clarified and settled two very important questions affecting legislative authority in New York: (1) the structure of the convention, and other details concerning it, and (2) the election of delegates. Prior to 1894, the legislature set the date on which conventions were to convene. However, a dispute in 1886 between the governor and the legislature over the details of the convention postponed the convention for some 8 years even though the people by referendum had voted to hold the convention. Under article XIV, however, once the question of holding a convention is approved, the time is automatically set for the meeting of the convention. So also, with the termination of the convention. Under former procedure the legislature would set a day certain on which the business of the convention was to be accomplished or finished. Experience had shown, however, that it was impractical to so limit the deliberations of the convention and in one instance (1867) the legislature had to pass supplementary legislation extending the time. Under article XIV any convention, once convened, remains in session "until the business of such convention shall have been completed." The only limitation with regard to this matter is the further provision that a 6 week interval must occur between the close of the convention, and the submission of its revised constitution to the people.[21]

Under article XIV, a majority of the convention constituted a quorum both for doing business and for approving proposed amendments. This provision was inserted to prevent a "mere handful" of delegates from being able to control the affairs of the meeting. It might be observed, however, that if the convention of 1777 had had such a limitation it no doubt would not have promulgated the State's first constitution. This was for the reason that the British, in occupying different parts of the State from time to time, made it impossible for a majority of delegates to be always present.

The article also provided that the convention—not the legislature or the courts—determine the rules of its own proceedings, its officers, and all issues relating to the election of the delegates. It is readily understood why a convention should be permitted to adopt rules to govern its own proceedings. However, on the issue of election, the power is not so apparent. The reason advanced at the time this provision was adopted was that by divesting the legislature and the courts of such power, the people, through the conventions, would have, ultimately, such power. It was the only method by which the people, in the final analysis, could have a final say over the legislature and the courts. In any event this safeguard rendered the convention free from legislative control as well as from judicial interference.

A reading and study of the constitutional convention history of New York clearly indicates that a convention clause with self-executing provisions is more expeditious than convention clauses calling for legislative control. Legislative action oftentimes results in delays. The governor, for example, may send his recommendations to the legislature and have that body reject them completely, or accept them only in part. The governor, in turn, has the power of vetoing the legislative acts thereby stymying the work of that body. With self-executing provisions, the convention, once agreed to by the people, eliminates these intermediate steps with their possible resulting delays and conflicts.

The constitutional convention of 1915 was held in pursuance to the amending article of the constitution providing for a referendum at 20-year intervals. The constitution proposed by this convention was rejected upon the ground that it was "not sufficiently progressive." [2]

In 1936, the people again, pursuant to the amending article of the constitution, voted to hold a constitutional convention. This resulted in the convention of 1938. An interesting sidelight on this convention was the fact that, a convention having been decided upon by the vote of the people, the governor asked the legislature to create a special commission to perform essential preparatory work for the convention just as it had created commissions to do preliminary work for the conventions of 1894 and 1915. However, the legislature did not adopt the governor's recommendation. Thereafter, the governor established an unofficial committee, nonpartisan and nonpolitical in character, which undertook the preparation of factual data on several subjects which were certain to be considered at the convention.[2]

The 1938 convention adopted a total of 57 separate measures proposing amendments to the then constitution. To expedite matters it was decided to group 50 of the proposals, which were considered uncontroversial, into 1 amendment. Eight other proposals were submitted singly and appeared on the ballot for the people's consideration as amendments Nos. 2 to 9, inclusive. These latter proposals were considered controversial and if the people were to reject any of them, it would not affect the remaining amendments.[24]

At the general elections of 1938, six of the proposed amendments were approved. The only change here pertinent concerned the amending article which was renumbered article XIX. The only substantive change made relating to constitutional conventions was changing the date on which to start the 20-year intervals, so that the next convention will be voted upon in 1957, a year when no impending State or National election is likely to inject its issues into the deliberations of the convention.

RÉSUMÉ

In review, there have been 8 constitutional conventions in New York State—1777, 1801, 1821, 1846, 1867, 1894, 1915, and 1938—and of these, 4 have had their work approved and adopted by the people. The work of 2 conventions became effective without ever being referred to the people, and the work of 2 conventions was rejected.

The rejection of the proposed constitution of 1867 engendered a new step in constitutional procedure, for following its rejection, the legislature created the constitutional commission of 1872 to do extensive preliminary work and thus prepare well-reasoned and well-considered proposals to the constitution. Again, because of the rejection of the proposed 1915 constitution, the legislature created a judiciary committee, a body of experts with a knowledge of judicial problems, to submit recommendations containing constitutional changes on the judicial provisions of the constitution (article VI).

Another noteworthy development has been the establishment of special commissions and committees, prior to the convening of the conventions of 1894, 1915, and 1938, to undertake to make studies and prepare statistical and other data on particular subjects for the conventions' aid and consideration when they meet.

While there have been many revisions and many changes and amendments, the New York State constitution has not been much altered in its main structure.

In its history, the legislature has restricted the scope of a convention's deliberations authorizing it to consider, in 1 instance, only 2 subjects. It has, however, authorized unlimited revision on other occasions.

The conventions in like manner have submitted completely revised instruments for approval and also piecemeal changes, even though some conventions had general revisionary powers.

This history also discloses that the trend has been away from legislative and judicial control and toward autonomy on the part of the convention, enabling it to decide for itself the scope of its deliberations as well as the number and kinds of subjects it will consider. This trend has helped in eliminating delays as well as disputes which have arisen between the legislature and the governor. Moreover, the conduct of recent conventions has indicated that there is little likelihood of a so-called runaway convention which would get out of control and promulgate proposals effecting radical, unpopular, or unwanted changes in the constitution. On the contrary, past conventions have suggested only changes which reflected the tempo of the times and only then on subjects which were in need of constitutional change.

CITATIONS

[1] Problems relating to legislative organization and powers, New York State Constitutional Convention Committee (1938), Albany, p. 336.
[2] Ibid.
[2a] New York, Constitution (1777), Art. VII.
[2b] Lincoln, The Continental History of New York (1906), I, 606. See footnotes to page 2, supra, where eight other state constitutions promulgated during the Revolutionary period expressly provided for constitutional changes.
[3] There was, however, sentiment in favor of a submission. See W. F. Dodd, The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions (1910), 12.
[4] Lincoln, The Constitutional History of New York (1906), I, 607–608.
[5] Lincoln, ibid., I, 610.
[6] Problems relating to legislative organization and powers, New York State Constitutional Convention Committee (1938), Albany, p. 337.
[7] Lincoln, ibid., I, 615.
[7a] Lincoln, ibid., I, 624–628.
[8] Lincoln, Messages from the Governors (1909), II, 1055, 1057; Lincoln, ibid., I, 626.
[9] Lincoln, ibid., I, 628–629.
[10] Lincoln, ibid., I, 751.
[11] New York, Debates of the 1846 Convention, reported by William G. Bishop and William H. Attree. Lincoln, ibid., II, 210.
[12] Dougherty, Constitutional History of the State of New York (1915), 171–172; see also discussion of this question in chapter 7, supra.
[13] Lincoln, ibid., II, 9–217.
[14] New York, Constitution (1846), Art. XIII, sec. 2, Lincoln, ibid., II, 210.
[15] Lincoln, ibid., II, p. 234.
[16] Lincoln, ibid., II, pp. 268, 422.
[17] Lincoln, ibid., II, pp. 464–574.
[18] Lincoln, ibid., II, p. 682, III, pp. 1–30.
[19] New York, Constitution (1846), Art. XIII, sec. 2, provided that the legislature was to provide by law for the election of delegates.
[20] Lincoln, ibid., IV, p. 797.
[21] Lincoln, ibid., III, pp. 660–678.
[22] New York, Record of the 1915 Constitutional Convention (revised record), (J. B. Lyon Co., Albany, N. Y., 1916), 2 Vols. There was a judicial constitutional convention in 1921 which dealt with the judiciary provisions revision. It was called by the legislature pursuant to the amending article.
[23] New York State Constitutional Convention Committee (1938), (J. B. Lyon Co., Albany, N. Y., 1938), vol. I, pp. v–viii.
[24] New York, What's in the Proposed Constitution, published by National Municipal League (1938).

PART VIII

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

CHAPTER 20

SUMMARY, CONCLUSIONS, AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Introduction

Article V provides two methods for amending the Constitution: (1) Congress itself may propose amendments for ratification by three-fourths of the States; or (2) on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, Congress shall call a Constitutional Convention for proposing amendments.

Twenty-seven proposed amendments have been referred to the States for ratification under the first method,[1] but there has never been, since the adoption of our Constitution, a Constitutional Convention. Because of the growing number of petitions submitted to Congress during recent years for a convention under the second method, and because of the complex issues involved, the question of when and how Congress shall call a convention creates considerable problems which should be faced and solved by responsible Government officials.

Article V of the Constitution is silent as to how and when conventions are to be convened and it does not state how conventions are to be formed or what rules of procedure are to govern their acts. In seeking answers to these problems, little aid can be obtained from the Constitutional Convention of 1787 which raised the issues but left them unanswered.[2]

Further, court decisions furnish little more than signpost assistance. They have relegated the matter of constitutional amendment to that area of constitutional law known as political questions.[3] While this leads one to believe that Congress alone may determine the matter there is nonetheless little guidance as to how and for what purposes constitutional conventions shall be convened.

Article V, for example, sets no requirements concerning what a State application must contain or what standards it must meet in order to be considered as validly made. One petition from the State of Maryland, for instance, was submitted by its house of delegates only.[4] It seems that such a petition is not an application from the "legislature"—both houses—of the State.

One application of a State legislature was vetoed by its governor.[5] This raises the question of whether the Constitution requires action solely by the houses of a State legislature or whether applications must be processed in accordance with procedures for enacting State laws which usually includes action by the State's chief executive.

Another question is, When have two-thirds of the legislatures made application for the calling of a convention? Some petitions to Congress were made over 168 years ago.[6] Do these petitions remain permanently alive or do they lapse after a reasonable period of time?

Article V is also silent on the subject matter which may be considered by conventions, as well as on whether States, once having made application, may later rescind their actions.

Other important questions are whether, after the requisite number of petitions have been submitted, an unwilling Congress could be required to call a convention and, if called, whether it could control a convention with regard to its procedures and the scope of its deliberations. The latter issue is further complicated with respect to the extent to which the States themselves may influence and control the actions of a convention.

These problems and others are discussed at length in the thesis. This summary states the conclusions on the more important ones. Many of these questions can be resolved or otherwise rendered academic by the Congress through the adoption of statutes setting up guides and standards to govern (1) the submission of State applications, and (2) the procedures of constitutional conventions.

Validity of State applications

Article V states that Congress shall call a convention on the application of the "legislatures of two-thirds of the several States" but does not indicate whether the term "legislature" means the usual channels for statutory enactments, including the assent of the governors.

The term "legislature" in different relations does not always imply, as noted in Smiley v. Holm, the performance of the same function.[7] The legislature, for example, was intended to act (1) as an electoral body under article I, section 3, in the choice of United States Senators; (2) as a ratifying body, under article V, with respect to proposed amendments; and (3) as a consenting body with regard to the acquisition of land by the Federal Government under article I, section 8. Wherever, therefore, the term "legislature" is used in the Constitution, it is necessary to consider the nature of the particular action in view.

The Supreme Court, while never directly deciding, has indicated that in matters pertaining to the amending process, the assent of State governors is unneccessary because the State legislatures are performing a Federal function—clearly different from State lawmaking.[8] Furthermore, the Constitution speaks as of the time it was adopted,[9] and in the beginning very few of the original States granted the veto power to their governors.[10]

As further indicia that gubernatorial action was not intended, the Constitution uses both the term "executives" and the term "legislatures" in its text. If the framers of the Constitution had intended that "legislature" include gubernatorial action, they could have used the word "State" which could include the governor, or some other expression such as "the legislature with the approval of the executive." Both terms are in no way novel and both are used in other provisions of the Constitution.

Another question pertaining to State applications is whether Congress may regulate State procedure in proposing constitutional amendments. It is well established that the amending power is manifestly a Federal function in which the States take part in proposing conventions and ratifying amendments.[11] At the same time, however, State legislatures are not subject to absolute congressional control. While the act of petitioning or ratifying is a Federal function, the legislature performing the act is nevertheless the State legislature and a clear distinction must be made between acts which are necessary and proper for Congress to carry out constitutional requirements, and those which seek to restrict the free will of State legislatures. Clearly Congress may not dictate to the States what they may or may not suggest in proposing a constitutional amendment or when they may propose it.

Cooley, in his book on constitutional limitations,[12] points out that when a constitution is adopted, there are in existence at the time of adoption known and settled rules and usages, which form a part of the law of the State in reference to which the constitution is evidently framed.

The Founding Fathers framed the Constitution against a background of existing colonial laws, legislatures, and customs. Historic precedents have left to legislatures the choosing of their own officers,[13] the determination of their own rules of proceedings,[14] and the election and qualification of their own members.[15] These so-called inherent rights are well documented in parliamentary rules. They were recognized by the United States Supreme Court in Field v. Clark [16] which held, among other things, that courts may not look behind legislative acts, once certified to as correct by their presiding officers, to determine whether their rules of procedure have been complied with.

While no doubt Congress could impose its will on the internal workings of State legislatures by refusing to recognize their actions if they do not comply with congressional mandates, it would be more prudent in the light of precedents to recognize that deliberative bodies regulate their own proceedings, and to accept State petitions when certified to, as having been validly adopted.

Control of constitutional conventions

Probably the most vital question relates to the power of Congress to bind a constitutional convention, or conversely, the power of a convention to ignore congressional acts seeking to restrict the scope of its deliberations. Assuming the right of Congress, for example, to call a convention into being, has it the further right to impose restrictions upon its actions and subject it to restraints?

Before considering the power and scope of a constitutional convention, it is important to distinguish between a revolutionary convention and a constitutional convention. A revolutionary convention is part of the apparatus of a revolution. Jameson says it consists of those bodies of men who, in times of political crisis, assume or have cast on them, provisionally, the function of government.[17] They supplant the existing government.

A constitutional convention on the other hand, as its name implies, is constitutional and, as Jameson states it, "ancillary and subservient and not hostile and paramount" to existing governments.[18]

A constitutional convention, therefore, that disregards the limits imposed upon it by its creators and seeks to exercise revolutionary powers, would cease to be a constitutional convention.

While the power of Congress to control a convention has never been determined by the courts or by the Congress, it seems that the whole scheme, history, and development of our Government, its laws and institutions, require control. Since a convention is called by Congress at the request of the States, and since both, in the final analysis, represent the people, the ultimate source of power, a Federal constitutional convention, to act validly, would have to stay within the designated limits of the congressional act which called it. This does not mean that the convention may not exercise its free will on the substantive matters before it; it means only that its free will shall be exercised within the framework set by the act calling it into being.

It may be asked whether the convention, once convened, may adopt extralegal means in proposing amendments? A theory being urged today especially by the Communist Party in America, is the so-called right of revolution. According to its supporters, the "right of revolution" is a concept recognized by our Constitution and protected by it.

If such a theory be valid, it could be argued, since it presupposes changing our form of government in a manner other than that provided for in article V, that a constitutional convention, once convened, could disregard congressional directions and article V and adopt extra legal means in establishing a new and revised Constitution.

This doctrine was denounced in Dennis v. United States,[19] where the petitioners, leaders in the Communist Party in the United States, were indicted for conspiring to teach and advocate the overthrow of the United States by force and violence.[20] It was argued, on their behalf, that the people as sovereign have an "historically established right to advocate revolution" and that the Constitution recognized that "right."[21]

Judge Learned Hand, in denying that such a right exists under the Constitution, succinctly held that no government could tolerate it and exist.[22] He stated that revolutions are often "right" but a "right of revolution" is a contradiction in terms, for a society which acknowledged it would have to tolerate conspiracies to overthrow it.[23] The Supreme Court, in affirming the court of appeals, observed that the Constitution can only be changed by peaceful and orderly means.[24]

Time limitations on the submission of State applications

A convention, under article V, after the constitutional application, does not automatically come into being. It must be called by Congress. The Founding Fathers intended that Congress should be required to call a convention and expressly provided in article V that Congress "shall call a Convention." Among other reasons, they wanted to insure the right of the States to change the Constitution in the event Congress was unwilling to act.[25] It is doubtful, however, that there is any legal process or machinery to compel Congress to perform its duty if it is unwilling to do so. Courts, most likely, would refuse to entertain actions to accomplish this end for the same reason they have refused to issue mandamus writs on the President of the United States—the doctrine of separation of powers.[26]

However, whether Congress, assuming it is willing, should act and when, raises still further problems. Does an application remain always alive, or can it become legally ineffective because of a lapse of time or another intervening factor?

In dealing with an analogous question, the Supreme Court thought that ratification of a proposed amendment by the States ought to be reasonably related in time and that Congress could set up a "reasonable time" within which the States might act.[27] Applying this test to State petitions seeking a convention, an application once made, would be valid for a reasonable time.

This conclusion raises the further question of what constitutes a "reasonable time." Orfield feels it should not be more than a generation.[28] Jameson takes the position that proposals for amending the Constitution reflect the sentiment of the people at a particular time, and action must be taken while the sentiment is fairly supposed to exist.[29] Congress, in proposing recent amendments, set a specific time limit of 7 years.

Since this issue involves an appraisal of a great variety of political, social, and economic conditions, it would seem that any time period wherein conditions remain substantially unchanged would be an acceptable period. History has shown that 7 years was acceptable, and in all probability longer periods of time would be reasonable too, so long as the political, social, and economic conditions do not change too greatly.

Concerning withdrawal of State applications, the present attitude among legislators at least, indicates that such action is permissible. Twelve States in the last 12 years alone have adopted resolutions rescinding previously made applications.[30] Furthermore, many States submit applications for the sole purpose of prodding Congress into taking action on a proposed amendment pending in the Congress, without ever having any real hope that Congress would call a convention. To hold these States bound to their petitions would not be politic or realistic. It would seem proper to permit withdrawal at least at any time prior to the time when two-thirds of the States have submitted applications for a convention on the same subject matter.

Ratification or rejection

Several writers had taken the position that since article V in terms provides for only affirmative acts, once having ratified or rejected a proposed amendment, a State cannot change its action.

Congress has previously been confronted with these questions. The Legislatures of Ohio and New Jersey first ratified the 14th amendment and then passed resolutions attempting to withdraw their consent. This Congress refused to permit them to do.[31] On the other hand, New Jersey, in connection with the 13th amendment, and Georgia, North Carolina, Virginia, and South Carolina, in connection with the 14th amendment, at first rejected these amendments but subsequently ratified them. These ratifications were treated as valid in each case.[32]

The question of ratification came before the Supreme Court in Coleman v. Miller,[33] and was declared to be a political question, subject to determination not by the courts but by Congress.

Because of the highly developed means of communication today, Congress, as a practical and political matter, could permit States to withdraw their ratifications, and conversely, to ratify proposals which they had previously rejected, up until such time as three-fourths of the States had ratified the proposed amendment. The old argument that such action would create uncertainty as to the exact status of a proposal at any given time loses merit in the light of today's speedy communication systems.

While Congress refused to permit Ohio and New Jersey to withdraw their approvals of the 14th amendment, it should be pointed out that that amendment was adopted during the reconstruction days after the Civil War and Congress' action under those peculiar political conditions can hardly be accepted as a final settlement of this far reaching question.[34]

Applications to limit Federal taxing power

In recent years Congress has received petitions requesting a constitutional convention to propose amendments to the Constitution which would limit the power of the Federal Government to tax incomes, gifts and inheritances.[35] The amendments requested in these petitions are of 4 general types [36] but for purposes of discussion may be broken down into 2 classifications. First are those petitions seeking an amendment which would limit the maximum rate of Federal taxation of income, gifts and inheritances to 25 percent with a proviso in a number of such petitions that the limitation may be removed by a three-fourths vote of both Houses of Congress during time of war. The second group of applications contain amendments which would limit the Federal taxing power, not by stipulating a maximum rate of levy, but by maintaining several funds into which there would be paid specified portions of all taxes collected by the Federal Government. Provision is made for the distribution of the moneys in these funds to the several States in designated amounts and proportions.

As of June 1957, Congress had received 32 petitions from 27 different States relating in some manner to amending the Constitution so as to limit the Federal taxing power.[37] The legislatures in 12 States have reversed their previous positions, however, and have taken action rescinding their applications.[38] Three States have submitted two applications each, only one of which should be counted for each State.[39]

It might be well to mention that the petitions of 3 other States (not included in the 32 petitions above) requested that Congress itself propose a Federal tax limitation amendment.[40] Such petitions, of course, are not binding upon Congress insofar as summoning a constitutional convention is concerned.

The application of Maryland [41] transmitted to the Congress consisted of a resolution passed by its house of delegates only and may be discounted as not emanating from a State "legislature" as contemplated by article V.

The two houses of the Legislature of the State of Texas passed identical resolutions on the subject of limiting the Federal taxing power but neither house ever concurred in the resolution of the other.[42] Since no agreement between the two legislative chambers was ever reached and since no resolution was transmitted to the Congress, it would appear that the action of the State of Texas would not be an application of a State legislature within the meaning of article V.

How long all these petitions on tax limitation should remain valid has never been determined. The earliest petition on this subject was submitted by the State of Wyoming in 1939—about 18 years ago.[43] Tables 3, 4, and 5, appendix, infra, list all the petitions and indicate their present status.

Accordingly, as of June 195[illegible], and as [illegible] appendix, set forth,[44] Congress, without discounting any applications because of the lapse of time, could well conclude that 16 States have applications validly pending for a constitutional convention limiting the Federal power of taxation. This is 16 short of the necessary 32 applications required by the Constitution for the calling of a constitutional convention.

Conclusions and recommendations

A compilation of the various State applications calling for a Constitutional Convention discloses that over 200 applications have been made since 1789. These applications have covered many subjects: direct election of Senators, limitation on Federal taxing power, prohibition of polygamy, general revision of the Constitution, world federal government, repeal of the 18th amendment, Presidential tenure, treatymaking, taxation of Federal and State securities, protective tariff, wages and hours, gasoline tax, tidelands problem, control of trusts, grants-in-aid, popular ratification of amendments, constitutionality of State enactments, revision of article V, and the Townsend plan.[44]

If the Constitution requires merely that two-thirds of the States submit applications, a convention has been long overdue. Even if the petitions were classified according to subject matter, a convention would be overdue since on two occasions, at least, more than the necessary two-thirds of the States of the number of States then comprising the Union had submitted applications seeking a convention on the same subject matter.[45]

However, other considerations have a controlling effect on these issues. The Supreme Court has indicated that applications ought to be reasonably related in time, so as to reflect a widespread sentiment among the States during a given period in history. It has announced that the burden of deciding what constitutes a reasonable time is on the Congress of the United States.

In addition to the question of being reasonably related in time, some argue that applications should relate only to a complete or substantial revision of the Constitution. This argument is somewhat unrealistic since it would negate amendment by the alternative method of convention. The Founding Fathers intended this method to be workable and incorporated it into the Constitution to permit the States to initiate changes if Congress became oppressive or unwilling to act. Certainly such an intention contemplated piecemeal amendment as well as general revision. This view is supported not only by the constitutional debates at the time of the Convention in 1787, but by many eminent legal authorities since then. Furthermore as a matter of historical precedent, the States have been submitting applications on specific subjects over the years with the number of applications for limited conventions far outnumbering applications for general conventions.

Even with these questions out of the way, there are many procedural questions to be dealt with, among them such matters as the effect of the governor's veto of an application, a State's rescinding action after it has submitted its application, the physical act of forming a convention, providing for its membership, rules of order, and most important of all, outlining the scope of the convention's deliberations.

Inasmuch as the courts have indicated that many of these issues fall into the category of "political questions," not justiciable, Congress may resolve many of them by enacting implementing legislation, containing provisions setting up standards and guides to govern Contitutional Conventions.

These and other issues have already been discussed in the preceeding chapters of this thesis. Two draft bills have been prepared which set up a framework for giving effect to the application procedure in accordance with the provisions of article V of the Constitution. The first draft bill provides a procedure for processing State applications for a constitutional convention in the Congress, and for convening conventions. The second draft amends the rules of the House so as to make provision for the processing of the applications once they have been submitted. The two pieces of legislation which are set out in their entirety beginning with pages 79 and 82 provide in substance as follows:

Analysis of draft bill for calling a Constitutional Convention

Applications for a convention may request either a general convention or a convention to propose specific amendments (sec. 2).

[As discussed in pp. 19–20, supra, the form of our government warrants a general revision of the Constitution if the people so wish it. In fact, the first two petitions submitted within two years after the Constitution's adoption were petitions calling for a general revision of the Constitution. Specific amendment is also authorized and the history of petitions submitted in the last fifty years clearly indicates a recognition of this form of amendment by a convention.]

State legislatures will determine all questions connected with the adoption of State applications (sec. 3 (b)).

[As developed in chapter 5, parliamentary precedents and court decisions recognize the rule that legislative bodies should have control over their own proceedings.]

Approval of governor is not to be required in application process (sec. 3(c)).

[Court decisions indicate, as pointed out in chapter 4, and the history of amendments to the Constitution show, that the action of the executive power is not required in the amending process.]

Applications must contain certain basic data including the exact text of the State resolution (sec. 4 (a)).

[In order that amendments may be properly classified and counted, it is proposed that the exact text of the State petitions be submitted so that the subject matter of each petition may be authoritatively established, and also to make certain that applications meet the procedural requirements set out in this draft legislation. It is not the underlying intention of this provision, however, to require that the text of applications be identical to be classified together. If they relate generally to the same subject they are to be classified together, since a convention, if called, would be free to adopt its own language in drafting a proposal on the subject.]

An application, once submitted, shall remain valid for 15 years and for such longer time as Congress deems necessary if two-thirds of the States have submitted applications on the same subject (sec. 5 (a)).

[In line with court decisions that proposals should not remain everlastingly alive, but must be "contemporaneous," a 15-year cutoff date was inserted. The same time limitation has been adopted in recent House resolutions and in some State petitions calling for the revision of article V itself.]

States may rescind their applications at any time except when two-thirds of the States have valid applications pending on the same subject (sec. 5 (b)).

[While Congress has never allowed a State, once having ratified, to withdraw its ratification of an amendment, it is believed that because of the present-day means of speedy communications (as noted in chapter 14 and p. 49), and the distinguishing features between applications for conventions and ratifications of amendments, withdrawals should be permitted.]

Congress, when the requisite number of applications have been received, shall call a constitutional convention (sec. 6 (a)), and the Chief Justice of the United States shall preside until the convention is organized (sec. 8).

[The first part of this provision repeats the mandate of article V of the Constitution. Further, a high Government official would seem to be the most appropriate person to initiate the tremendously important task of actually calling a convention to order, and it is believed that the office of Chief Justice of the United States, who is to act as a temporary chairman only, is sufficiently removed from active politics to avoid criticism.]

Delegates are to be elected in accordance with State law (sec. 7 (a)), and each State shall have as many delegates as it has Representatives in Congress (sec. 7 (a)).

[This provision places election procedures in the States, in line with the practice approved by Congress when it proposed the 20th amendment to the Constitution. In providing that delegates should be chosen on the same geographical basis as Congressmen, it is felt that this method, on a national basis, is the most representative and best proportioned.]

Each State is to have one vote to be cast as the majority of its delegates decide (sec. 9 (a)).

[Section 7 provides for representation on a proportional basis; this section gives each State equal suffrage. This procedure is in line with the 12th amendment and article 2, section 1, clause 3, of the United States Constitution which directs the House of Representatives in cases of tie in the electoral votes for President to vote by States, each having one vote.]

The convention will be limited to the consideration of those subjects set out in the congressional resolution calling the convention into being (sec. 8).

[The purpose of this provision, as discussed in chapters 6, 7, 9, and 10, is to give Congress and the States control over the scope and work of constitutional conventions, and to prevent so-called runaway, extra-legal, or revolutionary conventions.]

The convention will be in session not more than 1 year (sec. 9 (c)), and its proposals will be transmitted through Congress to the States for ratification (sec. 11).

[To limit the time of the convention and also to provide for congressional control and approval of the convention's work. This procedure was used by the Constitutional Convention of 1787.]

The presiding officers in Congress must transmit a convention's proposals to the States within 3 months of their receipt but only if Congress does not by affirmative action disapprove the proposals (sec. 12 (a)).

[This procedural provision follows the method adopted by Congress in considering reorganization acts. The burden is placed on the Congress to take action. If it does not the measure is automatically processed by the presiding officers.]

Amendments proposed by the convention must be ratified by the States within the time set by Congress for ratification (sec. 13 a).

[Under the provision Congress may set up a reasonable time limitation. It has limited the time for ratifying in the adoption of the 18th, 20th, 21st, and 22d amendments to the Constitution. (See chapters 11 and 13.)]

Congress may not recall a proposed amendment (sec. 12 (b)).

[Jameson states that the power to submit proposals to the States does not include the power to recall them; otherwise, in recalling proposals, Congress would also have the power to definitively reject such proposals.]

Gubernatorial action is removed from the ratification process (sec. 14 (b)), and States may rescind their action at any time prior to the ratification by three-fourths of the States (sec. 16 (a)). A State may also ratify an amendment it has previously rejected (sec. 16 (b)).

[As previously noted, and in line with court decisions and the practice adopted with other amendments, executive action is not requisite in the amending process. Since the exact status of proposed amendments may now be easily and quickly ascertained, it is no longer necessary to hold States bound to their ratifications unless three-fourths of the States have also ratified the same proposal. Rejection of an amendment presents no real problem since Congress, in the past, has permitted States who have rejected an amendment to later ratify the same.]

Congress will determine all questions relating to ratification (sec. 16 (c)), and the Administrator of General Services, when the requisite number of States have ratified, will officially proclaim the new amendment to be part of the Constitution (sec. 17).

[This provision concerns a "political question" and it is generally recognized that Congress has the power to decide all questions relating to ratification. Official proclamation by the Administrator of General Services is a procedural provision and follows the present law relating to amendments.]

Analysis of draft resolution amending rules of the House of Representatives for processing of State applications seeking Constitutional Conventions

The Speaker is to refer all State applications for a constitutional convention to the House Judiciary Committee (sec. 1(a)).

[This provision follows the present practice for referral of State applications to a congressional committee.]

Within 60 days after the beginning of each session of Congress, the Judiciary Committee must report to the House the number of petitions, according to subject matter, which have been received during the preceeding 15 years (sec. 1 (b)), together with the number of States which have rescinded their applications (sec. 1(b)).

[The 60-day provision is to prevent delay or deferring of action by a committee of Congress. The remainder of the section carries out the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of the draft bill.]

If, during a 15-year period, two-thirds of the States have submitted applications on a particular subject, a resolution must be introduced in the House calling for a convention within 2 years for the purpose set forth in the State applications (sec. 2).

[An enabling provision to initiate action by a House of Congress once the formal requirements outlined in the draft bill have been met.]

The resolution is to be referred to the Judiciary Committee which must report back to the House within 30 days or be automatically discharged (sec. 3 (a)).

[To give preference to this legislation over other matters pending in committee and to provide for not only immediate consideration of the measure by the committee, but also to require the committee to take final action without delay. Consideration was given to setting up a joint committee of the House and Senate; also to a separate commission. However, since applications only trickle in over the years there would be very little work to justify the existence of a joint committee or a commission. The judiciary committees of the Congress are ideally set up to handle the work involved in State applications.]

The resolution is to be considered immediately by the House (sec. 3 (b)), and may be passed by a simple majority vote (sec. 4).

[To give measure highest priority on floor of the House, and at the same time reqlire only a simple majority vote of the members present at time measure is considered.]

If, prior to taking action on a House resolution, the Senate passes a similar resolution, the House will nevertheless consider the House resolution, and, if acted upon favorably, shall then constitute the House resolution for the Senate resolution and adopt the same (sec. 5).

[This provision is similar to the present Rules of the House of Representatives with regard to separate but similar measures which are considered on the floors of both Houses of Congress at the same time or approximately the same time.]

In the absence of a House resolution, a Senate resolution shall be processed in the same manner as though it had been introduced as a House resolution (sec. 6).

[Follows present House rules with regard to a measure which has passed the Senate and on which there is similar measure pending in the House.]

A Congressman may, at any time, inquire whether a sufficient number of applications have been submitted requiring the calling of a convention (sec. 7).

[To authorise Members of Congress to require an accounting by the Judiciary Committee if there is doubt concerning the present status of applications.]

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL

A BILL

To provide procedures for calling constitutional conventions for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, pursuant to article V of the Constitution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Constitutional Convention Act."

ACTION OF STATE LEGISLATURES

SEC. 2. The legislature of a State, in making application for a constitutional convention under article V of the Constitution of the United States, shall, after adopting a resolution pursuant to this Act, petition the Congress stating, in substance, that the legislature favors the calling of a constitutional convention for the purpose of—

(a) proposing a general revision of the Constitution of the United States; or

(b) proposing one or more amendments of a particular nature to the Constitution of the United States stating the specific nature of the amendments to be proposed.

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of adopting a resolution pursuant to section 2, the State legislature shall adopt its own rules of procedure.

(b) Questions concerning the State legislative procedure and the validity of the adoption of a State resolution cognizable under this Act are determinable by the State legislature and its decisions thereon are binding on all others, including State and Federal courts, and the Congress of the United States.

(c) A State resolution adopted pursuant to this Act is effective without regard to whether it is approved or disapproved by the Governor of the State.

SEC. 4. (a) Within 60 days after a resolution is adopted by the legislature of the State, the secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by the State law with such function, shall transmit to the Congress of the United States two copies of the application, one addressed to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House.

(b) Each copy of the application shall contain—

(1) the title of the resolution,

(2) the exact text of the resolution, signed by the presiding officer of each House of the legislature, and

(3) the date on which the legislature adopted the resolution, and shall be accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of the State, or such other person as is charged by the State law with such function, certifying that the application accurately sets forth the text of the resolution.

SEC. 5. (a) An application submitted to the Congress pursuant to this Act, unless sooner rescinded by the State legislature, shall remain effective for 16 calendar years after the date it is received by the Congress, unless two-thirds or more of the several States have each submitted an application calling for a constitutional convention on the same subject, in which event the application shall remain in effect until the Congress has taken action on a concurrent resolution, pursuant to section 8, calling for a constitutional convention.

(b) A State, upon notification to the Congress in accordance with section 4, may rescind its application calling for a Constitutional Convention except that no State may rescind when two-thirds or more of the State legislatures have applications pending before the Congress seeking amendments on the same subject.

(c) The Congress of the United States has the sole power of determining whether a State's action to rescind its application has been timely made.

COMPOSITION AND PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONVENTION

SEC. 6. (a) Congress, under such rules as it may deem necessary, shall adopt concurrent resolutions calling for the convening of a Federal Constitutional Convention. It may, in such resolution designate the place and time of meeting and it shall set forth therein the particular subjects which the convention is to consider.

(b) When no place or time is specified in the concurrent resolution calling the convention, the convention shall be held in the District of Columbia not later than two years after the adoption of the resolution.

SEC. 7. (a) A convention called under this Act shall be composed of as many delegates from each State as it is entitled to Representatives in Congress. Each delegate is to be elected or appointed in the manner provided by State law. Alternate delegates, in the number established by State law, shall be elected or appointed at the same time and in the same manner. Any vacancy occurring in the State delegation shall be filled by appointment of one of the alternate delegates in the manner provided at the time of his election or appointment as an alternate delegate. No alternate delegate shall take part in the proceedings of the convention unless he is appointed a delegate.

(b) The Secretary of State of each State, or, if there be no such officer, the person charged by State law to perform such function, shall certify to the Chief Justice of the United States the name of each delegate and alternate delegate appointed or elected pursuant to this section.

(c) Delegates shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at a session of the convention, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in the convention they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(d) Each delegate shall receive compensation at the rate of $50 per day for each day of service and shall be compensated for traveling and related expenses in accordance with the Travel Expense Act of 1949, as amended. The convention shall decide the compensation of alternate delegates and employees of the convention.

(e) The Congress shall appropriate moneys for the payment of all expenses of the convention.

SEC. 8. (a) The Chief Justice of the United States shall convene the constitutional convention. He shall administer the oath of office to the delegates to the convention and shall preside until the delegates elect a presiding officer who shall preside thereafter. Before taking his seat each delegate shall subscribe an oath not to attempt to change or alter any section, clause or article of the Constitution or propose additions thereto which have not been proposed or fixed by the resolution calling the convention. Further proceedings of the convention shall be conducted in accordance with such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as it may adopt.

(b) The performance of the duties required of the Chief Justice of the United States under this Act, shall not be deemed to disqualify him from participating in any case or controversy before the United States Supreme Court.

SEC. 9. (a) Each State shall have one vote. The vote of each State shall be cast on any question before the convention as the majority of the delegates from that State, present at the time, shall agree. If the delegates from any State present are evenly divided on any question before the convention, the vote of that State shall not be cast on the question.

(b) The convention shall keep a daily record of its proceedings and publish the same. The votes of the States on any question shall be entered on the record.

(c) The convention shall terminate its proceedings within one year after the date of its first meeting unless the period is extended by the Congress by concurrent resolution.

SEC. 10. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a convention called under this Act may propose amendments to the Constitution by a majority of the total vote cast on the question.

(b) No convention called under this Act to propose an amendment of a limited nature may propose any amendment or amendments, the general nature of which differs from that stated in the concurrent resolution calling the convention. All controversies arising under this subsection shall not be justiciable but shall be determined by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 11. The presiding officer of the convention, within 1 month after the termination of its proceedings, shall submit the exact text of the amendments agreed upon at the convention to the Congress for approval and transmission to the several States for their ratification.

TRANSMITTAL OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 12. (a) The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting jointly, shall transmit the proposed amendments to the Constitution to the Administrator of General Services for submission to the States upon the expiration of the first period of 3 months of continuous session of the Congress following the date on which such proposals are received, but only if prior to the expiration of such period Congress has not adopted a resolution disapproving the submission of the proposed amendments to the States.

(b) Whenever the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives have jointly transmitted proposed amendments to the Administrator of General Services, the Administrator shall forthwith transmit, with his certification thereof, exact copies of the proposed amendments to the legislatures of the several States.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

SEC. 13. (a) Amendments proposed by the convention pursuant to and in accordance with the provisions of this Act shall be valid for all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. Congress, in the resolution adopting the proposal, may set the time within which the proposal shall be inoperative unless ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

(b) Congress may not recall a proposed amendment after it has been submitted to the States by the Administrator of the General Services Administration.

SEC. 14. (a) For the purpose of ratifying proposed amendments pursuant to this Act the State legislatures shall adopt their own rules of procedure except that the acts of ratification shall be by convention or by State legislative action as the Congress may direct. All questions concerning the validity of State legislative procedure shall be determined by the legislatures and their decisions shall be binding on all others.

(b) Any State resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be valid without regard to whether it has been assented to by the Governor of the State.

SEC. 15. The secretary of state of the State, or if there be no such officer, the person who is charged by State law with such function, shall transmit a certified copy of the State resolution ratifying the proposed amendment or amendments to the Administrator of General Services.

SEC. 16. (a) Any state may rescind its ratification of a proposed amendment except that no state may rescind when there are existing valid ratifications by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

(b) Any State may ratify a proposed amendment even though it had previously rejected the same proposal.

(c) The Congress of the United States shall have the sole power of determining all questions relating to the ratification, rescission, or rejection of amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 17. The Administrator of General Services when three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States have adopted a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, shall issue a proclamation proclaiming the amendment to be a part of the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 18. An amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States shall be effective from the date on which the legislature of the last State necessary to constitute three-fourths of the legislatures of the United States, as provided for in article V, has ratified the same.

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL

HOUSE RESOLUTION*

To provide rules for the processing of State applications for a Federal Constitutional Convention in the House of Representatives.

Be it resolved in the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That—

(a) The Speaker of the House of Representatives shall refer each application submitted, pursuant to the Federal Constitutional Convention Act, to the House Committee on the Judiciary.

(b) Within sixty days after the commencement of each regular session of the Congress of the United States, the House Committee on the Judiciary shall report to the House concerning the applications received pursuant to the Federal Constitutional Convention Act during the preceding fifteen calendar years. The reports shall be printed in the Congressional Record and shall state—

(1) the total number of applications calling for a convention to propose a general revision of the Constitution,

(2) the total number of applications calling for conventions to propose specific amendments of a limited nature to the Constitution, together with the total number received with respect to each such amendment,

(3) the date of receipt of each application,

(4) the particular State applications, if any, on which states have taken rescinding action, and

(5) such other information as the committee considers appropriate.

SEC. 2. If, during a fifteen year period, applications are received from the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States and

(a) each application seeks the calling of a convention to propose an amendment generally revising the Constitution of the United States, or

(b) each application seeks the calling of a convention to propose an amendment of the same general nature as each other application,

the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives shall, and any other Member may, introduce a concurrent resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention within two years for the purpose sought in the applications.

SEC. 3. (a) Concurrent resolutions calling a convention shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee shall report on the resolution within thirty calendar days after its introduction. If it does not report the resolution before the expiration of thirty calendar days after its introduction, the committee shall be automatically discharged from all further consideration of the measure.

(b) When the committee has reported or has been discharged from further consideration of such a concurrent resolution, it shall, at any time thereafter, be in order for a Member to move to proceed for the immediate consideration of such resolution.

SEC. 4. (a) A concurrent resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention may be adopted by the affirmative vote of a majority of those present and voting.

(b) Except as otherwise provided in this resolution, the rules of the House of Representatives shall govern the conduct of the proceedings hereunder.

SEC. 5. If, prior to the passage by it of a concurrent resolution, the House of Representatives receives from the Senate a resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention for proposing the same amendment, it shall proceed to consider its own resolution and, if favorably acted upon, shall substitute and adopt the resolution of the Senate therefor with such amendment as it deems necessary to reflect its own action.

SEC. 6. Where no similar resolution with respect to such amendment as shall be received from the Senate has been introduced or referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the resolution from the Senate shall be treated in the same manner as concurrent resolutions under section 3.

*This draft is drawn to reflect changes in the Rules of the House of Representatives. A similar resolution would be needed to provide for Senate procedure. .

SEC. 7. Any Member may introduce a resolution to determine—

(a) whether the rescinding action of a State legislature has been timely made or is otherwise entitled to recognition under the provisions of the Federal Constitutional Convention Act, and

(b) whether a sufficient number of applications have been submitted as to require the introduction of a resolution calling for a constitutional convention.

CITATIONS

[1] Twenty-two amendments have been certified as part of the United States Constitution. Five amendments have been proposed by the Congress but have not been ratified by a sufficient number of States. They relate to (a) the apportionment of Representatives in the House (submitted 1789), (b) the compensation of Senators and Representatives (submitted to the States in 1789), (c) acceptance by United States citizens of foreign titles of nobility (submitted 1810), (d) a proposal relating to slavery (submitted in 1861) and (e) child labor (submitted in 1924) (U. S. Congress, House, 83d Cong., 1st sess., 1953, H. Doc. 211, pp 16–17).

[2] Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention (1937), II, 558. Madison posed these questions "How was a Convention to be formed? By what rule decide? What the force of its acts?"

[3] See Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433 (1939).

[4] Maryland, House Journal (1939), p. 899.

[5] Pennsylvania, Session Laws (1943), p. 922.

[6] In 1789 New York and Virginia sought a Constitutional Convention; see Table 1, appendix.

[7] 285 U. S. 355, 365 (1932).

[8] Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U. S. 221 (1920).

[9] Ibid., p. 227.

[10] Only two States had veto powers by the chief executive, Massachusetts and New York, Massachusetts Constitution (1780), ch. 2, sec. 1, Thorpe, American Charters Constitutions and Organic Laws, III, 1890; Laws of New York (1789), ch. 11.

[11] Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U. S. 221, 229 (1920).

[12] Cooley, Thomas M., A Treatise on Constitutional Limitations (8th ed.; 1927) I, 267.

[13] In re Speakership, 15 Col. 520 (1891).

[14] French v. Senate, 146 Cal. 604 (1905).

[15] People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481 (1865).

[16] 143 U. S. 649 (1892).

[17] Jameson, John A., A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions (4th ed.; 1887), p. 6.

[18] Ibid., p. 10.

[19] 183 Fed. 2d 201 (2d Cir. 1950), aff'd. 341 U. S. 494 (1951).

[20] 64 Stat. (1952), 671; 18 U. S. Code, § 11 et seq.

[21] Brief of petitioners before U. S. Supreme Court, p. 267, Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951)

[22] 183 Fed. 2d 201 (2d Cir., 1950).

[23] Ibid., p. 213.

[24] U. S. v. Dennis, 341 U. S. 494, 501 (1951).

[25] Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 (Rev. ed., 1937), I, 203.

[26] Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475 (U. S. 1866); see also on political, nonjusticiable questions Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States (1929), I, 307.

[27] Dillon v. Glass, 256 U. S. 368, 374 (1921).

[28] Orfield, Lester B., The Amending of the Federal Constitution, Chicago, Callahgan & Co. (1942), p. 42.

[29] Jameson, John A., A Treatise on Constitutional Conventions (4th ed.; 1887), p. 634.

[30] Alabama, 91 Congressional Record 6631; Arkansas, 91 Congressional Record 1309; Illinois, 98 Congressional Record 742; Iowa, 91 Congressional Record 2383; Kentucky, 97 Congressional Record 10973; Massachusetts, 98 Congressional Record 4641; Louisiana, 100 Congressional Record 9420; Maine, 99 Congressional Record 4311; Nebraska, 99 Congressional Record 6283; New Jersey, 100 Congressional Record 11943; Rhode Island, 95 Congressional Record 8286; Wisconsin, 91 Congressional Record 8286.

[31] U. S. Congress, 40th Cong., 2d sess., Congressional Globe, p. 4070.

[32] 15 Stat. 709, 710 (1868).

[33] Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 438 (1939).

[34] See F. W. Grinnell, Finality of State's Ratification of a Constitutional Amendment, 25 A. B. A. J. 192 (1926).

[35] See Table 3, appendix.

[36] See Table 6, appendix.

[37] See Table 3, appendix.

[38] See Tables 3 and 4, appendix.

[39] See Tables 3 and 4, appendix. Since it is the number of States rather than the number of petitions which is controlling, only one application from each State can be considered valid.

[40] Nevada, Cong. Rec. Daily, June 28, 1952, p. 8599; Montana, Cong. Rec. Daily, March 26, 1951, pp 2612–2614 (vetoed by Gov.); Massachusetts, Cong. Rec. Daily, March 4, 1952, p. 1611.

[41] 84 Cong. Rec. 3320 (1939).

[42] Texas, House Journal (1943), 48 Reg. Sess., pp. 2339, 2391; Texas, Senate Journal (1943), 48 Reg. Sess. pp. 1120-1121.

[43] See Tables 4 and 5, appendix.

[44] Tables 3, 4, and 5 should be read together.

[45] See table 1, appendix.

[46] Direct election of Senators, and prohibition of polygamy, table 2, appendix, items 1 and 2.

APPENDIX

TABLE 1.—State applications to Congress to call conventions to propose constitutional amendments (1787–1957)

State	Year	Passed House	Passed Senate	Source of reference	Amendment to be presented
Alabama	1833	(1)	(1)	23 Senate Journal 194	Against protective tariff.
Do	1943	June 24	July 1	89 Congressional Record 7523	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Arkansas	1901	Apr. 15	Apr. 16	45 Congressional Record 7113	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1903	Mar. 2	Feb. 27	(2)	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1911	Apr. 24	Apr. 28	(2)	Do.
Do	1943	Mar. 1	Mar. 2	98 Congressional Record 742	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
California	1903	Feb. 16	Feb. 24	(2)	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1909	Mar. 13	Mar. 18	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1911	Mar. 26	Mar. 18	47 Congressional Record 2000	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1935	June 16	June 14	79 Congressional Record 10814	Taxation of Federal and State securities.
Do	1935	do	do	79 Congressional Record 10814	Federal regulation of wages and hours of labor.
Do	1949	Mar. 24	Mar. 31	95 Congressional Record 4568	World federal government.
Do	1952	Apr. 1	do	98 Congressional Record 4003–4004	Distribution of proceeds of Federal taxes on gasoline.
Colorado	1901	Mar. 31	Jan. 17	35 Congressional Record 112; 45 Congressional Record 7113.	General, including direct election of Senators.
Connecticut	1915	Mar. 4	Mar. 11	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1949	May 13	May 3	95 Congressional Record 7689	World federal government.
Delaware	1907	Jan. 23	Feb. 1	41 Congressional Record 3011, 3591	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1943	Apr. 9	Mar. 25	89 Congressional Record 4017	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Florida	1943	May 19	May 26	89 Congressional Record 5090	World federal government.
Do	1945	Apr. 25	Apr. 26	Florida Journal (1945)	Do.
Do	1945	May 3	May 2	91 Congressional Record 4965	Treaty making.
Do	1949	May 6	May 9	95 Congressional Record 7000	World federal government.
Do	1951	Apr. 27	Apr. 20	97 Congressional Record 5155	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Georgia	1832	(1)	(1)	23 Senate Journal 65	General.
Do	1952	Jan. 21	Jan. 22	98 Congressional Record 1052	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1952	(1)	(1)	98 Congressional Record 1057	Treaty making.
Do	1955	Jan. 20	Jan. 21	101 Congressional Record 1532, 2086, 2274	State control of school systems.
Idaho	1901	Feb. 21	Feb. 14	35 Congressional Record 306; 45 Congressional Record 7114.	Direct election of President and Senators.
Do	1903	Mar. 3	Feb. 28	(2)	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1927	Mar. 1	Feb. 18	69 Congressional Record 455	Taxation of Federal and State securities.
Do	1957	(1)	(1)	Daily, Congressional Record, 4300	Revision of article V.
Illinois	1861	(1)	(1)	Laws of Illinois (1861) 281	General.
Do	1903	Apr. 9	Feb. 10	45 Congressional Record 7114	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1907	May 9	May 10	42 Congressional Record 164, 359	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1909	Apr. 1	Apr. 7	(2)	Do.
Do	1911	Feb. 24	May 11	47 Congressional Record, 1298	Control of trusts.
Do	1913	Mar. 12	Feb. 27	50 Congressional Record, 120–121	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1943	Mar. 17	Mar. 10	89 Congressional Record, 2516	Limitation of Presidential tenure.
Do	1943	May 5	May 26	98 Congressional Record, 742	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1953	(1)	(1)	99 Congressional Record 9864, 10052, 10623	Revision of article V.
Indiana	1861	(1)	(1)	Senate Journal, 420, 421, 36 Cong., 2d sess	General.
Do	1907	Feb. 26	Feb. 28	45 Congressional Record, 7114	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1943	Mar. 2	Mar. 6	98 Congressional Record, 1056	Limitation of Federal taxing power.

Do	1957	(1)	(1)	Daily Congressional Record, 5760–5761	Revision of article V.
Do	1957	(1)	(1)	Daily Congressional Record, 5761–5762	Treaty making.
Do	1957	(1)	(1)	Daily Congressional Record, 5762–5763	Reapportionment.
Do	1957	(1)	(1)	Daily Congressional Record, 5763–5764	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1957	(1)	(1)	Daily Congressional Record, 5764–5765	Balancing the budget.
Iowa	1904	Mar. 19	Mar. 9	38 Congressional Record, 4959	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1906	Apr. 3	Mar. 31	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1907	Feb. 28	Feb. 13	42 Congressional Record, 204, 895; 45 Congressional Record, 7114.	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1909	Apr. 3	Apr. 9	44 Congressional Record, 1620; 45 Congressional Record, 7114.	Do.
Do	1941	Feb. 17	Apr. 10	67 Congressional Record, 3172	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1943	Mar. 12	Mar. 16	89 Congressional Record, 2728	Limitation of Presidential tenure.
Do	1951	Mar. 28	Mar. 28	97 Congressional Record, 3939	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Kansas	1901	(1)	(1)	(2)	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1905	(1)	(1)	39 Congressional Record, 3466	Do.
Do	1907	Jan. 28	Feb. 5	41 Congressional Record, 2925, 2929, 3005, 3072	Do.
Do	1909	(1)	(1)	45 Congressional Record, 7114	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1951	(1)	(1)	97 Congressional Record, 2936	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Kentucky	1861	(1)	(1)	Senate Journal, 189, 190, 36 Cong., 2d sess	General.
Do	1902	Jan. 15	Jan. 17	45 Congressional Record, 7115	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1944	Mar. 8	Mar. 14	90 Congressional Record, 4040	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Louisiana	1907	Nov. 15	Nov. 20	42 Congressional Record 5906; 45 Congressional Record 7115.	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1916	May 31	May 30	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1920	May 26	June 23	60 Congressional Record 34	Popular ratification of amendments.
Do	1950	June 12	June 12	99 Congressional Record 320	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Maine	1907	Feb. 24	Feb. 21	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1911	Feb. 22	do	46 Congressional Record 4280, 4339	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1941	Apr. 17	Apr. 15	87 Congressional Record 3370	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1949	Apr. 1	Apr. 4	95 Congressional Record 4348	World federal government.
Do	1951	May 15	May 15	97 Congressional Record 6033	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Maryland	1908	Mar. 30	Mar. 26	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1914	Apr. 4	Mar. 17	(2)	Do.
Do	1939	(1)	(1)	84 Congressional Record, 3320	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Massachusetts	1931	Mar. 13	Mar. 10	75 Congressional Record 45	Repeal of 18th amendment.
Do	1941	Apr. 29	Apr. 24	87 Congressional Record 3812	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Michigan	1901	May 8	Apr. 9	35 Congressional Record 117, 293; 45 Congressional Record 7116.	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1913	Apr. 16	Apr. 21	50 Congressional Record 2290	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1941	May 16	Apr. 29	87 Congressional Record 3904	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1943	Mar. 16	Mar. 12	89 Congressional Record 2944	Limitation of Presidential tenure.
Do	1949	Apr. 7	Apr. 11	95 Congressional Record 5628	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1956	Mar. 22	Apr. 4	102 Congressional Record 7240, 7241, 7304	Revision of article V.
Minnesota	1901	Feb. 2	Jan. 31	34 Congressional Record 2560, 2615, 2680, 2796; 45 Congressional Record 7116.	Limited to direct election of Senators.
Do	1909	Apr. 2	Mar. 24	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1911	Mar. 1	Jan. 27	(2)	Direct election of Senators.
Mississippi	1940	Apr. 29	Apr. 29	86 Congressional Record 6025	Limitation of Federal taxing power.

See footnotes at end of table, p. 86.

TABLE 1.—State applications to Congress to call conventions to propose constitutional amendments (1787–1967)—Continued

State	Year	Passed House	Passed Senate	Source of reference	Amendment to be presented
Missouri	1901	Feb. 11	Mar. 8	(2)	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1903	Mar. 3	Mar. 13	(2)	Do.
Do	1905	Feb. 17	Mar. 14	40 Congressional Record 137	Do.
Do	1907	Feb. 27	Jan. 30	45 Congressional Record 7116	General convention.
Do	1913	Mar. 13	Mar. 21	50 Congressional Record 1796	Constitutionality of State enactments.
Montana	1901	Feb. 11	Feb. 19	35 Congressional Record 208	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1903	Feb. 20	Feb. 26	39 Congressional Record	Do.
Do	1905	Jan. 20	Jan. 27	39 Congressional Record 2447	Do.
Do	1907	(1)	(1)	45 Congressional Record 7116	Do.
Do	1909	Feb. 20	Feb. 11	42 Congressional Record 225, 712	Do.
Do	1911	Jan. 30	Jan. 12	46 Congressional Record 2411	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1911	Feb. 14	Feb. 27	47 Congressional Record 98	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1947	Feb. 10	Feb. 22	(2)	Limitation of Presidential tenure.
Nebraska	1893	Apr. 7	Mar. 30	(2)	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1901	Jan. 28	Feb. 19	35 Congressional Record 1779	Do.
Do	1903	Mar. 18	Mar. 11	45 Congressional Record 7116	Do.
Do	1907	Apr. 2	Mar. 8	(2)	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1911	Mar. 9	Feb. 24	47 Congressional Record 99	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1949	May 25		95 Congressional Record 7893	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Nevada	1901	Mar. 16	Mar. 16	35 Congressional Record, 112	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1901	Mar. 12	Mar. 6	(2)	Do.
Do	1903	Feb. 13	Feb. 20	37 Congressional Record 24	Do.
Do	1905	Feb. 18	Feb. 7	(2)	Do.
Do	1907	Feb. 15	Feb. 21	42 Congressional Record 163, 895	Do.
Do	1907	(1)	(1)	42 Congressional Record 163	General, including election of Senators.
Do	1925	Feb. 17	Feb. 18	67 Congressional Record 456	Repeal of 18th amendment.
New Hampshire	1911	Mar. 9	Mar. 7	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1943	Apr. 13	Apr. 21	89 Congressional Record 3761	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1951	Aug. 21	Aug. 21	97 Congressional Record 10716	Do.
New Jersey	1907	Apr. 12	Mar. 6	42 Congressional Record 164; 45 Congressional Record 7117.	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1932	Jan. 25	Jan. 12	75 Congressional Record 3299	Repeal of 18th amendment.
Do	1944	Mar. 27	Feb. 25	90 Congressional Record 6141	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1949	Mar. 31	Apr. 8	95 Congressional Record 4871	World federal government.
New Mexico	1951	Feb. 28	Mar. 10	98 Congressional Record 947	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
New York	1789	(1)	(1)	House Journal (1789) 29, 30	General.
Do	1906	Mar. 2	Mar. 1	40 Congressional Record 4581	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1931	Feb. 16	Mar. 18	75 Congressional Record 48	Repeal of 18th amendment.
North Carolina	1901	Mar. 11	Mar. 12	(2)	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1907	Feb. 25	Mar. 11	45 Congressional Record 7117	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1949	Apr. 11	Apr. 18	95 Congressional Record 6587	World federal government.
North Dakota	1903	Feb. 27	Feb. 25	(2)	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1907	(1)	(1)	41 Congressional Record 4633, 4672	Prohibition of polygamy.

Ohio	1861	(1)	(1)	58 Laws of Ohio (1861) 181	General.
Do	1908	Apr. 15	Apr. 28	House joint resolution	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1911	Mar. 6	Mar. 8	46 Congressional Record, 2413; 47 Congressional Record 660, 661.	Do.
Do	1911	Feb. 17	Mar. 7	47 Congressional Record 85, 114, 148, 690	Prohibition of polygamy.
Oklahoma	1908	(1)	(1)	42 Congressional Record 894; 45 Congressional Record 7117.	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1911	Feb. 8	Feb. 8	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1955	(1)	(1)	101 Congressional Record 9941	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Oregon	1901	Jan. 23	Jan. 25	34 Congressional Record 2290, 2354	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1901	Feb. 23	Feb. 23	35 Congressional Record 112, 117	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1908	Feb. 18	Feb. 16	36 Congressional Record 2597; 45 Congressional Record 7118.	Do.
Do	1903	Jan. 27	Jan. 26	45 Congressional Record 7118	Do.
Do	1907	Jan. 22	...do...	41 Congressional Record 2928, 3599	Do.
Do	1909	...do...	Jan. 19	43 Congressional Record 2065, 2071, 2075, 2115, 2116	Do.
Do	1913	Jan. 16	Jan. 15	49 Congressional Record 2463	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1930	Jan. 24	Jan. 24	84 Congressional Record 985	Townsend plan.
Pennsylvania	1901	Feb. 6	Feb. 5	34 Congressional Record 2245, 2289, 2493; 45 Congressional Record 7118.	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1907	May 1	May 1	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1913	Feb. 11	June 23	(2)	Do.
Do	1943	May 5	May 8	89 Congressional Record 3220	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1943	May 7	...do...	89 Congressional Record 3220	Prohibition of conditions in grants-in-aid.
Rhode Island	1790	(1)	(1)	House Journal 148, 1st and 2d Congs	Revision of Constitution.
Do	1940	Mar. 15	Feb. 16	86 Congressional Record 3407	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
South Carolina	1915	Feb. 15	Feb. 15	53 Congressional Record 2442	Prohibition of polygamy.
South Dakota	1901	Mar. 8	Mar. 7	34 Congressional Record 2440, 2493, 2558	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1907	Jan. 19	Jan. 31	41 Congressional Record 2492, 2497, 2621; 45 Congressional Record 7118.	Do.
Do	1909	Jan. 28	Feb. 4	43 Congressional Record 2067, 2070	Do.
Do	1909	...do...	...do...	43 Congressional Record 2070	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1953	Mar. 5	Feb. 20	99 Congressional Record 9180, 9181	Revision of article V.
Do	1955	Feb. 15	Feb. 15	101 Congressional Record 2840, 2861, 2862	Do.
Tennessee	1901	Jan. 18	Jan. 19	35 Congressional Record 2344, 2338, 2382, 2707	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1901	Mar. 20	Mar. 18	(2)	Do.
Do	1903	Mar. 9	Feb. 12	(2)	Do.
Do	1905	Mar. 14	Mar. 8	45 Congressional Record 7119	Do.
Do	1911	Feb. 16	Feb. 15	47 Congressional Record 187	Prohibition of polygamy.
Texas	1899	May 19	Feb. 22	33 Congressional Record 219, 280	General.
Do	1901	Mar. 12	Apr. 5	45 Congressional Record 7119	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1911	Feb. 15	Feb. 15	(2)	Do.
Do	1911	Feb. 13	Mar. 10	(2)	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1949	Jan. 20	Jan. 19	101 Congressional Record 2840	Tidelands problem.
Do	1949	Mar. 1	Feb. 1	101 Congressional Record 2840	Revision of article V.
Utah	1908	Mar. 6	Mar. 10	45 Congressional Record 7119	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1951	June 15	June 15	98 Congressional Record 947	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Vermont	1913	Dec. 13	Dec. 17	49 Congressional Record 1433, 2464	Prohibition of polygamy.
Virginia	1788	(1)	(1)	Annals of Congress 248	General.
Do	1861	(1)	(1)	Senate Journal 149	Do.
Do	1952	Feb. 5	Feb. 21	98 Congressional Record 1496	Limitation of Federal taxing power.

See footnotes at end of table, p. 88.

TABLE 1.—State applications to Congress to call conventions to propose constitutional amendments (1787–1957)—Continued

State	Year	Passed House	Passed Senate	Source of reference	Amendment to be presented
Washington	1901	Mar. 12	Mar. 12	(2)	General.
Do	1908	Feb. 19	Mar. 7	45 Congressional Record 7119; 46 Congressional Record 3035.	General, including direct election of Senators.
Do	1909	Feb. 24	Feb. 2	44 Congressional Record 50, 127; 46 Congressional Record 651.	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1910	(1)	(1)	46 Congressional Record 651	Do.
West Virginia	1907	Jan. 23	Jan. 22	(2)	Do.
Wisconsin	1903	Apr. 29	Apr. 16	37 Congressional Record 276	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1907	June 28	June 20	42 Congressional Record, 165	Do.
Do	1908	(1)	(1)	45 Congressional Record 7119, 7120	Do.
Do	1911	May 13	Apr. 17	47 Congressional Record 1842, 1866, 1873, 1875, 1876, 1948, 2000, 2188, 3087.	General.
Do	1913	Mar. 18	Mar. 11	50 Congressional Record 42, 117	Prohibition of polygamy.
Do	1929	May 27	Apr. 23	71 Congressional Record 2590	General.
Do	1931	Apr. 13	Apr. 17	75 Congressional Record 57	Repeal of eighteenth amendment.
Do	1943	May 7	June 14	89 Congressional Record 7524	Limitation of Federal taxing power.
Do	1943	June 4	June 15	89 Congressional Record 7524	Limitation of Presidential tenure.
Wyoming	1895	(1)	(1)	(2)	Direct election of Senators.
Do	1939	Feb. 10	Feb. 16	84 Congressional Record 1973	Limitation of Federal taxing power.

[1] Dates of passage of application in houses of legislature not obtainable.

[2] Listed in the following documents but not recorded in the Congressional Record: Federal Constitutional Conventions, S. Doc. 78, 71st Cong., 2d sess. (1930), William Russell Pullen, The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution (an unpublished dissertation), University of North Carolina, 1951, and House Judiciary Committee Staff Report, Problems Relating to State Applications For a Convention To Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates (1952).

RESCISSIONS.—A number of the applications listed in this tabulation have subsequently been rescinded by the States which filed them. Resolutions purporting to effect such rescissions have not been included herein.

TABLE 2.—State applications to Congress for constitutional conventions, listed by subject matter

1. Direct election of Senators (73 petitions submitted by 31 states):
Arkansas	1901
Do	1903
Do	1911
California	1903
Do	1911
Colorado [1]	1901
Idaho	1901
Do	1903
Illinois [1]	1903
Do	1907
Do	1909
Indiana	1907
Iowa	1904
Do.[1]	1907
Do.[1]	1909
Kansas [1]	1901
Do.[1]	1905
Do.[1]	1907
Do.[1]	1909
Kentucky	1902
Louisiana [1]	1907
Maine	1911
Michigan	1901
Minnesota	1901
Do	1911
Missouri	1901
Do	1903
Do	1905
Montana	1901
Do	1903
Do	1905
Do	1907
Do	1908
Do.[1]	1911
Nebraska	1893
Do	1901
Do	1903
Do.[1]	1907
Nevada	1901
Do	1901
Do	1903
Do	1905
Do	1907
Do.[1]	1907
New Jersey	1907
North Carolina	1901
Do.[1]	1907
North Dakota	1903
Ohio	1908
Do	1911
Oklahoma [1]	1908
Oregon [1]	1901
Do	1901
Do	1903
Do	1903
1. Direct election of Senators (73 petitions submitted by 31 states)—Continued
Oregon	1907
Do	1909
Pennsylvania	1901
South Dakota	1901
Do	1907
Do	1909
Tennessee	1901
Do	1901
Do	1903
Do	1905
Texas	1901
Do	1911
Utah	1903
Washington [1]	1903
Wisconsin	1903
Do	1907
Do	1908
Wyoming	1895
2. Limitation of Federal taxing power (32 petitions submitted by 27 States; see also tables 3, 4, and 5, this appendix):
Alabama	1943
Arkansas	1943
Delaware	1943
Florida	1951
Georgia	1952
Illinois	1943
Indiana	1943
Do	1957
Iowa	1941
Do	1951
Kansas	1951
Kentucky	1944
Louisiana	1950
Maine	1941
Do	1951
Maryland	1939
Massachusetts	1941
Michigan	1941
Do	1949
Mississippi	1940
Nebraska	1949
New Hampshire	1943
Do	1951
New Jersey	1944
New Mexico	1951
Oklahoma	1955
Pennsylvania	1943
Rhode Island	1940
Utah	1951
Virginia	1952
Wisconsin	1943
Wyoming	1939

See footnote at end of table, p. 91.

TABLE 2.—State applications to Congress for constitutional conventions, listed by subject matter—Continued

3. Prohibition of polygamy (30 petitions submitted by 27 States):
California	1909
Connecticut	1915
Delaware	1907
Illinois	1913
Iowa	1906
Louisiana	1916
Maine	1907
Maryland	1908
Do	1914
Michigan	1913
Minnesota	1909
Montana	1911
Nebraska	1911
New Hampshire	1911
New York	1906
North Dakota	1907
Ohio	1911
Oklahoma	1911
Oregon	1913
Pennsylvania	1907
Do	1913
South Carolina	1915
South Dakota	1909
Tennessee	1911
Texas	1911
Vermont	1912
Washington	1909
Do	1910
West Virginia	1907
Wisconsin	1913
4. General revision of Constitution (29 petitions submitted by 22 States):
Colorado [2]	1901
Georgia	1832
Illinois	1861
Do [2]	1903
Indiana	1861
Iowa [2]	1907
Do [2]	1909
Kansas [2]	1901
Do [2]	1905
Do [2]	1907
Kentucky	1861
Louisiana [2]	1907
Missouri	1907
Montana [2]	1911
Nebraska [2]	1907
Nevada [2]	1907
New York	1789
4. General revision of Constitution (29 petitions submitted by 22 States)—Continued
North Carolina [2]	1907
Ohio	1861
Oklahoma [2]	1908
Oregon [2]	1901
Texas	1899
Virginia	1788
Do	1861
Washington	1901
Do [2]	1903
Wisconsin	1911
Do	1929
5. World federal government (8 petitions from 6 States):
California	1949
Connecticut	1949
Florida	1943
Do	1945
Do	1949
Maine	1949
New Jersey	1949
North Carolina	1949
6. Repeal of 18th amendment (5 petitions from 5 States):
Massachusetts	1931
Nevada	1925
New Jersey	1932
New York	1931
Wisconsin	1931
7. Limitation of Presidential tenure (5 petitions from 5 States):
Illinois	1943
Iowa	1943
Michigan	1943
Montana	1947
Wisconsin	1943
8. Treaty making (3 petitions from 3 States):
Florida	1945
Georgia	1952
Indiana	1957
9. Taxation of Federal and State securities (2 petitions from 2 States):
California	1935
Idaho	1927
10. Against protective tariff (1 petition from 1 State):
Alabama	1833

See footnote at end of table, p. 90.

TABLE 2.—State applications to Congress for constitutional conventions, listed by subject matter—Continued

11. Federal regulation of wages and hours of labor (1 petition from 1 State):
    California 1935
12. Federal tax on gasoline (1 petition from 1 State):
    California 1952
13. Tidelands problem (1 petition from 1 State):
    Texas 1949
14. Control of trusts (1 petition from 1 State):
    Illinois 1911
15. Prohibitions on grants-in-aid (1 petition from 1 State):
    Pennsylvania 1943
16. Popular ratification of amendments (1 petition from 1 State):
    Louisiana 1920
17. Constitutionality of State enactments (1 petition from 1 State):
    Missouri 1913
18. Townsend plan (1 petition from 1 State):
    Oregon 1939
19. Revision of art. V (7 petitions from 6 States):
    Idaho 1957
    Illinois 1953
    Indiana 1957
    Michigan 1956
    South Dakota 1953
    Do 1955
    Texas 1955
20. Reapportionment (1 petition from 1 State):
    Indiana 1957
21. Balancing the budget (1 petition from 1 State):
    Indiana 1957
22. Distribution of proceeds of Federal taxes on gasoline (1 petition from 1 State):
    California 1952
23. State control of schools (1 petition from 1 State):
    Georgia 1955

[1] Petition also called for general revision of Constitution.
[2] Petition also called for direct election of Senators.

TABLE 3.—State' applications to Congress seeking

State	Petitions
	Resolution No.	Passed			Committee referred to	Congressional Record citation	Nature†
		Year	Upper chamber	Lower chamber
Alabama	H. J. Res. 66	1943	July 1	June 24	H. Judiciary S. Judiciary	89 Congressional Record, pp. 7523–7524.	A
Arkansas	S. Con. Res. 10.	1943	Mar. 2	Mar. 1	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record, p. 742.	C
Delaware	S. Con. Res. 6	1943	Mar. 25	Apr. 9	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	89 Congressional Record, p. 4017.	C
Florida	S. Con. Res. 206.	1951	Apr. 20	Apr. 27	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	97 Congressional Record, pp. 5155–5156.	A*
Georgia	H. Res. 218	1952	Jan. 22	Jan. 21	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record, p. 1057.	A*
Illinois	H. J. Res. 32	1943	May 26	May 5	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record, p. 742.	A
Indiana	H. Con. Res. 10.	1943	Mar. 6	Mar. 2	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record, pp. 1056–1057.	C
	H. Con. Res. 8.	1957	.....	.....	S. Judiciary	Daily, May 8, 1957. pp. 5763, 5764.
Iowa	H. Con. Res. 15.	1941	Apr. 10	Feb. 17	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	87 Congressional Record, p. 3172; 3232–3233.	C
	S. Con. Res. 11.	1951	Mar. 26	Mar. 28	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	97 Congressional Record, pp. 3939–3940.	D
Kansas	S. Con. Res. 4	1951	Feb. 15	Mar. 21	H. Ways and Means. S. Judiciary	97 Congressional Record, p. 2936.	A
Kentucky	H. Con. Res. 79.	1944	Mar. 14	Mar. 8	S. Judiciary	90 Congressional Record, pp. 4040–4041.	A
Louisiana	H. Res. 24	1950	June 12	June 12	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	99 Congressional Record, pp. 320–321.	A
Maine	J. Res	1941	Apr. 15	Apr. 17	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	87 Congressional Record, pp. 3370–3371.	A
	J. Res	1951	May 15	May 15	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	97 Congressional Record, pp. 6033–6034.	D
Maryland [1]
Massachusetts	S. 656	1941	Apr. 24	Apr. 29	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	87 Congressional Record, pp. 3812–3813.	A
Michigan	S. Con. Res. 20.	1941	Apr. 29	May 16	S. Finance H. Judiciary	87 Congressional Record, p. 8904.	A
	H. Con. Res. 26.	1949	Apr. 11	Apr. 7	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	95 Congressional Record, pp. 5628–5629.	D
Mississippi	S. Con. Res. 14.	1940	Apr. 29	Apr. 29	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	86 Congressional Record, p. 6025.	C*
Nebraska	Leg. Res. 32	1949	Uni-cameral	May 25	S. Judiciary	95 Congressional Record, pp. 7893–7894.	D
New Hampshire	H. Con. Res.	1943	Apr. 21	Apr. 13	S. Finance	89 Congressional Record, pp. 3761–3762.	C
	H. Con. Res.	1951	Aug. 21	Aug. 21	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	97 Congressional Record, pp. 10716–10717.	D
New Jersey	J. Res. 5	1944	Feb. 25	Mar. 27	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	90 Congressional Record, p. 6141.	B
New Mexico	H. J. Res. 12	1951	Mar. 10	Feb. 28	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record, pp. 947–948.	D
Oklahoma	S. J. Res. 15	1955	May 11	May 23	H. Ways and Means.	101 Congressional Record p. 8397–8398, 8776, 9941.	E

See footnotes at end of table, pp. 94–95.

convention to limit federal income taxing powers

Rescissions
Resolution No.	Passed			Committee referred to	Congressional Record citation	Nature
	Year	Upper chamber	Lower chamber
H. J. Res. 10	1945	June 13	June 6	H. Judiciary	91 Congressional Record, pp. 6631-6632.	Rescinds prior action of legislature.
H. Con. Res. 3	1945	Feb. 9	Jan. 16	S. Finance	91 Congressional Record, p. 1209.	Res. 3 rescinds prior resolution.
H. Con. Res. 896.	1953	May 4	May 4			H. Con. Res. 896—never transmitted to Congress.[3]
H. J. Res. 7	1945	Mar. 28	Mar. 13	S. Judiciary [2]H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record, p. 742.	Expresses opposition to application and intent of prior resolution.
H. Con. Res. 9.	1945	Mar. 14	Feb. 14	S. Judiciary	91 Congressional Record, pp. 2383-2384.	Rescinds H. Con. Res. 15 (1941), and opposes amending Constitution re income taxes.
S. Res. 43	1946	Mar. 13	Mar. 21	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	97 Congressional Record, p. 10973.	H. Res. 79 is repudiated, retracted, and withdrawn.
S. Con. Res. 15.	1954	June 23	June 24	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	100 Congressional Record, p. 9420.	Rescinds H. Con. Res. 24.
J. Res	1953	Apr. 22	Apr. 21	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	99 Congressional Record, pp. 4211, 4434.	Rescinds J. Res. of 1941.
Res	1952	Apr. 22	Apr. 3	H. Judiciary S. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record, p. 4641.	Rescinds S. 688 (1941).
Leg. Res. 27	1953	Unicameral	June 2	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	99 Congressional Record, pp. 6168, 6283.	Rescinds Leg. Res. 22.
S. J. Res. 4	1954	May 3	June 26	S. Judiciary; H. Judiciary	100 Congressional Record, p. 11943.	Rescinds J. Res. 5.

TABLE 3.—State applications to Congress seeking

State	Petitions				Committee referred to	Congressional Record citation	Nature†
	Resolution No.	Passed
		Year	Upper chamber	Lower chamber
Pennsylvania	Con. Res. 7	1943	May 8	May 5	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	89 Congressional Record p. 8220.	C (Vetoed 6-7-43)
Rhode Island	S. 80	1940	Feb. 16	Mar. 15	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	86 Congressional Record p. 3407.	A
Utah	H. J. Res. 3	1951	June 15	June 15	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record p. 947.	A
Virginia	H. J. Res. 32	1952	Feb. 21	Feb. 5	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	98 Congressional Record p. 1496.	A°
Wisconsin	J. Res. 55, A	1943	June 14	May 7	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	89 Congressional Record p. 7524.	A
Wyoming	H. J. Mem. 4	1939	Feb. 16	Feb. 10	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	84 Congressional Record pp. 1973; 2509–2510.	C°

[1] The House of Delegates of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland adopted a resolution requesting that Congress call a constitutional convention to limit the maximum rate of taxation to 25 percent on March 15, 1939. Despite the fact that only one chamber of the legislature had adopted the proposal, the

† EXPLANAT

A—Petitions make application for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment which would repeal the sixteenth amendment and place a maximum limitation on the rate of Federal taxation of incomes, inheritances, and gifts of 25 percent; provided, however, that in case of war the limitation may be lifted for yearly periods by a three-fourths vote of each House of Congress.

A°—Petitions are identical with A petitions save only that the limitation on rates of taxation in the proposed amendment is automatically suspended during a state of war declared by Congress and may be increased for yearly periods in time of grave national emergency by a three-fourths vote of each House of Congress.

B—Petitions make application for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment which would repeal the sixteenth amendment and place a maximum limitation on the rate of Federal taxation on incomes, gifts, and inheritances of 25 percent, except that in time of war the limitation on the taxation of incomes may be suspended for yearly periods by a vote of three-fourths of each House of Congress.

C—Petitions make application for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment which would repeal the sixteenth amendment and place a maximum limitation of 25 percent on the rate of taxation of incomes, gifts, and inheritances.

C°—Petitions identical with C petitions except for the omission of a single section relating to the effective date of a provision and the following clause in the proposed amendment: "Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 2, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect."

D—Petitions make application for a constitutional convention to propose an amendment which would convention to limit Federal income taxing powers—Continued

Rescissions
Resolution No.	Passed			Committee referred to	Congressional Record citation	Nature
	Year	Upper chamber	Lower chamber
H. Res. 548...	1949	Apr. 27	Mar. 30	S. Judiciary	95 Congressional Record p. 3286.	Repeals prior resolution.
J. Res. 11, A...	1945	Feb. 20	Feb. 14	S. Judiciary H. Judiciary	91 Congressional Record p. 3266.	Rescinds prior resolution.

petition was forwarded to Congress and referred to the Senate Finance Committee and the House Judiciary Committee (84 Congressional Record 3320 (1939)).

[3] Florida's rescinding resolution has not been transmitted to Congress.

ORY NOTES

place limitations on the Federal power of taxation, except during a state of war and except when the legislatures of three-fourths of the States otherwise provide, as follows:

(1) 25 percent of all taxes collected by the United States and all moneys collected in taxes in excess of 50 percent of personal income and 38 percent of corporate income shall be placed respectively in two separate funds after 20 percent of such sums shall have first been used to make payments on the principal of the national debt.

(2) Moneys from the two separate funds shall be annually divided pro rata among the several States as specified.

(3) A minimum deduction of $600 for each dependent and for each person reporting a separate income shall be allowed in levying income taxes.

The proposed amendment contained in these petitions provides also:

(1) That the number of new States which may be formed from the Territories and possessions of the United States shall be limited to three except upon the express consent of the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

(2) That the dollar shall be the unit of currency.

(3) That the gold content of the dollar as of January 1, 1949, shall not be decreased.

E—Petition seeks, in the alternative, a convention to shift some of the taxing power from the Federal Government to the States and their subdivisions so as to bring about less reliance upon Federal grants in aid for State and local functions.

TABLE 4.—Present status of State applications submitted requesting a constitutional convention to propose amendments limiting the Federal power of taxation [a]

Applications for convention pending	Applications rescinded	Applications otherwise ineffective
Delaware.	Alabama.	Indiana [b].
Florida.	Arkansas.	Michigan [b].
Georgia.	Illinois.	New Hampshire [b].
Indiana [b].	Iowa.	Maryland [c].
Iowa.	Kentucky.
Kansas.	Louisiana.
Maine.	Maine.
Michigan [b].	Massachusetts.
Mississippi.	Nebraska.
New Hampshire [b].	New Jersey.
New Mexico.	Rhode Island.
Oklahoma.	Wisconsin.
Pennsylvania.
Utah.
Virginia.
Wyoming.

[a] Submitted since 1939.
[b] State submitted 2 applications only, 1 of which should be considered as validly pending.
[c] Adopted by only 1 house of the State legislature.

TABLE 5.—Chronological sequence of the actions of the State legislatures relating to limiting the taxing powers of the Federal Government

Year	Legislatures passing resolutions	Legislatures rescinding resolutions	Year	Legislatures passing resolutions	Legislatures rescinding resolutions
1939	Wyoming.	None.	1948	None.	Kentucky.
1940	Mississippi.	None.	1949	Michigan.	Rhode Island.
	Rhode Island.			Nebraska.
1941	Iowa.	None.	1950	Louisiana.	None.
	Maine.		1951	Florida.	None.
	Massachusetts.[a]			Iowa.
	Michigan.			Kansas.
1943	Alabama.	None.		Maine.
	Arkansas.			New Hampshire.
	Delaware.			New Mexico.
	Illinois.			Utah.
	Indiana.		1952	Georgia.	Massachusetts.
	New Hampshire.			Virginia.
	Pennsylvania.		1953	None.	Maine.
	Wisconsin.				Nebraska.
1944	Kentucky.	None.	1954	None.	Louisiana.
	New Jersey.				New Jersey.
1945	None.	Alabama.	1955	Oklahoma.	None.
		Arkansas.	1957	Indiana.	None.
		Illinois.
		Iowa.
		Wisconsin.

TABLE 6†

TYPES OF AMENDMENTS CONTAINED IN APPLICATIONS SUBMITTED BY THE SEVERAL STATES RELATING TO AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION SO AS TO LIMIT THE FEDERAL POWER OF TAXATION

TYPE A

SECTION 1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration: Provided, That in no case shall the maximum rate of tax exceed 25 per centum.

SECTION 3. The maximum rate of any tax, duty, or excise which Congress may lay and collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift, shall in no case exceed 25 per centum.

SECTION 4. The limitations upon the rates of said taxes contained in sections 2 and 3 shall, however, be subject to the qualification that in the event of a war in which the United States is engaged creating a grave national emergency requiring such action to avoid national disaster, the Congress by a vote of three-fourths of each House may for a period not exceeding 1 year increase beyond the limits above prescribed the maximum rate of any such tax upon income subsequently accruing or received or with respect to subsequent devolutions or transfers of property, with like power, while the United States is actively engaged in such war, to repeat such action as often as such emergency may require.

SECTION 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on incomes for any period ending on or prior to said 31st day of December laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

SECTION 6. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight on the last day of the sixth month following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

(Contained in resolutions of the States of Alabama, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Rhode Island, Utah, Wisconsin.)

TYPE A*

Same as type A, differing only in that the limitation on taxation is automatically suspended during a war declared by Congress, and Congress, during a period of national emergency, may likewise suspend the limitation for yearly periods by a vote of three-fourths of each House.

(Contained in resolutions of the States of Florida, Georgia, and Virginia.)

TYPE B

SECTION 1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration. The maximum aggregate rate of all taxes, duties, and excises which the Congress may lay or collect on, with respect to, or measured by income, however, shall not exceed 25 per centum. In the event that the United States shall be engaged in a war which creates a national emergency so grave as to necessitate such action to avoid national disaster, the Congress by a vote of three-fourths of each House, may while the United States is so engaged, suspend, for periods not exceeding 1 year each, such limitation with respect to income subsequently accruing or received.

SECTION 3. The maximum aggregate rate of all taxes, duties, and excises which the Congress may lay or collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift, shall not exceed 25 per centum.

† Table 6, as revised in this thesis, is from table set out on pp. 24–27 of House Judiciary Committee Staff Report: "Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention To Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates" (1952).

SECTION 4. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December following the ratification of the article. Nothing contained in the article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on, with respect to, or measured by, income for any period ending on or prior to said 31st day of December laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

SECTION 5. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight on the last day of the sixth month following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax with respect to any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

(Contained in resolution of the State of New Jersey.)

TYPE C

SECTION 1. The sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration; Provided, That in no case shall the maximum rate of tax exceed 25 per centum.

SECTION 3. The maximum rate of any tax, duty, or excise which Congress may lay and collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of death or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift, shall in no case exceed 25 per centum.

SECTION 4. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December, following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

SECTION 5. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight on the last day of the sixth month following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3 laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

(Contained in resolutions of the States of Arkansas, Delaware, Indiana, Iowa, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania.)

TYPE C*

Identical with type C, except that section 5 is omitted and section 4 does not contain the sentence: "Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect."

(Contained in resolutions of the States of Mississippi and Wyoming.)

TYPE D

SECTION 1. The power to levy taxes and appropriate the revenues therefrom heretofore granted to the Congress by the States in the several articles of this constitution is hereby limited.

SECTION 2. This article shall be in effect except during a state of war, hereafter declared, when it shall be suspended. The suspension thereof shall end upon the termination of the war but not later than 3 months after the cessation of hostilities, whichever shall be earlier. The cessation of hostilities may be declared by proclamation of the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress or by concurrent action of the legislatures of 32 States.

SECTION 3. Notwithstanding the provisions of article V, this article may be suspended for a time certain or amended at any time by concurrent action of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

SECTION 4. There shall be set aside in the Treasury of the United States a separate fund into which shall be paid 25 percent of all taxes collected by authority derived from the sixteenth amendment to this Constitution, except as provided in section 5, and 25 percent of all sums collected by the United States from any other tax levied for revenue.

SECTION 5. There shall be set aside in the Treasury of the United States a separate fund into which shall be paid all sums received from taxes levied on personal incomes in excess of 50 percent thereof and from taxes levied on income or profits of corporations in excess of 38 percent thereof.

SECTION 6. Before paying any sums into the funds created by sections 4 and 5 hereof, the Treasurer of the United States shall deduct therefrom 20 percent which shall be used in payment of the principal of the national debt of the United States.

SECTION 7. No tax shall hereafter be imposed on that portion of the incomes of individuals which does not exceed, in the case of unmarried persons, the sum of $600 per annum, and in the case of married persons the sum of $1,200 per annum jointly. A minimum deduction of $600 per annum shall be allowed for each dependent.

SECTION 8. The Treasurer of the United States shall once in each year, from the separate fund created by section 4 hereof, pay to each of the several States ¼ of 1 percent of said fund and from the remainder of said fund shall pay to each State a portion of such remainder determined by the population of each State in ratio to the entire population of the several States according to the last Federal decennial census or any subsequent general census authorized by law.

SECTION 9. The Treasurer of the United States shall, from the separate fund created by section 5 hereof, pay to each State, once in each year, a sum equal to the amount of money in such fund which was collected from persons or corporations within such State.

SECTION 10. Any sums paid hereunder to the several States shall be available for appropriation only by the legislatures thereof. The legislatures may appropriate therefrom for any purpose not forbidden by the constitutions of the respective States and may appropriate therefrom for expenditures within the States for any purpose for which appropriations have heretofore been made by the Congress except such purposes as are specifically reserved by this Constitution for the exclusive power of the Congress. The people of each State may limit the expenditures of funds herein made available to the legislature, but shall not direct the appropriation thereof.

SECTION 11. Each legislature shall have power by rule or resolution to provide for the assembly thereof in special sessions for the purpose of considering amendments to, the suspension of, or the ratification of amendments proposed to this article.

SECTION 12. Each legislature shall have power to elect one or more persons to represent such legislature in any council or convention of States created by concurrent action of the legislatures of 32 States for the purpose of obtaining uniform action by the legislatures of the several States in any matters connected with the amendment of this article.

SECTION 13. The Congress shall not create, admit, or form new States from the territory of the several States as constituted on the 1st day of January 1949, and shall not create, form, or admit more than three States from the Territories and insular possessions under the jurisdiction of the United States on the 1st day of January 1949, or from territory thereafter acquired without the express consent of the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

SECTION 14. On and after January 1, 1949, the dollar shall be the unit of the currency. The gold content of the dollar as fixed on January 1, 1949, shall not be decreased.

SECTION 15. Concurrent action of the legislatures of the several States as used herein shall mean the adoption of the same resolution by the required number of legislatures. A limit of time may be fixed by such resolution within which such concurrent action shall be taken. No legislature shall revoke the affirmative action of a preceding legislature taken therein.

SECTION 16. During any period when this article is in effect the Congress may, by concurrent resolution adopted by two-thirds of both Houses wherein declaration is made that additional funds are necessary for the defense of the Nation, limit the amount of money required by this article to be returned to the several States. Such limitation shall continue until terminated by the Congress or by concurrent action of a majority of the legislatures of the several States. Upon termination of any such limitation the Congress may not thereafter impose a limitation without the express consent by concurrent action of a majority of the legislatures of the several States.

SECTION 17. This article is declared to be self-executing.

(Contained in resolutions of the States of Iowa, Maine, Michigan, Nebraska, New Hampshire, and New Mexico.)

TYPE E

SECTION 1. That sound public tax policy requires greater reliance upon State and local sources of revenue for necessary State and local improvements, with less dependence upon Federal appropriations, and the lower Federal taxes which such a policy will make possible.

SECTION 2. That Federal participation in the cost of State and local improvements (in which the Federal Government may have a legitimate interest) would be continued automatically, as long as State and local taxes paid by each taxpayer are deductible in computing the Federal income tax, and that this form of Federal assistance is preferable to outright grants-in-aid, with their accompanying Federal controls and additional costs.

SECTION 3. That such a shift in tax policy can only be instituted and accomplished by action of the Congress, followed by corresponding State and local action, rather than the other way around.

SECTION 4. That the Congress of the United States is therefore respectfully petitioned to institute such a fiscal policy, restudying the financial relationship of the three levels of Government so as to bring about less reliance upon Federal grants-in-aid for traditionally State and local functions of government, and to take appropriate action either to submit a constitutional amendment limiting the taxing powers of Congress (except in time of war or grave national emergency) or to call a constitutional convention for such purpose.

(Contained in resolution from the State of Oklahoma.)

TABLE 7.—State constitutional conventions [a]

State	Number of conventions [1]	Procedure for calling a convention [2]		Popular ratification (convention proposals)
		Vote in legislature	Referendum vote
Alabama	6	Majority members elected	Majority voting at election.	No provision.
Arizona	1	Majority vote	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote on proposals.
Arkansas	6
California		⅔ members elected	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote cast at special election.
Colorado	1	⅔ members elected	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote at election which may be special election.
Connecticut	2
Delaware	5	⅔ members elected	Majority vote on question.	No provision.
Florida	5	⅔ all members	Majority vote on question.	No provision.
Georgia	12	⅔ all members	No referendum	Majority vote on proposals in state as a whole and majority vote of local electors in subdivision affected.
Idaho	1	⅔ members elected	Majority of electors voting in next general election.	"Adopted by people."
Illinois	5	⅔ each house	Majority voting at next general election.	Majority vote at special election.
Indiana	2
Iowa	3	Question mandatory every 10 years beginning 1870; legislature may provide for submission of question.	Majority voting on the question.	No provision.
Kansas	4	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at next general election.	No provision.
Kentucky	6	Majority members elected, 2 successive sessions.	Majority vote on question at least ¼ qualified voters at last election.	No provision.
Louisiana	10	No constitutional provision; practice is proposal by legislature, approved by referendum vote.	No constitutional provision; practice is proposal by legislature, approved by referendum vote.
Maine	1	⅔ both houses		No provision.
Maryland	4	Question mandatory every 20 years beginning 1930.	Majority voting at election.	Majority vote on proposals.
Massachusetts	5	No constitutional provision; but legislature has submitted question of calling convention to people under its general powers.	Majority voting on question.
Michigan	[3] 5	Question mandatory every 16 years beginning 1926.	Majority voting at election.	Majority vote on proposals.
Minnesota	1	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at election.	No provision.
Mississippi	7
Missouri	6	Question mandatory every 20 years.	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote on proposals.
Montana	1	⅔ members elected	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote at elections.
Nebraska	4	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at election.	Majority vote on proposals.
Nevada	2	⅔ members elected	Majority voters at election.	No provision.
New Hampshire	[1] 14	Question mandatory every 7 years.	Majority voting in town meetings.	⅔ voting in same town meetings.
New Jersey	4
New Mexico	1	⅔ members elected	Majority vote on question.	"Ratified by people
New York	8	Majority of legislature. Question mandatory every 20 years beginning in 1957.	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote on proposals.
North Carolina	6	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at election.	No provision.
North Dakota	1

See footnotes at end of table, p. 102.

TABLE 7.—State constitutional conventions—Continued

State	Number of conventions [1]	Procedure for calling a convention [2]		Popular ratification (convention proposals)
		Vote in legislature	Referendum vote
Ohio	4	⅗ members elected. Question mandatory every 20 years beginning 1932.	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote on proposals.
Oklahoma		Majority vote of legislature. Question mandatory every 20 years beginning 1907.	Majority vote on question.	Majority vote on proposals.
Oregon	2	Majority of Legislature or initiative petition of 8 percent of legal voters.	Majority vote on question.	No provision.
Pennsylvania	[3] 5 (n)
Rhode Island	6	Majority votes of legislature.	Majority votes on question.	According to terms of act calling convention.
South Carolina	7	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at election.	No provision.
South Dakota	1	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at election.	No provision.
Tennessee	4	Majority members elected.	Majority voting on question.	No provision.
Texas	5
Utah	1	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at next general election.	Majority vote at next general election.
Vermont	11
Virginia	[4] 9	Majority members elected.	Majority vote on question.	No provision.
Washington	1	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at election.	"Adopted by people."
West Virginia	2	Majority members elected.	Majority voting at election which can be a special election.	"Ratified by voters."
Wisconsin	1	Majority of legislature	Majority vote on question.	No provision.
Wyoming	1	⅔ members elected	Majority voting at next general election.	"Adopted by people."
Guam
Hawaii	1	Question mandatory every 10 years.	Majority voting at election.[5]	Majority vote on proposals.[5]
Puerto Rico	1
Virgin Islands

[1] Source: The Book of the States, 1954–55, vol. X. Council of State Governments, Chicago.

[2] For dates of conventions and action taken at each, see The Book of the States, 1941–42, pp. 48–55, and subsequent volumes. Constitutional conventions for the purpose of proposing amendments were held in New Hampshire in 1930, 1938, 1941 and 1948. In New Hampshire eight proposed amendments were drafted by the Limited Constitutional Convention meeting April–July, 1953. They will be submitted to the people on November 3, 1953, and a majority of those voting will be sufficient to ratify each of the eight proposals. A single amendment to Virginia's constitution was effected by a convention on May 2, 1945.

[3] In the states which make no provision for revision or amendment by constitutional convention, it appears that such conventions have been held permissible as an inherent right of the people acting through elected representatives.

[4] One of these was not a convention, but a special constitutional commission appointed by the Governor, under authority of an act of the legislature.

[5] Majority vote must constitute 35 percent of total vote cast at general election, or of registered voters at special election.

Present Federal Procedure for Transmitting Proposed Constitutional Amendments to the States for Ratification

Originally, Revised Statute 205 contained the procedure for transmitting resolutions containing constitutional amendments to States. By its authority, the State Department performed this function.

In 1950, however, Reorganization Plan No. 20 (5 U. S. C. 133z), effective May 24, 1950, transferred the functions to the General Services Administration.

In 1951, Congress enacted section 106b of title 1, United States Code, which repealed Revised Statute 205 and reflected the changes brought about by Reorganization Plan No. 20 of 1950.

The following procedure is not wholly statutory. It has been developed through the years:

(1) When Congress adopts a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment, certified copies are sent to the General Services Administration.

(2) The General Services Administration transmits copies of the resolution with covering letter, to the Governors asking them to advise the State legislatures. Receipt acknowledgment is obtained from the Governors.

(3) When the State legislature approves or disapproves a proposed amendment, General Services Administration receives notification either from (a) the Governor, or (b) the State legislature.

(4) When it is evident that nearly three-fourths of the States have ratified a proposed amendment, General Services Administration keeps in constant touch with the remaining States, especially those whose legislatures are in session.

(5) When the legislatures of three-fourths of the States have ratified a proposed amendment, the Administrator of General Services issues a proclamation declaring the proposal to be officially part of the United States Constitution.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

BOOKS AND TREATISES

Acton, Lord. The Cambridge Modern History. 13 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1934.

Allen, Florence E. The Treaty as an Instrument of Legislation. New York: Macmillan Co., 1952.

Beal, Edward. Cardinal Rules of Legal Interpretation. 3d ed. London: Randall, Stevens & Sons, Ltd., 1924.

Beard, Charles A. The Supreme Court and the Constitution. The Paisley Press, Inc., 1938.

Beck, J. M. The Constitution of the United States. London: Oxford University Press, 1924.

Bishop, William G., and Attree, William H. Report of the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention for the Revision of the Constitution of the State of New York. Albany: Evening Atlas, 1846.

Black, Henry Campbell. Handbook on the Construction and Interpretation of Laws. 2d ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co., 1914.

Black, William H. Our Unknown Constitution. Real Book Co., 1933.

Borgeaud, Charles. Adoption and Amendment of Constitutions in Europe and America. Translation by Hagen, 1895.

Bradley, Charles S. The Methods of Changing the Constitutions of the States Especially That of Rhode Island. Boston: A. Mudge & Son, 1885.

Bricker, John W., U. N. Blueprint for Tyranny. The Freeman, 1952.

Brierly, James L. The Law of Nations. 4th ed. London: Oxford University Press, 1949.

Brown, Everett S. Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States (1947–1953). Ann Arbor, Michigan, Geo. Wahr Publishing Co. (1953).

Brown, W. Jethro. The Austinian Theory of Law. London: John Murray, Albemarle Street, 1906.

Burdick, Charles K. The Law of the American Constitution: Its Origin and Development. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1922.

Burgess, John W. Political Science and Comparative Constitutional Law. 2 vols. London: Ginn & Co., 1891.

Burton, Theodore E. The Constitution of the United States: Its Origin and Distinctive Features. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1923.

Cahn, Edmond N. Supreme Court and Supreme Law, Indiana Univ. Press, Bloomington, 1954.

Calderon, J. Gonsales. Derecho Constitucional Argentino. 3 vols. Buenos Aires: 1923–26.

Carter, Nathaniel, and Stone, William H. Debates of the 1821 Convention. New York: Privately printed.

Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. How Human Rights Got Into the Constitution. Boston University Press, 1952.

Chafee, Zechariah, Stop Being Terrified of Treaties: Stop Being Scared of the Constitution, 38 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 731, 1952.

Chester, Alden. Courts and Lawyers of New York. New York: 1925.

Cooley, Thomas M. General Principles of Constitutional Law. 3d ed. Boston: 1898.

Cooley, Thomas M. A Treatise on Constitutional Limitations. 8th ed. 2 vols. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1927.

Corwin, Edward S. The Constitution and What it Means Today. Princeton University Press, 1947.

Corwin, Edward S. The Constitution and World Organization. Princeton University Press, 1944.

Crawford, Earl T. The Construction of Statutes. St. Louis: Thomas Law Book Co., 1940.

Crosskey, William Winslow. Politics and the Constitution. 2 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953.

Curtis, George T. Constitutional History of the United States. 2 vols. 1859.
Curtis, George T. History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States. 2 vols. New York: Harper & Bros., 1859.
Dicey, A. V. Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution. 8th ed. London: Macmillan Co., Ltd., 1923.
Dicey, A. V. The Law and the Constitution. 7th ed. London: Macmillan Co., Ltd., 1908.
Dodd, Walter Fairleigh. Modern Constitutions. 2 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1909.
Dodd, Walter Fairleigh. The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions. Johns Hopkins Press, 1910.
Dougherty, J. Hampton. Constitutional History of New York State. New York: 1915.
Elliott, Jonothan. Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution as Recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia in 1787. (1937 facsimile of 1836 ed.) 5 vols. 2d ed. J. B. Lippincott Co., 1937.
Farrand, Max. The Records of the Federal Convention in 1787. Revised ed. 4 vols. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1937.
Ferguson, Charles. The Revolution Absolute. Dodd, Mead & Co. 1915.
Flick, Alexander C. The History of the State of New York (1933–1937). 10 vols. New York: 1938.
Foster, Roger. Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. Boston Book Co., 1895.
Frank, John P., "Political Questions" set out in Supreme Court and Supreme Law, edited by Edmond N. Cahn, Indiana Univ. Press, Bloomington (1954).
Grant, U. S. Personal Memoirs of U. S. Grant (1885). 2 vols. New York: C. L. Webster & Co., 1894.
Graves, W. B. American State Government. 3d ed. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co., 1946.
Hoar, Roger Sherman. Constitutional Conventions: Their Nature, Powers, and Limitations. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1917.
Holman, Frank E. Treaty Law-Making: A Blank Check for Writing a New Constitution, 36 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ., 1950.
Hinds, Asher C. Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States. 11 Vols. Washington, Government Printing Office, 1907.
Hook, Sidney, Heresy, Yes—Conspiracy, No, New York, The John Day Co., 1951.
Hunter, Robert. Revolution: Why, How, When? New York: Harper & Bros., 1940.
Illinois, Constitutional Debates of 1847, edited by Arthur C. Cole, vol. 14 in the collection of Illinois State Historical Society.
Jameson, John Alexander. Constitutional Conventions. 4th ed., 1887.
Kasson, John A. The Evolution of the Constitution of the United States of America. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1904.
Kent, James. Commentaries on American Law. 12th ed. (Holmes). 4 vols. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1873.
Lincoln, Charles Z. The Constitutional History of New York. 5 vols. Rochester, N. Y.: Lawyers Coop. Publishing Co., 1906.
Lincoln, Charles Z. Messages from the Governors. 11 vols. J. B. Lyon Co. Albany, N. Y.: 1909.
Lincoln, Charles Z. Report of the Commissioners of Code Revision. Albany: Wynkoop, Hallenbeck Crawford Co., 1895.
Lincoln Inaugurals, set out in Old South Leaflets, I, Boston.
Locke, John. Essay concerning the true and original extent of Civil Government. I. P. Dutton, ed. 1924.
Madison, James. The Federalist, No. 43.
Madison, James. The Papers of James Madison. Mobile: A. Mygott, 1842.
Milton, George F. The Use of Presidential Power. Boston: Brown & Co., 1944.
Morison, S. F. & Commager, H. E., The Growth of the American Republic. 3d ed. New York; Oxford University Press, 1942.
New York, Record of the 1867 Convention. (Containing the debates.) 5 vols. Albany: 1868.
New York, Record of the 1894 Convention. (As revised.) Reported by William H. Steele. 5 vols. New York: 1896.
New York, Record of the 1915 Constitutional Conventions. (Revised ed.) 2 vols. Albany: J. B. Lyon Co., 1916.
New York State Constitutional Convention Committee (1938). 12 vols. Albany: J. B. Lyon Co., 1938.
New York, What's in the Proposed Constitution, published by National Municipal League (1938).

Official Publications Relating to American State Constitutional Conventions. University of Chicago Library, Document Section. New York: H. W. Wilson Co., 1936.
Orfield, Lester B. The Amending of the Federal Constitution. Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1942.
Peaslee, Amos J. Constitution of Nations. 3 vols. Concord, N. H.: Rumford Press, 1950.
Petersen, Arnold. Constitution of the United States: Founding of the Bourgeois Republic. New York: New York Labor News Co., 1944.
Pomeroy, John Norton. An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States. 3d ed. New York: Hurd & Houghton, 1875.
Poore, Ben Perley. The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters and Other Organic Laws of the United States. 2d ed. 2 vols. 1878.
Post, Charles G., Jr. The Supreme Court and Political Questions, Baltimore, The Johns Hopkins Press, 1936.
Rottschaefer, Henry. Handbook on American Constitutional Law. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co., 1939.
Schroeder, T. A. Methods of Constitutional Construction, the Synthetic Method Illustrated on the Free Speech Clause of the Federal Constitution. New York: Free Speech League, 191–?.
Scott, E. H. The Federalist and Other Constitutional Papers. 2 vols. Chicago: Albert, Scott & Co., 1894.
Shearer, Augustus H. A List of Documentary Material Relating to State Constitutional Conventions, 1776–1912. Chicago: The Newberry Library, 1915.
Shepard, S. The Duty of Christianity to Civil Government. Cincinnati: H. S. Bosworth, 1868.
Shridharani, K. J. War Without Violence, a Study of Gandhi's Methods and Accomplishments. London: V. Goldonez, Ltd., 1939.
Spofford, A. R. The Higher Law Tried by Reason and Authority. New York: S. W. Benedict, 1851.
Stimson, Frederic Jesup. The American Constitution. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1908.
Story, Joseph. Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. 3d ed. Boston; Little, Brown & Co., 1858.
Story, Joseph. Commentaries on the Constitution. 5th ed. 2 vols. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1891.
Sutherland, William A. Notes on the Constitution of the United States. Bancroft-Whitney Co., 1904.
Taylor, Hannis. The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1911.
Thorpe, Francis Newton. American Charters, Constitutions and Organic Laws, 1492–1908. 7 vols. Washington: 1909.
Tolstoi, Leon N. The Law of Love and the Law of Violence. New York: R. Field, 1948.
Trevelyan, George M. The English Revolution 1688–1689, New York. Henry Hobb & Co., 1939.
Tucker, Henry St. George. Limitations on the Treaty-Making Power. Boston: Little Brown & Co., 1915.
Tucker, John Randolph. Constitution of the United States. 2 vols. Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1899.
Walker, Harvey. Law Making in the United States. New York: Ronald Press, 1934.
Warren, Charles. The Making of the Constitution. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1928.
Watson, David K. The Constitution of the United States. 2 vols. Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1910.
Wheeler. Is a Constitutional Convention Impending, 21 Illinois Law Review, 782 (1927).
What's in the Proposed Constitution? (New York). New York: Nat. Mun. League, 1938.
Willis, H. E. Constitutional Law of the United States. Bloomington, Ind.: The Principia Press, 1936.
Willoughby, Westal Woodby. The Constitutional Law of the United States. 2d ed. 3 vols. New York: Baker Voorhies & Co., 1929.

ARTICLES

(Includes law review comments, decision notes, and miscellaneous references)

Almond, B. States Should Call a Constitutional Convention. 10 Ga. Bar Journ. 437 (1948).
Amendments—Child Labor—Validity of Ratification by a State Which Had Previously Rejected. 37 Col. Law Rev. 1201 (1937).
Ames, Herman V. The Amending Provisions of the Federal Constitution in Practice. 63 Am. Phil. Soc. Proc. 62 (1924).
Ames, Herman V. Recent Developments of the Amending Power as Applied to the Federal Constitution. 72 Amer. Phil. Soc. Proc. 27 (1933).
Anderson, R. H. A Proposal to Create Conventions to Ratify Amendments to the United States Constitution. 6 Fla. St. Bar Assoc. Law Journ. 508 (1933).
Anthony, Richard A. Ratification by Convention or Legislature—Constitutional Enigma. 21 Georgetown Law Journ. 333 (1933).
Ball, N. T. Ratification of Constitutional Amendments by State Conventions. 2 Geo. Wash. Law Rev. 216 (1934).
Behout, J. E. Status of Constitutional Conventions in New Jersey. 3 Univ. of Newark Law Rev. 146 (1938).
Behout and Kass. How Can New Jersey Get a New Constitution? 6 Univ. of Newark Law Rev. 7 (1941).
Bricker, John W. U. N. Blueprint for Tyranny. The Freeman (Jan. 28, 1952).
Brown, Everett S. The Ratification of the Twenty-first Amendment. 29 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 1005 (1935).
Brown, Raymond G. The Sixteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. 54 Am. Law Rev. 843 (1920).
Carman, Ernest C. Why and How the Present Method of Amending the Federal Constitution Should be Changed. 17 Ore. Law Rev. 102 (1938).
Chafee, Zechariah. Jr. Comments on Bricker Amendment. 14 Harvard Law School Record, Nos. 3–6 (1952).
Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. Stop Being Terrified of Treaties; Stop Being Scared of the Constitution. 38 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 731 (1952).
Child, Sampson R. Revolutionary Amendments to the Constitution. 10 Const. Rev. 27 (1926).
Clark, Jane Perry. Some Recent Proposals for Constitutional Amendments. 12 Wisc. Law Rev. 313 (1937).
The Constitution of Kentucky. Lexington: Bur. Gov't. Research, Univ. of Ky. (1948).
Constitutional Law—Amendment of United States Constitution—Ratification—Power of Judiciary to Pass Upon Validity. 24 Minn. Law Rev. 393, 411 (1940).
Constitutional Law—Amendment and Revision—Power to Call a Constitutional Convention Limited to Consideration of Specific Topics. 3 Vand. Law Rev. 111 (1949).
Constitutional Law—Amendments—Power of a State to Ratify an Amendment After Previously Rejecting It. 22 Minn. Law Rev. 269 (1938).
Constitutional Law—Ratification of Amendment Subsequent to Rejection by Same State. 17 New York Univ. Law Qt. 122 (1940).
"Constitutional" Limitations on Amendments in Indiana. 28 Ind. Law Journ. 65 (1952).
Constitutional Revision by a Restricted Convention. 35 Minn. Law Rev. 283 (1951).
Corwin, Edward S. Social Planning Under the Constitution. 26 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 1 (1932).
Corwin, Edward S. The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law. Cornell Univ. Press, Ithaca, 1955.
Corwin, Edward S. The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment. 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 185 (1951).
Crouch, Winston W. The Constitutional Initiative in Operation. 33 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 634 (1939).
Cummings, Homer S. Nature of the Amending Process. 6 Geo. Wash. Law Rev. 247 (1938).
Cuvillier, Louis. Shall We Revise the Constitution? 77 Forum 321 (1927).
Daily, F. L. Amending the United States Constitution; Two More Problems, Are Their Rejections Binding. 57 Dick. Law Rev. 137 (1953).
Dean, Arthur H. The Bricker Amendment and Authority Over Foreign Affairs. 32 Foreign Affairs 37 (1953).

Documentary History of the Constitution, Department of State, (1905), V, 141, citing Madison's Letter to Mr. Eve, January 2, 1789.
Dodd, Walter F. Adjustment of the Constitution to New Needs. 22 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 126 (1936).
Dodd, Walter F. Amending the Federal Constitution. 30 Yale Law Journ. 321 (1921).
Dodd, Walter F. Judicially Non-Enforceable Provisions of Constitutions. 80 Univ. of Pa. Law Rev. 54 (1931).
Dodd, Walter F. State Constitutional Conventions and State Legislative Power. 2 Vand. Law Rev. 27 (1948).
Dowling, N. T. Clarifying the Amending Process. 1 Wash. & Lee Law Rev. 215 (1940).
Dulles, John Foster. Speech at American Bar Association Regional Meeting, Louisville, Kentucky, April 11, 1952, Cong. Rec. (Daily) vol. 98 p. 5306.
Faust, Martin L. (ed.) Organization Manual for the Missouri Constitutional Convention of 1943. Columbia: Statewide Comm. for Rev. Const. (1943).
Feibleman, H. V. A Neglected Method of Constitutional Amendment. 6 Fla. St. Bar Assoc. Law Journ. 262 (1932).
Field, Oliver P. The Doctrine of Political Questions in the Federal Courts. 8 Minn. Law Rev. 485 (1924).
Finch, George A. The Treaty Clause Amendment: The Case for The Association. 38 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 467 (1952).
Frank, John P. Political Questions, set out in Supreme Court and Supreme Law, Indiana Univ. Press, Bloomington, 1954.
Goodnow, Frank W. Judicial Interpretation of Constitutional Provisions. 3 Acad. Pol. Sci. Proc. 49 (1912).
Graves, W. B. Unicameral Legislature. 11 Univ. Kan. City Law Rev. 1 (1942).
Grinnell, Frank W. Finality of State's Ratification of a Constitutional Amendment. 11 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 192 (1925).
Grinnell, Frank W. Procedure for Amending Federal Constitution. 28 Amer. Bar Journ. 588 (1942).
Hall, James Parker. An Eighteenth Century Constitution—A Comment. 7 Ill. Law Rev. 285 (1912).
Harvard, William C. The Abortive Louisiana Constitutional Convention of 1951. 13 Journ. of Pol. 697 (1951).
Harvey, Richard S. Phases of the American Revolution. 15 Georgetown Law Rev. 324 (1927).
Hayes, Raymond E. Revolution as a Constitutional Right. 13 Temple Law Qt. 18 (1938).
Henderson, Lewis H. Constitutional Law—Amendments—Child Labor—Validity of Ratification by a State Which Had Previously Rejected. 17 Neb. Law Bull. 81 (1938).
Hindman, Wilbert L. Constitutional Research for California Revision Project. 37 Nat. Mun. Rev. 270 (1948).
Hindman, Wilbert L. Roadblocks to Conventions. 37 Nat. Mun. Rev. 129 (1948).
Holdsworth, W. S. Conventions of the Eighteenth Century Constitutions. 17 Iowa Law Rev. 161 (1932).
Holman, Frank E. Treaty Law Making: A Blank Check for Writing a New Constitution. 36 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 707 (1950).
Hudson, Manley O. Some Problems Under Current Discussion, 1952 Proceedings, American Society of International Law (1952).
Ireland, G. Constitutional Amendments, Power of Conventions. 6 Tul. Law Rev. 78 (1931).
Jacobs, R. K. Problems and Personalities of the First New York Constitutional Convention. 20 New York St. Bar Assoc. Bull. 311 (1948).
Keith, J. P. Methods of Constitutional Revision. Austin: Bur. Mun. Rev. Univ. Tex. (1949).
Kimbrough, Owen. Blazing the Constitution Trail. 37 Nat. Mun. Rev. 140 (1948).
Kimbrough, Owen. Constitutional Revision by the Research Method. 37 Nat. Mun. Rev. 267 (1948).
Konvitz, Milton R. The Constitution and Civil Rights. Columbia Univ. Press (1947).
Larsen, Christian L., and Cowan, Conrad. South Carolina State Constitution Amendment Procedures. Columbia: Bur. Publ. Admin. Univ. S. C. (1948).

Lincoln, A. Ratifications by Conventions: A Discussion of the States to Ratify Proposals of a Federal Constitution. 18 Mass. Law Qt. 287 (1933).
Lee, Blewett. Abolishing the Senate by Amendment. 16 Va. Law Rev. 364 (1930).
Loeb, T. Constitution by Convention. 33 Nat. Mun. Rev. 14 (1944).
Machen, Arthur W., Jr. Is the Fifteenth Amendment Void? 23 Harv. Law Rev. 169 (1910).
Marbury, William L. The Limitations Upon the Amending Power. 33 Harv. Law Rev. 223 (1919).
Marbury, William L. The Nineteenth Amendment and After. 7 Va. Law Rev. 1 (1920).
Martig, Ralph R. Amending the Constitution. 35 Mich. Law Rev. 1253 (1937).
Martin, William Logan. A Study of the Amending Power. 39 Amer. Bar Journ. 21 (1953).
Monsma, George N. Constitutional Law—Amendment of Constitution—Reasonable Time for Amendment—Ratification After Previous Rejection of Amendment. 8 Geo. Wash. Law Rev. 975 (1940).
Morris, M. F. The Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. 189 No. Am. Rev. 82 (1909).
Morse, H. N. May an Amendment to the United States Constitution be Unconstitutional. 10 Ala. Law 199 (1949).
Moseley, Raymond H. The Limited Constitutional Convention. 21 Tenn. Law Rev. 867 (1951).
Murdock, James Oliver. Constitutionality of a Treaty or an Executive Agreement with United Nations to Establish the "World Capital" in the United States. 15 Geo. Wash. Law Rev. 2 (1947).
Musmanno, M. H. The Difficulty of Amending Our Federal Constitution: Defect or Asset? 15 Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 505 (1929).
Mussman, Michael A. Is the Amendment Process Too Difficult? 57 Amer. Law Rev. 694 (1923).
Necessity that Convention to Ratify Proposed Amendment to Federal Constitution be Deliberative. 47 Har. Law Rev. 130 (1933).
Needham, Charles W. Changing the Fundamental Law. 69 Univ. Penn. Law Rev. 223 (1921).
Oklahoma Constitutional Studies of the Oklahoma Constitutional Survey and Citizens Advisory Committees. H. V. Thornton, Director, Okla. City: 1950.
Orfield, Lester B. The Procedure of the Federal Amending Power. 25 Ill. Law Rev. No. 4, 418 (1930).
Orfield, Lester B. The Reform of the Amending Power. 10 N. C. Law Rev. 1 (1931); 10 Neb. Law Rev. 350 (1932).
Orfield, Lester B. What Should be the Function of States in Our System o Government. 23 Neb. Law Rev. 87 (1944).
Packard, Frank E. Rescinding Memorialization Resolutions, 30 Chicago-Ken Law Rev. 339 (1952).
Packard, Frank E. Legal Facets of the Income Tax Rate Limitation Program 30 Chicago-Kent Law Rev. 128 (1952).
Packard, F. E. Will the Future Statehood of Alaska and Hawaii Affect Pendin Federal Amendatory Matter? 57 Dick. Law Rev. 142 (1953).
Papers on Constitutional Revision. 2 vols. Knoxville: Bur. Pub. Admin Univ, Tenn. (1947).
Perlman, Philip B. The Vote on a Constitutional Convention. Baltimo Daily Record, March 19, 1931.
Phillips, Herbert S. Has the Congress the Power Under Article V of the Co stitution to Call and Regulate the Holding of Ratifying Conventions Ind pendent of State Legislature? 6 Fla. St. Bar Assoc. Journ. 573, 1933.
Pillsbury, Albert E. The Fifteenth Amendment. 16 Me. St. Bar Assoc. Pro 17 (1909).
Platz, William A. Article Five of the Federal Constitution. 8 Geo. Wash. La Rev. 17 (1934).
Potter, William P. The Method of Amending the Federal Constitution. 1 Univ. of Pa. Law Rev. 589 (1909).
Powell, Walter R. Constitutional Law—Amendments to the Federal Constit tion—Validity of Resolution of State Legislature Ratifying Child Lab Amendment. 6 Geo. Wash. Law Rev. 218 (1938).
Powers of Constitutional Convention. 7 Col. Law Rev. 611 (1909).
Quarles, James. Amendments to the Federal Constitution. 26 Amer. B Assoc. Journ. 617 (1940).

Raymond, Anan. Revolutions and the Profession. Amer. Bar Assoc. Journ. 859 (1932).
Reese, W. F. Why and How a Constitutional Convention for Louisiana. 1 La. Bar Journ. 21 (1921).
Reeves, J. E. Amending and Revising State Constitutions. 35 Ky. Law Journ. 119 (1947).
Reppy, A. Survey of New York Constitutional Law. 22 New York Univ. Law Qt. 523 (1947).
Rich, Bennett M. Convention or Commission. 37 Nat. Mun. Rev. 133 (1948).
Rich, Bennett M. Revision by Commission. 40 Nat. Mun. Rev. 201 (1951).
Riot—Acts of Violence by Two of Unlawful Assembly Constitute "Riot". 13 Va. Law Rev. 329 (1927).
Rottschaefer, Henry. Legal Theory and the Practice of Law. 10 Minn. Law Rev. 382 (1926).
Russell, Denver L. Constitutional Law—Political Issue—Equal Protection of Laws—Direct Election of Senators. 19 Geo. Wash. Law Rev. 216 (1950).
Saye, Albert B. Georgia's Proposed New Constitution. 39 Amer. Pol. Sci. Rev. 459 (1945).
Saye, Albert B. Trial Run on the New Amending Process. 18 Ga. Bar Journ. 425 (1956).
Scheips, P. J. Significance and Adoption of Article V of the Constitution. 26 Notre Dame Lawyer 46 (1950).
Shenton, C. G. Can the State Legislature Alone Call a Constitutional Convention? 10 Temp. Law Qt. 25 (1935).
Sims, Cecil. The Limited Constitutional Convention in Tennessee. 21 Tenn. Law Rev. 1 (1949).
Skinner, George D. Intrinsic Limitations on the Power of Constitutional Amendment. 18 Mich. Law Rev. 213 (1920).
Smith, Jas. Barclay. Studies in the Adequacy of the Constitution. Los Angeles: 1939.
Sprague, R. J. Shall We Have a Federal Constitutional Convention and What Shall It Do? 3 Maine Law Rev. 115 (1910).
Stahr, E. J., Jr. Constitution Review Commission of Kentucky. 39 Ky. Law Journ. 466 (1952).
Stephens, H. W. Constitutional Conventions. Ga. Bar Assoc. 219 (1931).
Sturdevant, Emerson S. What is the Status of the Child Labor Amendment? 26 Georgetown Law Journ. 107 (1937).
Sturm, Albert L. Methods of State Constitutional Reform. Ann Arbor: Mich. Univ. Press, 1954.
Tanger, Jacob. Amending Procedure of the Federal Constitution. 10 Amer. Pol. Sci. Rev. 689 (1926).
Thompson, James Westfall. Anti-Loyalist Legislation During the American Revolution. 3 Ill. Law Rev. 81 (1908).
Thomson, Meldrim, Jr. Amending the Constitution. 42 Law Notes, No. 1, 9 (1938).
Tolstoi, Leo. Right of Revolution. 5 New Rev. 57.
Tuller, Walter K. A Convention to Amend the Constitution—Why Needed—How It May be Obtained. 193 No. Amer. Rev. 369 (1911).
Weinfeld, Abraham C. Power of Congress Over State Ratifying Conventions. 51 Harv. Law Rev. 473 (1938).
Weston, Melville Fuller. Political Questions. 38 Harv. Law Rev. 296 (1925).
Wheeler, Wayne B. The Constitutionality of the Constitution is not a Justiciable Question. 90 Cent. Law Journ. 152 (1920).
Wheeler, Wayne B. Is a Constitutional Convention Impending? 21 Ill. Law Rev. 782 (1927).
White, Howard. Ohio Program Commission Studies State Constitution. 39 Nat. Mun. Rev. 142 (1950).
White, Justin D. Is There an Eighteenth Amendment? 5 Corn. Law Qt. (1920).
Williams, G. W. Are There Any Limitations on the Power to Amend the Constitution? 5 Temp. Law Qt. 554 (1931).
Williams, Henry N. The Calling of a Limited Constitutional Convention. 21 Tenn. Law Rev. 249 (1950).
Willis, H. E. Constitution Making in 1935–1936. 22 Wash. Univ. Law Qt. 206 (1937).
Willis, H. E. Doctrine of Amendability of United States Constitution. 7 Ind. Law Journ. 457 (1932).

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS AND LAWS

Argentina, Colección de Leves Nacionales, II, 271.
Argentina, Colección de Leves Nacionales, XI, 339.
Department of State Bulletin, vol. 26, p. 371, March 10, 1952. Myers, Denys P. Treaty and Law Under the Constitution.
El Salvador, Constitution (1886).
El Salvador, Constitution (1950).
Guatemala, Decree No. 86 (September 21, 1954).
Guatemala, Decree No. 134 (October 25, 1954).
Illinois, Laws of Illinois (1861).
New York, McKinny's Consolidated Laws of New York.
New York, Laws of New York (1789).
Maryland, House Journal (1939).
Montana, House Journal (1951).
New Jersey, Acts of 1866.
New Jersey, Acts of 1868.
Ohio, Laws of Ohio 1861).
Ohio, Laws of Ohio (1867).
Ohio, Laws of Ohio (1868).
Pennsylvania, Session Laws (1943).
State Constitutions (currently in force):
Alabama clause 18, sec. 286.
Arizona clause 21, sec. 2.
Colorado clause 19, sec. 1.
Delaware clause 16, sec. 2.
Florida clause 17, sec. 2.
Georgia clause 13, sec. 1.
Idaho clause 20, sec. 3.
Illinois clause 14, sec. 1.
Iowa clause 10, sec. 3.
Kansas clause 14, sec. 2.
Kentucky sec. 258.
Maine clause 4, sec. 3.
Maryland clause 14, sec. 2.
Michigan clause 17, sec. 4.
Minnesota clause 14, sec. 2.
Missouri clause 15, sec. 3.
New Hampshire clause 99.
New York clause 14, sec. 2.
Ohio clause 16, sec. 2.
State Constitutions (superseded or repealed):
Delaware, Constitution (1776).
Florida, Constitution (1885).
Georgia, Constitution (1777).
Maryland, Constitution (1776).
Massachusetts, Constitution (1780).
Missouri, Constitution (1875).
New Hampshire, Constitution (1784).
New York, Constitution (1777).
New York, Constitution (1821).
New York, Constitution (1846).
Pennsylvania, Constitution (1776).
South Carolina, Constitution (1778).
Tennessee, Constitution (1870).
Vermont, Constitution (1777).
Texas, Senate Journal (1943), 48th Reg. Sess.
U. S. Code, Title 18 (1952 ed.).
U. S., Congress, Congressional Record, vols. 46, 74, 76, 91, 98.
U. S., Congress, 1st Cong., 1st Sess. (1789) Annals of Congress.
U. S., Congress, House, 1st Cong., 1st Sess., 1789, House Journal.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 22d Cong., 2d Sess., 1833, Senate Journal.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 36th Cong., 2d Sess., 1861, Senate Journal.
U. S., Congress, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., 1869. Congressional Globe.
U. S., Congress, House, H. Doc. 353, pt. 2, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 1897. Ames Herman V. The Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States During the First Century of Its History.

U. S., Congress, Senate, 61st Cong., 2d Sess., 1909, S. Doc. 417. Sutherland, George. The Internal and External Powers of the National Government.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 69th Cong., 1st Sess., 1926, S. Doc. 93. Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.
U. S., Congress, House, 70th Cong., 2d Sess., 1929, H. Doc. 551, Proposed Amendments to the Constitution.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 71st Cong., 2d Sess., 1930, S. Doc. 78. Federal Constitutional Convention.
U. S. Congress, House, 76th Cong., 1st sess., 1939, Congressional Record, p. 134, 2420.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 76th Cong., 3d Sess., 1940, S. Doc. 314. Myers, Denys P. The Process of Constitutional Amendment.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 1941. Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.
U. S., Congress, House Committee on the Judiciary, Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitations on Federal Tax Rates, 82d Cong., 2d sess., 1952.
U. S., Congress, House, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., 1952, Committee on the Judiciary, Problems Relating to State Applications for a Convention to Propose Constitutional Limitation on Federal Tax Rates.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., 1953, S. Doc. 170. Constitution of the United States of America.
U. S., Congress, Senate, 83d Cong., 1st Sess., 1953, S. J. Res. 1.
U. S., Congress, House, 83d Cong., 1st Sess., 1953, H. Doc. 210, How Our Laws Are Made.
U. S., Congress, House, 83d Cong., 1st Sess., 1953, H. Doc. 211, The United States Constitution.
U. S., Congress, Senate. Dulles, John Foster. Hearings Before Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on S. J. Res. 1. 83d Cong., April 6, 1953.
U. S., Congress, House, 83d Cong., 2d Sess., 1954, H. J. Res. 568, H. J. Res. 569.
U. S., Congress, House, 84th Cong., 1st Sess., 1955, H. J. Res. 168, H. J. Res. 169.
U. S. Constitution, Arts. I, II, IV, V, VI, XIV, XVI, XVII, XVIII, XX, XXI.
U. S., Statutes at Large, vols. 14, 15, 37, 43, 54.

Unpublished Materials

Pullen, William R. The Application Clause of the Amending Provision of the Constitution. Unpublished Ph. D. dissertation, Univ. of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C., 1951.
Zinn, Charles J. The Exercise of the Treaty-Making Power Cannot Affect the Denial or Abridgment of Any Right Enumerated in the Constitution. Unpublished S. J. D. dissertion, Georgetown Univ., Washington, D. C., 1954.

○